---

THE Purpose of this DICTIONARY is to give an account of everything that relates to CHRIST—His Person, Life, Work, and Teaching.

It is in a sense complementary to the Dictionary of the Bible, in which, of course, Christ has a great place. But a Dictionary of the Bible, being occupied mainly with things biographical, historical, geographical, or antiquarian, does not give attention to the things of Christ sufficient for the needs of the preacher, to whom Christ is everything. This is, first of all, a preacher's Dictionary. The Authors of the articles have been carefully chosen from among those Scholars who are, or have been, themselves preachers. And even when the articles have the same titles as articles in the Dictionary of the Bible, they are written by new men, and from a new standpoint. It is thus a work which is quite distinct from, and altogether independent of, the Dictionary of the Bible.

It is called a DICTIONARY OF CHRIST AND THE GOSPELS, because it includes everything that the Gospels contain, whether directly related to CHRIST or not. Its range, however, is far greater than that of the Gospels. It seeks to cover all that relates to Christ throughout the Bible and in the life and literature of the world. There will be articles on the Patristic estimate of Jesus, the Mediæval estimate, the Reformation and Modern estimates. There will be articles on Christ in the Jewish writings and in the Muslim literature. Much attention has been given to modern thought, whether Christian or anti-Christian. Every aspect of modern life, in so far as it touches or is touched by Christ, is described under its proper title.

Still, the Gospels are the main source of our knowledge of Christ, and it will be found that the contents of the Gospels, especially their spiritual contents, have never before been so thoroughly investigated and set forth.

It will be observed at once that a large number of the titles of the articles are new. Thus—to take the first letter of the alphabet—there are no articles in the Dictionary of the Bible (unless the word happens to be used in some obsolete sense) on ABGAR, ABIDING, ABOVE AND BELOW, ABSOLUTION, ACCOMMODATION, ACTIVITY, AFFLICTION, AGONY, AMAZEMENT, AMBASSAGE, AMBITION, ANNOUNCEMENTS OF DEATH, ANNUNCIATION, ARBITRATION, ARISTEAS, ARISTON, ARREST, ASCETICISM, ATTRACTION OF CHRIST, ATTRIBUTES OF CHRIST, AUTHORITY OF CHRIST, AUTHORITY IN RELIGION, AWE. These articles are enough to give the present work distinction.

Again, there are certain topics which are treated more fully here than in the Dictionary of the Bible, because they have specially to do with Christ. In the letter A may be named ACCEPTANCE, ACCESS, ALPHA AND OMEGA, ANGER, ANOINTING, ASCENSION, ASSURANCE, ATONEMENT.

All these articles, moreover, have a range which is greater than the corresponding articles in the Dictionary of the Bible, if they occur there. They describe some aspect of Christ's Person or Work, not only as it is presented in the Bible, but also as it has been brought out in the history of the Church, and in Christian experience.

And even when the articles are confined to the Gospels they have a character of their own. The ground that has to be covered being less, the treatment can be fuller. It has also been found possible to make it more expository. Take the following examples—ABBA, AMEN, ANGELS, APOSTLES, ARCHELAUS, ART, AUGUSTUS.

Thus, in a word, there are three classes of topics, each of which contributes something towards the distinction of this work. There are topics, like AUTHORITY OF CHRIST, which are wholly new. There are topics which may or may not be wholly new, like ATTRACTION (which is new) and ATONEMENT (which is not), but which have a wider range than any topics in the Dictionary of the Bible. And there are topics, like ANGELS, which have a narrower range, having no occasion to go beyond the limits of the Gospels, but within that range are fuller, and of more practical value for the preacher.

The subject is inexhaustible. It has not been exhausted in this work. Perhaps the most that has been done is to show how great Christ is.

Many scholars have rendered valuable assistance. In addition to the services of Dr. Selbie and Dr. Lambert, the Editor desires especially to acknowledge those of Professor Howard Osgood of Rochester Theological Seminary, New York, who examined the Gospels minutely to see that no topic had been omitted, and added some useful titles to the list.

The Dictionary will be completed in two volumes, of which this is the first.

DICTIONARY OF CHRIST AND THE GOSPELS

A

AARON.—The name occurs only 5 times in the NT. Three of the passages contain historical references only: Lk 1<sup>8</sup> where Elisabeth is described as 'of the daughters of Aaron'; Ac 7<sup>30</sup> which refers to the request of the Israelites that Aaron would 'make them gods'; and He 9<sup>4</sup> 'Aaron's rod that budded.' The other two passages refer to Aaron's office as high priest, and are directly concerned with the Christian doctrine of the priesthood of Christ. In He 5<sup>4</sup> we read, 'And no man taketh the honour unto himself, but when he is called of God, even as was Aaron'; and He 7<sup>11</sup> speaks of another priest after the order of Melchizedek, who should 'not be reckoned after the order of Aaron.' It is as the representative high priest that Aaron has been regarded as a type of Christ.

The two points on which the writer of Hebrews insists are, one of comparison, and one of contrast. On the one hand, Christ, like Aaron, did not take His priestly office on Himself, but was directly appointed by God (5<sup>9</sup>); on the other, the Aaronic type of priesthood is sharply distinguished from that of our Lord in certain fundamental respects. Christ was indeed divinely appointed: He was prepared for service, in being made like His brethren (2<sup>17</sup>), and fitted by His sympathy (4<sup>15</sup>) and fidelity to undertake priestly work on their behalf; through His death on the cross He offered Himself as a sacrifice, apparently on earth and certainly in heaven as a temple not made with hands (9<sup>24</sup>); He is able to save to the uttermost those who come to God through Him as priest, seeing He ever lives to make priestly intercession for them (7<sup>25</sup>). Thus far He was Aaron's antitype. But the analogy fails most seriously in certain important features, as the writer of Hebrews shows. Christ's priesthood was not according to the Law. If He were on earth, He would not be a priest at all, springing as He did from Judah, not from Levi (7<sup>14</sup>). He did not hold His office in virtue of earthly descent, nor was He limited to an earthly sanctuary, nor did He present to God a sin-offering which could be, or needed to be, frequently repeated (9<sup>24</sup>). None of the sacrifices of the Law could 'make perfect as pertaining to the conscience' (9<sup>9</sup>). At best they procured only a limited access to God. Into the holiest place the high priest was permitted to enter only once a year, and then in virtue of sacrifices offered for his own sins, as well as the people's (9<sup>7</sup>). Christ's priesthood was 'after the order of Melchizedek' (6<sup>20</sup>), eternal: His sacrifice was a spiritual one, offered once for all; it is impossible to think of the repetition on earth of that offering which 'through (the) eternal Spirit' (9<sup>14</sup>) our glorified High Priest presents continually in 'a more perfect tabernacle' (v. 11) in heaven itself, for us. He was made a priest, not according to any legal enactment belonging to earth and finding its expression in the flesh; but dynamically, according to the enduring power of an indissoluble life (7<sup>16</sup>).

Thus Christ may well be spoken of as the second Adam, but not as a second Aaron. The lines of Bishop Wordsworth's hymn, 'Now our heavenly Aaron enters, Through His blood within the veil,' can be defended only in so far as the name Aaron is synonymous with high priest. The personal name suggests just those limitations which the generic name avoids, and which the writer of Hebrews expressly warns us must on no account be attributed to our great High Priest who has passed into the heavens. So far as the doctrine of Christ is concerned, it is well to follow Scripture usage and to speak of Him as our Eternal High Priest, rather than to press an analogical or typical relation to Aaron, which fails at many cardinal points.

LITERATURE.—For the further discussion of the subject see Westcott and A. B. Davidson on Hebrews, especially the detached note of the latter on the Priesthood of Christ; also Milligan's Baird Lectures on The Ascension and Heavenly Priesthood of our Lord, and the art. of Dr. Denney on 'Priesthood in NT' in Hastings DB, vol. iv. W. T. DAVISON.

ABBA.—An Aramaic word preserved by St. Mark in our Lord's prayer in Gethsemane (14<sup>36</sup>) 'Abba ô pater, tôra ðinacá σοι', and given twice in the same association with ô pater by St. Paul (Ro 8<sup>16</sup> ἐλέητε πνεύμα υιοθεσίας ἐν ᾧ κράζουσιν, 'Abba ô pater'; and Gal 4<sup>6</sup> ἐξαπέστειλεν ἐν Θεῷ τὸ Πνεῦμα τοῦ υιοῦ αὐτοῦ εἰς τὰς καρδίας ἡμῶν κράζον, 'Abba ô pater'). A difficulty arises both as to the spelling and the pronunciation of the word Abba, and also as to its being found in all the above passages joined to ô pater.

1. Abba (Abba) corresponds to the Aramaic אבא abba, which is the definite state of אב abb (construct state אב abb), and means 'Father,' unless it is used for 'my Father' (אבא for אב) as in Gn 19<sup>26</sup> (Targ. of Onkelos and pseudo-Jonathan; see Dalman, Aramäisch-Neuhebräisches Wörterbuch, s.v., Gramm. p. 162, and Words of Jesus, p. 112 [Dalman says that the suffix of 1 pers. sing. is 'deliberately avoided with אב and is supplied by the determinative form']. It is not, however, quite certain that the word was pronounced abbā in Palestine in our Lord's time. As the points were not invented till many centuries after, we cannot be sure that abbā was then the definite state rather than abbā as in Syriac; and we have no indication except the Greek transliteration that the b was then doubled. But the fact that, when points were first used (A.D. 700?), the daghesch was employed for the definite state of this word in the Targumic literature, coupled with the doubling of the β in the Greek, affords a presumption that the b was hard and doubled in this word at the beginning of our era [Dalman gives for the definite state אבא Gn 44<sup>b</sup>, or אב Nu 25<sup>d</sup>, or in Palestinian Targum also אבא; with other pronominal suffixes we have אבאי etc., and the pl. definite state is אבאן]. The Syriac, on the other hand, has b aspirated throughout, אב abb, אבא abbā (pron. av, avā, or av, avā), etc., and the distinction between אבא abbā, a spiritual father, and אבא avā, a natural father, which the grammarians make, appears not to be founded on any certain basis, nor to agree with the manuscripts [Payne-Smith, Thesaurus Syriacus, s.v.]. The proper name אבא also in Syriac has always aspirated b, while Dalman (Wörterbuch) gives for Targumic אבא, and says it is an abbreviation of אבא. In Mk 14<sup>36</sup> (Peshitta) Pusey and Gwilliam give אבא as in Massora 1 in the British Museum (Codex Additionalis 12138, Nestorianus, A.D. 899); the American edition prints אבא (i.e. with א) in all three NT places; but this is rather a following of the grammarians than of good manuscripts. It is very noteworthy, however, that the Harleian version in the Marcan passage spells the word אבא, transliterating the Greek directly back into Syriac, rather than using the Syriac word itself.

John Lightfoot (Horæ Hebraicæ on Mk 14<sup>36</sup>) remarks that the Targum, in translating the OT, never renders a 'civil' father, i.e. a master, prince, lord, etc., by אבא, but only a natural father, or a father who adopts; in the former sense they use some other word. But this throws no light on the pronunciation of Abba.

It is to be noticed that it is not certain how the Greeks of the 1st cent. themselves pronounced אבא, whether abbā or, as the modern Greeks pronounce it, avā. The word is not found in the LXX. It passed into ecclesiastical Latin with a doubled b, and gave us such words as 'abbot,' 'abbacy,' etc.

But does it mean 'Father' or 'my Father'? If it be a Jewish formula or fixed manner of beginning prayer, it may well be the latter. We must, however, note that whatever be the way of accounting for אבא δ πατήρ (see below), the originators or originator of that phrase in Greek, whether the Jews, or our Lord, or St. Paul, or the Second Evangelist, seem to have taken אבא to mean merely 'Father.' And the same is probably true of the translators of the Peshitta. The Sinaitic Syriac, however, appears to read אבא my Father (see below). The Curetonian Syriac is wanting here.

2. We have next to account for the association of אבא in its Greek dress with δ πατήρ in all the three places where it occurs in NT. In Mk 14<sup>36</sup> the Peshitta reads אבא אבא 'Father, my Father,' and the Sinaitic Syriac has simply אבא 'my Father.' In Ro 8<sup>15</sup> and Gal 4<sup>6</sup> the Peshitta reads אבא אבא. All these appear to be mere expedients adopted to avoid the awkwardness of repeating אבא, and they do not really throw light on the origin of the Greek phrase.

We may first take as a supposition that our Lord, praying in Gethsemane, used the Aramaic language, and therefore said 'Abba' only, and that δ πατήρ is the Evangelist's explanation, for Greek readers, of the Aramaic word. St. Mark undoubtedly reports several Aramaic words, and except in the case of the well-known 'Rabbi,' 'Rabboni' (9<sup>10</sup> etc.), explains them. But then he always uses a formula, δ τερως (9<sup>10</sup> 71: 3) or δ τερως μετρησθησθεστωσ (5<sup>11</sup> 15<sup>14</sup>). It is suggested that in the case of Abba the familiarity of the word would make the connecting formula unnecessary; but the same consideration would make it unnecessary to explain it at all. Another suggestion is that the solemnity of the context would make the formula incongruous. The strongest argument for δ πατήρ being an addition of the Evangelist is that, whatever view we take of our Lord's having made use of Greek in ordinary speech, it is extremely unlikely that His prayers were in that language; and if He prayed in Aramaic, He would only say 'Abba.' It is the common experience of bilingual countries that though the acquired language may be in constant use for commerce or the ordinary purposes of life, the native tongue is tenaciously retained for devotion and prayer. Sanday-Headlam's supposition (Romans, in loc.), that our Lord used both words spontaneously, with deep emotion, might be quite probable if He prayed in the foreign tongue, Greek; but scarcely so if He prayed in the native Aramaic (see, however, below).

If δ πατήρ be due to St. Mark, it is probably not a mere explanation for the benefit of Greek readers. The suggestion that אבא δ πατήρ had become a quasi-liturgical formula, possibly even among the Jews, or more probably among the Christians, would account for its introduction in a prayer, where interpretations would be singularly out of place. And this suggestion would account for St. Paul's using the phrase twice, in two Epistles written about the same time, indeed, but to two widely distant Churches. St. Paul is not in the habit of introducing Aramaic words ('Maran atha' in 1 Co 16<sup>22</sup> is an exception), and if he were not quoting a well-known form, it is unlikely that he would have introduced one in writing to the Romans and Galatians. It is not probable, however, that he is quoting or thinking of our Lord's words in Gethsemane, for there is nothing in the context to suggest this.

If the phrase be a liturgical formula, we may account for it in various ways. J. B. Lightfoot (Galatians, in loc.) suggests that it may have originated among Hellenistic Jews; or else among Palestinian Jews, after they had learned Greek, as 'an expression of importunate entreaty.' He prefers the latter view, thinking that perhaps our Lord Himself used both words. He apparently means that Jesus took the Greek word into His Aramaic prayer; and he quotes from Schöttgen a similar case where a woman entreats a judge and addresses him as אבא 'My lord, lord,' the second word being equivalent to the first, except for the possessive suffix, and being a transliteration of Abba. Chase ('The Lord's Prayer in the Early Church,' in the Cambridge Texts and Studies, vol. 1, p. 23) has suggested another origin for the phrase, which would place its home, not among the Jews (for which there is no evidence), but among the Christians. He suggests that it is due to the shorter or Lukan form of the Lord's Prayer (Lk 11<sup>22</sup>). The Aramaic shorter form would begin with Abba, for the Greek begins with Πατερ; and the hypothesis is that the early Christians in the intensity of their devotion repeated the first word of the prayer in either language. A somewhat similar phenomenon is seen in the repetitions for emphasis in Rev 9<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>2</sup> 20<sup>2</sup>, where the names are given in both languages. Such a repetition is possible only in a bilingual country. That it is the shorter form of the Lord's Prayer that is used (if Dr. Chase's hypothesis be true), is seen from the Aramaic Abba. If the longer form had been in question, Πατερ ἡμῶν, the initial word of the Lord's Prayer. This shows that both Evangelists had that prayer in their minds when relating the agony. The only consideration which militates against the theory is that ὁ πατήρ is used for Πατερ. The nominative with the article is, however, often used in NT, by a Hebrew analogy, for an emphatic vocative, and the desire for emphasis may account for its use here. A. J. MACLEAN.

ABEL (אָבֶל, אֶבֶל).—4. The name occurs in the Gospels only in Mt 23<sup>35</sup> || Lk 11<sup>51</sup>, where Jesus declares that the blood of the prophets will be required of this generation. The passage is one of a series of invectives against Pharisaism, collected in Mt 23, parts of which are preserved in Lk 11, 13, 14, 20, 21. Abel is named as the first of the long line of martyrs whose blood had been shed during the period covered by the OT, the last being Zachariah (which see). 'In both cases the ἀκρόασις is indicated: "the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground" (Gn 4<sup>10</sup>); "the Lord look upon it, and require it" (2 Ch 24<sup>24</sup>). In St. Matthew the words are addressed to the Pharisees in the 2nd person: "that upon you may come every righteous blood [i.e. the blood of each righteous person] shed upon the earth, from the blood of Abel the righteous, until the blood of Zachariah . . . etc.'" In St. Luke the passage is thrown into the 3rd person: "that the blood of all the prophets which hath been shed from the foundation of the world may be required of this generation, from the blood of Abel until the blood of Zachariah . . . etc."

The description of Abel in St. Matthew as 'the righteous' is noteworthy, and should be compared with He 11<sup>4</sup>. In the story of Abel nothing whatever is said as to his moral character; the contrast between him and his brother lay in the fact that 'Jehovah had respect unto Abel and to his offering; but unto Cain and to his offering he had not respect.' The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews says that it was faith which led Abel to offer the more excellent sacrifice; but wherein the excellence consisted the narrative of Genesis does not explain. But the expression καὶ ἀγαπᾶσθαι seems to reflect the Pharisaic conception of righteousness as that which 'consisted primarily in the observance of all the rites and ceremonies prescribed in the law' (cf. Lk 1<sup>5</sup>). Abel's offering must have been preferred presumably because it was in some way more to God's liking—more correct. This, however, was not consonant with Christ's idea of righteousness—'except your righteousness shall abound beyond that of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 5<sup>20</sup>). It may be concluded, therefore, that St. Luke has preserved the more original form of Christ's words, and that 'the righteous' is an addition in Mt 23<sup>35</sup> due to current Jewish conceptions.

2. It is possible that Christ had the story of Abel in mind when He spoke of the devil as being 'a murderer (ἀποποκτόνος) from the beginning,' i.e. the instigator of murder as he is of lies (Jn 8<sup>44</sup>). But the passage may be a reference to the introduction of death into the world by the fall of Adam.

3. In He 12<sup>24</sup> the 'blood of Abel' is contrasted with the 'blood of sprinkling' under the new dispensation. In Gn 4<sup>10</sup> God says: 'Hark! (שָׁמַע) thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground,' i.e. it pleads for vengeance. But the blood of sprinkling 'speaketh something better' (εὐαγγελίον λαλοῦντι): it is the blood shed in ratification of a New Covenant, whose mediator is Jesus.

ABGAR.—Between the years B.C. 99 and A.D. 217 eight (or ten) kings or toparchs of Edessa in Osroëne bore this name. It is with the toparch that ruled in the time of our Saviour, Abgar Ukkāma ('the Black,' c. B.C. 13 to A.D. 50 [Gutschmid], b.c. 9 to A.D. 46 [Dionysius of Telmahara]), that we are here concerned, owing to the legendary accounts of his correspondence with Jesus, accepted as historical fact by Eusebius, and by him given wide currency. Eusebius (HE i. 13) relates, without any suggestion of scepticism, that 'king Abgar, who ruled with great glory the nations beyond the Euphrates, being afflicted with a terrible disease which it was beyond the power of human skill to cure, when he heard of the name of Jesus and His miracles, . . . sent a message to Him by a courier and begged Him to heal the disease.' Eusebius proceeds to impart the letter of Abgar and the answer of Jesus, which he claims to have derived directly from the archives of Edessa, and to have translated (or caused to be translated) literally from Syriac into Greek. The letter of Abgar reads as follows:—

'Abgar, ruler of Edessa, to Jesus the excellent Saviour who has appeared in the country of Jerusalem, greeting. I have heard the reports of thee and of thy cures as performed by thee without medicines or herbs. For it is said that with a word only thou makest the blind to see and the lame to walk, that thou cleansest lepers and castest out impure spirits and demons, and that thou healest those afflicted with lingering diseases, and also that thou raisest the dead. And having heard all these things concerning thee, I have concluded that one of two things must be true: either thou art God and hast come down from heaven to do these things, or else thou who doest these things art the Son of God. Wherefore I have written to thee to ask thee that thou wouldest take the trouble to come even to me and heal the disease which I have. For I have been informed that the Jews are murmuring against thee and are plotting to injure thee. But I have a city, small indeed yet honourable, which may suffice for us both.'

The answer of Jesus runs:—
'Blessed art thou who hast believed in me when thou thyself hast not seen me. For it stands written concerning me, that they who have seen me will not believe in me, and that they who have not seen me will believe and be saved. But in regard to what thou hast written me, that I should come to thee, it is necessary for me to fulfil all things here for which I have been sent, and after I have fulfilled them thus to be taken up again to Him that sent me. But after I have been taken up, I will send to thee one of my disciples, that he may heal thy disease and give life to thee and those who are with thee.'

From an accompanying narrative in the Syriac language, giving an account of the fulfilment of Christ's promise, Eusebius quotes at considerable length. A brief summary of the contents of this document must here suffice. Judas, also called Thomas, is said to have sent Thaddæus, one of the Seventy, to Edessa, soon after the ascension of Jesus. Arriving in Edessa, he took lodgings, and without reporting himself at the court engaged extensively in works of healing. When the king heard thereof he suspected that he was the disciple promised by Jesus, and had him brought to court. On the appearance of Thaddæus 'a great vision appeared to Abgar in the countenance of Thaddæus,' which led the former to prostrate himself before the latter, to the astonishment of the courtiers, who did not see the vision. Having become assured that his guest is the promised disciple of Jesus, and that he has come fully empowered to heal and to save on condition of his exercise of faith, Abgar assures Thaddæus that his faith is so strong that, had it not been for the presence of the Romans, he would have sent an army to destroy the Jews that crucified Jesus. Thaddæus assures him that in fulfilment of the Divine plan of redemption Jesus has been taken up to His Father, and, on a further profession of faith in Father and Son, Thaddæus lays his hands upon the king and heals him. Many other healings follow, accompanied by the preaching of the gospel. At Thaddæus' suggestion the king summons the citizens as a body to hear the preaching of the word, and afterwards offers him a rich reward, which is magnanimously refused. According to the Syriac document from which Eusebius quotes, the visit of Thaddæus occurred in the year 340 of the era of the Seleucidae (corresponding, according to K. Schmidt in PRE, sub voc., to A.D. 29; according to others, A.D. 30, 31, or 32).

From the same Edessene materials Moses of Chorene, the Armenian historian of the middle of the 5th cent., prepared independently of Eusebius an account of the intercourse between Abgar and Christ and His disciples, which attests the general correctness of Eusebius' work. The fact that Moses was for several years a student in Edessa enhances the value of his account. He represents the reply of Jesus as having been written on His behalf by Thomas the Apostle. In Moses' account occurs the statement that after his conversion Abgarus wrote letters to the emperor Tiberius, to Nerses, king of Assyria, to Ardaches, king of Persia, and others, recommending Christianity (Hist. Arm. ii. 30-33). Here also appears the legend that Christ sent by Ananias, the courier of Abgar, a picture of Himself impressed upon a handkerchief. This part of the story was still further elaborated by Cedrenus (Hist. Comp. p. 176), who represents Ananias, the courier of Abgar, as himself an artist, and as so overcome by the splendour of the countenance of Jesus when attempting to depict it that he was obliged to desist; whereupon Christ, having washed His face, wiped it with a towel which retained His likeness. This picture was taken by Ananias to his master, and it became for the city a sort of talisman. This miraculously produced portrait, or what purported to be such, is said to have been transferred to the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople in the 10th cent., and later to have passed thence to the church of St. Sylvester in Rome, where it is still exhibited for the edification of the faithful. A church in Genoa makes a rival claim to the possession of the original handkerchief portrait.

Any suspicion that Eusebius fabricated the documents that he professes to translate was set aside by the discovery and publication of what have been accepted as the original Syriac documents

(The Doct. of Addai the Apostle, with an English Translation and Notes, by G. Phillips, London, 1876). The Syriac document contains the story of the portrait, which was probably already current in the time of Eusebius. The Syriac version of the story given by Cureton in his Ancient Syriac Documents seems to be an elaborate expansion of that of Eusebius, and to have been composed considerably later.

The letter of Christ to Abgar was declared by a Roman Council in 494 or 495 to be spurious. Tillemont sought to prove the genuineness of the correspondence (Mémoires, i. pp. 362, 615), and similar attempts have been made by Welte (Tübingen Quartalschr. 1842, p. 335 ff.), Rinck (Zeitschr. f. Hist. Theol. 1843, ii. pp. 3-26), Phillips (preface to The Doct. of Addai), and Cureton (Anc. Syr. Doc.).

It may be assumed that the documents were forged some time before Eusebius used them. Christianity seems to have been introduced into Osrhoëne during the 2nd cent. A.D. The first king known to have favoured Christianity was Abgar VIII. (bar-Manu), who reigned 176-213, and is said to have been on very intimate terms with Bardesanes, the scholarly Gnostic. A Christian church building modelled after the temple in Jerusalem existed in Edessa some time before 202, until, according to the Edessene Chronicle, it was destroyed (middle of the 6th cent.) by flood. As Edessa grew in importance as a Christian centre, with its theological school, its ambition for distinction may have led some not over-scrupulous ecclesiastic to fabricate these documents and to palm them off on the too credulous authorities. The forgery may have occurred early in the 3rd cent. (Zahn), but more probably early in the 4th. The only piece of real information that has come down to us regarding the Abgar of the time of Christ is a very uncomplimentary reference in Tacitus (Ann. xii. 12, 14).

ABIA (AV of Mt 17, Lk 15).—See ABIAH.

ABIATHAR.—The son of Ahimelech, the son of Ahitub, the son of Phinehas, the son of Eli. He is mentioned in Mk 22<sup>23, 28</sup>. 'Have ye never read what David did, when he had need, and was an hungred, he, and they that were with him? How he went into the house of God in the days of Abiathar the high priest, and did eat the shewbread?' The RV, however, translates, 'when Abiathar was high priest.' The reference is evidently to 1 S 21, where, according to the Hebrew text, Ahimelech gives David the sacred bread. There is thus a discrepancy between the two passages. The facts are these:—The AV, cited above, follows the reading of A and C (εστ' Αβιαθαρ τον αρχιερευς), RV follows that of B and N (which omit the article) and the Vulgate ('sub Abiathar principe sacerdotum'). The clause is omitted altogether by D. In the MT of 1 S 21 and 22 and in Ps 52<sup>8</sup> (title) the high priest is Ahimelech the son of Ahitub and the father of David's friend Abiathar. In the Greek text of all these passages, however, the name is Abimelech. In 2 S 8<sup>17</sup> and 1 Ch 24<sup>6</sup> Ahimelech (in 1 Ch 18<sup>16</sup> Abimelech) the son of Abiathar is priest along with Zadok, but it is generally supposed that Abiathar the son of Ahimelech is meant. Ahimelech is usually held to be identical also with Abihah the son of Ahitub of 1 S 14<sup>3, 15</sup>.

The discrepancy between Mk 2<sup>28</sup> and 1 S 21 f. has been sought to be accounted for in several ways. It may readily be due to a mere lapsus memoriae or calamity: Abiathar, David's high priest, being a much more familiar figure than his father, just as in Jer 27 'Jehoiakim' is a slip for Zedekiah. It is not impossible that father and son may each have borne both names, according to Arab usage, Abiathar corresponding to the Arab kunyah, and Ahimelech being the ism or lakab, or name proper. It has been suggested that the reference in St. Mark is not to 1 S 21 at all, but to some later unrecorded incident, such as might have occurred during the flight from Absalom. But this is very improbable.* T. H. WEIR.

ABIDING.—Of the three possible renderings of the Greek μωή and μένω, 'remaining, to remain,' 'dwelling, to dwell,' 'abiding, to abide,' the last is the most satisfactory. The first has the advantage of being akin to the Greek in derivation, but it is too passive in its sense, and in so far as it includes the conception of expectation it is misleading; the second is too local, and is rather the fitting rendering of κατοικία, κατοικέω; the last is an adequate though not a perfect rendering. 'Mansions' (RV in 'abiding places') is the stately rendering (AV and RV), through the Vulg. mansiones, of the noun in Jn 14; but it becomes impossible in v. 23 of the same chapter when the translators fall back on 'abode.' Further, in the English of to-day 'mansion' suggests merely a building, and that of an ostentatious type. The Scottish 'manse,' self-contained, modest, and secure, would be a nearly exact equivalent if it carried with it more than the idea of a dwelling-house; yet neither it nor 'mansion' has any correspondent verb.

Students who desire to get at the full meaning of verb or noun will find all that is useful in the etymological paragraph sub voc. μένω in the larger edition of Liddell and Scott's Greek Lexicon. They will discover how rich in language product is the root of this word. The inquiry cannot be pursued further here. It is enough to say that locality enters very slightly into its conception, and that what is dominant is ethical. The leading idea is that of steadfast continuance. This is apparent the moment one turns to the derivative ὑπομονή (cf. Ro 2<sup>7</sup>), the term of Stoic virtue boldly incorporated and transmuted in Christian usage and experience. The primitive noun, however (μωή), reminds Christians more clearly of the sphere in which it is contained, of a life in which it survives, of a power not its own on which it depends, and which in turn it exercises. If, as will be shown, the ethical import of μένω and μωή is dominant in the Gospels, the instances where the verb has a purely local sense, the sense of stopping or staying, may be dismissed. As a matter of fact, the instances are almost entirely confined to the Synoptists, and occur but in twelve passages; the use of the noun is purely Johannine. Only twice in the Synoptists does the verb occur in relation to persons, viz. Lk 24<sup>28</sup> in the pathetic appeal of Cleopas and his anonymous comrade, and the gracious response of the risen Christ; and even here there is no ethical significance, for the prepositions which link the verb and the personal pronouns imply only association (μεῖνον μεθ' ἡμῶν), or joint action (εἰσῆλθον τοῖς μέναισιν αὐτοῖς).

As soon as the student turns from the Synoptists to the Johannine literature, the idea of 'mansion' (one could wish it were a theological term) becomes full, luminous, and suggestive. St. John uses the verb μένω only thrice in its literal sense in the Gospel (2<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>40</sup>); he seems almost jealously to reserve it for metaphorical, i.e. ethical, application. We are not here concerned with St. John's letters, but it is pertinent to observe that μένω occurs 23 times therein, while it is used in the Gospel some 35 times. Moreover, as if the Evangelist and letter-writer would not suffer the spiritual point to be lost, he perpetually reminds his readers and children of the sphere of 'mansion,' and the source of its power. With a singular and marked uniformity, he employs the preposition ἐν in connexion with the verb. The Evangelist presses the idea not only of intimate relationship, but also of resultant power and blessing.

It is to be observed that, until we reach the great discourses in the chamber and on the way (chs. 14 and 15), we have only passing hints of the nature of the Abiding. The former chapter unfolds its meaning. The difficulties besetting the interpretation of these discourses are familiar to all students of the Fourth Gospel, and need not be dealt with here. They are not adequately met by references to the subjectivity or mysticism of the Evangelist. Our modes of thought, as Bishop Westcott reminds us,* follow a logical sequence; Hebrew modes of thought follow a moral sequence. The sermon to the Apostles in the chamber, especially, bears this moral impress throughout, and is rightly interpreted as the complement to the Sermon on the Mount. But while the connexion is thus somewhat precarious to the reader, certain great ideas or conceptions of the Abiding stand luminously forth for the devout mind. Here is set forth—(1) the Abiding of Christ in the Father; (2) the Abiding of Christ in the Church, as in the individual believer; (3) the issues of the Abiding.

1. The Abiding of Christ in the Father.—Here the student is, indeed, on ground most holy. He may not add to the Lord's words, he trembles as he ventures to interpret them. He feels with the patriarch that this place in the Scriptures is dreadful—full of a holy awe. Thus much, however, may be said, that the abiding of Christ in the Father belongs wholly to the operation and energy of the Holy Spirit. The keynote of this truth is struck by the testimony of the Baptist in the preamble of the Gospel (Jn 1<sup>32</sup>). It is important to notice that that which was the object of sight to the Baptist was not merely the descent of the Holy Spirit, but the Abiding. And here the careful student will observe that, though the preposition used in these verses is not ἐν but ἐν, yet the employment of the latter is necessary as linking the descent and the continuous indwelling of the Spirit in the Son. But if any hesitation remains as to the view that the character and sphere of Christ's abiding in the Father lies in and through the indwelling Spirit, it must disappear on consideration of our Lord's words (Jn 14<sup>20</sup>), 'At that day [the day of realized life] ye shall come to know [by the Spirit what is at present a matter of faith only] that I am in my Father.' The thought is inevitably linked with the Spirit's work both in Him and for them. When, therefore, the Lord invites His own to abide in His love (15<sup>9</sup>), He does not merely imply that His love is the atmosphere of their discipleship, but, as St. Augustine† suggests, He invites them to abide in that Holy Spirit whose love as fully permeates Him as it is imperfectly exhibited in His disciples.

2. The Abiding of Christ in the Church, as in the individual believer.—Our Lord's teaching as to the Abiding in Him refers even more closely to the Church than to the individual. Jn 14 and 15 are penetrated through and through by Pentecostal thought and Pentecostal expectations. Christ looked eagerly forward to the birthday of the Spirit-bearing body. He could and does, indeed, fully abide in the heart of each individual believer; but that believer is not a mere unit standing solitary and unsupported. The individual disciple will be a terrible loser unless he realize his incorporation, his oneness with the universal body, the body of Christ. But as if to make sure that this great truth should never escape him, his own down the ages, Christ introduces the great figure of the Vine and the branches (15<sup>1-6</sup>). The vine was already the symbol of the ancient Church; * Christ speaks of Himself as the true, the ideal Vine. But it is as a formula incomplete without the complement of v. 5 'I am the Vine, ye are the branches.' As a vine is inconceivable without branches,† so in all devoutness it may be said He is inconceivable without His disciples. Again, they draw their life from abiding in Him. The life may be imperfectly realized, the fruitage may be disappointing, it may be nothing but leaves (Mt 21<sup>9</sup>); the task of discipline, or of cleansing (καθαίρει, Jn 15<sup>2</sup>) is in the hands of the Great Husbandman. Thus as in ancient Israel union with the Church nation was the condition of life, so in the new dispensation the condition of life was to be the abiding in Christ. As apart from the vine the branches are useless since the living sap is therein no longer, so separated from Christ there can be no productiveness in Christian lives. St. John bears record of one more thought of the highest consolation to Christian hearts. There is a true analogy and correspondence between the abiding of Christ in the Father and the abiding of believers in Him (15<sup>9</sup>). Our abidings in Christ, often so sadly brief, uncertain, precarious, through the consequences of sin, have still their sublime counterpart in the abiding of Christ in the Father.

8. The issues of the Abiding.—We have seen that the Abiding finally depends upon the Spirit's work, whether in the Church or in the individual heart. The first fruit of that Spirit is love. The Spirit moves in this sphere, He manifests and expresses Himself in love. Thus love furnishes the test of the indwelling, as truly as it contains the pledge of a fruitful issue. According, moreover, to Johannine teaching, this love spread abroad in the hearts of believers is not a stagnant or sentimental affection. Of the basal or abiding virtues (1 Co 13<sup>3</sup>) it is the greatest because of its fruitful action. St. John presents another aspect of this truth when he shows that obedience and love are strictly correlated (Jn 15<sup>9</sup>). This love is seen in action. It doeth the will, and the reward of such loving obedience is final and complete. Those who in this dutiful and affectionate temper keep the commandments are raised by Christ from the base of bond-service to the height of friendship. It is enough—the fiat has gone forth—'such ones I have called friends.' †

ABIJAH (אִבְיָהוּ, 'Abid, 'Jah is my father'; or more probably without the particularizing pronoun, 'Jah is father').—1. Son of Rehoboam (Mt 1<sup>7</sup>) by Maacah (2 Ch 11<sup>20</sup>—see art. 'Maacah' No. 3 in Hastings' DB iii. 180). Abijah reigned over Judah from about B.C. 920, and the impressions made by him are given with some variety in 1 K 15<sup>2</sup> and by a later tradition in 2 Ch 13<sup>2-22</sup>. His name is introduced by St. Matthew simply as a link in the pedigree, in which it is shown that Jesus was both of Jewish and of royal stock.

2. A descendant of Eleazar, son of Aaron. The name was attached to the eighth of the twenty-four courses into which the priests were alleged to have been divided by David (1 Ch 24<sup>10</sup>). Members of only four courses seem to have returned from the Captivity (Neh 7<sup>29-41</sup>, Ezr 2<sup>26-29</sup> 10<sup>18-22</sup>). According to Jerus. Talm. Taanith, iv. 68, these men were divided into twenty-four courses with a view to restore the ancient arrangement. The authority for this statement is not of the best kind; but the statement itself is substantially confirmed by Neh 12<sup>7</sup>, where twenty-two groups are referred to (in Neh 12<sup>10-21</sup> the number has fallen to twenty-one, and two of the courses are grouped under a single representative), and by Ezr 8<sup>2</sup>, where two other priestly families are mentioned. Slight changes were probably made in the classification during the process of the resettlement of the country; but by the time of the Chronicler the arrangement seems to have become fixed. The course of Abijah is not mentioned amongst those that returned from the Exile; but in one of the later rearrangements the name was attached to a course that afterwards included Zacharias (Lk 1<sup>5</sup>). Each course was on duty for a week at a time, but all were expected to officiate as needed at the three great annual festivals. It is not possible with our present materials to determine exactly how the various services were divided amongst the members of a course, or at what times in the year Zacharias would be on duty. Nor does his inclusion in the course of Abijah carry with it lineal descent through that line from Aaron.

ABILENE.—Mentioned in Lk 3<sup>1</sup> as the district of which Lysanias was tetrarch in the 15th year of Tiberius. It was called after its capital Abila, situated on the Barada, about 18 miles from Damascus, and represented by the modern village of Sufé. The identity of Sufé with Abila is confirmed by a Roman rock-inscription to the west of the town. According to popular tradition, the name Abila is derived from Abel, who was buried by Cain in a tomb which is still pointed out in the neighbourhood. Little is known of the history of Abilene at the time referred to by St. Luke; but when Tiberius died in A.D. 37, some ten years later, the tetrarchy of Lysanias was bestowed by Caligula on Herod Agrippa I. (Jos. Ant. xviii. vi. 10), and this grant was confirmed in A.D. 41 by Claudius (XIX. v. 1; BJ II. xi. 5). On the death of Agrippa I. (A.D. 44) his dominions passed into the charge of Roman procurators (Ant. XIX. ix. 2; BJ II. xi. 6), but in A.D. 53 some parts of them, including Abilene, were granted by Claudius to Agrippa II. (Ant. XX. vii. 1; BJ II. xii. 8), and remained in his possession till his death in A.D. 100. See LYSANIAS.

ABIUD (Ἀβιούδ).—A son of Zerubbabel, Mt 1<sup>13</sup>. The name appears in the OT in the form Abihud (אֲבִיחֻד 'Father is glory'), 1 Ch 3<sup>8</sup>.

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION (τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως).—This phrase is found in the NT only in Mt 24<sup>15</sup> and Mk 13<sup>14</sup>, in both cases forming part of the passage in which Christ predicts the woes to come on the Jews, culminating in the destruction of Jerusalem. St. Mark's words, which are probably more exact than those of St. Matthew, are: ὅταν δὲ ἴσῃτε τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως ἐστηκέναι, οὐκ εἰδὲ (ὃ ἀναγινώσκων νοεῖτε), τότε οἱ ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ φευγέτωσαν εἰς τὰ ὄρη, κ.τ.λ. Three points in this account are to be noticed: (1) the change of gender * τὸ βδέλυγμα—ἐστὶ κρέα (cf. 2 Th 2<sup>6-7</sup>, Rev 21<sup>14</sup>); (2) the 'editorial note' ὁ ἀναγνώσκων νοεῖται, calling special attention to the prophecy (cf. Dn 9<sup>2</sup>, Rev 2<sup>13</sup>); (3) the command to flee to the mountains, which seems to have been obeyed by the Christians who escaped to Pella (Euseb. HE iii. 5; Epiphani. Haer. xxix. 7). St. Matthew characteristically adds the words (absent from the best MSS [NBL] of St. Mark) τὸ μῆδὲν διὰ Δαυὶδ τοῦ προφήτου; substitutes the neuter ἐπὶ τὸν for the masc. ἐστὶ κρέα; and instead of the quite general phrase ὅπου οὐ δεῖ has the more definite ἐν τόποις ἁγίοις,—an expression which may refer to the Temple (cf. Ac 6<sup>13</sup> 21<sup>28</sup>), but (without the article) may mean nothing more than 'on holy ground.' To the Jews all Jerusalem (and, indeed, all Palestine) was holy (2 Mac 1<sup>7</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>). St. Luke, writing most probably after the destruction of Jerusalem, omits the 'editorial note'; and for ὅπου ἔβητε τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως substitutes ὅταν ἴδῃτε κυκλομενῆν ὑπὸ στρατοπέδων Ἱερουσαλὴμ (21<sup>28</sup>).

The phrase we are considering occurs three times in the LXX of Daniel: † 9<sup>27</sup> (βδ. τῶν ἐρημώσεων), 11<sup>21</sup> (βδ. ἐρημώσεων) and 12<sup>11</sup> (cf. 8<sup>13</sup>), and is quoted in 1 Mac 1<sup>14</sup>. The original reference is clearly to the desecration of the Temple by the soldiers of Antiochus Epiphanes, the ceasing of the daily burnt-offering, and the erection of an idol-altar upon the great Altar of Sacrifice in B.C. 168 (1 Mac 1<sup>38-39</sup>; Jos. Ant. xii. v. 4, BJ i. i. 1). Thus it is plain that Christ, in quoting the words of Daniel, intends to foretell a desecration of the Temple (or perhaps of the Holy City) resembling that of Antiochus, and resulting in the destruction of the national life and religion. Josephus (Ant. x. xi. 7) draws a similar parallel between the Jewish misfortunes under Antiochus and the desolation caused by the Romans (ὁ Δαυὶδλος καὶ περὶ τῆς Ῥωμαίων ἡγεμονίας ἀνεγράφε, καὶ οὐκ ἔστ' αὐτῶν ἐρημώθησεται). But the precise reference is not so clear.

(1) Bleek, Alford, Mänsel, and others explain it of the desecration of the Temple by the Zealots just before the investment of Jerusalem by Titus (Jos. BJ iv. iii. 6-8, vi. 3). Having seized the Temple, they made it a stronghold, and 'entered the sanctuary with polluted feet' (μεμασμένους τοῖς ποσὶ παρέσαν εἰς τὸ ἅγιον). In opposition to Ananus, they set up as high priest one Phannias, 'a man not only unworthy of the high priesthood, but ignorant of what the high priesthood was' (ἐνὶ οὐ μόνον ἀνάξιός ἀρχιερεὺς ἀλλ' οὐδ' ἐπιστάμενος σαφῶς τί πῶρ ἢ ἀρχιερασίῃ). The Temple precincts were defiled with blood, and Ananus was murdered. His murder, says Josephus, was the beginning of the capture of the city (οὐκ ἂν ἀμάρτυροι δ' εἶπῶν ἀλώσεως ἄρξαι τῆ πόλει τῶν Ἀνάου θάνατον). In support of this view it is urged (a) that the 'Little Apocalypse' (2 Th 2<sup>1-2</sup>), a passage closely resembling this clearly contemplates a Jewish apostasy; (b) that the word used in Daniel (ἴδω=βδέλυγμα) is properly used not of idolatry in the abstract, but of idolatry or false worship adopted by Jews (1 K 11<sup>8</sup>, 2 K 23<sup>18</sup>, Ezk 5<sup>11</sup>); (c) that there was among the Jews a tradition to the effect that Jerusalem would be destroyed if their own hands should pollute the Temple of God (ἐὰν χεῖρες οικεῖαι προμάνωσι τὸ τοῦ θεοῦ τέμενος, Jos. BJ iv. vi. 3).

* Dr. A. Wright (Synopsis 2, 151) says that the masculine indicates that St. Mark interprets τὸ βδέλυγμα to signify a man. But this does not seem necessary. The masc. appears to denote a personification rather than a person. Such personifications are not uncommon in prophetic and apocalyptic literature (Ezk 38, Rev 21 [ἄγγελοι] 22 [ἴσχυρις] 12 [ὄρασις]). In 2 Th 2<sup>1</sup> ὁ ἀδελφεὸς τοῦ ἀνομίου (ἡ' ἡ' ὡς=Βελίαιος) may denote not a person, but a sin (ἀνομιμία); see Nestle in Expos. Times, July 1905, p. 472 f.

† The Hebrew text and its meaning are doubtful (see A. A. Bevan, Daniel, p. 192). Our Lord adopted the current view with which the LXX had made the Jews familiar.

(2) Others (Bengel, Swete, Weiss) explain it by reference to the investment of Jerusalem by the Roman armies. A modification of this view is that of H. A. W. Meyer, who explains it of the 'doings of the heathen conquerors during and after the capture of the Temple.' When the city was taken, sacrifices were offered in the Temple to the standards (BJ vi. vi. 1, cf. Tertullian, Apol. 16). Between the first appearance of the Roman armies before Jerusalem (A.D. 66) and the final investment by Titus (just before Passover A.D. 70), there would be ample time for flight 'to the mountains.' Even after the final investment there would be opportunities for 'those in Judaea' to escape. St. Luke's words (21<sup>28</sup>) are quoted in support of this view.

(3) Theodoret and other early Commentators refer the prophecy to the attempt of Pilate to set up statues of the emperor in Jerusalem (BJ ii. ix. 2).

(4) Spitta (Offenb. des Joh. 493) thinks it has to do with the order of Caligula to erect in the Temple a statue of himself, to which Divine honours were to be paid (Ant. xviii. viii. 8). This order, though never executed, caused widespread apprehension among the Jews.

(5) Jerome (Commentary on Mt 24) suggests that the words may be understood of the equestrian statue of Hadrian, which in his time stood on the site of the Holy of Holies. Similarly, Chrysostom and others refer them to the statue of Titus erected on the site of the Temple.

(6) Bousset treats the passage as strictly eschatological, and as referring to an Antichrist who should appear in the 'last days.'

Of these views (1) and (2) are the most probable. Considerations of chronology make (3), (4), and (5) more than doubtful, while the warnings that the events predicted should come to pass soon (Mt 24<sup>28-29</sup>, Mk 13<sup>26-27</sup>, Lk 21<sup>26-27</sup>) and the command to flee 'to the mountains' seem fatal to (6). Between (1) and (2) the choice is not easy, though the balance of evidence is on the whole in favour of (1). St. Luke's language (ὅταν ἴδῃτε κυκλομενῆν ὑπὸ στρατοπέδων Ἱερουσαλὴμ) is not decisive. He may not have intended his words to be an exact reproduction of Christ's words so much as an accommodation of them which would be readily understood by his Gentile readers.

ABOVE AND BELOW.—1. A cosmological terms. Like all similar expressions (ascent, descent, etc.), they presented to early ages a clear-cut image, which has disappeared with the rise of modern astronomy. But this is rather a gain than a loss. Here, as in so many other cases, the later knowledge is an aid to faith. At the beginning of the Christian era the earth was still regarded as a fixed body placed at the centre of the Universe, with the heavens surrounding it as vast spheres. But we know now that it is only a small planet revolving round the sun, which also has a 'solar way,' so immense and obscure that it is not yet determined: while the whole sidereal system—of which our constellation forms a 'mere speck'—is 'alive with movements' too complex to be understood. While, therefore, 'above and below' (like 'east,' 'west,' 'north,' 'south') would have for the ancients an absolute and cosmic, they can have for us only a relative and phenomenal, significance. We still use the old terms, just as we still speak of the rising sun, but we do so with a new interpretation. They have no meaning in a boundless Universe save in relation to our observation, and appearances are misleading. But these wider views of the Universe should help us to realize that all language involving conceptions of time and space is utterly inadequate to express spiritual realities.

* Some (Keim, Holtzmann, Cheyne) hold the passage to be part of an independent Jewish (or Jewish-Christian) Apocalypse inserted subsequently in the Gospels. But it occurs in all the Synoptists, and 'it is difficult to think that even these words . . . are without a substantial basis in the words of Christ' (Driver).

2. For the spiritual significance of these and kindred terms we turn first of all to Jn 3<sup>22, 42, 44</sup>. Manifestly, 'I am from above' (ἐκ τῶν ἄνω) = 'I came forth and am come from God'; and clearly also, 'Ye are from beneath' (ἐκ τῶν κάτω) = 'Ye are of this world,' 'Ye are of your father, the devil.' 'The source of My life is above, i.e. in My Father; ye draw your inspiration from below, i.e. from a malign spirit of darkness.' This is the spiritual significance of 'above and below.' To be 'born again,' or 'born from above' (ἀνωθεν) (Jn 3<sup>3</sup>), is to be 'born of God' (Jn 1<sup>13</sup>). To receive power 'from above' (ἀνωθεν), as in the case of Pilate (Jn 19<sup>11</sup>), is to receive it from God (Ro 13<sup>1</sup>). The wisdom which is from beneath is 'earthly, sensual, devilish' (Ja 3<sup>15</sup>), while the wisdom which is 'from above' is of God' (cf. 1<sup>3</sup>). The following passages may also be consulted: Jn 3<sup>22, 31</sup> 6<sup>38</sup> 16<sup>32</sup> 20<sup>17</sup>, Ro 10<sup>6, 8</sup>, Col 3<sup>2</sup>.

3. But, as has been already suggested, in using these and all similar terms, it is important to bear in mind their inadequacy and limitations. Not merely has theology suffered to an extent that is little realized, but the spiritual life of thousands has been impoverished through a tenacious clinging to an order of ideas in a region where they no longer apply. The difficulty, of course, is that we must employ such categories of thought even though we are compelled to recognize their inadequacy. 'A danger besets us in the gravest shape when we endeavour to give distinctness to the unseen world. We transfer, and we must transfer, the language of earth, the imagery of succession in time and space, to an order of being to which, as far as we know, it is wholly inapplicable. We cannot properly employ such terms as "before" and "after," "here" and "there," of God or of Spirit. All is, is at once, is present, to Him; and the revelations of the Risen Lord seem to be designed in part to teach us that, though He resumed all that belongs to the perfection of man's nature, He was not bound by the conditions which we are forced to connect with it' (Westcott, The Historic Faith, p. 74). We invoke 'our Father in heaven,' not as One who is divided from us by immeasurable tracts of space, but as far beyond our ignorance and sin—ininitely above us, yet unspeakably near.

'Speak to Him thou for He hears, and Spirit with Spirit can meet.
Closer is He than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet.'
So, when the Apostle bids us 'seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God' (Col 3<sup>1</sup>), we must shake off the incumbent thought of immeasurable distances to be crossed. And when we think of Christ's Ascension into heaven, we must not conceive of it as a flight into some far-off region, but as His passing into a state of existence (of which we gain hints during the great forty days) which we can describe only by employing words which, in the very act of using them, we see to be utterly inadequate. He has gone into a state which we cannot even imaginatively picture to ourselves without robbing it of much of its truth.

wishes to pursue the subject of the inadequacy of the categories of the understanding, and of the concepts of time and space in relation to spiritual realities, he will find an ample field of investigation by beginning with Kant's Critique of the Pure Reason, and then if he cares to, following the discussion into more recent works of Philosophy. He will find two valuable chapters (vi. and vii.) in Caird's Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion, dealing with the subject.

ARTHUR JENKINSON.

ABRAHAM.—It is noteworthy that while in the Synoptic Gospels references to the patriarch Abraham are comparatively frequent, and his personality and relation to Israel form part of the historical background which they presuppose, and of the thoughts and conceptions which are their national inheritance, in the Gospel of St. John his name does not appear except in ch. 8. In the Synoptists he is the great historical ancestor of the Jews, holding a unique place in their reverence and affections; he is their father, as they are each of them his children (Mt 3<sup>9</sup> || Lk 3<sup>8</sup>, Lk 13<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>24, 30</sup> 19<sup>9</sup>). To this the introductory title of St. Matthew's Gospel testifies; it is 'the book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham.' And in the genealogical record that follows, his name stands at the head (Mt 1<sup>3</sup>), and through equally graduated stages,—epochs marked by the name of Israel's most famous king, and by the nation's most bitter humiliation (v. 17),—the ascent of the Christ is traced to the great fountain and source of all Jewish privilege and life. It is otherwise in the genealogy of St. Luke; and the difference indicates the different standpoints of Jewish and Gentile thought. Here the historian records no halting-places in his genealogy, but carries it back in an uninterrupted chain, of which the patriarch Abraham forms but one link (Lk 3<sup>34</sup>), to its ultimate source in God. See art. GENEALOGIES.

Other references in the Synoptists are on the same plane of thought, and presuppose a prevalent and accepted faith, which not only knew Abraham as the forefather and founder of their national life in the far-off ages of the past, but realized that in some sort or other he was still alive; and it was believed that to be with him, to be received into his bosom (Lk 16<sup>22</sup>), was the highest felicity that awaited the righteous man after death. Both St. Matthew and St. Mark bear emphatic testimony to this belief, in their narrative of the incident of our Lord's solution of the dilemma presented by the Sadducees with their tale of the seven brothers. Jesus quotes Ex 3<sup>6</sup> in proof of the fact of the patriarchs' resurrection and continued existence (Mt 22<sup>28</sup> || Mk 12<sup>26</sup> Lk 20<sup>37</sup>), inasmuch as the Divine sovereignty here asserted over Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob necessarily implies the conscious life of those who are its subjects. In the Songs of Mary and Zacharias, again (Lk 1<sup>46-55, 68-79</sup>), Abraham is the forefather of the race, the recipient of the Divine promises (confirmed by an oath, Lk 1<sup>73</sup>) of mercy and goodwill to himself and his descendants (cf. Gal 3<sup>16, 18</sup>, He 6<sup>13</sup>, Ac 7<sup>17</sup>, Ro 4<sup>13</sup>); and his name is a pledge that the same mercy will not overlook or cease to care for his children (Lk 1<sup>55</sup>). And, finally, to be with Abraham and his great sons, to 'sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 8<sup>11</sup>), is the desire and reward of the faithful Israelite. This reward, however, Christ teaches, is not confined to the Jews, the sons of Abraham according to the flesh, still less is it one to which they have any right by virtue of the mere fact of physical descent from him; it is one that will be enjoyed by 'many' faithful ones from other lands, even to the exclusion of the 'sons of the kingdom,' if they prove themselves, like His present opponents, faithless and unworthy (Lk 13<sup>28</sup>).

The expression 'Abraham's bosom' (Lk 16<sup>22</sup>) or

'bosoms' (v. 23)* is hardly to be understood as conveying the idea of an eminent or unusual degree of happiness. It is practically equivalent to 'Paradise.' And the new condition of blessedness in which Lazarus finds himself is pre-eminent only in the sense that it is so striking a reversal of the relations previously existing between Dives and himself. The parable says nothing of any superior piety or faith exhibited by Lazarus, which might win for him a more exalted position than others. As far as his present and past are concerned, it but sets forth retributive justice redressing for him and Dives alike the unequal balance of earth. 'Abraham's bosom,' like the Hades in which the rich man lifts up his eyes, is part of the figurative or pictorial setting of the parable, and indicates no more than a haven of repose and felicity, the home and resting-place of the righteous with Abraham, who is the typical example of righteousness. The parable is on the plane of popular belief, and of set purpose employs the imagery which would be most familiar and intelligible to the hearers.†

In conformity with the general character of St. John's Gospel, the references to Abraham there would seem to imply a more mystical, less matter of fact and as it were prosaic manner of regarding the great patriarch. He is spoken of in the 8th chapter alone, in the course of a discussion with Jews who are said to be believers in Jesus (v. 31). Here also Abraham is the father of the Jews, and they are his children, his seed (vv. 37, 39, 56); and this position they claim with pride (vv. 33, 39, 53). It is a name and position, however, which Christ declares is belied by their conduct, in that though nominally Abraham's seed, they do not Abraham's works, in particular when they conceive and plot the death of an innocent man (vv. 39, 40). To the charge itself they have no answer, except to reassert their sonship, in this instance of God Himself (v. 41), and to repeat the offensive imputation of demoniacal possession (v. 42). But with almost startling abruptness, taking advantage of a phrase quietly introduced, which they interpret to imply freedom from physical death for those who accept Christ's teaching, they interrupt with the assertion that Abraham died 'and the prophets' (v. 52), in apparent contradiction to the tenor and assumption of the language which a moment before they had employed. Probably they meant no more than that he and they, like all other men, had passed through the gate of death which terminates life on earth; and were more intent on gaining a dialectic advantage than on weighing the implications of their own words. But, in spite of them, for the few moments that are left the discourse preserves the high level of otherworldliness, to which Christ's last words have raised it; and gives occasion for one of the most striking and emphatic assertions in which He is recorded to have passed beyond the boundaries and limitations of mere earthly experience. Abraham has seen His day (v. 56). And by silence He concedes and affirms the half-indignant, half-temptuous and protesting question of the Jews; He has seen Abraham, and is greater even than their father (vv. 53, 57). The climax is reached in v. 58, in a brief sentence, which, if it did not bear so evidently the stamp of simplicity and truth, would be said to have been constructed with the most consummate skill and the finest touch of artistic feeling and insight. 'Before Abraham came into being,—the speaker gathers up and utilizes Jewish belief in its past and reverence for its head,—'I am.' Abraham ἔγενετο; Christ ἴσθι. Thus was conveyed the answer to their question, 'Art thou greater?' (v. 53); and thus was reasserted with emphasis the measureless distance between Himself and the greatest of the Jews, and a fortiori, as it would appear to the company around, of the whole human race.

It is remarkable and suggestive that in the only notice of the patriarch Jacob that is contained in the Fourth Gospel, ch. 42:15, the same question is addressed by the woman of Samaria to Christ: 'Art thou greater than our father Jacob,—the Dispenser of the new water with its marvellous properties than the actual giver of the well? It was natural and inevitable that one of the questions that more particularly forced itself upon the attention of His contemporaries should be the relation of the Teacher, who had arisen in their midst and who claimed so great things, not only to the earlier prophets, but to the patriarchs and ancestors of the Jewish nation. See further art. JACOB.

The figure of Abraham, therefore, in the Gospels is idealized, and invested with a simple grandeur as the head and founder of the race in the indistinct ages of the past, to whom are owing its present privileges, and around whom gather its future hopes. There is, however, no indication of hero-worship, as in the case of the more or less mythical ancestors of other peoples. This conception, moreover, apart from St. John's Gospel, is purely patriarchal. The characteristic Pauline presentation of Abraham as the father of the faithful in a moral and spiritual sense, as the type and pattern of all righteousness and obedience, as it is developed in the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians, is absent (cf. also He 11:8ff., Ja 2:21-23). References to the details of his history are not indeed wanting in the remaining books of the New Testament, but they are all, as it were, with a moral and didactic purpose: Gal 4:2, the two covenants; He 7:12, Abraham and Melchizedek; Ro 4:16 and He 11:8-17, faith exhibited in the abandonment of his fatherland, in the birth and offering up of Isaac; Ac 7:2-3, the same abandonment of his country and the purchase of a tomb from the sons of Emmor in Sychem; cf. 1 P 3:3, with a possible reference to Gn 18:2.

Later Hebrew literature discussed especially this aspect of his character, and the historical view was superseded by the ethical or theological. Cf., for example, Pirke Avoth v. 4, of the ten testings or trials (nisvot) of Abraham, and Taylor, in loc.; 'Testament of Abraham,' ed. M. R. James, Texts and Studies, II. 2.

ABSOLUTION.—1. Our Lord's words on Absolution.—We find these in the following passages: Mt 16:19-20, especially this word spoken to Peter, 'I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven'; Mt 18:18 (spoken to all the Apostles), 'Verily I say unto you, What things soever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and what things soever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven'; Jn 20:22ff. 'Jesus therefore said to them again, Peace be unto you: as the Father hath sent me, even so send I you. And when he had said this he breathed on them, and said unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whose soever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven unto them: whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained.'

The first of the sayings—that about the keys and the binding and loosing—we might have been under some compulsion to take as for Peter alone, if it had not been that the like saying is repeated to all the Apostles afterwards. The words were special to Peter, as the early history of the Acts shows; but they were not limited to him. And following as they do on his great confession—being a prize and reward of that confession—they belong to him as a man who had attained by the revelation of the Father to a true faith that Jesus was the Christ the Son of God: they belonged to all the Apostles as men of like faith: and they belong to the whole Church of which these twelve were the nucleus, in proportion as that faith is alive in it. In regard to the saying (in Jn 20<sup>23</sup>) about the forgiveness and retaining of sins, it was spoken in 'a general gathering of the believers in Jerusalem' (see Lk 24<sup>48</sup>), and 'there is nothing in the context to show that the gift was confined to any particular group (as the Apostles) among the whole company present. The commission, therefore, must be regarded properly as the commission of the Christian society and not as that of the Christian ministry' (Westcott, in loco).

* The plural form is frequently used by the Greek Fathers, cf. Chrys. Hom. XI in Gen.: πάντες αὐτῶν . . . ἐξῆν ἄρτον πλάστου ἢ πῶς καλεῖται τὸν καταρῆρα καλαστῆρα.
† On the phrase 'Abraham's bosom,' see Trench, Parables 13, p. 461 ff., and the references there given; Lightfoot, Horæ Hebrææ et Talm. III. p. 167 ff.; Stevens, Theology of the New Testament, p. 83; Meyer, and the commentators, in loc. Cf. also Salmon in Hastings' DB I. 179 f.

The 'keys' may be understood as the keys of the porter at the outer door of the house, and as symbolic of authority to admit into the kingdom of heaven or to exclude from it. Or they may be taken as the keys of the steward for use inside the house, and as symbolic of authority to open the stores or treasuries of the household of God and to give forth from these treasures according to the requirements of the household. It is rather in this second sense that authority is given to bind and to loose, which in Rabbinical usage meant to forbid and allow in matters of conduct; that is to say, to interpret the will of God and to enjoin rules of life in harmony with that will. This is the work of the steward of the mysteries of God, and has to do directly with things, not persons. But the first sense, that of admitting and excluding, which has to do with persons, is what is chiefly meant by the power of the keys, and it is as an exercise of this power and of the power given in the words, 'Whose soever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven unto them,' that absolution must be considered.

Our Lord's words seem at first reading to invest the Church with absolute authority, and to promise that Heaven will follow and ratify the action of the Church on earth, whatever that action may be, in forgiving or judging, in admitting into the kingdom of heaven or excluding from it. But we recoil from this as impossible. There is no Church, how great soever its claims in regard to absolution, which does not admit that God alone forgives sin. We feel, however, that we must find a great sense in which to understand so great words as those of our Lord in these commissions. And we observe that before the words in Jn 20<sup>23</sup> our Lord breathed upon His disciples and said, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost.' He imparted to them His own very Spirit, so enabling them to be His representatives and equipping them to continue His work. (The faith which Peter had by revelation of the Father, that is to say, by the same Spirit, was an equivalent endowment before he received the promise of the keys). It was evidently the purpose of the Lord Jesus that His Church should continue the exercise on earth of the power which He constantly exercised and set in the forefront of His ministry, the power of saying to the penitent, 'Thy sins are forgiven thee'; and of saying this with such assured knowledge of the truth of God and such sympathetic discernment of the spirits of men, that what was done by the Church on earth should be valid in heaven, and the word of Christ by the Church powerful to give comfort to truly penitent souls.

The Lord is concerned not only that men be forgiven, but that His disciples should know that they are forgiven. The grace of forgiveness has not its proper power in transforming their lives unless they know that they have it. As long as men are under fear and doubt they are not Christ's freemen: their religion is still only regulative. It is when they have an assured sense of forgiveness and reconciliation to God that a great impulse of gratitude, with a new life in their souls, makes them free indeed, and strong in their freedom to serve God. Christ accordingly equips His Church to convey this assurance of forgiveness, and if a Church does not succeed in doing this, especially if, as often, the current idea in the Church is that to be assured of forgiveness is abnormal and unusual, the Church is greatly failing in its mission. If the form of our Lord's promise in Jn 20<sup>23</sup> 'Whose soever sins ye forgive,' etc., seem too absolute, we must remember that the gift of the Holy Spirit, which He then gave the sign of imparting, is a gift of exceeding power, and that no limit can be set to the degree in which God through Christ is willing to give the Spirit. 'He giveth not the Spirit by measure' (Jn 3<sup>34</sup>). And our Lord is speaking, according to His wont, to the ideal Church, to the Church which receives in the fulness with which He is willing to bestow. Just as, speaking at the high level of the ideal, He says to His servants in another place (Lk 10<sup>40</sup>), 'He that heareth you heareth me: and he that despiseth you despiseth me'; so He says here, 'Whose soever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven,' etc. But all these and such like promises depend for their fulfilment on the Spirit of Christ working, nay, reigning, in the Church. This power and reign of the Spirit ebbs and flows according to the faith and receptivity of the Church; and while it is the duty of the Church to believe in God being with it, and while the Church ought to clothe itself with the mighty assurance of heaven assenting to its judgments, it can dare to do so, and will be able to do so, only in proportion as it has sought and obtained the indwelling of the Spirit.

The words of our Lord before us certainly do not mean that forgiveness by the mouth and at the will of man is always to be followed by a ratification of God in heaven, even though that man be an apostle. But they do imply that when Christ's servants do their work in the enlightenment and guidance of the Spirit, they will be able to convey messages of grace which will be according to the truth of things, and therefore valid in heaven: they will be able also to convey assurances of forgiveness, which will be owned of God as true, and will be made effective by His Spirit in penitent souls. So then the great and chief means by which the Church has in all ages fulfilled the work which is sustained by these startling promises, is the preaching of the gospel of reconciliation by Jesus Christ. By preaching in the power of the Spirit, thousands of souls have been in all ages receiving remission of sins and an assurance of forgiveness. Although the preaching is public, and the preacher has little or no separate knowledge of individual hearts, there is a 'privacy of publicity' in which whatever message he has from God is made an absolution Divine in power and assurance to one and another of the hearers. So effectual is preaching in the Spirit, that it may perhaps be found that in the Churches in which there is no ordinance with the title of 'private absolution,' the sense of forgiveness of sins is truer, deeper, and more widely spread than in those which have such an ordinance, and count it necessary. Obviously another means by which the Church carries out the Lord's purpose of conveying absolution to the penitent is by the sacraments. But there is great occasion also for the Church to afford full opportunity for individual help to souls in spiritual trouble, and such individual dealing as may in its issue amount to private absolution. In every revival of religion the need for this is felt. There are souls in doubt whether their repentance and faith are true, and whether they are themselves accepted of God. Such souls seek the help of the Church, and often greatly profit by it. 'Inquiry-rooms' have been of notable service in modern 'missions,' and it is a common thing for people in trouble of conscience about some special sin to long to unbosom themselves about it to one whom they feel to have spiritual authority. Evangelical religious newspapers have found that they supply a demand by setting apart a column, often largely used, for the answers of some minister of reputation to men who open their minds to him, confess their chief sins, doubts, or temptations, and seek comfort through him. All the Churches, to a greater or less extent, supplement the preaching of the word by 'discipline,' and their admission to communion and exclusion from it tell powerfully on the individual conscience. The effectiveness of all such dealing has a natural basis in the fact of experience that a man's judgment of himself is greatly influenced by the judgment of his fellow-men. It belongs to human nature that the judgment of the community in which a man lives so tells upon his spirit that it is hard for him to bear up against it. This is carried to a higher power in the Church, in the sphere wherein the Spirit of Christ works. The testimony of men who are spiritually minded and in communion with God is felt to have an authority such that great relief is given to souls by the Church's absolution, and great burden imposed by its refusal. And justly, for the discernment of spirits is one of the gifts of the Spirit of Christ to His servants. They all have it in some measure, some in a wonderful measure (1 Co 12: 1, Jn 29: 4), and it may be recalled that after our Lord promised to Peter that on him He would build His Church, He did not say, as we should have expected, 'I will give thee the keys of the Church,' but 'the keys of the kingdom of heaven': from which we infer that, while the Church and the kingdom are not contemporaneous, the Church is meant to be a true realization of the kingdom, and its judgments valid for that kingdom. In an ideal Church this would be fulfilled. In any actual Church the power spoken of, at once gracious and awful, varies in its effectiveness according to the fulness of the Spirit in its office-bearers and members.

2. History of Absolution in the Church.—In the NT age there is no trace of the practice of private confession to ministers of the Church for private absolution (Ja 5: 16 cannot be so interpreted). But very early in the history of the Church it became customary for those who, after baptism, had fallen into gross sins, especially the sins of idolatry, adultery, or murder, to be cut off from fellowship, and to be readmitted after repentance manifested by public confession in the church. This readmission was an absolution, which came to be spoken of as the Church's power to forgive sins—a power, however, declared by Tertullian (de Pudic. xxi) to belong to the Church only in so far as she is composed of spiritual men. This power in the 2nd cent. was claimed as vested in the whole episcopate, and, by and by, in every single bishop; still later, in every priest. And from the time of Leo the Great (Bishop of Rome A.D. 440), the custom grew of private confession and private absolution. In the Middle Ages there were many discussions as to whether the priest had power simply to declare the forgiveness of sins, God alone having power to forgive, or whether the priest truly himself exercises a power to forgive as representative of God. The final doctrine of the Church of Rome, as fixed by the Council of Trent, combines both these views. God alone forgives sins, and He does this solely on account of the sinner's repentance. But the priest is the necessary instrument of God. God has been pleased to make the priest's absolution the means by which the grace is conveyed, and the word of the priest is a judicial act in which he passes sentence on the penitent. The priest is entitled to use the words of the ritual, 'I absolve thee from thy sins in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.' It is admitted that 'perfect sorrow for sin without addition of external rite blots out the stains, and restores the peace of God in the soul'; yet this perfect sorrow involves in a well-instructed Catholic the intention of confessing and receiving the priest's absolution when opportunity offers. Protestants truly penitent may indeed receive the peace of God, because this desire of confession may be regarded as implicit in them. But confession to the priest is a necessary duty, and priestly absolution may not be omitted without loss of salvation. The Lutheran Church did not entirely abolish confession and absolution; but Luther made changes which very greatly altered its character. Confession was not made compulsory; it was a free opportunity that might be used in case of sins about which the penitent could not otherwise attain to peace. Luther made it unnecessary in confession to enumerate every individual sin; and so little was absolution sacerdotal that it might be given by a Christian layman. In course of time, private confession to the pastor mostly died out in the Lutheran Church. But it has often been spontaneously resumed in times of religious revival, of which interesting examples may be found in Dr. Richard's Erwerungen. He testifies strongly to the benefit both to pastor and people of the Priestbeichte, as he calls the Lutheran method, in contradistinction to the Roman Catholic Ohreichte (Vol. II, p. 133f.). And he justifies the word of absolution spoken by the minister, 'I absolve thee,' etc., defending it from the objection that it is falsified and of no effect if the absolved has not truth and faith, by saying that in that case it is still effectual for judgment, as in the case of the missus of the Lord's Supper, or, indeed, of the preached gospel.

In regard to the Anglican Church, in its ordinary service 'the absolution or remission of sins to be pronounced by the priest alone, the people still kneeling,' is no more than a gospel proclamation of God's pardon to the penitent, ending in a prayer for true repentance. The exhortation before the Communion contains this invitation, to be pronounced by the curate: 'If there be any of you who . . . cannot quiet his own conscience, let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned minister of God's word, and open his grief, that by the ministry of God's holy word he may receive the benefit of absolution, together with ghostly counsel and advice to the quieting of his conscience, and avoiding of all scruple and doubtfulness.' From this, the teaching of the Church of England appears to be similar to that of the Lutheran, making confession exceptional, not compulsory, and absolution not sacerdotal, but a part of the ministry of the Word.

In the service for the visitation of the sick, the minister is enjoined 'to move the sick person to make a special confession of his sins if he feel his conscience troubled with any weighty matter. After which confession the priest shall absolve him (if he humbly and heartily desire it) after this sort: "Our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath left power to His Church to absolve all sinners who truly repent and believe in Him: His great mercy forgive thee thine offences: and by His authority committed to me, I absolve thee from all thy sins in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

In the Presbyterian Churches the words 'absolve' and 'absolution' are used only of the restoration to Communion by the minister and elders—i.e. the Kirk-Session—of those members of the Church who have fallen into any scandalous sin by which Christ is publicly dishonoured. These are usually dealt with first by the minister in private; then they appear before the Session, or before a delegation of it, to make acknowledgment, and profess repentance. Thereupon they may be addressed and 'absolved' by which is meant restored to Communion. This dealing has been undoubtedly, when used with spiritual tact and tenderness, a great means of deepening both the sense of sin and the trust of God's forgiveness, and it has the effect of giving many who had lost character a new spiritual start. The value, however, of this discipline depends wholly on the measure in which those who administer it are Christian, not legal, in their spirit, and on the support which the discipline receives from the spiritual level of the general body of the Church.

3. Conclusion.—Absolution, in the full meaning of bringing men into the sense of God's forgiveness and keeping them in that sense, may be said to be the primary work of the Church and its ministry. This work is carried out mainly by preaching, sacraments, and individual dealing with souls. The short history given above indicates the more or less fitting and successful methods by which the Christian Church has endeavoured to fulfil especially the duty of individual dealing. In order that a Church may be truly successful in this work of grace, it must be largely and widely pervaded by the Spirit of Christ in its whole membership. The gift of power in this work is not confined to the ministry; it is found wherever there is a deeply spiritual mind and Christian experience. Men in spiritual trouble do not betake themselves to a priest or minister unless they feel him to have the spiritual authority that belongs to Christ-like character. A merely official spiritual authority is not seriously believed in. What comforts add assures in time of soul-trouble is the word or sign of acknowledgment from the Christian company speaking by those who truly represent it—those who are truly called of God to the ministry, or who are shown by their goodness to be in the fellowship of God. On the training-ship Shaftesbury a bad boy met with an accident; he was taken to the little hospital. When he was awake at night he talked to the nurse. One night he said, 'Sister, I think I am dying, and it is so hard; but I think if you kissed me as if I was a good boy, I could bear it.' This boy, conscious of an evil past and struggling to escape from it, felt as if the kiss of that good woman would give him cheer, and hope of acceptance with God—would be, in fact, an absolution. A Christian minister, in converse with a dying man in whom he discerns a true repentance, may be able to say with great power, 'Brother, be assured thy sins are forgiven thee,' and great blessing of comfort to the man may follow, may indeed be looked for. Only in a high moment of spiritual impulse and assurance could the minister venture to say, 'In the name of the Lord Jesus I absolve thee from thy sins.'

ABYSS (ἡ ἀβύσος).—The word 'abyss,' which we find in several places in the RV of the NT, is not found in the AV. There we find instead, in St. Luke (8<sup>3</sup>) and in Romans (10<sup>7</sup>) 'the deep,' and in the Apocalypse 'the bottomless pit.' In Rev 9:2 we find (RV) 'the pit of the abyss' (τὸ φέταρ τῆς ἀβύσσου), a somewhat peculiar expression, but not having, it would seem, a different signification from the simple word 'abyss.'

It is not easy to see that the word 'abyss' has the same signification in Romans as it has in St. Luke and the Apocalypse. In a general way, of course, the word may be taken as meaning the underworld, the world of departed spirits and of things dim and mysterious,—a world conceived of as deeply hidden away from that of things seen and known, even as the interior of the earth and the depths of the ocean are hidden. The abyss is certainly the realm of the departed in Ro 10<sup>7</sup>, where St. Paul himself interprets the word for us: 'Who shall descend into the abyss (that is, to bring up Christ from the dead)?' But a more specific meaning than that of simply the underworld must be given to the word in Lk 8<sup>3</sup> and in the various passages in the Apocalypse where it occurs. The abyss is not even in Lk 8<sup>3</sup>, perhaps, the ultimate place of punishment, but it is there assuredly a place of restraint and of terror, as it is also so far in the Apocalypse. The abyss in the latter is the Satanic underworld, the dark and mysterious region out of which evil comes, but also the prison in which during the millennial period Satan is confined. Of course much that is given in the Apocalypse is given under poetic imagery. The abyss is rather a condition of spiritual beings than a region of space. But under the imagery there is fact, the fact that there are spiritual beings setting themselves in opposition to the Kingdom of God, and yet in their very opposition conscious of His restraining power. Satan is bound for a season in the abyss. He has no absolute power, but must submit to such restraint as is put upon him. Evil comes from the abyss, but the very Spirit of evil has to submit to being bound there.

ACCEPTANCE.—The state or relation of being in favour, especially with God. It is a common OT conception that has been carried over into the NT. In the former it has both a ceremonial significance, involving the presence of an approved offering or a state of ceremonial purity, and also an ethical significance, involving divinely approved conduct. The Hebrew expression  $\text{קָבַץ אֶת־פָּנָיו}$  'to lift up or accept the face or person of one,' becomes in NT  $\text{πρόσωπον λαμβάνειν}$ , 'to accept the person or presence,' which, however, with its derivatives,  $\text{προσωποληπτῆρῶν}$  and  $\text{προσωπολήπτῆς}$ , always implies the acceptance of the outward presence, without regard to the inward or moral qualities; hence, in a bad sense, partiality, as in Lk 20<sup>31</sup> (cf. Mt 22<sup>4</sup> and Mk 12<sup>34</sup>). In a good sense the idea is expressed by  $\text{εὐάρετος}$ , 'well-pleasing' (Mt 3<sup>17</sup> 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased'; cf. Mt 17<sup>5</sup>); cf. also  $\text{δεκτός}$ , 'acceptable' (Lk 4<sup>34</sup>, Ph 4<sup>18</sup>), used with  $\text{ἐνιαυτός}$ , 'acceptable year' (Lk 4<sup>43</sup>) and with  $\text{καρπός}$ , 'acceptable time' (2 Co 6<sup>3</sup>), of a period or time when God's favour is specially manifest. In numerous passages in the Gospels and Epistles acceptance with God comes only through and in Jesus Christ (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>, Eph 1<sup>6</sup> 'accepted in the Beloved,' Ro 14<sup>18</sup>, He 13<sup>21</sup>). So also the disciple's conduct and service are to be such as will find acceptance with Christ (Eph 5<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>7</sup>; cf. He 12<sup>7</sup>). See, further, art. ACCESS.

As applied to our Lord Himself, the idea of His acceptance both with God and man is of frequent occurrence in the Gospels. Of Jesus as a growing boy this twofold acceptance on earth and in heaven is expressly affirmed (Lk 2<sup>52</sup>). His perfect acceptance with the Father is testified to, not only by a voice from heaven both at the beginning of His ministry (Mt 3<sup>17</sup>) and towards its close (Mt 17<sup>5</sup>), but by the constant affirmations of His own self-consciousness (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, Mk 12<sup>36</sup>, Jn 5<sup>20</sup> 8<sup>29</sup> 10<sup>17</sup>, 15<sup>26</sup> etc.). The favour with which He was regarded by the people when He first came declaring 'the acceptable year of the Lord,' is proved not only by such notices as, 'The common people heard him gladly' (Mk 12<sup>37</sup>), but by the crowds which followed Him constantly all through the period of public favour. So far as acceptance with men is concerned, there is, of course, another side to the picture. 'No prophet,' He said, 'is acceptable in his own country' (Lk 4<sup>24</sup>). His own brethren did not believe on Him (Jn 7<sup>5-9</sup>). His own townsmen thrust Him out of their city (Lk 4<sup>28-29</sup>). His own people were guilty at last of that great act of rejection which found utterance in the shouts, 'Not this man, but Barabbas' (Jn 18<sup>40</sup>), and 'Crucify him, crucify him' (Lk 23<sup>21</sup>), and was visibly set forth to all coming time when He was nailed to a cross in full sight of Jerusalem (see REJECTION). He who had been accepted for a time was now 'a root out of a dry ground,' the 'despised and rejected of men' (Is 53<sup>3</sup>). And yet it was from this same root of rejection and sorrow that the acceptance of Christ was to grow into universal forms. Being lifted up from the earth, He drew all men unto Him (Jn 12<sup>32</sup>). And though as the well-beloved Son He had never for a moment lost favour in His Father's sight, it was through enduring the cross and despising the shame that He sat down at the right hand of the throne of God (He 12<sup>2</sup>; cf. Ph 2<sup>8-11</sup>).

ACCESS ( $\text{προσάγωγῆς}$ ).—No word in the English language expresses the double meaning of  $\text{προσάγωγῆς}$ . While the AV translates it invariably 'access,' the RV more accurately renders 'our access' in Ro 5<sup>2</sup> and Eph 2<sup>18</sup>.

The  $\text{προσάγωγῆς}$  at Eastern courts acted as official introducer in conducting strangers to a king's presence.\* Whether there were any allusion to this or not in the minds of our New Testament writers, the custom illustrates appropriately one use of the word 'access.' Christ as our Introducer obtains admission for us into the favour and presence of God. προσάγωγη is 'aditus ad rem vel personam' (Grotius). It means (1) 'introduction,' 'admission' (see references to classical Greek authors, and to Chrysostom in Ellicott on Eph 2<sup>19</sup>); (2) 'liberty of approach.'

'Access' (προσάγωγη) occurs in three passages in the New Testament, Ro 5<sup>2</sup>, Eph 2<sup>18</sup>, and 3<sup>12</sup>. An examination of these passages will best explain what 'access' meant in the thought of St. Paul. Then it will be necessary to consider I P 3<sup>18</sup>. For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us (προσάγωγη) to God; and afterwards, the idea of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews regarding 'access' as the act of drawing near to God through the great High Priest must be stated.

1. Ro 5<sup>2</sup> 'Through whom we have also [καί, copulat et auget (Toletus), 'answering almost to our "as might be expected"' (Alf.)] got [ερχήκαμεν] our [ἡμῶν] access (introduction) by our [ἡμῶν] faith, into this grace wherein we stand.' The Perfect tense is used in connexion with that justifying act referred to in v. 1. Access is not here a second privilege of the justified, but introduction to the very grace of justification itself. We owe to Christ not only peace as the primary blessing of justification, but admission to that state which is the atmosphere of peace.

This paragraph, beginning with v. 1 and descriptive of the life of the justified, is founded on the doctrinal basis just laid down. The Apostle has examined the world of men, as it appeared in the prevalent antithesis of Jew and Gentile. His spiritual diagnosis revealed the fact of universal sin and universal condemnation. A guilty race, a holy God, and a broken law, with its death penalty, were factors in the problem for solution. This problem, insoluble by man, is taken in hand by Christ. Christ provided a solution as effectual as the need for it is clamant. The summary of that solution as contained in 4<sup>24</sup> is the Divine certificate of its efficacy. It was written not for the sake of Abraham alone (a typical case of its application), but for us also, to whom it shall be imputed, if we believe on Him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead; who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification. Based on this, ch. 5 begins: 'Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.' Before getting further, the Apostle 'larks back' in v. 1 to the thought of justifying grace, access to which is by Christ.

Into the state of justifying grace we have access through Christ's Passion. His introduction includes, nay, is the starting-point of, liberty of approach. The need of an introduction implies that we were outside the state into which we are introduced. St. Paul himself had experienced transition from the condition of a condemned, to that of a justified, sinner. 'Barnabas introduced him to the apostles (Ac 9<sup>27</sup>), and there were others "that led him by the hand to Damascus" (v. 9); but it was Christ that introduced and led him by the hand into this grace' (M. Henry). Christ introducens, 'Contigit nobis ut perduceremur' (Erasmus). He does not drag unwilling followers. Faith is the following foot. If He draws us, we run after Him.

2. Eph 2<sup>18</sup> 'For through him we both have our access in one Spirit unto the Father.' 3<sup>12</sup> 'In whom we have our boldness and our access with confidence by the faith of him.' The old controversy as to whether access means in these verses introduction or liberty of approach, still survives. Among moderns, Alford and Ellicott take opposite sides. Alford contends for the latter as 'better representing the repetition, the present liberty of approach which ἐκουεῖ implies, but which "introduction" does not give.' While pressing the point that as 'boldness' (παρρησία) is subjective in 3<sup>12</sup>, 'access' there coupled with it must also be subjective, he gives away his case by admitting that the second term (προσάγωγη) is 'less purely so than the first' (παρρησία). Ellicott argues for 'introduction' on grounds of lexical and classical usage, but also makes the significant admission that the transitive meaning of προσάγωγη is a little less certain in 3<sup>12</sup> than it is in 2<sup>18</sup>, on account of its union with the intransitive παρρησία.

Where equally competent critical authorities thus differ, the context of the passages may be allowed to decide between them. In the paragraph 2<sup>11-22</sup>, where 'access' (v. 18) appears, the Apostle writes of a change in the Ephesians' relations corresponding to the change already described as having taken place in their moral and spiritual condition. At one time they were afar off, aliens, strangers, hopeless, godless. A change was effected by the blood of Christ. Those for whom His death procured peace are now declared to be fellow-citizens of the saints, members of the household of God, stones in that living temple in which God dwells through the Spirit. There is surely something more implied by 'access' in such a setting than mere liberty of approach to God. The Church is Christ's body, sharing the privileges of its Head. The reconciliation effected by His blood is not a mere potential one. Very definite language is used to express change of relationship: v. 13 'were brought nigh' (historic). To become citizens of a kingdom, members of a household, stones in a building, implies a definite act performed on behalf of the persons or things thus brought into these new relations. Access in the sense of introduction seems to express most fitly the alteration thus contextually described.

The argument for 'introduction' is not quite so strong in 3<sup>12</sup>. In the context preceding, St. Paul has been speaking of his own office as Apostle of the Gentiles. He was made a minister of the gospel in order by its means to bring the Gentiles into the fellowship of the saints, and instruct men as to the eternal purpose of God in Redemption. That purpose, executed in Christ, manifested to principalities and powers in heaven the wisdom of God. Had the 'access' been used by itself in v. 12 after the above line of thought, that would not point to introduction rather than to liberty of approach. But standing as it does between 'boldness' (παρρησία) and 'with confidence' (ἐν περὸσθεσι), 'liberty of approach' scarcely expresses all the author's thought. The multiplication of terms indicates an attempt to give utterance to something besides this. And so, according to the analogy of Ro 5<sup>2</sup> and Eph 2<sup>18</sup>, we are warranted here also in translating προσάγωγη by 'introduction.' 'While the former of the parallel terms (boldness) describes the liberty with which the newborn Church of the redeemed address themselves to God the Father and the unchecked freedom of their petitions, the latter (admittance) takes us back to the act of Christ by which He introduced us to the Father's presence and gave us the place of sons in the house' (Findlay in Expos. Bible, 'Ephesians').

Confusion has been created by expositors insisting that 'access' must, in the three passages where the word occurs, always mean either introduction, or liberty of approach exclusively. But the larger concept, 'introduction,' includes the lesser, 'liberty of approach.' To put it in another way—the latter term follows from the former. Presentation at the Court of Heaven gives one the right to return there. It secures habitual access to God at all times.

3. 1 P 3<sup>18</sup> 'Because Christ also suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us (προσαγάγει) to God.' The Apostle does not set himself in this Epistle to expound the theology of the Passion. His general purpose is to comfort and sustain Christians who are suffering persecutions. Some of them were slaves, enduring wrongs from cruel masters because of their faith in Christ. These were directed to the exemplary character of Christ's sufferings. In 3rd St. Peter assures them that it is better to suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing. Then in v. 19 he links them in thought with the suffering Saviour. But it is not on the exemplary significance of Christ's sufferings that he enlarges. That is left behind. The writer is spellbound by the very mention of the Cross, and for a moment he forgets his purpose of directing some wronged slaves to Christ as the supreme example of suffering innocents, that he may state again the wider and deeper meaning of His Lord's Passion. Christ suffered in connexion with sin once for all (ἀπαλλάξ). The unique significance of His death consisted in its being the death of a righteous person for the unrighteous (δικαῖος ὑπὲρ ἀδίκων); and His action had this end in view, that He might conduct us (προσαγάγει) to God: 'ut nos, qui abalienati fueramus, ipse abiens ad Patrem, secum una, justificatos adduceret in caelum, v. 20, per eodem gradus quos ipse emensus est, exinantiōnis et exaltationis' (Bengel). 'And if the soul bear back still through distrust, He takes it by the hand and draws it forward; leads it unto His Father; presents it to Him, and leaves not the matter till it [the reconciliation between a sinner and God] be made a full and sure agreement' (Leighton).

4. The word προσαγωγή is not found in the Epistle to the Hebrews. Access is expressed there in different language from that in the passages considered, because it is associated with somewhat different ideas. The author of Hebrews, writing as a pastor, not as an evangelist, aims at conserving rather than initiating faith. Instead of the Pauline and Petrine idea of the Saviour leading in a sinner, we have the sinner coming to the Saviour. Introduction (προσαγωγή) becomes access, liberty of approach, approximation. Sinners are represented in the very act of approaching—are exhorted to approach. The worshippers under the law were τοῖς προσερχομένοις, 'the comers' (He 10th): 'not those that come to the worship, but those who by the worship come to God' (Owen). Under the gospel (Judaism evolved) their attitude and character remained the same: 7th 11th (singular) or 4th 10th, where believers are exhorted to draw near (προσεγγιθεῖθα).

As a Hebrew Christian addressing Hebrew Christians, the writer of Hebrews makes large use of Old Testament conceptions and Old Testament rites familiar to himself and his correspondents. Urging upon them the truth 'that the faith of Christ is the true and final religion' (Davidson), he presents a series of contrasts between what was elementary in Judaism and the finished product of Christianity. Modern readers are apt to lose themselves amid unfamiliar details here. But it is possible to set these details in the background, and yet grasp the permanent truths, which are as important for us as for the readers to whom such details became the most effective illustrations. We shall keep this in view when attempting now to summarize the great facts associated with the idea of access in the four Epistles already referred to.

(1) The need of access to implies separation from God—want of fellowship like that enjoyed by those who walk in the light. We are by nature afar off (Eph 2nd), aliens (v. 12). There is an enmity which must be slain before peace is effected.

The wrath of God is revealed against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men (Ro 1st). The Ephesians were by nature children of wrath (Eph 2nd). That exhortation used in Hebrews to draw near (4th 10th) could be addressed only to those who are at a distance from God. 'Whereas it is emphatically affirmed that He is able to save unto the uttermost, it is supposed that great oppositions and difficulties do lie in the way of its accomplishment' (Owen).

(2) The great separating barrier is sin. All have sinned (Ro 3rd); and the correlative of universal sin is universal condemnation. Sin and death are so associated as to be completely one (Ro 5th 12, 14, 15, 17, 21). The Ephesians are represented as dead in trespasses and sins (2nd).

(3) All three Persons of the Godhead conspired to deal with the problem of sin, in a way corresponding to its magnitude. Access is (a) to (πρὸς) the Father (Eph 2nd)—representing the God to whom we are to be reconciled and introduced, and into whose family we are to be adopted; (b) through (διὰ) the Son (Ro 5th, Eph 2nd); (c) by (ἐν) the Spirit (Eph 2nd).

(4) This is the special work of Christ. He bridges the gulf which sin has created between God and man. We have access into the grace of justification through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood (Ro 3rd 25). The double alienation from God and His Church discussed in Ephesians is removed through Christ—by His blood (2nd), by His flesh (v. 12), by His Cross (v. 16).

The steps whereby access was effected by Christ are clearly laid down in I P 3rd. His death has a connexion with sin. He suffered once for all (ἀπαλλάξ), 'so that to them who lay hold on Him this holds sure, that sin is never to be suffered for in the way of strict justice again, as not by Him, so not by them who are in Him' (Leighton). The unique significance of Christ's suffering in connexion with sins is expressed in the words 'the just for the unjust' (δικαῖος ὑπὲρ ἀδίκων). In dying, the righteous One took on Himself the liability of the unrighteous. Access to God was, in St. Peter's estimation, thus purchased at an unspeakable price. 'A righteous One has once for all faced, and in death taken up and exhausted, the responsibilities of the unrighteous, so that they no more stand between them and God' (Denney, The Death of Christ, p. 102).

The author of Hebrews explains and illustrates by a method sui generis, how Christ obtains access for us. Christ is the great High Priest interceding for men in the heavenly sanctuary, and the function which He discharges in heaven is based on the death which He died on earth. A priest's duty is to establish and represent fellowship between God and man. Christ found that sin barred the way to this fellowship, and accordingly dealt with sin. He was appointed with a view to this end—to make propitiation for the sins of the people (He 2nd). In contrast with the Levitical priests and their duties, Christ's Person and work are perfect (τέλειος). He deals with sin by way of sacrifice. This He did once when He offered up Himself (7th). 'Once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself' (9th). 'Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many' (v. 28). 'For by one offering he hath perfected for ever ['to perfect,' τελειοῦν, 'is to bring into the true condition of those in covenant'] them that are sanctified' ['to sanctify,' ἀγιάζω, 'is to make to belong to God,' Davidson].

Associated with the same conception of sacrifice are the references in the Epistle to the blood of Christ. He entered into the Holy Place by (διὰ)

His blood (9th). The blood of Christ, who offered Himself to God, purges the conscience from dead works (v. 14). We have boldness to enter into the Holiest by the blood of Christ (10th). Access is therefore dependent on Christ's Person and work. In reliance on His sacrifice (10th), along a way consecrated by His death (v. 20), mindful of their High Priest (v. 2) in heaven, believers are exhorted to draw near to God. The exhortation in 4th to come boldly unto the throne of grace is also founded on Jesus having passed into the heavens as our great High Priest: and it adds the thought of Christ's sympathy, as having experienced infirmities and temptations Himself, in order to encourage supplicants for mercy and grace. The truth put hortatively in these passages is also taught directly in 7th, where access is linked with intercession. This intercession, of which an example is preserved in Jn 17, is continued in heaven, and derives its power from the sacrifice which Christ offered on earth.

(6) Faith is the subjective condition of those who have access (Ro 3rd 5th, Eph 3rd). 'He who comes to God must believe that he is' (He 11th). The eleventh chapter of Hebrews is a record of faith in action, faith as illustrated in the lives of saints, who first came to God, and then acted and endured, because sustained by the strength of God.

Literature.

The term 'accommodation' may be defined as the principle or law according to which God adapts His Self-revelation to the capacities and limitations of created intelligences. In every age, from the earliest onwards, this Self-revelation of God has been made, and has its own characteristic features. Between the time when men conceived of God in the rudimentary anthropomorphism of Gn 3rd and the time of the highest attainment by the human mind of His Nature and Being (Jn 4th), every conceivable gradation occurs in the extent and character of God's revelation of Himself to men.

i. THE INCARNATION AS THE SUPREME EXAMPLE.

—This is not the place to enter into a detailed inquiry as to the nature and extent of the self-imposed limitations of Christ, or how far the modern theories of the kenosis (wh. see) are justified by revelation, directly or by implication. It will be sufficient here to indicate how far the Gospels, as we have them, point to a real adoption by Him of the conditions of that life which He assumed, and involved Him ex necessitate in the limitations of a real human life.

(a) So complete is the accommodation to the capacities and requirements of infancy, that St. Luke scruples not to record, as part of the angelic message, the finding by the shepherds of . . . 'a babe wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger' (Lk 2nd), and St. Matthew makes the safety of His childhood depend on the vigilance and care of Joseph and His mother, their return from enforced exile being conditioned by the fact that 'they are dead that sought the young child's life' (Mt 2nd). All this presupposes, of course, His development along the lines of human growth, which is boldly outlined by St. Luke in the much debated passage, 'Jesus advanced in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and men' (Lk 2nd). If these words are to be interpreted according to their obvious meaning, they imply a moral and spiritual as well as a physical advancement along lines as normal as, for example, those which marked the growth of the child Simeon. We may say, indeed, that there is a marked reference to the words . . . kai dyablon kai mera Kyplov kai mera avthrwpon of 1 S 2nd (LXX), 'Christ's growth was from His birth a holy growth' (Martensen, Christian Dogmatics, Eng. tr. p. 282); but the words 'the child grew and waxed strong' (Lk 2nd) point to the essentially human conditions under which that growth was effected.

The sole incident in connexion with His boyhood which has come down to us in our reliable authorities is that of His visit to the temple (Lk 2nd). Short, however, as it is, it throws a clear light on the nature and reality of the advance 'in wisdom and favour,' and its uninterrupted continuity as well expressed in v. 9. If we give the word ἠρρώσθη its proper significance, 'Day by day He was being filled with wisdom. Even at this age, His marvellous intellectual powers displayed themselves, and already He exhibited that keen insight which in after life He so frequently showed. The verb used to express the amazement of the learned teachers (ἐξίσταστο) shows how much these men wondered at the Boy's knowledge and at the depth of His understanding (ἐπὶ τῇ συνέσει). Notwithstanding this feature of the narrative, the historian is far from leading us to suppose that there was anything supernatural in the matter. He rather represents Jesus as a boy of a singularly inquiring turn of mind, who deliberately determines to find out for Himself the solution of many problems which puzzled Him during the course of His home education, and for which He could find no satisfactory explanation from His teachers in Nazareth. He sits down (καθίσήμενος) at the feet of these great teachers (διδασκάλων) as a learner (cf. St. Paul's description of his own education in the Law, Ac 22nd). Nor are we to look upon the circumstance in the temple as constituting an exhibition of miraculous intellectual acquirements in the ordinary sense of that word. All Jewish children from their 'earliest infancy' (Jos. c. Apion. ii. 18) were made to acquire a knowledge of and to practise the precepts of the Law. We have only to compare the Lukan narrative with that given in the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy to see how completely natural and human is the whole incident, and how entirely the boyhood of Jesus was subject to boyhood's conditions and limitations. In the latter He is represented as cross-examining each of the doctors, and instructing them not only in matters appertaining to the Law and the Prophets, but in astronomy, physics, metaphysics, and other branches of current erudition (see chs. xviii.-lii.).

Without entering into an examination of the words contained in His answer to His mother's gentle rebuke, or what relation they bear to His subsequent complete and developed self-consciousness, it may be said that they do not necessarily involve all that is sometimes imported into them. Even the implied antithesis ἐκείνη ἡ ἡμέρα v. 48 and ἐν ταύτῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ v. 49 probably means nothing more than a reminder that the claims of His heavenly Father take precedence of all others, and bears testimony to a profound appreciation of the transcendent reality of His Divine Sonship (cf. E. Weiss, Leben Jesu, Eng. tr. vol. i, p. 374f.). It is true, we have no right to assume that the Boy Jesus had no knowledge of His unique relationship to God (cf. Gore, Diss., p. 78, n. 1). The use of the possessive particle σοῦ points to the probability that His powers of realization in this respect were as wonderful as the development of His mental faculties in another. This is, however, far from saying that Jesus at this early age possessed the consciousness of His Messiahship, which only came to full maturity at the next turning-point of His life (see Sanday's art. 'Jesus Christ' in Hastings' Dict. vol. ii, p. 609); and the short but graphic touch with which St. Luke portrays for us His surprise at His parents' method of search (εἰς τὴν ἱστορίαν αὐτοῦ), and His sustained subordination (ὁ ὑπακούων αἰσθητῶς) gives the idea of a continuance of His subjection to the conditions of His home life to the authority of Joseph and Mary shows how completely the Son of God 'emptied Himself,' παρρησίᾳ θελήσει κενώσας, Ph 2f.

One incidental reference to this period of Jesus' life in the Synoptic narrative further deepens the impressiveness of this self-humiliation. St. Mark relates that on the occasion of one of His visits to Nazareth (Mk 6<sup>f</sup>) His teaching was met by His fellow-townsmen with the scornful question, 'Is not this the carpenter?' (ὁ τέκτων)*. This single question gives point to the more general remark of St. Luke mentioned above, and interprets his use of the analytical or periphrastic tense (ἡ ὑποτακτικὴ) for the use of this form of the verb the reader is recommended to see Barton's NT Moods and Tenses, p. 11 f. and p. 16; see also Blass, Gram. of NT Greek, p. 203).

His whole life, then, previous to the events which led to His public ministry, was lived under the simple conditions which obtained in a humble but pious country home, and His answer to the Baptist's remonstrance, 'It becometh us (τέκτων ἑστίν ἡμῶν) to fulfill all righteousness' (Mt 2<sup>16</sup>), is the result of a training characteristic in its naiveté of a house whose inmates 'waited for the redemption of Israel' (Lk 2<sup>25</sup>), and were strict observers of the laws governing the religious life of the Jews. See, further, artt. BOYHOOD and CHILDHOOD.

It may not be out of place to note a slight but significant difference in the method of introducing the narrative of Jesus' baptism between the Lukan and the other two Synoptic versions. The latter speak of Jesus as coming from Galilee for the special purpose of being baptized (see fragment of Gospe. Heb. in Jerome's adv. Pelag. 2)—εἰς τὸ βαπτισθῆναι ἐν ἁρῶνι (Mt 3<sup>13</sup>), καὶ ἰωάννου ἐν τῷ Ἰορδάνῳ (Mk 10),—and seem to be conscious of a certain amount of astonishment on account of the act. The Lukan narrative, on the other hand, gives the story an incidental character; and by its use of the participle, both in describing the act of baptism and also His prayer which immediately followed (καὶ ἰησοῦς βαπτισθεὶς καὶ προσευχόμενος, Lk 3<sup>21</sup>), the Evangelist gives a human touch to the whole scene which harmonizes well with the style of his history in this place.

(6) It is, however, when we come to the scene of His temptation, and study it in connexion with the revelation which He had just received from His Father, that we begin to appreciate the full meaning of the words of He 4<sup>12</sup> that Jesus was One who 'in all points' (κατὰ πάντα) was tempted like ourselves. Whatever be the interpretation we are inclined to put upon the nature and method of the temptations (see art. TEMPTATION) to which He was subjected, one thing must be uncompromisingly insisted on—the struggle was a real one, it was intense, it was necessary (ἐπεὶ ἦν γὰρ ἀνάγκη . . . διὰ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν κτελεῖσθαι, He 2<sup>10</sup>). It is necessary that we should be on our guard against falling into the errors which mar, for example, the work of Hilary of Poitiers in his controversy with the Arians (see especially his Liber XII de Trinitate, Liber x.). To explain away the reality of the sufferings of Jesus arising out of His different temptations, whether these sufferings are mental or physical, is of the essence of Docetism; and a docetic Christ has never yet appealed, and we are confident never will appeal, to the conscious needs of humanity. Jesus Himself must have been the ultimate source from which the story of the Temptation became known, and it is very evident that the impression made upon His mind by the terrible ordeal was most profound. He had just received from His Father the revelation of His unique Sonship.

* This would seem to be the original and correct form of the expression, though the Matthean record has ὁ τέκτων ὡς (Mt 13<sup>55</sup>), to which the Western text (D) of St. Mark has conformed (see Wright, Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek, p. 52 f.).

* St. Matthew and St. Luke agree in prefixing to two of the temptations the words, 'If thou art the Son of God,' the essence of the trial consisting in the danger of doubting the truth which had been disclosed to His consciousness, and of testing the fidelity of God by a thaumaturgical exhibition. There is also a subtle psychological and spiritual fitness in the character of the first of the series, which speaks, perhaps, more for its real force than any direct statement could do. The appeal came to Jesus in the hour and on the side of His physical exhaustion, and this is in direct accordance with the general experience of humanity. Temptation becomes infinitely stronger and more dangerous when physical weakness comes to the aid of the external promptings of the Evil One.

That Jesus believed, and led those to whom He recounted His experiences to believe, in the near presence of a personal spirit of evil during this critical period of conflict, is very evident (see Gore, Diss., p. 21 f.). Moreover, this Evil One (ὁ διαβόλος, Mt 4<sup>8</sup>, 8, 11, Lk 4<sup>8</sup>, 8, 12; ὁ σατανᾶς, Mk 1<sup>13</sup>) is a prince standing at the head of a kingdom which is the direct antithesis of the kingdom of God. According to the Lukan version of this incident, Jesus expected to meet again in personal conflict this great spiritual enemy. The devil left Him only till further opportunity for assault should arise (ἔρχομαι ἄνω, Lk 4<sup>13</sup>); and towards the end of His ministry we find Him giving expression to the consciousness that the great struggle with His arch-enemy was about to recommence—'The prince of the world (ὁ πῦρ ἡγεμῶν ἐρχομαι, Jn 14<sup>30</sup>) is (now) coming' (cf. 12<sup>31</sup>). When His arrest, following upon His betrayal, was about to become an accomplished fact, He recognized the return of the spirit of evil, and that the return was with power (ὁ ἰσχυρὸς τοῦ σατανᾶ, Lk 22<sup>30</sup>).

Perhaps there is no more vivid presentation of the profound reality of His subjection to temptation than that afforded by the narrative dealing with the events which occurred in Caesarea Philippi. It is almost possible to see the startled look of horror on Jesus' face as He listens to Peter's well-meant, if indiscreet, remonstrance. In the words of His chief Apostle He hears again the voice of Satan (cf. Mt 16<sup>23</sup> and Mk 8<sup>33</sup>), and the almost fierce way in which He rebukes Peter points to the conclusion that this is not the first time the suggestion has whispered itself into His ear, to forego the bitter taste which He knows He must experience before His work is ended.

(c) Before passing from the consideration of this aspect of the Incarnation viewed as the self-adaptation of the Son of God to the conditions of humanity, we must refer shortly to some of the details of the last, greatest, and most awful of the temptations to which Jesus was exposed. Some have sought to explain away the reality both of the temptations and the sufferings, through a vain desire to exalt His Divine at the expense of

* For our present purpose it is immaterial whether we reject the words of the Textus Receptus ἔτι ἡ ψυχή μου ἔδωκεν ἑαυτήν, in favour of the Western reading of Lk 22<sup>42</sup> ὡς ἡ ψυχή μου ἔδωκεν ἑαυτήν, which Resch and Blass as well as others seem to prefer (cf. Blass, Ev. secundum Lucam, etc., Frankfurt, pp. xxxvi-xxxvii).

His human nature; but this is not the method of interpreting the life of Christ which brings out of it God's answer to man's deepest and most conscious needs. There can hardly be a doubt in the mind of any unprejudiced reader that the Synoptists place on record their accounts of the Passion believing the facts detailed to be real and objective. The words of Jesus are the expressions of a mind torn with the mental and spiritual conflict; and if Lk 22<sup>54</sup> be not a mere Western interpolation, the element of awful fear entered into and heightened His sufferings. It is only in this way that we can interpret the words ἐν ἀγωνίᾳ. See art. AGONY. The thrice-repeated prayer of Jesus, in which He speaks of His own will as distinct from, but completely subordinate to, His Father's, adds to the impression, already gained, of the purely human feelings exhibited by Him in His struggle, and recalls to our mind the words in His own form of prayer, 'Thy will be done' (Mt 6<sup>10</sup>); thus connecting, in the greatest crisis of His life, His own with our absolute dependence upon the expressed will of His Father.

The writer of the Fourth Gospel records sayings of Jesus which are very similar to this. After the conversation of Jesus with the woman of Samaria, He explains to His disciples the all-absorbing, satisfying character of His life's work, which is to do the will (τὸ θέλημα) of His Father (Jn 4<sup>34</sup>). In other places He distinguishes between His own θέλημα and that of His Father (Jn 5<sup>30</sup> 6<sup>38</sup>); and this is the word used by the Synoptic writers when recording the words of Jesus' prayer in Gethsemane. On what grounds St. Luke employs the verb βούλομαι (22<sup>42</sup>) in this connexion we do not know. If the choice is not accident, it is evidence that even in His great affliction Jesus bowed Himself to the deliberate determination of God (for the connexion between βούλομαι and θέλω see Cremer, pp. 143 ff. and 726 f.).

A very pathetic touch is given by St. Matthew to the portraiture of this scene in the garden. Both he and St. Mark relate how Jesus expressed a wish that His three disciples should be on their guard. St. Mark, however, leaves the impression that He is bidding them watch against the too sudden intrusion of their enemies upon His privacy. Twice He uses the imperative 'Watch.' On the other hand, St. Matthew twice adds to this same verb the expression 'with me,' as if anxious to show the very human desire of Jesus to have the companionship of faithful friends in the hour of His need and solitude. The same two writers have recorded a saying of Jesus to His sleeping companions ('Sleep on now, and take your rest') which is omitted by St. Luke. In these words it is possible to discover a tinge of bitter sadness and disappointment, as if the reflection were forced upon Him that He was bereft even of that loyal friendship which had left all and followed Him; and that, too, at a time when it was most precious, and when He stood in sorest need of its help and sympathy. The truth is, He felt the full force of the temptation to leave undone the last and hardest part of the work which He came to do, or to find a way of fulfilling His Father's will other than by treading the path of suffering and death. It was in the very act of submission that He found His most effective weapon of resistance; and we have here at the same time a verification of the reality of His human nature, and an example of Himself carrying out to fulfillment the principle which He inculcated as a guide to others—'He that humileth himself shall be exalted' (Lk 14<sup>14</sup>).

ii. INCIDENTS INFERENTIALLY VALUABLE.—(a) If we scrutinize carefully the method of resistance which Jesus adopted in His first great conflict, we cannot fail to see the results of that moral and spiritual education which was the characteristic element of His domestic surroundings, and with which we become incidentally acquainted by the tone of His remark to His mother in the temple. The words ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρὸς μου (Lk 2<sup>49</sup>) show how profoundly He was impressed with the sense of His Divine Sonship; and, we must believe, they were the outcome of His familiarity with the thought underlying much of the language of the OT. In repelling the Satanic attacks of the Temptation He reveals to us a mind steeped in the literature of, and full to overflowing with spiritual principles culled from, the Book of Deuteronomy. Nor was it only when He felt the sore stress of temptation that His belief in the truth of God's revelation given in the OT, and His profound knowledge of its contents, came to His aid. In the hour of His intensest bodily and mental agony, the words of Ps 22 leaped instinctively to His mind, and gave expression to the feeling of awful loneliness which then hung over Him like a black cloud. If in moments of deepest feeling, when the soul almost without conscious effort turns to the sources whence it drew its early sustenance, Jesus had recourse to the words of the OT, and was able to extract from that wide field of literature all that was purest and most spiritual, it was not, we feel sure, without long, deep study and pondering over the meaning of the different writers from His childhood onwards. Remembering, then, this feature in the mental and spiritual equipment of Christ, it will not be surprising if we find Him displaying the same habit of mind in almost every variety of circumstance of which He found Himself the centre. St. Matthew and St. Mark tell us that, at the time of St. Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi, He for the first time spoke to His disciples of the fatal end in store for Him. St. Matthew clearly points out that this was a new departure—ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡρώδου, κ.τ.λ. (16<sup>21</sup>),—and that He continually reverted to the subject as if desirous of impressing the disciples with the impossibility of His escape. We do not know at what precise period Jesus was convinced that there could impossibly be only one ending to His work, or whether He knew from the beginning, and merely waited for a fitting time to prepare His disciples for the shock. We do, however, know that at this period He was convinced not merely by the 'signs of the times' (Mt 16<sup>3</sup>), which all pointed in this direction, but also by His knowledge and interpretation of the things which were written 'in the law of Moses, and the prophets, and the psalms' (Lk 24<sup>44</sup>), concerning Him, that the way of glory was the way of the cross. St. Mark makes a pointed reference to the connexion, which evidently existed in Jesus' mind, between the death of the Baptist and His own coming end (9<sup>13</sup>); and we know that the murder of John made a profound impression upon Him (Mt 14<sup>12</sup>, cf. Jn 6<sup>1</sup>). Perhaps we may be allowed to conjecture that this circumstance marked an advance in the mind of Christ towards a great synthesis—the identification of the Conquering with the Suffering Messiah.

The question εὐὸς ὑπάρχωντι, κ.τ.λ., of Mk 9<sup>12</sup>, shows what it was that strengthened His resolve to pursue His mission to its consummation. That He dwelt long and deliberately on this aspect of His work is seen by the way in which He again refers to it towards the end of His journey to Jerusalem (Lk 10<sup>22</sup>), to which St. Luke adds the characteristic formula... ἐπιθεθήσεται πάντα τὰ ὑποπροσέτιμα διὰ τῶν ἀρετῶν, Lk 10<sup>21</sup>; cf. also Mt 20<sup>24</sup> καθὼς ὑπάρχωντι, Lk 22<sup>28</sup> καθὼς τὸ ὑποπροσέτιμα, 24<sup>46</sup>. Cf. also Mt 20<sup>24</sup>.

(b) One of the most widely canvassed, and, indeed, the most difficult passage in the Gospel history is that in which Jesus is said to have disclaimed the knowledge of the time of His glorious Return. St. Matthew and St. Mark record His disavowal in almost identical words, except that the former emphasizes it by the addition of λόγους to the words εἰ μὴ ὁ πατὴρ, which are common to both (cf. Mt 24<sup>36</sup> and Mk 13<sup>32</sup>). In both narratives Jesus is represented as speaking in the 3rd person (οὐδὲ ὁ υἱός, by which we are doubtless to understand His usual self-designation 'Son of Man,' occurring as this title does in the context of both passages, Mt 24<sup>37-39</sup>, Mk 13<sup>32</sup>). How are we to interpret, then, this self-revelation which emanates from the consciousness of Jesus? Many expedients have been tried to get over the logical conclusion derivable from a literal exegesis, some even going so far as to suggest that the passage is an Arian interpolation.

Athanasius would almost dichotomize the Person of Christ in his effort at explanation. Indeed, he plainly asserts that the Son did know 'the hour of the end of all things.' But as being the Word (ὁ λόγος) He knew, though at the same time as man (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου) He is ignorant of it (ἀγνοῶν). In the same context he maintains that Jesus acted deliberately in speaking of His ignorance for the sake of 'economy' (οἰκονομία, ἀναγκαῖα ἐν τῷ λόγῳ τῆς ἀποκρίσεως ἀπὸ τῆς ἀποκρίσεως τῶν Ἰουδαίων). See his Orations against the Arians, bk. ii, chapters xliii. and xlii., where these passages occur (Bright's ed.). Cyril of Alexandria, in his capacity of malicus Arianorum, speaks in much the same strain, and sometimes more unguardedly, as if he were unwilling, as indeed most of the Fathers were, to face the theological and exegetical difficulties of this whole question. Most of us will sympathize with the strong and vigorous language of Theodoret with respect to the evasions so commonly current. 'If,' he says, 'He knew the day, but being desirous to conceal it said He did not know, you see in what blasphemous inference lands us. For the Truth lies' (Aggr. XII, capp. Cyril in Anath. IV.).

There is also a considerable body of modern thought which seems to reject all serious consideration of this aspect of the Incarnation as being dangerous to a right and reverent attitude towards the claims of Christ. We have only to read such a book as Hall's The Kenotic Theory, or several articles in the O. G. Review (e.g. vols. xlv., xiv., and iii.), to see how earnestly men contend against the frank acceptance, in their most obvious meaning, of the words of Jesus.

However mysterious the conclusion at which we are forced to arrive may be, and however inconsistent the different parts of our Christological system may appear, it is necessary for us candidly to accept this self-revelation of Jesus as being strictly in accord with His personal consciousness, and, moreover, as being an infallible indication of the complete and perfect manner in which the Divine Word accommodated Himself to the conditions of the race whose nature He took.

It would, again, be impossible and absurd to treat the incident of the barren fig-tree, related by both St. Matthew (21<sup>19-22</sup>) and St. Mark (11<sup>13-14</sup>), as if it were a mere scenic display for the purpose of solemnly inculcating a moral lesson. Yet this is practically what we are asked to do by writers who refuse to believe that the mind of Jesus was no more exempt from human characteristics than His body was from the sufferings incident to earthly life. On this occasion He felt the pangs of hunger, and He believed He saw the natural means of satisfying His need. We could look for no more convincing example, in His life, of the complete adaptation of Himself to all the laws governing mortal existence. Other instances there are in abundance which point in the same direction, viz. to His complete and willing submission to the limitations which condition the human mode of life. He hungered, as we have seen (Mt 4<sup>2</sup>, Mk 11<sup>12</sup>=Mt 21<sup>18</sup>, Jn 4<sup>31</sup>), and sympathized with those who suffered thus (Mt 15<sup>22</sup>=Mk 8<sup>2</sup>, cf. Mt. 12<sup>10</sup>, and 14<sup>13</sup>). He suffered the pangs of thirst (Jn 4<sup>7</sup> 22<sup>36-43</sup>). He experienced physical weariness after prolonged exertion (Jn 4<sup>6</sup>, cf. Mt. 8<sup>24</sup>=Mk 4<sup>38</sup>). Notwithstanding O. Holtzmann's interpretation of Lk 9<sup>18</sup> (=Mt 8<sup>23</sup>) it is very certain that there is a personal reference to His homeless condition in these words, and we notice a quiet sadness, as if He felt the loneliness attaching to a life of continued wandering (cf. O. Holtzmann's Leben Jesu, Eng. tr. p. 169, note 3, and p. 303 f.).

(c) The element of spontaneity discoverable in the words and actions of Jesus, expressive of His attitude either towards His fellow-men or towards God, lends force to what we have been saying about limitations involved in His manhood. (1) He experienced feelings of keen disappointment with the people of His country for their lack of spirituality (Mk 8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>11</sup>, Jn 11<sup>51-52</sup>, cf. Mk 9<sup>11</sup>, Jn 14<sup>9</sup>, Mk 8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>11</sup>=Lk 4<sup>9</sup>, Lk 8<sup>54</sup>=Mk 4<sup>40</sup>=Mt 8<sup>10</sup>, Mk 3<sup>7</sup> 7<sup>9</sup> 8<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>41</sup>=Lk 18<sup>32</sup>=Mt 19<sup>12-32</sup>). On the other hand, He expressed astonishment at the spiritual receptivity of some who had no claim to be amongst the number of the chosen people of God (Mt 8<sup>12</sup>=Lk 7<sup>9</sup>, cf. Mt 15<sup>22</sup>=Mk 7<sup>29</sup>), though He recognizes the fact that this phenomenon was not confined to His own experience (Mt 12<sup>41</sup>=Lk 11<sup>21</sup>, Lk 4<sup>22-27</sup>). The legitimate inference to be drawn from the passage last mentioned is not so much that the Divine love flowed over spontaneously towards those who were outside the Abrahamic covenant, as that faith and trust, often found amongst the heathen, drew towards them God's gracious intervention, just as the lack of these spiritual graces amongst His own people tended to dry up the fountain of God's active love (Mk 6<sup>1-6</sup>=Mt 13<sup>34-35</sup>=Lk 4<sup>16-24</sup> [cf. Plummer, in loc.]).

One of the methods adopted by Jesus for purposes of instruction was that with which the name of Socrates is usually linked. Starting from premises universally recognized as valid, He leads His hearers onwards by question and answer to the result He wishes to establish (Mk 3<sup>14-21</sup>=Mt 16<sup>2-12</sup>, Mk 12<sup>41-45</sup>, Mt 12<sup>48-50</sup>, 22<sup>34-36</sup>=Mk 12<sup>31-37</sup>=Lk 20<sup>41-44</sup>). With these examples we may also compare the merciless way in which Jesus employed this method to involve His enemies in an awkward dilemma (Mt 21<sup>24-26</sup>), driving home His argument against their moral dishonesty by the parable of the Two Sons, and the question arising out of it (Mt 21<sup>28-31</sup>, cf. 21<sup>40-42</sup>, 12<sup>31</sup> and 13<sup>3</sup>). Not all the questions, however, asked by Jesus were of this character. Some are of the nature of ordinary inquiry—a demand for some needed information. Such are the questions addressed to the sisters of Bethany (Jn 11<sup>31</sup>), to the Gerasene demoniac (Lk 8<sup>29</sup>=Mk 9<sup>18</sup>), to the father of the epileptic boy (Mk 9<sup>21</sup>), to the disciples on the two occasions (if, indeed, they are not different versions of the same occurrence) of His feeding the multitude (Mk 6<sup>38</sup>, 8<sup>9</sup>=Mt 15<sup>34</sup>; cf., however, Jn 6<sup>9</sup>, which is the author's gloss).

(2) Not very far removed from this phenomenon in Jesus' life is the habit of prayer and quiet communion with God which He habitually and sedulously cultivated (Mt 11<sup>25-30</sup>=Lk 10<sup>21</sup>, Lk 3<sup>21</sup>, Mk 1<sup>35</sup>, Mt 14<sup>23</sup>, Lk 5<sup>16</sup> 6<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>18</sup> 22<sup>32</sup> 22<sup>42</sup>=Mt 26<sup>36</sup>=Mk 14<sup>22</sup>), with which we may compare Jn 17<sup>15-16</sup>, 20 14<sup>16</sup> 12<sup>27</sup>). Of the three Synoptists, St. Luke seems to be the one who most appreciates this feature of Jesus' attitude to His Father. No truer comment has ever been made on it than that of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (5<sup>7</sup>) in referring to His supplications in Gethsemane—the 'obedience' of Christ was slowly fashioned through prayer, which was answered for His reverent devotion (Westcott, Ep. to Heb. in loc.). The two descriptive words employed by this writer (δέξασθε τὴν καὶ ἰκετηρίας) illustrate well the intense nature of these supplications (μετὰ κραυγῆς ἰκετηρίας καὶ δακρύων), reminding us of the vivid representation of Mk 14<sup>34</sup>. We have here the spectacle of true man, weighted with a crushing burden, the dread of a catastrophe awful and unfathomed' (Gore, Diss. p. 82 f.).

iii. JESUS' ACTIVITY AS TEACHER.—(a) When we look at the position of Teacher occupied by Jesus, we not merely see Him assuming tacitly to be the ultimate authority upon the ethical value of OT laws, and giving instruction from that standpoint suitable to the receptive powers of His hearers, we are also confronted with His confessed subordination even in this sphere. His is a delegated authority conferred on Him by an unction from God. He was sent with a definite message, the contents of which He identified with that given in Deutero-Isaiah (ch. 42, cf. 61<sup>1</sup>). We are reminded of the words of the Apostle Peter at Caesarea (Ac 10<sup>39</sup>), where he uses the same word to express this unction, and adds as the secret of the marvellous power exhibited by the Anointed that God was with Him. This thought is most frequently and plainly dwelt on in the Fourth Gospel, and this is the more surprising as it appears alongside of claims the most far-reaching as to the significance of His life and teaching. In His conversation with Nicodemus, Jesus sets forth His place in the scheme of world-salvation. He is the object of men's faith and belief. It is through Him that life is brought into the world. At the same time He is the Sent of God (. . . ἀπεσταλμένος ὁ θεὸς τῶν υἱῶν τοῦ κόσμου, κ.τ.λ., Jn 3<sup>17</sup>, cf. 3<sup>34</sup> 4<sup>34</sup> 5<sup>36</sup> 7<sup>29</sup> 8<sup>26</sup> 9<sup>35</sup> 10<sup>36</sup> 11<sup>42</sup> 12<sup>44</sup> 13<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>24</sup> 15<sup>21</sup> 16<sup>8</sup> 17<sup>8</sup> and 20<sup>21</sup>, Lk 10<sup>18</sup> 9<sup>55</sup>, Mt 10<sup>45</sup>, cf. Mk 9<sup>37</sup> and Jn 13<sup>36</sup>).

(b) Not only has He received His commission as a Teacher from God, but there is a limitation defined for Him in the scope of the delivery of His message (Jn 1<sup>11</sup>, Mt 15<sup>24</sup> 21<sup>27</sup>). (1) This limit He not only observed Himself, but imposed also on His disciples. During His ministry their preaching was confined to the borders of Israel by His direct orders (Mt 10<sup>5</sup>); and this limitation was considered of binding force at the time (Ac 3<sup>23</sup>), though it was abrogated in the light of further development (cf. Mt 28<sup>18</sup>, Mk 16<sup>7</sup>, Lk 24<sup>47</sup>, Ac 1<sup>8</sup>). It is important, then, to recognize that Jesus Himself consciously set national and local bounds to His missionary activity, and was willing to adapt His methods of work to suit the conditions which governed the time and place of His incarnate life. It is difficult to see how He could have approached, with any hope of success, a people so hide-bound in traditionalism as were His countrymen, in any other way than He did. Discrimination in the choice, rather than originality in the creation and presentation of fundamental ideas, characterizes His teaching. And in this we discover His Divine wisdom and greatness. With conscious deliberation He refused, so far as His own personal work was concerned, to break with the best and truest tradition as it was embodied in the teaching and institutions of His time. (2) There is a line of development observable in the Jewish mind from the days of the earliest prophets right onwards to the time of Jesus, and He did not break off at a sharp angle from its continuation. He rather set His face towards the direction in which that line travelled, and unswervingly refused to turn aside at the bidding of a childish literalism or of a debased legalism. That He did not confine His recognition of truth to what was overtly taught in the OT is shown by the whole-hearted way in which He accepted the doctrine of individual resurrection, and pressed home the truth of this latter-day Judaistic development upon those who refused to accept it, by a magnificent argumentum ad hominem (Lk 20<sup>27</sup> = Mk 12<sup>26</sup> = Mt 22<sup>32</sup>). With this doctrinal disputation between Jesus and the Sadducees we may compare that on the same subject between Gamaliel and the 'scribes of the Sadducees' (see Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, vol. i. p. 316 n.). This Rabbi bases his argument also on a passage out of the Pentateuch (Dt 1<sup>5</sup>, cf. 1<sup>17</sup>), but misses the opportunity so well utilized by Jesus of emphasizing the spiritual side of that truth. It is significant in respect of this, that Jesus very seldom makes a formal declaration or revelation of the truth of the resurrection doctrine (Jn 5<sup>28-29</sup>); and, except on this occasion when He was challenged to prove it, He never attempts to give any reasons for its acceptance. He found the belief prevalent amongst the best spirits of His time, and He simply refers to it as a matter of course by talking for granted that His hearers will understand the allusion, and accept the consequences He deduces (Lk 14<sup>14</sup>, cf. Jn 11<sup>24</sup>). On the one hand, He lays stress on His own judicial functions as finding their final scope when that wondrous result is achieved (cf. Jn 5<sup>21-27</sup>, Mt 24<sup>31</sup> 16<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>31</sup>, 19<sup>28</sup> 13<sup>41</sup>, Mk 13<sup>37</sup>). Then, again, He incidentally refers to the resurrection as a future event of universal significance, to be brought into objective existence by the power of God (Mt 25<sup>29</sup>) exercised through Himself, who will employ angels as the executors of His final decrees (Mt 13<sup>41</sup>, 44<sup>1</sup>, Mk 13<sup>37</sup>).

(a) In these passages we are able to observe a double object in the teaching of Jesus about two distinct contemporary beliefs. As we have seen, there was a current belief, existent amongst the best religious thought, in the resurrection of the dead. This was, however, intimately connected with Jewish hopes as to the future earthly national Messianic kingdom (cf. Is 26<sup>14-19</sup>, Ezk 37<sup>11</sup>, Dn 12<sup>2</sup>, where its extent is limited to those who have distinguished themselves on one side or other of the national conflict, mainly with Antiochus Epiphanes [see Driver, Daniel, in loc. and Intro. xci.], and Salmond, Christian Doctrine of Immortality, p. 213; cf. Dn 11<sup>32</sup>]).

The imperfection and uncertainty of the hold which this doctrine had on the Jewish mind is evidenced by such passages as 2 Mac 7<sup>14</sup> 23 38, 2 Es 7<sup>76-100</sup>; Jos. Ant. xviii. 1. 3; Bar 2<sup>47</sup>, Sir 17<sup>34</sup> 414. In the Apocryphal of Baruch, in answer to the question as to the changes which are to take place (408), the writer affirms his belief in the resurrection of the body, and the subsequent transformation of the righteous into order to the enjoyment of unending spiritual happiness (chs. 50 and 51 [ed. by Prof. Charles]). The authors of the Book of Enoch vary as to the extent of the resurrection, but all are agreed as to the restoration of the righteous Israelite to the fullness of a glorious life in the new Messianic kingdom which God shall establish on earth.

Now, as we have just said, Jesus, in His allusions to the doctrine of the resurrection, while accommodating His language to the received Jewish opinions, emphasizes the truth and discards the excrescences which had deformed the popular belief. In His eschatological references and discourses, connexions with current thought are easily discovered, even when He is engaged in contradicting the presumptuous expectations of those whom He is addressing. Compare His use of apocalyptic figures when speaking of His Parousia (Mt 8<sup>11</sup>, Lk 13<sup>28</sup> 22<sup>26</sup>, Mt 26<sup>29</sup>), where the future kingdom is likened to a banquet where the guests recline at the table with the fathers of the Jewish nation (cf. e.g. Mt 22<sup>1-14</sup> and Lk 14<sup>15-24</sup>). This is the more remarkable that it is accompanied by a stern reminder that the real heirs of the kingdom shall find themselves outside their heritage. The reference to the judgment of the tribes of Israel is also to be noted in Mt 19<sup>28</sup>, Lk 22<sup>30</sup>, and Rev 20<sup>4</sup>, reminding us of the idea expressed in Dn 7<sup>22</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>21</sup>, Wis 3<sup>8</sup>, Sir 4<sup>12</sup>.

The imagery in which Jesus clothed His description of the events which were to precede the destruction of Jerusalem (Mt 24<sup>31</sup> = Mk 13<sup>27</sup> = Lk 21<sup>28</sup>), and His subsequent Return, finds many parallels in Jewish literature (cf. 2 Es 6<sup>1-12</sup> 63-28 91-12 128-33, 2 Mac 5<sup>56</sup>, Apoc. Bar 70<sup>28</sup>; Mishna, Sota, ix. 15; and Jos. Ant. vi. 5). It is probable that in Mt 24<sup>28</sup> we have the quotation of a current proverb which may or may not have had its origin in the detestation in which the symbols of Roman power and authority were held (see Plummer on Lk 17<sup>37</sup>; and Farrar, Life of Christ, vol. ii. p. 262). In any event we know that the phrase ἀραρι was known to His hearers as symbolical of God's judgments wrought by means of heathen enemies and oppressors (see Charles' ed. of Evangelii [2]; cf. Dt 28<sup>49</sup>, Job 9<sup>8</sup>, Hab 1<sup>8</sup> etc.). The same may be said of the reference to the trumpet (ἐλάτρυε) as the instrument by which the resurrection of the dead is immediately effected (cf. 1 Th 4<sup>16</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>52</sup>, Mt 24<sup>31</sup>, and 2 Es 100). In this connexion, and intimately related to the subject of the destruction of Jerusalem, we may note the simile used by Jesus in His lamentation over that city. The similitude of the hen and her brood (Mt 23<sup>37</sup>) is not found in the OT, but is frequent in Rabbinical literature (Plummer on Lk 19<sup>44</sup>). Compare, e.g., 2 Es 13<sup>2</sup>, in which context are also to be found very similar references to the righteous wrath of God and its terrible consequences. He will require the blood of all His servants and prophets slain by the hands of those to whom they were sent (2 Es 13<sup>2</sup>). Their house is left unto them desolate (v. 23). These words remind us of the language of Jesus in Mt 23<sup>37-38</sup> (cf. Lk 11<sup>49-50</sup>), where Wendt thinks there is a reference to a Jewish apocalyptic writing (cf. ἡ ἀποκάλυψις) on the part of Jesus (Lehre Jesu, Eng. tr. II, 262). See, further, Heston, Patristica.

(3) The other contemporary belief referred to above had to do with the part played by angels in the Divine economy of revelation and grace. Amongst the Jews of the time of Jesus there was a tendency to emphasize the importance of the functions ascribed to these beings. This tendency arose out of the growing habit of thought which removed God farther and farther from that active participation in the world's concerns which was characteristic of early Israelitish belief (Ex 37<sup>2</sup>, Gn 11<sup>7</sup> 18<sup>2</sup> cf. G. B. Stevens, The Theology of the NT, p. 11 f.). To them angels were the necessary media connecting a transcendental God with the world and men. 'For the external influences which helped the growth of this development see art. [by Whitehouse] 'Demon, Devil,' in Hastings' DB, vol. I, p. 592). Over against God and His kingdom, thus conceived, stood Satan and his dominion, ruled after the same method by means of dependent demoniacal beings. It is important to note that, although these dualistic conceptions held a large place in the current thought of His day, Jesus has left no hint as to His ideas on the subject of angelology. By Him God is conceived as in direct living contact with men, guiding their affairs, and interesting Himself in their welfare (Mt 5<sup>8</sup>, Lk 6<sup>9</sup>, Mt 6<sup>4</sup> 18<sup>2</sup> 32 71). Perhaps in no way does this come out so clearly as in the stress laid by Him on the Fatherhood of God (cf. e.g. Lk 15<sup>12</sup>). What was halting, spasmodic, and inferential in the OT becomes in the teaching of Jesus a central, illuminating truth which He would have His hearers emphasize during the most sacred moments of their lives—Ἰδέτε ἑαυτῶν (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>, cf. the Ἰδέτε of Lk 11<sup>2</sup>). At the same time the Gospels furnish us with many references by Jesus to angels and their work, all of which are intimately related to contemporary ideas. It is unimportant for our present purpose whether we interpret these references literally, or, as Beyschlag and others do, metaphorically; viz. as poetical and figurative expressions.

From Himself must have come the information noted by the Synoptists as to angelic ministrations (cf. Mt 411=Mk 13, Lk 22<sup>9</sup>), and He must have been thinking of those services when He rebuked St. Peter with the question recorded in Mt 268 (cf. Jn 18<sup>10</sup>, where ὁ ἀγγελὸς τοῦ Ἰησοῦ may refer to them also). That He believed in the reality of their existence is, of course, true. That He ascribed to them functions suitable to their state of being is also true. They are described as 'holy,' possessed of a knowledge of the ways of God in a higher degree than the sons of mankind (cf. Mk 8<sup>26</sup>, Mt 16<sup>7</sup> 25<sup>2</sup>, Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, Lk 15<sup>10</sup>), with which we may compare 2 Es 16<sup>9</sup> and Lk 12<sup>8</sup>. Jesus in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, utilizes the Rabbinical belief that the souls of the righteous are carried to paradise by the angels, but in a way so incidental that we are not justified in affirming or denying His belief in that tenet (Lk 16<sup>22</sup>, with which may be compared the description of Elijah's translation in 2 K 2<sup>11</sup>). In Mt 13<sup>10</sup> there is a deliberate assertion by Jesus that God's care over the least important of His people is exercised through the media of angels. This is an extension or development of the idea of national guardian angels in Dn 10<sup>5</sup> 20. He makes an incidental reference to their supernatural nature in His discussion with the Sadducees on the subject of the Resurrection (Mk 12<sup>27</sup>=Mt 22<sup>30</sup>=Lk 20<sup>36</sup>), where He employs a well-known Jewish opinion (with the Lukan ἀποψύχεται compare Apoc. Bar 51<sup>9</sup> and Ezb. Enoch 104<sup>4</sup>-9) in order to enforce a fundamental spiritual truth. The same didactic purpose is discoverable in all the references of Jesus to these beings; and we are therefore led to the conclusion that there is, in His attitude towards this question, evidence of that deliberate economy by which He set to Himself the task of accommodation to the limited knowledge of His fellow-men. It seems to the present writer to be very evident that Jesus knowingly refrained from correcting their ideas on this subject because He had an infinitely more important work to perform. To say with Bishop Gore that His 'language certainly reaches the level of positive teaching' about good spirits, seems to import more significance into that language than it can bear (cf. Dives, p. 23 f.). The work of Jesus lay on a far higher plane than this—the correcting and revealing of details as to the nature, position, and employment of subordinate spiritual agencies. It was sufficient for His purpose that a general belief existed in the loving activity of God, though that activity might be somewhat too rigorously conceived of as mediated by certain personal forces—ἀγγελικὰ πνεύματα (He 1<sup>14</sup>). A comparison of one pair of parallel passages may throw some light on the way in which Jesus' attitude towards this belief was interpreted by those who heard Him. In Mt 10<sup>28</sup> we read of those who accept, and are loyal in their adherence to, His Messianic claims, that the Son of Man will confess them before His Father in heaven; while in Lk 12<sup>8</sup> the words run, 'Him shall the Son of Man also confess before the angels of God.' From this it would appear that 'the angels of God' is a popular synonym for the sacred Presence, and is employed by Jesus as such (cf. also Lk 15<sup>10</sup>). But see art. ANOMIA, p. 57<sup>b</sup> f.

(7) On coming to the consideration of the kindred question arising out of Jesus' language respecting Satan, demons, and demoniacal possession, we are confronted with a more intricate and difficult problem. There can be no doubt, the present writer thinks, that as He believed in the personal existence of good, so He also believed in that of evil angels. How far, on the other hand, we are bound to accept the views which a literal interpretation of the passages where reference to them is found would convey, is another question, and one which demands some care in determining. In the first place, there are several instances where the language of Jesus respecting these beings is obviously figurative, and intended to be interpreted as such. In relating His experiences during the Temptation period, it would certainly seem as if He intended to convey, in language vividly symbolical, an idea of the tremendous difficulties which beset Him in His choice of two alternatives. The popular Jewish Messianic expectations He embodied in a personified form, and Satan appears in the narrative because of the didactic purpose which He had in view.

A similar interpretation seems necessary in Jesus' explanation of the parable of the Sower (Mt 13<sup>18</sup> ἔγχετο ἡ σπέρμα; Mk 4<sup>13</sup> ἐσπέρη ἡ σπέρμα; Lk 8<sup>12</sup> ἔγχετο ἡ σπέρμα), though Plummer (note on Lk 8<sup>12</sup>) insists that Jesus is here emphasizing His belief in the Personality of the evil there described as working. The whole passage, however, is highly figurative, and is somewhat arbitrary to pick and choose in that way. A very remarkable instance of similar personification is found in the Lukan narrative of the healing of St. Peter's mother-in-law. Just as St. Luke seems to be the most deeply impressed of the Synoptists with this aspect of Jesus' power and work, so he is the only one of the three to note this. By using the verb ἰσχυροῦν (4<sup>9</sup>), which he had employed immediately before (v. 38) in describing the healing of the demoniac in the synagogue, he links the two acts together by an inward connexion. The same verb, indeed, is found in all three Synoptists in their narratives of the stilling of the tempest on the Lake of Gennesaret (cf. Lk 8<sup>24</sup>, Mt 8<sup>26</sup>, Mk 4<sup>38</sup>), and we cannot resist the conclusion that the disciples saw behind the storm the work of a living personal agent, and that Jesus acted in the spirit of that presupposition (cf. O. Holtzmann's Leben Jesu, Eng. tr. p. 268). Similarly in His rebuke of St. Peter (Mk 6<sup>7</sup>=Mt 16<sup>7</sup>), Jesus sees behind the language of His chief Apostle that spirit of evil which all through His work strove to thwart and hinder Him. He addresses him directly and personally as 'Satan' (Σατανᾶ), just as He addressed the last and fiercest temptation in the first dangerous crisis of His life (Mt 4<sup>10</sup>).

A striking and illustrative example of this figure is discovered in Jesus' words to His returned missionary disciples (Lk 10<sup>18</sup>). These, in their report, referred specially to the power over demons, recently conferred upon the Twelve, as being also possessed by themselves, which elicited from Him the following reply, 'I beheld Satan fallen (AV fall) as lightning from heaven' (cf. Is 14<sup>12</sup>). Some see in these words a reference by Jesus to the original Fall of the Angels, and an implied rebuke to the disciples, warning them against the sin which caused that catastrophe. On the other hand, the use of the aorist participle (πεσὼν) in the place of emphasis points to the conclusion that Jesus is speaking of an event occurring during the time of the successful missionary tour (cf. Blass, Gram. of NT Greek, § 55, 4, p. 197 f.; and Burton, NT Words and Tenses, § 146 ff., p. 67 f.). Be that as it may, the simile is a familiar one to the Jews (cf. Is 14<sup>12</sup>, Rev 12<sup>9</sup>), and is used by Jesus to point to the overthrow of the kingdom of evil, as it was foreshadowed by the success which attended His disciples' first efforts (cf. Jn 12<sup>31</sup>).

A very remarkable instance of this method is peculiar to the Lukan narrative. Jesus, in warning St. Peter of his coming fall, informs him in solemn language that Satan 'obtained him' by asking (ἔρωτησεν, Lk 22<sup>31</sup>) for the purpose of testing him (cf. Job 1<sup>6</sup> and 2<sup>9</sup>). He puts Himself in direct personal opposition (πρὸς τὸν ἄρχοντα τοῦ αἵματος) to the Prince of Evil by praying for His Apostles. No less remarkable and instructive in the allegory, common to St. Matthew and St. Luke, by which He teaches the danger of and tendency towards reverting to a former state of sin. He speaks of the unclean spirit or demon (τὸ ἀκάθαρτον πνεῦμα) which, having been cast out of his victim, goes in search of rest through dry and desert regions (ὅτι ἀναζητεῖ σιγήν). Falling in his quest, he deliriously with himself as to his future line of action, and finally makes up his mind to return to the place whence he was driven. With himself he brings seven other spirits, and they all take up their abode in the empty chamber, which was all too ready to receive them (Lk 11:24-26, Mt 12:43-45). For the belief that more than one demon might possess a human being, compare Mk 9:17, Mt 9:32, Lk 9:39, and Lk 9:49 (τὸ πνεῦμα δαιμονίων). The teaching of Jesus is not only based on the popular belief in the active connexion between evil spirits and the children of man, but there is a reference in it to the generally accepted idea that wild and desert regions are the special habitat of these beings (see art. 'Demon, Devil' in Hastings' DB, vol. I, p. 682).

Jesus, on more than one occasion, seems to sanction the current conception of the malignant influence of demons on the human body, their activity in this respect being controlled and guided by their chief, Satan (ὁ ἄρχων τῶν δαιμονίων, Mt 12:26). St. Luke's diagnosis of the woman's case who was afflicted for eighteen years, is simply that she was possessed of a 'spirit of infirmity' (πνεῦμα ἀρθρῶν, Lk 13:11); and Jesus apparently countenanced the belief by the words contained in His reproof (ὅτι ἔθενα ἰ Σατανᾷ, v. 15). A similar instance of His countenance of popular beliefs occurs in the healing of the deaf and dumb epileptic (Mk 9:17-19). The boy's father believes his son to be the victim of demonic malignity (ὄραται πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον, v. 17); and Jesus addresses the spirit by an authoritative command (ὦ ἀκάθαρτε καὶ κερὶς πνεύματι, ἔξω ἐκτάσθη σου, v. 20).

Perhaps the surest evidence we have that Jesus deliberately suited His language to the notions of His day arises out of the way in which He wrought His cures, depending as He did on the moral and spiritual forces inherent in His own Person. A word, a command, a touch of the hand suffices His purpose (cf. Mt 8:1, Mk 1:7, Lk 13:13). There is no trace of His ever having employed any of the current methods of exorcism—the use of certain magic formulae, such as 'the ineffable Name,' etc. (see Ederheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, bk. iii. ch. xiv. and Ap. XVI. Cf. the astonishment which Jesus' method created amongst His countrymen [Lk 4:9; cf. Ac 19:13]). That He knew of such methods is evident from the ironical question He put to the Pharisees who accused Him of collusion with Beelzebub (Mt 12:27=Lk 11:19). For evidence that Jesus believed in power over evil spirits exercised by others not directly commissioned by Him, cf. Mt 7:22, Mk 9:38=Lk 9:49.

On the other hand, signs are not wanting that Jesus recognized an essential difference between the casting out of demons and the curing of bodily disease.—'I cast out demons and perform cures' (Lk 13:16, cf. Mt 10:8, Mk 6:13, Lk 9:1, 6:11). St. Matthew, moreover, records the same distinction in his account of the early Galilean ministry (δαίμονιζομένους καὶ σεληνιάζουένους, 4:24, with which cf. Mk 1:32-34). We may also note in passing that instances are not wanting of references to disease without mention of these agents (cf. e.g. Mt 9:32-33, Mk 7:22-27, Lk 17:11-16).

Looking then at this last aspect of the question, and noting the way in which He employed the language current in His day about this mysterious phenomenon, we perceive Jesus' knowledge to be in advance of that possessed by His countrymen. We see the workings of that love which, while it appeals to man as he is, yet ever strives to draw him upwards by gradually stripping him of the clogging weights of superstition and of false conceptions. See art. DEMON, LUNATIC, POSSESSION.

(c) In harmony with this characteristic habit of Jesus is His general method of imparting definite instruction. It is impossible not to be struck with the way in which He, not content with telling His hearers directly what He wishes them to know, approaches them from another side—the side of reason and its resultant freedom and independence of thought. The Sermon on the Mount is not a body of precepts like the Mosaic code, so much as a series of paradoxes which arrest and fix the attention, calling out and developing the powers of rational deduction. The same feature runs through the parabolic form which His teaching so largely took, and which was so admirably suited to maintain the studied reserve in the content of His communications. Notice the way in which He keeps back, all through the earliest period of His ministry, the revelation of His claims to be the Messiah (Mk 1:23, 31, Lk 4:4, cf. Mt 12:48, 50, etc.); and even to the Twelve He does not impart the nature of those claims till they slowly worked out for themselves the conviction to which St. Peter gave such emphatic expression at Caesarea Philippi (Mk 8:27=Mt 16:13=Lk 9:20).

(1) Popularly intelligible and highly impressive, the parables of Jesus have been the wonder and admiration of every age. The OT is not without examples of this mode of teaching (2 S 12:1-7, 14:6, 1 K 2:23-24, Is 5:1-9), and the Rabbinical writings afford numerous examples of parables (see Ederheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, vol. i. p. 580 f.) some of which bear a striking resemblance to those of Jesus (cf. Midrash on Ca 1). The object of parabolic teaching was twofold, and was thus purposely employed by Him (Mt 13:10-17). By it He meant to conceal the truth 'from the wise and clever' (ἀπὸ σοφῶν καὶ εὐεργῶν, Mt 11:25 [see Moffatt's Histor. NT, p. 316 f.]). By it He at the same time intended to unfold the same truth 'to babes' (νηπίοις). According to the Markan narrative, there was an adaptation to the capacities of His hearers even within the zone of His parabolic teaching. He did not, that is to say, employ this method indiscriminately or harshly, but in a tentative and gentle fashion, proportionate to the intelligences of those who heard Him (Mk 4:2).

Such was the aim and intention of Jesus; and in connexion with this it will not be unimportant to note how, as His experience widened, and the stress of opposition increased, and the bitterness of the enmity to which He was exposed intensified, the parable enters more and more largely into His public teaching, and gradually assumes a more admonitory, controversial, and sometimes a warning judicial tone. It is impossible to draw up any hard and fast rule exemplifying this statement, but a comparison of the parables grouped in Mt 13 with those in Lk 14:7-11, 13:2-9, 14:16-24, 16:13, 19:11-27 etc. will show the gradual development of method in the employment of the parable by Jesus to drive home the meaning of His message to the heart and understanding of His hearers. See PARABLE.

(2) Without entering into a discussion as to the difference between the parable, the fable, the allegory, and other forms of instruction by figure, it is important to note that Jesus never disdains to use popular figurative expressions in order to point the truth He is aiming to disclose. Just as in its outward form and method He conformed to the usages of His time (cf. Mt 5:1, Lk 4:2, Jn 8:1, Mt 13:16, etc.), so in His choice of language He did not disdain to employ what He found ready to His hand, though it was manifestly imperfect. He did not, for example, correct the popular notions as to the local positions of Heaven and Hades. The one was regarded as being situated at an indefinite height above the earth (see Ac 1:10), the other 'as a dark deep underworld in which the deceased continued to exist' (Salmond, art. 'Hades' in Hastings' DB ii. 275). The ethical teaching of Jesus is not disturbed by these crudities. On more than one occasion He uses them as illustrations of His meaning. Capernaum, because it rejected the unparalleled opportunities afforded by His presence and works, He addressed with the question, 'Shalt thou be exalted unto heaven?' answering it Himself at the same time, 'Thou shalt go down to Hades.' The idea was that a complete moral and spiritual overthrow awaited her, whereas she might have enjoyed the full and lofty freedom characteristic of the atmosphere of God's presence (see Mt 11<sup>28</sup> = Lk 10<sup>16</sup>).

The expression 'gates of Hades' (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>) is similarly figurative, and in this place has reference to the forces of death and spiritual decay. Here there is an incidental reference to the general belief that Hades is an enclosed prison-like (cf. the ἑσπέραι of 1 Pt 3<sup>9</sup>) hades whose inhabitants are locked and detained inside its gates (cf. Rev 19<sup>1</sup> 'I have the keys of Hades'), while there is added to this notion the further thought that there is even in Hades a broad impassable line of demarcation ('between you and you a great gulf is fixed,' Lk 16<sup>26</sup>) between the souls of those who have lived piously here and those whose lives were selfish (cf. Lk 23<sup>43</sup> where the former department of Hades is called 'Paradise'). In connexion with this subject it is instructive to note such ideas as are found in Enoch 22. 51. 63<sup>10</sup> 102<sup>8</sup> etc., where, with the single exception of the loantz of Sheol, the general description is very similar to that we have been discussing.

(3) One of the traditional forms of teaching was by the employment of aphoristic sayings, such as we have before us in the gnomic wisdom of the Son of Sirach, or of the Pirke Aboth in the Mishna (Schürer, HJP II. iii. pp. 23-32). Jesus uses this method with wonderful effect, as we see especially in the list of utterances grouped in Mt 5-7, which were collected, we may feel sure, from many different periods of His ministry. All four Gospels afford examples of these proverbial expressions. Cf. e.g. Mk 2<sup>27</sup>, 27<sup>98</sup>, 12<sup>17</sup> 14<sup>88</sup>, Mt 22<sup>14</sup> 12<sup>30</sup>, Lk 12<sup>28</sup> 16<sup>10</sup>, and the unrecorded saying in Ac 20<sup>35</sup>, Jn 3<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>24</sup> 12<sup>25</sup>, while, in this Gospel, Jesus refers explicitly to a proverb current in His time ('Herein is the saying true,' Jn 4<sup>27</sup>). Very striking and vivid also are such figures as those by which the doctrine or teaching of the Pharisees is referred to by the word 'leaven' (Mk 8<sup>15</sup>). His own suffering by the words 'cup' and 'baptism' (Mk 10<sup>38</sup>, cf. Lk 12<sup>30c</sup>), the relative positions of Jew and Gentile in the kingdom of grace by the words 'children' and 'dogs' (Mk 7<sup>27</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel there is a striking frequency in this mode of expression. It is in His writing that Jesus speaks of Himself as 'the way' (ἡ ὁδὸς, Jn 14<sup>6</sup>), 'the light of the world' (8<sup>12</sup>), 'the bread of life' (8<sup>58</sup>), 'the vine' (15<sup>1</sup>), 'the door' (10<sup>7</sup>). He speaks of His work as His 'meat' (4<sup>34</sup>), of His body as 'this temple' (2<sup>21</sup>). Cf. also such passages as those which deal with the second birth (3<sup>3</sup>), the living water (4<sup>10</sup>), the heavenly mansions (14<sup>2</sup>), and so on. In all this we observe a method which is peculiarly adapted to the intelligence of those He meant to instruct; and this is still more emphatically the case when, as He sometimes does, He expands these figures and similes until they assume the shape of allegories. We see examples of this in His use of the figure of 'the shepherd' (10<sup>10c</sup>), 'the vine' (15<sup>1</sup>), 'the light' (12<sup>30c</sup>), etc. No one who has ever heard these can fail to admire 'the wonderful art and power of popular eloquence' which He possessed. It was precisely the power to gain the attention and arouse and retain the interest of the people which Jesus wielded, and we can appreciate the reasons for the willingness and eagerness with which He was listened to by the proletariat (Mk 12<sup>37</sup>). See art. WISDOM.

(4) The references in the discourses of Jesus to natural or world-phenomena, and to the psychological features of man's being, exhibit the same reserve, the same restraint in correcting popular notions, the same frank acceptance of current thought. A few examples will be sufficient to show how completely He adapted His language to the limitations of contemporary knowledge. (a) God makes His sun to rise (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>); lightning comes out of the east and takes its swift journey towards the west (Mt 24<sup>27</sup>), or it falls down straight from heaven (Lk 10<sup>18</sup>); the germ of life in the wheat-grain is brought into active play only by the death of the seed (Jn 12<sup>24</sup>). Even the signs which enabled men to forecast the weather were laid by Him under contribution to emphasize a contrast (Lk 12<sup>28c</sup>). The wind blows hither and thither, but men know neither its beginning nor its ending (Jn 3<sup>8</sup>), any more than they can point to the origin or the destiny of the mysterious ἄνεμος, the reality of whose existence He nevertheless insists cannot be doubted. The gradual growth of the kingdom of God eludes men's observation, just as that of the planted seed does, which receives the vital principle of its growth from the earth, and advances steadily though secretly (Mk 4<sup>27</sup>).

It seems to the present writer that in the last two cases Jesus is pointing to the existence of a wider field of knowledge into which man has not as yet entered. At the same time He seems to include Himself in the number of those who 'know not' the how or the wherefore. Ages were yet to pass over the world before men discovered the laws which govern the relations of natural phenomena, and which enable them, in some cases at least, to predict with almost infallible certainty their regular sequence. Jesus consciously recognized that it was no part of His work to add to the sum total of human knowledge of these subjects.

(5) The same trait is observable in His references to the anthropological ideas of His time; but for the illustration of this we must refer the reader to art. FLESH, HEART, SOUL, SPIRIT.

iv. THE ATTITUDE OF JESUS TOWARDS THE MESSIANIC EXPECTATIONS OF HIS TIME.—A discussion of the question of Jesus' attitude towards Messianic hopes and longings is of the utmost importance, on account of its bearing upon the subject with which we are dealing. The attention of the student is at once arrested by His obvious anxiety during the early periods of His ministry to conceal from the general public His claims to the Messiahship. This He did expressly by forbidding the open proclamation of the truth not merely by the demoniacally possessed (Mk 1<sup>34</sup> 3<sup>3</sup>, Mt 12<sup>15</sup>, Lk 4<sup>4</sup>), but also by those amongst His circle of disciples who grasped the purport of His teaching and the secret of His Personality (Mt 16<sup>20</sup> = Mk 8<sup>30</sup> = Lk 9<sup>21</sup>; Mt 17<sup>9</sup> = Mk 9<sup>9</sup> = Lk 9<sup>35</sup>). For the same reason He courted secrecy in the performance of miraculous cures, and enjoined silence on those who were healed (Mk 1<sup>44c</sup>, 5<sup>42</sup> 7<sup>36</sup> 8<sup>26</sup>, Mt 9<sup>30</sup> 9<sup>34</sup>). Indeed, there is no part of the message which Jesus came to deliver where the words of Mk 4<sup>33</sup> ('He spake the word unto them as they were able to hear it') are more appropriate. The declaration of His Messiahship was gradual; and even those who were nearest His Person, and in closest touch with His teaching, were left by Him to work out the truth slowly and by degrees.

(b) The attitude of Jesus to the Jewish Canon of the OT must not be left out of account when considering the methods of His public teaching. Frankly, the belief is at once confessed that here also He 'used the common language of His contemporaries in regard to the OT' (Sanday, Bampton Lect. p. 414), and in accordance with this we can explain the words which St. Luke puts into the mouth of the risen Jesus, where the tripartite division of the Hebrew Bible is recognized—the Law of Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms (24th). With this we may compare the division given in the Prologue of the grandson of Jesus ben Sirach. Other divisions were also current, as 'Moses and the Prophets' (Lk 16th, Mt 7th), where the idea is the same, namely, the entire OT as then existing. In perfect harmony with this is the acceptance by Jesus of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch (Lk 16th—24th, Mt 19th—Mk 10th, Mk 12th—Lk 20th, Jn 6th—7th, 9th, 10th), and the Davidic authorship, if not of the whole Jewish Psalter, at least of many of the Psalms contained therein (Mk 12th—Mt 22nd—Lk 20th).

(1) Several other indications there are which show that He accepted not only the general popular belief in the authenticity of the OT books as a whole, but also the literal genuineness of the stories with which they abound. The details of the narratives of the Flood and Noah (Mt 24th—Lk 17th), the story of Jonah and his adventures by sea as well as in Nineveh (Mt 12th, 16th, Lk 11th), are utilized by Jesus on the assumption of their genuine historicity. The glory of Solomon's reign, that heyday of Israelitish prosperity, is incidentally mentioned by Him without any reserve (Mt 12th—Lk 13th). The question is not, as Dr. Sanday puts it (The Oracles of God, p. 111), whether Jesus 'accommodated His language to current notions, knowing them to be false,' but rather, was His 'accommodation' or 'condescension' so complete that He never entertained any other idea as to the character of these narratives than the one currently held? It certainly seems that He never entered into His mind to question their historical truth; and if we seek for the estimation in which He held 'the Law and the Prophets,' we find it expressed in words which, if genuine, are as emphatic as any that are to be had. Not 'one jot or one tittle' (ἀντα ἐν ἡ μίνα κεράται) was to be done away with until all was fulfilled (Mt 5th). Into this Jewish idea of the abiding nature of the Law, Jesus characteristically imported a depth of meaning which, while it did not destroy, transmuted its whole tenor, giving it the eternal significance of which He speaks (ὅτι ἂν παρὰ τὴν ὁ σὸν ἀντα καὶ ἡ γῆ), and which it could never otherwise have had. This habitual method, by which Jesus based His teaching on the foundations of existing knowledge, receives some illustration from the way in which He treats the story of Moses and the Bush (Mk 12th—Lk 20th, cf. Mt. 22nd). He says nothing whatever of the nature of this vision beyond what the letter of the narrative expresses. He does not tell us whether the sight was visible to the outward eye or to the inward spiritual understanding alone. Cf. also His references to the brazen serpent (Jn 3rd, 12th).

(2) In the same way, it seems to the present writer, we are to interpret the reference to the authorship of Ps 110 (Mt 22nd—Mk 12th—Lk 20th—4th). There were three distinct ideas current about this Psalm which Jesus adopts as the groundwork of His argument: (i.) it was Davidic, (ii.) it was written by David under the influence of inspiration (Δαβὶδ ἐν πνεύματι), (iii.) it was explicitly Messianic. If Jesus placed the imprimatur of His Divine authority upon any one of these notions, we are bound to believe that He did so on all, and by consequence on the Messianic ideas which were popularly held, and which doubtless were supposed to be favoured by Ps 110. We know, however, that He habitually discouraged the popular belief in a Messiah who was to be an earthly Sovereign of all-conquering power, which was held to be countenanced by the words of this Psalm (cf. Jn 6th 18th and Lk 17th). There is no hint given by any of the three Synoptists that Jesus corrected these Messianic expectations during the course of the argument. His purpose was other than this, 'to argue from the contents' of the Psalm, and not at all to correct ideas as to authorship and interpretation (cf. Driver, LOT, p. 363 n.; and A. F. Kirkpatrick, 'Psalms,' in the Cambridge Bible, Introd. to Ps 110).

The whole edifice so laboriously constructed by the opponents of a rational criticism, on the basis of Jesus' references to this Psalm as well as to other portions of OT Scriptures, falls to the ground when considered beneath 'the dry light of reason.' The following words of Bishop Gore are so moderate and reasonable in connection with this reference of Jesus to the Davidic authorship of Ps 110, that we may be pardoned for quoting them in full. 'On the face of it, the argument suggests that the Messiah could not be David's Son.—"If David called him Lord, how is he his Son?"—but, in fact, its purpose is not to prove or disprove anything, to affirm or deny anything, but simply to press upon the Pharisees an argument which their habitual assumptions ought to have suggested to them: to confront them with just that question, which they, with their principles, ought to have been asking themselves' (Exposition Lect. p. 186). In a word, nothing can be truer than that both 'the Saviour and the Apostles have quoted a body of sacred Scriptures, and it does not appear that in their teaching they had any wish to introduce a novel theory as to the meaning and authority of that collection. Neither the Apostolic writing nor the tradition of the Christian Church bear any trace of an explicit decision given by Jesus Christ or the Apostles with respect to the Canon of the Old Testament, and still less of a decision which would have the effect of formally correcting opinions which obtained in the Jewish world' (Loisy, Canon de l'Ancien Testament, p. 97).

v. SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION.—In summing up and reviewing the conditions under which the teaching of Jesus was ushered into the world, and the relation in which that teaching stood to the human race, we cannot do better than quote a passage from a little work of the last-named writer (L'Evangile et l'Eglise), though he is there dealing with a very different problem:—

'Nothing could make Jesus other than a Jew. He was only man under condition of belonging to one branch of humanity. In that in which He was born, the branch that may well be said to have carried in it the religious future of the world, this future was known in quite a precise manner, by the hope of the reign of God, by the symbol of the Messiah. He who was to be the Saviour of the world could enter on His office only by assuming the position of Messiah and by presenting Himself as the Founder of the Kingdom, come to accomplish the hope of Israel. The Gospel, appearing in Judaea, and unable to appear elsewhere, was bound to be conditioned by Judaism. Its Jewish exterior is the human body, whose Divine soul is the Spirit of Jesus. But take away the body, and the soul will vanish in the air like the lightest breath. Without the idea of the Messiah, the Gospel would have been but a metaphysical possibility, an invisible, intangible essence, even unintelligible, for want of a definition appropriate to the means of knowledge, not a living and conquering reality. The Gospel will always need a body to be human. Having become the hope of Christian people, it has corrected in the interpretation certain parts of its Israelitish symbolism. None the less it remains the shadowy representation of the great mystery, God and the Providential destiny of man and of humanity, because it is a representation always striving after perfection, inadequate and insufficient. This is the mystery that Jesus revealed, as far as it could be revealed, and under the conditions which made revelation possible. It may be said that Christ lived it as much as He made it manifest.'

The present writer has no intention of entering into the very difficult and much-debated question of the connexion between Jesus' ideas of 'the kingdom of God' (or 'of heaven') during the early and the later periods of His active ministry, or how far the latter was a development of the former; nor again to inquire as to the period when it dawned upon His consciousness that His death was the condition upon which its inauguration and subsequent life rested. Broadly speaking, a line of demarcation might be drawn through the life as it is presented to us, cutting it into two fairly well marked divisions at the time of the Petrine confession and the Transfiguration. After these events Jesus began to concentrate His teaching more especially upon the circle of disciples gathered closely round Him. It was then that He, in solemn and almost sad foreboding, warned His followers of the events which were soon to try His own fidelity to the cause which He so constantly and fearlessly championed, and which were to put their faith to a most cruel test. We are indebted to the writer of the Fourth Gospel for the series of discourses in which He endeavoured to strengthen and encourage His disciples against the coming time of trial. From these we gather that Jesus looked forward to the establishment, on the basis of His own life, of a kingdom amongst men which was to carry on His teaching, even as it received the truth at the hands of His Spirit. The time had not as yet arrived when they could assimilate the full self-revelation of God (Jn 16<sup>13</sup>), but as their experience widened and their understandings became enlarged, they would be made the recipients of 'all the truth' (v. 13, cf. also 15<sup>26</sup>). That He looked beyond the lives of those whom He thus addressed will not, we think, be disputed (cf. eis 700 aïōna, 14<sup>19</sup>). Certainly His words were so interpreted by His followers (see Mt 28<sup>20</sup>; cf. 13<sup>30</sup>, Jn 14<sup>17</sup>, Ac 2<sup>39</sup>). We are thus emboldened to state our belief that this plan of Divine self-accommodation enters into the very centre of the life of Jesus Himself, and that it is the plan by which the world has received its education from the beginning even till these latter days.

Each of them (Baptism, Temptation, and Transfiguration of Jesus) constitutes a moment, and a moment important, nay supreme, in the development of the Humanity of Jesus. That for the ultimate, Divine consummation accomplished in the garden and on the cross He was preparing all His life long, and that we can see in these three events a scheme divinely prepared, by which that development was set forward; that we can see Him in each of the three pass from stage to well-defined stage of that incomprehensible process which is indicated in the Epistle to the Hebrews, when He is spoken of as "learning obedience" . . . That this growth . . . should have gone on to the end of His life is in itself no more marvellous or more mysterious than that it should ever have been possible, and have taken place" (Ch. Quest. Rev., July 1901, pp. 303-4).

The question naturally arises at this stage, How far is this Divine method of educating humanity to enter into the conscious active life of the teaching 'Body of Christ' (Eph. 4<sup>12</sup>)? How is the Church to exercise her functions as the guide and instructress of the race? Is she to draw lines of distinction between those who 'are able to bear' the fulness of the faith delivered to her keeping, and those whose receptive faculties she considers are not fitted to receive such revelation? How far is she to practise the doctrine of economy or reserve in disclosing to men 'the faith which was once for all delivered to the saints' (Jude 3). That once for all delivered a policy which seems to put such judicial authority into the hands of men, is not to be denied; nor can we shut our eyes to the tendency which such a course fosters, to hold up different standards of belief and practice before different minds. At the same time, we cannot shut our eyes to the sad phenomenon of a rent and distracted Christendom, which necessarily implies inability somewhere to grasp the fundamental verity of Christian life (cf. Jn 13<sup>30</sup>). Imperfect belief and faith are the causes to which must be attributed the vital as well as the minor differences separating those who ought to belong to the same household. The bearing with each other, the sympathetic endeavour on each side to understand the other's point of view, seem to be the only worthy methods of continuing the work of love begun by Jesus. It seems, indeed, to be the method which, springing from the love for men which He inculcated, He bequeathed to His teaching Body. We are, however, bound to admit that those occupying the position of Doctores ecclesie have not always marched in the van of human progress, and that often they have adopted the rôle of obscurantists where the discoveries of science ran counter to preconceived ideas. The Church, at times, seemed to have been committed almost irrevocably to a false and transient philosophy, to a weak and untenable exegetical process, when she was forced by the onward march of God's self-revelation, grasped and promulgated in the teeth of opposition and obloquy by the brightest intellects amongst her children, to review her position, to reject old prejudices, and to bring her interpretation of the life and teaching of Jesus into line with the newer discoveries which are so constantly revealing to men's minds wider and profounder ideas of the condescending love of God. The chief object for which the Church exists is, while 'reproving, rebuking, exhorting' (cf. 2 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>), to interpret the Incarnation as it bears on man's life, and on the destiny of the world and the race, in the light of an ever-increasing knowledge. Her business is not so much to keep back the profounder mysteries of a gradually accumulating revelation from the minds of 'the weak' (1 Co 8<sup>9</sup>), as to build up and strengthen the entire man, intellectual and spiritual, so that all may learn that there is no department of human life which has not its own intimate relationship to the Incarnate Son of God.

ACCUSATIONS.—See TRIAL (OF JESUS).

ACHIM ('Ἀχιζ).—An ancestor of Joseph, according to the genealogy of our Lord in St. Matthew's Gospel (1<sup>14</sup>). The name may be a shortened form of Jehoiachim, or it may be for Ahiam (cf. 1 Ch 11<sup>28</sup>) or Jachin (cf. Gn 46<sup>16</sup>).

ACTIVITY.—1. The period of our Lord's activity is, in other words, that of His ministry, in the fulfilment of which His activity was exhibited. Its duration is a matter of dispute, relevant only so far as it compresses into one year the recorded details, or extends them to the traditional three. In any case the records are in no sense exhaustive. Manifold ministries are expressed in few words (Mt 4<sup>23</sup>, 15<sup>24</sup>, Lk 4<sup>43</sup> 8<sup>1</sup>, Jn 4<sup>1</sup> etc.); a complete account is beyond an Evangelist's scope (Jn 20<sup>30-31</sup>), and would be voluminous (21<sup>23</sup>). This is said of things done 'in the presence of the disciples' (Jn 20<sup>20</sup>), and we cannot suppose they saw or knew all that Jesus did. See art. MINISTRY.

In fact, we possess no more than specimens of Christ's labours; but these, no doubt, are so selected as to give us a general idea of the whole. In this connexion the first Sabbath at Capernaum (of which a detailed account is given in Mk 1<sup>3-4</sup>, Lk 4<sup>14-15</sup>) has well been pointed to as a specimen day. Some details of the Son of Man's toilsome life—wearily journeys (Jn 4<sup>6</sup>), rising 'a great while before day' (Mk 1<sup>35</sup>)—may be in themselves not much more than features of Oriental life: others—'nowhere to lay his head' (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>)—cannot be so explained. Day to Him meant work. The Father's work was both a daily necessity (Jn 9<sup>4</sup>) and His very 'meat' (4<sup>34</sup>). Its substance was twofold: (1) the general work of evangelizing and healing; (2) the special work of training others, the Twelve (Mk 3<sup>14-15</sup> etc.) and the Seventy (Lk 10<sup>1</sup>), and superintending their efforts. Similarly we may regard as twofold the conditions under which it was carried on: (1) the normal conditions, ever varying, of the day (Sabbath or week-day), the place (synagogue, Temple or open-air) and the hearers (multitudes or individuals); (2) the abnormal conditions, created by the presence of opponents (Mt 12<sup>10-14, 24-25</sup> etc.), or of crowds who cling to Him sometimes for days together (Mt 16<sup>20</sup>, Mk 8<sup>3</sup>). Under such pressure there was often leisure to eat (Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, 9<sup>31</sup>). Night did not mean sleep, but was given largely to prayer (Mt 14<sup>23</sup>, Lk 8<sup>18, 22, 23-24</sup>), till His exhausted nature, finding opportunity for repose, could sleep undisturbed even by a storm (Mk 4<sup>38</sup>, Lk 8<sup>23</sup>). More than once His disciples (accustomed by their trade to night-watches, Lk 9<sup>18</sup>) proved unequal to the strain of wakefulness (Lk 9<sup>18</sup>, Mk 14<sup>7-9</sup>). His friends, fearing a mental breakdown, came to restrain Him by force (Mk 3<sup>32</sup>). It would be hazardous to estimate degrees of spiritual activity by the precarious test of numerical results (Jn 12<sup>27-40</sup>), but it is noticeable that at one time He made more disciples than John the Baptist (Jn 4<sup>1</sup>).

Certain limitations of Christ's activity are clear and significant. (1) In scope it was confined to 'the house of Israel,' more especially its 'lost sheep' (Jn 1<sup>1</sup>, Mt 15<sup>24</sup>). A few outsiders (Gentiles and proselytes) came within its range; but these were exceptional (Mt 8<sup>12-13</sup>, Lk 17<sup>15</sup>, Jn 4<sup>9</sup>, 12<sup>20-21</sup>). (2) In development it was regulated by the unfolding of a Divine plan, frequently referred to by such expressions as 'my hour' (Jn 2<sup>4</sup>, 7<sup>30</sup>, 8<sup>12</sup> etc.), 'my time' (Mt 26<sup>18</sup>, Jn 7<sup>9</sup>). (3) In operation it was morally conditioned by the existence (or otherwise) of a certain measure of receptiveness (Mk 6<sup>7</sup>).

In reference to the source of His activity, it must be noted: (1) that it was always and essentially associated with times of retirement and prayer (Mk 1<sup>35</sup>, 3<sup>34</sup>, 6<sup>46</sup> etc.); (2) that its manifestation is directly ascribed to the power of the Spirit (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>, Lk 4<sup>14</sup> etc.); and (3) that, in its miraculous exercise, there is indicated (at least once) a perception that 'power had gone out' (Mk 5<sup>30</sup>, Lk 8<sup>46</sup>).

2. In the Christian course, energy is constantly commanded (Mt 11<sup>12</sup>, Mk 13<sup>34</sup>, Lk 13<sup>34</sup>). Yet it is worthy of remark that in Christ's estimate of human character the active qualities seem sometimes to be depreciated in comparison with the passive, contemplative, and devotional. The latter attain to 'the good part' (Lk 10<sup>42-43</sup>), and find their place in the Beatitudes (Mt 5<sup>3-12</sup>). See, further, CHARACTER (Christian).

3. Finally, the believer's view of Christ is not, in the Gospels, primarily directed to His active labours. Such things are the record of an Apostle (2 Cor 6<sup>4, 5</sup> etc.) rather than a Saviour: accordingly, if with the account of our Lord's active labours we measure that of His Passion, both as to general proportion and minutiae of detail, there can be no doubt that in the Gospel picture the Passion, and not the activity, occupies the foreground. F. S. RANKEN.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.—The aim of this article is to answer the question, What does the Acts of the Apostles say of Christ?; otherwise expressed, How is the Book of Acts related to 'the gospel?' or, What is 'the gospel' of the Acts? We do not know the name of the author of the book—for St. Luke or some other disciple of St. Paul did not compose it, but merely supplied valuable materials for its composition—but his religious individuality may be ascertained from his work with sufficient clearness to enable us to answer the questions just stated. The problem is all the more interesting because the author can hardly have written before the end of the 1st cent., and thus cannot reckon himself among the first eye-witnesses and ministers of the word (Lk 1<sup>1</sup>). What then is the picture of Christ that stamps itself on the heart of a man of the second generation? Has this man anything new, anything unique, to tell us of Him?

Before we go on to answer this question, we must make it clear to ourselves that our author, in what he writes, does not always speak in his own person. From the Gospel of St. Luke we know to what extent he is dependent on sources. This may be observed and proved in particular instances by a close comparison with St. Mark and (in the case of the discourses) with St. Matthew. In the Gospel he is almost entirely a mere retailer of older tradition, and the lineaments of his own personality scarcely come into view. There can be no doubt that likewise in the Acts he largely reproduces early tradition, that he makes use of sources, sometimes copying them in full, at other times abbreviating or expanding them, grouping them and editing both their language and their contents. Modern criticism, however, has reached the conviction that in this second work more of the author's idiosyncrasy is to be detected than in his Gospel. Hence it will be necessary to make the attempt to distinguish the notions which reveal to us the educated writer of the last decade of the 1st cent. from those passages in which the rôle is played by early popular tradition.

The author's personality undoubtedly shows itself more strongly in the second than in the first part of the book, but most clearly in the way in which the work is arranged in these two parts, so that the first is dominated by the person of Peter and the second by that of Paul. To him the Church rests upon the foundation of the Apostles and prophets (cf. Eph 2<sup>20</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>)—not upon one Apostle, as in Mt 16<sup>18</sup>, but upon the two great leaders, the head of the primitive Church who by a Divine dispensation was led to engage in a mission to the Gentiles, and the great Apostle of the heathen world who by Divine guidance had to turn his back on his own people and betake himself to the Gentiles. 'Peter and Paul' is the watchword, the shibboleth of the Roman Church, as we find again in the First Epistle of Clement.

It is especially in the speeches contained in the second part of the book that the author reveals his conception of Christianity. When St. Paul discourses (Ac 24<sup>14</sup>) of 'the faith in Christ Jesus,' the subjects of his address are given in v. 22 as 'righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come.' This future and not distant judgment is also the point that forms the climax of St. Paul's address at Athens (17<sup>31</sup>): 'He hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness,' and immediately thereafter, 'by a man whom he hath (thereof) ordained, having given him his credentials before all men by having raised him from the dead.' This last is the essentially new point in contradistinction from the Jewish preaching in the Diaspora. That there is to be a judgment of the world had, indeed, been already declared, but that the Judge 'appointed by God over living and dead' (10<sup>22</sup>) is already present in heaven (24<sup>1</sup>), has already been manifested on earth (1<sup>3</sup> 10<sup>46</sup>), and accredited by God through an unprecedented miracle—this is the cardinal and significant message of the Apostles. Now, it is noteworthy how the author of the Acts gives point and practical application to this generally accepted idea. The resurrection of Jesus is the main content of the Apostolic preaching, so much so that in 1<sup>22</sup> the Apostles are roundly designated 'witnesses of the resurrection.' In the eyes of our author it comes to this, that in the gospel of the resurrection of Jesus is implied the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead in general. What St. Paul (1 Co 15<sup>12-19</sup>) seeks to prove to his readers, is to our author self-evident; the one special case implies the general. This is plainly declared in Ac 4<sup>1</sup> 'they proclaimed in Jesus the resurrection from the dead.' So also in 17<sup>1</sup> 'he preached Jesus and the resurrection,' and in v. 32 'the resurrection of the dead' is the point in St. Paul's address on which the Athenians fix. Before the Sanhedrin St. Paul declares: 'Touching the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question' (23<sup>6</sup>); to Felix he says: 'I have the hope that there shall be a resurrection both of the just and of the unjust' (24<sup>15</sup>). The latter passage is specially important because in it the relation of Christianity to Judaism is defined to the effect that there is really no essential difference between them. St. Paul, like his accusers, serves, although after the new 'Way,' the God of the fathers (v. 23); 'for the hope of Israel' he bears his chain (28<sup>2</sup>). All Jews who believe in the resurrection ought really to be Christians. 'Why is it judged incredible with you if God doth raise the dead?' (28<sup>2</sup>). Hence also the Pharisees, who believe in the resurrection of the dead, appear as the party favourable to Christianity; whereas the Sadducees, who say that 'there is no resurrection,' are its enemies (23<sup>8</sup>). Resurrection, then, is the main theme of the new message, hence the preaching of the Apostles bears the designation 'words of this Life' (5<sup>4</sup>). The Risen One is 'the Prince of Life' (3<sup>15</sup>). By His resurrection and exaltation He is proved to be the Saviour (σωτήρ, the term best answering our author's purpose, and most intelligible to the Greeks of the time, 5<sup>30</sup> 13<sup>29</sup>); the 'word' is the 'word of salvation' (13<sup>29</sup>); and the whole of the Acts of the Apostles might have this motto prefixed: 'In none other is there salvation, and neither is there any other name under heaven, that is given among men, wherein we must be saved' (4<sup>12</sup>). This religion is proved to be the superior of all earlier ones, superior alike to the darkness of heathendom (26<sup>18</sup>) and to Judaism, in this, that it tells of a Saviour who saves alive. The method is described in 10<sup>38</sup> 13<sup>38</sup> 26<sup>18</sup> as the forgiveness of sins, or, to use the designation adopted in one of St. Paul's addresses, 'justification' (13<sup>39</sup>).

But who now is the Judge and Saviour accredited by the resurrection? It is very characteristic of our author that in those passages where for the most part it is himself that speaks, e.g. in the speeches put into the mouth of St. Paul before Agrippa or Felix or Festus (chs. 22, 23), we scarcely hear of the earthly Jesus but of the heavenly Lord. The appearance of the Exalted One near Damascus is the great matter which St. Paul has to communicate to his countrymen and to the Jewish king. It is the heavenly Lord that permeates the life of His Church and His apostles, the Κύριος on whom Christians believe. This Divine name is very often applied in the Acts to God, but not infrequently also to Christ. Thus the Exalted Christ, working miracles from heaven by His name (9<sup>34</sup>), accredited by the miracle of the resurrection, and destined to come again with judgment and salvation, occupies the central point of the faith of our author.

But it would be a mistake to suppose that our author had no interest in the earthly Jesus of Nazareth. As the heavenly Christ says to Saul, 'I am Jesus of Nazareth whom thou persecutest' (22<sup>5</sup>), so to the writer of the Acts 'the Christ' and 'Jesus' constitute an inseparable unity. He interchanges freely such expressions as 'proclaimed unto them the Christ' (8<sup>3</sup>) and 'preached unto him Jesus' (v. 30); cf. 5<sup>4</sup> 'to preach Christ Jesus' (RV 'Jesus [as] the Christ'), 9<sup>35</sup> 'proclaimed Jesus that he is the Son of God,' 18<sup>5</sup> 'testifying to the Jews that Jesus was the Christ.' And as our author in his Gospel narrative already calls Jesus 'Lord,' it is always of the Exalted One that he thinks even when communicating what he knows of the earthly life of Jesus. More than once he defines the contents of the Apostolic preaching as 'the things concerning Jesus' (18<sup>25</sup>) or 'the things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ' (23<sup>31</sup>), and this concise formula embraces far more than one might infer from the meagre sketches of St. Paul's address in 13<sup>24-29</sup> or St. Peter's in 10<sup>37-42</sup>. We must keep in mind that the first readers of the Acts, Theophilus in particular, when this work came into their hands, were already acquainted with the Third Gospel, and would thus, by means of the full details supplied in it, unconsciously clothe with meaning the brief formulae in question. Still more varied was the knowledge which our author possessed of the life of Jesus, for he was acquainted not only with St. Mark's Gospel, but with other writings which he utilized merely for extracts; and how manifold may have been the oral tradition current at the same time, which he made use of in an eclectic fashion! The whole of this copious tradition we must think of as forming the background of the Acts if we are to appreciate rightly its picture of Christ.

A special charm of the Lukan writings arises from the fact that the author, with all his culture and Greek sympathies, has had the good taste to retain in large measure the peculiar, un-Greek, popular Palestinian character of his sources, and that both in language and contents. Some scholars, indeed, are of opinion that he himself deliberately produced the colouring appropriate to place and time, as in the case of an artificial patina. But this view is untenable. The more thoroughly the Third Gospel and the Acts are examined, the deeper becomes the conviction that the author worked upon a very ancient tradition which he has preserved in his own style. As in the early narratives of his Gospel he preserves almost unimpaired the colouring and tone of Jewish-Christian piety without any admixture of Græco-Gentile-Christian elements, so also in the Acts, especially in the first part of the book, he has succeeded in presenting the original picture of the religious conceptions and the piety of the earliest Christian community in Jerusalem. We are far from believing that everything here related is 'historical' in the strict sense. For instance, it is in the highest degree improbable that the actual speeches of St. Peter have been preserved verbatim; all we assert is that these chapters are a true representation of the spirit of early Jewish Christianity. Very specially is this the case with the Christology. For such a doctrine of Christ as is represented by the Petrine discourses was scarcely to be found in the Church after the time of St. Paul and at the time when the Fourth Gospel was written. After the kenosis doctrine of St. Paul had been propounded, and then, as its counterpart, the Johannine picture of Christ, in which also the earthly Jesus wears the 'form of God,' had taken hold of men's minds, a Christology such as the first part of the Acts exhibits could not have been devised. But we are grateful to the author for having preserved to us a picture of that earliest mode of thought. Let us examine its main features.

We may use as a collateral witness the words of the disciples on the way to Emmaus (Lk 24<sup>30</sup>), for it is a mere accident, so to speak, that this story is found in the Gospel and not in the Acts: 'Jesus of Nazareth, which was a prophet (ἀρῆς προφήτης), mighty in deed and word before God and all the people.' So also He is described by St. Peter: 'Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God unto you by mighty works and wonders and signs, which God did by him in the midst of you' (Ac 2<sup>22</sup>). The peculiarity of this last statement is that the wonders and signs are not attributed to Jesus Himself: God wrought them through Him; He was simply God's organ or instrument. The same thing is expressed in another passage (10<sup>38</sup>), where it is declared that in His going about and in His deeds God was with Him. In both instances the conception comes out clearly that Jesus was a man chosen and specially favoured of God. There is not a word in all these discourses of a Divine birth, nor word of a coming down from heaven or of a 'Son of God' in a physical or supernatural sense. On the contrary, Jesus is called more than once 'the Servant of God' (3<sup>13</sup>, 22, 47). This designation suggests a prophet, and as a matter of fact Jesus is directly characterized as a prophet when in 4<sup>2</sup> the words of Dt 18<sup>15</sup>, 18<sup>2</sup>, are applied to Him. At the same time He is no ordinary prophet, but the prophet like unto Moses; He is the second Moses predicted by Moses himself.

But it may be asked, Was Jesus then nothing more than this to the earliest disciples, was He not to them the Messiah? In a certain sense—yes, and in another sense—no. Certainly He had received the kingly anointing (10<sup>38</sup>); but, as David was anointed long before he received the kingdom, so Jesus was from the time of His baptism a king, indeed, but a secret one with an invisible crown. The primitive Jewish-Christian Church was far from saying: Jesus of Nazareth, as He journeyed through the land teaching and healing, was the Messiah; no, He was then merely the One destined for lordship. It was only at a later period that He received the crown, namely at His resurrection and exaltation. Here comes into view the saying of St. Peter in Ac 2<sup>26</sup>, which is a gem to the historian of primitive Christianity: 'This Jesus hath God made both Lord and Christ,' namely by exalting Him to His right hand (v. 33) and thereby fulfilling the words of Ps 110<sup>1</sup> 'Sit thou at my right hand.' The exaltation of Jesus marks His ascension to the throne; now He has become in reality what since His baptism He was in claim and anticipation—the Anointed. Now for the first time the name 'Lord' is fully appropriate to Him. This is the principal extant proof passage for the earliest Christology. It reveals to us the conceptions of the primitive Church, which, as a matter of fact, still underlie the teaching even of St. Paul. For, in spite of his advanced speculations on the subject of Christ, in spite of his doctrine of pre-existence and his cosmological Christology, the Apostle holds fast in Ro 1<sup>4</sup> and Ph 2<sup>9</sup> to the notion that Jesus became 'Son of God in power' through His resurrection from the dead, and was invested with the title 'Lord' at His exaltation. To the same effect St. Paul in Ac 13<sup>33</sup> applies the words of Ps 2<sup>7</sup> ('Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee') not to the birth nor to the baptism of Jesus, but to the day of His resurrection and exaltation. With this fundamental passage corresponds another. When in Ac 3<sup>21</sup>, speaking of the future, it is said 'that there may come the times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, and that he may send the Christ who hath been appointed for you, even Jesus,' this assumes that Jesus has not yet made His appearance as Messiah; in that capacity He belongs to the future; there is not a word of coming again or of a second sending. Such is the earliest primitive Christian conception, and it is this alone which is in harmony with the preaching and the self-estimate of Jesus when these are rightly understood.

But what now are the contents and the significance of the life-work of Jesus? Thoroughly in harmony with important words of Jesus, Ac 10<sup>38</sup> replies: 'He went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil.' Just as the Third Gospel delights to represent the work of Jesus as a conflict with the devil, the brief formula we have quoted reproduces accurately the contents of His life work. Along with this, indeed, should be taken also 3<sup>26</sup> 'God sent him to bless you in turning away every one of you from your iniquities.' He was 'the Holy and Righteous One' (3<sup>14</sup>), or, absolutely, 'the Righteous One' (7<sup>54</sup>). The latter expression is chosen, no doubt, in order to emphasize His innocence in His sufferings and death, but it is certainly not contrary to the spirit of the Acts to find in it the testimony that it was He that was called to break the sway of sin in the world. Less clear is Ac 10<sup>39</sup>, according to which God caused Moses to be preached by Jesus to the children of Israel; a form of expression which recalls Eek 2<sup>7</sup>, and in its abrupt conciseness no doubt reflects the conceptions of the author more than those of the early Church.

This brings us to the question, What view, judging from the evidence of the Acts, did the early Church take of the death of Christ? Repeatedly in the addresses of St. Peter it is urged upon opponents that this Jesus, the Holy and Righteous One, was put to death by the Jews (2<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>13</sup> 4<sup>10</sup>, 22, 5<sup>28</sup>, 7<sup>52</sup> 10<sup>39</sup> 13<sup>28</sup>), by the hands of wicked men (2<sup>23</sup>), although Pilate was prepared to acquit Him (3<sup>13</sup>). In all these instances, as was fitting in addresses meant to lead the hearers to conviction and repentance, the innocence of Jesus is emphasised as a point to awaken conscience, not as an element in a doctrine of the atoning death of Christ. Such an element is entirely lacking in these chapters, for in the passage from Is 53 about the Suffering Servant, which Philip expounded to the Ethiopian eunuch, it is precisely the expressions about bearing our sins that are wanting. The early theology of the death of Christ confines itself entirely to the point that this event was in no way contrary to God's saving purpose; on the contrary, it had long been foreseen (2<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>13</sup> 4<sup>28</sup> 13<sup>33</sup>). Hence the copious Scripture proofs, which, however, deal more with the resurrection than with the sufferings and death (2<sup>22</sup>, 34, 41, 26, 32, 13<sup>33</sup>).

The resurrection is not in these passages, as with St. Paul, regarded as a clothing of the Risen One with a glorified body, but as the revivification, or, to put it better, the conservation of the very same body of flesh which was laid in the grave. The principle that governs the conception is found in Ps 16<sup>9</sup> (quoted in Ac 2<sup>27</sup>), 'Thou wilt not leave my soul to Sheol, neither wilt thou suffer thine holy one to see corruption.' For, if Christ did descend to Hades, He was not given over to its power (2<sup>24</sup>), God 'having loosed' "the pangs of death," because it was not possible that he should be holden of it<sup>3</sup>

(v. 24), 'nor did his flesh see corruption' (v. 21). This is the essential point, that the same body which was laid in the grave was that which rose again. For this reason, as in St. Luke's Gospel (24<sup>39-43</sup>), such emphasis is laid upon the eating and drinking of the Risen One (Ac 10<sup>41</sup>); hence also the forty days' intercourse with the disciples (1<sup>4</sup>). Jesus, in short, actually returned again to earth in complete corporeality; hence the necessity, at the end of the forty days, of yet another special miracle, that of the Ascension (1<sup>4</sup>). Like Moses or Elijah, He is carried up by a cloud, as He still walks on earth and still belongs to earth. This tradition says nothing about the necessary change whereby this earthly body that rose from the grave was transformed into the glorified heavenly body that appeared to Saul of Tarsus in kingly splendour. We have here before us the popular view of the Resurrection in its crudest form. That an author whose ideas otherwise are cast in such a Greek mould should reproduce it, shows that the popular conceptions cannot have been so strange to him as we should have supposed. Conceptions which our intelligence thinks it necessary to separate, and which a St. Paul did separate, appear to have found a place in the same mind side by side.

We owe a special debt of gratitude to the author of the Acts for having drawn for us several pictures illustrating the prominent part played in the early Church by the Spirit and the Name of the exalted Christ. The Spirit sent by the latter is the proof of His exaltation and Messiahship (28<sup>26-28</sup>). This is the culminating point of St. Peter's Pentecostal address (24<sup>28-31</sup>), whose order of thought forms a very interesting study for the historian of primitive Christianity. This proof is addressed primarily to the house of Israel (29<sup>1</sup>). The Jews have not, indeed, seen the Risen One (10<sup>41</sup>), but for that very reason His exaltation is designed as a final means of leading Israel to repentance (5<sup>31</sup>), for the coming of the era of salvation is bound up with this repentance (31<sup>34</sup>). Through this Spirit the exalted Lord is ever present with His own; He imparts power and success to the words of the Apostles (27<sup>5</sup> 5<sup>2</sup> 6<sup>9</sup>); and miracles are wrought by the power of God (6<sup>9</sup>). It is noteworthy, however, that it is only rarely that the Spirit of God is introduced in this connexion; far more frequently it is the Name of Christ that, like a present representative of the Lord, works miracles (3<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>10</sup>). Specially instructive are 6<sup>8</sup> where the pronouncing of the Name effects healing, and 19<sup>12</sup> where the use of the Name is resorted to even by unbelievers.

ADAM.—1. In Lk 3<sup>38</sup> the ancestry of Jesus is traced up to Adam. From what source the Evangelist drew his genealogy it is impossible to say. But when compared with that in the First Gospel, it clearly shows the purpose with which St. Luke wrote. As a Gentile, writing for a Gentile, he took every opportunity of insisting upon the universal power of the gospel. The effects of the life and Person of Jesus are not confined to the Jews; for Jesus is not, as in St. Matthew's Gospel, a descendant of Abraham only, but of the man to whom all mankind trace their origin. See art. GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST. But further, St. Luke closes his genealogy with the significant words 'the son of Adam, the son of God' (τῷ Ἀδὰμ, τῷ Θεῷ). Adam, and therefore all mankind, had a Divine origin. The same Evangelist who relates the fact of the virgin birth, and records that Christ was, in His own proper Person, ὁὖς Θεοῦ (1<sup>30</sup>), claims that the first man, and hence every human being, is ὁὖς Θεοῦ. Thus the genealogy, which might at first sight appear to be a useless addition to the Gospel narrative, possesses a lasting spiritual value.

The truth placed by St. Luke in the forefront of his Gospel is treated in its redemptive aspect by his master St. Paul, who in four passages brings Adam and Christ into juxtaposition:

(a) 1 Co 15<sup>22</sup>. The solidarity of mankind in their physical union with Adam involves universal death as a consequence of Adam's sin. Similarly the solidarity of mankind in their spiritual union with Christ involves universal life as a consequence of Christ's perfect work.

(b) In Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup> this solidarity and its results are treated in fuller detail. (i.) Vv. 12-14. There is a parallelism between Adam and Christ. Adam 'is a type of him who was to come' (v. 14), in the sense that his act affected all men. Adam committed a παράπτωμα, a lapse, a false step—commonly termed the Fall. By this lapse, sin was as 'a malignant force let loose among mankind'; and through sin came physical death. (St. Paul sees no occasion for proof of the connexion between sin and physical death; he unhesitatingly bases his position on the narrative in Genesis: see 217 3<sup>8</sup> 18 21.) Were this all, the passage would implicitly annul human responsibility. But St. Paul, without attempting fully to reconcile them, places side by side the two aspects of the truth—the hereditary transmission of guilt, and moral responsibility: 'and thus death made its way (ἔλαβε) to every individual man, because all sinned (οἱ ἅπαντες ἡμάρτησαν)'. Controversy has raged hotly round this phrase, Augustine and many other writers having understood the relative οἱ ἅπαντες as masculine, and as referring to Adam; so vixit in quo. But there can be no doubt that οἱ ἅπαντες must be taken in its usual meaning 'because'. Adam's fall involved all men in sin, and therefore in death; but this was because all men (in full exercise of their free will) sinned. It would be out of place here to discuss the attempts that have been made to combine these two factors in the moral history of man (see Literature); strictly speaking, they cannot fully and logically be combined; but many of the most fundamental truths of the Christian religion can be arrived at only by the balancing of complementary statements. In vv. 13-14 a qualification is entered, which causes St. Paul to ruin his construction, and omit the apostrophe of which v. 12 forms the protasis. He feels obliged to explain that, sin being an offence against law, those who lived between Adam and Moses had no law, and thus did not transgress an explicit command as Adam had done. But the fact that death reigned throughout that period only shows that—not the guilt of individuals, but—the transmitted effects of Adam's sin were at work. And it is this that makes him a type of the Messiah. (ii.) Vv. 15-17. The contrast is far greater than the similarity. The contrast between Adam and Christ is great—in quantity (v. 15). The one representative man, Adam, committed a παράπτωμα; but over-against that must be placed the undeserved kindness (χρησμία) of God, and the gift of righteousness arising from the kindness of the other representative Man, Jesus Christ. In quantity (v. 16). 'One act tainting the whole race with sin, and a multitude of sins collected together in one only to be forgiven.' In character and consequences (v. 17). Adam's fall ushered in a reign of death; Christ's work ensures that all who have received His kindness and His gift of righteousness shall themselves reign in life. (iii.) Vv. 18-21. Summary of the argument, in which it is further shown that Law 'came in as an afterthought' (ἔσπευσθη), multiplying sin, but thereby only increasing the abundance of God's kindness.

(c) 1 Co 15<sup>44-47</sup>. The two foregoing passages from St. Paul's writings deal with the practical results of union with Adam and Christ respectively. These verses (i.) go back behind that, and show that there is a complete and radical difference between the natures of each; (ii.) look forward, and show that this difference has a vital bearing on the truth of man's resurrection.

(i.) St. Paul maintains (vv. 46-48), by a series of illustrations from the natural world, the reasonableness of a resurrection from death. In Nature 'every seed has its own particular body'—'all flesh is not the same flesh'—the terrestrial differs from the celestial—there is a different glory of the sun, the moon, and the stars. So also it may be rightly held that it is possible for man to exist in two different states, one far higher than the other. Not only so, but (vv. 48-49) there actually exists such an analogous distinction between man and man, as Scripture shows. The thought in v. 49 is arrived at by an adaptation of Gn 27: Ὁ ἀδελφὸς ἡ ἀδελφὴ ἢ ψυχὴ ἕκαστος. These words relate only that after being lifeless clay, man was by God's breath transformed into a living being. But St. Paul reads into the statement the doctrinal significance that the body of the first representative man became the vehicle of a 'psychical' nature, while the body of the second is the organ of a 'pneumatical' nature. St. Paul's trichotomy of man may be represented thus:

Everything in man that is not πνεῦμα may be called 'psychical' in so far as it is considered as 'intellect,' and 'carnal' in so far as it is thought of as the seat of the animal passions; both the adjectives ψυχικός and σαρκικός thus mean 'non-spiritual.' The second half of St. Paul's statement—the last Adam became a life-giving spirit—finds no exact parallel in the OT, but seems to be based on a reminiscence of Messianic passages which speak of the work of the Divine Spirit, e.g. Is 11<sup>2</sup>, Jt 28<sup>2</sup>.

(L) But as the ψυχὴ ζῶσα came first and the πνεῦμα ζωοποιῶν last, so it is with the development of mankind; the spiritual must follow the physical (v. 45). As the first man was formed from the clay, and had a nature in conformity with his origin, while the second Man has His origin 'from heaven' (v. 47), so among mankind there are those whose nature remains low and mean, tied to the clods of earth, and there are those whose nature has become heavenly (v. 48). But this implies more (v. 49). In his present state man is an exact counterpart, he visibly reproduces the lineaments and character, of the first man, because of his corporate union with him (ἰσχυρισμὸς τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ χριστοῦ). But the time is coming when we shall become the exact counterpart or image of the second Man (cf. Gn 2<sup>24</sup>), because of our spiritual union with Him (σπέρματι καὶ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος). The above follows the text of B a c g 17 meth.

arm. (syrr. ܐܕܡܐ) is indeterminate; and Theodore distinctly says ὅτι τὰς ἐπιφανείας προσηγορίας ἐπὶ παρανομίας ἵστανται. The mass of authorities read ἐπιφανείας, 'from a desire to turn what is really a physical assertion into an ethical exhortation' (A.H.); so Orlino, πρὸς ἱερογ. ἀποστολ. ἐπιφανείας. . . ἐπιδηλοῦσθε τὴν ἀρετὴν τοῦ λόγου. But it is difficult to conceive how St. Paul, who has from v. 38 been leading up to the thought of the resurrection, could at the critical moment throw his argument to the winds, and content himself with saying, 'according as we have been earthly in our thoughts, let us strive to be heavenly.'

It has been suggested that St. Paul adopted the designation of Christ as 'the last Adam' and 'the second Adam' from Rabbinic theology. But such a comparison between Adam and the Messiah was unknown to the earlier Jewish teachers. Passages adduced to support it belong to the Middle Ages, and are influenced by the Kabbala. See G. F. Moore, JBL xvi. (1897), 168-161; Dalman, The Words of Jesus, Eng. tr. 248 L, 321 f.

(d) Ph 2<sup>6</sup>. St. Paul speaks of 'Christ Jesus, who being [in His eternal and inherent nature, ἰσχυρισμὸς] in the form of God, deemed it not a thing to be envied at (ἐξουσίαν) to be on an equality with God.' There is here an implied contrast with Adam, who took fruit from the tree of knowledge of good and evil, which God said had made him 'as one of us' (Gn 2<sup>7</sup>).

2. In Mt 19<sup>4-6</sup> || Mk 10<sup>2-8</sup> reference is made by Jesus to the account of Adam and Eve in Gn 1<sup>27</sup> 'male and female created he them' (ἄρσεν καὶ θήλυ ἐποίησεν αὐτούς). Pharisees came and asked Him whether divorce was allowable ('for any cause,' Mt.). Our Lord's answer is intended to show that the provision made for divorce in the Mosaic law (Dt 24<sup>1</sup>) was only a concession to the hardness of men's hearts. The truer and deeper view of marriage which Christians should adopt must be based on a nobler morality,—on a morality which takes its stand on the primeval nature of man and woman as God made them. 'To suit (ἵνα) your hardness of heart he wrote for you this commandment. But from the beginning of the creation "he made them male and female."' And with this quotation is coupled one from Gn 2<sup>24</sup> (see also Eph 5<sup>3</sup>), 'For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother [and shall cleave to his wife (Mt.)], and they twain shall become one flesh. The same result is reached in Mt., but with a transposition of the two parts of the argument. See Wright's Synopsis, in loc. Thus Jesus bases the absolute indissolubility of the marriage tie on the union of man and woman from the first. In Mt 19<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>32</sup> this pronouncement is practically annulled by the admission of the words 'except for fornication' (μὴ ἐστὶ πορνεία, καὶ πορνείας λόγου πορνείας). See Wright, in loc., who contends that 'the Church (of Alexandria?) introduced these two clauses into the Gospel in accordance with the permission to legislate which our Lord gave to all Churches (Mt 18<sup>18</sup>).' See art. MARRIAGE.

3. In Jn 8<sup>44</sup> ἀπορροσθέντες may refer to the introduction of death into the world by the fall of Adam. But see art. ABEL.

4. The parallel drawn by St. Paul between Adam and Christ may have been the origin of the tradition that Adam was buried under Golgotha. Jer. (Com. in Mat. § iv. 27) rejects it, saying that it arose from the discovery of an ancient human skull at that spot. He also declines to see any reference to it in Eph 5<sup>14</sup>. But in Ep. 46 he says, 'The place where our Lord was crucified is called Calvary, because the skull of the primitive man was buried there. So it came to pass that the second Adam, that is the blood of Christ (a play on ἄδων and ἄδων), as it dropped from the Cross, washed away the sins of the buried protoplast,* the first Adam, and thus the words of the apostle were fulfilled.'—quoting Eph 6<sup>14</sup>. Epiphanius (contra Hæc. xvi. 6) goes farther, stating that Christ's blood dropped upon Adam's skull, and restored him to life. The tradition is mentioned also by Basil, Ambrose, and others.

ADULTERY (μοιχεία).—This word is used to denote the sexual intercourse of a married man or woman with any other than the person to whom he or she is bound by the marriage tie. It has sometimes been maintained that μοιχεία is confined in its use to the misdemeanours, in this respect, of the woman. That it has, however, a wider sense is evidenced by the reference which Jesus makes to the inward lust of any man after any woman (ὅτι τὸς ὁ θύεωσ γυναικὸς πρὸς τὸ ἐπιθυμῆσαι αὐτῆς ὄντι ἄνομος λόγος πορνείας, κ.τ.λ., Mt 5<sup>28</sup>). The word πορνεία also employed to describe this sin, though it has been contended that it refers solely to pre-nuptial immorality; and again we have a reference made by Jesus in His teaching to this sin, which disposes of that contention, and which establishes the fact that the married woman who commits herself in this way was said to be guilty of πορνεία (πορνείας λόγου πορνείας, Mt 5<sup>28</sup>, and ὁ μὴ ἐστὶ πορνεία, Mt 19<sup>9</sup>). In both passages just quoted Jesus makes the woman's guilt the ground of His teaching on divorce. With these examples we may compare the words of Am 7<sup>17</sup> (LXX) . . . ἡ γυνὴ σου ἐν τῇ πόλει πορνέουσα, κ.τ.λ., where the form of the expression incidentally but conclusively carries out our argument.

A very favourite figure of speech, by which the intimate relations of Jehovah and Israel were denoted by OT writers, was that of marriage (see, e.g., Is 54<sup>6</sup> 62<sup>5</sup>, Jer 3<sup>14</sup>, Hos 2<sup>7</sup>, 14<sup>20</sup>); and accordingly in the prophetic books the defection of the Jewish people from the altars of Jehovah, and their repeated reversions to the worship and practices of their heathen neighbours, were stigmatized as 'adultery' (*νὴ ἀφ' ἢ νὴ ἀφ' ἡμ, Jer 13<sup>27</sup>, Ezk 23<sup>2</sup>; cf. Is 57<sup>3</sup>, Jer 3<sup>21</sup>, Ezk 23<sup>27</sup>). This transference of an idea from the daily social life to the life spiritual finds its place in the teaching of Jesus, whose example in this respect is followed by writers of a subsequent period (cf. Ja 4<sup>4</sup>). The generation in which He lived was denounced by Him, for its continued rejection of His claims, as 'wicked and adulterous' (*γενεὰ πορνῆ καὶ μοιχαλίσ, Mt 12<sup>30</sup> 16<sup>5</sup>; cf. also Mk 8<sup>38</sup>). It is, of course, possible that Jesus by these words had in view the social evils of His day, as well as the general lack of spiritual religion. That nation and generation might be called adulterous literally; for what else, I beseech you, was their irreligious polygamy than continual adultery? And what else was their ordinary practice of divorcing their wives, no less irreligious, according to every man's foolish or naughty will?' (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. et Talmud. ad Mt 12<sup>30</sup>). It is not necessary, however, in the interpretation of His teaching in this and similar places to insist on such a view of His words. The entire body of the recorded teaching of Jesus betrays the most intimate acquaintance with the literature and ethical tendencies of the OT.

That exceedingly lax and immoral views of this sin were held generally by the generation in which Jesus lived, becomes evident not only from His casual references to the subject, but also from His positive teaching in answer to hostile questions addressed to Him about adultery and the kindred subject of divorce. We are also confronted with the same phenomenon in the writings, e.g., of Josephus (cf. Ant. iv. viii. 23; Vita, § 76), Sir 7<sup>25</sup> 25<sup>25</sup> 42<sup>2</sup>, and in the Talmud. The result of the teaching of Hillel was of the worst description, reducing as it did the crime of adultery to the level of an ordinary or minor fault. This Rabbi actually went the length, in his interpretation of the Deuteronomic law of divorce as stated in Dt 24<sup>1</sup>, of laying down the rule that a man might put away his wife 'if she cook her husband's food badly by salting or roasting it too much' (see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. et Talmud. ad Mt 5<sup>31</sup>), and R. Akiba, improving on this instruction, interpreted the words 'if she find no favour in his eyes' as giving permission to a man to divorce his wife 'if he sees a woman fairer than her.'

On the other hand, R. Shammai refused to take a view so loose and immoral, and in his exposition of the Deuteronomic permission confined the legality of divorce to cases of proved unchastity on the part of the wife. Other celebrated Rabbins took a similarly rigid view of this question, while all, of every school, were agreed that the crime of adultery demanded divorce as its punishment. The form of the question addressed to Jesus by the Pharisees (κατὰ πᾶσαν αἰτίαν) in Mt 19<sup>9</sup> shows the nature of the controversy between the rival Rabbinical schools, and also lets us see how far the pernicious teaching of the school of Hillel had permeated the social fabric. Men's ideas about this sin were also debased by the polygamous habits then prevalent. Of Herod the Great we read that he had ten wives; which, according to Josephus, was not only permissible, but had actually become a common occurrence amongst the Jews, 'it being of old permitted to the Jews to marry many wives' (BJ I. xxiv. 2). In another place the same historian remarks, in connexion with the story of the Herodian family, that 'it is the ancient practice among us to have many wives at the same time' (Ant. xvii. i. 2). There seems to have been no hard and fast rule limiting the number of wives permissible to each man, but their teachers advised them to restrict themselves to four or five (cf. Schürer, HJP i. i. 455, note 125).

From these observations we see what an important bearing the teaching of Jesus had on the current conceptions of sexual morality obtaining amongst His countrymen. It is quite in harmony with His method of instruction to reduce the overt commission of a sin to the element out of which it originates and takes its shape. 'A corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit' (Mt 7<sup>17</sup>, cf. Lk 6<sup>43</sup> and Lk 6<sup>43</sup>), and the heart corrupted by evil desire fructifies, just as surely, by an inexorable law of nature. There exists within the man whose inner life is thus tainted not merely latent or germinal sin, such as may or may not yet issue in deeds of wrong. The lustful eye gazing with sinful longing is the consummation,—the fruit of the corrupt tree,—and so far as the man's will is concerned, the sinful act is completed (Mt 5<sup>28</sup>). The note of sternness which characterizes this teaching is not altogether original, as will be seen if we refer to such commands as are found, e.g., in Ex 20<sup>17</sup>, Pr 6<sup>25</sup>, Sir 9<sup>9</sup> etc., and to such interpretative sayings in the Talmud as forbade the gazing upon 'a woman's heel' or even upon her 'little finger' (cf. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. et Talmud. ad Mt 5<sup>28</sup>). The ethical foundation, however, upon which Jesus based His doctrine strikes the reader as being the deepest and the firmest of any that had as yet been revealed on the subject; and this must have seemed to His hearers to be not the least remarkable of those luminous addresses by which He contradicted the laboriously minute guidance of their moral and religious guides. We are not concerned here to inquire whether Jesus put no difference between the guilt of the man who, though he has lustful desires, abstains from carrying them into practice, and that of the man who completes them by the sinful act. Common sense forbids us to suppose that Jesus put out of sight the social aspects of the question when He discussed it. What is of importance is to note the lofty tone assumed by Him when engaged in inculcating the absolute necessity of sexual purity. Nor is it possible to infer that Jesus confined His remarks to the case of those who were married. The general terms into which He casts His instruction (ὅτι ὁ βέλων) forbids us to assume that γυναῖκα and ἐμολύεσθαι are to be limited to the post-nuptial sin with a married woman. It gives a much more fitting as well as a truer meaning to Jesus' words if we think of Him as giving directions for the guidance of the entire social and ethical life to all members of society whether married or otherwise.

According to the laws of the ancients, those guilty of adultery were to be put to death, whether by burning (Gn 38<sup>24</sup>) or by stoning (Jn 8<sup>3</sup>, cf. Dt 22<sup>22</sup>, Lv 20<sup>10</sup>, Ek 18<sup>17</sup>). This punishment was not, however, universally prescribed; for where the woman was a slave, and consequently not the owner of her own person, the man was exonerated by presenting a guilt-offering (Lv 19<sup>20</sup>). It is doubtful, indeed, if ever capital punishment was insisted on. Lightfoot, for example, says: 'I do not remember that I have anywhere in the Jewish pandect read any example of a wife punished with death for adultery' (Hor. Heb. et Talmud. ad Mt 19<sup>9</sup>). This statement is borne out by such incidental references as we have in Mt 19<sup>9</sup>, where Joseph receives the praise of his contemporaries (θαυμάσιος ὤν) for his merciful intention; and if the story of Hosea's wife is to be taken literally, we have an OT example of mercy towards the guilty being recommended, and even of divorce not being suggested as a punishment. Jesus Himself also leaned to the side of mercy; and nowhere does the tenderness of His solicitude for the guilty sinner appear so deep as in the traditional, yet doubtless genuine, narrative incorporated in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 7<sup>53-54</sup>). For a discussion of the 'pericope adulteræ' see Blass, Ev. sec. Lucam, Pref. p. xvii, and his Philology of the Gospels, pp. 155-163.

A closer examination than we have as yet attempted in this place, of the words and teaching of Jesus Christ will reveal some startling results, and furnish obvious reasons to explain the difficulties which have been always felt on the relations of adultery, divorce, and remarriage, by Christian thinkers and legislators. A comparative examination of the passages in the Synoptic writers (Mt 5<sup>28</sup> 19<sup>9</sup>, Mk 10<sup>11</sup>, Lk 16<sup>18</sup>) discloses a peculiar addition to the words and teaching in the first of these places. According to Mt 5<sup>28</sup>, Jesus asserts that the wife who is wrongfully divorced is involved compulsorily in the guilt of her husband. He is not only an adulterer himself (Lk 16<sup>18</sup>), but 'he causes her to be an adulteress,' or rather 'he makes her to commit adultery' (ᾧ αὐτῆρ μοιχευθήσεται). The interpretation which would explain these words as if they meant that the divorced wife is placed in such a position that she probably will commit adultery by marrying another man, is manifestly unsatisfactory. The statement is unqualified even if we are absolutely convinced of the genuineness of the succeeding words, 'καὶ ὁ . . . μοιχεύει.' [They are omitted by D11, see WH, New Test. in Greek]. It is as if Jesus said: 'The wife who is divorced is, in virtue of her false position, an adulteress though she be innocent, and the man who marries her while she occupies that position becomes a willing partner in her guilt.' It is not too much to say that, in this place, we have a glimpse of the profound depth which Jesus was accustomed to sound in His ethical teaching. Marriage is a Divine institution, and has its roots in the eternal order of things (cf. Mt 19<sup>4-6</sup>). It results in a mystical union so close that the married pair are no longer two; they have become 'one flesh.' With this we may compare the teaching which St. Paul embodies in a few luminous words based on his Christological doctrine (Eph 5<sup>29-32</sup>, especially vv 29 and 32), and of which he says 'this mystery is great.'

We have thus a clue to the meaning of the difficult expression ποιεῖ ἀσθήν μοιχευθῆναι. Any mode of conduct or action which tends to mar or set at naught the mysterious relationship of marriage is of the essence of adultery. Perhaps we shall not be considered to be importing more meaning into words than they were originally intended to convey, if we press the Markan addition ἐπὶ ἀσθήν into our service here. Jesus, according to St. Mark, seems to teach His hearers that the husband in wrongfully divorcing his wife is guilty of the aggravated sin of dragging her into the slough where he is himself already wallowing. On him falls the woe pronounced in another connexion by Jesus (Mt 18<sup>7</sup>); for he compels his wife to occupy a position which is a living contradiction of the Divine law. A course of action tending to the dissolution of that which in the Divine intention is indissoluble, Jesus places in the category of adulterous acts. He mentions nothing as to His view of the case of the remarriage of a woman justifiably divorced, but the present writer here appears plainly to assert that the man who marries an innocent divorced woman is guilty of adultery.

In our critical examination of these passages we are confronted with a still greater and no less remarkable variety. St. Matthew differs from the other two Synoptists by giving a place in Jesus' teaching to an implied ground for legitimate divorce. He alone includes the exceptive clauses παρὰ τὸν λόγον σαρρῆας (52) and καὶ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ (19). It is this variety in the records of Jesus' words which has introduced so much difficulty, doctrinal and legislative, into the questions of divorce and the remarriage of divorced persons. We are not, of course, without that form of conjectural criticism which would delete these clauses as mere glosses or unsuitable interpolations (see Bacon, The Sermon on the Mount, ad loc.). In the absence, however, of external or textual evidence we are not entitled to invent textual emendations in the interests of a preconceived theory (cf. Wright, Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek, p. 881). It is but fair to add that the Codex Vaticanus (B) and some less important authorities manifest a strong desire to make Mt 19<sup>9</sup> conform literally to Mt 6<sup>2</sup>, and thereby create some uncertainty as to the textual purity of these passages. The evidential value, however, of these variations is too slight to be of any avail against the unanimity of all our other witnesses; they are transparent and later attempts at assimilation or harmony. The argumentum e silentio is in this case too strong to admit the validity of conjecture. A forcible statement of the other side of the case may be found in the art. 'Sermon on the Mount' (Votaw) in the Extra Vol. of Hastings' DB p. 27.

At all periods of the history of Christian teaching, differences of opinion have existed within the Church as to the practical application of Jesus' words concerning adultery, divorce, and remarriage. These differences have been stereotyped in the Eastern and Western branches of the Catholic Church. The former takes the more lenient view, and permits the remarriage of the innocent divorcé(e), while the latter has always maintained the more stringent and (shall we say?) the more strictly literal conclusion from Jesus' words, that inequality of treatment is not to be tolerated, interpreting the conclusion by refusing the right of remarriage to either during the life of the other.

On the other hand, the general consensus of theological opinion amongst English-speaking divines since the Reformation has leaned towards the view held by the Eastern Church, and the resolutions of the bishops in the Pan-Anglican Conference of 1888 on this subject were but the formal expressions of a traditional mode of interpretation. When we turn from the words of Jesus to see what were the ideas of those who taught in His name during the ages immediately subsequent, we have St. Paul's teaching on, and references to, the question of divorce. In one place he treats marriage as indissoluble, and he has no hesitation in saying that the woman who marries another man during the lifetime of her husband is guilty of adultery (Ro 7<sup>2-3</sup>). On the other hand, we must not forget that the Apostle in this place is dealing with the Jewish law and with Jews who did not admit the absolute indissolubility of the marriage tie. The fact that he has made no reference to this Jewish law of divorce forbids us drawing any certain conclusion as to the length St. Paul was willing to go in stating a universal principle which would guide the legislative activity of the Christian Church. In another place he speaks of separation as the possible outcome of an unhappy or unequal marriage, and gives permission, if not encouragement, to that contingent result (χωρίζεσθαι). In this he goes farther than Jesus, so far as we have His teaching recorded for us, went. According to Jesus, adultery is the only crime of sufficient enormity to warrant divorce; according to St. Paul, the law of marriage does not govern the deserted wife or husband (οὐ δεδουλευται ἡ ἀδελφεὴ ἢ ἡ ἀδελφὴ ἐν τοῖς τοῦτοῖς, 1 Co 7<sup>10</sup> [cf. Newman Smyth, Christian Ethics, p. 412 f. and note]).

The Shepherd of Hermas (Mand. iv. 1. 6) lays down the rule that adultery demands separation or divorce (ἀπολυθῆτω ἀσθήν), because by continuing to live with his wife after she has been convicted of guilt, the husband becomes 'an accomplice in her adultery.' On the other hand, he is equally insistent that the man thus wronged must not marry another, lest he cut his guilty partner off from the hope of repentance, and lest he involve himself likewise in the sin of adultery (ἐάν δὲ ἀπολύσῃ τὴν γυναῖκα ἑτέραν γάμῳ, καὶ αὐτὸς μοιχεύεται).

The universal conclusion is that this sin creates a breach of the marriage relation so grave and far-reaching that it makes divorce the only legitimate sequel—divorce a mensâ et thoro. The question, however, remains whether the Christian Church has the right to go farther and say that, as the result of an adulterous act, the aggrieved party has a just claim to divorce a vinculo; has a right, that is to say, to be placed in a position as if the marriage had never taken place. This will, no doubt, be answered differently by different minds, and the difficulty is not decreased by merely appealing to the authority of Jesus. Different answers are given to the more fundamental questions, Did Jesus intend to occupy the position of legislator when He spoke of adultery and divorce? or was He simply enunciating a general principle, leaving future generations to deal with social conditions as they arose? The present writer has no hesitation in saying that his own opinion leans strongly to the side of those who believe that Jesus affirmed solemnly the indissolubility of the marriage tie, and that He meant His followers to understand that the remarriage of either party during the life of the other constitutes adultery. At the same time he is not unaware of the fact that there is a strong body of sober modern thought which tends towards a relaxation of this view in favour of the innocent (see Gore, The Sermon on the Mount, p. 73).

If Jesus in Mt 5<sup>32</sup> is making a categorical statement of universal application, then the opinion, given by the present writer as his own, can scarcely be disputed; but if He is interpreted as dealing with the foundations rather than making structural alterations in the ethical beliefs of His countrymen, we must conclude that He leaves His followers to deal with the question as it arises. In the latter case it is, of course, competent for the Church in each age to treat the question de novo. The conditions of society alter, and what constitutes danger to the social welfare at one time, may have comparatively little peril for the people of another period. At the same time it must not be forgotten that the tendency of human legislation has been and is likely to be, for some time to come at least, towards the loosening of the marriage bond, and the minimizing of the seriousness of that guilt by which men uproot the foundations of their social and domestic life.

LITERATURE.—Newman Smyth's Christian Ethics contains a very fair and cautious discussion of this whole question, and along with that work it will be found useful to study the more abstract volume of Bampton Lectures on the same subject (1885) by T. B. Strong; cf. G. B. Stevens' The Theology of the N.T. Gore's The Sermon on the Mount may be read along with Bacon's volume of the same title, and Votaw's article 'Sermon on the Mount' in the Extra Volume of Hastings' D.E. The latter work (vols. I. and III.) are also to be found useful references under art. 'Orphans,' 'Marriage.' A very suggestive art., 'The Teaching of Christ about Divorce,' by the Rev. the Hon. E. Lytton, will be found in the Journal of Theol. Studies for July 1904. Cf. also H. M. Luckock's History of Marriage (1894), and G. D. Watkins' Ely Matrimony (1895).

ADVENT.—In its primary application the term is used to denote the first visible coming of Jesus into the world. His coming again at an after period is distinguished as the Second, or the Final, Coming (see COMING AGAIN and PAROUSIA).

The term is also employed to designate one of the ecclesiastical seasons,—that immediately preceding the Festival of the Nativity,—during which, in certain sections of the Church, the thoughts of believers are turned to the first appearance of their Lord in the flesh. This season includes four Sundays, commencing on the one nearest St. Andrew's Day (Nov. 30) and lasting till Christmas Eve. With Advent the appointed order of Church services is renewed, and the ecclesiastical year begins.

Dealing here specially with the primary historical application, the first coming of Jesus possesses a unique significance as marking the entrance into the world of a moral force altogether unparalleled, a momentous turning-point in the religious progress of mankind. As the Son of God (Mt 10<sup>2</sup>, Jn 3<sup>16-17</sup>), revealing and representing God in His own person (Jn 5<sup>30</sup> 14<sup>9, 10</sup>), whose mission it was to redeem men from sin (Mt 18<sup>1</sup>, Lk 4<sup>2</sup> 17<sup>21</sup>), Jesus was to prove Himself in the truest sense the Messiah whom the Jewish people had long been expecting,—'a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord' (Lk 24<sup>1</sup>).

1. The foreshadowing Promise.—The expectation entertained by the Jews had its roots in a promise enshrined in their earliest literature and dating from the dawn of history, that a signal deliverance from sin should be brought to the human race,—the promise contained in the sentence pronounced on the tempter, that the seed of the woman should bruise his head (Gn 3<sup>15</sup>). This brighter outlook for fallen humanity was confirmed by the assurance given to Abraham that in the line of his descendants the original promise was destined to be fulfilled (Gn 12<sup>7-9</sup>),—an assurance which was further strengthened when, under Moses, Israel was formed into a nation and entered at Sinai into covenant with Jehovah as His chosen people (Ex 20-24). It was not, however, till David's prosperous reign, with its recognition of ruling power held in the name of Jehovah, had passed, and when the idea of the theocratic kingship had been deeply implanted in the national consciousness, that the conception of the blessing to be looked for took definite shape. Then, as successive rulers failed and the nation's fortunes became embarrassed, the splendours of David's time, glorified by the halo which memory and distance cast around them, were projected into the future, forming a picture full of allurements and charm. It fired the imagination of the prophets amid the troubles of the later monarchy.

The promise, as thus transformed, was that of a king, or line of kings, sprung from David's house, who, endowed with transcendent gifts, and acting by special authority as the Anointed of the Lord should reign in righteousness, introduce an era of Divine salvation for Israel, and draw all other nations round them in loyalty to Jehovah's law (Is 2<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>10-27</sup>, Mic 4<sup>1-9</sup>). This was the blossoming out of the Messianic idea.

During the period of the Exile, with the fall of the monarchy and the collapse of the expectations based upon it, the figure of the victorious and righteous king was thrown into the background; yet the prospect of a future glorious manifestation of Divine mercy, rescuing the people from their iniquities and miseries, kept its hold on susceptible minds (Is 55<sup>2</sup> 60<sup>1-6</sup>). It was in this period that the distinctively spiritual character of the coming deliverance emerged into prominence. As delineated in Ezekiel and the Second Isaiah, it was to consist in an inward regeneration, wrought by penitence and the impartation of a new spirit and a new heart (Is 65<sup>1-7</sup>, Ezk 11<sup>19</sup> 36<sup>26-29</sup>). In those prophecies of the Exile, Jehovah Himself is set forth as the true and ever-living King of Israel; and collective Israel, the nation regarded poetically as an individual, is conceived as the Anointed Servant of Jehovah, who, amid manifold afflictions, is to bear witness for Jehovah, and be the medium of accomplishing His saving purpose for mankind. On the return from the Exile the hope of salvation through a Davidic kingship revived, as is evident from the prophetic utterances of Haggai (2<sup>22-23</sup>) and Zechariah (3<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>12</sup>); but in Malachi's day it had again disappeared.

With the Maccabean struggle against Antiochus Epiphanes (B.C. 167-135) the Messianic idea entered on a fresh course of development. In the Book of Daniel, which dates presumably from that time, we find supernatural elements more freely introduced. The writer in vision beholds an ancient of days, seated on his throne to judge the great world-kingsdoms and their rulers. Before him appears, coming with the clouds of heaven, 'one like unto a son of man,' and to him is given everlasting dominion and a kingdom which shall not be destroyed (7<sup>13-14</sup>). This dominion is passed over to 'the saints of the Most High,' to be theirs for ever and ever (7<sup>18, 27</sup>). There is thus a picture of the Messianic future in which the triumph and rule of the godly over the nations are the distinguishing features.

We look in vain in the books of the Apocrypha for any expansion of these ideas. Their allusions to the Messianic hope are somewhat meagre, and do not expressly refer to the appearance of a personal Messiah. It is in the Apocalyptic literature, which sprang up in imitation of the Book of Daniel, that we find the conceptions which gave peculiar shape and colour to the Messianic expectations entertained in later times. We see there, amid the stress of national misfortunes, the predictions of the prophets interpreted and expanded in such a way as to furnish elaborately drawn out schemes of future glory. The coming of the God-sent king is depicted (2<sup>2</sup>, 3<sup>1</sup>, 4<sup>1</sup>, 5<sup>1</sup>, 6<sup>1</sup>, 7<sup>1</sup>), the supernatural Son of Man, who was hidden with God before the world was created, and who, clothed with Divine attributes, will suddenly appear along with the Head of Days to execute judgment on men and angels (Similitudes of Enoch 48: 3-5, 48: 3). The dispersed of Israel will be restored, and the Gentiles drawn into submission (Enoch 90<sup>3</sup>); sin and wrong will be banished (8<sup>1</sup>, 9<sup>1</sup>); the faithful dead will be raised to life again, and the righteous will dwell in everlasting joy (Enoch 51: 20<sup>2</sup>). In the Psalter of Solomon, written under the pressure of the Roman domination (B.C. 70-40), the idea of a king of the Davidic line is once more revived. The Messiah is regarded as 'the Son of David,' 'the Anointed of the Lord,' free from sin and endowed with miraculous powers, who will conquer, not by force of arms, but will smite the earth by the rod of His mouth (YPM), and bring to an end all unrighteousness (17<sup>9</sup>).

In those Apocalyptic writings peculiar prominence is given to the spiritual content of the Messianic hope. Notwithstanding the supernatural elements they so largely introduce, they throw into strong relief the higher religious conceptions which the best of the prophets had insisted on as essentially bound up with the great period of blessing expected; while the scope of the ancient promise is widened out beyond national and temporal limitations to embrace the world and the life to come.

Meanwhile the scribes were at work, hardening the Messianic idea into scholastic form, and reducing the poetic language and bold imagery of the prophets to dogmatic statements and literal details, with the result, on the whole, of a restoration of the theoretic idea that God was to vindicate His authority as the true Sovereign of the nation, and to send His vicegerent in the line of David to establish His law and introduce the rule of righteousness under His anointed King.

Such was the form which the long-cherished hope had assumed when Jesus appeared. It was largely mixed up with expectations of political deliverance, yet the thoughts of many earnest spirits were centred mainly on the prospect of a spiritual emancipation for Israel. He came to meet the great hope by fulfilling in their ideal and spiritual significance the prophecies that had kindled and kept it alive. Leaving aside the merely earthly, time-coloured features that bulked so largely in the popular imagination, He entered the world to offer Himself as the true representative of God, in and through whom all that was eternal and most precious in the Messianic idea was destined to be realized. See art. MESSIAH.

2. The state of Religion at the date of Christ's Advent.—In many respects the way had been prepared for the appearance of Jesus and the spread of His influence as Messiah and Saviour. There were national, political, social, and other conditions existing in the world at the time, which rendered His coming and work singularly opportune (see FULNESS OF TIME); but here we are specially concerned with the prevailing aspects of religious life in the immediate scene in which He appeared. Undoubtedly, among the Jewish people at that period religion was a dominating interest, and was based on principles far higher than any that obtained in other nations. Yet its quality was vitiated by certain serious defects. There was—

(1) Its partisanship. Scribes and Pharisees on the one hand, and Sadducees on the other, stood in mutual antagonism, striving for ascendancy as leaders of national religious feeling,—the scribes and Pharisees combining to enforce the mass of stringent precepts which the former had elaborated to supplement the original written word; the Sadducees entirely rejecting those precepts, and contending that the Law as written was sufficient, and that the observance of the temple ordinances, its worship and sacrifices, was the central element in religion. The controversies that arose over those points of difference, and over the doctrine of the resurrection, created a fierce party spirit, bitter and bigoted on the one side, haughty and contemptuous on the other, while the smaller sect of the Essenes, with their extremist views and rigid austerity, maintained an inflexible protest against both these classes of religionists.

(2) Then there was its legalism. By their insistence on conformity to the regulations they had added to the Law as a condition of Divine favour, the scribes and Pharisees, who were the most numerous and aggressive party, converted religion itself into a matter of slavish obedience, in which the instigating motives were the hope of reward and the fear of punishment. The calculating temper thus engendered rendered the religious life a task-work of anxious scrupulosity and constraint, wanting in spontaneous action from the higher impulses of the soul; while in the case of those less sincere it introduced an element of prudential self-regard concerned only with the prospect of future benefit and safety.

(3) Closely allied to this was the externalization of piety. The Rabbinical regulations were held to be so binding, and their multiplicity was so great, that the effort to observe them inevitably involved a machine-like routine and formality. The Jew in his fulfilment of the Law found himself at every turn brought under the pressure of hard and fast exacting rules,—in his food, his clothes, his daily occupations, his devotions, and the smallest acts of his life. The endeavour to yield obedience under such circumstances necessarily led to a laborious outward punctiliousness; a tendency to ostentation and spiritual pride was fostered; and many were ensnared into hypocrisy by finding they could obtain a reputation for exceptional piety by an obtrusive parade of their ceremonial performances. The most precise minuteness was observed in trifles, the tithing of mint and cummin, but in matters of greater import the principles of morality were surrendered.

These are the darker shades of the picture. Nevertheless, it is clear that a very considerable measure of religious earnestness was preserved in the nation. It was fed by the ancient Scriptures, which were regularly read in the synagogues and committed to memory in the synagogue schools. Thus in the body of the people there was kept alive a sense of the holy character and mighty doings of Jehovah; and although, owing to the decayed influence of the priesthood, the Temple itself was not a centre of spiritual life, yet the hallowed memories it recalled in the breasts of the multitudes assembled at the religious festivals were calculated to inspire the higher emotions. At all events, there is evidence enough to show that many hearts throughout the nation were imbued with a deep-seated reverence for God and a true spiritual longing for the hope of Israel. The soul of religion might be sadly crushed by legality and formalism, but it was not utterly dead. Devout men and women in varied ranks of society were holding a pure faith and leading lives of simple sincerity, vaguely dissatisfied with the bondage of legal observances and Rabbinical rules, and yearning to rise into a more spiritual atmosphere, a closer communion with the Divine mind and will. Of these Zacharias and Elisabeth (Lk 1<sup>6-8</sup>), Anna (2<sup>24-27</sup>), and the aged Simeon (2<sup>22</sup>) may be taken as examples; while the numbers who responded to the living preaching of John the Baptist and became his followers are an index of the extent to which genuine piety survived in the land. It was amongst such that the spiritual preparation was found for the recognition and welcome of the promised Saviour when He appeared. The coming of Jesus brought the birth of a new spirit in religion, a spirit of fresh vitality and power; and the life of absolute devotion to righteousness which He began to live, and which He was ultimately to close in a death of sacrificing love, infused into religion an inspiring energy destined on a scale of vast magnitude to regenerate and redeem.

3. The national unrest of the period.—The Jewish people, fretting under political depression, had flung themselves with impassioned eagerness on the hope that the long-desired Messiah and His kingdom must be drawing nigh. It was even thought by many that He was hidden somewhere in obscurity, only waiting for a more penitent disposition in the national mind; and so inflamed was the common imagination with these ideas, that popular excitement was easily aroused, and any bold spirit, rising in revolt against the existing state of things, could find a group of followers ready to believe in him as the one who should deliver Israel. In the broader world outside, too, the expectation of a powerful king, issuing from Judaea, who was to conquer the world, appears to have been widely spread; and the references to this given by Tacitus (Hist. v. 13) and by Suetonius (Vesp. 4) may be taken at least as an echo of views disseminated throughout the Roman Empire by the Jews of the Dispersion. When Jesus was born into the world, however, an event had transpired vastly grander than Jewish expectation at the time conceived. The day at last had dawned to which the original promise to fallen humanity pointed forward, and for which the best minds of the nation had for ages yearned; the divinely-pledged Deliverer from sin and its curse had arrived, to set up the kingdom of righteousness, love, and peace.

ADVERSARY.—In the Gospels the word 'adversary' stands twice (Lk 13<sup>v</sup> 21<sup>is</sup>) for ἀντιπάλωτος, and thrice (Mt 5<sup>ss</sup>, Lk 12<sup>ss</sup> 18<sup>ss</sup>) for ἀντίδικος. The first two passages require no comment, as they describe the opponents of the gospel in the simplest terms, as adversaries. Thus we read that when Jesus triumphantly vindicated His actions, His adversaries were ashamed and could not answer Him. Similarly Jesus assured His disciples that none of their adversaries in the approaching time of persecution should be able to gainsay or resist the words of wisdom which the Holy Spirit would put into their mouths.

In Mt 5<sup>ss</sup> (|| Lk 12<sup>ss</sup>), and again in the parable of the Unjust Judge (Lk 18<sup>ss</sup>), the question suggests itself, 'Who is the adversary referred to?' The passage from the Sermon on the Mount occurs as one of a series of maxims of Christian prudence, and the key to its interpretation is suggested by that which immediately precedes it (Mt 5<sup>ss</sup>), where Christ says that reconciliation with an offended brother must go before the offering of a gift at God's altar.

Alienation from the brother offended must operate as a hindrance to true worship. Therefore he who would be accepted of God must do justly by his brother and have all cause of difference with him removed, for if he regards iniquity in his heart, has upon his conscience the guilt of wrongdoing or ill-will, or a grudge, the Lord will not hear him (Ps 66<sup>ss</sup>). Thus a certain order must be observed in connexion with this matter of worship. Still more, Jesus appears to suggest, does this principle of order hold in respect of the controversy between God and sinners. Reconciliation with God must be for every man the first business to be attended to. That antagonism must be removed, and he must satisfy the claim which the law of God has against him in the first place, else if he fails to avail himself of the present opportunity of ending the controversy, the law must take its course. The adversary referred to is thus the broken law, or God Himself as the Author of the law, whom the unreconciled sinner treats as an adversary (cf. Lk 14<sup>ss</sup>).

In the parable of the Unjust Judge the widow's petition against her opponent at law, and her importunity in pressing it upon the attention of the judge, are used to illustrate the prayers of God's elect. The reference seems to be to the opposition which, in her efforts to promote the cause and kingdom of God, the Church is obliged to encounter, some adverse influence to which she has long been exposed, and against which she fears she is left to struggle alone. Here there is no special reason for identifying this adversary with Satan (cf. Alford, in loc.; Trench, Parables, 488, etc.) or with the Jewish persecutors of the Early Church (Weizsäcker, who regards the passage as a late addition; cf. Weiss in Meyer's Commentary, in loc.). We must not forget that the word occurs in a parable which was spoken with a special didactic purpose, that being, as St. Luke is careful to explain, the encouragement not of the Church only, but especially of individual believers, to persevere in their efforts by faith and prayer to withstand the power of evil in the world, in whatever form it may assail them or thwart their endeavours. Christ's object was to assure them that their importunity must prevail with God, who shall soon respond to their prayers and grant them the victory over all that would frustrate their efforts for the advancement of His cause. ADVOCATE (παράκλητος).—A term applied to Christ in 1 Jn 2<sup>v</sup> (AV and RV; RVM 'Or Comforter or Helper, Gr. Paraclete'), and to the Holy Spirit in RVm of 1 Jn 14<sup>ss</sup> 15<sup>ss</sup> 16<sup>ss</sup>, where both AV and RV have 'Comforter' in the text. For an examination of the Greek word and its cognates, see art. 'Paraclete' in Hastings' DB iii. 665-668. The verb παράκαλέω occurs in the papyri in the contrasted senses of 'encourage' (Oxyr. Pap. 665. 42) and of 'entreat' (ib. 744. 6); but the passive verbal form has not been found. The term in its Latinized form came originally from the Itala or one of the Old Latin versions through the Vulgate. And Wyclif introduced it into the English versions, translating 1 Jn 2<sup>v</sup> 'we han avoket' in 1382; so Purvey 'an aduocat' in 1388.

Etymologically the word means 'called to one's side,' especially for the purposes of help, and, in its technical usage, for advice in the case of judicial procedure, with the further suggestion of endeavouring to enlist the sympathy of the judge in favour of the accused. In 1 Jn 2<sup>v</sup> the last is generally taken to be the only sense; and the meaning evidently is that, if any believer sin, Jesus Christ in person intercedes in his behalf with the Father, and, representing the believer, carries on his cause in the courts of heaven. Similarly, according to the passage in the Fourth Gospel, the Holy Spirit may be regarded as God's Advocate both with and in man, promoting the Divine interests in the human sphere, from repentance (1 Jn 16<sup>v-11</sup>, cf. Job 33<sup>ss-36</sup>) to perfecting. But here the technical legal sense of the word disappears, and the Spirit becomes, according to another marginal rendering, the God-sent 'Helper' of a man who is struggling against everything within or around him that makes godly living difficult. Whilst, therefore, the provisions of grace include the twofold advocacy,—Christ as the Advocate of a believer with God, and the Spirit as the Advocate of God with man, whether believing or unregenerate,—the two functions differ both in range and in relation; and the term 'Advocate' is too specialized to characterize or to cover the operations attributed to the Spirit. The Spirit, as an Advocate sent from God, entreats and helps a man (see art. COMFORTER), but does not represent him before God as Judge or as Father, and does not appeal to anything in man of final and supreme authority. R. W. MOSS.

ÆNON (Αἰνών, probably from Aramaic ܐܝܢܘܢ 'springs').—Mentioned only in Jn 3<sup>23</sup>. And John also was baptizing in Ænon near to Salim, because there were many waters there' (RVm). The place cannot be identified with certainty. Four sites have been proposed, two in Samaria and two in Judæa.

1. Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. 229. 91, 99. 25) place Ænon in the Jordan Valley, 8 miles south of Scythopolis (Beisân), 'juxta Salem et Jordanem.' About 7 miles south of Beisân and 2 miles west of the Jordan there are seven springs, all lying within a radius of a quarter of a mile, and numerous rivulets. Three-quarters of a mile to the north of these springs van de Velde found a tomb bearing the name of Sheikh Salim. But the fact that a modern sheikh bore the name Salim is far from satisfactory proof that the Salim of our narrative was at this place. If we are to find Salim in Samaria at all, does not the mention of it as a well-known place suggest the well-known Salim 4 miles east of Shechem? And would it not be gratuitous for the Evangelist to say of a place so near the Jordan that there was much water there? But, in spite of these objections, Sanday (Sacred Sites of the Gospels, p. 36) and others still think this site has the best claim.

2. Tristram (Bible Places, p. 234) and Conder (Tent Work in Palestine, I. pp. 91-93) place Ænon at 'Ainun on a hill near the head of the great Fârâh valley, the open highway from the Damieh ford of the Jordan to Shechem. Four miles south-west of the village of 'Ainun, in the Wady Fârâh, is a succession of springs, yielding a copious perennial stream, with flat meadows on either side, where great crowds might gather. Three miles south of the valley (7 miles from 'Ainun) stands Salim. Conder says: 'The site of Wady Fârâh is the only one where all the requisites are met—the two names, the fine water supply, the proximity of the desert, and the open character of the ground.' The situation is a central one also, accessible by roads from all quarters, and it agrees well with the new identification of Bethabara. But (a) 'Ainun is not 'near to Salim,' the two places being 7 miles apart, and separated by the great Wady Fârâh. (b) There is not a drop of water at 'Ainun (Robinson, Bib. Res. iii. 305). (c) It is not likely that John the Baptist was labouring among the Samaritans, with whom the Jews had no dealings (cf. Mt 23 10<sup>2</sup>). (d) It appears that both Jesus and John were baptizing in Judæa (Jn 3<sup>23</sup>), and their proximity gave occasion to the remarks referred to in Jn 3<sup>22</sup>, and that Jesus left Judæa for Galilee with the intention of getting out of the neighbourhood of John and removing the appearance of rivalry (Jn 4<sup>1</sup>). But if Ænon was in Samaria, Jesus was nearer John than before.

3. Ewald and Hengstenberg prefer Shilhim (LXX Σαλειμ) in the extreme south of Judæa, mentioned (Jos 15<sup>22</sup>) in connexion with Ain. Godet says the reason given for John's baptizing in Ænon would have greater force as applied to a generally waterless region like the southern extremity of Judah than if the reference were to a well-watered district like Samaria. But elsewhere (Jos 18<sup>25</sup>, 1 Ch 4<sup>29</sup>, Neh 11<sup>29</sup>) Ain is connected with Rimmon and not with Shilhim.

4. More probable as a Judæan site for Ænon is Wady Fârâh, a secluded valley with copious springs about 6 miles north-east of Jerusalem (quite different, of course, from the great Wady Fârâh of Samaria). This is the view adopted by Professor Konrad Furrer in his article on the geographical allusions in the Gospel of St. John in the ZNTW, 1902, Heft 4, p. 255. The suggestion is not new. It was put forward nearly fifty years ago by Barclay (City of the Great King, pp. 558-570), but has never received the attention it deserves. Barclay says that 'of all the fountains in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, the most copious and interesting by far are those that burst forth within a short distance of each other in Wady Fârâh.' He quotes the following description from The History of the Jerusalem Mission:

'From the brow at Wady Fârâh we descended with some difficulty into that "Valley of Delight,"—for such is the literal signification of its name,—and truly I have seen nothing so delightful in the way of natural scenery, nor inviting in point of resources, etc., in all Palestine. Ascending its bold stream from this point, we passed some half-dozen expansions of the stream, constituting the most beautiful natural catartemas I have ever seen; the water, rivaling the atmosphere itself in transparency, of depth varying from a few inches to a fathom or more, shaded on one or both sides by umbrageous fig-trees, and sometimes contained in naturally-excavated basins of red mottled marble—an occasional variegation of the common limestone of the country. These pools are supplied by some half-dozen springs of the purest and coldest water, bursting from rocky crevices at various intervals. Verily, thought I, we have stumbled upon Ænon! . . . Portions of aqueducts, both of pottery and stone, and in a tolerable state of preservation, too, in many places, are still found remaining on each side of the valley, indicating the extent to which the valley was at one time irrigated; and richer land I have never seen than is much of this charming valley. . . . Several herds of cattle were voraciously feeding on the delicate herbage near the stream; and thousands of sheep and goats were seen approaching the stream, or "resting at noonday" in the shadow of the great rock composing the overhanging cliff here and there. . . . Rank grasses, luxuriant reeds, tall woods, and shrubby and trees of various kinds, entirely conceal the stream from view in many places. . . . Higher up, the valley becomes very narrow, and the rocky precipitous tower to a sublime height.

The name Ænon does not seem to have survived in connexion with these springs, but within 2 miles of them there is another valley called by the Arabs Wady Saleim. It is at least possible that this name was once borne by one of the towns whose ruins still crown the neighbouring heights. A town thus placed would have been a conspicuous object from many parts of Judæa, and would have been naturally referred to by the Evangelist when describing the location of Ænon.

LITERATURE.—In addition to writers cited above, see art. 'Ænon' in Smith's DB<sup>2</sup>, and 'Salim' in Encyc. Biblica. W. W. MOORE.

AFFLICTION.—In AV of the Gospels 'affliction' occurs only twice (Mk 4<sup>17</sup> 13<sup>19</sup>), corresponding both times to θλίψις in the original. RV gives 'tribulation'—its invariable rendering of θλίψις except in Jn 16<sup>21</sup>, where, like AV, it has 'anguish.' In Mt 24<sup>9</sup> AV translates εἰς θλίψιν 'to be afflicted' (RV 'unto tribulation'). In all remaining cases it renders θλίψις by 'tribulation' (Mt 13<sup>21</sup> 24<sup>9-29</sup>, Mk 13<sup>19</sup>, Jn 16<sup>21</sup>). The Greek θλίψις (WH θλίψις) signifies literally 'pressing together,' 'pressure' (cf. ὀδὸν στενωπῆν in Mt 7<sup>14</sup> of the 'straitened way'; ἵνα μὴ θλιβῶσιν αὐτοὺς, 'lest they should throng him,' in Mk 3<sup>9</sup>). In classical Greek it is found infrequently, and with its literal meaning only. In Biblical Greek, where the metaphorical significance prevails, it is of much commoner occurrence, always possessing a passive sense, and usually suggesting 'sufferings inflicted from without' (Lightfoot).

In the sayings of Christ the word bears three references. It denotes the persecution to which His followers will be subjected, and by which their loyalty will be tested (Mk 4<sup>17</sup>=Mt 13<sup>21</sup>, Mt 24<sup>9</sup>, Jn 16<sup>21</sup>). It describes the privations and sufferings (not, as above, necessarily induced by His service) attendant upon a great national or universal crisis (Mk 13<sup>21-22</sup>=Mt 24<sup>21-22</sup>). And, finally, it is employed in one of His illustrations to indicate a woman's pangs in childbirth (Jn 16<sup>21</sup>, AV and RV 'anguish'). See, further, artt. PERSECUTION, SUFFERING, TRIBULATION. H. BISSEKER.

AGE.—The word 'age' is a vague term, as may be seen by its doing duty as a possible translation for αἰών (Lat. aeuum, an unmeasured period of existence), for γενεά (Lat. generatio), and even for the more precise and exact terms χρόνος (Lat. tempus), and καιρός (Lat. ocasio). Its strictest Greek equivalent, however, is ηλικία (Lat. aetas). An examination into the significance of the term shows a remarkable parallel between its employment in classical literature and in the Greek of the New Testament. Ηλικία marks a normal development of life; such development may be registered in the individual by years, or by physique. In classical Greek, the former is the usual reference of the term, and hence the most ordinary meaning of the word is, like the poetical ἄβη, the flower or prime of life. The significance, however, of ηλικία as stature or height, that feature of physical development which mostly attracts the eye, is quite classical; and this sense occurs in Herodotus (iii. 16), Plato, and Demosthenes. Turning to the New Testament, we find the same oscillation of meaning in ηλικία. In the Fourth Gospel the parents of the blind man for fear of excommunication evade the question of the Jews, and shift the responsibility of answering upon their son: 'Therefore said his parents, He is of age, † ask him.' In the Sermon on the Mount 'age' † appears to be the true rendering of ηλικία. A cubit would be a prodigious addition to a man's height, while a span was already a proverbial expression to signify the brevity of life. 'Stature' is, of course, the only possible rendering in the interesting note about Zaccheus; † and this is the only place in the Gospel where, as will be seen, ηλικία bears this meaning with an absolute certainty.

The idea of periodicity, which is largely foreign to the meaning of ηλικία in classical Greek, appears only once, and that doubtfully, in the New Testament. † The different 'ages of man' † and so of our Lord, † are indicated by the classical formula of time, 'years' being in the genitive case. Hence the word yields no suggestion as to those characteristic periods, or epochs in the earthly life of our Lord—the infancy, childhood, manhood of Christ. Nor would the word deserve a place in this Dictionary were it not for two passages in which it occurs or is referred to when its interest is a real one, as is evident by the attention paid to them by all commentators on St. Luke's Gospel. † Both passages appear as a postscript to the narrative of the Holy Child with the doctors in the temple. It is an incident in the regular equable development of His life upon earth. This development is shown in two aspects. The Evangelist declares that Jesus increased (or advanced) in wisdom and stature, and in favour (or grace) with God and man. St. Luke's phraseology was no doubt influenced by his recollection of a similar encomium passed upon the youthful Samuel, † and already he had found it not unsuitable to be quoted in reference to the Baptist. †

The key to the meaning of ηλικία in Lk 2<sup>52</sup> may

Mt 26<sup>39</sup>. 'O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass away from me: nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt.'

Mk 14<sup>36</sup>. 'Abba, Father, all things are possible unto thee; remove this cup from me: howbeit not what I will, but what thou wilt.'

Lk 22<sup>42</sup>. 'Father, if thou be willing, remove this cup from me: nevertheless, not my will, but thine, be done.'

be discovered by a comparison of these four passages—

Lk 1<sup>80</sup> τὸ δὲ παιδίον ἤξανε καὶ ἐκραταίωτο πνεύματι (said of the Baptist).

Lk 2<sup>40</sup> τὸ δὲ παιδίον ἤξανε καὶ ἐκραταίωτο πνεύματι σοφίᾳ, καὶ χάριτι θεοῦ ἦν ἐν αὐτῷ (said of Christ).

Lk 2<sup>52</sup> καὶ ἡλικίᾳ προέκοιτε ἐν τῇ σοφίᾳ καὶ ἡλικίᾳ καὶ χάριτι παρὰ θεῷ καὶ ἀνθρώποις (said of Christ).

A careful comparison of these passages appears determinative of the sense of ηλικία in the last as 'stature,' not 'age.' What was noticeable in a measure in Samuel and in the Baptist, was supremely characteristic of the Holy Child, namely, an equal development both on the physical and spiritual side. Translate it as RVm, and it is little more than a truism. 'Stature' is not only not superfluous, but an interesting and unexpected contribution to that group of references which lay stress on our Lord's humanity. It helps to explain His 'favour with men' with which it stands in parallel. It suggests that our Lord's personality, even His appearance, may have had a fascination about it. Even more, it may make the student of Messianic prophecy cautious in attaching a too physical meaning to the description of the countenance of Jehovah's Servant (Is 52<sup>4</sup> 53<sup>2</sup>). B. WHITEFOORD.

AGONY.—This word is used in Lk 22<sup>44</sup> to describe the sorrow, suffering, and struggle of Jesus in Gethsemane. The Greek word ἀγωνία (agōnia) is derived from ἀγών (agōn), meaning: (1) an assembly of the people (cf. ἐγρός); (2) a place of assembly, especially the place in which the Greeks assembled to celebrate solemn games; (3) a contest of athletes, runners or charioteers. Ἀγών is used in a figurative sense in He 12<sup>1</sup> 'let us run with patience the race that is set before us.' The word has the general sense of struggle in 1 Th 2<sup>2</sup> 'in much conflict'; Ph 1<sup>9</sup> 'having the same conflict'; 1 Ti 6<sup>2</sup> 'the good fight of faith'; 2 Ti 4<sup>7</sup> 'I have fought the good fight.' It means solicitude or anxiety in Col 2<sup>1</sup> 'how greatly I strive for you' (literally, 'how great an agōn I have for you').

The state of Jesus in Gethsemane is described in the following phrases: Mt 26<sup>7</sup> 'he began to be sorrowful and sore troubled'; Mk 14<sup>33</sup> 'he began to be greatly amazed and sore troubled'; Lk 22<sup>44</sup> 'And being in an agony he prayed more earnestly: and his sweat became as it were great drops of blood falling down upon the ground.'* Jesus confesses His own feelings in the words, 'My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death' (Mt 26<sup>38</sup>, Mk 14<sup>34</sup>). That He regarded the experience as a temptation is suggested by His warning words to His disciples: 'Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak' (Mt 26<sup>41</sup>, Mk 14<sup>38</sup>, cf. Lk 22<sup>46</sup>). That He was conscious of human weakness, and desired Divine strength for the struggle, is evident from the prayers, in reporting the words of which the Evangelists do not verbally agree, as the following comparison shows:—

St. Mark and St. Luke give the words of one prayer only, although the former evidently intends to report three distinct acts of prayer (vv. 38, 39, 41).
* On the genuineness of this passage see the 'Notes on Select Readings' in Westcott and Hort's NT in Greek.

and the latter apparently only two (vv. 41, 44). But St. Matthew gives the words of the second prayer, which he reports as repeated the third time (vv. 42-44): 'O my Father, if this cannot pass away, except I drink it, thy will be done.' It is not at all improbable that there was such progress in Jesus' thoughts. At first He prayed for the entire removal of the cup, if possible (Mt.), because possible to God (Mk.), if God were willing (Lk.); and then, having been taught that it could not be taken away, He prayed for strength to take the cup. It is not necessary for us to decide which of the reports is most nearly verbally correct, as the substance of the first prayer is the same in all reports. Although St. John gives no report of the scene in Gethsemane, yet in his account of the interview of Jesus with the Greeks there is introduced what seems to be a faint reminiscence: 'Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour; but for this cause came I unto this hour. Father, glorify thy name' (Jn 12<sup>27, 28</sup>). It is substantially the same request, expressed in the characteristically Johannean language. But even if this conjecture be unwarranted, and this be an utterance on the occasion to which the Fourth Evangelist assigns it, the words serve to illustrate Jesus' struggle in view of His death. Much more confident can we be that Gethsemane is referred to in He 5<sup>7, 8</sup>: 'Who in the days of his flesh, having offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death, and having been heard for his godly fear; though he was a Son, yet learned obedience by the things which he suffered.' Having passed in review the material which is offered us in dealing with the question of the nature of the agony in Gethsemane, we may now concentrate our attention upon it, excluding all reference to other matters which are dealt with in their own place. Many answers have been given to the question, 'What was the cup which Jesus desired to be taken away?'

(1) The most obvious, but not on that account the most intelligent and reverent, answer is that in Gethsemane Jesus was overcome by the fear of death, from which He longed to escape. But this is to place Christ on a lower plane of manhood than many men, even among the lowest races. If the love of Christ has constrained many martyrs for His name to face rack and block, water and flame, and many other painful modes of death without shrinking, and even with the song of praise upon the lips, is it at all likely that He Himself shrank back?

(2) A more ingenious view, which has an apparent verbal justification in Mt 26<sup>28</sup>, Mk 14<sup>34</sup> ('even unto death'), and He 5<sup>7</sup> ('to save him from death'), is that Jesus felt Himself dying, and that He feared He would die before He could offer the great sacrifice for the sin of the world. But to this suggestion there are three objections. Firstly, there is no evidence of such physical exhaustion on the part of Jesus as would justify such a fear; although the stress of His work and suffering had undoubtedly put a severe strain upon His bodily strength, yet we have no proof that His health had given way so far as to make death appear at all probable. Secondly, only a very superficial and external view of His work as Saviour warrants the supposition that His sacrifice could be accomplished only on the Cross; that its efficacy depended in any way on its outward mode; that His death, if it had come to Him in Gethsemane, would have had less value for God and man than His crucifixion has. Thirdly, even if this supposition be admitted, we may be sure of this, that Jesus was so confident of His Father's goodness and guardianship in every step of His path, that it was impossible for Him to fear that the great purpose of His life would be left unfulfilled on account of His premature death. His rebuke of the 'little faith' (Mt 8<sup>26</sup>) of His disciples during the storm at sea would have been applicable to Himself had He cherished any such fear.

(3) A much more profound view is offered to our consideration, when not the death itself, but the circumstances of the death, are represented as the cause of Jesus' agony. He regarded His death not only as a sacrifice which He was willing to offer, not only as a tragedy which He was ready to endure, but as a crime of man against God from which He shrank with horror. That the truth and grace of God in Him should meet with this insult and injury from the race which He had come to save and bless—this it was that caused His agony. He could not endure to gaze into 'the abysmal depths' of human iniquity and impiety, which the murder of the Holy One and the Just opened to view. Surely this apocalypse of sin was not necessary as a condition of the apocalypse of grace. If we look more closely at the conduct of the actors in this drama, we shall better understand how appalling a revelation of sin it must have appeared to Jesus. The fickleness of the multitude, the hypocrisy and bigotry of the Pharisees, the worldliness and selfishness of the priesthood, the treachery of Judas, the denial by Peter, the antagonism of the disciples generally to the Master's saving purpose, the falsehood of His accusers, the hate and the craft of His persecutors,—all these were present to the consciousness of Jesus as an intolerable offence to His conscience, and an unspeakable grief to His heart. To His moral insight and spiritual discernment these were not single misdeeds, but signs and proofs of a wickedness and godlessness spreading far and wide in the life of mankind, reaching deep into the soul of man. Must this antagonism of sin to God be forced to its ultimate issue? Could He not save mankind by some mode of sacrifice that would involve the men concerned in it in less heinous guilt? Must He by persevering in His present course drive His enemies to do their worst against Him, and thus by His fidelity to His vocation must He involve all who opposed Him in this greater iniquity? That such questions cannot have been present to the mind of Jesus, who can confidently affirm? He foresaw the doom of the guilty nation, and He also saw that it was the crime about to be committed against Him that would seal its doom. That He shrank from being thus the occasion of its judgment cannot be doubted. But if in Gethsemane Jesus anticipated distinctly and accepted deliberately what He so intensely experienced on the Cross, then this solicitude for all who were involved in the crime of His death does not at all exhaust His agony. The words of darkness and desolation on the Cross, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' (Mt 27<sup>46</sup>), must be our clue to the mystery of this experience.

(4) The only view that seems to the present writer at all adequate is that what Jesus dreaded and prayed to be delivered from in the experience of death was the sense of God's distance and abandonment. His sorrow unto death was not the fear of death as physical dissolution, nor of dying before He could finish His work on the Cross, but the shrinking of His filial soul from the sting of death, due to sin, the veiling in darkness of His Father's face from Him. His prayer was answered, for He was saved from death, inasmuch as the experience of darkness and desolation was momentary, and ere He gave up the ghost He was able to commit Himself with childlike trust unto His Father. 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit' (Lk 23<sup>46</sup>). His agony in Gethsemane was worthy of Him as the Son of God, for it was the recoil of His filial spirit from the interruption of His filial communion with His Father, which appeared to Him to be necessarily involved in the sacrifice which He was about to offer for the sins of the world.

It is not the function of this article to offer a theological interpretation of Jesus' experience in Gethsemane; but a justification of the above answer to the question of the nature of Jesus' agony may be briefly offered in a psychological analysis of His experience. First of all, then, we note Jesus' sense of solitude. He must leave behind Him the disciples except three, and even from these three He must withdraw Himself (Mt 26<sup>38-39</sup>). He sought this outward isolation because He felt this inner solitude. Since His announcement of His Passion (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>) the disciples had been becoming less and less His companions, as they were being more and more estranged from His purpose. At last He knew that they would abandon Him altogether, their outer distance but the sign and proof of their inward alienation. Yet the comfort of the Father's presence would remain with Him: 'Behold, the hour cometh, yea, is come, that ye shall be scattered every man to his own, and shall leave me alone; and yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me' (Jn 16<sup>29</sup>). But now in Gethsemane He began to realize that it might be necessary for the accomplishment of His sacrifice that even the Father's presence should be withdrawn from Him. That dread drives Him to the Father's presence, but the assurance that there is no ground for this fear does not come to Him. Again He turns to His disciples. Secondly, therefore, we note His need of sympathy. When He withdrew from the three, He asked them to watch with Him; when, returning, He found them sleeping, His words are a pathetic reproach: 'What, could ye not watch with me one hour?' (Mt 26<sup>40</sup>). He craved sympathy, not only because He felt solitary, but because this solitude was due to His love for man. The sacrifice He was about to offer, in which the sense of His Father's abandonment was the sting of death, was on behalf of, and instead of man; and yet not even the men He had chosen would sorrow with Him, although He was suffering for all mankind. Thus man's denial of sympathy must have made Him feel more keenly the dread that even God's comfort and help might be withheld from Him. Thirdly, we note that this dread was not groundless, but was rooted deep in His experience and vocation. We must then go beyond any of the words uttered in Gethsemane itself to discover all that was involved in His agony there. As the incarnate love, mercy, and grace of God, His experience was necessarily vicarious. He suffered with and for man. He so identified Himself with sinful mankind, that He shared its struggle, bore its burden, felt its shame. Himself sinless, knowing no sin, He was made sin for mankind in feeling its sin as it were His very own. The beloved of God, He became a curse in experiencing in His own agony and desolation the consequences of sin, although as innocent He could neither feel the guilt nor bear the penalty of sin. So completely had He become one with mankind in being made sin and a curse for man, that even His consciousness of filial union and communion with God as His Father was obscured and interrupted, if even for only a moment, by His consciousness of the sin of man. God did not withdraw Himself from, or abandon His only-begotten and well-beloved Son, but was with Him to sustain Him in His sacrifice; but the Son of God was so overshadowed and overwhelmed by His consciousness of the sin and the consequent curse of the race which He so loved as to make Himself one with it, that He dreaded in Gethsemane to lose, and did on Calvary lose for a moment, the comfort and help of His Father's love. In this experience He exhibited the antagonism of God and sin, the necessary connexion between the expulsion of God and the invasion of sin in any consciousness, since His self-identification with sinful man involved His self-isolation from the Holy Father. This, then, was the agony in Gethsemane, such a sense of the sorrow, shame, and curse of mankind's sin as His very own as became a dread of the loss of God's fatherly presence. Although He at first prayed to be delivered from this, to Him, most terrible and grievous experience, yet He afterward submitted to God's will, as God's purpose in the salvation of mankind was dearer to Him than even the joy of His filial communion with God His Father. In this surrender He was endowed with such strength from above that He finished the work His Father had given Him to do, and in His obedience even unto death offered the sacrifice of His life, which is a ransom for many, and the seal of the new covenant of forgiveness, renewal, and fellowship with God for all mankind. AGRICULTURE.—The influence of the physical and climatic characteristics of a land upon the character of its people has been a favourite theme with many writers. But we are more concerned here with another marked feature—the profound influence exerted by the occupations of a people on their manner of thought and their modes of expressing it. Nowhere was this subtle influence more manifest than in the case of the Hebrews. Their occupations were largely determined by the characteristics of the land they inhabited, but their thought and the language that was its vehicle were equally moulded by their occupations.

1. The place of Agriculture in the life and thought of the Hebrews.—From the first the Hebrews were a pastoral, and from very early times an agricultural people; and these twin employments have lent their colour and tone to their literature, and shaped their profoundest thoughts and utterances regarding God and man. God is the Shepherd of Israel (Is 40<sup>1</sup>); Israel is 'the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand' (95<sup>7</sup>, cf. 74<sup>1</sup>, 79<sup>13</sup>, 100<sup>7</sup>). God is the Husbandman; Israel is His vineyard (Is 5<sup>1-7</sup>). God is the Ploughman; Israel is the land of His tillage (Is 28<sup>24-25</sup>, cf. 1 Co 3<sup>9</sup>).

When we turn to the Gospels we find the same stream of thought in full flow. The highest Christian virtue is enforced by appeal to Him who 'maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust' (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>). The kingdom of God is set forth under such emblems as the sower going forth to sow (13<sup>3</sup>), the wheat and the tares growing together until the harvest (v. 24<sup>2</sup>), the lord of the vineyard going out early in the morning to hire labourers (20<sup>1-17</sup>), or sending to demand its fruits (21<sup>34-35</sup>). Christ compares Himself to the shepherd who seeks his lost sheep until he finds it (Lk 15<sup>3</sup>), or lays down his life for the sheep (Jn 10<sup>11</sup>). The multitude are, to His compassionate eye, as 'sheep not having a shepherd' (Mt 9<sup>36</sup>, Mk 6<sup>34</sup>). The world appears to Him as a great field 'white unto harvest' (Jn 4<sup>35</sup>), and awaiting the labour of the reapers (Mt 9<sup>37-41</sup>). His relation to His disciples is expressed under the figure of the vine and its branches (Jn 15<sup>1-8</sup>). See also art. HUSBANDMAN.

Noteworthy also is the place assigned by Biblical writers to the cultivation of the soil. It is represented as the duty of the first man, Adam, placed in the Garden of Eden, is 'to dress it and to keep it' (Gn 2<sup>15</sup>); driven from it, he is sent 'to till the ground from whence he was taken' (3<sup>2</sup>). To Noah the promise is given that 'while the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest . . . shall not cease' (8<sup>12</sup>). The land of promise is 'a land of wheat and barley' (Dt 8<sup>8</sup>). The Golden Age will be a time when men 'shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks,' and 'they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig-tree' (Is 2<sup>4</sup>, Mic 4<sup>4</sup>). The gladness of the Messianic age is 'joy according to the joy in harvest' (Is 9<sup>3</sup>).

Nor was it only in their conception of the past and their anticipation of the future that the influence of agriculture made itself felt: it was the very foundation of their national and religious life. A pastoral age, it is true, preceded the agricultural, and the patriarchs are represented, for the most part, as herdsmen rather than cultivators (Gn 37<sup>12-47</sup>); and even as late as the beginning of the settlement in Canaan, the trans-Jordanic tribes are said to have had a great multitude of cattle (Nu 32<sup>1</sup>). But, on the other hand, we learn that Isaac, who had gone to Gerar, 'sowed in that land, and found in the same year an hundredfold' (Gn 26<sup>12</sup>); while the first dream of Joseph shows that if he did not actually follow, he was at least familiar with, agricultural pursuits (37<sup>7</sup>). But it was not till after their conquest of the Land of Promise that the Hebrews became an agricultural people on any large scale. Prior to that time, however, agriculture was highly developed among the Canaanites (Dt 8<sup>9</sup>); and it may have been from the conquered race that they acquired it. Once learned, it became the staple industry of the country.

The Mosaic legislation presupposes a people given to agricultural pursuits. That is sufficiently attested by the laws anent the three annual festivals (Ex 23<sup>14-16</sup>), the septennial fallow (23<sup>11</sup>), the gleanings of the harvest field (Lv 19<sup>9-10</sup>), the year of Jubilee (25<sup>10-17</sup>), and many others. Further attestation of the same fact is found in the blessings that were to attend the faithful observance of the Law, and the curses that would follow disobedience (Lv 26<sup>3-14-20</sup>, Dt 28<sup>1-16-18</sup>).

2. The soil of Palestine.—The fertility of the soil of Palestine was remarkable, as is testified by Josephus (c. Apion, i. 22; BJ ii. 3) and others (Diod. xl. 3, 7; Tac. Hist. v. 6). The soil varies in character. In the Jordan Valley and the maritime plains it consists of a very rich alluvial deposit; in the regions lying at a higher elevation it has been formed from decomposing basaltic rock and cretaceous limestone. This, however, was greatly enriched by the system of 'terracing,' low walls of 'shoulder-stones' being built along the mountain slopes, and the ledges behind them filled with the alluvial soil of the valleys. These walls gave protection against the heavy rains, and prevented the soil from being washed away. It was to this system that districts such as Lebanon, Carmel, and Gilboa owed the wonderful fertility that formerly characterized them.

All parts were not, of course, equally productive. Thus we find the Mishna (Gittin, v. 1) enumerating several classes of soil according to their quality or the degree of moisture. Such a classification is quite distinct from that of the parable of the Sower,* where the wayside, the rocky places, etc., are all within the limits of a single field (Mt 13<sup>5</sup>, Mk 4<sup>3</sup>, Lk 8<sup>5</sup>). It may be noted here that ground which yielded thorns was considered specially good for wheat-growing, while that which was overrun with weeds was assigned to barley. The most productive fields were often marked by the presence of large stones, some of which were beyond a man's own strength to remove. Their presence was regarded as a token that the soil was fertile. Smaller stones, which were also plentiful, were often used for making rude walls along the side of the fields. In some districts they were so numerous that they had to be removed every year after ploughing had taken place.

3. Agricultural operations, etc.—The work of preparing the land for cultivation was the first concern of the farmer. Where virgin soil had to be reclaimed, a beginning was made by clearing it of timber, brushwood, or stones (Jos 17<sup>18</sup>, Is 5<sup>5</sup>). It was then ready to receive the plough (which see).

(a) Ploughing began immediately after the 'early rain' had softened the ground, i.e. towards the end of September or beginning of October, and went on right through the winter, provided the soil had not become too wet and, therefore, too heavy. Usually a single ploughing sufficed, but if the soil was very rough it was ploughed twice.

In some cases the hoe or mattock took the place of the plough. That is the common practice in modern times where there is a rocky bottom and only a sparse covering of earth. In ancient times the same course was followed where hillsides were brought under cultivation (Is 7<sup>2</sup>). The same implement was employed for breaking up large clods of earth (Is 28<sup>24</sup>, Hos 10<sup>11</sup>), but whether the reference includes the clods upturned by the plough, or merely those occurring in 'stony ground,' is not quite certain.

(b) Dung was employed for increasing the productivity of fruit trees (Lk 13<sup>6</sup>), but not, as a rule, for grain fields. The most common forms were house and farmyard refuse mixed with straw (Is 25<sup>10</sup>), withered leaves, oil-scum, and wood-ashes. The blood of slaughtered animals was also used for this purpose.

(c) The principal crops were wheat, barley, spelt, millet, beans, and lentils (see articles on the first two of these). Oats were little cultivated. From Jos 2<sup>9</sup> we learn that flax was grown. It was sometimes sown as an experiment for testing the quality of the soil, for a field which had yielded good flax was regarded as specially suitable for wheat-growing.

(d) The sowing season began in the early days of October. A beginning was made with pulse varieties, barley came next, and wheat followed. Millet was sown in summer, the land being prepared for it by irrigation. When the winter set in cold and wet, barley was not sown till the beginning of February.

The sower carries the seed in a basket or bag, from which he scatters it broadcast. Where a single ploughing suffices, the seed is sown first and then ploughed in. When it is sown on ploughed ground, the usual course is also to plough it in, but sometimes a light harrow (not infrequently a thorn-bush) is used to cover it. Seed that falls on the footpath or 'wayside' cannot be covered owing to the hardness of the ground, and is picked up by the birds (Mt 13<sup>1</sup> and parallels).

(e) The crops thus sown were exposed, as they grew, to various dangers, such as the inroads of roaming cattle, the depredations of birds, or the visitation of locusts; and also to such adverse natural and climatic influences as drought, east wind, and mildew. Some of these will be separately treated, and need not be dwelt upon now. But it may be convenient to say a few words at this stage regarding—

(f) The water supply of the country.—Unlike Egypt, which owed its fertility exclusively to the Nile, Palestine had its time of rain (Dt 11<sup>10</sup>, 11, 14, Jer 5<sup>4</sup> etc.). The 'early rain' (רִיבֵן) of the Bible is that of October, which precedes ploughing and sowing; the 'later rain' (רִיבֵן) denotes the refreshing showers that fall in March and April, and give much-needed moisture to the growing crops. The intervening period is marked by the heavy rains of winter (רִיבֵן), the wettest month being January. The rainfall is not uniform over the country. In the Jordan Valley it is very slight; at Jerusalem it averages about 20 inches annually; in some other upland regions it is almost twice as much. In the highest lying parts, as Lebanon, there is a considerable fall of snow. There are also many brooks and springs (Dt 8<sup>7</sup>), and irrigation is employed, especially in gardening, though naturally on a much smaller scale than in Egypt. The summer months are hot and rainless.

(g) Harvest.—Barley harvest (2 S 21<sup>9</sup>) began in April or May, according as the district was early or late; wheat and spelt were ripe a few weeks after (Ex 9<sup>18</sup>, 23). The grain was cut with a sickle (Jl 3<sup>8</sup>, Dt 16<sup>9</sup>, Mk 4<sup>29</sup>; see art. SICKLE), or pulled up by the roots (Michas, Psalm iv. 10). The latter method was followed both in Palestine and in Egypt, and is so still; but the use of the sickle goes back to very early times, as the excavations at Tell el-Hesi have shown. Ordinarily the stalks were cut about a foot beneath the ear, but in some instances even higher (Job 24<sup>24</sup>). The reaper grasped them in handfuls (Ru 2<sup>16</sup>), reaped them with his arm (Is 17<sup>4</sup>), and laid them behind him; while the binder, following him, gathered them in his bosom (Ps 129<sup>7</sup>), tied them with straw into sheaves (Gn 37<sup>7</sup>), and set them in heaps (רִיבֵן * Ru 2<sup>7</sup>).

(h) Threshing.—The sheaves thus prepared were carried to the threshing-floor on the backs of men or of beasts of burden, such as donkeys, horses, or camels. Am 2<sup>9</sup> has been taken by some as implying that they were sometimes removed in carts, but this is very doubtful. The reference is more probably to the threshing-sledge (Is 28<sup>26</sup>).

The threshing-floor is simply a circle of level ground which has been carefully cleaned and beaten hard, and is enclosed with a row of big stones to prevent the straw from being too widely scattered. The spot selected always stood higher than the surrounding ground, so that it should be open to the air currents, and that rain, if it occurred, though it was rare in harvest time (1 S 12<sup>17</sup>), might run off without doing injury. The sheaves were unbound and scattered over the floor, till a heap was formed about a foot high. Cattle (Hos 10<sup>4</sup>) were then driven over it repeatedly, or a threshing-wain drawn by cattle. The Pentateuchal law provided that the cattle engaged in this operation should not be muzzled (Dt 25<sup>4</sup>). It was also the custom to blindfold them, as otherwise, moving continually in a circle, they became dizzy (Talmud, Kelim xvi. 7). Certain crops, however, were threshed by being beaten with a stick (Is 28<sup>26</sup>).

Two kinds of threshing machines were employed, the drag and the waggon. The drag (רִיבֵן, רִיבֵן) was a heavy wooden board,† the under-surface of which was studded with nails or sharp fragments of stone (Is 41<sup>13</sup>). It was further weighted with large stones, and by the driver himself, who stood, sat, or even lay upon it. The waggon (רִיבֵן Is 28<sup>26</sup>) was provided with sharp metal discs. These were affixed to revolving rollers set in a rude waggon-frame.

* See Vogelstein, Landwirtschaft in Pal. 61.
† See illustration in Driver's Isaiah and Amos (Camb. Bible), p. 227.

(i) Winnowing.—The operation of threshing yielded a confused mass of grain, chaff, and broken straw, which required to be winnowed. Two implements were used for this process—the shovel and the fan (Is 30<sup>24</sup>). With these the mixed mass was tossed into the air, against the wind. The chaff was blown away (Ps 1<sup>4</sup>), the straw fell a little distance off, and the grain at the feet of the winnower. Where, as at large public threshing-floors, there was an accumulation of chaff, it was burned (Mt 3<sup>12</sup>). The chopped straw (רִיבֵן Is 11<sup>7</sup>) was used as fodder for cattle.

(j) Sifting.—The winnowed grain still contained an admixture of small stones and particles of clay, stubble, and unbrused ears, and also of smaller poisonous seeds such as tares, and so stood in need of yet further cleansing. This was effected by means of sifting. In modern Palestine the sieve in common use is a wooden hoop with a mesh made of camel-hair. This implement probably corresponds to the רִיבֵן (kēbhārāh) of ancient times (Am 9<sup>5</sup>). The mesh was wide enough to allow the separated grains to pass through, but retained the unthreshed ears, which were cast again on the threshing-floor.* In Is 30<sup>25</sup> another implement is mentioned, נָפֶה (nāphāh), which both AV and RV render 'sieve.' It is not quite certain, however, that the nāphāh was really a sieve. If it was, it may have resembled the modern ghirbal, which is of smaller mesh than the kēbhārāh (Arab. kīrbal), and permits only broken grains and dust to pass through, while retaining the unbrused kernels.

The sifted grain was collected in large heaps, and, pending its removal to the granary, the owner, to guard against thieving, slept by the threshing-floor (Ru 3<sup>7</sup>). In the Gospels there is one reference to sifting (Lk 22<sup>31</sup>).

AHAZ.—One of the kings of Judah (c. 735–720 B.C.), named in St. Matthew's genealogy of our Lord (Mt 1<sup>9</sup>).

AHIMELECH.—See ABIATHAR.

AKELDAMA.—The name given in Ac 1<sup>18</sup> to the field purchased with the price of Judas' treachery.

* In this case the meaning of 'the least grain' in Am 9<sup>5</sup> must be 'the least pebble' (so Preuschen, ZATW, 1896, p. 24). Others (e.g. Driver, Isaiah and Amos, p. 221; Nowack and Marti in their Comm. ad loc.) take the word רִיבֵן (kēbhārāh, 'pebble') to stand here for a grain of wheat, while admitting that the word is not elsewhere so used. On this supposition the action of the kēbhārāh would be similar to that of the modern ghirbal described above.

The true reading seems to be ἀκελδαμάχ (B; cf. ἀκελδαμάχ, NA 61, etc.; ἀκελδαμάχ, D; ἀκελδαμάχ, E) rather than the TR ἀκελδαμά; and the final aspirate is here of importance, as will be seen.

The two accounts of the death of Judas (Mt 27:22, and Ac 1:18) are hard to reconcile (see JUDAS, and art. in Expositor for June 1904, by the present writer); but it is sufficient to note here that they are clearly independent of each other. The salient features of the Matthean tradition are—(a) Judas stricken with remorse returned the money paid to him as the price of his treachery; (b) he hanged himself in despair, nothing being said as to the scene of his suicide; (c) the priests bought with the money a field known as 'the Potter's Field,' which (d) thenceforth was called ἀγρός αἵματος, the allusion being to the blood of Christ, shed through the treachery of Judas; (e) the field was devoted to the purpose of a cemetery for foreigners. In Acts, on the other hand, (a) nothing is said of a refunding of the money by Judas; (b) his death was not self-inflicted, nor was it caused by hanging; it is described as due to a fall and a consequent rupture of the abdomen; (c) the field was bought by Judas himself, and not by the priests; (d) nothing is said of its former use as a 'potter's field,' nor (e) of the purpose for which it was used after the death of Judas; (f) the blood which gave its name to the field was that of Judas, by which it was defiled, for (g) the field Akeldama is identified with the place of his death, a fact of which there is no mention in Matthew.

The only point common to the two accounts is that the name by which the field was known in the next generation after Judas' death was an Aramaic word which was variously rendered ἀγρός αἵματος and γὰρον αἵματος by Mt. and Luke. Lk. gives a transliteration of this Aramaic name; he says it was ἀκελδαμάχ, that is, he understands it as equivalent to קפא דמא, 'Field of Blood.' And ἀκελδαμάχ is, no doubt, a possible transliteration of these Hebrew words, for we have other instances of final * being represented by the Greek χ, as, e.g., in the equation Σπαράχ=σπάρ. But we should not expect a final χ, although it might be defended, if the last part of the Aramaic title were קפא; the presence of χ suggests rather that the Aramaic title ended with the letters קפא. Now it is remarkable that קפא=κοιμηθῆναι, so that κοιμηθῆριον 'cemetery' would be the exact equivalent of קפא דמא. And Klostermann (Probleme im Aposteltexte, p. 6 ff.) has suggested that this was really the name by which the field was known to the native Jews, and that we have here a corroboration of St. Matthew's tradition 'to bury strangers in' (Mt 27). This conjecture is confirmed by the fact, which has been pointed out above, that the significance of the name 'Field of Blood' was differently understood by Mt. and Luke. When we have two rival explanations offered of a place-name, it is probable that the name itself is a corruption of some other, akin in sound, but not in sense.

The evidence, then, points to the following conclusions. The field which was purchased with the wages of Judas was originally a 'potter's field,' or pit, in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. It may have been (as Christian tradition had it afterwards) the place in the Valley of Hinnom where the potter of Jeremiah's day pursued his craft (Jer 18:19); but of this there is no hint in the NT, for the reference to Jeremiah in the text of Mt 27 is an inadvertence, the passage quoted by the Evangelist being Zec 11:13. This 'potter's field' was used as a burial-ground for strangers, and so was called קפא דמא=cemetery. Within half a century the name became corrupted to קפא דמא 'the Field of Blood,' the allusion being variously interpreted of the blood of Christ and the blood of Judas.

There is no good reason to doubt the identity of the modern Hakked-Dumm, on the south bank of the Valley of Hinnom, with the 'Akeldamach' of Lk. and the ἀγρός αἵματος of Matthew. The early pilgrims, e.g. Antoninus (570) and Arculf (685), describe its site with sufficient accuracy, and so do the later mediaeval travellers.

Tradition has distinguished Akeldama, the field purchased with Judas' thirty pieces of silver, from the scene of his death—a distinction of sites which, though inconsistent with Ac 1, is compatible with Mt., as has been pointed out above. Thus Antoninus places 'Akeldama, hoc est, ager sanguinis, in quo omnes peregrini sepeluntur' (§ 26), near Siloam; but the figure 'on which Judas hanged himself' was shown him on the N.E. of the city (§ 17). Arculf seems to place the latter upon the Hill of Evil Counsel (§ 18), where it is shown at the present day; but the tradition has not been constant, the 'alder-tree' of Judas having been pointed out to Sir J. Maundeville (in 12th cent.) near Absalom's pillar.

The best description of Hakked-Dumm, and of the buildings which remain of the old charnel house, will be found in an article by Schick (LEFSK, 1892, p. 283 ff.). It is quite possible, as he says, that this was once the site of a potter's cave; and clay used to be taken, up to quite recent times, from a place a little higher up the Hill of Evil Counsel. This burial-place was much used in Crusading times; indeed, it came to be regarded as an honour to be buried in Akeldama, so completely were the old associations of horror forgotten or ignored.

J. H. BERNARD.
ALABASTER (ἀλάβαστρος or ἀλάβαστρον; in secular writers always ἀλάβαστρος [more correctly ἀλάβαστρος], though with a heterog. plur. ἀλάβαστρα; in NT only in accus., and only once with art., which is found in different MSS in all the genders—ἄγρον, τόπος, τὸ [Tisch., Treg., WH, Meyer, Alford prefer τῆς]). The word occurs four times in the Gospels: Mt 26, Mk 14:24, Lk 7:2. The Oriental alabaster, so called from the locality in Egypt (the town of Alabastron, near Tell el-Amarna)* where it is found in greatest abundance, is a species of marble softer and more easily worked than the ordinary marble. It was so frequently used for holding precious ointment that ἀλάβαστρος came to be a synonym for an unguent box (Theoc. xv. 114; Herod. iii. 20). Horace (Od. iv. 12. 17) uses onyx in the same way.

In all three of the Gospel narratives emphasis is laid on the costliness of the offering made to our Lord. The ointment was that with which monarchs were anointed. Judas valued it at three hundred pence. If we bear in mind that a denarius was a day's wage for ordinary labour, it would represent about four shillings of our money, and unguent and box would have a value of something like £60. Mary 'brake the box.' This is generally interpreted as merely meaning 'unfastened the seal'; but is it not in accordance alike with a profound instinct of human nature and with Oriental ideas to interpret the words literally? The box which had been rendered sacred by holding the ointment with which Jesus was anointed would never be put to a lower use.

This incident is the gospel protest against philanthropic utilitarianism. 'Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.' We have here the warrant for the expenditure of money on everything that makes for the higher life of man. Whatever tends to uplift the imagination, to ennoble and purify the emotions, to refine the taste, and thus to add to the spiritual value of life, is good, and is to be encouraged. Jesus claims our best. He inspires us to be and do our best, and the first-fruits of all the higher faculties of the soul are to be devoted to Him. See, further, art. ANOINTING I. 2.

A. MILLER.

* The reverse supposition is possible, that the town derived its name from the material (see Encyc. Bibl. i. 108).

ALEXANDER AND RUFUS.—The Synoptists all record that the Saviour's cross was borne by one Simon of Cyrene. St. Mark (16<sup>2</sup>) alone adds that he was 'the father of Alexander and Rufus.' From this we gather that, when the Second Gospel was written, the sons of him who bore the cross were followers of the Crucified, and men of prominence and note in the Church. This information as to the two sons of Simon being Alexander and Rufus, is also found in the Gospel of Nicodemus (ch. 4). The name Alexander appears in Ac 4<sup>7</sup> 19<sup>2</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>2</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>4</sup>, but there is not the slightest ground for identifying any one of these with the Alexander of Mk 15<sup>2</sup>.

In the case of Rufus, however, it has generally been considered that he is probably the same as the Rufus who, with his mother, is saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16<sup>13</sup> (Ῥούφου τῶν ἐκκεκρίτων ἐκ Κυρίου). And if this is so, it tells us that not only the sons of Simon of Cyrene, but his wife also, were members of the Church. Lightfoot supports this view, and Swete considers that it has 'some probability.' In St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians, written from Rome, occurs a salutation sent to the Church at Philippi from Caesar's household (4<sup>2</sup>). Lightfoot has compared the list of names of those to whom St. Paul sends greeting in his letter to the Romans (ch. 16) with the names in the lists of the household which occur in the inscriptions, and on the name Rufus he writes (Philippians, p. 176)—

'Rufus is a very ordinary name, and would not have claimed notice here but for its occurrence in one of the Gospels. There seems no reason to doubt the tradition that St. Mark wrote especially for the Romans; and if so, it is worth remarking that he alone of the Evangelists describes Simon of Cyrene as the "father of Alexander and Rufus" (16<sup>2</sup>). A person of this name, therefore, seems to have held a prominent place among the Roman Christians; and thus there is at least fair ground for identifying the Rufus of St. Paul with the Rufus of St. Mark. The inscriptions exhibit several members of the household bearing the names Rufus and Alexander, but this fact is of no value where both names are so common.'

In connexion with Bishop Lightfoot's note, it is worthy of notice that in Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians (9) we find Ignatius, Zozimus, and Rufus adduced as examples, with St. Paul and the rest of the Apostles, of men who had obeyed the word of righteousness and exercised all patience, 'and are gone to the place that was due to them from the Lord with whom also they suffered; for they loved not this present world, but Him who died and was raised again by God for us.'

In the Acts of Andrew and of Peter, Rufus and Alexander appear as the companions of Peter, Andrew, and Matthias, but no further information is given. J. B. BRISTOW.

ALLEGORY.—See PARABLE.

ALMSGIVING (ἐλεημοσύνη).—[For the history of the word, and Jewish teaching, see Hastings' DB i. 67.] Only on three occasions does our Lord in the NT employ the word (Mt 6<sup>1-4</sup>, Lk 11<sup>4</sup> and 12<sup>2</sup>). But these texts by no means exhaust His teaching on the subject. All the Gospels witness to His interest in it. Mk. contains the incidents of the Rich Young Man whom He told, 'Yet one thing thou lackest: go, sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven' (10<sup>9</sup>); the Widow's Mite (12<sup>8</sup>); and the emphatic praise of Mary of Bethany (14<sup>7</sup>). Jn. again exhibits all Christ's miracles as so many charities (e.g. 2<sup>1-11</sup>), 'good works' which Christ 'showed you from the Father' (10<sup>25</sup>); tells the Lord's defence of Mary's act (12<sup>1</sup>); and drops a hint twice over (12<sup>2</sup> and 13<sup>29</sup>) of Christ's own practice of giving something to the poor out of His scanty wallet. But it is St. Matthew the converted tax-gatherer who left all and followed Him, and St. Luke the beloved physician, with his abounding sympathy for wretchedness of every sort, who have preserved to us the most numerous and striking of His sayings on the subject.

The general character of our Lord's teaching concerning Almsgiving has been described as in close accordance with the Jewish thought of the time, even in points where we should have least expected it. Certainly He endorses and very much enhances the praise of Almsgiving which we find in the OT (e.g. Ps 41<sup>1</sup>, Pr 19<sup>17</sup>, Dn 4<sup>21</sup>). But in dealing with the teachings of the Apocrypha, which probably reflect more closely the views He found prevailing, He discriminates. If, on the one hand, He combines (Mt 6<sup>2, 5, 16</sup>) Almsgiving, Prayer, and Fasting, as in To 12<sup>8</sup>, and describes Almsgiving as providing a treasure in the heavens which faileth not (Lk 12<sup>33</sup>), as in Sir 40<sup>17</sup>; yet, on the other hand, He explicitly condemns (Mt 6<sup>1</sup>) the notion countenanced in Sir 31<sup>11</sup> (LXX, 34<sup>11</sup>) that alms may be done to gain a reputation for piety; while in Mt 5<sup>46</sup> He directly contradicts both the precept and the doctrine of Sir 12<sup>27-7</sup> 'Give not to the ungodly . . . for the Most High hateth sinners, and will repay vengeance.'

Almsgiving is, according to Christ, a duty even towards our enemies, and those with whom we have little to do (Mt 5<sup>42-45</sup>, Lk 6<sup>27-36</sup> 10<sup>7</sup>); it is a means whereby we may conform ourselves to the example of our Father which is in heaven (Mt 5<sup>46</sup>, Lk 6<sup>36</sup>); it is the first exercise of righteousness (Mt 6<sup>1-4</sup>). As eliminating from our enjoyment of material things the elements of unthankfulness and selfishness, it is the true way to purify them for our use (Lk 11<sup>4</sup>). To obtain the means of almsgiving, we may profitably part with earthly goods, because we shall thereby provide ourselves with 'purses which wax not old, and raise our hearts, with our treasures, to heaven (Lk 12<sup>33-34</sup>). In certain cases, like that of the Rich Young Ruler, it may be needful for a man to sell all and distribute to the poor (Mt 19<sup>21</sup>, Mk 10<sup>21</sup>, Lk 18<sup>22</sup>); while the poor whom we may make our friends by using 'the mammon of unrighteousness,' for their benefit, are able, by their grateful prayers for us, to 'receive us, when it (our wealth) has failed us, into the eternal tabernacles' (Lk 16<sup>1-13</sup> parable of the Unjust Steward). Even trifling alms, given in the name of a disciple, are sure to be rewarded (Mt 10<sup>42</sup>). And surely in those words of the Good Samaritan to the innkeeper, 'Whatsoever thou spendest more, when (not, if) I come again I will repay thee' (Lk 10<sup>35</sup>), we must discern the voice of our Lord Himself: since no one but He can be certain either of returning (Ja 4<sup>12</sup>), or of ability to reward the ministrations of love. His rewards, when He does come, will surprise some, who did not realize that in ministering to 'his brethren' they ministered to Him (Mt 25<sup>23a</sup>). On the other hand, for the rich to indulge themselves, and neglect their poor neighbour, is the way for them to Gehenna (Lk 16<sup>13a</sup> parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus); and the omission of the duty will be a ground of condemnation at the Last Day (Mt 25<sup>46</sup>).

Other notices, though less direct, are worth considering, e.g. our Lord's injunction to the Twelve, 'Freely ye have received, freely give' (Mt 10<sup>7</sup>); His own compassionate feeding of the hungry multitudes (Mt 14<sup>13-15</sup>, Mk 6<sup>9-8</sup>, Lk 9<sup>13</sup>); His rebuke of the Rabbis' rule, that when sons had rashly or selfishly taken the vow of Corban, they must no longer be suffered to do aught for their father or their mother (Mt 15<sup>2</sup>, Mk 7<sup>11</sup>); His acceptance of the Jews' intercession for the Gentile who had built them a synagogue (Lk 7<sup>9</sup>); the praise of the women who ministered unto Him of their substance (8<sup>3</sup>); His advice, when we make a feast, to invite the poor (14<sup>13</sup>); and the vow of the penitent Zacchæus, 'The half of my goods I give to the poor' (19<sup>o</sup>). Nor may we omit 'the words of the Lord Jesus,' quoted by St. Paul, but preserved by St. Luke (Ac 20<sup>o</sup>), 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.'

We do not find in the teaching of our Lord Himself any of those cautions, which are so dear to the present day, against excessive almsgiving; though doubtless St. Paul 'had the mind of Christ' (1 Co 2<sup>o</sup>) when he laid down his rule, 'If any man will not work, neither let him eat' (2 Th 3<sup>o</sup>). Not far, at any rate, from this is His parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard (Mt 20<sup>o-10</sup>), where Jesus describes God under the figure of a rich and generous householder who gives work and wages (not mere alms) to those who are able to work, asks with surprise of such, 'Why stand ye here all the day idle?' and, on learning it was their misfortune and not their fault, makes them work for the last hour, yet pays them a whole day's wages.

We have seen how Christ condemns the doing of alms to have glory of men. He exposes also the ugliness of boasting of our giving before God (Lk 18<sup>o</sup> parable of the Pharisee and the Publican); insists that justice, mercy, and truth are of infinitely greater importance than minute scrupulousness in giving, and lays down the comprehensive principle that, however there may be opportunities for us to do more than we have been explicitly commanded, yet we never can do more than we owe to God: 'When ye have done all, say, We are unprofitable servants: we have done that which it was our duty to do' (Lk 17<sup>o</sup>). Again, by His own example, in the case of the woman of Canaan (Mt 15<sup>o-28</sup>), He cuts off another unworthy motive, too often active in our so-called almsgiving, the wish to get rid of a beggar's importunity; while, both in the case of this woman and of her with the issue of blood (Mt 9<sup>o</sup>, Mk 5<sup>o</sup>, Lk 8<sup>o</sup>), He shows by His own example that true kindness is not indiscriminate, but takes the most careful account, not so much of the immediate and material, as of the ultimate and spiritual benefit which may be done, by its assistance, to the afflicted or the needy. The soul's wellbeing is higher than the body's. And, of course, our almsgiving, like all our works, is to be done in subjection to the two commandments which are the standing law of His kingdom, that we love the Lord our God with all our heart and all our mind, and that we love our neighbour as ourself (Mt 22<sup>o-11</sup>).

ALOES.—We have in the NT only one reference to aloes, Jn 19<sup>o</sup>, where Nicodemus brings myrrh and aloes with him, when he joins Joseph of Arimathea in taking away the body of Jesus for burial. In English, 'aloe' is used to designate (1) Aloe vulgaris, A. spicata, etc., of the natural order Liliaceae, from which the medicine known as 'bitter aloes' is obtained; (2) Agave Americana, or American aloe, of the order Amaryllidaceae, a plant which is noted for its long delay in flowering, and for the rapidity with which it at length puts forth its flowering stalk; and (3) Aquilaria Agallocha, A. secundaria, etc., of the order Aquilariaceae, from which is obtained the aloes-wood or eagle-wood of commerce. The substance so named is the result of disease occurring in the wood of the tree. To obtain it, the tree has to be split, as it is found in the centre. With this eagle-wood are probably to be identified the aloes of the Bible.

The grounds on which this identification rests are chiefly these:—(1) Under the name ἀγάλλαξον

Dioscorides (i. 21) describes an aromatic wood which was imported from India and Arabia, and was not only used for medicinal purposes, but also burned instead of frankincense. Similarly Celsius (Hierobot. i. 135 ff.) discusses references of Arab writers to many varieties of aghalaji found in India and Ceylon which gave off, when burned, a sweet fragrance, and which were used as a perfume for the very same purposes as those which 'aloes' served among the Jews (Ps 45<sup>o</sup>, Pr 7<sup>o</sup>, Cs 4<sup>o</sup>). Quite analogous is the employment of aloes for perfuming the coverings of the dead (Jn 19<sup>o</sup>; cf. 2 Ch 16<sup>o</sup>).

(2) It is practically certain that ἀγάλλαξον and aghalaji, and also the Hebrew אגלילין (ahalim) and אגלילת (ahaloth), are derivatives of the Sanskrit word aguru, of which the term 'eagle-wood' is itself a corruption. If this etymology is correct, it indicates that both the name and the commodity were brought from the Far East (cf. Sanskrit navada). The Greek ἀλγη and our own 'aloe' may be from the same root.

(3) There was an active trade in spices carried on in ancient times, not only through Phœnicia but also through the Syrian and Arabian deserts, so that there is no great difficulty in supposing that 'aloes' were brought from India. These considerations seem to afford sufficient justification for the belief that eagle-wood was the aloes of the Biblical writers. HUGH DUNCAN.

ALPHA AND OMEGA.—A solemn designation of divinity, of Jewish origin, peculiar to the Book of Revelation. In Rev 1<sup>o</sup> it is applied to Himself by 'the Almighty,' with obvious relation to Ex 3<sup>o</sup> (cf. v. 4) and Is 41<sup>o</sup> 44<sup>o</sup> (for the LXX rendering of ארמיא by παντοκράτωρ, cf. Am 3<sup>o</sup> 4<sup>o</sup>). In Rev 21<sup>o</sup> also the epithet is applied not to the Son but to the Father, as shown by the context (cf. verses 3 'a voice out of the throne,' 5 'He spake that is seated on the throne,' 6 'I will be his God and he shall be my son'). In 22<sup>o</sup> it is placed in a derived sense (i.e. 'I, the primary object and ultimate fulfilment of God's promise') in the mouth of the glorified Jesus. This transfer of a Divine title to the Son furnishes a problem of great interest for the early development of Christology; for, as R. H. Charles points out (Hastings' DB i. p. 70), 'although in Rev 1<sup>o</sup> [add 21<sup>o</sup>] this title is used of God the Father, it seems to be confined to the Son in Patristic and subsequent literature.'

1. Origin and Significance.—(a) The simplest and most primary use of this figure, derived as it is from the first and last terms of the alphabet, which with Greeks and Hebrews were also those of numerical notation, is common to several languages. Thus in English we have the expression 'from A to Z.' Schoettgen (Hor. Heb. i. 1066) adduced from Jalkut Ruben, fol. 17. 4, 'Adam transgressed the whole law from א to נ'; and 48. 4, 'Abraham kept the law from א to נ.' As Cremer shows (Theol. Wörterbuch, p. 1), this has no bearing on the case except linguistically. In Jalkut Rub. 128. 3, God is said to bless Israel from א to נ (because Lv 16<sup>o-43</sup> begins with א and ends with נ), but to curse only from י to ס (because Lv 16<sup>o-43</sup> begins with י and ends with ס). R. H. Charles (i.c.) adds examples of this (general) use from Martial (v. 26 and il. 57) and Theodoret (HE iv. 8).

(b) In the later, more philosophical, period of Hebrew literature similar expressions are applied to God, as indicative of His omnipresence and eternal existence. God, as the Being from whom all things proceed and to whom they tend, is thus contrasted in Deutero-Isaiah with heathen divinities (41<sup>o</sup> 43<sup>o</sup> [cf. Ex 3<sup>o</sup>] 44<sup>o</sup> 48<sup>o</sup>). Here the best example is the Kabbalistic designation of the Shekinah as  $\omega$ , according to Buxtorf = 'principium et finis' (Lex. Chald. Talm. et Rab.).

But a threefold designation of God as the Eternal is also employed. The Jerusalem Targum on Ex 3<sup>14</sup> so interprets the Divine name ('qui fuit, est, et erit, dixit mundo'), and the Targ. Jonathan on Dt 32<sup>2</sup> ('ego ille est, qui est, et qui fuit, et qui erit'). So also, according to Bousset (ad Rev 1<sup>9</sup>), Shemoth R. iii. f. 103, 2, Midrash Tylim 117, 2, Bereshith R. on Dn 10<sup>4</sup> (the 'writing of  $\omega$ —truth—the seal of God.' See below). Thus in He 2<sup>10</sup> God is both end and means of all things ( $\delta\epsilon\ \omega\varsigma\ \delta\epsilon\ \omicron\upsilon\tau\alpha\ \pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\alpha$ ); in Ro 11<sup>36</sup> 'Of him, through him, and unto him are all things'; cf. Rev 1<sup>4</sup>.

Instances of expressions of like implication applied to the Deity ( $\delta\ \theta\epsilon\omega\varsigma$ ), or to individual divinities, are naturally still more common in Greek philosophical literature, so that, as Justin says (ad Graecos, xxv.), 'Plato, when mystically expressing the attributes of God's eternity, said, "God is, as the old tradition runs, the end and the middle of all things"; plainly alluding to the Law of Moses.' The tradition was indeed 'old' in Plato's day, but there are many more probable sources than Ex 3<sup>14</sup> for Plato. We need refer only to the song of the Peleias at Dodona: Zeus  $\eta\varsigma$ , Zeus  $\epsilon\sigma\tau\iota\nu$ , Zeus  $\epsilon\sigma\sigma\epsilon\tau\alpha\iota$  (Paus. x. 12. 5); and the Orphic saying, Zeus  $\pi\acute{\rho}\omega\tau\omicron\varsigma\ \gamma\acute{\epsilon}\nu\epsilon\tau\omicron$ , Zeus  $\theta\epsilon\sigma\tau\alpha\omicron\varsigma\ \alpha\rho\chi\eta\tau\epsilon\pi\alpha\tau\omicron\varsigma$ , Zeus  $\epsilon\kappa\theta\alpha\lambda\eta$ , Zeus  $\mu\acute{\epsilon}\tau\omicron\varsigma$ , κ.τ.λ. (Lobeck, Apologetikamus, 521, 523, 530 f.). Similar attributes are applied to Athens and Asclepius in examples quoted by Wetstein. Notoriously the Jewish apologists had been beforehand with Justin Martyr in ascribing to Moses the larger and more philosophical conceptions of Deity enunciated by the philosophers; and from these writings of the period of Revelation and earlier it is possible to demonstrate the existence of a Jewish kerygma (formula of missionary propaganda) defining the true nature of the Deity and of right worship, wherein Is 44<sup>6</sup>, with the expression borrowed in Rev 1<sup>8</sup> 21<sup>6</sup>, or its equivalent, is the central feature. Josephus (c. Apion. ii. 196-198 [ed. Niese]), contrasting the law of Moses on this subject with heathenism, calls it 'our doctrine (λόγος) concerning God and His worship.' What he designated 'the first commandment' is easily recognizable as part of such a kerygma, and seems to be derived from the same Jewish apologist pseudo-Hecataeus (c. 60 B.C.) whom he quotes in c. Apion. i. § 183-204, and ii. 43. It is traceable already in the diatribes against idolatry in the Ep. of Aristaeus (132-141) and the Wisdom of Solomon (chapters 13-14). The Proemium of the oldest Jewish Sibyl (Sib. Or. v. 7-8, 15) has: 'There is one God Omnipotent, immeasurable, eternal, almighty, invisible, alone all-seeing, Himself unseen. . . . Worship Him, the alone existent, the Ruler of the world, who alone is from eternity to eternity.' It appears again in Christian adaptation in Ac 17<sup>24-28</sup> (cf. 14<sup>16-17</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>8-9</sup>, Ro 1<sup>8-9</sup>, Wis 11<sup>23</sup> 13<sup>8-10</sup> 14<sup>23-25</sup>), in the fragment of the Kerygma Petri, quoted in Clem. Strom. vi. 5. 39-43 (Fragm. 2 and 3 ap. Preuschen, Antileg. p. 52:  $\epsilon\iota\varsigma\ \theta\epsilon\omega\varsigma\ \epsilon\sigma\tau\iota\nu$ ,  $\delta\varsigma\ \alpha\rho\chi\eta\tau\epsilon\pi\alpha\tau\omicron\upsilon\nu\ \epsilon\pi\acute{\omicron}\lambda\eta\tau\epsilon\varsigma\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \tau\epsilon\lambda\omicron\upsilon\varsigma\ \xi\theta\upsilon\sigma\iota\omega\tau\omicron\varsigma\ \epsilon\chi\omega\nu$ , κ.τ.λ.); in the Apology of Aristides; Tatian's Oration iv.; Athenagoras, Leg. xiii., and the Ep. to Diogn. iii. It begins in Josephus:  $\epsilon\sigma\tau\iota\ \theta\epsilon\omega\varsigma\ \epsilon\mu\epsilon\iota\ \tau\alpha\ \sigma\acute{\iota}\mu\alpha\tau\alpha\ \pi\alpha\tau\epsilon\lambda\eta\varsigma\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \mu\acute{\alpha}\kappa\alpha\tau\omicron\varsigma$ ,  $\alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\varsigma\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\omicron\upsilon\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\alpha\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{\alpha}\rho\alpha\kappa\tau\epsilon$ ,  $\acute{\alpha}\rho\chi\eta\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \mu\acute{\epsilon}\tau\omicron\varsigma\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \tau\epsilon\lambda\omicron\varsigma\ \omicron\theta\epsilon\omega\varsigma\ \tau\acute{\omega}\nu\ \pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\omega\nu$ —'He is the beginning and middle and end of all things' (c. Apion. ii. 190).

On the other hand, the apologetic and eschatological literature, which Rabbinic Judaism after the rise of Christian speculation more and more excluded from canonical use, shows a marked tendency to offset these heathen demiurgic ascriptions by similar ones applied not directly to God but to a hypostatized creative Wisdom (Pr 8<sup>22-36</sup>, Wis 7<sup>21</sup> 8<sup>19-9</sup>, Sir 24<sup>23-25</sup>, Bar 3<sup>27</sup>), or to an angelic Being endowed with the same demiurgic attributes (2 Es 5<sup>2-6</sup>).

The statement of Rabbi Kohler (Jewish Encycl. i. p. 438) is therefore correct regarding the phrase in Rev 1<sup>8</sup> and 21<sup>6</sup> if not in 22<sup>13</sup>: 'This is not simply a paraphrase of Is 44<sup>6</sup> "I am the first and the last," but the Hellenized form of a well-known Rabbinical dictum, "The seal of God is Emet, which means Truth, and is derived from the letters  $\alpha\ \omega\ \epsilon$ , the first, the middle, and the last letters of the Hebrew alphabet, the beginning, the middle, and the end of all things.'" In other words, we must realize the metaphysical development of Jewish theology which had taken place between Deuterocanonical and Revelation. The passages adduced by Kohler from Joma 69b and Sanh. 64a, and in particular Jerus. Seb. xii. 13a, Gen. R. lxxxi., show the early prevalence of this interpretation of Dn 10<sup>4</sup>: 'I shall show thee what is marked upon the writing of truth ( $\omega\kappa\omega\ \alpha\omega\omega$ ), as the signum of God; for, says Simon ben Lakish, "as is the first, so the middle, and n the last letter of the alphabet." This being the name of God according to Is 44<sup>6</sup>, explained Jerus. Sanh. i. 18a, "I am the first [having had none from whom to receive the kingdom]; I am the middle, there being none who shares the kingdom with me; [and I am the last], there being none to whom I shall hand the kingdom of the world." It would seem probable, however, considering the connexion with Is 44<sup>6</sup> ("first and last," the passage is a commonplace of early Christian-Jewish polemic), that the Kabbalistic form  $\omega\kappa\omega$  is the earlier, the middle term having perhaps been inserted in opposition to Jewish angelological and Christian cosmological speculation. Cf. Rev 11<sup>7</sup> and 16<sup>7</sup> with 1<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>8</sup>; and 2 Es 6<sup>1-6</sup> (where Uriel, speaking in the name of the Creator, says, "In the beginning, when the earth was made . . . then did I design these things, and they all were through me alone, and through none other: as by me also they shall be ended, and by none other") with He 2<sup>10</sup>.

In 1 Co 8<sup>6</sup> we have a significant addition to the two-term ascription, 'One God, the Father, of ( $\epsilon\varsigma$ ) whom are all things, and we unto ( $\epsilon\iota\varsigma$ ) him.' St. Paul (or his Corinthian converts) adds, 'And one Lord Jesus Christ, through whom are all things, and we through him.' This addition marks the parting of the ways for Jewish and Christian theology, implying a mediating hypostasis identified with Christ, that is, a Wisdom-Logos doctrine. That in Rev 1<sup>8</sup> and 21<sup>6</sup> the phrase is still applied in the purely Jewish sense to God the Father alone, is placed beyond all doubt by the connected ascriptions, especially  $\delta\ \omega\kappa\omega\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \delta\ \eta\epsilon\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \delta\ \epsilon\pi\acute{\rho}\chi\omicron\mu\epsilon\tau\omicron\varsigma$  (not =  $\epsilon\sigma\theta\epsilon\mu\epsilon\tau\omicron\varsigma$ ) connecting 1<sup>8</sup> with 1<sup>4</sup>.

Why, and in what sense, the term A-Q is applied in Rev 22<sup>13</sup> by the glorified Christ to Himself, is the problem remaining; and this independently of the question of composite authorship; for to the final redactor, whose date can scarcely be later than A.D. 95, there was no incompatibility.

(c) Besides the metaphysical or cosmological development, which we have traced in connexion with the Divine title A-Q from Deutero-Isaiah through Wisdom and pseudo-Aristaeus to its bifurcation in Jewish and Christian theology contemporary with the Book of Revelation, we have a parallel development of eschatological character. Jehovah is contrasted with the gods of the heathen in Is 41<sup>23-27</sup> 42<sup>8</sup> 43<sup>10</sup> 44<sup>6-7</sup> 45<sup>1</sup> 46<sup>9-10</sup> 48<sup>5-12</sup>; also, and indeed primarily, as 'first and last' in the sense of director of all things to the fulfilment of His predeclared purpose, i.e. confirmer and fulfiller of His promise of redemption (44<sup>7</sup>). And manifestly the development of this idea of Jehovah as 'first and last' in the redemptive or soteriological sense, would be more congenial to Hebrew thought than the metaphysical, although cosmology plays a great and increasing part in apocalyptic literature. In the substitution of  $\delta \epsilon\rho\chi\theta\epsilon\upsilon\sigma$  for the anticipated  $\delta \epsilon\rho\theta\epsilon\upsilon\sigma$  in Rev 1<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>8</sup> (cf. 11<sup>17</sup> 16<sup>2</sup>) recalling Mt 11<sup>8</sup> and He 10<sup>27</sup>, we have evidence of the apocalyptic tendency to conceive of God by preference soteriologically.

But the final redemptive intervention of Jehovah is necessarily conceived as through some personal, human, or at least angelic (Mal 3<sup>1</sup>, 2 Es 5<sup>2</sup>) agency, even when creative and cosmological functions are still attributed to Jehovah directly, without any, or with no more than an impersonal, intermediate agency. Hence, while in Rev 1<sup>8</sup> as in 1<sup>8</sup> and 21<sup>8</sup> Jehovah Himself, 'the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end,' is also  $\delta \epsilon\rho\chi\theta\epsilon\upsilon\sigma$ , there is no escape for any believer in Jesus from transferring the title in this soteriological sense to Him as Messiah. This will be the case whether his cosmology requires a Logos-doctrine for demiurgic functions, as with St. Paul, the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Fourth Evangelist, or not. (The only trace of a true Logos-doctrine is the very superficial touch Rev 13<sup>12</sup>.) Thus in Rev 13<sup>12</sup> 2<sup>8</sup> the Isaian title 'the first and the last' is applied to Christ, and in 3<sup>14</sup> He is called 'the Amen . . . the beginning of the creation of God.' The titles are combined in 22<sup>13</sup>, where we should perhaps render (Benson, Apocalypse, 1900, p. 26), 'I, the Alpha and the Omega (am coming), the first and the last, the beginning and the end.' As Hengstenberg maintained (on Rev 1<sup>8</sup>), 'In this declaration the Omega is to be regarded as emphatic. It is equivalent to saying, As I am the Alpha, so am I also the Omega. The beginning is surety for the end' (cf. Ph 1<sup>9</sup>). For this reason it is perhaps also better to connect the words  $\text{N}\alpha\iota, \text{A}\mu\eta\eta\text{v}$  of 1<sup>7</sup> with v. 4. 'Verily, verily, I am the Alpha and the Omega' (Ferry, Bibl. Apocalypsis, 1908, p. 281).

The true sense, and at the same time the origin and explanation of this application of the Divine title, is to be found, as before, in the Epistles of St. Paul. In 2 Co 1<sup>20</sup> the promises of God, however many they be, are said all to have their Yea in Christ. And, because this is so, it is further declared, 'the Amen is also through him.' The conception that Christ is the Amen or fulfillment of all the promises of God, as 'heir of all things' and we 'joint heirs with him' (Ro 4<sup>13</sup> 8<sup>17</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>2</sup>, He 1<sup>3</sup>, Rev 21<sup>7</sup>), is comparatively familiar to us. It represents the significance of the term  $\Omega$  in the eschatological application. We are much less familiar with the idea expressed in the  $\text{A}$ , though it is equally well attested in primitive Christian and contemporary Jewish thought. In Pauline language it represents that the people of Messiah were 'blessed with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places in Christ, inasmuch as God chose them in his person before the foundation of the world . . . and foreordained them to be an adoption of sons, Eph 1<sup>4-5</sup>; cf. Is 44<sup>1-2</sup>, Wis 18<sup>3</sup>, He 2<sup>9-10</sup>, Rev 21<sup>7</sup>, and the doctrine of the apocalyptic writers, Jewish and Christian, that 'the world was created for the sake of man'—resp. 'Israel,' 'the righteous,' 'the Church' (As-sump. Mos. 1<sup>12-14</sup>, 2 Es 6<sup>20-22</sup> 7<sup>10-11</sup> 9<sup>12</sup>, Hermas, Vis. II, 4<sup>4</sup> etc. The doctrine rests on Gn 1<sup>26</sup>, Ps 8<sup>3-6</sup>, Ex 4<sup>22</sup> etc.). Harneck has shown (History of Dogmas, vol. I, Appendix I, 'The Conception of Pre-existence') how pre-existence is for the Jewish mind in some sense involved in that of ultimate persistence. The heir 'for whom' all things were created was in a more or less real sense (according to the disposition of the thinker) conceived as present to the mind of the Creator before all things. Thus in Rabbinic phrase, Messiah is one of the 'seven pre-existent things,' or His 'soul is laid up in Paradise before the foundation of the world.' Apocalyptic eschatology demanded a representative 'Son,' the 'Beloved,' chosen 'in the beginning' to be head of the 'Beloved' people of 'sons' in the end, with at least as much logical urgency as speculative cosmology demanded an agent of the creation itself. It is this which is meant when St. Paul says that 'however many be the promises of God, they are in Christ Yea.' This is 'the mystery which from all ages hath been hid in God who created all things . . . according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus.' In Pauline language, Christ 'the Beloved,' the 'Son of his love,' is the Yea and the Amen of the promises of God. Cosmologically, He is the pre-creative Wisdom, 'the firstborn of all creation, in whom all things were created' (cf. Rev 3<sup>14</sup>, Pr 8<sup>22</sup>). But it is not only that 'he is before all things, and in him all things consist' (cf. Sir 24<sup>8</sup>, Wis 1<sup>1</sup>), not only that 'all things have been created through him,' but also eschatologically 'unto him' (Col 1<sup>15-17</sup>; cf. He 1<sup>2-3</sup> and Wis 7<sup>22-27</sup>), logically subsequent to Him because made for His sake. In Revelation we have only the latter. The cosmological 'through' Him practically disappears. It is only in the eschatological sense that Christ becomes the original object and the ultimate fulfillment of the Divine purpose and promises, 'the Yea, the Amen,' 'the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last, the beginning and the end.'

2. The Later History.—It is doubtless from Revelation that the use of the term in Patristic literature and Christian epigraphy is mainly derived, though its popularity may well have been partly due to oral currency in Jewish-Christian circles before the publication of Revelation. The eschatological interest is still apparent in the hymn of Prudentius (Cathem, ix, 10-12), wherein the first line contains a reference to Ps 45<sup>7</sup> Vulg. ('Exultavit cor meum Verbum bonum'), treated as Messianic by the Fathers—

'Corde natus ex Parentis
Ante mundi exordium
Alpha et  $\Omega$  cognominatus
Ipse fons et celsus.
Omnium que sunt, fuerunt
Quaque post futura sunt.'

But in Clem. Alex. (Strom. iv, 25 and vi, 16) and Tertullian (de Monog. 5) the cosmological predominates. Ambrose (Expositio in VII visiones, i, 8) presents a different interpretation. In Gnostic circles speculative and cosmological interpretations are unbridled. Thus Marcus (ap. Irenaeus, Her. i, xiv, 6, xv, 1) maintained that Christ designated Himself  $\text{A}\Omega$  to set forth His own descent as the Holy Ghost on Jesus at His baptism, because by Gematria  $\text{A}\Omega (=800+1)$  and  $\pi\epsilon\alpha\rho\epsilon\rho\epsilon\pi\acute{\iota} (=80+5+100+10+200+300+5+100+1)$  are equivalent.

ALPHÆUS ( $\text{A}\lambda\phi\alpha\iota\omicron\varsigma$ ).—In the NT this name is borne by (1) the father of the Levi who is commonly identified with Matthew the Apostle (Mk 2<sup>14</sup>); (2) the father of the second James in the lists of the Apostles (Mt 10<sup>3</sup>, Mk 3<sup>18</sup>, Lk 6<sup>15</sup>, Ac 1<sup>13</sup>). The desire to connect as many of the Twelve as possible by ties of natural relationship has led some (e.g. Weiss) to identify the two. But in the lists Matthew and James are separated by Thomas in St. Mark and St. Luke; and even in St. Matthew, where one follows the other, there is no note that they were brothers, similar to that attached to the names of the sons of Zebedee.

The identification (2) with the Clopas of Jn 19<sup>25</sup> rests on two hypotheses: (a) The assumption that as a Mary is given as the mother of James, and consequently as the wife of Alphaeus, she must be the same as Mary the wife of Clopas who stood by the Cross. Jerome (de Feppet. Virg. v. 16) adopted this argument. But Mary is a name of far too common occurrence in the NT to make this theory of any value. (b) The alleged derivation of the names Alphaeus and Clopas from a common Aramaic original. But this has not been satisfactorily established; there is even a lack of agreement as to the form of the original. WH held that its initial letter would be  $\alpha$ , and print 'Αλαφος accordingly; but Edersheim quotes the Babylonian Talmud to show that the letter would be  $\kappa$ . Jerome, although predisposed by his view of the Brethren of the Lord in favour of finding the same man under both names, rejects the linguistic identification; and the Syriac versions also represent them by different words. Delitzsch held Alphaeus to be a Grecized form of an Aramaic word, but Clopas and Cleopatra to be abbreviations of a Greek name Cleopatros (against this see Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr. p. 315 n.).

Nothing is known of either Alphaeus beyond the name; for such details as that (2) was the brother of Joseph, the reputed father of the Lord, stand or fall with his identification with Clopas to whom they really belong. See art. CLOPAS, below.

ALTAR (θυσιαστήριον, a word of Hellenistic usage, applied to Jewish altars as distinguished from βωμῆς, the ordinary word for heathen altars [cf. Ex 34<sup>2</sup>, Nu 23<sup>1</sup>, Dt 7<sup>5</sup>, Ac 17<sup>21</sup>]).—The raised structure on which sacrifices and oblations were presented. As used in the Jewish ritual, the word was applied not only to the great altar of burnt-offering before the temple, but also to the altar of incense within the holy place, and on one or two occasions even to the table of shewbread (cf. Mal 1<sup>7, 13</sup>, Ezk 41<sup>22</sup>). When no further specification was added, it denoted the altar of burnt-offering, the altar κατ' ἐξοχήν.

The Jewish altar of Christ's day was the last term of a long development, the history of which remains still in many points obscure. In the primitive Semitic worship it seems that no altar, properly speaking, was in use; unless we choose to give that name to the sacred stone or pillar beside which the victim was slain, and on which the blood or fat of the sacrifice was smeared (cf. 1 S 14<sup>23</sup> 6<sup>14-15</sup>, 1 K 1<sup>7</sup>). In such cases the victims were slain (or slain and burnt), not on the sacred stone, but beside it. No doubt the significant part of the offering lay in the smearing of the stone, which was more or less identified with the Deity (Gn 28<sup>10-22</sup>), and might thus be considered as both altar and temple. Later the burning of the victim came to be an integral part of the ceremony, and the hearth of burning acquired more importance. The hearth was originally the bare ground, or a rock (Jg 6<sup>20</sup> 19<sup>13, 20</sup>), but later it was artificially formed. In the earliest law (Ex 20<sup>24-26</sup>) it was prescribed that the altar should be of earth, or of unhewn stone, and be made without steps, evidently a reversion to a simpler custom than prevailed in many of the Canaanite altars, or in the altars of the high places. That the stone was not to be hewn may also be connected with the primitive idea that the deity which inhabited the stone might be offended or injured by the dressing. These regulations were respected in a modified degree in the building of the altars of the temple at Jerusalem. The altar built by Ahaz, on an Assyrian model, was probably designed in total disregard of the early prescriptions; but the later altars endeavoured to conform somewhat to the original ideal. Thus the altars of the second temple—both that of Zerubbabel and that built by Judas Maccabeus—were built of unhewn stone. In all probability there were steps up to the altar of the first temple* (cf. the altar of Ezekiel's vision [43<sup>17</sup>], which had steps on the eastern side); but the altars of the second temple were ascended by means of a gradual acclivity.

The altar of Herod's temple, though larger than all former altars, preserved their main characteristics. It stood in front of the temple, in the innermost court. It was built of unhewn stone; no iron tool was used in its construction. In this the letter of the law in Exodus was adhered to, while its evident intention was evaded. A new interpretation of the law against the use of hewn stone was given by Jewish tradition in the words of Johanan ben Zakkai: 'The altar is a means of establishing peace between the people of Israel and their Father in heaven; therefore iron, which is used as an instrument of murder, should not be swung over it.' The altar was of huge dimensions. According to Josephus (BJ v. v. 6) it was 15 cubits high and 50 cubits square at the base; according to the more reliable tradition of the Mishna, which enters into precise details, it was 32 cubits square at the base and correspondingly less in height.† Like the earlier altars, it rose up in a series of terraces or stages, contracting at regular intervals. (The first landing was a cubit from the ground, and a cubit in breadth; while 5 cubits higher came a second landing). The hearth on the top still measured 24 cubits in length and breadth. The altar-hearth was made accessible to the ministering priests by a structure on the south side, built in the form of a very gradual acclivity, and making a pathway 32 cubits long by 16 broad. Beside this main ascent were small stairs to the several stages of the altar. Round the middle of the entire altar ran a red line as an indication to the priest when he sprinkled with blood the upper and lower parts of the altar. At the south-west corners of the hearth and of the altar's base were openings to carry off the wine of the drink-offerings or the blood sprinkled on the side of the altar. These openings led into a subterranean canal which connected with the Kidron. At the corners of the altar-hearth were projections, called horns. The supposition that these were a survival of the time when the victims were slain as well as burnt on the altar, and required to be bound upon the hearth, has at least the recommendation of simplicity; but it scarcely explains the peculiar sacredness attached to the altar-horns, or the important part they had in the ritual (1 K 14<sup>22</sup>, Lv 8<sup>15</sup> 9<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>18</sup>; in certain cases they were sprinkled with blood, Ex 29<sup>12</sup>, Lv 4<sup>7</sup>). The explanation given by Stade and others connects them with the worship of Jahweh as symbolized by a young bull. Northward from the altar was the place of slaughtering, with rings fastened in the ground, to which the animals were tied; it was provided also with pillars and tables for purposes of hanging, flaying, and washing. The temple, together with the altar and the place of slaughter, were separated from the rest of the inner court by a wall of partition, a cubit high, to mark off the part reserved for the priests from that free to Israelites generally.

* i.e. the altar of Ahaz. For the 'brazen altar' of Solomon see the daring hypothesis of W. R. Smith (RS, note L), and A. B. S. Kennedy's note in Hastings' DB i. 729.

† The dimensions given by pseudo-Hecataeus (Jos. c. Apion, i. 22)—30 cubits square and 10 cubits high—are not admissible here; they refer to an altar of the second temple. The altar of Ezekiel's vision was 18 cubits square at the base and 11 cubits high. The altar of Solomon, according to 2 Ch 4<sup>1</sup>, was 20 cubits square at the base and 10 high; dimensions perhaps taken, by the author who inserted them, from the altar of the second temple, with which he was acquainted.

On this great altar the fire was kept burning night and day; it was the centre of the Jewish ritual. On it, morning and evening, was offered the daily burnt-offering in the name of the people, accompanied with meal-offerings and drink-offerings. On the Sabbaths and during the festival days, the public offerings were greatly augmented. Still more vast was the number of private sacrifices which were offered day by day; and on the festival days, when Jerusalem was crowded with worshippers, thousands of priests officiated, and the great altar was scarcely sufficient to burn the masses of flesh that were heaped continuously upon it.

The altar of incense, or the golden altar, stood within the Holy Place. It was of very modest dimensions, and was used chiefly for the offering of incense, which took place twice daily, in the morning before the burnt-offering, and in the evening after it.

Besides an incidental mention of the altar (Mt 23<sup>35</sup>, Lk 11<sup>15</sup>), there are two pregnant sayings of Christ in the Gospels where the altar is concerned. In the first (Mt 5<sup>23-24</sup>) He opposes to the mere externalism of the altar-worship the higher claims of brotherhood, teaching that what God requires is mercy and not sacrifice. In the other (Mt 23<sup>19-20</sup>) He exposes the puerility of the distinction made, in swearing, between the altar and the gift upon it. It was by such miserable casuistry that the scribes and Pharisees evaded the most solemnly assumed obligations.

J. DICK FLEMING.

AMAZEMENT.—The interest of this word to students of the Gospels is twofold, and arises out of its employment, on the one hand, as one of the terms used to express the effect upon the people of our Lord's supernatural manifestation, and on the other, in one unique instance, to describe an emotion which tore the heart of the God-man Himself.

The nominal form, 'amazement,' is of rare occurrence in EV (only Ac 3<sup>10</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>8</sup> [for επληροσθη] in AV; Mk 6<sup>42</sup>, Lk 4<sup>26</sup> 5<sup>26</sup>, Ac 3<sup>10</sup> in RV); the passive verb, 'to be amazed,' occurs not infrequently in the narrative books of NT (rarely in CV, e.g. Ex 15<sup>14</sup>). They are especially characteristic of the Synoptic Gospels, and are currently employed in their narratives, along with several kindred terms, to describe the impression made by our Lord's wonderful teaching and His miraculous works. In the AV they translate in these narratives a number of Gr. words: θαυμάσιος, θαυμάσιον, θαυμάσιον; ἐσθάρη; ἐσθάρη; ἐσθάρη. But the RV, studying greater uniformity of rendering, omits θαυμάσιος from this list, and makes 'amazement,' 'to be amazed,' the stated representatives of the other two groups (exceptions are: Mk 16<sup>8</sup> where ἐσθάρη is rendered 'astonishment'; Ac 3<sup>10</sup> where θαυμάσιος, θαυμάσιον are represented by 'wonder'; passages like Mk 5<sup>20</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>, and again Ac 10<sup>33</sup> 11<sup>18</sup> 23<sup>17</sup> are, of course, not in question). To ἐσθάρη it uniformly assigns 'astonishment,' 'astonishment'; and to the accompanying terms of kindred implications similarly appropriate renderings: to θαυμάσιος (θαυμάσιον, Mk 12<sup>17</sup>) generally 'to marvel' (but 'to wonder,' Mt 15<sup>31</sup>, Lk 9<sup>42</sup> 22 24 41, also Ac 7<sup>23</sup>), and to θαυμάσιον (εἶδος Mt 14<sup>5</sup>, Mk 4<sup>4</sup>, Lk 5<sup>26</sup> 7<sup>37</sup>; cf. κατάλαβον Mt 14<sup>5</sup>, Mk 6<sup>5</sup>, εὐφραν Mk 16<sup>8</sup>, εὐφραν Mk 6<sup>5</sup>, Lk 8<sup>17</sup>) 'to be afraid,' varied to 'to fear.' The constant recurrence in the Synoptic narrative of one or another of these terms as a comment upon the effect of our Lord's teaching or works, imparts to the reader a vivid sense of the supernaturalness of His manifestation and of the deep impression which it made as such on the people.

Sometimes it appears to have been the demeanor or bearing of our Lord which awoke wonder or struck with awe (Mt 27<sup>14</sup> || Mk 15<sup>5</sup>, Mk 9<sup>15</sup> 10<sup>32</sup>; cf. Lk 24<sup>6</sup>). Sometimes the emotion was aroused rather by the tone of His teaching, as, with His great 'I say unto you' He 'taught them as having authority, and not as the scribes' (Mk 12<sup>1</sup> || Lk 4<sup>2</sup> || Mt 7<sup>29</sup>; cf. Mk 11<sup>18</sup>, Mt 22<sup>33</sup>). At other times it was more distinctly what He said, the matter of His discourse, that excited the emotions in question—its unanticipated literalness, or its unanticipated judiciousness, wisdom, graciousness, or the radical paradox of its announcements (Lk 2<sup>7-8</sup> 4<sup>2</sup>; Mt 13<sup>34</sup> || Mk 6<sup>7</sup>; Jn 7<sup>15</sup>; Mt 19<sup>28</sup> || Mk 10<sup>2</sup>; Mt 22<sup>2</sup> || Mk 12<sup>1</sup>, Lk 20<sup>9</sup>). Most commonly, however, it was one of His wonderful works which brought to the spectators the dread sense of the presence of the supernatural (Lk 5<sup>9</sup>; Mk 12<sup>7</sup> || Lk 4<sup>20</sup>; Mk 2<sup>12</sup> || Lk 5<sup>26</sup>, Mt 9<sup>8</sup>; Lk 7<sup>18</sup> 11<sup>14</sup> || Mt 12<sup>22</sup>; Mt 8<sup>7</sup> || Mk 4<sup>41</sup>, Lk 8<sup>26</sup>; Mk 5<sup>15</sup> || Lk 8<sup>26</sup>; Mk 5<sup>20</sup>, 23, 42 || Lk 8<sup>26</sup>; Mt 9<sup>33</sup>; Mk 6<sup>5</sup>; Jn 6<sup>10</sup> || Mt 14<sup>20</sup>; Mk 7<sup>37</sup>; Lk 9<sup>41</sup>; Mt 21<sup>20</sup>), and filled the country with wonder (Mt 15<sup>21</sup>).

The circle affected, naturally, varies from a single individual (Mk 5<sup>8</sup>), or the few who happened to be concerned (Lk 2<sup>8</sup> 5<sup>9</sup>), or the body of His immediate followers (Mt 17<sup>8</sup>, Mk 10<sup>34</sup>, 26, Mt 19<sup>35</sup> 21<sup>20</sup>), up to a smaller or larger assemblage of spectators (Lk 2<sup>7</sup> 4<sup>2</sup>; Mk 12<sup>1</sup> || Lk 4<sup>20</sup>; Mk 12<sup>1</sup> || Lk 4<sup>20</sup>; Mk 2<sup>12</sup>, Lk 7<sup>18</sup> 8<sup>26</sup>; Mk 5<sup>15</sup>; Mk 13<sup>18</sup>, Mt 6<sup>3</sup>; Jn 6<sup>10</sup> || Mt 14<sup>20</sup>, Mk 6<sup>20</sup>, Mk 7<sup>37</sup>, Lk 9<sup>41</sup>, Mk 16<sup>8</sup>, Mt 22<sup>2</sup> || Mk 12<sup>1</sup>, Lk 20<sup>9</sup>). These spectators are often expressly declared to have been numerous: they are described as 'the multitudes' or 'all the multitudes,' 'all the people of the country,' or quite generally, when not a single occasion but a summary of many is in question, 'great multitudes' (Mt 9<sup>8</sup> || Lk 5<sup>9</sup>, Mt 7<sup>29</sup> 12<sup>2</sup>, Lk 11<sup>14</sup>; 8<sup>26</sup> || Mk 5<sup>15</sup>, Mk 8<sup>20</sup>; Mt 9<sup>33</sup> 15<sup>21</sup>, Mk 9<sup>15</sup>, Jn 7<sup>15</sup>, Mk 11<sup>18</sup>, Mt 22<sup>3</sup>).

The several terms employed by the Evangelists to describe the impression on the people of these supernatural manifestations, express the feelings natural to man in the presence of the supernatural. In their sum they leave on the reader's mind a very complete sense of the reality and depth of the impression made. Their detailed synonymy is not always, however, perfectly clear. The student will find discriminating discussions of the two groups of terms which centre respectively around the notions of 'wonder' and 'fear' in J. H. Heinrich Schmidt's well-known Synonymik der griechischen Synoptik, at Nos. 168 and 159. It will probably suffice here to indicate very briefly the fundamental implication of each term in its present application.

θαυμάσιος is a broad term, primarily expressing the complete engagement of the mind with an object which seizes so powerfully upon the attention as to compel exclusive occupation with it. It is ordinarily used in a good sense, and readily takes on the implication of 'admiration'; but it often occurs also when the object contemplated arouses internal opposition and displeasure. What it always implies is that its object is remarkable, extraordinary, beyond not so much expectation as ready comprehension, and therefore irresistibly engages attention and awakens 'wonder.' It does not import 'surprise,' but rather, if you will, 'curiosity' or better, 'interestedness.' In this it separates itself from ἐσθάρη, in which the notion of 'unexpectedness' is, at least originally, inherent.

This latter term gives expression to the sense of mental helplessness which oppresses us on the occurrence of an unanticipated and astonishing phenomenon. The affection of the mind it suggests is one of mingled admiration and fear; and in the usage of the word this passes both downward into 'consternation,' strengthened to 'fright' and 'terror,' and upward into 'awe' and 'veneration.' In the LXX the lower senses are predominant (e.g. Sir 12<sup>2</sup>, Ca 28 69 [4] 91<sup>0</sup>, Ezk 7<sup>18</sup>; 1 K 14<sup>15</sup>, 2 S 7<sup>15</sup>, Wis 17, Dn 9<sup>17</sup>, 19; 1 Mac 6<sup>9</sup>, Dn 7<sup>17</sup>, Sir 30<sup>9</sup>). In the Evangelical passages now before us, on the other hand, the higher senses come forward, and the idea expressed lies near to 'awe,' and the term comes thus into close synonymy with εὐφραν.

The notion of 'surprise' which underlies θαυμάσιος seems to be much more prominent in ἐσθάρη. This term, broad enough to be applied to any 'dismagement,' bodily or mental, was particularly employed, with or without a defining adjunct, to describe that aberration of the mind, the subjects of which in English too we speak of simply as 'demented' (2 Co 6:11). In its more ordinary usage the implication is no more than that the subject is thrown out of his normal state into a condition of 'ecstasy,' or extreme emotion,—the emotion in question being of varied kind, but more commonly an 'amazement' which carries with it at least a suggestion of perplexity, if not of bewilderment.

When this 'surprise' rises to its height, however, especially if it is informed with alarm, the appropriate term to express it would seem to be ἰσχυρὸς ἐκπληξίς, although this term is used so frequently for purely intellectual effects arising from intellectual causes, that it falls readily into the sense of pure 'astonishment.' Nevertheless, the element of 'alarm' inherent in it places it among the synonyms of ἐκπληξίς, from which it differs as a sudden access of fright differs from an abiding state of fear, or as, in conceptions like those at present engaging our attention, to be 'awestruck' differs from the continuous sense of 'awful reverence' which prompts to withdrawal from the dread presence.

The same fundamental emotion of fear which finds its most natural expression in ἐκπληξίς is more rarely given expression also in such terms as ἐκπληξίς, the basal implication of which is 'agitation,' 'perturbation,' passing on into the 'disquietude,' on the one side, of that 'troubled worry' the extreme of which is expressed by ἀδυναμία, and on the other into that terrified 'contemneration' which finds its extreme expression in ἐπιτίμησις (Lk 24:7); or as ἐπιτίμησις, which in its application to the trembling of the mind—to mental 'shivering'—draws near to the notions of 'anxiety' and 'horror.'

The emotions signalized as called out by the manifestation of Jesus in His word and work, it will be seen, run through the whole gamut of the appropriate responses of the human spirit in the presence of the supernatural. Men, seeing and hearing Him, wondered, were awestruck, amazed, astonished, made afraid, with a fear which disquieted their minds and exhibited itself in bodily trembling. The confusion by RV under the common rendering 'amaze,' 'amazement' of two of these groups of terms (θαμβος, θαμβέσθαι, ἐκθαβεῖν, ἐκθαμβέσθαι, and ἐκστασις, ἐκστασιμαί), seems scarcely to do justice to the distinctive implications of either, and especially fails to mark the clear note of the higher implication of 'awe' that sounds in the former. The interest of noting how completely the notion of 'surprise,' originally present in θαμβος, has in usage retired into the background in favour of deeper conceptions, is greatly increased by the employment of the strengthened form of the verb ἐκθαμβέσθαι by St. Mark (14:8) to describe an element in our Lord's agony in Gethsemane.

When St. Matthew (26:37) tells us that Jesus 'began to be sorrowful (λυπεῖσθαι) and sore troubled' (ἀδύνατον), St. Mark, varying the phraseology, says (in the RV) that He 'began to be greatly amazed (ἐκθαμβέσθαι) and sore troubled' (14:33). Surely the rendering 'amazed,' however, misses the mark here: the note of the word, as a parallel to ἀδύνατον and λυπεῖσθαι, is certainly that of anguish not of unexpectedness, and the commentators appear, therefore, to err when they lay stress on the latter idea. The usage in the LXX, both of the word itself (Sir 30<sup>7</sup>, where also, oddly enough, it is paralleled with λυπέω) and of its cognates, seems decisively to suggest a sense for it which will emphasize not the unexpectedness of our Lord's experience, but its dreadfulness, and will attribute to our Saviour on this awful occasion, therefore, not 'surprise,' but 'anguish and dread,' 'depression and alarm' (J. A. Alexander), or even 'inconceivable awe' (Swete).

The difficulty of the passage, let it be remarked, is not a dogmatic, but an exegetical one. There is no reason why we should not attribute to the human soul of the Lord all the emotions which are capable of working in the depths of a sinless human spirit (cf. J. A. Alexander's excellent note on Mt 8:10 and Swete's on Mt 6). But certainly the employment of the verb ἐκθαμβέσθαι here by St. Mark affords no warrant for thinking of the agony of Gethsemane as if it exceeded the expectation of our Lord, and as if it consisted in large part of the surprise and perplexity incident upon discovering it to be worse than He had anticipated (cf. the otherwise admirable note of Dr. Swete, in loc.—'long as He had foreseen the Passion, when it came clearly into view its terrors exceeded His anticipations'; A. J. Mason, The Conditions of our Lord's Life on Earth, pp. 128-128—when the hour came, it exceeded all His expectations'). On the contrary, the usage of the word combines with the context here to suggest that its whole force is absorbed in indicating the depths of soul-agony through which our Lord was called upon to pass in this mysterious experience. On the terms employed, the note of Pearson, On the Creed, ed. 1835, p. 281; ed. New York, 1847, pp. 288-288, is still worth consulting.

In studying the emotional life of our Lord's human spirit during His life on earth, as it is exhibited to us in the Gospel narratives, nothing in point of fact is more striking than the richness of the vocabulary by means of which He is pictured to us as the 'man of sorrows and acquainted with grief,' and the slenderness of the suggestion that He may have been subject to the surprises which constitute so large an element in the lives of mere men. So far as the explicit assertions of the Evangelic narratives go, it would seem that the unexpected never happened to Jesus. Neither surprise, nor astonishment, nor amazement, nor suspense, nor embarrassment, nor perplexity, nor distraction, is ever, in so many words, attributed to Him. Those who would discover in the narratives, nevertheless, some ground for supposing that He may have experienced these emotions (e.g. A. J. Mason, The Conditions of our Lord's Life on Earth, pp. 128-128; A. Adamson, Studies of the Mind in Christ, pp. 11, 12, 167; and in its extremity, E. A. Abbou, Philomythos, on which see Southern Presbyterian Review, Oct. 1884, 'Some Recent Apocryphal Gospels,' p. 733 ff.), must needs depend on an inferential method, the inconclusiveness of which has been repeatedly pointed out of old, as, for example, by Augustine (e.g. Enchiridion, xlii, 13), who remarks upon its equal applicability to the anthropomorphism of the OT.

'Wonder' (AV; RV 'marvelling'), to be sure, is attributed to Jesus on two occasions (Mt 8:10; Lk 9:46). But the term used (θαυμάζω) is on both occasions precisely that one which least of all implies 'surprise,' which declares its object rather extraordinary than unexpected. 'θαυμάζω,' remarks Schmidt (op. cit. p. 184), 'is perfectly generally "to wonder" or "to admire," and is distinguished from θαυμάζω precisely as the German sich wundern or bewundern is from staunen; that is, what has specially seized on us is in the case of θαυμάζω the extraordinary nature of the object, while in the case of θαυμάζω it is the unexpectedness and suddenness of the occurrence.' All that needs to be supported by these passages is that the circumstances adverted to were in themselves remarkable; and that Jesus recognized, felt, and remarked upon their remarkableness,—in the one instance with the implication of admiration, in the other with that of reprobation. That the circumstances which called out His sense of the incongruity in the situations He remarks upon were unanticipated by our Lord, and therefore when observed struck Him with a shock of surprise, we are not told. BENJAMIN B. WARFIELD.

AMBASSAGE.—This term is used in Lk 14:12 (AV and RV) and in RV of Lk 19:14 (more accurately instead of AV 'message'). The Greek is πρεσβεία. Both in the original and the translation the abstract is used for the concrete; a term meaning the office or message of an ambassador or body of ambassadors for the ambassadors themselves.

The formation of the word is not fully explained. The earlier form both in English and French was ambassade. The French suffix -age (= Lat. -aticum) is usually found in words transferred from France, but sometimes it was added to English words. Ambassage seems to be an exception to both. It may be either a formation from a French root or a softening of ambassade by the influence of analogy. The word was accented by some on the first syllable, by others on the second. An alternative spelling was embassage. Both forms are obsolete, being supplanted by ambassy, the direct equivalent of ambassade.

In Lk 14:12 Jesus is speaking of discipleship and the necessary condition of entire surrender to spiritual authority. And He gives in illustration the parable which teaches the folly of entering on an enterprise without counting the cost. A prince who has provoked to war a superior power will do well to send an embassy to sue for peace—peace without honour. The man whose force of character is not able to withstand and overcome the worldly obstacles, must in some form or other make compromise with the worldly powers. He is not fit for the kingdom of God. (For other interpretations see Trench and the Commentators).

The second occurrence (Lk 19:14) is in the parable of the Pounds; not in the main part, which bears resemblance to the parable of the Talents, but in one of two verses (vv. 14, 27) directed to a subsidiary aspect of the situation. While the servants of the distant dignitary are, in his absence, carrying out instructions and using opportunities, a section of his subjects resolve to cast off his authority. To this effect they send an embassy. When he returns he rewards the faithful and executes punishment on the disloyal. The application is to the Second Coming of the Lord.

The term πρεβεία (from πρεβύς, 'old') belongs to classical Greek, and it contains an expression of the rule that responsible duties of statecraft are naturally entrusted to approved elders and heads of families. St. Paul uses the corresponding verb in 2 Co 5<sup>20</sup>, where he describes the Christian preachers as 'ambassadors for Christ,' and in Eph 6<sup>23</sup> the idea is repeated. Perhaps we may connect the occurrence of πρεβεία in the Third Gospel with St. Luke's apparent preference of 'presbyter' to 'bishop' (Ac 20<sup>17</sup>), and his repeated use of presbyterion for the body of Jewish elders (Lk 22<sup>26</sup>, Ac 4<sup>8</sup> 22<sup>25</sup>). For the terms are expressive of dignity, and in St. Luke's literary style a sense of dignity is clearly shown.

It is further notable that commentators are able to refer the suggestion of both these parables to contemporary history. The former corresponds with the struggle between Antipas and his father-in-law, Hareth, king of Arabia; the latter is illustrated by Herod, by Archelaus, and by Antipas, each of whom went to Rome to obtain an enhancement of power. But details apply to the case of Archelaus, who put his friends in command of cities, and against whom the Jews sent to the emperor an embassy of fifty men (Jos. Ant. XVII. xi. 1).

AMBITION.—The word 'ambition' is not found in the AV or RV, but the propensity signified is, of course, represented in the New Testament. Its derivation is Latin ambī, 'about,' and ire, 'to go,' meaning a going about in all directions, especially with a view to collecting votes. It thus means to have such a desire as to make one go out of one's way to satisfy it, and, in a secondary sense, denotes the object which arouses such desire and effort. As a psychological fact, Ambition may be defined as a natural spring of action which makes for the increment of life. Ethically speaking, it takes its colour from the object towards which it is directed. In ordinary use it implies blame; but in true Christianity, where the utmost is given for the highest, it is otherwise.

In the Epistles the verbs διώκω, σπουδάζω, ζητέω are used figuratively for this propensity (Ph 3<sup>12</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>12</sup>, Ro 10<sup>3</sup>); but perhaps a nearer synonym is ζηλώω with its corresponding substantive ζήλος (as in 1 Co 14<sup>1-12</sup>, cf. Weymouth's NT in Modern Speech), though ζήλος in a good sense is generally translated 'zeal,' and in a bad sense 'jealousy,' both words being of rather broader significance than 'ambition.'

It is in accordance with the literary characteristics of the Gospel narratives that such an abstract idea as ambition can be found only under some picturesque phrase, e.g. 'lamp of the body' (Mt 6<sup>22-23</sup>), 'food' (Jn 4<sup>24</sup>). 'To cut off the right hand' or 'to pluck out the right eye' is the expression used by our Lord for destroying one's dearest ambition, whether it is controlling one's energies or directing one's imagination (Mk 9<sup>43</sup>, cf., as Trench points out, the use of ἀφθαλμὸς πονηρὸς [Mt 6<sup>23</sup>, Mk 7<sup>22</sup>] for 'envy').

But although there is no explicit reference to Ambition in the NT, it is so characteristic a fact of human nature that a large part of the teaching of Christ might be exhibited in relation to it. And because it is capable of being bent towards lofty as well as sinister, or at least selfish ends, Christian ethics seems from one point of view to be the exaltation of Ambition, from another its deposition.

1. For Ambition.—Christ's method was to use the fact of Ambition and purify it by exercising it on the highest objective. The call to the first disciples was an appeal to their ambition for a higher life: 'Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men' (Mt 4<sup>19</sup>). He gave primacy to an ambition for the ends of the Kingdom over all worldly ambitions in the words: 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness' (Mt 6<sup>33</sup>). He compared the earnestness of true followers with the ambition of a pearl-merchant (Mt 13<sup>45</sup>), and encouraged the religious ambition of the young ruler by trying to turn it into a new and deeper channel (Mt 19<sup>21</sup>): 'If thou wouldst be perfect, sell . . . give . . . and thou shalt have treasure in heaven.' It was part of His teaching to set before His disciples a prize to aim at (Lk 22<sup>28-30</sup>, Mt 5<sup>12-14</sup>, Jn 12<sup>25</sup>); and He expected them to go out of their way in devotion, and to all lengths in fidelity (Lk 9<sup>24</sup> 14<sup>26-27</sup>, Mt 25<sup>14-29</sup>), in order to win the truest praise and most lasting success. 'The Christian moral reformation indeed be summed up in this—humanity changed from a restraint to a motive' (Ecco Homo).

2. Against Ambition.—But it may with equal truth be said that the aim of the life and teaching of Christ was to depose Ambition from its ruling place. He was always rebuking (1) inordinate desires for any kind of selfish satisfaction, whether they were associated with greed (Jn 6<sup>27</sup> 'food that perisheth'; Lk 6<sup>24</sup>, and esp. 12<sup>15-21</sup>) or with pride (Mt 6<sup>1-4</sup> 'glory of men,' 23<sup>23-28</sup> 'lord it,' 23<sup>28-32</sup> 'seen of men and called Rabbi'); or (2) even a high-placed desire if it was held thoughtlessly and without counting the cost (Lk 14<sup>28-33</sup> the builder and the king who failed in their ambition; Mk 10<sup>34-45</sup> the sons of Zebedee who 'knew not what they asked'). Moreover, Christ cut away the very tap-root of Ambition by turning self out of its place at the seat of the motives of life, in favour of a living trust in the Father and an undivided allegiance to Himself. The virtues which are most prominent in the Christian ideal leave no room at all for Ambition in the generally accepted use of the word. For Christianity demands humility (Mt 5<sup>3</sup> etc., Lk 14<sup>7-11</sup> etc., Jn 13<sup>12-15</sup>), generosity (Mk 12<sup>42-44</sup>, Lk 6<sup>30-31</sup> 12<sup>33</sup> etc.), and self-renouncement (Mt 10<sup>38-39</sup>, Mk 10<sup>30-32</sup>, Jn 12<sup>24-26</sup>).

On the whole, the influence of Christ's teaching and inspiration on Ambition has been not to extirpate it, but to control and chasten it by the discovery and establishment of other standpoints, such as the outlook of other-worldliness, the sense of brotherhood, and personal allegiance to Himself.

A. NORMAN ROWLAND.

AMEN.—Like the Greek ἀμήν, this is practically a transliteration of the Heb. אָמֵן, which itself is a verbal adjective connected with a root signifying to make firm, establish. In the last instance, and as we are concerned with it, it is an indeclinable participle. Barth treats it as originally a substantive (= 'firmness,' 'certainty'). For the derivation, cf. our Eng. 'yes,' 'yea,' which is also connected with an old verbal root of similar significance.

As a formula of solemn confirmation, asseveration and assent, it was established in old and familiar usage amongst the Jews in the time of our Lord. Its function is especially associated with worship, prayer, the expression of will and desire, the enunciation of weighty judgments and truths. Four modes in which Amen is used may be distinguished—(1) Initial, when it lends weight to the utterance following. (2) Final, when used by the speaker himself in solemn confirmation of what precedes. (3) Responsive, when used to express assent to the utterance of another, as in prayers, benedictions, oaths, etc. (4) Subscriptional, when used to mark the close of a writing, but hardly amounting to much more than a peculiar variant of 'Finitis.'

The subscriptional Amen requires but a brief notice. No instance of it is found in the OT; and as regards the closing Amen in the several Scriptures of the NT there is for the most part a lack of textual authority. The AV, following the TR, in most instances has it; the RV in most instances omits it. Where it is found, in the Epistles and the Apocalypse, it is rather due to the fact that these writings close with a doxology, prayer, or benediction. The variations of authority in such cases seem to a large extent capricious; else why, e.g., Amen at the end of 1 Corinthians and not at the end of 2 Corinthians? The closing Amen in each of the Gospels, though without authority, is a genuine instance of the subscriptional use of later times. This use has a further curious illustration in the practice of copyists of MSS who wrote 99 at the end of their work, this being the total numerical value of the characters in ἀμήν. For the purposes of the present article it will be necessary to examine the whole Biblical usage of 'Amen.'

1. Amen in the OT.—The formula is found in (a) the Pentateuch (Nu 22, Dt 27 passim) as a ritual injunction (LXX ῥεσπορο throughout). (b) In 1 K 18, 1 Ch 16, Neh 6, Jer 11, 28 it is mentioned as being actually used (LXX in 1 K 18 ῥεσπορο αὐτως, Jer 28 ἀληθῶς, elsewhere ἀμήν). (c) In the Psalms (41, 72, 89, 106) ῥεσπορο was meet with its liturgical use (LXX ῥεσπορο). The most common equivalent for Amen in the LXX is ῥεσπορο; and with this may be compared St. Paul's familiar μή ῥεσπορο, the negative formula of dissent and deprecation.

No clear instance of the use of an initial Amen occurs. Hogg thinks we have such in 1 K 18, Jer 11 and 28; but in each of these cases it will be found that the Amen is a responsive assent to something that precedes. It is true that the LXX rendering in Jer 28 (ἀληθῶς) shows that the translators were inclined to regard this as an instance of an initial Amen; but even here the term is really an ironical response to the false prophecy of Hananiah in vv. 2-4. Almost all the instances, indeed, in which Amen is met with in the OT are examples of the responsive use; the only considerable instances of the final use being found at the end of each of the first three divisions of the Psalter. In the Apocrypha we have further instances of the responsive Amen in To 8 and in Jth 13 and 15 (EV in the latter book renders 'So be it'). The doubled formula ('Amen, Amen,' cf. Jth 13) thus used is naturally explained as an expression of earnestness. It may here be added that among the Jews at a much later period Amen has a responsive and desiderative use in connexion with every kind of expression of desire and felicitation; e.g. 'May he live to see good days: Amen.'

2. Amen in the Gospels.—We must set aside the instances of subscriptional Amen (see above) as without authority. In Mt 6 some ancient authorities support the conclusion of the Lord's Prayer with doxology and Amen; but it can hardly be doubted that Amen here, along with the doxology which it closes, is not original, but due to liturgical use (see 'Notes on Select Readings' in Westcott-Hort's NT in Greek, ad loc.). In all the other instances in the Gospels it is the initial Amen that is found, given always and only as a usus loquendi of Christ in the formula, ἀμήν λέγω ὑμῖν (οὖν), according to the Synoptists, and ἀμήν ἀμήν λέγω ὑμῖν (οὖν), according to St. John.

Now, whilst final Amen as a formula of conclusion or response remains unaltered throughout in NT in the various versions, it is of interest to notice the different ways in which this initial Amen is treated. The Vulgate, e.g., invariably keeps the untranslated form, and reads Amen (or Amen, Amen dico vobis). The modern Greek equivalent is ἀληθῶς (ἀληθῶς ἀληθῶς); and with this accords our EV 'Verily,' and also Luther's Wahrlich. And, indeed, among the Synoptists themselves there are indications that an initial Amen has sometimes been replaced by another term. This is specially so in the case of St. Luke, who has only 5 instances of ἀμήν as against 30 in St. Matthew, and 13 in St. Mark. We have, e.g., ῥαί in Lk 11 for ἀμήν in the parallel Mt 23; ἀληθῶς in Lk 9 (cf. Mt 16, Mk 9). All this goes to show that this use of Amen on the part of Jesus was quite a peculiarity.

The very λέγω ὑμῖν alone would have been noticeable as a mode of assertion: the addition of ἀμήν does but intensify this characteristic, as an enforcement and corroboration of the utterances that are thus prefaced. The Heb. יְשׁ, which in our Lord's time was usual only in responses, thus appears to have been taken by Him as an expedient for confirming His own statement, 'in the same way as if it were an oath or a blessing.' Formulas of protestation and affirmation involving an oath were in use among Rabbinical teachers to enforce teachings and sayings, and with these the mode of Jesus invites comparison and contrast.

The attempt of Delitzsch to explain this Amen (particularly in the double form) through the Aramaic אָמֵן 'I say,' cannot be sustained. Janaris, again (Revue Theol., Sept. 1866, p. 564), has ventured the suggestion that ἀμήν thus used is a corruption of ἡ μὴ (ὡ μὴ); but interesting and ingenious as this may be, it lacks confirmation, and amongst the instances of the use of ἡ μὴ which he adduces from the LXX, the papyri, etc., not one suits the case here by showing any such construction as ἡ μὴ λέγω ὑμῖν in use.

A parallel between Amen and our 'Yes' has been already suggested: and in the NT we similarly find ἀμήν and ῥαί closely associated (2 Co 1, Rev 1), whilst we have before noticed how in St. Luke ῥαί is found as a substitute for ἀμήν. It may not therefore be out of place here to suggest that we have an illustration and analogy as regards the use of an initial Amen in the use of an introductory 'Yes' sometimes found in English (see, e.g., Shakespeare, 2 Hen. IV. I. iii. 36; Pope, Moral Essays, i. 1).

The double Amen, which occurs 25 times in St. John, and is peculiar to that Gospel, has provoked much curiosity as to how it is to be explained. If Jesus used as a formula in teaching now ἀμήν λέγω ὑμῖν and again ἀμήν ἀμήν λέγω ὑμῖν, it is very strange that the Synoptists should invariably represent Him as using the former, and the Fourth Gospel invariably as using the latter. Why not instances of both promiscuously through all the Gospels if the two were thus alike used?

The statement that the Johannine form 'introduces a truth of special solemnity and importance' (as Plummer in Camb. Gr. Test. for Schools, etc., 'St. John,' note on ch. 15) is quite gratuitous, as a comparison of the sayings and discourses of our Lord will show. It is too obviously a dictum for the purpose of explanation. The truth is, if we have regard to the exclamatory character of ἀμήν as a particle in this special use, there is nothing surprising in its being thus repeated; and we have the analogy of the repeated Amen in responses, as noticed above. Why St. John alone should give the formula in this particular way is a further question. If a consideration of the phenomena connected with the composition of the Fourth Gospel leads to the conclusion that in the form in which the utterances of Jesus are there presented we have not His ipsissima verba, we may most naturally regard the repetition of ἀμήν as a peculiarity due to the Evangelist, and (taking the evidence of the Synopsists into account) not necessarily a form actually used by Jesus.

3. Amen in the rest of the NT.—In the numerous instances in which Amen occurs in the NT outside the Gospels, it is almost entirely found in connexion with prayers, doxologies, or benedictions, as a solemn corroborative conclusion (final use).

In addition, we have the responsive use of Amen illustrated in 1 Co 14<sup>20</sup> (see below, e. 'liturgical use') and Rev 5<sup>4</sup>, and ἀμήν in Rev 22<sup>20</sup> is responsive to the ἐρχομαι ταχέ preceding. Extra-canonical writings furnish plentiful examples of the same use. Two instances, again, of an introductory Amen in the Apocalypse (7<sup>12</sup> 19<sup>4</sup>), as a form of exultant acclamation, are interesting, but are quite distinct from the initial Amen in the utterances of Jesus in the Gospels.

Amen as a substantive appears in two forms: (1) τὸ ἀμήν, (2) ὁ ἀμήν. We meet with the former in 1 Co 14<sup>20</sup> and 2 Co 1<sup>20</sup>. In both cases there appears to be a reference to a liturgical Amen. In the latter passage, indeed, it might be contended that ἀμήν is merely in correspondence with πάς, both simply conveying the idea of confirmation and assurance; but if we follow the better supported reading (as in RV) the presence of such a reference can hardly be denied.

The use of ὁ ἀμήν as a name for our Lord in Rev 3<sup>4</sup> is striking and peculiar. The attempt, however, to explain it by reference to 2 Co 1<sup>20</sup> is not satisfactory. The curious expression 'the God of Amen' (EV: 'the God of truth') in Is 65<sup>16</sup> is not sufficiently a parallel to afford an explanation, for the Amen in this case is not a personal name, but the EV furnishes a satisfactory equivalent in the rendering 'truth.' Surely, however, there need be little difficulty about the use of such a term as a designation of Jesus. Considering the wealth of descriptive epithets applied to Him in the NT and other early Christian writings, and also the terminology favoured by the author of the Apocalypse, we must feel that this use of Amen, if bold, is not unnatural or unapt, so suggestive as the term is of truth and firmness. Another but very different use of Amen as a proper name may be mentioned. Among certain of the Gnostics ἀμήν figured as the name of an angel (Hippolytus, Philosophumena, ccxviii. 79, ccxiv. 45).

4. Amen in liturgical use.—(a) Jewish.—In the Persian period Amen was in use as 'the responsory of the people to the doxology of the Priests and the Levites' (see Neh 8<sup>5</sup>, 1 Ch 16<sup>38</sup>, Ps 106<sup>48</sup>). In the time of Christ it had become an established and familiar formula of the synagogue worship in particular, the response used in the Temple being a longer form: 'Blessed be the Name of the glory of His kingdom for ever and ever!' In still later times a formula of response was used which was apparently a combination of the synagogue Amen with the Temple responsory: 'Amen; praised be the great Name for ever and ever!' In the synagogue service the Amen was said by the people in response to the reader's doxology. (In the great synagogue of Alexandria the attendant used to signal the congregation with a flag when to give the response). Amen was also the responsory to the priestly blessing.

Responsive Amen at the end of prayers was evidently an old custom among the Jews. In later times they are said to have discouraged this, because Amen at the end of every prayer had become the habit of Christians. The use of Amen in this connexion was thus considerably restricted;

but certain synagogue prayers were still specified as to be followed by the Amen.

The Rabbis in their liturgical exactness rigorously determined the sense of Amen, and, among other things, enjoined that every doxology, on whatever occasion, must be followed by this response. Curious sayings were current among them, emphasizing the significance and value of Amen. Should, e.g., the inhabitants of hell exclaim 'Amen!' when the holy Name of God is praised, it will secure their release (Yalk. ii. 296 to Is 26<sup>7</sup>).

(b) Christian.—This use of Amen was undoubtedly borrowed by the Christians from the Jewish synagogue, as, indeed, other liturgical features were. St. Paul's words in 1 Co 14<sup>20</sup> are of special interest here. The reader is so to recite his prayers that the ignorant should have the boon of answering the Amen to the doxology. The ἀκούσας (ἀκούσας) for whom he pleads is similarly considered by the Rabbis, and they give the same instruction. It cannot be maintained that the term εὐχαριστία used here by St. Paul has that special and, so to speak, technical sense which it afterwards acquires as applied to the Lord's Supper, and that so 'the Amen' (τὸ ἀμήν) intended 'is specifically the response connected with the observance of that institution.' At the same time, the whole reference clearly indicates that Amen as a responsory in Christian worship was already a regular and familiar usage.

It is, however, in connexion with the Eucharist, in the special sense of the term, that the Fathers particularly mention the responsive Amen, and refer to it as said after the doxology with which the long Prayer of Consecration closed. Justin Martyr (Apol. 2), Tertullian (de Spectacul. 25), Dionysius of Alexandria (ap. Euseb. HE), and Chrysostom (Hom. 35 in 1 Cor.) make such reference. This prayer, of course, was at first said aloud, so as to be heard by all; but in the course of time (after the 8th cent.) the custom grew for the officiating minister to say it softly. Even then, such importance was attached to the response of the people that the priest was required to say the closing words ('world without end') aloud, so that then the 'Amen' might be said. This in the West: in the Greek Church it was similarly required that the words of the institution should be said aloud, though the first part of the prayer was said inaudibly, so that the people might hear them and make their response. A writer of the 9th cent. (Florus Magister), referring to this usage, says: 'Amen, which is responded by the whole church, means It is true. This, therefore, the faithful respond at the consecration of so great a mystery, as also in every prayer duly said, and by responding declare assent.' A similar use of Amen at the end of the Exhortation (which is not a prayer), commencing the second part of the eucharistic service (see Book of Common Prayer), and at the end of the corresponding 'Preface' in the old Gallican Liturgy, may also be pointed out.

Jerome has an interesting reference to the loud congregational Amen, which he describes as sounding like thunder ('ad similitudinem celestis tonitru'—Com. ad Galat.). This corresponds to a synagogue custom of uttering the 'Amen with the full power' of the voice (Shab. 119b).

The modern practice of singing Amen at the close of hymns in public worship is partly due to a musical demand for a suitable cadence to conclude the tune; but it is also in harmony with the most ancient practice of closing hymns with doxologies, which naturally carried an Amen with them. The discrimination observable in some hymnals, whereby hymns containing a prayer or a doxology are closed with Amen and others not, arises from misapprehension. Amen not only means 'So be it,' but equally 'So it is,' and should thus be suitable as a conclusion to all hymns that are appropriate for Christian worship.

(c) Mohammedan.—Among the Mohammedans Amen is used liturgically, but only to a slight extent. It is universally used by them after every recital of the first Sura of the Koran—the so-called Surat al-Fatihah (= Preface or Introduction). This brief, prayer-like form is held in great veneration, and has among them a place corresponding to that of the Paternoster amongst Christians.

J. S. CLEMENS.

AM HA'AREZ (אֶמ הָאָרֶז) means literally 'the people of the land.' Sometimes—particularly in later books of OT—it is found in the plural 'ammē hā'ārez or 'ammē hā'ārezōth. Its use in the time of Christ indicates the following development:—From being (1) applied to the ordinary inhabitants of the land (Gen 23<sup>12</sup>, 12, 13) or to the people at large as a body (2 K 11<sup>14</sup>, 15, 20, 15<sup>16</sup>, 16<sup>14</sup>, 21<sup>24</sup> etc.), the term came (2) to be used to designate the common people as distinguished from the king, princes, priests, etc. (Jer 44<sup>1</sup>, Hag 2<sup>1</sup>, Zec 7<sup>1</sup>), and (3) like 'pagan' from paganus, was applied to those remote from or untouched by the culture (particularly religious culture) of the time, till it became (4) finally, an expression of contempt meaning 'uncultured,' 'rude,' 'barbarous,' 'irreligious,' applied to a certain class or even to a member of that class. To the 'am hā'ārez the Pharisees directly refer in Jn 7<sup>49</sup>. 'This multitude which knoweth not the Law are accursed.'

The origin of this cleavage is found in the OT. At the Exile we are told 'none were left save the very poor of the people of the land' (יְרֵמְיָהוּ 2 K 24<sup>14</sup>). These mingled with the neighbouring non-Israelites and perhaps also with the settlers from Assyria, intermarrying with them, and probably adopting their customs. Hence at the Return both Ezra and Nehemiah demanded a complete separation (Ezr 9<sup>1-13</sup>, Neh 10<sup>28-29</sup>) between the returned exiles who constituted the Law strictly, and those settlers who constituted 'the people of the land.'

This idea developed and led to the formation of a party called 'Separatists,' Hāsādīm or Pārūshīm (Aram. Pār-šahyāyā'; see art. 'Pharisees' in Hastings' DB iii. p. 826<sup>f</sup>), who regarded all contact with the vulgar crowd ('am hā'ārez) as defiling, observed a strict régime of ceremonial purity, and called each other hābēr (i.e. 'brother'). The 'am hā'ārez was the antithesis of the hābēr, outside the pale of this higher Judaism, poor, ignorant of the Law, despised. In Rabbinical literature, where he is always regarded as a Jew, many definitions of the 'am hā'ārez are given. Thus in the Talmud (Berakhoth 47b) he is described as one 'who does not give his tithes regularly,' or 'who does not read the Shema morning and evening,' or 'who does not wear téphillim,' or 'who has no mēzuzah on his doorposts,' or 'who fails to teach his children the Law,' or 'who has not associated with the learned.' Montefiore in his Hilbert Lectures denies that such sharp cleavage between the Hāsādīm and the 'am hā'ārez ever existed save in the minds of later Rabbis who had difficulty in defining 'am hā'ārez, and consequently he questions the authenticity of Jn 7<sup>49</sup>, but on insufficient grounds. A great gulf and much bitterness existed between the two. A Pharisee would not accept the evidence of an 'am hā'ārez as a witness, nor give him his daughter in marriage. Even the touch of the garment of an 'am hā'ārez was defiling; and Lazarus (Ethics of Judaism) quotes a saying, 'An 'am hā'ārez may be killed on the Sabbath of Sabbaths, or torn like a fish.' This can hardly be taken literally; yet it illustrates the feeling which doubtless prevailed in the time of Christ towards the 'am hā'ārez. The mind of Jesus triumphed over this narrow spirit. In these poor despised outcasts He saw infinite possibilities for goodness. They were the objects of His special care. To them had the Father sent Him, for at the very worst they were only 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 10<sup>6</sup>).

AMMINADAB.—An ancestor of our Lord, Mt 1<sup>4</sup>.

AMON.—A king of Judah (c. 640 B.C.) mentioned in our Lord's genealogy, Mt 1<sup>10</sup> (Gr. Ἄμωσ, RVm Amos).

ANDREW (Ἀνδρέας, 'manly').—In the Synoptic Gospels, Andrew is little more than a name; but the references to him in the Fourth Gospel are of such a character as to leave upon our minds a wonderfully clear impression of the manner of man he was, and of the service which he rendered to the Church of Christ. Andrew was a native of Bethsaida (Jn 1<sup>41</sup>), but afterwards shared the same house (Mk 1<sup>29</sup>) at Capernaum (v. 21) with his better known brother Simon Peter. By trade he was a fisherman (Mt 4<sup>18</sup>), but, attracted by all that he had heard or seen of John the Baptist, for a time at least he left his old work, and, following the Baptist into the wilderness, came to be recognized as one of his disciples (Jn 1<sup>35</sup>, 40). A better teacher Andrew could not have had; for if from John he first learned the exceeding sinfulness of sin, by him also he was pointed to the promised Deliverer, the Lamb of God, who was to take away the sin of the world. And when, accordingly, the Christ did come, it was to find Andrew with a heart ready and eager to welcome Him. Of that first interview between the Lord and His new disciple the Fourth Evangelist, who was himself present, has preserved the record (Jn 1<sup>35-40</sup>), and he it is also who tells us that no sooner had Andrew realized for himself the truth regarding Jesus, than he at once went in search of his brother Peter (vv. 41, 42). And thus to the first-called of Christ's disciples (πρωτόκλητος), according to a common designation of Andrew in early ecclesiastical writers) was given the joy of bringing next his own brother to the Lord. The call of James and of John, if they had not been previously summoned, would seem to have followed; but in none of these instances did this imply as yet more than a personal relationship to the Saviour. The actual summons to work came later, when, by the Sea of Galilee, Jesus bade Andrew, along with the same three companions, leave his nets and come after Him (Mt 4<sup>19</sup>). And this in turn was followed shortly afterwards by Andrew's appointment to a place in the Apostolic Band (Mt 10<sup>22</sup>). His place, moreover, was a place of honour, for his name always occurs in the first group of four, and it is with Peter and James and John that he is again associated in the 'private' inquiries to Jesus regarding the time of the Last Things (Mk 13<sup>3</sup>). Still more interesting, however, as illustrating Andrew's character, are the two occasions on which he is specially associated with Philip, the only other Apostle who bore a Greek name. The first incident occurred at the Feeding of the Five Thousand, when, in contrast to the anxious, calculating Philip, the downright, practical Andrew thought it worth while to draw the Saviour's attention to the lad's little store, even though he too was at a loss as to what it could effect (Jn 6<sup>9-11</sup>). And the second occurred when to Philip, again perplexed by the desire of certain Greeks (Gentiles, therefore) to see Jesus, Andrew suggested that the true course was at least to lay the request before Jesus Himself, and leave Him to decide whether or not it could be granted (Jn 12<sup>20-21</sup>).

After this, with the exception of the incident already referred to (Mk 13<sup>12</sup>), Andrew is not again mentioned in the Gospels, and the only subsequent reference to him in Scripture is the mere mention of his name in Ac 1<sup>25</sup>. Tradition, however, has been busy with his after-history; and he is represented as labouring, according to one account, in Scythia (Eus. HE iii. 1), whence he has been adopted as the patron-saint of Russia; or, according to another, in Achaia. In any case, there is general agreement that he was martyred at Patræ in Achaia, being bound, not nailed, to the cross, in order to prolong his sufferings. There is, however, no warrant for the belief that the cross was of the decussate shape (X), as this cross, usually associated with his name, is of a much later date.

A striking tradition preserved in the Muratorian Fragment brings Andrew and John together in their old age as they had been in their youth: 'The fourth Gospel (now written by John, one of the disciples (i.e. Apostles)). When his fellow-disciples and bishops urgently pressed him, he said, "Fast with me (from) to-day, for three days, and let us tell one another any revelation which may be made to us, either for or against (the plan of writing). On the same night it was revealed to Andrew, one of the Apostles, that John should relate all in his own name, and that all should review (his writing)" (see Westcott, Gospel of St. John, p. xxxv; History of NT Canon, p. 523).

It is also deserving of mention that about 740 Andrew became the patron-saint of Scotland, owing to the belief that his arm had been brought by St. Regulus to the town on the East Coast that now bears his name.

The character of Andrew, as it appears in the few scattered notices that we have of him, is that of a simple, kindly man who had the courage of his opinions, as proved by his being the first of the Baptist's disciples openly to follow Jesus; who was eager to share with others the privileges he himself enjoyed (witness his search for Peter, and his treatment of the Greeks); and who, his work done, was always ready to efface himself (see especially Lightfoot, Sermons on Special Occasions, p. 160 ff.). Again, when we think of the Apostle in his more official aspect, it is sufficient to recall that he was not only the first home-missionary (Jn 14<sup>1</sup>), but also the first foreign-missionary (12<sup>22</sup>)—evidence, if evidence be wanted, of the close connexion between the two spheres of work.

GEORGE MILLIGAN.

ANGELS.—The statements as to angels which meet us in the Gospels are in most respects the same as are found in the Jewish literature of the period, both Biblical and extra-Biblical. In the main, Christ and His Apostles appropriated the Angelology of current Judaism—but not without critical selection. It would be difficult to point to a time when the Jews, as a people, did not believe in angels; yet there were exceptions. Possibly it was the exuberance of the belief that produced in some minds a reaction. At all events, it is a fact that the portion of the OT known to criticism as the Priests' Code is silent on the subject of angels; and it is also noteworthy that the Sadducees, who were the descendants of the high-priestly families, protested in the time of our Lord against some, if not all, of the popular notions respecting angels (Ac 23<sup>8</sup>).

It is probable that belief in angels is originally a corollary from the conception of God as King. A lone King—a king without a court—is almost a contradiction in terms. And inasmuch as the recognition of God as King is the earliest and most prevalent of Israel's conceptions of God, we naturally expect the belief in angels, as God's court, serving Him in His palace and discharging the function of messengers, to be ancient and pervasive. We have then, doubtless, a very primitive conception of angels in the words of Micah to Ahab, in 1 K 22<sup>19</sup>: 'I saw Jahveh sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven standing by him, on his right hand and on his left.' A second and quite distinct feature of the Angelology of the OT is found in the appearances of one who is called 'the Angel of Jahveh'—who is described as undistinguishable from man in appearance, and yet claims to speak and act in the name of Jahveh Himself (Gn 18<sup>1</sup>, 16<sup>7</sup>, 22<sup>22-23</sup>; Jg 13<sup>3-6</sup>, 13<sup>20</sup>). It is noteworthy as a feature of OT criticism, that, as P is silent as to angels, so the appearances of an angel as a manlike manifestation of God and not a mere messenger, are confined to those portions of the OT which, on quite other grounds, are assigned to JE. Thirdly, when the Jews came to have more exalted views of God, and of the incompatibility between Divinity and humanity, spirit and matter, good and evil, and, in consequence, conceived of God as aloof from the world and incapable of immediate contact and intercourse with sinful mortals, the doctrine of angels received more attention than ever before. The same influences which led the Persians to frame such an elaborate system of Angelology, led the Jews, during and after the Exile, to frame a similar system, or in some respects to borrow from the Persian system; to believe in gradations among the angelic hosts; to give names to those who were of high rank, and to assign to each of these some definite kind of work to do among men, or some province on the earth to administer as satrap under 'the King of Heaven' (see art. 'Zoroastrianism' in vol. iv. of Hastings' DB).

In the Gospels there are clear indications of the first and third of these phases of belief. The second is of interest to the NT student as a preparatory discipline in the direction of Christology; and as such has no further importance for us at present. Ewald has said (OT and NT Theology, p. 70) that in Christianity there is 'no denial of the existence of angels, but a return to the simpler colouring of the early narratives.' So far as simplicity of narrative is concerned, there is certainly a close resemblance between the angel-incidents of St. Luke and Acts on the one hand, and of Genesis on the other; but in the NT the angel never identifies himself with Jahveh as is done in Genesis; and there are in the NT some phases of Angelology which belong, not to 'the early narratives,' but to post-exilic conceptions.

We wish now, with the help of Jewish literature, more or less contemporary, to make a systematic presentation of those beliefs as to angels which are found in the discourses and narratives of the four Gospels. It might be supposed that we should find it helpful to keep apart the utterances of our Lord from the descriptions of the Evangelists; but, in fact, there is such complete unity of conception underlying both discourses and narratives, that no useful purpose can be served by treating them separately.

1. ANGELS IN HEAVEN.—4. They form an army or host. Lk 2<sup>13</sup> 'There was with the angel (who appeared to the shepherds) a multitude of the heavenly host' (εργαστα). Our Lord carries the military metaphor even further when He speaks of 'more than 12 legions of angels' (Mt 26<sup>53</sup>). Oriental hyperbole was fully employed in expressing the magnitude of the heavenly army. Rev 5<sup>11</sup> speaks of 'myriads of myriads and thousands of thousands'; and He 12<sup>28</sup> speaks of 'the myriads of angels'—both in probable allusion to Dn 7<sup>10</sup>. In Job 25<sup>6</sup> also the question is asked: 'Is there any number of his armies?' Similarly the Pal. Targ. to Ex 12<sup>29</sup> tells of 90,000 myriads of destroying angels; and in Dt 34<sup>4</sup> the same Targum speaks of the glory of the Shekinah being revealed to the dying Moses, with 2000 myriads of angels and 42,000 chariots; as 2 K 6<sup>17</sup> tells of a 'mountain full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha.'

2. They form a court. Heaven is 'God's throne' (Mt 6<sup>25-26</sup>), and there also 'the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of his glory' (Mt 19<sup>28</sup>). The angels, as courtiers, stand in vast multitudes before the throne (Rev 5<sup>11</sup> 7<sup>11</sup>). As in earthly courts there are gradations of rank and dignity, so in heaven. It is St. Paul who speaks most explicitly of 'the principalities and powers in the heavenly places' (Eph 3<sup>10</sup>), and of Christ's being 'exalted far above all rule, and authority, and power, and dominion' (Eph 1<sup>21</sup>); and 'evidently Paul regarded them as actually existent and intelligent forces' (Robinson, in loco); but the same conception presents itself in the Gospels in the reference to archangels, who were four, or in some authors seven, in number: Gabriel, Raphael, Michael, and Uriel being those most frequently mentioned. In Lk 1<sup>19</sup> the angel who appears to Zacharias says: 'I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God'; as in To 12<sup>25</sup> the angel says to Tobit: 'I am Raphael, one of the seven holy angels, which present the prayers of the saints and go in before the glory of the Holy One.' Even in the OT the angels are spoken of as forming 'a council': e.g. in Ps 89<sup>7</sup>, where God is said to be 'very terrible in the council of the holy ones,' and in Ps 82<sup>1</sup> where He is said to 'judge amidst the Elohim.' This idea was a great favourite with later Jews, who maintained that 'God does nothing without consulting the family above' (Sanhedrin, 38b). To the same circle of ideas belong the words of the Lord Jesus: 'Every one that shall confess me before men, him will the Son of Man confess before the angels of God; but he that denieth me in the presence of men shall be denied in the presence of the angels of God' (Lk 12<sup>8-9</sup>). Evidently the angels are interested spectators of men's behaviour, responsive to their victories and defeats, their sins and struggles; and we are here taught that to be denied before such a vast responsive assembly intensifies the remorse of the apostate, as to be confessed before them intensifies the joy of those who are 'faithful unto death.' Again, in many courts, and particularly in that of the Persians, there were secretaries or scribes, whose business it was to keep a 'book of records' (Est 9), in which the names and deeds of those who had deserved well of the king were honourably recorded. The metaphor of heaven as a palace and court is so far kept up, that the Jews often spoke of books in heaven in which men's deeds are recorded. Not only do we read in Slavonic Enoch 19<sup>1</sup> of 'angels who are over the souls of men, and who write down all their works and their lives before the face of the Lord'; and in the Apocalypse of John, where symbolism abounds, of 'books' being 'opened,' and of the 'dead' being 'judged according to what was written in the books'; but even in an Epistle of St. Paul we read of those 'whose names are in the book of life' (Ph 4<sup>3</sup>), and in He 12<sup>23</sup>, of 'the church of the firstborn who are enrolled in heaven'; and precisely in accord with the above our Lord bade His disciples rejoice, because their names 'are written in heaven,' i.e. enrolled for honour (Lk 10<sup>20</sup>).

3. They form a choir in the heavenly temple. The description of heaven in the Apocalypse is quite as much that of a temple as a palace. Heaven contains its altar (8<sup>3</sup> 9<sup>3</sup>), its censers (8<sup>3</sup> 8<sup>3</sup>), its musicians (5<sup>8</sup> 15<sup>7</sup>), and its singers (5<sup>9</sup> 14<sup>2</sup> 15<sup>7</sup>). In extra-Biblical literature the veil is often mentioned, concealing the abode of God in the Most Holy Place, within which the archangels are permitted to enter (To 12<sup>23-24</sup>, Enoch 40<sup>1</sup>). The only reference in the Gospels under this head is the song of the angels, described in Lk 22<sup>43</sup>. It is possible, in spite of the reading of some very ancient Greek MSS (N*ABD), that this song, like that of the seraphim in Is 6<sup>3</sup>, is a triple antiphonal one—'Glory to God in the highest (heaven),

Peace on earth,
Among men [Divine] good pleasure.'

4. They are 'sons of God.' In this respect the saints who are raised again are 'equal to the angels' (Lk 20<sup>36</sup>). They are sons of God by creation and by obedience (Job 1<sup>6</sup> 2<sup>1</sup> 38<sup>7</sup>). They 'do not owe their existence to the ordinary process of filiation, but to an immediate act of creation' (Godet, OT Studies, 7); thus resembling in their origin the bodily nature of those who are 'sons of the resurrection.' Hence we find that they are frequently described as 'holy' (Mt 25<sup>1</sup>, Mk 3<sup>28</sup>, Lk 9<sup>8</sup>, Job 5<sup>15</sup>, Dn 8<sup>10</sup>), and by implication we learn that angels obey God's will in heaven, since we are taught by our Lord to pray that God's holy will may be done on earth as it is in heaven (Mt 6<sup>10</sup>, cf. Ps 103<sup>20</sup>).

5. They are free from sensuous feelings. This is taught in Mt 22<sup>30</sup> 'In the resurrection they neither marry [as men] nor are given in marriage [as women], but are as the angels of God in heaven.' These words were spoken by our Lord in response to the doubts of the Sadducees on the subject of the resurrection. Christ's reply is in effect this: The source of your error is that you do not fully recognize the power of God. You seem to think that God can make only one kind of body, with one sort of functions, and dependent on one means of life. In that way you limit unduly the power of God. 'In that age' (Lk 20<sup>35</sup>), 'when they rise from the dead' (Mk 12<sup>26</sup>), men do not eat and drink (Ro 14<sup>17</sup>). Not being mortal, they are not dependent on food for nourishment, nor have they, by nature, sensuous appetites, but are ἀσθητικοί ('equal to the angels'). Thus skilfully did Jesus give a double-edged reply to the teachings of the Sadducees (Ac 23<sup>8</sup>). While answering their objection against the resurrection, He affirms that 'those who are accounted worthy to attain to that αἰών, and the resurrection from the dead . . . are equal to the angels'—thus plainly disclosing His belief in angels and setting it over against their disbelief. As to the spiritual nature of angels, Philo speaks of them as ἀσώματοι καὶ εὐδαίμονες ψυχῆς ('incorporeal and happy souls'); and again, as 'bodiless souls, not mixtures of rational and irrational natures as ours are, but having the irrational nature cut out, wholly intelligent throughout, pure-thoughts (λογισμοί, elsewhere λόγοι) like a monad' (Drummond's Philo, 145-147; cf. Philo's Confusion of Tongues, p. 8, Allegory, iii. 62). The Rabbis interpreted Du 7<sup>10</sup> to teach that the nature of the angels is fire. 'They are nourished by the radiance which streams from the presence of God. They need no material nourishment, and their nature is not responsive to bodily pleasures' (Weber, Jud. Theol. 2 167; Pesq̄ta, 57a; Exodus R. 32). They are also said to be 'spiritual beings' (Lev. R. 24), 'without sensuous requirements' (Yoma, 74b), 'without hatred, envy, or jealousy' (Chag. 14). The Jewish legends which interpret Gn 6<sup>4</sup> as teaching a commingling of angels with women, so as to produce 'mighty men, men of renown,' seem at variance with the above belief as to the immunity of celestial intelligences from all passion. It is true that Jude<sup>6</sup> and Enoch 15<sup>7-7</sup> both speak of the angels as having first 'left their habitation' in heaven; but the fact that they were deemed capable of sexual intercourse implies a much coarser conception of the angelic nature than is taught in the words of our Lord, of Philo, and of the Talmud.

6. They have extensive, and yet limited, knowledge. This is clearly taught in one utterance of Christ's, recorded in Mt 24<sup>36</sup> || Mk 13<sup>32</sup> 'Of that day and hour knoweth no man, not even the angels of heaven.' The implications clearly are (1) that angels know most things, far better than men; but (2) that there are some things, including the day of the Second Advent, which they do not know. Both these propositions admit of copious illustration from Jewish literature. First, as to their extensive knowledge. There are numerous intimations of the scientific skill of the angels, their acquaintance with the events of human lives, and their presence of future events. The Book of Jubilees, a pre-Christian work extensively read, affirms (12<sup>7</sup>) that Moses was taught by Gabriel concerning Creation and the things narrated in Genesis; that angels taught Noah herbal remedies (10<sup>21</sup>), and brought to Jacob seven tablets recording the history of his posterity (32<sup>2</sup>). In Enoch 8<sup>1</sup> Azazel is said to have taught men metallurgy and other sciences; as Prometheus was said to have taught the Greeks. In To 12<sup>2</sup> the angel assures Tobit that he was familiar with all the events of his troublous days: as in 2 S 14<sup>27-28</sup> the woman of Tekoa flatters Joab that he was 'as wise as an angel of God to know all things that are in the earth.' But this knowledge has its limits. Angels were supposed to understand no language but Hebrew (Chagigah, 16a). In 2 Es 4<sup>22</sup> in revealing eschatological events, the angel gives the tokens of the coming end, but confesses his ignorance as to whether Esdras will be alive at the time. The Midrash on Ps 25<sup>14</sup> affirms that 'nothing is hidden from the angels'; but according to Sanhedrin, 99a, and other Talmudic passages, 'they know not the time of Israel's redemption.' In 1 P 1<sup>12</sup> we are told that 'the angels desire' (but in vain) 'to look into' some of the NT mysteries; and in Slav. Enoch 24<sup>40</sup>, Enoch tells his children that not even the angels know the secrets which he discloses to them.

7. They take a deep interest in the salvation of men. We gather this from the evident joy with which angels announced the advent of the Messiah to the shepherds at Bethlehem. The angel who brought the 'tidings of great joy' (Lk 2<sup>9</sup>) clearly felt the joy himself; and the song which the heavenly host sang in praise to God was the outcome of joyous hearts. Even more explicitly is this taught in Lk 15<sup>9</sup> 'There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.' The word εὐφραν seems here to mean 'in the midst of,' 'among.' 'Joy is manifest on every countenance.' Even if the joy intended be 'the joy of God, which breaks forth in presence of the angels' (Godet, in loco), still the implication would be that the heart of the angelic throng is en rapport with the heart of 'the happy God.' On this point the words of the angel are instructive which are recorded in Rev 22<sup>10</sup> 'I am a fellow-servant with thee and with thy brethren the prophets, and with them that keep the words of this book.' The interpreting angel confesses to unity of service with the Church, and in so doing implies a oneness of sympathy and love with the saints. So also when, in 1 P 1<sup>12</sup>, we read that 'the angels desire to look into' the marvels of redemption, there is, as Dr. Hort says, 'a glimpse of the fellowship of angels with prophets and evangelists, and implicitly with the suffering Christians to whom St. Peter wrote.' The same deep interest in the progress of the Church appears in Eph 3<sup>10</sup>, where we are taught that one great purpose which moved God to enter on the work of human salvation was, that 'through the Church the manifold wisdom of God might be made known to the principalities and powers in heavenly places.' The Church on earth is the arena on which the attributes of God are displayed for the admiration and adoration of 'the family in heaven' (Eph 3<sup>10</sup>).

ii. ANGELS AS VISITANTS TO EARTH.—1. To convey messages from God to man.—(a) In dreams. It is a peculiarity of the Gospel of the Infancy, as recorded by St. Matthew, that the appearances of the angels are in dreams to Joseph, bidding him acknowledge Mary as his wife (Mt 1<sup>20</sup>), take the young child and His mother to Egypt (2<sup>13</sup>), and return to Palestine on the death of Herod (2<sup>19</sup>). The only OT parallel to this is Gn 31<sup>11</sup>, where Jacob tells his wives that 'the angel of God spake' to him 'in a dream.'

(b) In other instances the message of the angel is brought in full, waked consciousness. It was while Zacharias was ministering at the altar of incense in the Holy Place that an angel who called himself Gabriel appeared, foretelling the birth of John (Lk 1<sup>11</sup>). It was while the shepherds were keeping watch over their flock that the angel stood near them and directed them to the babe in Bethlehem (Lk 2<sup>8-12</sup>); and it is narrated by the three Synoptists that it was through angelic agency that the disciples were informed of the Resurrection. St. Matthew narrates that it was an angel who had 'descended from heaven' (28<sup>2</sup>), that spoke to the women at the tomb (28<sup>6-7</sup>). St. Mark speaks of a young man 'arrayed in a white robe' (16<sup>7</sup>), and St. Luke of 'two men in dazzling apparel' (24<sup>23</sup>), who assured the women that Christ was risen. The author of the Fourth Gospel is silent as to angelic appearances at the Resurrection, but he bears testimony to the popular belief in angelic voices (Jn 12<sup>29</sup>). When a voice came from heaven, saying, 'I have glorified and will again glorify (my name),' the Evangelist records: 'Some of the people said, An angel spake to him.' We reserve for special consideration the sacredly mysterious interview of the angel Gabriel with the Virgin Mary (Lk 1<sup>26-38</sup>). The salutation of the angel was: 'Hail, thou favoured one! The Lord is with thee.' When she was perplexed at the saying, the angel announced: 'Thou shalt conceive in thy womb and bear a son, and shalt call his name Jesus.' This Son is further described as 'Son of the Most High' and He to whom 'the Lord God will give the throne of his father David.' Then, in reply to the Virgin's further doubts and perplexities, the angel vouchsafes the dread explanation, 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power (δυναμις) of the Most High shall overshadow thee. . . . No word from God shall be devoid of power.' The full consideration of these words will be fittingly considered under ANNUNCIATION (which see). On us it seems to devolve to speak of the view which arose very early in Jewish Christian circles, and which regarded the angel as not merely the messenger, but the cause of the conception. It was a general belief among the Jews that a spoken word has causal efficacy. This lay at the root of the belief in the potency of spells and charms. And if every spoken word is mighty, the words of God are almighty. The expression 'No word from (παρά) God shall be devoid of power' (Lk 17) was accordingly interpreted to mean that the message brought from God through the angel had causal efficacy: the Divine word spoken by the angel caused the conception. In the Protœvangélium of James (113) the angel is recorded to have said: 'Thou shalt conceive from His word' (ἐκ τοῦ λόγου αὐτοῦ), and the same expression occurs in the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy. This is the origin of the curious doctrine of the ancient Church, that the Virgin conceived through the ear. The word of the angel, which was a Divine message, reached the Virgin through the ear. The ear was thus believed to be the channel through which the Divine potency was operative. Even Augustine says: 'Virgo per aurem impregnabatur.'

As bearing on this subject, we may note that in the Ascension of Isaiah the angel Gabriel is called 'the angel of the Holy Spirit' (315<sup>a</sup> 723<sup>b</sup> 728<sup>b</sup>). In pseudo-Matthew (c. 10), Joseph says: 'Why do ye mislead me to believe that an angel of the Lord hath made her pregnant?' and in the Protœvangélium of James the Virgin explains her condition to Joseph in these words: 'The case is the same as it was with Adam whom God created. He said, "Let him be", and he was.'

2. Angels as performing physical actions. This is an ancient representation of which the OT furnishes many instances: Ps 91<sup>11</sup> (cited Mt 4, Lk 4<sup>34</sup>), 'angels . . . shall bear thee up on their hands'; in Dn 6<sup>22</sup> angels shut the lions' mouths; in Ps 34<sup>7</sup> angels encamp round about them that fear God; so in Apocrypha (Bel 36, Three 22). It is therefore precisely in accord with Jewish modes of thought that we read in Mt 23<sup>3</sup> 'There was a great earthquake; for an angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled away the stone'; and in Mk 16<sup>7</sup> 'He was with the wild beasts; and the angels ministered unto him' (cf. Mt 41).

3. As performing psychical actions. When Jesus was in the garden, and 'being in an agony prayed more earnestly,' we are told that 'there appeared to him an angel from heaven strengthening him' (Lk 22<sup>43</sup>). So in Dn 10<sup>17</sup> Daniel records that there was 'no strength in him, and no breath left in him,' and an angel 'touched him and strengthened him.' The Hebrews drew no distinction between the physical and the psychical. It was in their regard just as easy for these spiritual existences to roll away a stone as to infuse vigour into the system, and give power to the enfeebled nerves and will.

4. Angels are deputed to guard the righteous from danger. In Gn 24<sup>7</sup> Abraham prays for his servant: 'May God send his angel before thee'; and Jacob saw angels 'ascending and descending' over him in his sleep (Gn 28<sup>12</sup>). In the time of Christ it was a Jewish belief not merely that angels are sent to guide and guard men, but also that every man has his own guardian spirit, or, as others teach, two guardians. In the Talmudic treatise Berakhot (30b), when a man goes into an unclean place, he prays his guardian angels to wait outside till he returns. In Pal. Targum to Gn 33<sup>9</sup> Jacob says to Esau, 'I have seen thy face as if I saw the face of thy angel'; on Gn 48<sup>16</sup> the same Targum reads: 'May the angel whom thou hast assigned to me bless the lads.' Similarly the Sohar to Exodus (p. 190) says: 'From the 13th year of a man and onwards, God assigns to every man two angels, one on the right hand and one on the left; and the Testament of Joseph (c. 6) names the angel of Abraham as the guardian of Joseph. It is here more than elsewhere that we seem to recognize the influence of Persia on Jewish beliefs.'

* On the question of the genuineness of this passage see the 'Notes on Select Readings' in Westcott and Hort's NT in Greek.

The question now occurs, 'What connexion is there between the above and Mt 18<sup>10</sup> "See that ye despise not one of these little ones, for I say unto you, that their angels in heaven continually behold the face of my Father who is in heaven"? It is evident that "their angels" means angels that watch over them. But did our Lord refer to the "angels of the presence" or to individual guardian angels? The former is more probable for two reasons—(1) It was not part of the Jewish creed that any angels behold the face of God except the archangels; (2) the guardian spirits accompanying men on earth could hardly at the same time be said to be in heaven continually beholding the face of the Father who is in heaven. The allusion probably is, then, to the "angels of the presence," and especially to Michael the guardian of the pious and the helpless. It must be admitted that in Ac 12<sup>15</sup> we seem to have the popular Jewish notion in all its later development. "When many brethren were met in the house of Mary, mother of John Mark, and were unable to believe that Peter had really been delivered, they said to Rhoda, first, "Thou art mad," and then, "It is his angel." This, if pushed to its apparent implications, seems to contain an allusion to a notion which occurs in some Jewish writings, that heaven is a counterpart of earth, and every man has his double in the celestial sphere; or at all events the guardian angel is like him whom he guards. It is quite likely, however, that on the lips of the disciples these words might be merely an allusion to a popular conception, without carrying with them any literal belief.'

5. Angels visit wrath on the adversaries of the righteous. This is implied in Christ's words: 'See that ye despise not one of these little ones' (Mt 18<sup>10</sup>). The word ὑπέρε implies 'beware!' and the teaching clearly is that angels are capable of punishing any who injure those whom it is their business to guard. The OT contains instances of their punitive abilities. It was an angel of the Lord who smote 185,000 in the camp of the Assyrians (2 K 19<sup>35</sup>), and who destroyed the children of Israel till, when he came to Jerusalem, the Lord said to him, 'It is enough' (2 S 24<sup>18</sup>); and Ps 35<sup>6</sup> presents a picture calculated to inspire terror in every breast: 'Let them be as chaff before the wind, the angel of the Lord driving them on. Let their way be dark and slippery, the angel of the Lord pursuing them.' It is very noteworthy that the Lord Jesus, even in His hour of intensest agony, drew comfort from the thought of angelic help. It was a real comfort to Him that the angels were at His control, if He needed them. The military band led by Judas could not arrest or injure Him unless He voluntarily submitted Himself to them. He had 'authority to lay down' His 'life'; and when the struggle was over, and the resolve retaken that the path of the cross was the path of duty, He conveyed to the Eleven the fact of His self-surrender by saying to Peter, who had impetuously used the sword in his Lord's defence, 'Thinkest thou that I cannot now beseech the Father, and he would even now send me more than twelve legions of angels?' (Mt 26<sup>53</sup>). We note here that the prayer is not to be addressed to angels. There are very few instances of Jews praying to angels. The Rabbis discouraged it. Every pious Jew would, as Jesus did, pray to God that He would send angelic ministry; as in 2 Mac

15th, where Judas is said to have prayed: 'O sovereign Lord, send a good angel before us to bring terror and trembling.'

6. Angels render aid at death. Lk 16th 'Lazarus was carried away by the angels into Abraham's bosom.' We come here upon a widespread belief among Jews and Jewish Christians—that angels convey the souls of the righteous to Paradise. Michael is usually the one entrusted with this duty. If he has a companion, it is Gabriel. The Gospel of Nicodemus records that when Jesus descended into Hades and released the righteous dead from captivity, He delivered Adam and all the righteous to the archangel Michael, and all the saints followed Michael; and he led them all into the glorious gate of Paradise: among them being the penitent thief. The History of Joseph the Carpenter records that Michael and Gabriel drew out the soul of Joseph and wrapped it in a silken napkin, and amid the songs of angels took him to his good Father, even to the dwelling-place of the just. In the Testament of Abraham we have a similar account of the death of Abraham. The Ascension of Isaiah (7th) affirms that 'those who love the Most High and His Beloved will ascend to heaven by the Angel of the Holy Spirit.'

7. Angels are to be the ministers of Christ at His Second Advent. 'The reapers' in the great Harvest 'are angels'; and they separate the tares from the wheat (Mt 13th). 'The Son of Man will send forth his angels to gather out all that offend' (Mt 13th). 'He shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him' (Mt 25th). 'He shall send forth his angels with the great sound of a trumpet to gather the elect' (Mt 24th; cf. 1 Th 4th, 2 Th 1st).

8. To complete our survey, we must add one word as to the appearance of angels when men were conscious of their presence. It is taken for granted that there needs to be a preparation of vision before man can recognize their presence. As Balaam was unaware that the angel confronted him until the Lord opened his eyes (Nu 22nd), and as Elisha prayed that God would open the eyes of his servant (2 K 6th), so when the risen Jesus appeared to Saul of Tarsus, those who travelled with him 'saw no man' (Ac 9th). (a) Angels had a manlike appearance. As Abraham and Noah's wife mistook them for men (Gn 18th, Jg 13th), so, in describing the Resurrection, St. Mark says that the women 'saw a young man' (16th), and St. Luke that 'two men stood by them' (24th).—(b) Their appearance was usually with brilliant light or 'glory.' When the angel appeared to the shepherds, 'the glory of the Lord shone round about them' (Lk 2nd), and when the Son of Man cometh, He will come 'in the glory of the holy angels' (Lk 9th). So in To 3rd, Cod. B reads: 'The prayer of both was heard before the glory of the great Raphael'; in 2 Mac 3rd two young men appeared, 'notable in their strength and beautiful in their glory'; and the Protevangelium of James narrates that 'an angel of the Lord appeared in the great light to Joachim.'—(c) They wear raiment of great luminousness. Mt 28 'His appearance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow'; cf. Dn 10th, Ezk 1st, Rev 1st 19th. So Apoc. of Peter says of the angels, 'their body was whiter than any snow.'

iii. DIFFERENCES BETWEEN NT AND RABBINISM AS TO ANGELS.—We undertook to show that 'in the main Christ and His Apostles appropriated the Angelology of Judaism'; and the above systematic treatment has surely rendered this evident. It has often been observed that 'Jesus says very little about angels'; and, so far as the bulk of His sayings is concerned, this is quite true; but when we classify His utterances, we find that they constitute almost a complete Angelology; and so far as it goes, it is in harmony with the Jewish beliefs of the period. The Jews believed all that the NT says of angels, but they also believed much more.

4. It is very significant that the Gospels are silent as to the mediation of angels. In Judaism this was very prominent. In Tobit, e.g., one great function of angels is said to be to carry the prayers of saints within the veil, before the glory of the Holy One (12th, 13th). In Enoch 40th the seer says: 'And the third voice heard I pray and intercede for those who dwell on the earth, and supplicate in the name of the Lord of spirits.' In the Greek Apoc. of Baruch (c. 11), Michael is said to have a great receptacle in which the prayers of men are placed to be carried through the gates into the presence of the Divine glory (Texts and Studies, v. i. 100). In the Midrash Exodus Rabba 21 an angel set over the prayers of men is said to weave them into crowns for the Most High.—But not only are the Gospels silent as to the need of angels to be mediators in carrying the prayers and necessities of saints into the unapproachable chamber of the Most High, the teaching of Jesus was designed to counteract such a view of God. When our Lord said: 'Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things' (Mt 6th); 'Your heavenly Father feedeth' (6th); 'Thy Father seeth in secret' (6th); 'Pray to thy Father who is in secret' (6th),—He certainly wished to break down the barriers which the Jewish mind had placed between itself and God, and encourage men to come direct to the Father in childlike confidence.

2. In other respects the only difference is, that the Gospels are free from the extravagant embellishment in which the Rabbis indulged, when speaking of angels: (a) as to their size.—The Talmudic treatise Chaqiqah (13th) says that Sandalfon is taller than his fellows by the length of a journey of 500 years; and the Gospel of Peter (c. 9) tells how the Roman soldiers saw two men descend from heaven, and the head of the two reached unto heaven, but that of Him whom they released from the tomb overpassed the heavens.—(b) As to a fondness for the marvellous in describing their appearance and actions. For instance, Yoma 21a narrates how a high priest was killed by an angel in the Holy of Holies, and the impress of a calf's foot was found between his shoulders. Joshua ben Hananiah is reported to have told the Emperor Hadrian that God hears the song of new angels every day. When asked whence they come, he replied, 'From the fiery stream which issues from the throne of God' (Dn 7th); see Bacher, Agada der Tannaiten, i. 178.—(c) The Jews also speculated much as to the origin of the angels, their connexion with the four elements, etc.; and they had ingenious methods of computing their number by Kabbalistic Gematria—the whole thing being the extravaganza of Oriental phantasy.

iv. THE OBJECTIVE VALUE OF THE NT DOCTRINE OF ANGELS.—The most difficult part of our task now awaits us, to give some account of modern views as to the reality of angels, and to discuss whether there are valid reasons why we, as Christians, are bound to accept the prima facie NT teaching as to the angelic ministry. Every Christian must feel that it is of very great importance to decide whether the Lord Jesus really believed in the objective existence and ministrations of angels. To this question the present writer feels obliged to give an affirmative reply (but see art. ACCOMMODATION, above, p. 20), and that for the following reasons: (1) Though Jesus did not speak much concerning angels, yet His recorded sayings cover, with some intentional exceptions, almost the complete Angelology of the Jews—which is evidence that He was, in the main, in agreement with it. (2) If the disciples had been radically mistaken on this subject, surely this is a matter as to which Christ's words were applicable: 'If it were not so, I would have told you,' Jn 14'. (3) In controversy with the Sadducees, who were sceptical as to angels, He adroitly gave them such a reply to their objection against the resurrection as to show that the existence and nature of angels was to Him a settled matter, and might be used to elucidate the nature of the resurrection body. There is a wealth of conviction in the words of Jesus: 'Those who rise again are like the angels.' (4) Christ made mention of angels not merely in the parables, where we expect symbolism and pictorial illustration, but also in the interpretation (Mt 13<sup>35</sup>, 41, 47). (5) He used the punitive ability of angels to warn men against despising the little ones in His Kingdom (Mt 18<sup>6</sup>). Apart from a literal belief in angels, such words are an empty threat. (6) In the time of His most intense agony He evidently derived comfort from the loving sympathy of the 'cloud of witnesses'; for when He emerges from the trial and its bitterness is past, He assures Peter that, had He permitted it, more than twelve legions of angels would readily have intervened to deliver Him (Mt 26<sup>53</sup>). — Stevens (Theology of NT, p. 80) is impressed by other passages. 'In several places,' he says, 'Christ seems to refer to angels in such a way as to show that He believed in their real existence. He will "come in the glory" of His Father with His holy angels" (Mk 8<sup>38</sup>). "Angels in heaven" neither marry nor are given in marriage (Mk 12<sup>25</sup>). Of the hour of His Advent "not even the angels in heaven" know (Mk 13<sup>32</sup>).'

In recent times the views of scholars are much divided on this subject. 1. There are large sections of the universal Church to whom the existence of angels is very real, not only as a matter of theoretical belief, but as a matter of religious experience. They set great value on the services of angels as mediators between themselves, in their sins and needs and miseries, and the holy, infinite God; and they delight to think that the spiritual strength and light and succour which come to them in answer to prayer, reach their low estate through the mediation of angels. We might readily quote from saints of the Greek and Roman Churches on this head, but we prefer to give the 'disclosures' of Swedenborg. 'According to him, we are every moment in the most vital association with the spirits both of heaven and hell. They are the perpetual prompters of our thoughts: they incessantly work by insinuating influences on our loves; and they give force on the one hand to the power of temptation, and on the other fortify the soul, by hidden influx, to resist temptation' (Rev. G. Bush, Disclosures of Swedenborg, 79).

2. There are many who believe in angels theoretically. They take the teaching of the NT in a thoroughly literal sense. They are prepared to maintain and contend that Jesus Christ believed in the real existence of angels; and, in consequence, a belief in angels forms part of their 'creed'; but angels have no part in their inner religious life. Some admit, not without regret and self-reproach, that angels do not seem so real to them as they did to Jesus; while others are reluctant to admit that it can be a fault to yearn as they do for heart-to-heart fellowship with God Himself, without the intervention of an angel ministry — to seek for direct interaction with God, without even the holiest angel intervening in the sacredness of the communion. As a specimen of this attitude, we quote from an article in the First Series of the Expositor (viii, 409 ff.) by R. Winterbotham: 'I do not mean to imply that we disbelieve either the existence or the ministry of angelic beings: we cannot do so without rejecting and denying point blank the unquestioned and unquestionable dicta of our Lord and of His apostles. But I do say that our belief in angels is formal only, or at the best, merely poetic. It does not strike its roots down into our religious consciousness, into that inner and unseen, but most real and often passionate, life of the soul towards God and the powers of the world to come.'

3. There are others yet again who set such a high value on the immediacy of the interaction of fellowship with God, believing, as they do, that it was the chief feature of Christ's teaching to reveal the possibility of fellowship with God as our Father — or led perhaps by scientific predilections to feel that there is now no room for angels in our modern world — that they sweep away the intervention of angels, and are reluctant to admit that the Lord Jesus really believed in their existence. They would believe rather that He accommodated Himself in this matter to current popular notions. For instance, Beyschlag maintains that 'the immediate relation to the world in which Jesus viewed His heavenly Father left no room for such personal intermediate beings' (as the Jews of that time believed in). In passages like Lk 12<sup>2</sup> and 13<sup>32</sup> angels are 'a poetic paraphrase for God Himself.' 'The holy angels of the Son of Man, with whom He will come again in His glory, are the rays of Divine majesty which is then to surround Him with splendour: they are the Divine powers with which He is to waken the dead.' And again, 'The most remarkable passage is Mt 18<sup>10</sup> and it is the very passage which we can least of all take in prosaic literalness. According to it, even the least of the children of men has his guardian angel who at all times has access to the Heavenly Father, viz. to complain to Him of the offences done to his protégé on earth. But as God, according to Jesus, knows what happens to each of His children without needing to be told, in what other way can we conceive this entirely poetical passage, than that in every child of man a peculiar thought of God has to be realized, which stands over his history, like a genius, or guardian spirit, and which God always remembers, so that everything which opposes its realization on earth comes before Him as a complaint?' (New Test. Theology, i, 86 f.). Dr. Bruce is even more pronounced. In his Epistle to the Hebrews (p. 45) he says: 'For modern men, the angels are very much a dead theological category. Everywhere in the old Jewish world, they are next to nowhere in our world. They have practically disappeared from the universe in thought and in fact.' Then, with a strange lapse of the historic sense, he adds: 'This subject was probably a weariness to the writer of our Epistle. A Jew, and well acquainted with Jewish opinion, and obliged to adjust his argument to it, he was tired, I imagine, of the angelic régime. Too much had been made of it in Rabbinical teaching and in popular opinion. It must not be supposed that he was in sympathy with either.'

A belief in angels among men of to-day depends entirely on one's religious outlook, one's general view of God and the world. The man who has scientific proclivities, who has toiled through much doubt and uncertainty before he can sincerely affirm the first article of the Christian creed, 'I believe in God the Father Almighty,' will probably be reluctant to take more cargo aboard than his faith can carry. In other words, he will employ the Law of Parsimony, 'Entia preter necessitatem non multiplicanda sunt,' and, finding the full satisfaction of his religious needs in direct intercourse with God the Father, will reject, or ignore as superfluous, the ministry of angels. So also the man of mystical tendencies, whose eager desire is to have communion with the Divine—who claims to be endowed with a faculty by which he can cognize God, and receive immediate communications from Him, is also likely to regard the intervention of angels between his spirit and the Divine Spirit as an intrusion. And not less so is this the case with one who has leanings to Pantheism—whether he regards God as altogether immanent in the world, or as both immanent and transcendent. In proportion as one's thoughts centre on Divine immanence, and as one regards God as more or less identical with Force, variant but transmutable, present everywhere, and everywhere causative, in that proportion are one's thoughts drawn away from every theological conception but that of the One Great Cause of motion, life, and mind. There is no room for angels.

The only scientific conception which to some minds seems to foster the belief in angels is the Law of Evolution, or, to speak more accurately, the anticipation of gradation of being, encouraged by that law. T. G. Selby, in his volume of sermons headed by one on 'The Imperfect Angel,' contends that a true science welcomes the belief in angels as intervening between man and God. 'It is surely not unscientific,' he says, 'to assume the existence of the pure and mighty beings spoken of by seers and prophets of the olden time.' 'The spirit of inspiration, in seeking to convey to us some faint hint of the strict and awful and absolute holiness of God, depicts ranks of angels infinitely higher and better than the choicest saints on earth; and then tells us that these angels, which seem so lofty and stainless and resplendent, are creatures of unwisdom and shortcoming in comparison with the ineffable wisdom and surpassing holiness of God' (p. 7). Godet in his Biblical Studies on the OT has elaborated a scientific apologia on behalf of angels. He contends that science recognizes three forms of being: species without individuality, in the vegetable world; individuality under bondage to species, in the animal world; individuality overpowering species, in the human race. He holds, therefore, that it is antecedently probable that there is a fourth form of being—individuality without species—each individual owing his existence no longer to parents like himself, but immediately to the Creative Will. This fourth form would exactly be the angel (p. 2 ff.).

It remains now to show that a belief in angels is in precise accord with the fundamental views of God and the world which present themselves in the recorded life and teaching of the Lord Jesus. Were the belief in angels at variance with Christ's personal religious outlook, we might readily regard it as an excrescence which modern thought might lop off without much detriment; but if it is closely allied to our Lord's fundamental doctrines, then this will surely confirm the impression arrived at from other evidence, that Jesus sincerely believed in the reality of angels, and would have us derive from the belief the same comfort and support which He did. Where shall we look with more assurance for the first principles of the doctrine of Jesus than to the Lord's Prayer? 'There our Saviour taught His disciples to say, 'Our Father which art in heaven. Hallowed be Thy name. . . . Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.' Beyond all contradiction, then, it is an axiom of the creed of Jesus that there are beings in heaven who do God's will. It is generally recognized that Jesus presented to men a conception of God which meets the needs of man's religious nature, rather than of his reason and intellect. Men of culture and philosophical training may aspire to know God as 'the One in all,' 'the Absolute,' 'the First Cause'; and may appeal for support to isolated sayings of the Apostles, but not to sayings of the Master. His sayings owe their eternal permanence to the fact that they appeal to that which is common to all men—the innermost in all men—the heart—the religious nature. To conceive of God as the Absolute, or the First Cause, may satisfy the reason; but before the heart can be satisfied, it must know God as Father, the 'Father in heaven.' But the very phrase 'Father in heaven' seems to imply that He has sons in heaven. And that this implication is warranted, is irrefragably substantiated by the words which follow: 'Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.' Surely no one can deny that Christ firmly believed that there are beings in heaven who do God's will, to say the least, far more perfectly than we do, since their obedience is the model to which we are constantly taught to pray that we may attain. Again, it was the outstanding feature of Judaism to push God aloof from men and the world, whereas Jesus brought God nearer to men, as a Father who takes a minute interest in all that concerns us. But if Jesus thus brought heaven nearer to man, He must, in the very act, have brought the occupants of heaven nearer, and must wish us to believe that they also are deeply interested in our welfare. There is no need that angels should tell God anything that concerns us. He knows already far more than they can tell. Those who object to the doctrine of angels because it interposes a barrier between our prayers and our Father's love, misunderstand Christ's teaching. His disclosure of the Fatherliness of God was meant to correct Judaism, in so far as it made angels the bearers of our prayers and the informants to God of our requirements. Those Christians also who approach God through angels contravene in this way Christ's teaching; and also His example, for in the garden He said to Peter (Mt 26<sup>38</sup>): 'I could pray the Father, and he would send . . . angels.' Christ's teaching and example both show that it is our duty and privilege to have direct intercourse with God in prayer and fellowship. But this is not to say that there is no room for the ministry of angels. We may still believe that angels are sent on errands of mercy. Indeed, we may well say to those who on this subject are of doubtful mind, as the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews said: 'Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to do service on behalf of those who shall inherit salvation?' (11<sup>14</sup>). There is nothing at all in the Gospel doctrine of angels which is at variance with the religious needs of the most cultured among us. It may present difficulties to reason, as everything which is supernatural does; but the heart of man which loves God must surely rejoice to think that the heavenly Father has also a 'family in heaven' as on earth (Eph 3<sup>13</sup>). It must always find a responsive chord in the nature of men who allow the heart a place in their creed, to be told that there are beings who 'continually behold the face of our Father,' who are deeply interested in us (Mt 18<sup>10</sup>); that our penitence gives the angels joy (Lk 15<sup>10</sup>); that in our times of depression and anguish it may be our privilege to have 'an angel sent from heaven, strengthening' us (Lk 22<sup>8</sup>), as in our times of gladness it is our privilege to 'give thanks to the Father from whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named' (Eph 3<sup>4</sup>).

J. T. MARSHALL.

ANGER.—Anger is the instinctive resentment or reaction of the soul against anything which it regards as wrong or injurious. It is part of its equipment for self-preservation, and the promptitude and energy with which it comes into play are a fair measure of the soul's power to protect itself from the evil which is in the world. If there is not an instant and indignant repulsion of evil, it creeps into the apathetic soul, and soon makes it not only its victim but its instrument. The child's anger with the fire which burns him is in a sense irrational; but one true meaning and purpose of anger in the moral world is illustrated by it. It is the vehement repulsion of that which hurts, and there is no spiritual, as there is no natural, life without it.

An instinct, however, when we come into the world of freedom and responsibility, always needs education; and the radical character of the education required by the instinct of anger is apparent from the fact that the first thought of almost all men is that anger is a vice. Taking human nature as it is, and looking at the actual manifestations of anger, this is only too true. There is, as a rule, something vicious in them. They are self-regarding in a selfish way. Men are angry, as Aristotle puts it (Ethics, iv, 5, 7), on wrong grounds, or with the wrong people, or in a wrong way, or for too long a time. Their anger is natural, not spiritual; selfish, not guided by consideration of principle; the indulgence of a temper, not the staking of one's being for a cause. In the NT itself there are far more warnings against anger than indications of its true place and function. Yet when we read the Gospels with the idea of anger in our minds, we can easily see that justice is done to it both as a virtue and a vice. There is a certain arbitrariness in trying to systematize the teaching of Jesus on this or on any other subject, but most of the matter can be introduced if we examine (1) the occasions on which Jesus Himself is represented as being angry; (2) those in which He expresses His judgment on moral questions with a vehemence which is undoubtedly inspired by indignation; and (3) those in which He gives express teaching about anger.

1. Occasions on which Jesus Himself is represented as being angry.—(a) The most explicit is Mk 3<sup>6</sup> 'He looked round on them with anger (μετ' ὀργῆς), being grieved (ἐνὸνολόμενος) over the hardening of their heart.' The objects of Christ's anger here are the people in the synagogue, who maintained an obstinate and prejudiced silence when He asked them, 'Is it lawful on the Sabbath day to do good or to do evil, to save life or to kill?' What roused His anger was partly their inhumanity, which cared nothing for the disablement of the man with the withered hand, but even more, perhaps, the misrepresentation of God of which they were guilty, when in His honour (as they would have it) they justified inhumanity on the Sabbath day. To be inhuman themselves was bad enough, but to impute the same inhumanity to the Heavenly Father was far worse, and the indignation of Jesus was visible as He looked round on them. He passionately resented their temper, and repelled it from Him with vehemence, as injurious at once to God and to man. Yet His indignation was expressed in one indignant glance (ἐπιβλέψας, aorist), while it was accompanied by a deep pain, which did not pass away (ἐνὸνολόμενος, present), over the hardening of their heart. This combination, in which resentment of wrong is accompanied with a grief which makes the offender's case one's own, and seeks to win him by reaching the inner witness to God in his soul before insensibility has gone too far, is characteristic of Jesus, and is the test whether anger is Christian.

(b) The next occasion on which we see our Lord display an emotion akin to anger is found in Mk 10<sup>34</sup>. He was 'moved with indignation' (RV ἠγάπησεν) when the disciples forbade the children to be brought to Him. The other instances in which the same word is used (Mk 10<sup>34</sup> 14; Mt 21<sup>18</sup>; Lk 13<sup>14</sup>) show that a natural feeling of being hurt or annoyed is what the word specifically means. The disciples should have known Him better than to do what they did: they wronged Him in forbidding the approach of the children. Hence doctrines and practices which refuse to children, and to the intellectually and morally immature in general, their place and interest in the kingdom of God, are proper subjects of resentment. In one aspect of it, the kingdom of God is a protest against nature, and to enter into it we must be born again; but in another, there is a real analogy between them; the order of nature is constituted with a view to the order of grace; man is made in God's image and for God, and it is his true nature to welcome God; if the children are 'suffered,' and not forbidden, they will go to Jesus. 'They wrong God who deny this, and therefore the denial is to be resented.'

(c) There is a striking passage in Luke (14<sup>26-7</sup>), where, although anger is not mentioned, it is impossible not to feel that Jesus is speaking with a profound and even passionate resentment. 'Great multitudes followed with him, and he turned, and said to them, If any man cometh to me, and hateth not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brothers, and sisters, yes, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple.' Jesus was on His way to die; and it moved Him as an indignity, which He was entitled to resent, that on the very path to the cross He should be attended by a shallow throng who did not have it in them to do the slightest violence to themselves for the sake of the kingdom of God. The whole passage, in which the moral demands of discipleship are set at the highest, vibrates with indignation. To follow Christ is a great enterprise, like building a tower, or going to war; it requires the painful sacrifice of the tenderest natural affections, the renunciation of the most valued possessions; and when it is affected by people who have no moral salt in them—who could not win it from themselves to give up anything for God and His cause—the resentment of Jesus rises into scorn (v. 24). With all His love for men, there was a kind of man whom He did not shrink from describing as 'good for nothing.'

(d) The last passage is that in which Jesus cleanses the Temple: Mk 11<sup>15</sup> and parallels. What stirred His indignation here was in part the profanity to which sacred places and their proper associations had lost all sacredness; in part, the covetousness which on the pretext of accommodating the pilgrims had turned the house of prayer into a den of thieves; in part, again, the inhumanity which, by instituting a market so noisy in the Court of the Gentiles, must have made worship for these less privileged seekers after God difficult, if not impossible. The text quoted in Jn 2<sup>17</sup> (P's 69<sup>9</sup>), as remembered by the disciples in connexion with this event—'the zeal of thy house shall eat me up'—sums up as well as anything could do the one characteristic which is never wanting in the anger of Jesus, and which alone renders anger just. It is jealousy for God—the identification of oneself with His cause and interest on earth, especially as it is represented in human beings, and resentment of everything which does it wrong.*

2. The occasions on which Jesus expresses His judgment on moral questions with a vehemence which is undoubtedly inspired by indignation.—Every moral judgment, of course, contains feeling; it is not merely the expression of assent or dissent, but of consent or resentment. We are all within the moral world, not outside of it; we cannot be spectators merely, but in every thought we are actors as well; to deny this is to deny that there is a moral world at all. Hence all dissent is condemnation, and all condemnation, if real, is resentment; but there are circumstances in which the condemnation is so emphatic that the resentment becomes vivid and contagious, and it is illustrations of this that we wish to find in the life of Jesus.

(a) The most conspicuous is perhaps that which we find in the passage on σκάνδαλα (Mt 18<sup>6f</sup>). Jesus has taken a little child to rebuke the ambitious strife of the Twelve; but 'these little ones who believe in me' are not children, but the disciples generally (cf. Mt 10<sup>42</sup>). 'To make one of them stumble' (σκάνδαλιζειν) is to perplex him, to put him out about Christ, to create misunderstanding and estrangement, such as we hear of for a time in the case of the Baptist (11<sup>20f</sup>) and the Nazarenes (15<sup>7f</sup>), and so to make his discipleship void. In a more general sense it means to mislead, or to be the cause that another falls into sin which his better conscience condemns. If we are to judge from His language, nothing ever moved Jesus to such passionate indignation as this. The sin of sins was that of leading others into sin, especially 'the little ones'—the weak, the untaught, the easily perplexed and easily misled—whose hearts were otherwise naturally right with Him. Every word in Jesus' sentence is laden with indignation: 'Better for him that a great millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea.' This anger of Jesus is exactly what is meant in the OT by 'the jealousy of God,' i. e. His love pledged to His own, and resenting with all the intensity of the Divine nature any wrong inflicted on them (cf. Zec 8<sup>21</sup>). Though anger is often sinful, the absence of anger may be due to the absence of love; and the man who can see the 'little ones' being made to stumble and who takes it quite coolly is very far from the kingdom of God.

(b) It is possibly an instance of this same indignation that we find in Mt 16<sup>23</sup>. Peter tempts Jesus to decline the cross—in other words, tries to make Him stumble at the will of the Father; and the indignant vehemence with which he is repelled—'Get thee behind me, Satan'—shows how real the temptation was, and how a prompt and decisive resentment is the natural security in such trials. We have a right and a duty to be angry with the tempter.

(c) In the answer of Jesus to the Sadducees in Mk 12<sup>24f</sup>, we have another light on what moved Him to indignation. In the scornful πάλιν ληρωσθε with which the discussion closes, resuming the ληρωσθε of v. 24, Jesus' resentment shines out. The question at issue, that of man's immortality, was a great and solemn question. It involved the whole character of God—what He was, and what in His power, His goodness, and His faithfulness He could and would do for the souls He had made * In Mt 21<sup>33</sup> Wellhausen adopts the reading ἡ βερεπε instead of ἡ σφοδρα. This makes the Jews deride Jesus, instead of seriously answering Him; and Wellhausen, taking it so, finds in the words which follow—'The publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you'—not an explanation of the parable, but a Formenspruch, an outbreak of wrath, which could hardly be cleared of petulance (Das Evangelium Matth., 106 l.). O. Holtzmann's idea that Jesus cursed the fig-tree in a momentary fit of temper is only worth mentioning as a warning (see his Leben Jesu, p. 824).

ANGER

in His own image. The Sadducees had tried to degrade it and make it ridiculous, and the indignation of Jesus is unmistakable. It is an example which justifies indignation with those who by unworthy controversial methods profane or render ridiculous subjects in which the dearest concerns of humanity are involved.

(d) To these passages may be added Jesus' denunciation of the Pharisees in Mt 23<sup>23f</sup>. The long series of woes is not merely a revelation of things which in the mind of Jesus are illegitimate, it is a revelation of the passionate resentment which these things evoke in Him. They are the things with which God is angry every day, and it is a sin in men if they can look at them without indignation. To keep people ignorant of religious truth, neither living by it ourselves, nor letting them do so (v. 13); to make piety or the pretence of it a cloak for avarice (v. 14, only introduced here from || Mark); to raise recruits for our own faction on the pretext of enlisting men for the kingdom of God (v. 15); to debase the simple conscience by casuistical, sophistical (vv. 16-22); to destroy the sense of proportion in morals by making morality a matter of law in which all things stand on the same level (v. 23); to put appearance above reality, and reduce life to a play, at once tragedy and farce (vv. 25-28); to revive the spirit and renew the sins of the past, while we affect a pious horror of them, crucifying the living prophets while we build monuments to the martyred (v. 29); these are the things which made a storm of anger sweep over the soul of Jesus, and burst in this tremendous denunciation of His enemies. Yet it is entirely in keeping with the combination of ideas in Mk 3<sup>6</sup> (μετ' ὀργῆς . . . σφωλιωσόμενος) when the Evangelist attaches to this our Lord's lament over Jerusalem (v. 34, cf. Lk 13<sup>34f</sup>). His anger does not extinguish His compassion, and if the city could be moved to repentance He would still gather her children together as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings.

Putting the whole of the passages together, and generalizing from them, we may infer that the two things in human conduct which moved Jesus most quickly and deeply to anger, were (1) inhumanity, wrong done to the needs or rights of men; and (2) misrepresentation of God by professedly religious people, and especially by religious teachers. He stood in the world for the rights and interests, or, we may say, for the truth of God and of human nature; and His whole being reacted immediately and vehemently against all that did wrong to either.

3. Something may further be learned from the passages in which Jesus gives express teaching about anger.—(a) The chief of these is Mt 5<sup>21-27</sup>. Here our Lord interprets the sixth commandment for the citizens of the kingdom of God. It is not only the act of murder which is condemned, but the first movement of the passions which leads in that direction. 'He who murders shall be liable to the judgment? I tell you, every one who is angry with his brother shall be liable to the judgment.' The reading εὐχῆ ('without cause,' temere) is no doubt erroneous here; but the introduction of it is rather a rhetorical than an exegetical blunder. As Tholuck observed, to bring in the idea that there is such a thing as lawful anger would only weaken the condemnation passed here upon such anger as men are familiar with in themselves and others; but after what has been said under (1) and (2), it does not need to be proved that there is a place for anger in the Christian in the world in which we live. What Jesus condemns here is not any kind of anger, but anger with a brother, which forgets that he is a brother, and that we have a brother's duty to him; the anger which leads straight to contemptuous and insulting words (the ἰσχυρὰ and μωροὶ of v. 23), and ends in irreconcilable bitterness (v. 24). Anger like this on the part of one Christian toward another is sin, and sin so deadly that no words could exaggerate the urgency of escape from it. No religious duty, not even the most sacred, can take precedence of the duty of reconciliation. If a man should be offering his gift at the altar—if he should actually be seated at the communion table with the communion cup in his hand, let him put it down, and go first, and get out of these angry relations with his brother, and then come and have fellowship with God (v. 24). How can an angry man, with the temper of a quarrel in him, have communion with the God of peace? It is possible to raise casuistical questions in all such situations as are here supposed, but as these questions present themselves only to the spectators, not to the responsible actors, it is not worth while to raise them. The one duty insisted on here, as in the partly parallel passage in Mt 18<sup>31-33</sup>, is the duty of placability. The person who has suffered the wrong—that is, who is in the right, who is entitled to be angry—is for that very reason to take the initiative in reconciliation, and to bear the expense of it. That is how God deals with us, who have offended Him, and that is how we are to deal with those who offend us. There is to be no anger in the sense of a selfish resentment into which the bad passions of unregenerate human nature can pour themselves; and the lawful anger of the soul, whose wrong is a wrong done to the kingdom of God, will pass away at once when he who has done the wrong is brought to repentance. The penitence and the resentment are the guilty and the innocent index of the reality of the wrong; and each is as inevitable as the other if the Christian life is to be morally sincere.

(b) It is natural to take account here of the passage on retaliation and non-resistance in Mt 5<sup>38-39</sup>. Anger seems to be unconditionally precluded by such a saying as, 'Whosoever smiteth thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also.' It is on the face unjustly (as is assumed in the connexion) without resenting it, and just as difficult to believe that it would be for the good of humanity or of the kingdom of God that it should be so. But Jesus, who came to abolish one literalism, did not come to institute another. His words are never to be read as statutes, but as appeals to conscience. What He teaches in this place is that there is no limit to be laid down beforehand beyond which love is no longer to regulate the conduct of His disciples. No provocation can be so insulting, no demand can be so unjust, so irrational, so exasperating, as that His disciples shall be entitled to cast love overboard, and meet the world with weapons like its own. Love must to all extremities be the supreme and determining principle in their conduct, the same love, with the same interests in view, as that of their Father in heaven (v. 43); but no more in them than in Him does it exclude all manifestation of anger. What it does exclude is the selfish anger which is an alternative to love, not the Divine resentment which is a mode of love, and expresses its sense of the reality of wrong. If this died out of the world, society would swiftly rot to extinction; but the gospel, in the sense of the words, the example, and the spirit of Jesus, is so far from proscribing this that it is the greatest of all powers for keeping it alive. For those who have learned that where the spirit of the Lord is there is liberty, the literal interpretation of words like Mt 5<sup>38-39</sup> is a combination of pedantry and fanaticism which no genius will ever make anything else than absurd.

Echoes of the teaching of Jesus on anger are probably to be traced at various points in the teaching of the Apostles. E.g. in Ro 12, a chapter which often recalls the Sermon on the Mount, vv. 16-21 are entirely in the key of Mt 5<sup>38-39</sup>. 'The wrath' of Ro 12<sup>19</sup>, to which Christians are to leave room, is the wrath of God which will be revealed at the last day. God has reserved for Himself (ἡμεῖς ἐδικίοντες, ἕως ἀποκαθάρσεως) the vindication of the wronged, and they are not to forestall Him or take His work out of His hands; in the day of wrath, when His righteous judgment is revealed, all wrongs will be rectified; meanwhile, as Christ teaches, love is to rule all our conduct, and we must overcome evil with good. It is perhaps with a vague recollection of Mt 5<sup>32</sup> that men are directed in 1 Ti 2<sup>8</sup> to pray χαρῆς ὀργῆς: an angry man cannot pray. Accordingly a bishop must not be ὀργῆλος, given to anger, or of an uncontrollable temper (Tit 1). Exhortations like those in Eph 4<sup>2</sup>, Col 3<sup>1</sup>, Ja 1<sup>19</sup>, show that anger was known to the Church mainly in forms which the Christian conscience condemned. Ja 1<sup>19</sup> is particularly interesting, because it reminds us of the danger (in anger) of enlisting self in the service of God, calling on the old man to do what can be done only by the new: 'The wrath of men worketh not the righteousness of God.' But though it is difficult, it need not be impossible that the wrath which a man feels, and under the impulse of which he expresses himself, should be, not 'the wrath of man,' but a Divine resentment of evil. The words of Mt 18<sup>34</sup> or Mt 23<sup>34</sup> fell from human lips, but they are the expression and the instrument of the jealousy of God. To be angry without sin is difficult for men, but it is a difficult duty (Eph 4<sup>26</sup>).

Apart from anything yet alluded to is the use of the verb ἐμψυμάσθαι to describe some kind of emotion in Jesus (Mk 1<sup>4</sup>, Mt 9<sup>30</sup>, Jn 11<sup>38, 39</sup>). Ordinarily the word conveys the idea of indignation which cannot be repressed; but this, though found elsewhere in the Gospels (e.g. Mk 14<sup>4</sup>), is not obviously appropriate in the passages quoted. In the first two it may be due to our Lord's consciousness of the fact that the persons on whom He had conferred a great blessing were immediately going to disregard His command to keep silent about it; the sense of this put something severe and peremptory into His tones. In the last two it has been explained as expressing Jesus' sense of the indignity of death; He resented, as something not properly belonging to the Divine idea of the world, such experiences as He was confronted with on the way to the grave of Lazarus. But this is precarious, and on the whole there is little stress to be laid on any inference we can draw from the use of ἐμψυμάσθαι in the Gospels.

JAMES DENNEY.

ANIMALS.—It cannot be said that animals play a very important part in the life and teaching of our Lord; yet the Gospel references cover a wider range than is usually imagined. The Evangelists use no fewer than 40 different Greek words denoting animals, and, apart from such general terms as 'birds of the air,' 'wild beasts,' and 'serpents,' they mention at least 20 particular kinds. The references may best be classified under the headings 'Domestic' and 'Wild.'

I. DOMESTIC ANIMALS.—1. The beasts of burden in Palestine in the time of our Lord were the ass and the camel. The horse is not mentioned in the Gospels, its use in the East being restricted to purposes of war. Thus the horse becomes prominent in the military imagery of the Apocalypse.

A general term for 'beast of burden' occurs in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>33</sup> ζῷον). In Rev 18<sup>2</sup> 'beasts of burden' are distinguished from horses. Josephus (Ant. iv. vi. 3) uses the word of asses in particular. In Ac 22<sup>3</sup> a 'beast' is provided to carry St. Paul to Caesarea; in the NT therefore ζῷον is clearly some 'beast of burden' which is not a horse. Probably the Good Samaritan rode on an ass, or possibly on a mule.

The ass is denoted by four other words in the Gospels, viz. πῶλος, ὄναρον, ἄνος, and ὄνον. The animal on which our Lord made His triumphal entry into Jerusalem is described by all four Evangelists as a colt (πῶλος, Mt 21<sup>2-7</sup>, Mk 11<sup>2-7</sup>, Lk 19<sup>30-35</sup>, Jn 12<sup>14</sup>). The word is not used elsewhere in the Gospels, and in John it occurs only in the quotation from Zechariah. St. John describes the colt as ὄναρον, a young ass. St. Matthew introduces the she-ass, the mother of the colt, into the story. In the Matthean form of the quotation from Zechariah (Mt 21<sup>2</sup>) the mother ass is further described as a draught beast (ὄνον ὄνον).

The meaning of this fulfilment of prophecy is well brought out by Chrysostom: 'Jesus entered Jerusalem riding on an ass, not driving chariots like the rest of the kings, not demanding tributes, not thrusting men off, and leading about guards, but displaying His great meekness even hereby' (Hom. 66 in Mt.).

The triumphal entry into Jerusalem is the only incident in the life of our Lord in which an ass is concerned; but in His teaching, as reported by St. Luke, there are two other references. The synagogue-ruler, who forbade people to come to be healed on the Sabbath, received the rebuke, 'Hypocrites, does not each one of you loose his ox or his ass (τὸν ὄνον) from the stall on the Sabbath and lead him away to watering?' (Lk 13<sup>16</sup>). On another occasion, with reference to the same question of Sabbath healing, our Lord asked, 'Which of you shall have an ass or an ox fallen into a well, and will not straightway draw him up on a Sabbath day?' (Lk 14<sup>5</sup>).

The text of the latter passage is uncertain, the evidence of κ and B being divided. B reads αἷμα, adopted by Westcott and Hort; while κ reads ἄνα, retained by the Revisers. Possibly neither is the correct text; but if we follow the Revisers, we may notice that on the only two occasions when the ass is mentioned in our Lord's teaching, it is coupled with the ox, as if to imply that the Jewish farmer took equal care of each. 'The ox, the ass, and the sheep are the (chief) domestic animals with which an Israelite household is provided' (O. Holtzmann).

The ass occupies a much more important place in the farm life of the East than his neglected descendant in England to-day. The finer breeds are regularly used for riding, while the commoner breeds draw the plough and carry burdens. 'The ass is still the most universal of all beasts of burden in Bible lands' (Post, in Hastings' DB).

The camel (κάμηλος) figures in two sayings of our Lord which have a proverbial ring. (Thomson notes that the camel is still the subject of many Arabian proverbs). The three Synoptics record the saying, 'It is easier for a camel to pass through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God' (Mt 19<sup>24</sup>, Mk 10<sup>25</sup>, Lk 18<sup>25</sup>). There is no need to stumble at the hyperbole involved in 'a needle's eye,' nor is it necessary to explain the phrase as a reference to a particularly small gate (see art. 'Camel' in Hastings' DB). The second reference is found in the denunciation of the Pharisees, who strain out a gnat while they gulp down a camel (Mt 23<sup>24</sup>). A camel-caravan would be one of the sights of our Lord's boyhood, and the awkwardness of meeting a camel in the narrow street, which modern travellers experience, was not unknown nineteen hundred years ago. The camel must have been the largest animal with which our Lord was familiar, and in both sayings it is mentioned for its size.

The only other reference to the camel occurs in the description of the dress of John the Baptist, whose garment, like that of Elijah, was of camel's hair (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>6</sup>).

On this Sir Thomas Browne notes: 'a coarse garment, a cilicium or sackcloth garment, suitable to the austerity of his life—the severity of his doctrine, repentance—and the place thereof, the wilderness—his food and diet, locusts and wild honey.'

2. Of larger cattle,* oxen, bulls, and calves find a place in the Gospels.

The ox (βοῦς) is mentioned three times in Luke, twice in connexion with the ass in the passages previously cited (Lk 13<sup>15</sup> 14<sup>5</sup>), and again in the parable of the Great Supper, when one of the invited guests excuses himself on the ground that he has bought five yoke of oxen which need to be tested (Lk 14<sup>19</sup>). The ox was employed in the East for ploughing and threshing; it was also used for sacrifice, as appears from the only other passage in the Gospels where oxen are mentioned, viz. St. John's account of the cleansing of the Temple court. Sheep and oxen (Jn 2<sup>14c</sup>) were driven out along with their vendors.

Bulls (ταύροι) and fat beasts (σκινοτά)† are mentioned only in Mt 22<sup>4</sup>. They form samples of the rich dainties prepared for the marriage feast of the king's son, and illustrate the magnificent scale of the entertainment which those summoned to partake so insolently spurned. Similarly the fatted calf (ὁ μωχὸς ὁ σκετερός), which appears only in the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15<sup>23-29</sup>), indicates an unusual feast, made to celebrate an unusual joy. The fatted calf is contrasted with the kid, the customary repast, which Oriental hospitality provides to this day. The elder brother complains that he has never been allowed to offer his friends the entertainment which his father is wont to provide for any chance visitor; while for the graceless prodigal is killed the fatted calf, which is destined only for high festivals. The bulls and fattings in the parable of the Marriage Feast, and the fatted calf in the parable of the Returning Prodigal, alike stand for the lavish generosity of God's love, which the Scribes and Pharisees could not appreciate, even when offered to themselves, the king's invited guests, much less when those prodigals, the publicans and sinners, were likewise embraced therein.

3. Of smaller cattle, goats and sheep are mentioned.

Goats (εἰσφοῖ, εἰσφοῖον, lit. 'kid,' a meaning retained in Lk 15<sup>26</sup>; in LXX the word = 'goat' as well as 'kid') appear only in the picture of the Last Judgment (Mt 25<sup>32-33</sup>), where they are contrasted with sheep. The point of the contrast lies in the colour rather than the character of the animals, the sheep being pure white, while the goats are covered with long jet-black hair. So in the Song of Solomon (4<sup>1</sup>) the locks of the beloved are compared to 'a flock of goats that appear from Mt. Gilead.' The Son of Man shall separate all the nations 'as a shepherd separateth the sheep from the goats,' and the simile is quite true to pastoral life. Tristram (Nat. Hist. p. 89) says that sheep and goats pasture together, but never trespass on each other's domains; they are folded together, but they do not mix; they may be seen to enter the fold in company, but once inside they are kept separate.

The Syrian goat, Capra mambrica, is the most common breed in Palestine. It is distinguished by long pendant ears, stout recurved horns, and long black silky hair. Flocks of goats are most frequent in hilly districts from Hebron to Lebanon, where their habit of browsing on young trees tends to deforest the country.

* The word 'cattle' is used to tr. βοῦματα in Jn 4<sup>12</sup>. The word is also found in the AV of Lk 17<sup>7</sup>.
† Wyclif, following the Vulg. avellana, translates 'my volatilis (tows)'; but fatted cattle are probably meant.

A kid (ερφος, some MSS ερδων) is mentioned in the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15<sup>26</sup>). The kid formed the ordinary dish at an Eastern feast, as lambs were preserved for the sake of wool, and were, as a rule, slain only in sacrifice. For the contrast between the kid and the fatted calf see above, a 'fatted calf.' There is no other direct mention of the goat in the Gospels, though the wine-bottles (αραια) referred to in Mt 9<sup>17</sup> (|| Mk 2<sup>22</sup>, Lk 5<sup>37</sup>) were doubtless made of goat-skin. These bottles were made by cutting off the head and legs, and drawing the carcass out by the neck, and then tying the neck, legs, and vent, and tanning the skin, with the hairy side out (Post, in Hastings' DB II, 195).

The word for sheep (προβατον) is to be found in the Gospels no fewer than 36 times, while words connected with sheep, e.g. πολυη, πολυων, 'a flock,' are not infrequent. Sheep were so often in the thoughts of Jesus that we have postponed fuller consideration of these passages to § IV.

Of the two words for lamb, one, αμνος, is applied only to our Lord, whom John the Baptist twice describes as 'the Lamb of God,' adding in one case 'which taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 1<sup>29, 36</sup>). The title implies sacrifice.

Whether the Baptist was thinking of the Paschal lamb or of the lamb daily offered in the temple matters little. In Jesus he saw 'the reality of which all animal sacrifice was the symbol' (Marcus Dods). No doubt the patience of the lamb is implied in the title, as unfolded in Lk 2<sup>27</sup> as 'lamb because he is dumb, so he opened not his mouth.' The purity of the lamb, without spot and without fault, on which St. Peter dwells (1 P 1<sup>19</sup>), is also involved. But the idea of redemption through sacrifice is fundamental in the Baptist's words.

The second word for 'lamb' occurs in two forms, αρνας (acc. pl.) and αρνιον. The diminutive form is found only in Jn 21<sup>15</sup>, where our Lord bids Peter feed His lambs. 'Lambs' is used instead of 'sheep,' to bring out more strongly the appeal to care, and the consequent complete confidence in Peter (M. Dods). In the Apocalypse our Lord is called 'the Lamb' (το αρνιον) no fewer than 27 times. The form αρνας is confined to Lk 10<sup>8</sup> 'Behold, I send you forth as lambs into the midst of wolves.'

The parallel Mt 10<sup>16</sup> reads 'sheep,' but the Lukan form is supported by Clement of Rome, Ep. II, 2, 'Ye shall be as lambs (αρνια) in the midst of wolves. But Peter answered him, saying, If then the wolves tear the lambs in pieces? Jesus said to Peter, Let not the lambs fear the wolves, after they (the lambs) are dead.' Further support for the reading 'lambs' may perhaps be derived from Justin's casual description of Marcionites as lambs torn by wolves (Αποστ. ανακηρυξεις, Αποστ. c. 65).

3. Poultry were kept in Palestine in the time of our Lord, as is clear from the references to the cock (αλεκτριον) and the hen (ορνις). If we except the mention of cock-crow (see sep. art.) in Mk 13<sup>35</sup>, the cock appears only in the story of Peter's denial, and our Lord's prediction of it (Mt 26<sup>34, 74</sup>, Mk 14<sup>30, 69-72</sup>, Lk 22<sup>34, 69</sup>, Jn 13<sup>38, 18</sup>). The hen (ορνις) affords a simile in the lament over Jerusalem. 'How often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her chickens (Lk. 'her brood') under her wings!' (Mt 23<sup>37</sup>, Lk 13<sup>34</sup>). The action by which the hen gives rest and protection to the chickens under the shelter of her wings is too well known to need comment. The tenderness of the simile witnesses to the love of Jesus for His own countrymen, and His longing to avert national disaster. The words used for 'chickens' and 'brood' (ορνιθιον and ορνιθια) are found here only, though a word from the same root is employed in the phrase 'two young pigeons' (οσσαδις περιστερων, Lk 2<sup>24</sup>).

5. To the list of domestic animals we may add dogs and swine, which were classed together as unclean.

Dogs (κυνας) are mentioned twice. In the Sermon on the Mount the disciples are warned not to give that which is holy to dogs (Mt 7<sup>6</sup>). The pariah dogs that infest Eastern towns, and have to be cleared off periodically with poison, are 'a lean, mangy, and sinister brood,' acting as scavengers and living on offal. Naturally these animals do not possess a fastidious palate, and their manner of life is disgusting enough to justify the Jews' contempt for them. To call a man a dog is throughout the Bible a customary form of abuse. These wild dogs, says Tristram (Nat. Hist. p. 80), were the only dogs known in Palestine, with the exception of the Persian greyhound; and though they could be trained enough to act as watch-dogs for the sheep-folds,* they hardly became companions to man [the dog of 1<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>11</sup> is altogether an exceptional case]. To the Jew the dog was a very fitting symbol of the man who had depraved his moral and spiritual taste by evil living. In the Didache, 'Give not that which is holy to dogs' is interpreted to mean, Do not administer the Eucharist to the unbaptized; but the principle involved in the text is capable of wider application. A Christian is not required to wear his heart on his sleeve! In the parable of Dives and Lazarus it is said that these street-dogs came and licked the beggar's sores (Lk 16<sup>21</sup>). This is an aggravation rather than an alleviation of Lazarus' suffering. It shows his destitute and defenceless condition, that he could not even keep the dogs away! A diminutive form of κυων, viz. κυωριον, occurs in the story of the Syro-Phoenician woman. 'It is not right,' said the Master, 'to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs.' 'Yea, Lord,' replied the woman, 'yet the dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from their masters' table' (Mt 15<sup>27</sup>, Mk 7<sup>27</sup>). Bohart treats the diminutive κυωριον as doubling the contempt inherent in the word. But it is clear from the woman's reply that the dogs in question are kept within the house; they are household pets. Tristram says that a puppy taken from among the pariah dogs (Nat. Hist. p. 80). Probably the κυωρια were puppies which had been taken into Jewish households as pets in a similar way. The word is not intended to add to the harshness of our Lord's saying; the woman saw in it her ground for appeal.

Swine (χοιροι, not βει) appear in the story of the Gadarene demoniac (Mt 8<sup>28</sup>, Mk 5<sup>12</sup>, Lk 8<sup>26</sup>). 'The fact that swine were kept in Palestine at all is evidence of the presence of the foreigner' (O. Holtzmann). Cf. Lv 11<sup>7</sup>, Dt 14<sup>8</sup>, Is 65<sup>4</sup>. The country on the east side of the Lake was much under Gentile influence. The Prodigal Son is put to tend swine. The nature of the task is evidence at once of the difference between his home and the far country, and of the want and degradation into which he has fallen (Lk 15<sup>16</sup>). The only further reference to swine is the saying, 'Cast not your pearls before swine' (Mt 7<sup>6</sup>), in which our Lord emphasizes the necessity of tact in religious work.

H. WILD ANIMALS.—1. Ορνιθιον, the general word for wild beast, is found in the Gospels only once. Mk 1<sup>13</sup> tells us that during the Temptation our Lord was with the wild beasts. Thomson says that 'though there are now no lions (in Palestine), wolves, leopards, and panthers still prowls about the wild wady's' (Land and Book, 'Central Palestine,' p. 594). 'In the age of Jesus, the chief beast of prey in Palestine was, as to-day, the jackal. Mark's addition indicates Jesus' complete severance from human society' (O. Holtzmann, Life of Jesus, p. 143 f.).

* The word ορνιθιον is now to be found in the second of the five new sayings recently recovered by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt: 'The birds of the air and whatever of the beasts are on the earth or under it are they who draw us into the kingdom.'

* It would be truer to say that the pariah dogs have degenerated from the sheep-dogs than that the latter have developed from the former.

Here the word is not confined to 'beasts of prey': it stands for the whole kingdom of wild animals. There is a similar use of the word in a saying of our Lord as given by Justin Martyr: 'Be not anxious as to what ye shall eat or what ye shall put on: are ye not much better than the birds and the beasts?' (1 Apol. 15). These considerations support the conclusion that St. Mark's addition does not imply physical danger, but is rather intended to suggest that our Lord was alone with Nature.

Two beasts of prey mentioned by name in the Gospels are the fox (ἀλώπηξ) and the wolf (λύκος). The fox, which has at least a hole to live in, is contrasted with the homeless Son of Man (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>, Lk 9<sup>58</sup>). In Lk 13<sup>32</sup> our Lord speaks of Herod as 'that fox.' The cunning and perhaps the cowardice of the animal are the basis of the comparison. 'The name,' says O. Holtzmann, 'must have been given to Herod because he was mimical, yet, not daring to make any open attack, timidly prowled about until he found an opportunity to murder in secret' (Life of Jesus, p. 364).

The wolf is mentioned only in connexion with or in contrast to sheep. The wolf is the chief enemy against which the shepherd has to guard his flock. 'A single wolf,' says Tristram, 'is far more destructive than a whole pack of jackals' (Nat. Hist. p. 153). Eastern shepherds employ dogs (if they employ them at all) not to help in herding the sheep, but to ward off wolves. In contrast to the hireling, the Good Shepherd faces the wolf even at the risk of his life (Jn 10<sup>12</sup>). False prophets are wolves in sheep's clothing (Mt 7<sup>15</sup>). The contrast between outward profession and inward character could not be more vividly expressed. The same antithesis is used by our Lord to portray the contrast between the Church and the world, between the patient non-resistance of the one and the brutal violence of the other. The disciples are sent forth as sheep (Lk. as lambs) into the midst of wolves (Mt 10<sup>16</sup>, Lk 10<sup>3</sup>).

2. The general term for wild birds is περὴναι, 'the birds,' often τὰ περὴναι τῶν οὐρανῶν, 'the birds of heaven.' They are mentioned in the Sermon on the Mount: 'Consider the birds: they do not sow, nor reap, nor gather into barns' (Mt 6<sup>26</sup>; in the parallel passage, Lk 12<sup>24</sup>, the reading is κόρακες, 'ravens,' which, however, are themselves called περὴναι at the end of the verse). Dean Stanley says that the birds most in evidence round the Sea of Galilee are partridges and pigeons. Finches and bulbuls are also abundant, according to Thomson. For the doctrine of providence involved in this and similar sayings of our Lord, we must refer our readers to § iv. Like the foxes, the birds are contrasted with the Son of Man; they have nests, while He hath not where to lay His head (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>, Lk 9<sup>58</sup>). The birds appear in the parable of the Sower, where they pick up the seed that falls by the wayside (Mt 13<sup>4</sup>, Mk 4<sup>4</sup>, Lk 8<sup>5</sup>). No doubt the fields round the lake, with the birds busy upon them, could be seen from the place where Jesus stood to teach the people. Probably the parable was spoken early in the year. The parable of the Mustard Seed also introduces the birds, which come and lodge in the branches of the full-grown tree (Mt 13<sup>32</sup>, Mk 4<sup>32</sup>, Lk 13<sup>19</sup>). Here the imagery seems to be drawn from Dn 4<sup>12-21</sup>, where the kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar is likened to a tree 'upon whose branches the birds of the heavens had their habitations.' Daniel interprets the tree to represent the greatness of Nebuchadnezzar's dominion, which is to reach to the end of the earth. The description in the parable carries with it the same implication with regard to the kingdom of heaven. There is one other reference to 'the birds' in Lk 12<sup>24</sup> 'How much better are ye than the birds!'

The following particular wild birds are mentioned in the Gospels:—dove (pigeon), eagle, raven, sparrow, turtle-dove.

VOL. I.—5

In all four Gospels the dove appears as the symbol of the Holy Ghost at our Lord's Baptism. In Mt 3<sup>16</sup> the vision of the Holy Ghost descending in the form of a dove (ὄρατ' ἑπερὴναι) seems to have been granted to all present at the Baptism. In Mk 1<sup>10</sup> and Lk 3<sup>22</sup> the vision is apparently addressed more especially to Jesus Himself. In Jn 1<sup>32</sup> it is a sign given to John the Baptist. In the story of the Creation, a metaphor from bird-life is employed to describe the Spirit of God fluttering (RVm 'brooding') over the waters (Gn 1<sup>7</sup>). The same Spirit rests on the Saviour with whom begins God's new creation. But the mention of the dove naturally carries us back to the story of the Flood (Gn 8<sup>11</sup>). For Jesus the dove with olive-leaf after the Flood is the emblem of the Spirit (A. B. Bruce in Expositor's Greek Testament, on Mt 3<sup>16</sup>). The Holy Ghost in the form of a dove typifies the hope of the gospel, peace between man and God. In cleansing the Temple-courts our Lord came upon them that sold doves for sacrifice. It is to these dove-sellers that the words in Jn 2<sup>16</sup> are addressed, 'Take these things hence.' The cattle can be driven out; the doves must be carried out. This detail, which is perfectly natural, is recorded only in John, who consequently mentions 'doves' twice (Jn 2<sup>14-16</sup>), while Matthew and Mark have only one reference each (Mt 21<sup>12</sup>, Mk 11<sup>16</sup>).

The word περὴναι is used in the LXX where the EV reads 'pigeon' as well as where it reads 'dove.' The same bird is probably meant by the two English words. But in the LXX for sacrifice in Leviticus, the word 'pigeon' is regularly used, and in Lk 2<sup>24</sup> περὴναι is translated 'pigeon,' though elsewhere in the Gospels it is rendered 'dove.' In Lv 12<sup>8</sup> a poor woman, 'if she be not able to bring a lamb, shall bring two turtles or two young pigeons.' The mother of Jesus brings the poor woman's sacrifice.

To the ancients the dove symbolized purity (Aristotle mentions the chastity of the dove), and this fact perhaps made birds of this class suitable for sacrifice. The only other reference to the dove in the Gospels is found in Mt 10<sup>16</sup>, where the disciples are bidden to be as pure (ἀκέραια) as doves, a command which St. Paul echoes in Ro 16<sup>18</sup> and Ph 2<sup>15</sup>.

The turtle-dove (τρογιδόν) is mentioned only in the quotation from Lv 12<sup>8</sup> in Lk 2<sup>24</sup>. There are three species of turtle-doves in Palestine. The colored turtle (T. risorius) is the largest, and frequents the shores of the Dead Sea. The palm turtle (T. senegalensis) 'resorts much to the gardens and enclosures of Jerusalem.' 'It is very familiar and confiding in man, and is never molested.' The common turtle (T. auritus) is the most abundant of the three species.

The eagle (ἀετός) is the subject of a proverbial saying recorded in Mt 24<sup>28</sup> || Lk 17<sup>37</sup> 'where the carcass is, there shall the eagles be gathered together.' According to Post, there are four kinds of vultures and eight kinds of eagles to be found in the Holy Land. Here the term 'eagle' is generic. Thomson describes the eagles' flight as majestic, and their eyesight and, apparently, sense of smell, are both extremely keen.

The exact force of the above saying is hard to determine. Some old commentators, following the Fathers take it to refer to 'the influx of the godly to the light and liberty of the Gospel' (Master Trapp). More modern exegesis regards the passage as hinting at the gathering of the Roman eagles round the moribund Jewish nation. But Bengel rightly observes that in Mt 24 the reference of v. 28 goes back to the false prophets and false Christs of v. 25. In the decay of Judaism as a religious faith, such men will find their opportunity, and will turn popular fanaticism to their own profit. In Matthew the proverb is perfectly general in form, and is capable of wider application. National ruin and feverish religiosity go hand in hand. False Messianism marked the final overthrow of the Jews in A.D. 135; and when the barbarians laid siege to Rome in 408, even a Pope consented to resort to Etruscan magic rites! (Milman, Latin Christianity, i. 126). In Lk 17<sup>27</sup> the 'whosoever' becomes 'where', and the saying is in answer to a definite question regarding the signs that are to mark the sudden return of the Son of Man. Here it is difficult not to interpret the eagles of the Roman standard. For St. Luke evidently does not take the saying as a statement of a general law. The Matthean form and position give the more attractive interpretation.

The raven (κόραξ) is mentioned only in Lk 12<sup>24</sup>, 'Consider the ravens how they neither sow nor reap.' The parallel Mt. 6<sup>26</sup> reads, 'birds.' The whole passage and the force of Luke's change will be considered in § iv. The term 'raven' includes the numerous tribes of crows. Tristram mentions eight different species as common in Palestine. God's care for the ravens is twice mentioned in OT (Job 38<sup>4</sup> Ps 147<sup>9</sup>). These passages may have influenced Luke, if he changed 'birds' into 'ravens.' Again, they may have been in the mind of our Lord, if Luke gives the original form of the saying.

The sparrow (σπριουδιον) is twice mentioned in sayings recorded both in Matthew and Luke. In Mt 10<sup>29</sup> we read, 'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing?' and in Lk 12<sup>6</sup> 'Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings?' In Tatian's Diatessaron the words in taberna, 'in the cookshop,' are added. Doubtless we have here the prices current in popular eating-houses in the time of our Lord. 'Sparrows, two a farthing; five a halfpenny.' In Mt 10<sup>21</sup> and Lk 12<sup>7</sup> our Lord adds, 'Ye are much more worth than many sparrows.' For a discussion of these references to sparrows and of their bearing on our Lord's teaching, we must again refer our readers to § iv.

3. For fish, three words are used, ἰχθύς, ἰχθυίον, and ὀψάριον. The latter term is confined to John. In the feeding of the five thousand, the Synoptics speak of 'two fishes' (δύο ἰχθύας, Mt 14<sup>17, 19</sup>; Mk 6<sup>38, 41, 43</sup>; Lk 9<sup>13, 16</sup>). The parallel narrative in John reads δύο ὀψάρια, which is also translated 'two fishes' (Jn 6<sup>9, 11</sup>). But while the Syn. ἰχθύς is a general term, ὀψάριον, says Edersheim, 'refers, no doubt, to those small fishes (probably a kind of sardine) of which millions were caught in the lake, and which, dried and salted, would form the most common savoury, with bread, for the fisher-population along the shore' (Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, I. 682). The parable of the Drag-net (Mt 13<sup>47-50</sup>) is taken from the life of the Galilean fisher-folk. But this definite meaning of ὀψάριον cannot always be maintained: for in John's narrative of the miraculous draught of fishes, ὀψάριον and ἰχθύς are interchanged as equivalents (ὀψάριον, Jn 21<sup>10, 11, 12</sup>; ἰχθύς, vv. 8, 11). Jesus says to the disciples, 'Bring of the fish (ἰχθυίον) which ye have now caught. Simon Peter went up, and dragged the net to shore full of great fishes' (ἰχθυίον). Both in the narratives of the miraculous multiplication of loaves and fishes and in His post-resurrection appearance by the lake, our Lord makes use of the disciples' own resources, while adding to them something of His own. In the similar miracle recorded in Lk 5, ἰχθύς is the word used (vv. 2, 9). When narrating the feeding of the four thousand, both Matthew and Mark speak of a few small fishes (ὀψάρια ἰχθύας, Mt 15<sup>2</sup>; Mk 8<sup>7</sup>). These are probably the same as the ὀψάρια of Jn 6. In Mt 15<sup>36</sup> ἰχθύς reappears. The remaining references to fish do not require much comment. Mt 17<sup>27</sup> is concerned with the stater in the fish's mouth. This passage contains the only reference to line-fishing in the Gospels: 'Cast a hook and take the first fish (ἰχθύς) that cometh up.' In Lk 24<sup>42</sup> we read that our Lord convinced the disciples of the reality of His resurrection by eating before them a piece of cooked fish (ἰχθύς στρογγύλον). In Mt 7<sup>12</sup> Lk 11<sup>12</sup> the word ἰχθύς, 'fish,' is found in the teaching of Jesus. In Matthew the passage runs thus: 'What man is there among you who, if his son ask for bread, will give him a stone? or if he ask for fish, will give him a serpent?' Here fish and bread are the subject of joint reference, as in the narratives of the feeding of the five and four thousands. Bread and fish are clearly the customary diet of the common people of Galilee, and in the form of these questions, as in so many other details, the teaching of Jesus closely reflects the daily life of His countrymen.

In the Catacombs the figure of a fish was often used as a symbol of Christ. The letters which make up ἰχθύς form the initial letters of Ἰησοῦς Χριστός Θεοῦ Υἱός Σωτήρ, so that the word served as a summary of the faith. See art. CHRIST IN ART.

4. The general word for scorpions (ἰσκιόεις) occurs 7 times in the Gospels. No human father will give his son a serpent as a substitute for fish (Mt 7<sup>10</sup>, Lk 11<sup>11</sup>). Some small reptile as common as the scorpion must be meant, as Luke twice (10<sup>19</sup> 11<sup>12</sup>) couples scorpions and serpents (ἰσκιόεις). The disciples are to be as wise as serpents for 'as the serpent,' reading ἰσκιόεις for ὀφίς; the sense is the same in either case] (Mt 10<sup>16</sup>). The ideal of discipleship is a combination of the prudence of the serpent with the guilelessness of doves. As in the saying about not casting one's pearls before swine, our Lord here condemns recklessness and tactlessness in religious work. 'Religion without policy is too simple to be safe: Policy without religion is too subtle to be good' (Trapp). In Mt 23<sup>34</sup> the word 'serpents' is applied to the Pharisees.

In the later appendix to Mark's Gospel, power to take up serpents is numbered among the signs that are to follow faith in Christ (10<sup>28</sup>). The passage is paralleled in Lk 10<sup>19</sup>: 'Behold, I have given you power to tread upon serpents and scorpions, and upon all the might of the evil one.' WH here note a reference to Pe 8<sup>13</sup>: 'Thou shalt tread upon the lion and the adder.' Possibly the passage is to be interpreted metaphorically, and the 'serpents' are to be explained by the night of the Evil One. The words, however, find a more literal fulfilment in St. Paul's experience at Melita (Ac 28<sup>5</sup>).

The viper (ἐχιδνα) is referred to only in the phrase γεννηματα ἐχιδνῶν, 'offspring of vipers,' and the phrase is applied only to scribes and Pharisees. John the Baptist thus addressed the Pharisees that came to his baptism, 'O offspring of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?' (Mt 3<sup>7</sup>, Lk 3<sup>7</sup>). According to Mt., our Lord on two occasions adopted the same mode of address (Mt 12<sup>34</sup> 23<sup>35</sup>). Sand-vipers about 1 foot long are common in Palestine. The young are said to feed upon the mother. But the force of the phrase, Bochart observes, is not to be derived from any such special characteristic; the sense implied is simply 'bad sons of bad fathers.' This comment satisfactorily interprets Mt 23<sup>35</sup>: but perhaps we may read a little more into the phrase. The words of John the Baptist suggest the familiar picture of vipers roused from torpor into activity by the approach of heat (cf. Ac 28<sup>3</sup>). In Mt 12<sup>34</sup> the phrase receives added point from the fact that the Pharisees have just been attempting to poison the popular mind against Christ by suggesting that the miracles were the work of Beelzebub; there is something spiteful and venomous about their attacks on our Lord.

5. Scorpions (σκορπιός), which we are told may be found under every third stone in Palestine, are twice mentioned in Luke. The disciples are to tread on scorpions with impunity (Lk 10<sup>19</sup>). However we interpret the passage, the addition of 'scorpion' seems to imply that the disciples are to be protected against some small, frequent, and at the same time serious danger. The other reference is in Lk 11<sup>12</sup>. If a son asks for an egg, the father will not give him a scorpion. In both passages the scorpion and the serpent are mentioned together, being common objects of the country in Palestine. The scorpion at rest is said closely to resemble an egg in appearance.

6. The worm (σκώληξ) is mentioned only in Mk 9<sup>18</sup> in the phrase 'where their worm dieth not,' a description of Gehenna based on the last verse of Isaiah (66<sup>24</sup>).

In the TR the verse appears 3 times, Mk 9<sup>14</sup> 46-48, and there is something impressive in the repetition: WH, however, retain only 48. Whether literally or metaphorically understood, the phrase must not be taken as the basis of a Christian doctrine of future retribution. The worm does not stand for remorse; it is simply part of a picture of complete physical corruption. A man has sometimes to choose between losing a limb and losing his life: the part has to be sacrificed to save the whole. The same law of sacrifice, says Christ, holds good in the spiritual world.

7. Of insects the bee is indirectly referred to, while the gnat, the locust, and the moth are all mentioned. In Lk 24<sup>46</sup>, the Western Text says the disciples gave our Lord part of a bees' honeycomb (κέρυ μελισσῶν κηρῶν), i.e. the product of hived bees. John the Baptist, on the other hand, lived on wild rock honey, i.e. honey deposited in clefts of the rock by wild bees; this honey was often very difficult to get.

Bees, wild and hived, are very common in Palestine. Tristram (Nat. Hist. p. 325) says: 'Many of the Bedouin obtain their subsistence by bee-hunting, bringing into Jerusalem skins and jars of the wild honey on which John the Baptist fed.' Bee-keeping is much practised, especially in Galilee. The hives are very simple in construction; being large tubes of sun-dried mud, about 8 inches in diameter and 4 feet long, closed with mud at each end, having only a small aperture in the centre.'

The gnat (κνίσα) is mentioned in Mt 23<sup>24</sup>. As one of the smallest animals, it is contrasted with the camel, one of the largest. The Pharisees strain out a gnat with scrupulous care, while they will swallow a camel. They are careful to tithe mint, but they fail to do justice. The Pharisees may have adopted a practice which is still in use among the Brahmans, viz. of drinking through muslin in order to avoid swallowing any fly or insect present in the water.

Locusts (ἀκρίδες) formed part of the food of John the Baptist (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>6</sup>). The LXX uses ἀκρίδες for the third of the four kinds of edible locusts mentioned in Lv 11<sup>22</sup>. They formed a common article of diet in Palestine, and there is no need to alter the text, as one or two MSS have done, reading ἐκρίδες, 'cakes.'

The moth (οὐλίς) is mentioned as disfiguring earthly treasures (Mt 6<sup>19</sup>, Lk 12<sup>33</sup>). The common clothes-moth is meant, of which there are many species in Palestine. 'In this warm climate it is almost impossible to guard against their ravages' (Post). There is an indirect reference to the saying of Jesus in Ja 5<sup>7</sup>.

8. A sponge (σπίγγος) full of vinegar was offered to our Lord on the cross (Mt 27<sup>48</sup>). Of sponges, the finest in texture and the most valued is the Turkish or Levant sponge. The sponge-fisheries of the Mediterranean have always been and still are very considerable. For the method of diving for sponges see Post in Hastings' DB iv. 612<sup>2</sup>.

iii. THE PLACE OF ANIMALS IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD.—In this connexion it may be worth while to point out that the part played by animals in many of the incidents in which their presence is recorded, serves to emphasize the humility of Jesus. The two young pigeons which Mary brings as an offering when she presents Jesus in the Temple (Lk 2<sup>24</sup>), are a mark of her poverty. Jesus belonged to a poor family. The peaceful character of Christ's teaching, which is marked at the outset by the descent of the dove at His baptism, is confirmed at the close by the fact that He rode into Jerusalem (Mt 21<sup>2-7</sup>) not on the warrior's horse, but on the ass, which, as prophecy foretold, was to be a sign of the lowliness of the coming Messiah.

iv. THE PLACE OF ANIMALS IN THE TEACHING OF

OUR LORD.—We have reserved for discussion under this head the imagery drawn from pastoral life in which Jesus described His own mission, and the doctrine of providence unfolded more especially in His sayings about the birds of the air.

1. Our Lord's mission illustrated.—(a) Jesus confined His earthly ministry to 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 15<sup>24</sup>). When He sent forth the Twelve on a preaching tour, He bade them observe the same limits (Mt 10<sup>6</sup>). We need not suppose from this phrase that the work of Jesus embraced only the outcasts of Israel. 'The lost sheep of the house of Israel' describes the nation as a whole [grammatically the words 'of the house of Israel' (οἰκῶν Ἰ.) are best taken as a defining genitive, i.e. 'the lost sheep who are the house of Israel']. The very sight of a Galilean crowd touched the heart of Jesus, for they were like worried and scattered sheep that have no shepherd (Mt 9<sup>36</sup>, Mk 6<sup>34</sup>). In the eyes of Jesus, the spiritual condition of His countrymen agreed with the description of the shepherdless people given in Ezk 34. More particularly the Jews needed guidance in their national and religious aspirations. They had mistaken alike the character of the coming Messiah and the nature of the coming kingdom. The hope to re-establish by force the throne of David made the people the helpless victims of political agitators like Judas the Gaulonite (Ac 5<sup>37</sup>), and led at length to the chastisement inflicted on the nation by the Roman power.

The exact interpretation of Jn 10 is exceedingly difficult, but it may in part be understood, in relation to this view given in Matthew and Mark, of the nation as a shepherdless flock. Jesus speaks of Himself as the door of the sheep, through which if a man enters, he shall be saved (vv. 7-9). The only hope of salvation for the Jews lay in their realizing, through the teaching of Jesus, that God's kingdom was not of this world. Those who offered themselves as leaders before Christ, and who proposed to subdue Rome by arms, were thieves and robbers who came only to steal and destroy (vv. 8, 10). The best comment on these thieves and robbers, and their treatment of those helpless sheep, the house of Israel, is perhaps Josephus' account of the Judas above mentioned—

'There was one Judas a Gaulonite, . . . who, taking with him Sadduc, a Pharisee, became zealous to draw (the people) to a revolt; who both said that this taxation (under Cyrenius) was no better than an introduction of slavery, and exhorted the nation to assert their liberty; as if they could procure them happiness and security for what they possessed, and an assured enjoyment of a still greater good, which was that of the honour and glory they would thereby acquire for magnanimity. . . . All sorts of misfortunes also sprang from these men, and the nation was infected with this doctrine to an incredible degree: one violent war came upon us after another, and we lost our friends, who used to alleviate our pains; there were also very great robberies and murders of our principal men. This was done in pretence of the public welfare, but in reality from the hopes of gain to themselves' (Jos. Ant. xviii. 1, 2).

If Barabbas was one of these robbers (cf. Jn 18<sup>40</sup> with 10<sup>8</sup>), the fact that the Jews chose Barabbas in preference to the Good Shepherd shows the bewilderment of the popular mind, which led Jesus to compare the house of Israel to lost sheep. Jesus further describes Himself as the Good Shepherd in contrast to the hirelings, who care nothing for the sheep (Jn 10<sup>11-13</sup>). If the thieves and robbers be 'the hirelings' are probably the Pharisees and Sadducees, the shepherds who, in the words of Ezekiel, 'fed themselves and did not feed the sheep.'

The interpretation here suggested is not usually adopted. Godet, for example, understands the thieves and robbers to be the Pharisees. The wolf (v. 12) he takes as a further symbol of the same party, the hirelings being the scribes and priests, whom cowardice kept from opposing Pharisaic domination. This latter interpretation fits well with the context, i.e. with ch. 9 (see Godet, St. John, vol. II, pp. 375-397).

But without attempting to decide questions of exposition, it is sufficient for us to point out that the imagery of the parable is true to life.

* A sheep-fold in the East is not a covered building like our stables, but a mere enclosure surrounded by a wall or palisade. The sheep are brought into it in the evening, several flocks being generally assembled within it. The shepherds, after committing them to the care of a common keeper, a porter, who is charged with their safe keeping during the night, retire to their homes. In the morning they return, and knock at the closely barred door of the enclosure, which the porter opens. They then separate each his own sheep, by calling them; and after having thus collected their flocks, lead them to the pastures. As to robbers, it is by scaling the wall that they penetrate into the fold' (Godet, l.c. p. 373).

The details are confirmed by all Eastern travellers. Thus, speaking of the power of the sheep in distinguishing between the voice of the shepherd and that of a stranger, Thomson tells us that, if a stranger calls, they stop, lift up their heads in alarm; and if the call is repeated, they turn and flee from him. 'This is not the fanciful costume of a parable, but a simple fact. I have made the experiment often' ('Central Palestine,' p. 594).

Godet cites 'the well-known anecdote of a Scotch traveller, who, meeting under the walls of Jerusalem a shepherd bringing home his flock, changed garments with him, and thus disguised proceeded to call the sheep. They, however, remained motionless. The true shepherd then raised his voice, when they all hastened towards him, in spite of his strange garments' (l.c. p. 382).

All the sheep distinguish the voice of a shepherd from that of a stranger: a shepherd's own sheep distinguish his voice from that of any other shepherd (v. 3). The practice of naming sheep (ἰσχυρίζεσθαι τὰ πρόβατα, v. 3) is common in the East. The picture of the shepherd thrusting his sheep out of the enclosure (ἐκβάλλει, v. 4, implies the use of a certain amount of force) and then placing himself at the head of the flock, is likewise a simple fact, and not fanciful imagery.

Though the historical application of the parable in Jn 10 is not easy to determine, yet it is clear that the chapter deals with the relation of Christ to the Church and to the individual Christian, and it is unnecessary to draw out in detail the lessons that follow from the fact that Christ is for us the door of the sheep and the Good Shepherd. It is, however, important to notice that in Jn 10 our Lord speaks of the Jewish nation as a whole and of His disciples alike as sheep ('his own sheep,' i.e. the disciples, are distinguished from the other flocks in the fold, i.e. the Jewish people), and that He compares His mission towards both to the work of a shepherd. These ideas are common to St. John and the Synoptists, and the pastoral imagery we are considering links the Fourth Gospel to the other three.

(b) We have seen that in the Synoptics our Lord spoke of the people as lost sheep. But though the Matthean phrase 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel' applies to the nation as a whole, the parable of the Lost Sheep in Mt 18<sup>12</sup> is a defence of Christ's view of children, and in Lk 15<sup>3-6</sup> (where alone in Luke the word πρόβατον is used) a similar parable forms an answer to the criticism of the Pharisees, who could not understand our Lord's eating with publicans and sinners. In a sense all the Jews were like lost sheep; in a very special sense the comparison applied to these social outcasts. 'No animals are more helpless than sheep that have strayed from the flock: they become utterly bewildered, for sheep are singularly destitute of the bump of locality. They have to be brought back' (Thomson). The figure of the lost sheep illustrates to some extent the character of the publicans and sinners. In the East, says Thomson, the sheep have to be taught to follow the shepherd: they would otherwise leave the pasture lands and stray into the corn-fields. Naturally some sheep follow the shepherd closely, while others straggle and have to be recalled to the path by means of the crook. So a lost and wandering sheep is an ill-trained and troublesome one. But the main point of the parable is the action of the shepherd, who would regard it as part of his ordinary duty to seek the lost. Though Jesus does not call Himself the Good Shepherd in the Synoptics, yet the parable recorded in Mt. and Lk. shows us how naturally He came to compare His ministry to the work of a shepherd, and how He used the comparison to justify His friendly attitude to publicans and sinners. According to Mt 12<sup>12</sup>, our Lord also adduced an owner's care for a single sheep as a defence of His healing a man with a withered hand on the Sabbath-day.

(c) If the weakness and the helplessness of sheep supplied Jesus with similes whereby to describe the Jewish people as a whole, the purity symbolized by their white wool, their harmlessness and patience, led Him to speak of His own disciples in similar terms. The disciples are sent forth as sheep (or as lambs) into the midst of wolves (Mt 10<sup>16</sup>, Lk 10<sup>2</sup>; Clem. Rom. Ep. ii. 5). Christians are to be ready even to suffer death without resistance, so at least the epistle attributed to Clement interprets the saying (see above under 'lamb').

(d) In the Synoptics the few other passages where the disciples are described as sheep throw little light on the subject. In Mt 25 the righteous and the wicked are contrasted as sheep and goats; but, as has already been pointed out, the character of the animals concerned has little to do with the comparison. The words 'I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered' (quoted from Zec 13<sup>7</sup> in Mt 26<sup>31</sup>, Mk 14<sup>27</sup>), serve only to show that the death of Christ would place the disciples in the same leaderless bewilderment which, in the eyes of our Lord, marked the nation as a whole. But in a somewhat different connexion (Lk 12<sup>29</sup>) our Lord spoke of His disciples as a little flock. After bidding them forego anxiety about earthly goods and seek the kingdom, our Lord adds, 'Fear not, little flock: for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.' The reassuring words were needed, no doubt, because the disciples were but a little feeble band. But surely the little flock implies something as to character as well as number. It is the duty of the shepherd at all times to find suitable pasture, and in the autumn and winter he has to provide fodder. Sheep cannot fend for themselves. Similarly the disciples, intrusting to God the care of their earthly interests, will appear to the world at once foolish and ineffectual; yet this little flock is to inherit the kingdom. God chooses the weak things of this world (1 Co 1<sup>27</sup>).

Further references to sheep in the Gospels are less important. Mt 7<sup>15</sup> speaks of the false prophets who are sheep in appearance and wolves in reality, a saying which also appears in Justin, Dial. 35. In Jn 21<sup>16</sup> Peter is bidden to tend (ποιμαίνειν) Christ's sheep (προβάτια, 'lambs,' is given as a variant in WH). Here we have in germ the pastoral view of the ministerial office. See art. SHEPHERD.

Jesus' description of Himself as the Good Shepherd laid hold from the first of the Christian imagination. In the NT Jesus is twice spoken of as the Shepherd (He 13<sup>20</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>20</sup>). In the Catacombs no symbol of Christ is more frequent than the picture of the Good Shepherd. See CHRIST IN ART.

2. Our Lord illustrates His teaching concerning God's providence by one or two sayings about the birds. He bids His disciples 'consider the birds of the air; for they neither sow nor reap nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they? (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>). In conjunction with this passage, we must examine the reference to sparrows in Mt 10<sup>29, 31</sup>, Lk 12<sup>6</sup>. 'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? yet not one of them shall fall to the earth without your Father. . . . Fear not then; ye are of more value than many sparrows.' Bochart well brings out the force of Luke's mention of 'ravens' instead of 'birds of the air,' and he rightly discerns the bearing of the reference to the sparrows, when he says, 'Express mention is made of ravens and sparrows among the other birds, to make it clear that God's providence is not only concerned with birds in general, but even extends to the most worthless and the most despised among birds: so that men, especially those that believe, may the more certainly draw from this fact the conclusion that God cares for them, since He will not deny to those who worship Him and call upon Him, the care which He so graciously bestows on animals of the lowest order.' Bochart further dwells on the harsh grating voice, the ugly black colour, and the awkward movements of the raven, which make him a despicable bird. Concerning the sparrows, Thomson says they are 'a tame, troublesome, vivacious and impertinent generation: they nestle just where they are not wanted. Their nests stop up stove-pipes and water-gutters. They are destroyed eagerly as a worthless nuisance' ('Lebanon,' etc., p. 59). Jesus then insists that the birds which men hold cheap are not unthought of by God: 'our Lord has taught us that God providently caters for the sparrow, and Himself conducts its obsequies.'

By taking the references to sparrows and ravens closely together, we may save ourselves from a one-sided interpretation of Mt 6<sup>26</sup> which has found favour with many. Thus O. Holtzmann (Life of Jesus, p. 102) says: 'With the drudgery and toil of human labour, Jesus contrasts the foolish life of nature, in which God feeds the raven and clothes the lilies.' A parallel saying from the Talmud is cited in Delitzsch's Jewish Artisan Life, which suggests the same view of our Lord's teaching. 'Didst thou ever see in all thy life,' says Rabbi Simeon, son of Eleazar, 'a bird or an animal working at a craft? And yet these creatures, made simply for the purpose of serving me, gain their living without difficulty. But I am created to serve my Creator; and if those who are created to serve can gain their livelihood without difficulty, shall not I, who am made to serve my Creator, earn my living without trouble?' If this saying is modelled on Mt 6<sup>26</sup>, then Rabbi Simeon and O. Holtzmann seem to agree in interpreting our Lord's teaching to the effect that 'the birds are fed, without working; surely we may expect God to feed us too, without our toil.' Such an interpretation makes Mt 6<sup>26</sup> the magna charta of idleness. But the superiority of the birds does not lie in their not working, but in their not worrying. If we may paraphrase the passage, 'the birds do not engage in any methodical toil; yet they trust God for daily food, and praise Him for His care: men are better than birds, a superiority shown in the fact that men work in an orderly manner: now, if God feeds the birds, which live a haphazard kind of life, how much more will He reward men's patient labour without their needing to be anxious?' This section of the Sermon on the Mount is best interpreted by St. Peter's words, 'casting all your care (i.e. your worries and anxieties) on him; for he careth for you' (1 P 5<sup>7</sup>), or by St. Paul's lesson of contentment under all circumstances (Ph 4<sup>11-13</sup>). Our daily wants are the care of God. The saying about the sparrows forbids us to assume that daily needs will be met exactly in the way we expect. We are not to assume that food and raiment will be provided amply and at all times. Privation and suffering may fall to men's lot; but suffering even unto death is not to be feared, because the very death of a sparrow is not forgotten before God.

Our Lord's teaching as to the trust in God's providence, which may be learnt from the animals, appears to be summed up in the second of the five new sayings recently discovered by Grenfell and Hunt. They restore this logion as follows: 'Jesus saith (ye ask? who are those) that draw us (to the kingdom, if the kingdom is in Heaven? . . . The fowls of the air, and all beasts that are under the earth or upon the earth, and the fishes of the sea (these are they which draw) you, and the kingdom of Heaven is within you; and whoever shall know himself shall find it. (Strive therefore?) to know yourselves and ye shall be aware that ye are the sons of the (almighty?) Father; (and?) ye shall know that ye are in (the city of God?) and ye are (the city?).' The restoration of the saying is highly conjectural, but it seems to be based in part on Job 12<sup>7-8</sup>. 'Ask now the beasts and they shall teach thee; and the fowls of the air and they shall tell thee. Or speak to the earth and it shall teach thee; and the fishes of the sea shall declare unto thee.' And the conclusion which the saying is intended apparently to enforce may be stated in the following verses taken from the same passage in Job. 'Who knoweth not in all these that the hand of the Lord hath wrought this? In whose hand is the soul of every living thing and the breath of all mankind' (v. 16). In effect we are taught that converse with nature should produce a calm trust in God.

It does not fall within the scope of this article to discuss the wider aspects of our Lord's attitude towards Nature. But the place taken by animals in His teaching bears out the truth of the following words of a recent writer. 'Jesus loved Nature as Nature; here as everywhere He was in touch with the actual. Plenty of people—from Æsop to Mrs. Gatty—have made or drawn parables from Nature, but not like His. His lost sheep have no proverbs: His lilies may be dressed more charmingly than Solomon, but they have not Solomon's wisdom: and His sparrows are neither moralists nor theologians, but sparrows,—two for a farthing, sparrows chirping and flying about and building their nests,—just sparrows! But the least motion which they made seemed a thrill of pleasure. . . . Sparrows, lilies, lost sheep, hens and chickens, midnight stars and mountain winds,—they all entered into His mind and heart, and spoke to Him of the character of God, of His delight in beauty, and His love' (T. R. Glover).

LITERATURE.—Without attempting to provide a complete bibliography, it may be worth while to give a list of books that the present writer has found helpful. Bochart's Hierozoicon (ed. Rosenmüller) is encyclopaedic. Aristotle's Natural History of the Bible is a most handy manual of compact and accessible information. References to animals are frequent in books of Oriental travel: e.g. Stanley's Sinai and Palestine; Robinson's BRP; and Thomson's Land and the Book (the latest edition of Thomson's work in 3 vols. is especially valuable, though the information is widely scattered and is not always easy to find). The articles on natural history and on particular animals in Hastings' DB and the Encyc. Bibl. may be consulted with advantage. The standard 'Lives of Jesus' deal with the references to animals incidentally; Edersheim is perhaps the fullest and most reliable. There are some fresh, though not always accurate, observations on the subject in the Life of Jesus by O. Holtzmann. Of the many commentaries that expound the passages in the Gospels which concern our subject, the present writer has found vol. I. of the Expositor's Greek Testament ('Synoptics' by A. B. Bruce, 'St. John' by M. Dods) most useful. H. G. WOOD.

ANISE.—'Anise' is the translation given in AV and RV of ἀνηθον (Mt 23<sup>23</sup>): the marginal rendering 'dill' is the correct one. The true anise is the plant Pimpinella anisum, which is quite distinct from Anethum graveolens, the anise of the Bible.

By the Jews dill was cultivated as a garden plant, but in Egypt and Southern Europe, to which it was indigenous, it is often found growing wild in the cornfields. It possesses valuable carminative properties, and in the East the seeds are eaten with great relish as a condiment. It is a hardy annual or biennial umbellifer, and grows to a height of one, two, or even three feet. The stem is round, jointed, and striated; the leaves are finely divided; the flowers, which are small, are yellow; the fruits are brown, oval, and flat.

In Mt 23<sup>23</sup> dill is represented as subject to tithe. That is in strict accord with the provision of the Law (Lv 27<sup>26</sup>, Dt 14<sup>22</sup>), and is corroborated by the express statement of the Mishna (M'asevoth iv. 5). See, further, art. RUE; and cf. note by Nestle in Expos. Times, Aug. 1904, p. 528.

ANNA (Ἀννα, Heb. אָנָּה).—When His parents brought the infant Jesus to the temple to present Him to the Lord, two aged representatives of the OT Church received Him with songs of praise, Simeon and Anna (Lk 2<sup>26</sup>). Anna was the daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Asher (v. 38), which, though one of the Ten Tribes of the Dispersion, was still represented in Palestine. From it some beautiful women are said to have been chosen as wives for the priests (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. p. 200). Anna was a widow 84 years of age (RV), or more probably (RV) about 105, as 7 years of married life followed by 84 years of widowhood would make her to be. She was a devout and saintly woman, worshipping constantly in the temple, with fastings and supplications, night and day; and, like Deborah and Huldah of the OT, she had prophetic gifts. Her desire, like the Psalmist's (Ps 27<sup>4</sup>), was to dwell always in the house of God, though it is hardly likely that a woman would be allowed literally to dwell within the sacred precincts. Having entered the temple at the same time as Jesus was brought in, she followed up the song of Simeon in similar strains, and spoke of the Holy Child 'to all them that were looking for the redemption of Jerusalem' (v. 38). Anna would seem to later times an ideal saint of the cloister, as such stress is laid on her virginity, her long life of widowhood, and her ceaseless devotions. Possibly her name may have had to do with the name Anna, given to the mother of the Virgin Mary, in the Protoevangelium of James.

ANNAS (Ἄννας, Heb. אָנָּס, Hanan, Jos. Ἀναῖος, Ananos).—High priest of the Jews from A.D. 6 to 15, and thereafter exercising commanding influence through his high priestly rank and his family connexions. The son of one named Sethi, who is otherwise unknown, he was appointed high priest by Quirinius, probably in A.D. 6, and exercised that office, which involved political as well as religious headship of the nation, until he was deposed by the procurator Valerius Gratus in A.D. 15 (Jos. Ant. xviii. ii. 2). The duration of his rule, and the fact that of his sons no fewer than five succeeded him at intervals in the high priesthood ('which has never happened to any other of our high priests'), caused him to be regarded by his contemporaries as a specially successful man (Ant. xx. ix. 1). On the other hand, he incurred in an unusual degree the unpopularity for which the high priests were proverbial. In addition to their common faults of arrogance and injustice, Annas was notorious for his avarice, which found opportunity in the necessities of the Temple worshippers. It was he, probably, who established the 'bazaars of the sons of Annas' (ἡἀννῶνθ βῆνῆ ἡἀνῶν), a Temple market for the sale of materials requisite for sacrifices, either within the Temple precinct (Keim, Jesus of Nazara, v. 116) or on the Mount of Olives (Derenbourg), the profits of which enriched the high priestly family. Beyond this, the house of Annas is charged with the special sin of 'whispering' or hissing like vipers, 'which seems to refer to private influence on the judges, whereby "morals were corrupted, judgment perverted, and the Shekina withdrawn from Israel"' (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. 265).

Annas is referred to by St. Luke and by St. John. In Lk 3<sup>2</sup> ('in the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas') he is linked with Caiaphas, who alone was actually high priest at the time (A.D. 26). The explanation of this is found partly in the fact that the office having become to some extent the prerogative of a few families, it had acquired some degree of hereditary and indelible quality, and partly in the unusual personal authority exercised by Annas. The result was that even after his deposition he continued to enjoy much of the influence, and even to receive the title, of his former office (Schürer, HJP II. i. 195 ff.; against this Keim, l.c. vi. 36 ff.; H. Holtzmann, Hocm. ad Lk 3<sup>2</sup>). In like manner in Ac 4<sup>5</sup> Annas appears at the head of the chiefs of the Sanhedrin in its action against the Apostles, though the actual president was the high priest. See CHIEF PRIESTS.

The only other passage in which Annas is referred to is in the narrative of the trial of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 18<sup>23-24</sup>). The Evangelist, speaking with technical accuracy, refrains from calling him high priest, and assigns as a reason for Jesus being led before Annas the relationship between Annas and Caiaphas. The ex-high priest had probably been the chief instigator of the plot against Jesus, and before him He was brought not for trial, but only for an informal and private examination (so Schürer, l.c. p. 182). 'The Lord Himself is questioned, but there is no mention of witnesses, no adjuration, no sentence, no sign of any legal process' (Westcott, ad loc.).

ANNOUNCEMENTS OF DEATH.—It is certain that we have words from Jesus concerning His death; for such ruthless criticism as that of Schmiedel (Encyc. Bibl. 'Gospels'), who admits only nine genuine sayings of the Master, is uncritical and unscientific. These words appear in the Synoptics as well as in the Fourth Gospel. The genuineness of the latter is here assumed, though there is a wide difference in character between it and the Synoptics.

The main point in the announcements of His death by Jesus rests on the time of their utterance. Hence the chronological grouping of these sayings of Jesus must be followed. If He spoke of His death only as a disappointed man after He saw the manifest hate of the rulers, there would be little ground for claiming Messianic consciousness concerning His death as an atonement for sin. And the heart of the whole problem turns on the Messianic consciousness. When did He become conscious of His death? Why did He expect a violent death? What did He think was to be accomplished by His death? Was His death a voluntary sacrifice, or merely a martyr's crown? These and similar questions can be answered only by a careful and comprehensive survey of Christ's own words upon the subject. It is noteworthy that Jesus put the emphasis in His career on His death rather than on His incarnation. That is so out of the ordinary as at once to challenge attention. Here is One who came to give life by dying. That is in deepest harmony with nature, but not in harmony with man's view of his own life.

1. The first foreshadowings.—(a) Jesus first exhibits knowledge of His death at the time of the Temptation, immediately after the Baptism and the formal entrance upon the Messianic ministry. The word 'death' or 'cross' is not mentioned between Jesus and Satan, but the point at issue was the easy or the hard road to conquest of the world. It is the unexpressed idea in this struggle for the mastery of men. Hence, before Jesus began to teach men, He had already wrestled with

ANNOUNCEMENTS OF DEATH

His Messianic destiny and chosen the path that led to the cross. This tone of high moral conflict is never absent from Jesus till the end. The Synoptic Gospels thus give the first account of Christ's consciousness of His struggle to the death for the spiritual mastery of men.

(b) Another occasion for the mention of His death by our Lord grew out of the failure of Nicodemus to understand the new birth and the spiritual nature of the kingdom of God (Jn 3<sup>9</sup>). If the teacher of Israel could not apprehend these aspects of what took place in the kingdom on earth, how could he lay hold of the purposes of God in heaven (v. 12) about the work of the kingdom? One of the chief of these 'heavenly things' is the necessity of the death of Christ for the sin of the world. The brazen serpent of the older history serves as an illustration (v. 14), but 'das göttliche "δεν" Todeschicksals' (Schwartzkopff, Die Weissagungen Jesu Christi, p. 20) is grounded in the eternal love of God for the world (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>). The Son of Man (Jn 3<sup>14</sup>) who 'must' be lifted up is the Son of God (3<sup>16</sup>). It is not perfectly certain that 3<sup>16</sup> is a word of Jesus and not of the Evangelist, but at any rate it is a correct interpretation of the preceding argument. The high religious necessity for His death, of which Jesus is here conscious, could come to Him by revelation from the Father (Schwartzkopff, l.c. p. 22). The consciousness of Jesus is clear, but He finds in Nicodemus an inability to grasp this great truth. The word 'lifted up' (ὑψωθήναι) refers to the cross, as is made plain afterwards (Jn 8<sup>28</sup> 12<sup>32</sup>). Even when the multitudes heard Jesus use the word just before His death, they did not understand it (Jn 12<sup>34</sup>), though the Evangelist gives the correct interpretation in the light of the after history (12<sup>38</sup>). In itself the word could refer to spiritual glory (Paulus) or heavenly glory (Bleek), but not in view of the later developments. So then the cross is consciously before Jesus from the very beginning of His ministry.

(c) It is possibly nearly a year before we have the next allusion by the Master to His death. Again in parabolic phrase Jesus calls Himself the bridegroom who will be taken away from the disciples (Mk 2<sup>20</sup>, Mt 9<sup>17</sup>, Lk 5<sup>35</sup>). The Pharisees from Jerusalem (Lk 5<sup>17</sup>) are now in Galilee watching the movements of Jesus, so as to gain a case against Him. On this occasion they are finding fault because the disciples of Jesus do not observe stated seasons of fasting. The answer of Jesus is luminous in marking off the wide difference in spirit between a ceremonial system like Judaism and a vital personal spiritual religion like Christianity. There is a time to fast, but it is a time of real, not perfunctory, sorrow. Such a time will come to the disciples of Jesus when He is taken away. By itself this reference might allude merely to the death that would come to Christ as to other men, but the numerous other clear passages of a different nature preclude that idea here. Gould is right (Internat. Crit. Com. on Mk 2<sup>20</sup>) in saying that 'even as a premonition it is not premature,' though there is more in it than this, for Jesus understood the significance of His death. Soon the historical developments confirm the prejudgment of Jesus, for the enmity of the historical conspiracy grows apace. At the next feast at which Jesus appears in Jerusalem (Jn 5<sup>1</sup>) the rulers make a definite attempt to kill Him as a Sabbath-breaker and blasphemer, also for claiming equality with God the Father (Jn 5<sup>18</sup>). This decision to kill Jesus soon reappears in * Jn 2<sup>20</sup> and Mt 12<sup>30</sup> are passed over because of doubts (not shared by the present writer) as to their interpretation or genuineness. The case is strong enough without these disputed passages.

ANNOUNCEMENTS OF DEATH 71

Galilee (Mk 3<sup>9</sup>), and often in Jerusalem during the closing six months of the ministry.

(d) The use of the cross as a metaphor, as in Mt 10<sup>38</sup> (see also Mk 8<sup>34</sup>, Mt 16<sup>24</sup>, Lk 14<sup>27</sup>), would not of itself constitute an allusion to the death of Jesus, since death on the cross was so common at this time. But in the light of the many allusions by Jesus Himself to His death, the background of the metaphor would seem to be personal, and so to imply His own actual cross. He is Himself the supreme example of saving life by losing it. Meyer, in loco, considers that this verse was transferred from the later period; but this is unnecessary; for it is eminently pertinent that in the directions to the Twelve, who are now sent out on their first mission, they should be urged to self-sacrifice by the figure of His own death on the cross. In this same address occurs an apocalyptic saying that presupposes the death of Christ (Mt 10<sup>23</sup>). It is not an anachronism (J. Weiss) to find self-sacrifice and self-realization in the words of Jesus about losing life and finding it (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>), for Jesus Himself gives the historical background of this image in the sublime justification of His own death in His resurrection (Jn 12<sup>34</sup>).

(e) It is just a year (Jn 6<sup>4</sup>) before the death of Jesus that He is addressing the Galilean populace in the synagogue at Capernaum. He explains that He is the bread of heaven, the true manna, the spiritual Messiah. It is the climax of the Galilean ministry, for but yesterday they had tried to make Him king (v. 15). 'To-day Jesus tests their enthusiasm by the supreme revelation of His gift of Himself 'for the life of the world' (v. 51), a clear allusion to His atoning death on the cross. Thus will it be possible for men to make spiritual appropriation of Christ as the living bread. The people and many of the so-called disciples fall back at this saying (v. 66), and thus justly the wisdom of Jesus in having said no more as yet concerning His death, and life by His death. For at the first dim apprehension of this basal truth the people left Him. But it was time for the truth to be told to the flippant multitudes. Here Jesus reveals His consciousness of the character and work of Judas as the betrayer, a very devil (Jn 6<sup>70</sup>). The bald truth of the betrayal is not at this point told to the Twelve, for John's comment is made afterwards; but Jesus expressly says that one of them is a devil. Jesus clearly knows more than He tells. There is this bitterness in His cup at the very time that the people desert Him. The shadow of the cross is growing closer and darker, but Christ will go on to meet His hour.

2. The definite announcements.—(a) The new departure at Caesarea Philippi. Just after the renewed confession by Peter that Jesus is the Messiah, St. Matthew says that 'from that time began Jesus to show unto his disciples how that he must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and the third day be raised up' (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>). St. Mark (8<sup>31</sup>) also says that 'he began to teach them.' Clearly, then, this was an epoch in the teaching of Jesus concerning His death. When He withdrew from Galilee this last summer, he devoted Himself chiefly to the disciples, and especially to preparing them for His departure. The specific teaching concerning His death follows, therefore, the searching test of their fidelity to Him as the Messiah. This is not a new idea to Jesus, as we have already seen. It has been the keynote of His mission all the time, but He had to speak of it in veiled and restrained language till now, when 'he spake the saying openly' (Mk 8<sup>31</sup>). Now Jesus told the details of His death, the place and the persecutors. He repeats the necessity (δεσ) of His death as He had proclaimed it in

72 ANNOUNCEMENTS OF DEATH

Jn 8<sup>34</sup>. The disciples are still unprepared for this plain truth, and Peter even dares to rebuke Jesus for such despondency (Mt 16<sup>22</sup>). The sharp rebuke of Peter by Jesus (v. 25) shows how strong a hold the purpose to die had on His very nature. Peter had renewed the attack of Satan in the Temptation. The Gospels record the dulness of the disciples, thus disproving the late invention of these sayings attributed to Jesus. The principle of self-giving is a basal one for Jesus and for all His followers (Lk 9<sup>23-25</sup>). The disciples could not yet, any more than Nicodemus, grasp the moral necessity of the death of Jesus. They recoiled at the bare fact.

(b) On the Mount of Transfiguration a week later, somewhere on the spurs of Hermon, Peter, James, and John get a fresh word from Jesus about His death (Mk 9<sup>9</sup>). It is not necessary to suppose that they understood or even heard the conversation of Jesus with Moses and Elijah about 'his decease which he was about to accomplish at Jerusalem' (Lk 9<sup>21</sup>). Most likely they did not, if Peter's remarks are a criterion (Lk 9<sup>22</sup>). There is a fitness both from the manner of the deaths of Moses and Elijah, and from their respective positions in law and prophecy, that these two should talk with Jesus about His atoning and predicted sacrificial death. This exalted scene lifts the curtain a little for us, so that we catch some glimpse of the consciousness of Jesus concerning His death, as He held high converse with Moses and Elijah. But the remark of Jesus (Mt 17<sup>7</sup>) was a caution to the three disciples to keep to themselves what they had seen till His resurrection, when they would need it. But the lesson of strength was lost on them for the present. Even the chosen three questioned helplessly with each other about the rising from the dead (Mk 9<sup>9</sup>). They could not understand a dying Messiah now or later till the risen Christ had made it clear.

(c) In Galilee Jesus renewed His earnest words about the certainty of His death (Mk 9<sup>31</sup>, Mt 17<sup>22</sup>, Lk 9<sup>44</sup>). He concealed His presence in Galilee as far as possible (Mk 9<sup>30</sup>), but He was very insistent in urging, 'Let these words sink into your ears: for the Son of Man shall be delivered up into the hands of men' (Lk 9<sup>44</sup>). But it was to no purpose, for they understood it not (Mk 9<sup>32</sup>). St. Luke (9<sup>45</sup>), in fact, says that it was concealed from them, thus raising a problem of God's purpose and their responsibility. They were sorry (Mt 17<sup>20</sup>), but afraid to ask Jesus (Lk 9<sup>46</sup>). Hence Jesus has not yet succeeded in making the disciples understand His purpose to die for men. So then He will have no human sympathy, and will have to tread the path to Calvary alone.

(d) At the feast of Tabernacles, or a few days afterwards, just six months before the end, in the midst of the hostile atmosphere of Jerusalem, Jesus emphasizes the voluntary character of His death for His sheep (Jn 10<sup>11</sup>). He does this to distinguish between Himself and the Pharisees, who have been vehemently attacking Him. They are robbers, wolves, and hirelings, while Jesus is the Good Shepherd. He is not merely caught in the maelstrom of historic forces, nor is He the victim of time and circumstance, for He has voluntarily put Himself into the vortex of sin (Jn 10<sup>12</sup>). The Father has given the Son the power or right (ἐξουσία) to lay down and to take up His life again. It was a 'commandment' from the Father, but not to the exclusion of the voluntary nature of His death; just as the necessity of His death was an inward necessity of love, not an outward compulsion of law. It is in the realm of spirit that we find the true value of the death of Jesus for our sins (He 9<sup>14</sup>), and the moral grandeur of it is seen in the fact that He made a voluntary offering of His life for those who hated Him (Ro 8<sup>32</sup>).

ANNOUNCEMENTS OF DEATH

(e) As the time draws nearer, Jesus even manifests eagerness to meet His death (Lk 12<sup>50</sup>). It is only some three months till the end. However we take it, whether as interrogative or exclamation, we see clearly the mingled eagerness and dread with which Jesus contemplated His death. It is a fire that will burn, but also attracts. He had come just for this purpose, to make this fire. It will be a relief when it is kindled. It is a baptism of death that presses as a Divine compulsion upon Him, like the 'must' of the earlier time (Jn 3<sup>14</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>). Here we feel the inward glow of the heart of Christ as it bursts out for a moment like a flame from the crater, unable to be longer restrained. So Jesus had a double point of view about His death, one of joy and one of shrinking, but He did not go now one way and now the other. He will pursue His way steadily, and as the time draws nigh, His view of His death will amount to rapture (Jn 17<sup>23</sup>). But Jesus was never more conscious and sane than when He spoke thus about His death. It was, in fact, His inner self speaking out. He thus gave us not only a new view of His own death, but a new view of death itself.

(f) Jesus even tells His enemies that He expects to be put to death in Jerusalem (Lk 13<sup>33</sup>). They were posing as His friends, but were either representatives of Herod Antipas or of the Jerusalem Pharisees. Jesus asserted His independence of 'that fox' and of them, but announced the inward necessity ('I must') that He should ultimately at the right time meet the fate of other prophets in Jerusalem. His lament over Jerusalem reveals the depth of His love for that city, and demands a Judean ministry such as that described by John.

(g) It is not till the death of Lazarus that the disciples realize that Jesus may be put to death (Jn 11<sup>51</sup>), and then as a dread growing out of the last attempt of the Jews to kill Him at the feast of Dedication (10<sup>39</sup>). Thomas has the courage of despair (11<sup>16</sup>) in the gloomy situation, but Jesus speaks of His own glorification (11<sup>4-6</sup>). One item in this glorification was the formal decision of the Sanhedrin to put Jesus to death (11<sup>53</sup>). With this formal decision resting over Him, Jesus withdrew to the hills of Ephraim, near where in the beginning He had refused Satan's offer of a compromise, and had chosen His own way and the Father's. Had He made a mistake?

3. Facing the end.—(a) The relation between the death of Christ and the consummation of the kingdom. It is in the last journey to Jerusalem that the Pharisees ask when the kingdom of God comes (Lk 17<sup>20</sup>). They are thinking of the apocalyptic conception current in their literature. There are two difficulties thus raised. One is their utter failure to understand the nature of the kingdom, for it is inner and spiritual, not external (the Papyri show that εἰς τὸν means 'within,' not 'among').* But, though the kingdom had already come in this sense, there would be in the end a fuller and complete realization of the work of the kingdom. It is in this sense that Jesus addresses the disciples in Lk 17<sup>20</sup>. The day when the Son of Man shall be revealed (Lk 17<sup>20</sup>) will be the end. 'But first must he suffer many things, and be rejected of this generation.' Thus Jesus separates His own death from the final stage of the Messianic work on earth. The other difficulty is raised by the disciples, and concerns the place where the Son will manifest Himself (Lk 17<sup>22</sup>). He will come when there are people for Him to come for.

(b) Jesus uses the word 'crucify' before He reaches Jericho on this last journey to Jerusalem

ANNOUNCEMENTS OF DEATH

(Mt 20<sup>19</sup>). Stapfer scouts this item as put in post eventum (Jesus Christ during His Ministry, p. 202), because it is expressly used by Christ only twice before His death (see also Mt 26<sup>29</sup>); but the Master particularizes beforehand other details, such as the mocking, scourging, spitting, delivering to the Gentiles (these all now mentioned for the first time, Mk 10<sup>32</sup>, Mt 20<sup>19</sup>, Lk 18<sup>32</sup>). Besides, now for the first time also Jesus claims that His death will be in fulfillment of the prophetic writings concerning the Son of Man (Lk 18<sup>31</sup>). See later Mt 21<sup>42</sup>, Jn 13<sup>18</sup>, Mk 14<sup>47</sup>, Lk 22<sup>37</sup> 24<sup>47</sup>. Jesus is not, however, playing a part just to fulfil the Scripture, but He sees this objective confirmation of the inner witness of His spirit to the Father's will concerning His death. Besides, on this occasion Jesus had made a special point of talking about His coming death, taking the Twelve apart (Mt 20<sup>17</sup>), and explaining that He does so now because they are near Jerusalem. There was an unusual look on the Master's face, so much so that the disciples were amazed and afraid (Mk 10<sup>32</sup>). But with all this pain, they were hopelessly dull on this subject (Lk 18<sup>34</sup>).

(c) There is strange pathos in the next occasion Jesus had for speaking concerning His death. James and John and their mother (Mt 20<sup>20</sup>, Mk 10<sup>35</sup>) seem hardly able to wait for the Master to cease telling about His death before they come and ask for the chief positions in the temporal kingdom for which they are looking. It was a shock to Jesus. Waiving their ignorance, He asked if they could drink His cup of death and take His baptism of blood (Mt 20<sup>22</sup>, Mk 10<sup>38</sup>). They actually said that they were able. And James was the first of the Twelve to die a martyr's death, and John the last; for Jesus had said that they would have His cup and baptism (Mk 10<sup>38</sup>).

(d) It was on the same occasion, as Jesus proceeded to give the disciples a needed lesson in true greatness and taught the dignity of service, that He set forth in plain speech the purpose of His death (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, Mk 10<sup>45</sup>). Certainly Jesus had the right to tell the purpose of His voluntary death. Αντίποινα is obviously 'ransom,' but it need not be said that this word exhausts all the content in the death of Christ. Jesus Himself elsewhere spoke of the vital connexion between Himself and the believer (Jn 15<sup>15</sup>). This view of the redemptive death of Christ is further emphasized by the symbol of Baptism and also of the Supper, in both of which the vital aspect of mystic union is expressed. Αντί is here used to express the idea of substitution, though ἀντί is more common in this sense in the NT (Jn 11<sup>50</sup>) and in the earlier Greek (Alkestis, for instance). It is a ransom instead of many.

A distinction needs to be made between the atoning death of Christ as a basis for reconciliation and the consummation of reconciliation in the individual case by the Holy Spirit's work in the heart. The doctrine of the substitutionary atoning death of Jesus, with vital and mystic union of the believer with Him, is not a rabbinic and legal refinement of St. Paul. He simply echoes the words of the Master more at length, while true to the heart of the matter.

(e) The request of the Greeks during the last week brought forth one of the deepest words of Jesus concerning the necessity of His death (Jn 12<sup>32-33</sup>). He gives, in fact, the philosophy of grace about His death, which is, in truth, the same as the law of nature. It is the law of self-giving. Thus the wheat grows, and thus will Jesus establish the kingdom. By His death the middle wall of partition between Jew and Gentile, and between both and God, will be broken down (Eph. 2<sup>14-15</sup>). The agitation of Jesus on this occasion is surpassed only by that in the Garden of Gethsemane, and the cause is the same. In facing His death He shrinks from it, but instantly submits to the Father (Jn 12<sup>26</sup>), and is comforted by the Father's voice. To the multitude Jesus boldly announces that His lifting up (on the cross) will be the means of drawing all men (Gentile as well as Jew) to Him (v. 32). And it has been so. Jesus gloried in His own cross as the means of saving the lost world.

(f) In the famous controversy with the Jewish rulers in the temple on the last Tuesday, Jesus identified Himself as the rejected Stone in the Messianic prophecy in Ps 118<sup>22</sup>, and pronounced condemnation on those who collided with the rejected Stone (Mt 21<sup>44</sup>). At every turn during these last days the death of Jesus is in the background of His words and deeds; especially is this true of the great eschatological discourse (Mt 24 1.), as well as of the third lament over Jerusalem (Mt 23<sup>37-39</sup>), and the previous defiance of His enemies (Mt 23<sup>32</sup>).

(g) It is on Tuesday night (beginning of Jewish Wednesday) that Jesus definitely foretells the time of His death (Mt 26<sup>7</sup>). It will be at the feast of the Passover, which begins after two days. Strangely enough, on this very night the rulers were in conference, and had decided, owing to the popularity of Jesus with the multitude at the feast, as shown by the triumphal entry and the temple teaching, to postpone the effort to kill Him till after the feast (Mt 26<sup>6-7</sup>). And so it would have been but for the treachery of one of Christ's own disciples, who this very night, after the doleful announcement by Jesus of His near death, and after a stern rebuke for his covetous stinginess (Jn 12<sup>6</sup>), went in disgust and showed the Sanhedrin how to seize Him during the feast (Lk 22<sup>2</sup>). But Jesus saw in the beautiful act of Mary a prophecy of His burial (Jn 12<sup>7</sup>).

(h) Jesus is fully conscious that the Paschal meal which He is celebrating is His last, is, in fact, taking place on the very day of His death (Jn 13<sup>31-33, 35</sup>). The material is now so rich and full, as the great tragedy draws near, that it can only be alluded to briefly. He is eager to eat this meal before He suffers (Lk 22<sup>15</sup>). He knows that now at last His hour has come (Jn 13<sup>1</sup>), and that He will conquer death (v. 3). The contentious spirit of the Twelve at such a time occasions the object-lesson in humility. Jesus points out the betrayer, who leaves the room; comforts the disciples, and warns them of their peril, though all fail to grasp the solemn fact or the moral greatness of the tragedy that is coming swiftly on them, actually producing two swords for a fight under the new policy of resistance now announced by Jesus (Lk 22<sup>36-38</sup>).

Pfeiderer (Evolution and Theology, p. 179) seeks to reconstruct the whole story of Jesus' attitude towards His death by the answer of Jesus, 'It is enough.' He forgets that this answer may be neither irony nor sober earnest, but rather an inability to make the disciples understand more about the matter before the time. It is chimerical for Pfeiderer to set up his view of this one passage against all the clear words of Jesus, and say that Jesus did not expect to die.

(i) When Jesus introduces the Supper just after the Passover meal, He speaks a strong word about His death. He calls the cup of this new ordinance 'my blood of the covenant' (Mk 14<sup>24</sup>, Mt 26<sup>28</sup>); and it is the 'new' covenant, i.e. of grace (1 Co 11<sup>25</sup>, Lk 22<sup>20</sup>). Not only so, but the blood of Jesus is shed for many (Mk 14<sup>24</sup>, Mt 26<sup>28</sup>), as He had previously said (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, Lk 18<sup>32</sup>), and St. Matthew has the further clause 'unto remission of sins' (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>).

H. Holtzmann (Hand-Com., in loco) would expunge this phrase, while Spiitta (Urchristentum, p. 286 ff.) denies that Jesus made any reference to His death on this occasion. Holtzmann admits that He spoke of His death, but rejects the liturgical observance commanded in 1 Co 11<sup>25</sup>. Bruce (Kingdom of God, p. 247) bluntly calls all this 'criticism carried to an extreme in the interest of a theory.'

There is just doubt as to the true text of Lk 22<sup>16</sup>, but this in no way affects any of the points above mentioned. Certainly expiation of sin by the shedding of His blood is the idea of Jesus here.

74 ANNOUNCEMENTS OF DEATH

The world had long been familiar with blood sacrifice, but the new thing in His vicarious sacrifice is that it has real efficacy and is not mere type and shadow. The blood is the life, and Jesus gave Himself, a sinless and free self, the representative Man and God's own Son. The moral value of this voluntary and vicarious blood-offering comes from the worth of the spiritual self of Jesus. Jesus could see that this atoning sacrifice was in Is 53<sup>10</sup>, but it was also wrought in His very consciousness.

(f) The very heart of Jesus is laid bare in Jn 14-17. The Master tries once more to prepare the Eleven for the tremendous fact of His death. Nothing in life or literature approaches the touch of Christ as He makes plain the awful truth of His separation, silences the doubt of Thomas, Philip, Judas, cheers them with the promise of another Paraclete, reminds them of their high dignity as His friends, exhorts them to courage against the world, and promises victory in spite of tribulation. In the prayer that follows, a halo is around the cross in the mind of Christ, for He asks for His glorification in death (Jn 17<sup>1-9</sup>). He had already sanctified Himself to this mission (vv. 17-19), and now the hour is at hand.

(g) And yet in Gethsemane Jesus Himself is 'greatly amazed' at His own agitation of spirit (Mk 14<sup>28</sup>). He needs the Father's help, and for the moment has difficulty in finding Him fully, for Satan has renewed his temptation with fresh energy. For a moment Satan seemed indeed to triumph, but Jesus quickly surrendered to the Father's will and won supreme mastery over Himself (Mk 14<sup>28</sup>). But Ritschl is in error in saying that Jesus 'is first of all a priest in His own behalf' (Justification and Reconciliation, p. 474). What broke the heart of Christ in Gethsemane was no thought of His own sin, but the sin of the world. Here in Gethsemane the heart of Jesus was touched to the quick by the essence of the redemptive sacrifice. The disciples gave Him no human sympathy, and Satan even sought to poison His heart toward the Father. The picture in Hebrews (5<sup>7-8</sup>) of the strong Son of God, having learned obedience through suffering, crying out to the Father for help, is the acme of soul agony. Jesus won the power to drink the cup, and in the dregs of the cup was the kiss of Judas. His hour has come at last, and His enemies take Him now only because He allows them. It is the hour and the power of darkness (Lk 22<sup>53</sup>). The hour and the power of light will come later. Once again He speaks of the necessity of His death that the Scriptures may be fulfilled (Mt 26<sup>28-29</sup>).

(h) In the trial it is a foregone conclusion that Jesus will be condemned, and on the cross He 'sees what He foresaw.' He knows that His public confession of His Messiahship means His death, but He asserts His ultimate triumph over His enemies (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>). He claims superiority over the world, and that He is now fulfilling His destiny (Jn 18<sup>26</sup>). On the cross itself He practises the forgiveness of enemies which He had preached (Lk 23<sup>34</sup>), exercises saving power though dying (v. 43), is in some sense forsaken by the Father (Mk 15<sup>34</sup>), is conscious to the last of what He is performing (Jn 19<sup>29</sup>), and proclaims the completion of His Messianic work (Jn 19<sup>30</sup>) as He dies with submission to the Father (Lk 23<sup>46</sup>).

After the resurrection Jesus had a new standpoint from which to teach the disciples the significance of His death (Lk 24<sup>26-27, 28, 46</sup>). But it is not till they receive the new light from the Holy Spirit at Pentecost that the disciples fully appreciate the moral greatness of the death of Christ, and see the glory of the cross, with something of the dignity with which Jesus Himself went into the shadow.

A. T. ROBERTSON.

ANNUNCIATION, THE (Annuntiatio, Ἐπαγγελία, Ἐπαγγελία, Ἐπαγγελία).—The announcement of the fact that the Son of God was to be born of the Virgin Mary, who at the time was espoused to Joseph, the descendant and heir of David. St. Luke (1<sup>26-28</sup>) tells us that this announcement was made to Mary by the angel Gabriel at Nazareth six months after the same angel had told Zacharias in the Temple at Jerusalem that his wife Elisabeth should bear him a son, who was to be called John. St. Luke is our sole authority for this announcement by the angel to Mary. St. Mark and St. John are silent; and the narrative of St. Matthew, who is our other authority for the fact that Jesus was born of a virgin, is very different, being written as entirely from Joseph's point of view as St. Luke's is written from Mary's point of view (see below). Nevertheless there is no contradiction between the accounts, and in some important particulars they confirm one another. They are wholly independent narratives, as their wide differences show. Yet they agree, not only as to the central fact of the virgin birth, but also as to the manner of it, viz. that it took place through the operation of the Holy Spirit. This agreement is all the more remarkable when we remember that there is nothing like this effect of the Spirit of God upon a virgin in the Old Testament, and that, prior to the New Testament, the very expression 'Holy Spirit' is rare (see the art. in Hastings' DB ii. p. 402 ff.); also that the fact of the Incarnation is elsewhere indicated in quite other terms, as by St. John (1<sup>14</sup>). Moreover, the two narratives agree as to four other points, which are of some importance. Both state that at the time of the announcement Mary was espoused to Joseph, that the child was to be named 'Jesus,' that He was born at Bethlehem in Judea, and that the parents brought Him up at Nazareth.

It is well to remember that there are stories, more or less analogous to what is told by the two Evangelists, in heathen mythologies. The historical probability of the Gospel narratives is not weakened but strengthened by such comparisons. St. Luke's Gentile readers must have felt the unspeakable difference between the coarse impurity of imagined intercourse between mortals and divinities, in the religious legends of paganism, and the dignity and delicacy of the spiritual narrative which St. Luke laid before them. And St. Matthew's Jewish readers, if they compared his story with their own national ideas, as illustrated in the Book of Enoch (6. 15, 69, 86, 106), would find a similar contrast. Nor should the legendary additions to the Gospel story, which are found in the Apocryphal Gospels, be forgotten. These show us what pitiful stuff the imagination of early Christians could produce, even when the Canonical Gospels were there as models. All these three classes of fiction, heathen, Jewish, and Christian, warn us that we must seek some source for the Gospel narrative other than the fertile imagination of some Gentile or Jewish Christian whose curiosity led him to speculate upon a mysterious subject. We should have had something very different, both in details and in tone, if there had been no better source than this. And this applies even more strongly to St. Luke's narrative than to that of St. Matthew. It required more delicacy to tell the story of the virgin birth from Mary's side than from Joseph's; and this greater delicacy is forthcoming. And it is all the more conspicuous because St. Luke's narrative is the richer in details. We conclude, therefore, that St. Luke had good authority for what he has told us, viz. an authority well acquainted with the facts. For if he was incapable of imagining what he has related, equally incapable was his informant. The narrative which he has handed on to us is what it is because in the main it sets forth what is true.

Then who was St. Luke's authority? Assuming the truth of the narrative, it is obvious that, in the last resort, the authority for it must have been Mary herself. No one else could know what St. Luke records. It does not follow from this that he got the information from her directly, although there is nothing incredible in the supposition that he and she had met. And the form of the narrative leads one to think that there cannot have been many persons between her and him. By frequent transmission from mouth to mouth details about the angel's outward appearance, his beauty and brightness, and about Mary's attitude and employment, would have crept in, and the conversation would have been expanded; all of which corruptions are found in the Apocryphal Gospels. Moreover, such touches as 2<sup>32-31</sup> would be likely to drop out; and they have dropped from the Apocryphal Gospels.

We may go a step farther, and say that if St. Luke did not get his information direct from Mary herself, the person who passed on the mysterious story from her to the Evangelist was almost certainly a woman. Mary would be much more likely to tell it to a woman than to a man; and, in spite of her habitual reticence, she would, after Joseph's death, be likely to confide it to some one. She would feel that such an astounding fact, so much in harmony with the life and death and resurrection of her Son, must not be allowed to die with her; and she would therefore communicate it to some intimate friend, who may have communicated it to St. Luke.

It is quite possible that this communication was at its first stage, or had not even started, when St. Mark composed his Gospel, so that when he wrote he was ignorant of the virgin birth. But as the plan of his Gospel excludes all that preceded the preaching of the Baptist, St. Mark's silence would be natural even if he already knew it. Probably most of the first generation of Christians were ignorant of this mystery, for the Book of Acts and the Epistles show us that what was preached by the Apostles was not the miraculous birth, but the death and resurrection of Christ (Ac 1<sup>22</sup> 22<sup>3</sup> 24. 22 3<sup>15</sup> 4<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>38</sup>. 40 13<sup>28-30</sup> 17<sup>31</sup> etc.).

That the Fourth Evangelist knew the Synoptic Gospels, and sometimes silently corrects them, is certain; but he does not correct the story of the virgin birth. On the contrary, what he says about the Incarnation and about the pre-existence of the Son of Man and His oneness with the Father, is in harmony with it. Such passages as 1<sup>14</sup> 3<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>38</sup>. 44. 51. 62 8<sup>38</sup>. 46. 58 10<sup>39</sup> 11<sup>28</sup> 20<sup>38</sup>. 41 are more intelligible if written by one who believed the virgin birth, than if written by one who knew the doctrine and rejected it. It is indeed urged that this Evangelist's beliefs about the Christ are such, that he must have stated the virgin birth, if he believed it. But, as the story had already been twice told, there was no need to repeat it. And the whole of his Gospel shows that he is reserved about the Virgin Mother, whose name he alone among the Evangelists never mentions. She had become his mother (19<sup>7</sup>), and he is reticent about all things connected with himself. He nowhere names his own brother.

Nevertheless, when the mystery became known through the diffusion of the First and Third Gospels, its importance as a completion and confirmation of the faith was recognized. Ignatius (c. A.D. 110), in a passage (Eph. 19) which is frequently quoted by later Fathers (Origen, Eusebius, Basil, Jerome, etc.), places the virgin birth in the front rank among Gospel truths; and we find it as an article of faith in the Old Roman Creed, which can be traced almost to the beginning of the second century, τὸν γεννηθέντα ἐκ παρθένου ἀπὸ τοῦ καὶ Πατρὸς ἰσὺς ἀληθινὸν ἐκ Μ. V.

The antecedent probability that St. Luke derived the information respecting Mary either from herself, or from a woman to whom she had confided it, is confirmed by the characteristics of these first two chapters of his Gospel. The notes of time (1<sup>28</sup>. 36. 52) are specially feminine; and competent critics find a feminine touch throughout (1<sup>24</sup>. 25-4-45. 57 25-7. 19. 36. 43. 51). Lange (Life of Christ [ed. 1872], I. p. 258) says: 'The colouring of a woman's memory and a woman's view is unmistakable in the separate features of this history. When it is once ascribed to a female narrator, we comprehend the in describable grace, the quiet loveliness and sacredness of this narrative.' Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 88) says: 'There is a womanly spirit in the whole narrative which seems inconsistent with the transition from man to man.' Sanday (Expository Times, April 1903, p. 297) agrees that the narrative came not only from a woman, but through a woman, and he thinks that Joanna, the wife of Chuza, steward to Herod Antipas (Lk 8<sup>2-3</sup> 24<sup>10</sup>; cf. 23<sup>40</sup>, Ac 1<sup>14</sup>), may have been the person through whom the information passed from Mary to St. Luke. Both Lange (confidently) and Sanday (less confidently) believe that St. Luke received the information in writing, and that he wrote the first two chapters with a document before him. On the whole, this is probable. It is quite true that the peculiarities and characteristics of St. Luke's very marked style are specially frequent in these two chapters (Plummer, St. Luke, p. lxx); but they are also very frequent in other places where he was working from a document. St. Luke seems never to have simply copied his authority. In using written material he freely altered the wording to expressions which were more natural to himself: so that mere frequency of marks of his style is no proof that he was not using what was already in writing. And, of course, when he was translating from an Aramaic document his own favourite words and constructions would come spontaneously.

But, while this is admitted because it admits of something like proof, we are not compelled to admit the unproved assertion that the hymns of praise with which these chapters are enriched have been composed by St. Luke himself, and have no more basis in fact than the speeches in Livy. Each of these canticles suits the time at which it is supposed to have been uttered better than the time at which St. Luke wrote, and it may be doubted whether he could in imagination have thrown himself back to the surroundings and anticipations of Zacharias and Mary and Simeon. There may have been on his part 'a free literary remodelling of material' (B. Weiss). Before anything was written down there may have been some modification in the wording as the result of reflexion upon what had been uttered and done. There may even have been conscious elaboration. But it is reasonable to believe that these exquisite and appropriate songs represent fairly accurately what was said and felt on each occasion. What was said and felt would be remembered, and perhaps was committed to writing long before St. Luke obtained the precious record, although not till many years after the events. And there is nothing extravagant in the belief that Mary herself may at last have thought it best to commit her recollections and meditations to writing. The feeling, meum secretum mihi, would prevail for a long time: she pondered these things in her heart. Then, as the end of her life drew nearer, she might put on record what ought not to be lost. Finally, she committed the sacred mystery to another woman, or to a small group of women; and from them it passed to St. Luke. But we must be content to remain in ignorance as to whether Mary, or some confidante, or St. Luke himself, was the first to put the story in writing.

That St. Luke should be the Evangelist to receive this womanly story of women is not surprising. The rest of his Gospel shows a marked sympathy with the sex which was so commonly looked down upon by both Jews and Gentiles. To this day, in the public service of the synagogue, the men thank God that they have not been made women. No other Evangelist gives us so many types of women. Besides those in the first two chapters, we have the widow at Nain, the sinner in Simon's house, Mary Magdalene, Joanna, Susanna, the woman with the issue, Martha and Mary, the woman bowed down for eighteen years, the widow with her two mites, the daughters of Jerusalem, and the women at the tomb. And he alone gives us the parable of the Woman and the Lost Coin. We may believe that he was one in whom a woman might naturally confide.

While in St. Luke everything is grouped round Mary and her kinswoman Elisabeth, in St. Matthew everything is grouped round Joseph. Joseph's genealogy is given by way of preface. The Annunciation is made to him; and all revelations about the name of the Child, and the provisions to be taken for His safety, are made also to him. Obviously, if the story is true, Joseph must have been the ultimate source of a great deal of it; but it may have passed through many mouths before it took the form in which it appears in the First Gospel.

Doubt has been thrown upon the two narratives, because in the First Gospel the revelations are made by the angel of the Lord in dreams, whereas in the Third they are made by angels to persons in their waking moments. It is argued that in each case the miraculous agency is due to the imagination of the writer. This is possible. But it is also reasonable to believe that the special method of communication was in each case adapted to the character of the recipients. It cannot be said that St. Matthew always gives us dreams, or that St. Luke objects to such things. St. Matthew mentions the ministry of angels (4th), and communications made by means of them (23<sup>rd-7</sup>); and St. Luke mentions communications made by means of visions in the night (Ac 16th 18<sup>th-19</sup>). And if the writers had imagined the substance of the heavenly message, would not St. Matthew have given the promise of the Kingdom, and St. Luke the promise of Salvation? But it is St. Matthew who has the latter (12th), while St. Luke has the former (12<sup>th-23</sup>). It is worth noting that in the New Testament we do not read of dreams or visions in the night anywhere but in St. Matthew and in Acts; cf. 2 Co 12th.

Again, doubts have been raised about the two narratives, because in the one the revelation of the miraculous conception is made to Mary, in the other to Joseph; and either revelation, it is urged, would render the other unnecessary. On the contrary, both are necessary. If the virgin birth was to take place, God in His mercy would not leave Mary in ignorance of the mysterious manner in which He was about to deal with her. We may reverently say that the Annunciation to Mary was a necessity in order to save her from dreadful perplexity and suffering. And this rendered a revelation to Joseph also necessary. On the mere testimony of Mary he could not have accepted so extraordinary a story. The fact that, in spite of his inevitable suspicions, he took her in marriage, requires us to believe that to him also had been revealed God's purposes respecting his betrothed.

It is evident that St. Matthew and St. Luke give the narratives as historical. Each believed his own story, and expected that others would believe it also (Lk 14). Indeed, the isolation in which these two very different intimations of the virgin birth stand in the New Testament makes the explanation of them very difficult unless there is an historical basis. They are not needed to explain anything else. They are intensely Jewish in tone; but we may be sure that Judaism, with its enthusiastic estimate of the blessings of marriage, would not have invented them. Moreover, at the time when these Gospels were written, Judaism was antagonistic to the new faith, and would not have tolerated such a glorifying of its Founder.

In the Annunciation to Mary we are not told that she saw anything, for the ἰδοῦσα read by A.C. in Lk 1st is almost certainly not genuine. Gabriel was sent, and entered some building in which she was living at Nazareth, and there delivered his message. The εἰσῆλθὼν is against the later tradition that she was at the fountain drawing water (Proterogospelium of James, 11; Gospel of pseudo-Matthew, 9). The angelic message is given 'in three little pieces of trimeter poetry, which have become somewhat obscured by the Greek translation' (Briggs, The Messiah of the Gospels, p. 45 ff.), the first of which is the Ave Maria 'in the form of a distich'—

'Hail, thou that art endued with grace,
The Lord is with thee.'

The much discussed κεχαριστωμένη must mean 'endued with grace' (Sir 18th): πιστῶν καὶ χάριν λαβοῦσα Μαρία (Justin Martyr, Try. 100); and both here and in 1st the usual translation 'grace' should be retained for χάρις. 'The Lord is with thee' is frequent in the Old Testament (Jos 1st 6th, Jg 6th, Is 43rd). The RV is probably right in omitting 'Blessed (art) thou among women,' which may have come from 1st: Ἐβ L, with the Egyptian and Armenian Versions, omit.

By the first words of the angel, Mary was greatly disturbed (περατομένη) both in mind and heart: then her perplexity and emotion gave place to thought (διελογίσθη). But, although πατριός originally meant 'from what country or nation,' she was not deliberating, like Hamlet about the ghost, whether the message came from heaven or hell, i.e. whether it was Divine or diabolical. The Latin Versions rightly have qualis, not cuius, as an equivalent. Nowhere in the New Testament has πατριός a local signification, but means simply 'of what kind or quality' (ποιός), and implies astonishment (Lk 7th, Mt 8th, Mk 13, 2 P 3rd, 1 Jn 3rd).

In his second address Gabriel calms the Virgin's fears and explains the purpose of his mission. 'Thou hast found grace with God' is another Old Testament expression (Gn 6th 18th 19th 38th, Ex 32nd 12-14). This 'grace' is manifested in making her the mother of the longed-for Messiah, an unspeakable joy to a Jewish mother. In the promise which follows there are allusions to two prophecies. 'Son of the Most High' recalls Ps 27, and 'the throne of his father David' recalls the great Messianic prediction in Is 9:7.

By the second utterance of Gabriel, which contains the substance of the Annunciation, Mary is astounded. Yet she does not, like Zacharias, ask for proof (1<sup>28</sup>). Nor is her 'How?' a request for an explanation. Rather it is an exclamation of amazement. She is not married; how can she have a son? And how can a humble maiden like herself have such a son? This seems to be the natural import of her words. It is unlikely that 'I know not a man' means that she has already taken, or there and then takes, or intends to take, a vow of perpetual virginity. And can Mt 1<sup>28</sup>, with its Imperfect tense (not Aorist, as in Gn 19<sup>9</sup>), be reconciled with any such vow? Mary's ἀσπλαγχισμός is a confession of conscious purity, drawn from her by the surprising promise that she is to have a son before she is married (see Sadler, ad loc.).

Although Mary does not ask for an explanation or a sign, Gabriel gives both in a third utterance. As to the explanation, it is an influence that is spiritual and not carnal, that is holy and not sinful, that is to come upon her and enable her to become a mother, and the mother of the Messiah.

'Wherefore also the holy thing which shall be born shall be called the Son of God.'

'Son of God' was a recognized title of the Messiah. Both in the Book of Enoch and frequently in 4 Ezra the Almighty speaks of the Messiah as His Son. Jesus rarely uses this title of Himself (Mt 27<sup>43</sup>, Jn 10<sup>36</sup>). But we have it in the voices from heaven (Lk 3<sup>22</sup> 9<sup>35</sup>) and in the devil's challenge (4<sup>9</sup>), in St. Peter's confession (Mt 16<sup>16</sup>), in the cries of the demoniacs (Mk 3<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>7</sup>), and in the centurion's exclamation (16<sup>7</sup>). The primitive Church adopted it as a concise statement of the Divinity of Jesus Christ (Sweete, Apostles' Creed, p. 24). It is worth noting, in connexion with the part assigned to the Holy Spirit in the virgin birth, that in a fragment of the Gospel according to the Hebrews quoted by Origen (Com. in Johan. iii, § 63) the words, 'My mother, the Holy Spirit, took Me,' are put into the mouth of Christ.

As to the sign, which was granted unasked, Mary receives one which is as convincing as the one given to Zacharias, but much more gracious. Another wonderful birth is about to take place, and by the mention of 'the sixth month' the angel assures Mary that all is known to him. Mary can verify his words respecting Elisabeth, and thereby know that this message to herself is true. He intimates that there is to be close relationship between Elisabeth's son and her own, and directs her to her kinswoman for confirmation and sympathy.

Mary's final response to the angel is not a prayer that what he has promised may be fulfilled, but an expression of absolute submission. She foresees the difficulty with Joseph and with all who know her. But she accepts, without reserve, God's decree respecting her, as made known to her by His messenger, and leaves the issue in His hands. She is the Lord's bondmaid, and His will must be done.

There is perhaps more irreverence than wisdom in speculating whether God could have redeemed mankind by one who was produced without human parent; or, again, by one who had a human father as well as a human mother. But suggestions of this kind have been made, and perhaps call for comment. It may be pointed out that a new act of creation would have left no nexus between the Redeemer and those to be redeemed. He would not have belonged to the same race as those whom He came to save. He would not have taken their flesh, and His life would have had little relation to theirs. It is difficult to see how the death and resurrection of such a being would have aided the human race. But the virgin birth avoided all violent breach with humanity. Just as the prophet (John the Baptist) who was to renovate Israel was taken from the old priesthood, so the Christ who was to redeem the whole of mankind was not created out of nothing, but 'born of a woman.'

Again, if the Christ had had two human parents, it is difficult to see how the hereditary contamination of the race could have been excluded. It may be said that such contamination remains even with only one human parent, and that the choice lies between admitting the contamination and severing the nexus with the human race altogether. But, in truth, there is no such dilemma. The choice is not between creation on the one hand and human parentage (whether with one or two parents) on the other. There is also the possibility of the substitution of Divine agency for the human father. It is conceivable that the presence of this Divine element would entirely exclude the possibility of contamination from the human mother. Indeed it is difficult to conceive that the Divine element could in any way receive contamination. But it is wiser to accept with reverent thankfulness what has been revealed to us respecting this mystery than to speculate needlessly, and perhaps fruitlessly, about what has not been revealed.

It has been pointed out already that the beauty, dignity, and delicacy of the story of the Annunciation are tokens of historic reality; for the fictions about similar subjects in pagan, Jewish, and Christian literature are, in these respects, so very different. There is yet another mark of historic truth to be noted, viz. the extreme simplicity of the Christology. New Testament doctrine about the Christ is here found at a very early stage, earlier even than that in the Epistles to the Corinthians; for there we have Christ's pre-existence implied as 'the second man from heaven' (1 Co 15<sup>47</sup>), who 'became poor' when He became man for us (2 Co 8, cf. 4<sup>10</sup>); and therefore much earlier than the more developed Christology of Colossians (1<sup>15</sup>) and Ephesians (1<sup>7</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>), and than that of the writer to the Hebrews (1<sup>3</sup>), or that of the Fourth Gospel (1<sup>14</sup> 3<sup>17</sup>). 'The power of the Most High shall overshadow thee' reminds us rather of the manifestations of the Divine presence in the Old Testament, especially the 'pillar of cloud' (Ex 13<sup>21</sup> 40<sup>34-35</sup>, 1 K 8<sup>10</sup> 11). If St. Luke had invented the story of the Annunciation, would he not have given us more of Pauline Christology, and that in its fullest form? That he has given us what is so rudimentary is evidence that he gives a record of what was revealed to Mary at the time, rather than what he himself knew and believed.

The couplet with which the narrative ends (1<sup>28</sup>) balances that with which it opens (1<sup>26</sup>), and it is one of deep spiritual significance to every believer. By her absolute submission to the will of God, in spite of the agony of shame and distress which this involved, Mary entered into an intimacy of relationship with Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, such as even angels cannot know. And yet it is precisely here that the humblest Christian may, by similar obedience, follow her. 'Blessed is the womb that bare thee,' said one to the Lord, 'and the breasts which thou didst suck. But he said, Yea rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it' (Lk 11<sup>27</sup>, 28).

It was natural that a special day should be set apart to commemorate this mystery, but we do not know when this was first done. The earliest mention of such a festival is in the Acts of the Tenth Synod of Toledo (A.D. 658); and the next is in those of the Second Synod in Trullo (A.D. 692). But, just as the Purification was originally a feast in honour of our Lord rather than of the Virgin Mary, viz. of His presentation in the Temple and meeting with Simeon and Anna, so also this festival originally commemorated His miraculous conception rather than the announcement made to her. In the Ethiopian Calendar it is not called 'the Annunciation of the blessed Virgin Mary,' but 'the Conception of Christ'; elsewhere the later name of the feast has driven out the original title, not only in the West, but also in the Eastern Churches.

ANOINTING.—I. In the ancient world, Jewish and pagan alike, it was customary to refresh guests at banquets by pouring cool and fragrant ointment on their heads. Cf. Mark, iii. 12; Ps 23<sup>7</sup>, where Cheyne gives an Egyptian illustration: 'Every rich man had in his household an anointer, who had to place a cone of ointment on the head of his master, where it remained during the feast.' There are two instances of the usage in the Gospel history:

1. The anointing in the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup>).—Impressed by the fame of Jesus and desirous of closer acquaintance with one who was certainly a prophet, perhaps more,* Simon bade Him to his table, inviting also a party of his friends. He was a Pharisee of the better sort, yet he shared the pride of his order and put a difference betwixt Jesus and the other guests, withholding from Him the customary courtesies: the kiss of welcome, the abluion of the feet, the anointing of the head. In the course of the meal a woman appeared in the room, wearing her hair loose, which in Jewish society was the token of a harlot.† What did she in a Pharisee's house? She had come, a sorrowful penitent, in quest of Jesus; and she brought an offering, an alabaster vase of ointment. As He reclined at table, she stole to His couch and, stooping over His feet, rained hot tears upon them, wiped them with her flowing tresses, kissed them, and anointed them with the ointment. She should have poured it on His head, but she durst not.‡

2. The anointing in the house of Simon the Leper (Jn 12<sup>1-3</sup> = Mk 14<sup>3-9</sup> = Mt 26<sup>6-13</sup>).—On His way up to the last Passover, Jesus stopped at the village of Bethany, where, a few weeks before, He had raised Lazarus; and, in defiance of the Sanhedrin's edict (Jn 11<sup>57</sup>), He was received with grateful reverence. One of the principal men of the village, named Simon, made a banquet in His honour. He had been a leper, and, if he had been healed by Jesus, it was fitting that his house should be

* According to the v.l. ἰσχυρῶς in v. 30, Simon thought Jesus might be the prophet who should arise and herald the Messiah. Cf. Jn 12: 35 (14 76).

† See Lightfoot on Jn 19.

‡ Orig. in Matth. Comm. Ser. § 77: 'Non fuit aua ad caput Christi venire sed lacrymis pedes ejus lavit, quasi vix etiam ipais pedibus ejus digna.'

the scene of the banquet.* But it was a public tribute, and others bore a part in it. Lazarus was present, and the good housewife Martha managed the entertainment. And what part did Mary take? She entered the room with her hair loose and an alabaster vase of precious ointment in her hand, and, approaching the Lord's couch, poured the ointment over His feet and wiped them with her hair. See MARY.

There are several points of difference between John's and Matthew-Mark's accounts of the anointing: (1) Matthew and Mark say that it happened in the house of Simon the Leper, and make no mention of Lazarus and his sisters. They simply say that the 'beautiful work' was wrought by 'a woman.' (2) They seem to put the incident two days (Mt 26<sup>6</sup> = Mk 14<sup>3</sup>), whereas John puts it six days before the Passover (12<sup>1</sup>). (3) They represent the nameless woman as pouring the ointment not on the Lord's feet but on His head, and say nothing of her wiping His feet with her hair. On the ground of these discrepancies it was generally maintained by the Fathers that there were two anointings at Bethany, the incidents recorded by Matthew-Mark and John being distinct. So Chrysostom (in Matth. lxxxi.), who apparently identified the anointing in the house of Simon the Leper (Mt-Mk) with that in the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk). Origen (in Matth. Comm. Ser. i. 77) held that there were in all three anointings: (a) in the house of Simon the Leper (Mt-Mk); (b) in the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk); (c) at Bethany by Mary (Jn); mentioning also the opinion that there were four, Matthew and Mark recording distinct incidents.

Nowadays the tendency is rather to ignore the differences and identify all the narratives, reducing them to one. The Matthew-Mark narrative is regarded as authentic, the Lukan and Johannean narratives being adaptations thereof (Strauss, Ewald, Keim). Even in Origen's day a similar view prevailed: 'multi quidem existimant de una eademque muliere quatuor Evangelistas exponisse.'

It hardly admits of reasonable doubt that there were two anointings, one in the house of Simon the Pharisee, and the other by Mary in the house of Simon the Leper at Bethany.† The discrepancies in the triple account of the latter are not inexplicable. (1) Matthew-Mark's omission of the names of Lazarus and his sisters belongs to the larger question of the Synoptic silence regarding the family at Bethany. (2) The position of the incident in Matthew-Mark is merely an example of the freedom wherewith the Synoptic editors were wont to handle the material of the Evangelic tradition, arranging it topically rather than chronologically. They have brought the story into juxtaposition with the betrayal (Mt 26<sup>14-16</sup> = Mk 14<sup>10-11</sup>), evidently by way of casting light on the traitor's action. The Lord's rebuke at the feast angered Him, and, burning for revenge, he went and made his bargain with the high priests. Cf. Aug. de Cons. Ev. ii. § 153. (3) The difference regarding the manner of the anointing is an instance of John's habit of facility correcting his predecessors. His account is historical, and it would stand so in the Apostolic tradition; but the Synoptic editors or, more probably, the calcographers in their oral repetition of the tradition, wondering, since they did not know who the woman was, at the strangeness of her action, substituted 'head' for 'feet,' and then omitted the unintelligible circumstance of her wiping His feet with her hair. See MARY.

II. Besides the two special incidents already described, some other references to 'anointing' may be briefly dealt with.

1. In Mt 6<sup>17</sup> Jesus tells His disciples that when they fast they are to anoint (ἀλείψω) the head as usual. The allusion is to that daily use of oil, as an application soothing and refreshing to the skin, which is common in hot countries, and was regularly practised by the Jews. The meaning of Jesus is that His disciples, when they feel it right to fast, should undertake the observance as in the sight of God, and not ostentatiously parade their performance of it before the eyes of men. They should wash and anoint themselves as usual, and not draw attention by any peculiarities of outward appearance to a matter lying between themselves and their heavenly Father.

* Lazarus was not the host, but one of the guests (Jn 12<sup>2</sup>). The notion that his house was the scene of the banquet has occasioned speculations about Simon. Theophylact mentions the opinion that he was Lazarus' father, lately deceased (Ewald). † So Aug. de Cons. Ev. ii. § 154.

2. In Mk 6<sup>3</sup> we read of the Twelve on their evangelistic mission, that they 'anointed (ἀλείφω) with oil many that were sick, and healed them.' The employment of oil as a medicinal agent was familiar in the time of Christ (cf. Lk 10<sup>34</sup>, Ja 5<sup>14</sup>), and is doubtless referred to here; though the natural virtues of the oil were accompanied in this case by miraculous powers of healing. In Jn 9<sup>6-11</sup> Jesus, before working the miracle upon the blind man, anoints (ἐχρίψω) his eyes with clay which He had made by spitting on the ground. Here, also, the anointing may have had a medicinal aspect (see Meyer and Expositor's Gr. Test. in loc. on the ancient belief that both spittle and clay were beneficial to the eyes); though, of course, it is the miraculous agency of Jesus that is paramount in the narrative. In Rev 3<sup>18</sup> Jesus says to the Church of the Laodiceans, '... and anoint thine eyes with eyesalve, that thou mayest see,' where the effect of the application of collyrium is used as a figure of the healing and enlightenment which are found in the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ.

3. In Mk 14<sup>8</sup> Jesus says of the gracious act of Mary of Bethany in anointing Him at the feast, 'She hath anointed (ἀνέσθη) my body with ointment; probably akin to μύρα = 'myrrh') my body afore-hand for the burying' (cf. Jn 12<sup>7</sup>). And in Mk 16<sup>1</sup> we read how Mary Magdalene and the other women went to the sepulchre to anoint (ἀλείφω) the dead body of the Saviour (cf. Lk 23<sup>56</sup>, Jn 19<sup>38-40</sup>). This application of ointments and spices (cf. Lk 24<sup>1</sup>) was an expression of reverence and affection for the departed, and may be compared with the modern custom of surrounding the beloved dead with fragrant and beautiful flowers. These unguents were not used for the purpose of embalming the dead, as among the Egyptians, but were only outwardly applied, and did not prevent decomposition (cf. Jn 11<sup>39</sup>).

4. When Jesus in the synagogue at Nazareth read from Is 61 the prophetic words, 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he anointed (χρίσε) me to preach good tidings to the poor . . .' (Lk 4<sup>18</sup>), and went on to say, after closing the book, 'To-day hath this scripture been fulfilled in your ears' (v. 21). He definitely claimed to be set apart to the Messianic calling. In the OT anointing was the symbol of consecration alike in the case of prophet (1 K 19<sup>9</sup>), priest (Lv 8<sup>3</sup>), and king (1 S 10<sup>1</sup>). And in the case of Jesus, who to His people is at once prophet, priest, and king, a spiritual anointing is distinctly affirmed by His Evangelists and Apostles as well as claimed by Himself (cf. Ac 4<sup>27</sup> 10<sup>38</sup>, He 1<sup>9</sup>). The Hebrew word 'Messiah' (מָשִׁיחַ from מָשַׁח 'to anoint') means 'the anointed one'; and of this word 'Christ' is the Greek equivalent (χριστός, from χρίω, 'to anoint,' being employed in LXX to render מָשַׁח).

5. In 1 Jn 2<sup>20</sup> the Apostle writes, 'And ye have an anointing (χρίσμα) from the Holy One, and ye know all things' (so RV; AV renders 'unction'). Again, in v. 2<sup>7</sup> he says, 'And as for you, the anointing (χρίσμα) which ye received of him abideth in you. . . .' (here AV as well as RV gives 'anointing'). That the 'Holy One' of this passage is Christ Himself, and that the 'anointing' He dispenses is the bestowal of the Holy Spirit, is held by nearly all commentators. Being Himself anointed with the Holy Ghost (Ac 10<sup>38</sup>), the Christ has power to impart the same gift to His disciples. Indeed, the bestowal of this gift is constantly represented as His peculiar function (cf. Jn 15<sup>26</sup> 16<sup>7</sup>, 13-15, Ac 2<sup>33</sup>).

LITERATURE.—

i. NAME AND NATURE.—The term 'apocalypse' (ἀποκάλυψις from ἀποκαλύπτω, to uncover) signifies in the first place the act of uncovering, and thus bringing into sight that which was before unseen, hence 'revelation.' It is predominantly a NT word. It occurs rarely in extra-biblical Greek, is used only once in the canonical portion of the LXX (1 S 20<sup>36</sup>), and thrice in Sirach (11<sup>27</sup> 22<sup>28</sup> 42<sup>1</sup> [41<sup>27</sup>]). In the NT it is used to designate the disclosing or communicating of knowledge by direct Divine act. The gospel is an apocalypse to the nations (Lk 2<sup>21</sup>, Ro 16<sup>25-26</sup>). St. Paul received it as an apocalypse (Gal 1<sup>12</sup>). The manifestation of Jesus Christ in glory is an apocalypse (Gal 2<sup>2</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>1-7</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>7</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>7-18</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>).

An apocalypse is thus primarily the act of revelation; in the second place it is the subject-matter revealed; and in the third place a book or literary production which gives an account of revelation, whether real or alleged (e.g. 'The Apocalypse of St. John the Divine'). As a matter of history, the form in which the revelation purports to come is of the utmost importance in determining the question whether a writing should be called an apocalypse or not. In general, the form is like the drawing of the veil from before a picture, the result of which action presents to the eye a definite image. All imparting of Divine truth is revelation; but it is not all given in the apocalyptic form, i.e. it does not all come in grand imagery, as if portrayed on canvas or enacted in scenic representation. Some revelations come in sub-conscious convictions. Those who receive them do not feel called upon to give an account of the way in which they have received them. In fact they seem ignorant of the method of communication; they only know that they have received knowledge not previously possessed. Apocalypse and revelation thus, though primarily the same thing, come to be distinguished from each other.

The term 'apocalypse' is also sometimes used, with an effort at greater precision, to designate the pictorial portraiture of the future as foreshadowed by the seer. When so employed it becomes appropriate only as the title of certain passages in books otherwise not to be called apocalypses (so Bousset in Herzog-Hauck, REB, s.v., who enumerates the following passages: Dn 27<sup>28</sup>; Eth. En 85-91, 97-71; Ps-Sol 2, 17, 18; the Assumption of Moses; Slav. En.; 4 Ezra; Syr. Bar.; Sibyl. Orac. iii, 286 to the end, iii, 36-92, iv., the Jewish source of i. and ii.; also certain sections of the Apoc. John and 2 Th 2<sup>12-14</sup>; Mt 24 with parallels).

To constitute a writing an apocalypse, it is not necessary that the author should have actually seen or experienced what he portrays. It is enough that he write as one who has had a vision and is describing it. Thus apocalypse becomes a form of literature precisely in the same manner as an epistle. Strictly an epistle is simply a letter from one person, or many persons, to another, or others. But, as a matter of usage, it has often been adopted as a form into which men have chosen to cast their thoughts for the public. The same is true of the dialogue, of fiction, and many other species of literature. Such forms become favourites in certain ages, usually after some outstanding character has made successful use of them. The dialogue became fashionable when Plato made it such a telling medium for the teaching of his philosophical system. The epistle was used by Horace, and later by Seneca. The apocalypse form appears as a favourite about the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C. The most illustrious specimen, and perhaps the prototype of later apocalyptic literature, is the Book of Daniel.

ii. ORIGIN AND HISTORY.—The question has been mooted as to the earlier antecedents of the apocalyptic form. Its ultimate source has been traced variously to Egypt, Greece, Babylonia, and Persia. In view of the fact, however, that the Hebrew prophets frequently incorporate visions into their writings (Is 6, Jer 24<sup>1-3</sup>, Ezk 1<sup>3</sup>, Is 24-27), it is scarcely necessary to go outside of Israel to search for its origins. Nevertheless, the Persians, the Babylonians, the Egyptians, and the Greeks had their apocalypses. And it would be a mistake to ignore the influence especially of Persian forms during the period of the formation of Jewish apocalypses. This was the very period when Jewish forms came most directly into touch with Persian. In any case, much of the material of the Jewish apocalypse has been adopted and naturalized from Persia (cf. Bousset, Die Jüd. Apokalyphtik, 1903; Gunkel, Schöpfung u. Chaos, 1895). Apocalyptic literature in general begins before Christ. Soon after the Christian era it develops into the two naturally distinct forms of Christian and neo-Hebraic. Hence we may distinguish three classes of apocalypses:—(1) The earlier Jewish ones, or those which were published from B.C. 200 to A.D. 100. Within this class, however, may be included also such writings as proceed from Jewish sources purely, though not written until half a century, more or less, later than the last limit of the period. (2) Christian apocalypses, including the canonical book known as the Apocalypse (Revelation of St. John), and a series of apocryphal imitations. These are mostly pseudonymous, but include an occasional work in which the author does not conceal his name behind that of an apostle or older prophet (The Shepherd of Hermas). Apocalypses of this class pass into Patristics and culminate in Dante's immortal Commedia. (3) The neo-Hebraic apocalypses, beginning with the predominance of the Talmud (especially the Babylonian) and including a series of revelations to the great Rabbis (The Revelation of R. Joshua b. Levi, The Alphabets of R. Akiba, The Hebrew Elijah Apocalypses, The Apocalypse of Zerubbabel, The Wars of King Messiah, The Revelations of R. Simon b. Yohai, The Prayer of R. Simon b. Yohai, and the Persian Apocalypse of Daniel).

It would be somewhat beside the purpose of this article to do more than sketch the first of these three classes of apocalypses. On the other hand, as Christ emerged in history at a definite period and in a definite environment, and as in this environment nothing is more conspicuous and potent than the early Jewish apocalyptic literature, the importance of this literature cannot be overestimated. A flood of light is shed by the form and content of these writings upon His life, teaching, and work. Happily, considerable attention has been given in recent years to this as a field of investigation, and some definite results may be registered.

iii. THE APOCALYPSES.—Of the earlier Jewish apocalypses, the canonical Daniel forms the prototype. The proper place, however, for a particular treatment of Daniel is conventionally the sphere of Old Testament Introduction (see art. 'Daniel' in Hastings' DB vol. i.). Our list will begin with the Books of Enoch.

1. The Ethiopic Enoch.—The adjective 'Ethiopic' has been attached to the title of this work because of another Book of Enoch discovered in a Slavonic version. Outside the canonical Daniel, this is the best known of the apocalypses, because of the quotation from it in Jude<sup>14</sup>. Tertullian knows it, believes in its genuineness, and attempts to account for its transmission through and survival under the vicissitudes of the Flood. It appears to have been neglected, however, through the Middle Ages, and lost until 1773, when two MS copies of an Ethiopic version of it were brought from Abyssinia by J. Bruce. A translation of one of these was made by Lawrence, and published in 1821. But its full importance and significance came to be realized only with Dillmann's critical edition of the Ethiopic text in 1851, which was followed in 1853 by a thorough German translation and commentary. A portion of the Greek text was discovered in 1886-7, and edited by H. E. Swete.

Contents.—As it stands to-day, the Book of Enoch can be subdivided into five main parts with an introduction and a conclusion, as follows: Introductory Discourse, in which the author announces his parable, and formally asks attention to the important matters which he is about to divulge (1-5).

(a) The first section is concerned with Angelology (6-36), beginning with the report of the fall of two hundred angels who were enticed by the beauty of the daughters of men, and left heaven in order to take them for wives. Out of these unions sprang giants 3000 cubits in height. The fallen angels, moreover, taught men all manner of secrets whereby they were led into sin. When the giants had consumed all the possessions of men, they turned against the men themselves and smote them until their cry went up to heaven. Ringleaders of the angels are Azazel and Semjaza (6-9). Through the intercession of the four archangels, Michael, Uriel, Raphael, and Gabriel, God is moved to arrest bloodshed upon earth. He sends Uriel to Noah to tell him that He has determined to destroy the world. He commands Raphael to bind Azazel and throw him into a pit in the wilderness, where he shall remain until the day of the great judgment, and then be cast into the fire. He commands Gabriel to rouse the giants against each other; and, finally, he commands Michael to announce to Semjâzâ the sentence of punishment, which is, that the fallen angels shall be kept enchained and imprisoned under the hills of the earth, waiting the last judgment, when they shall be cast into the fire (10). After the destruction of all impiety upon earth, the righteous shall flourish and live long, the earth shall yield abundantly, all people shall pray to God, and all evil shall be banished from the earth (11). The sentence upon the fallen angels is communicated to Enoch (12), and he reveals it to them; but, at their urgent request, he composes a petition on their behalf, that they might obtain forgiveness; while rehearsing this, preparatory to presenting it, he falls asleep and is informed in a dream that their request for forgiveness will not be granted, and once more makes known to the angels their impending doom (13-16). Enoch tells of a journey in which he learned of the places where thunders and lightnings originate, and saw the stream of Hades, the corner-stone and the pillars of the world, the seven mountains of precious stones, and the places of punishment of the disobedient angels, i.e. the six (seven) archangels (20). He once more visits the place of punishment of the condemned angels, and the nether world (21), consisting of four parts (22). He travels to the West (23-25). From there he returns to the city of Jerusalem, which is the centre of the earth (26, 27); then he travels to the East (28-33), to the North (34, 35), and, lastly, to the South (36).

(b) The second section is Christological, and consists of chs. 37-71, subdivided into three Similitudes. A short introductory discourse (37) is followed by the first Similitude, including chs. 38-44. The appearance of the Messiah, the righteous One, brings an end of sinners upon earth (38). Enoch is carried by storm-clouds to the end of heaven, and there beholds the pre-existing Kingdom of God, the dwellings of the righteous and the elect, and of angels and archangels (39, 40). He then sees the weighing of men's actions in the balance, the rejection of sinners, the places prepared for the righteous, and certain physical mysteries (lightnings, thunders, winds, hail, mist, clouds, sun and moon, 41), also the place of Wisdom in heaven (42), and, finally, some more physical mysteries (43, 44). The second Similitude includes chs. 45-57. It begins with the Messianic Judgment (45). Enoch sees the Son of Man beside the Head of Days (46). An angel explains the vision (47), the Son of Man will overthrow and judge the kings and mighty ones of the ungodly. The task of the pre-existing Son of Man is outlined (48, 49), and the happy consequences of the judgment for the pious, together with the punishments of the wicked, and the resurrection of those who have died in righteousness (50, 51). In a vision of six mountains of metal which pass away, the destruction of the heathen world by the Messiah is portrayed. The heathen world endeavours through offerings to propitiate God, but fails. The angels of punishment go forth to do their work. The synagogue service may now be carried on unhindered (52-54<sup>a</sup>). An account of the coming flood and its occasion is inserted (54<sup>b</sup>-55<sup>a</sup>), and is followed by the final assault of the heathen world-power (55<sup>b</sup>-56) and the return of the dispersed Jews (57). The third Similitude comprises chs. 58-69, to which chs. 70 and 71 are added by way of an appendix. It begins with the picture of the blessedness of the righteous in heaven (58); an account of the mystery of lightning and thunder follows (59). A vision of Noah, an account of Leviathan and Behemoth, and various nature-elements which take part in the Flood are then given (60). The judgment of the Son of Man over the angels in heaven, and the sentence of kings by Him, followed by vain pleas on their part for mercy, are given next (61-64). Then comes the revelation to Noah of the fall of the angels, the Flood, his own preservation, the punishment of the angels, and the judgment of men by the Son of Man (65-69). Enoch's translation to Paradise, his ascension to heaven, and his acceptance by the Son of Man, are then given in the appendix (70, 71).

vol. 1. — 6

(c) The third section is Cosmological, and consists of chs. 72-82. It has been called the 'Book of the Luminaries of Heaven.' It contains a revelation given by the angel Uriel on all sorts of astronomical and geographical matters, among others on the convulsions that will occur during the period of the wicked upon earth. The course of the sun is first described (72), next the course of the moon (73, 74); untoward days (75); the winds (76); the four quarters of heaven (77); further details regarding the rising and setting of the sun (78, 79), changes in the order of things to come in the last days (80), and the return of Enoch to the earth; and the committal of these matters to Methusaleh (81, 82).

(d) The fourth section is a Historical forecast. Enoch narrates to his son Methusaleh two visions which he saw before he had taken a wife to himself. The first of these (83, 84) came to him as he was learning to write. It placed before his eyes the picture of the Deluge. The second vision (85-90) unfolded before him the whole history of Israel from the creation of man to the end of time. The children of Israel appeared in this vision in the forms of the clean animals (bulls, sheep, lambs, and goats). Their enemies were in the form of dogs, foxes, swine, and all manner of birds of prey. In the conflict between the clean and unclean, the struggle of Israel against her enemies was portrayed. The chosen people were delivered into the hands of lions, tigers, wolves, and jackals (the Assyrians and Babylonians); then they were put under the care of seventy shepherds (angels). (From this fact this section of the book takes the title of 'Vision of the Seventy Shepherds'). The shepherds allowed more of the faithful to perish than was the will of God, but at the critical moment there appeared a white lamb in their midst and entered into a fierce combat with the birds of prey, while a heavenly being gave him assistance. Then the Lord Himself burst forth from heaven, the enemies of Israel were overthrown and exterminated, the judgment ensued, and the universal restoration; and the Messiah was born as a white bull.

(e) The fifth section (91-105) is a Book of Exhortations. Enoch commands his son Methusaleh to summon to his side all his other sons, and when they have come he delivers to them an address on righteousness, which is especially designed to instruct the righteous of all ages (91<sup>a</sup>-93). In this first discourse is inserted the prediction of the Ten Weeks (91<sup>b</sup>-93). The remainder of the book (92, 94, 105) is taken up with final encouragements and message of hope.

The conclusion of the whole Book of Enoch (106-108) contains an account of the marvels destined to accompany the birth of Noah (106, 107), and a new description of the fiery tribulations reserved for the wicked and of the blessings that await those who 'loved eternal heaven better than their own lives' (108).

Literary features.—Thus far the Book of Enoch has been treated as it is extant. A closer inspection reveals the fact that it is composite. Criticism is still in a considerable state of flux as to the correct analysis of it. Charles believes it to consist of five primary documents. Clemens finds in it seven separate Enoch traditions or legends worked together by a redactor. The weight of probability, however, is rather in favour of three primitive documents: (1) A Book of Enoch, consisting of chs. 1-34 and 72-105; (2) A Book of Similitudes, including chs. 36-71; and (3) a Noachic document, broken up and inserted in various parts within the preceding two. The work of redaction appears to have been done after the two primary documents had undergone some modification, possibly accidental. The redactor used the lost Apocalypse of Noah, alluded to in Jubilees (103:210), supplementing what he deemed to be lacunae. The passages inserted from the Book of Noah are the following: 67-69: 60, 65-69a, and 106:107. To these some would add several other passages.

The date of the first of these documents is the first quarter of the 2nd cent. B.C. (200 to 175); that of the Book of Similitudes offers an as yet unsolved problem whose difficulty is somewhat enhanced by the importance of the issue involved, i.e. the relation the book sustains to the NT. The fact that this relation is undoubted and intimate has quickened interest and led to the perception of slight considerations otherwise easily left out of view. The weight of these considerations is, moreover, so well balanced that criticism seems unable to reach a general consensus on the subject. The views that divide the field are (1) that the book was composed in the Maccabean period (Ewald, s.c. 144); (2) that it was composed between 300 B.C. and 54 (Dillmann, Sieffert, Charles); (3) that it was written during the days of Herod (Lücke, Harnack, Lipsius, Schodde, Schürer, Baldensperger, Beer); (4) that it is a production of the Jewish apocryphal and written by a Christian who has used an older Jewish apocalypse as a basis (Hoffmann, Weise, Hilgenfeld, Vollmar, Tideman); (5) that though a Jewish apocalypse and possibly written before the beginning of the Christian era, it was interpolated by a Christian through the insertion of the 'Son of Man' passages (Crummond, Stalker). That the book should have been composed as a Jewish apocalypse and as such adopted the Messianic title 'Son of Man' from the Christian Gospels, is not to be thought of. That it should have been originally a Jewish apocalypse and modified by a Christian, either with a free hand or by the mechanical interpolation of the 'Son of Man' passages, is credible. But a more natural hypothesis is that it is a pre-Christian work, inclusive of the 'Son of Man' passages.

It has been demonstrated by Baldensperger and Dalman that the title 'Son of Man' occurs in Jewish rabbinical writings as the name of the Messiah (Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu, p. 90; Words of Jesus, p. 224 f.); and there is therefore nothing in the occurrence of the phrase to lead to its being considered due to a Christian author. Upon the whole it is probable that the book was produced in the 1st cent. B.C. The redaction is difficult to locate with precision and may be post-Christian.

The originals of the book were undoubtedly Semitic (Hebrew or Aramaic). The fragment of the Greek version recently discovered shows clear evidences of being the translation of a Semitic original (the case is argued conclusively by Charles, Book of Enoch, pp. 21, 22, 295, and Halévy, Journal asiat. 1887, pp. 352-355).

2. The Slavonic Enoch.—This is one of the most recent additions to our group of apocalypses. Its existence was not indeed suspected before its discovery. But this was due to the fact that a number of books were attributed to Enoch. In this very work Enoch is said to have written 366; cf. 229:681. And because some of those were extant in the Ethiopic book no one thought of seeking for more. Nevertheless, it was no source of surprise when it was announced that a new Enoch had been found. This came first as an intimation that a copy of a Slavonic version of the Ethiopic Enoch was in existence (Kozak in Jahrb. f. Prot. Theol. 1892). Prof. Charles started to investigate the matter, and with the assistance of Mr. Morfill procured and examined printed copies of the Slavonic text in question. The result was the publication of the altogether independent and hitherto unknown pseudepigraph (1896). Prof. Charles' title for the book is The Book of the Secrets of Enoch, but it is likely to be known in the future by the more convenient title, The Slavonic Enoch,* which distinguishes it from the better known and older Ethiopic work.

Contents.—The book may be divided into three parts, viz. (1) The Ascension of Enoch and his travels in the Seven Heavens (1-38). (2) The Return and Instructions to his children (39-56). (3) Second Series of Instructions, including in his audience an assemblage of 2000 people, and final assumption (57-68).

(a) Chs. 1-38. The book opens with a short prologue, introducing the personality of Enoch, and giving the time and place of a dream he saw (1). Enoch then warns his children of his impending absence from them for a time (2); he is taken by two angels up to the first heaven (3), where he sees 200 angels who guard the treasures of the snow, the dew, and the oil (4-6). He is next taken up into the second heaven, and beholds and converses with the fallen angels (7). In the third heaven, the paradise prepared for the righteous (8, 9), he is led to the northern region, where he sees the places of torture (10). From thence he is taken up into the fourth heaven, the habitation of the sun and moon, and there sees the phoenixes and chalkydries (chalkydries), mysterious composite beings with heads of crocodiles and bodies of serpents (11, 12). In the eastern portion of the fourth heaven he comes to the gates of the sun (13); thence he is led to the western regions, and hears a song by the phoenixes and chalkydries (14, 15). He is then taken to the eastern course, and hears indescribable music by angels (16, 17). Here his visit to the fourth heaven ends; he is carried to the fifth heaven, where he sees the Grigori or Watchers (18). In the sixth heaven he delays only a short time, and thence passes to the seventh (19, 20), where the Lord is seated on a high throne. Here the ministering angels who have brought him take their departure; Enoch falls down and worships the Lord; he is stripped of his earthly clothing, anointed, and robed in suitable apparel; he is given over to Vretil, the archangel (patron of literature), to be instructed (21, 22). Under the guidance of this archangel he writes 366 books (23). He returns into the presence of the Lord, and holds direct converse with Him, learning the secrets of creation (24-29*), and of the formation of 10,000 angels and the fall of Satanai (29*<sup>2</sup>); also of the creation of man, i.e. Adam and Eve (30), his being placed in paradise, his fall and judgment (31, 32). God then declares His purposes for the future (33, 34), and sends him back to the earth to stay thirty days longer and teach his children the true knowledge of God (35-38).

(b) Chs. 39-56. Enoch now begins his admonitions and instructions to his children (39); he tells of the manner in which he was given his visions, and of how he wrote them down (40); of how he wept for the sins of Adam (41); of his visit to the gates of hell, and the impression produced upon him (42); of the judgment of the Lord (43); of the duty of charity (44); of the superiority of a contrite and broken heart to sacrifice as a means of pleasing God (45); of God's love of purity in heart and His rejection of the sacrifices of the impure (46); and commends his writing to them as a permanent means of knowing God's will (47, 48). He further instructs them not to swear by heaven or the earth, and deprecates vengeance (49, 50); he urges them to be generous to the poor, not to hoard up treasures on earth (51), to praise God, and to be at peace with men (52). He enjoins them not to trust in his own intercession with God, but to give heed to his writings and be wise (53); and closes his address with an exhortation to circulate his writings, announcing at the same time that the hour for his ascension to heaven has come (54, 55).

(c) Chs. 56-67. The second series of Exhortations opens with a request by Methusalem for a blessing over the houses and children of Enoch (56); Enoch asks Methusalem to call his brothers together (57), and gives them his instructions (58), especially that they should not eat the flesh of cattle (59), nor kill any man through 'net,' 'weapon,' or 'tongue' (60); but practise righteousness, and trust in repentance for the future (61, 62), and not despise the humble and thus incur God's curse (63). At this point God calls Enoch with a loud voice, and 2000 persons come together to give him their greetings (64); he delivers his final exhortations to them, which are to the effect that they should fear and serve the Lord (65, 66). A thick darkness covers the earth, and while it lasts Enoch is taken up, but no one knows how (67). The book concludes with a summary of Enoch's life and work, and an account of Methusalem's building an altar upon the spot where his father was last seen before his ascension.

Literary questions.—The author of the work was an Alexandrian Jew. This is made clear by the affinities of his style and thought with those of Philo, his use of the LXX, his portraiture of pharaohs and chalcidians (chalcidians), and his syncretistic cosmogony. The date of composition cannot be later than a. d. 70. The temple was evidently still standing, and sacrifice was offered (66). But the Ebraic Enoch was also in existence (40th c. cf. also 432nd 3 528 612-4).

The original language was undoubtedly Greek. This is proved by the explanation of the name Adam, which is made upon the basis of the Greek form AAAM, each letter representing one of the cardinal points of the compass (ANATOLIA, ΔΤΕΙΣ, ΑΡΚΤΟΣ, ΜΕΣΗΜΕΡΙΑ). The book was known and used by Barnabas, by the author of the Ascension of Isaiah, by some of the many Sibyls, and by Irenaeus.

Editions.—The Slavonic text has been published from different manuscripts, varying more or less from one another, and not as yet fully collated (Pocock, 1880).

Translations.—English: Charles and Morfill, The Book of the Secrets of Enoch, 1896.—German: Bonwetsch, 'Das Slavische Henochbuch' in Abhandl. d. Gött. Ges. d. Wiss. (Phil.-hist. Klasse, Neue Folg. 1-3, 1896).

3. The Sibylline Oracles.—The name 'sibyl' is of uncertain derivation. Even the spelling of the word varies in the earliest period. It is, however, a very ancient one, and occurs as early as in the works of Heraclitus. By the Romans a number (ten) of sibyls were distinguished. The one of Erythrae in Ionia is reckoned the oldest. The sibyl of Cumae (Kyme) became the most famous. Large collections of verses were circulated under her name during the latter years of the commonwealth and the early empire. Sibylline verses became common in Egypt, and there arose a so-called Jewish sibyl simultaneously with the appearance of the spirit of proselytism among the Jews. Finally, a Christian sibyl came into existence in succession to and imitation of the Jewish one. The productions of the Jewish and Christian sibyls are for the most part blended into one body. They constitute a compilation of hexameters in twelve Books, besides some fragments. Each of these is evidently independent of the others, and may have circulated separately.

Contents.—Book I. opens with an account of the Creation, based upon Genesis. This is followed by the story of the Fall, the multiplication of mankind, the appearance of four successive races down to the days of the giants, the story of Noah and the Flood, a sixth race and the Titans, from whom the transition is made to Christ, and the dispersion of the Jews.—Book II. predicts a time of plagues and wickedness, which is succeeded by the tenth race (the Romans), and a period of peace. After an interpolation of a group of proverbs, the woes of the last generations are portrayed, and the events of the last day of judgment and resurrection are foretold. Then follows a picture of the punishment of the wicked and the blessedness of the righteous.—Book III. extols the unity and power of God, denounces idolatry, proclaims the coming of the Great King, and of his opponent Balaam, foreshadows the reign of a woman (Cleopatra), and the subjection of the world to Christ. At this point the sibyl returns to the origin of man, and beginning with the Tower of Babel recounts the story as given in the OT down to Roman days. She foretells the doom of Rome, and of many Asiatic cities, as well as of the islands of the Aegean. A general judgment and millennium (Messianic Day) closes the book.—Book IV. declares the blessedness of the righteous, sketches successively the Assyrian and Medo-Persian dominations, announcing the Greek conquest, which will bring woes on Phrygia, Asia, and Egypt; one great king especially will cause calamities to fall on Egypt and Greece.—Book V. is an account of the heavenly Joshua, and once more returns to further details of judgment, such as the destruction of Serapis, Isis, and the Ethiopians.—Book VI. describes the pre-existence, incarnation, and baptism of the Son of God, His teaching and miracles, the miseries in store for the guilty land, and the glories of the Cross.—Book VII. is an account of the woes impending upon various lands and cities of Greece, Asia Minor, and Egypt, in which just one prediction of the signs of the Messiah is incorporated.—Book VIII. is a history of the world under five monarchies. The fifth of these furnishes the subject for a prophecy of misery, judgment, and destruction. From this the sibyl passes to the denunciation of woes upon Egypt, the islands of the Mediterranean, and Persia, and closes with a picture of the Messiah.—Books IX. and X. are in fragments.—Book XI. is an orderly story of the world-powers from the time of the Tower of Babel to the subjection of Egypt under Cleopatra.—Book XII. pictures the fortunes of the Caesars, beginning with Augustus and closing with Alexander Severus.—Book XIII. concerns the times of the emperors of the 1st cent., beginning with Maximin. It touches more especially upon their relations with the Persians and Syrians, closing with an allegory of a bull, a stag, a lion, and a goat.—Book XIV. is the most obscure of the Sibylline productions. The writer evidently intends to unfold the fortunes of a long succession of emperors and conquerors. He gives the initial letter of the name of each, and suggests other ways of identification. But his descriptions are so wide of the historical figures that they cannot be safely identified. The period portrayed is generally the late Roman and possibly the early Byzantine.

Literary questions.—The above division into books was made in the 6th cent. of the Christian era (during the reign of Justinian). Whoever made it is also responsible for the collection of the oracles from various sources, and the insertion of certain verses of his own among them. It has been conjectured that he was a literary monastic and expert transcriber of manuscripts. Before his time the verses were circulated in a rude, undigested mass. The task of unravelling the confusion, which does not seem to have disturbed him, and of rearranging the material according to authorship and date of origin, is a very complex one, and not as yet fully accomplished. This much is evident, however, that there are four classes of utterances in the oracles: (1) those which issue from a Jewish source; (2) those which come from a Christian; (3) those which are of heathen origin; and (4) neutral elements. The last of these adds very much to the difficulty of the critical problem. The heathen elements are not very extensive, and attach themselves in general to the Jewish. For the rest, the analysis which results from the labours of Ewald and Alexandre may be safely adopted as workable, and is as follows:—

The Sibylline Oracles may be grouped into eight parts, each by a different author and from a different age, as follows—(1) The Prologue of Book I, and Book III., 97-228, belong to the age of Ptolemy Physcon (a.c. 140). They were therefore written by an Alexandrian Jew. They constitute the pith and kernel of the whole collection in point of value for the study of inter-Testamental conditions and modes of thought, and for the times of Jesus. (2) Book IV. was written about a.d. 80. Its author may have been either a Christian or a Jew, with the probability largely in favour of the former alternative. (3) Book V., with the possible exception of the first part, issued from the 1st cent. a.d., and is a mixture of Jewish and Christian fragments impossible to disentangle from each other. (4) Books VI. and VII. (to which Ewald adds the first part of Book V.) date from the early part of the 2nd century. The author was a heretical Christian. (5) Book VIII., 1-206, is also by a Christian, but not a heretic, probably of the middle of the 2nd century. (6) Book VIII., 207-501, is also by an orthodox Christian of the 2nd century. (7) Book I. (without the Prologue), Book II., and Book III., 1-86, come from the middle of the 3rd cent., and are of Christian origin. (8) Books XI., XII., XIII., and XIV. were written by a Jew resident in Egypt, who, however, lived in Christian times, and is acquainted with some Christian practices. According to this analysis, these oracles cover a period of more than 400 years in their production, and represent a wide variety of types of thought.

Editions.—The first eight books in the original Greek text were published in 1545 at Basel, and subsequently by others up to Angelo Mai (1819 and 1828, Milan). The first complete edition is that of Alexandrin (1841), and again 1869). Recent critical editions by Rzach (1891), Geffcken (1902), and Heitz (1903).

4. The Assumption of Moses.—There is some vagueness in the early Patristic references to the Assumption of Moses. Syncellus (ed. Dind. i. 48) mentions an Apocalypse of Moses. Clement of Alexandria (Adumbr. in Epist. Jac. [ep. Zahn, Supplementum Clemetinum, 84] and Didymus [Epist. Jude Enarratio [in Gallandi, Bib. Patr. vi. 307]], allude to an Assumptio Moysi. Origen (de Princ. iii. ii. 1) refers to an Ascensio Moysis. In the Acts of the Nicene Synod (Mansi, Sacror. Concil., Nova Collectio, ii. 18, 20) there is mention again of an Assumption of Moses. In other lists of apocrypha, a Testament (Δαθήκη) of Moses is mentioned (Stichometry of Nicephorus and Synopsis of pseudo-Athanasius). It has been argued (by Schürer, followed by Charles) that these two titles represent two separate divisions of one and the same book, or two books fused together in one. The work was lost during the Middle Ages, and recovered by Ceriani in an old Latin version in the Ambrosian Library at Milan in 1861.

Contents.—Moses calls to himself Joshua, the son of Nun, and directs him to preserve his writings (1). He then forecasts the apostasy and distress of the twelve tribes of Israel and their divisions into the ten and two (2), their awakening to consciousness of their sin, their repentance (3), the restoration of the two tribes and the preservation of the ten among the Gentiles (4), their repeated backslidings (5), the tyranny of Herod (6), the prevalence of wicked leaders over them (7), the oppression by the Romans (8), the advent of the Levite Taxo,* who was destined to restore a better state of things among them (9). At this point the author inserts a Psalm of Hope and adds a few concluding words closing the discourse of Moses (10). Joshua then laments over the course of events revealed to him, and refuses to be comforted (11); but Moses urges him to take up his work, and conquer and destroy the Gentiles (12). At this point the book breaks off rather abruptly.

Literary questions.—The Patristic quotations from the Assumption of Moses identify the words of Jude<sup>9</sup> as from this book; but as the extant text does not contain the words, it can only be that it is either (1) wrongly entitled, or (2) that the quotation is made from the second part of it which is lost (Schürer), or (3) that two separate works entitled respectively The Testament of Moses and the Assumption (Ascensio) of Moses were fused into one (Charles). The last position is most convincingly supported by its advocate, and seems the most probable. The present so-called Assumption of Moses is then the Testament of Moses, bearing within it traces of the addition to it of the original Assumption of Moses.

The text of the book exists in a single Latin manuscript of the 6th (6th) cent. a.d. This is undoubtedly a translation from a Greek text. It has been further conjectured that the Greek itself was a translation of a Hebrew or Aramaic original; but though the advocates of each of these languages, as also of the Greek, strenuously defend each his position, in the absence of definite data nothing can be dogmatically asserted on the point. Hilgenfeld and Drummond favour a Greek original; Ewald argues for a Semitic (either Hebrew or Aramaic); Wieseler and Langen, for a Hebrew; Hausrath, Schmidt-Merx, Dillmann, Thompson, for an Aramaic.

The author of the work was probably a devout Jew, a Pharisee, and a mystic who does not share but rather aims to defeat the purposes of the Zealots (so Charles, but it has been strenuously maintained that he was a Zealot). The date of the composition is fixed by the allusion to Herod the Great. At the earliest, it must be 41, but various dates down to 138 have been advocated. The design of the author seems to be to teach the lesson that God has foreseen and foreshadowed all things; hence Israel should entertain no fear. A deliverer is to come.

5. Fourth Ezra (Second Ezechiel).—This pseudepigraph has been known from the earliest Christian days, and widely circulated under the name of Ezra as his second, third, fourth, or fifth book, according to the various ways of grouping and entitling the books that issue from the Restoration generation. (See explanation of these names by Thackeray in Hastings' DB, art. 'Ezra, First Book of'). Fourth Ezra, however, has come to be generally accepted as the name for it.

Contents.—This is given in seven visions. The First Vision (3<sup>1-5</sup>) is granted to Ezra in answer to disturbing doubts arising in his mind. These concern the origin of sin and suffering in the world (3<sup>1-6</sup>). An angel gives him the answer: God's ways are inscrutable. The human spirit can comprehend but little (4<sup>1-21</sup>). But as he pleads that it is painful to be left in ignorance on such vital matters, he is assured of a change of soon to take place soon. Definite signs will mark the change. He must fast for seven days, and receive another revelation at the end of that time (4<sup>22-5</sup>).

The Second Vision (5<sup>2-6</sup>) is granted in answer to the question, Why has God given over His only chosen people into the hands of the heathen? (5<sup>20-26</sup>). He receives the answer that God loves His people, and the problem must be regarded as not solvable for man; nevertheless deliverance is drawing near; the generations of men are passing; the world has become old; the signs of the end are visible (5<sup>23-6<sup>24</sup></sup>).

* After unsuccessful attempts by many others, a satisfactory explanation of this name has been given by Burkitt (see Hastings' DB iii. 449). Taxo is a copyist's mistake for Taxok—Taxok. And this is to be read by Gematria as Eleazar. עֲלֵזָרָא = אֵלְעָזָר. Eleazar the father of seven sons is the great Levite (2 Mac 6<sup>10</sup>).

The Third Vision (6<sup>2-9<sup>25</sup></sup>), like the second, is given after a period of seven days' fasting, and is in answer to the question, Why does not Israel possess the land which belongs to it? (6<sup>2-26</sup>). The answer is not direct. An evil age must necessarily precede the good that shall be in the future (7<sup>1-18</sup>). The doom of sinners is grievous but well-deserved. The Son of God, the Christ, shall appear in judgment (7<sup>17-44</sup>). Few are chosen, but all the greater is the honour conferred on them (7<sup>14-24</sup>). A sevenfold suffering and a sevenfold joy await men in the intermediate state (7<sup>12-16</sup>). Intercession for the condemned will be of no avail at the last judgment (7<sup>10-13</sup>), they have deserved their doom (7<sup>16-18</sup>). God's mercy is consistent with the sufferings of the condemned (7<sup>12-13</sup>). At this point Ezra interposes a prayer and receives an answer (8<sup>2-25</sup>). The saved shall rejoice at their own lot, and forget the sufferings of sinners (8<sup>2-5</sup>). It is certain that the end of the world is nigh. The signs are not to be mistaken (8<sup>2-9<sup>12</sup></sup>). There are more of the lost than of the saved (9<sup>14-25</sup>).

The Fourth Vision (9<sup>2-10<sup>8</sup></sup>) is given upon the Plain of Ardash. It consists of a symbolic picture of Zion's sorrow, followed by glory. The vision (9<sup>2-10<sup>8</sup></sup>) presents a woman in tattered garments, weeping and wailing because of her lost son. The explanation by the angel (10<sup>2-8</sup>) identifies the woman with Zion, and points out the lesson to the seer.

The Fifth Vision (10<sup>9-12<sup>21</sup></sup>) presents the fourth world-empire under the figure of an eagle coming out of the sea, and like the fourth vision falls into two parts, i.e. the Vision (10<sup>9-12<sup>2</sup></sup>) and the interpretation of it by the angel (12<sup>2-21</sup>). This is followed by a Conclusion in story form. The people come out to seek for Ezra, they find him in the plain, and he sends them back into the city (12<sup>20-21</sup>).

The Sixth Vision (13<sup>1-18</sup>) portrays a man emerging out of a stormy sea and floating on a cloudless heaven (13<sup>1-4</sup>). A countless multitude comes to wage war against him; but by a stream of fire proceeding from his mouth he overcomes his enemies (13<sup>5-11</sup>). Then another host of friendly men flock around him (13<sup>12-13</sup>). The question is raised, Is it better to survive to the end of the world or to die beforehand? It is answered in favour of the former alternative (13<sup>14-15</sup>). The explanation of the vision follows. The man in the cloud is the Son of God, the events are those of the Messianic age (13<sup>16-18</sup>).

The Seventh Vision (14<sup>1-20</sup>) is given three days after the sixth, under an oak. This is the familiar legend of Ezra's restoring the lost Scriptures. But it begins with a command to keep his present vision secret (14<sup>1-7</sup>). A prayer of Ezra follows, in which he beseeches the Lord for the privilege of rewriting the lost Scriptures (14<sup>7-16</sup>). The prayer is answered, and Ezra reproduces the lost books together with seventy others (14<sup>17-18</sup>). The book concludes with an account of Ezra's decease.

The above does not include chs. 1. 2 and 15. 16, found in the Latin Version, which is the basis of the chapter divisions of the book. The Latin Version has also served as the basis of some current translations into English (The Variorum Apocrypha, by C. J. Ball, and in Wace's Holy Bible, 'Apocrypha,' by Lupton). These four chapters are universally regarded as later additions by a strongly anti-Jewish Christian author, appended respectively to the beginning and end of the Latin Version. The other versions do not contain them. They have been detached and published together as 5th Esdras by Fritzsche (Lib. Apocr. Vet. Test. 'Liber Esdræ Quintus,' pp. 640-653).

Literary questions.—The book is a unity, and comparatively free from interpolations and editorial tampering. The author was a devout man for whom problems of theology especially had a considerable fascination, but he is also interested in the broader and more constant questions which recur in the religious sphere with every generation. He naturally looks into his own age, and finds no sign of a restoration to righteousness and recognition of God in the forces that work there. He accordingly plants his hopes in the world to come.

Fabrichius has indeed analyzed the work into four different productions fused together into unity by clumsy redactors (Das Vierte Buch Esra, 1880), and his theory has been substantially accepted by de Faye, but his observations would lead rather to the composition of the book from pre-existing sources than to the bringing together of independent books of documents by a redactor. The impression of unity is too strong to be destroyed by such considerations as Fabrichius alleges.

The date of the book cannot be earlier than the fall of Jerusalem, as that event is distinctly alluded to (3<sup>16-18</sup> 13<sup>18</sup>). The Temple is destroyed and the service in abeyance (10<sup>1</sup>). A still later chronological starting-point is given in an allusion to the death of Titus (11<sup>18</sup>); the author even expects the death of Domitian (12<sup>2</sup>). It is safe, therefore, to set down the year 90 as approximately the time of composition.

Editions.—The book exists in Latin, Syriac, Ethiopic, Arabic (2), and Armenian versions. The original was in Greek. This is made evident by the characteristic differences of the versions. They are all easily accounted for by an original Greek. The Latin text was first edited critically by Volkmar (1860); also by Fritzsche (Lib. Apocr. Vet. Test. 1871). The Syriac was published in Ceriani's Monumenta Sacra, I, Fasc. 2 (1860); also in photolithographic reproduction, under the title Fragmenta Syro-Pesulto Veteris Testamenti, etc. (1876-1883); again by H. Bensly, with an introd. by M. R. James (Fests and Studies, Camb. III, 2, 1893). The Ethiopic was published by Laurentius (1820), the Arabic by Gildemeister (1877), the Armenian by the Mechitarists in Venice (1806).

Translations.—English: Bissell (Lange's Commentarij, 1880), Lupton (Wace's Apocrypha, 1888).—German: Volkmar (1863), Ewald (*Abhandl. d. Gott. Gesellsch. d. 6. The Syriac Baruch.—Baruch is mentioned as Jeremiah's companion and helper during the trying days which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem and the deportations under Jehoiakim and Zedekiah (Jer 32<sup>1-5</sup> 36, 45). The fact that he wrote under Jeremiah's direction seems to have stimulated the tendency to publish alleged prophecies and revelations in his name. The first of these was the book that passed into the group of OT Apocrypha. One of Ceriani's many contributions to apocryphics was the discovery, translation into Latin (1866), and later publication of a Syriac text of a Book of Baruch (Monumenta Sacra, v, 1871, pp. 11-18).

Contents.—The book is divided into two main parts, i.e. the Apocalypse proper (chs. 1-77) and the Letter to the Nine Tribes and a Half (chs. 78-87).

Part I may again be subdivided into seven sections. (1) The first section (1-12) begins with the announcement of the impending fall of Jerusalem, and the captivity of Judah; next comes the portrait of the advancing Chaldeans, the hiding of the treasures of the Temple, and the destruction of the walls by angels, so that the Chaldeans might not claim the glory of the capture of the city. The next day the city is occupied by the enemy (6-8). Baruch stays amid the ruins of the city, while Jeremiah, by Divine command, accompanies the exiles to Babylon (9-12).—(2) The second section (13-20) contains a vision given to Baruch while standing on Mount Zion. He is assured that the calamity just fallen on the chosen people has been inflicted in mercy (13); he complains that good men are no better than others, but is answered that sin in one who possesses the Law is worthy of being punished (14, 15). He expresses other misgivings which are answered. He is then promised a new revelation (16-20).—(3) The third section (21-34) opens with Baruch's appearance at the end of seven days in the place appointed. Here he expresses his thoughts in the form of a prayer (21); he is shown that his knowledge is imperfect, that the time is coming when God's judgment will mature (22-25); he wishes to know of the distresses of the last days (26), and is given a revelation concerning the order of the times. The tribulation will come in twelve stages (27); the whole earth will be affected, but those in the chosen land will escape; the Messiah will appear, first to bring blessings to the righteous on the earth (28, 29), and then, as He returns to His glory, to raise from the dead both the righteous and the unrighteous, and consign them respectively to happiness and perdition (30). Baruch then summons the elders of the people, and announces to them that the ruined Zion shall be rebuilt and destroyed again, and finally restored in glory to last for ever (31-34).—(4) The fourth section (35-46) gives a vision which Baruch saw as he slept amid the ruins of the Holy Place. On one side there appeared a great forest in a valley surrounded with mountains; on the other side a vine with a gentle spring streaming from beneath its roots. But the spring grew into a mighty river, and overwhelmed the forest, together with the mountains round about. A solitary cedar was left. The stream first addressed words of denunciation against the cedar, and then annihilated it. In the place of forest and mountains the vine grew, and the valley was filled with blossoms (35-37). The interpretation of the vision is given as requested by Baruch. The kingdoms which have oppressed Zion shall be overwhelmed by the Messiah. The cedar is the last king of the last kingdom; he shall be slain by the Messiah, who shall then begin His eternal reign (38-40). Baruch is commanded to warn the people and prepare himself for further visions (41-43), which he accordingly does (44-46).—(5) The fifth section (47-52) also opens with a prayer of Baruch's offered seven days later (47-48<sup>ab</sup>). In answer Baruch receives a new revelation regarding the distress of the last days (48<sup>bc-52</sup>), and of the resurrection both of the evil and the good, together with their punishment and reward (49-52).—(6) The sixth section (53-76) is again in the form of a vision. A cloud ascends from the sea, and pours forth upon the earth black and white (dark and bright) waters. Lightning illumines it, and twelve streams are put in subjection under it (53). Baruch prays that it may be explained to him (54), and the angel Ramsael is sent to him to interpret the vision (55). The cloud pouring forth the waters represents mankind in its historical unfolding; the dark waters stand for evil ages, the bright for good. The course of the world from Adam to the Exile is thus symbolized. The twelve periods are identified with the bright and dark streams (56-63). The twelfth is the age of the rebuilding of Jerusalem and of the restoration of the Temple service. These twelve are followed by a last black stream, which stands for the tribulation of the Messianic age. Then shall the Messiah take charge of the few saved ones (69-71). The lightning is the Messiah, and His eternal beneficent reign (72-74). Baruch thanks God, and is informed that he will shortly be taken from the earth, though not by death (75, 76).—(7) The seventh section tells how Baruch called the people together, told them of his impending departure, wrote two letters, one to the exiles in Babylon and the other to the nine and a half tribes in the regions beyond, and how he sent the first by messengers and entrusted the second to an eagle (77).

Part II. This part of the book is taken up with the letter to the nine tribes and a half (78-87). In it Baruch recalls to the minds of the tribes God's mercy, and assures them that their sufferings are intended for their good (78-81). God has shown Baruch in visions the meaning of their experiences and the doom of their enemies (82-84); they should therefore be undismayed, and expect speedy deliverance, for the end is near (85). The letter then ends with formal instructions (86, 87).

Literary questions.—The extant text in Syriac is from an original Greek. This is shown by the use of such forms as Godolias, Sedekias, etc., which could only have been made from the Greek. The word for 'splendour' in 37 is manifestly a translation of εσπασ. But if the Syriac was made from a Greek text, was this Greek the original language of the book? The answer demanded by the facts seems to be negative. There are traces of a Hebrew original behind the Greek. The most distinct of these is the occurrence of Hebrew idioms surviving through the two translations. Moreover, the quotations agree in all cases with the Hebrew text as distinguished from the LXX, which must have been used had the original been in Greek. Certain obscurities, too, can be cleared up by retranslation into Hebrew. (For the full argument see Charles, The Apoc. of Baruch, pp. xiii-iii.)

The relation of this apocalypse to 4 Ezra is very striking. Both books seem to be the products of the same environment. They deal with the same questions and in similar fashion. Their resemblances are indeed so marked that they have been denominated 'the twin apocalypses.'

The author of Baruch was evidently a Jew. The date when he wrote is determined partly from his relation to the author of 4 Ezra. There are other data in the case. Papias quotes one sentence from it, though attributing the expression to Jesus. This fixes the terminus ad quem as A.D. 130. The terminus a quo is an allusion to Eab. Enoch 56<sup>ab</sup>, hence A.C. 160. Charles, however, following Kabisch, believes that it was put together out of five or six independent writings, composed between A.D. 50 and 90, some time about the year 100.

7. The Greek Baruch.—A hint as to the existence of another book bearing the name Baruch was long known to exist in a passage of Origen (de Princ. II. iii. 6), in which he alludes to Baruch's account of the Seven Heavens. No such account is to be found either in the OT apocryphon or in the Syriac apocalypse bearing the name of Baruch. But it was not until 1896 that the book alluded to by Origen was discovered and published in Texts and Studies (Camb. vol. v. 1, pp. 84-94).

Contents.—The book opens with Baruch's lamentation and prayer over the fallen kingdom of Judah. Forthwith an angel visits him and promises to show him wonderful secrets (1). The promise is fulfilled. He is taken up into the first heaven, where he sees creatures with the face of bulls, the horns of stags, the feet of goats, and the hanches of lambs; he then inquires as to the dimensions of this heaven, and is given some astounding figures (2). In the second heaven he sees men with the look of dogs and the feet of deer. They are those who have counselled the building of the tower (of Babel) (3). In the third heaven he sees a dragon which lives on the bodies of the wicked; it is Hades. He further learns that the tree which caused Adam's fall was the vine, and therefore the abuse of the fruit of the vine has ever since been the source of fearful evils to men (4). He is told the nature of Hades (5), and is shown the Phoenix, which protects the earth from the burning rays of the sun (6). The approach of this monster terrifies him (7). He learns that the renewing of the crown of the sun is necessary, because the view of the sins of men daily dims and weakens this luminary; it must be cleansed and refreshed at the end of each day (8). The chariot of the moon and the explanation of its stages, together with the reason for its shining only at night, are then made known to Baruch (9). In the fourth heaven he comes into view of a vast plain and body of water which is the source of the 'dew of heaven' (10). The gates of the fifth heaven are closed as he and his guide come to them; but upon being opened they admit the archangel Michael, who receives the prayers and good works of the righteous and presents them before God (11, 12). The guardian angels of the unrighteous petition to be released from their hated work, but are told to wait (13). Michael departs, but returns again bringing oil, which he gives to the angels that had brought to him the virtues of men (14, 15). He addresses the angels who had brought no good works (16). The gate closes, and the prophet and angel return to the earth.

Literary questions.—Thus far there are two recensions of this apocalypse known, the Greek and the Slavonic. But neither of them is believed to be the original. Their relations to one another are those of a more or less condensed version of the same story. That the original must have been fuller and larger is clear from Origen's intimation that it gave an account of seven heavens, whereas the Greek text before us stops with the fifth heaven, and the Slavonic knows of only two.

The relation of the book to the Syriac Baruch is probably explained by referring to 70th of that work. Here God promises to give Baruch, after the lapse of forty days, a further revelation regarding the world of material elements (the cycle of the earth, the summits of the mountains, the depths of the valleys and of the seas, and the number of its rivers). The fulfilment of this promise is not recorded in what follows, and the Greek apocalypse was composed to show not only that it was fulfilled, but also in what way.

This dependence on the Syriac Baruch on the one side and the allusion of Origen to the work on the other, fix the date of its composition as between 100 and 175 A.D. It was written as a Jewish apocalypse, but shows traces of interpolation by Christians (cf. ch. 4, 'The Vine').

LITERATURE.—This is limited almost altogether to the introductions accompanying the editions and translations. Of these, however, that by Prof. James is quite ample and thorough.

8. The Psalter of Solomon.—The Psalter of Solomon is placed in the Stichometry of Nicephorus among the Antilegomena of the OT, and not among the Apocrypha; so also in pseudo-Athanasius' Synopsis S. Scripturae. It is a collection of lyrics, each one independent of every other. Only the last two of these (the 17th and 18th), strictly speaking, fall into the group of apocalyptic writings. They were known and referred to as the 'Odes of Solomon' as early as the Pistis Sophia (200 to 250 A.D.), and frequently later than that date.

Contents.—Ps 17 is in general a prophecy of the restoration of the glory to the desolated throne of David. It opens with an expression of trust in the Lord, the Eternal King of Israel, addressed directly to Him (1-4). The Lord (still addressed in the second person) has chosen David to be king over Israel, and promised him and his seed perpetual dominion; but sinners have risen up against Israel and have desolated the throne of David (5-8); yet the Lord will cast these down and visit them according to their sins (9-12). They have done wickedly and acted proudly (13-17); the righteous fled before them and wandered in desert places (18-20); the sins of the wicked have abounded (21, 22); the Lord is to raise the son of David, His Servant, purge Jerusalem, cast down the unrighteous and lawless nation, gather together His people, and judge all the tribes of men (23-30). He will not put confidence in human weapons of warfare, but in the Lord; and the Lord will bless him, will strengthen and give him dominion (37-44). He shall rule righteously and wisely (45-49). Blessed are they who shall live in his day (50, 51).

Ps 18 is on the Messianic Age. It begins with an ascription of praise to the Lord for His favour to Israel and His love to the seed of Abraham (1-5). It foreshadows a blessed day in which God shall purge Israel and raise His Messiah (6); it declares the blessedness of those who shall live in the days of the Anointed (7-10), and closes with a doxology for the constancy and perpetuity of the heavenly luminary (11-14).

Literary questions.—Though the Psalter of Solomon is a collection of independent compositions, these apparently issue from the same historical conditions and are pervaded by the same spirit and tone. They nowhere claim to be Solomon's composition. This claim was made for them by later copyists. In general, the conditions under which they were written are those of the period of thirty years between 70 and 40 B.C. Pompey is alluded to as 'the mighty striker' who comes 'from the ends of the earth' (39). Certain prisoners of the land go forth to meet him and welcome him (51). These are Artabulus II. and Hyrcanus II. The Gentiles tread Jerusalem under foot (29, 30, 31); but he who has conquered it and inflicted severe sufferings on it is finally overtaken and suffers a shameful death in Egypt (28, 29). All this points directly to the Roman conquest under Pompey.

Some older critics read the allusions above indicated as having reference to Herod and his days (Movers, Keim); Ewald saw in them Antiochus Epiphanes and his times; but these identifications are manifestly far-fetched. The consensus of critics is now against them. But there are exceptions, such as Frankenberg, who advocates the age of Antiochus.

The original language of the Psalter was Hebrew. The radical difference between the type of Messianism held up in 17 and 18 and the eschatology of the rest of the collection points to a separate authorship of these two psalms. But apart from this, and the antecedent probability that lyrics of this class are apt to be independent contributions, there are no clear grounds for ascribing particular psalms to different authors. The author (or authors) belonged to the Pharisaic sect.

9. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs.—This production was well known to the ancient Patristic writers. It is quoted by Irenaeus (Evangel. 17, ed. Harvey, ii, 487), Origen (Hom. in Jos. 15<sup>2</sup>), and Tertullian (adv. Marc. v, 1). It is named in the Synopsis of pseudo-Athanasius and in the Stichometry of Nicephorus. In the 13th cent. Bishop Grosseteste made a translation of it into Latin. It has been very frequently translated both in ancient and in modern times.

Contents.—The book extends the idea of Gn 49 to the sons of Jacob. Just as the father had called his sons together before his death and told them his last thoughts, so each of the sons is made to summon his own children to his deathbed and to give them a retrospective and a prospective view. Each, however, centres his discourse in a dominant idea or topic. (1) Reuben, on Thoughts. This Testament begins with the confession by Reuben of his sin and the penance he performed therefor (1). Man has seven spirits given him to perform his work in the world, i.e. life, sight, hearing, smell, taste, speech, reproduction (2); an eighth is added to these; but Beliar has intermingled with these seven misleading spirits, i.e. fornication, gluttony, strife, vanity, arrogance, lying, and injustice; sleep is a counterfeit eighth (3). Beware of fornication (4). Women have always been seducers. They misled the Grigori, 'watchers' (5). Give heed to Levi, for he shall know the Law (6 and 7).—(2) Simeon, on Envy. This also opens with a confession, but the sin confessed is envy (1, 2). The patriarch warns his children against this sin (3), commends Joseph, and urges them to imitate him (4-8).—(5) Levi, on the Priesthood and Arrogance. This is the distinctively apocalyptic Testament. After introducing himself, the patriarch recounts the revelation given him of the seven heavens (1-4); then tells of being ushered into the presence of the Lord, who gave him the command to destroy the Shechemites (5). Contrary to the desire of his father, he executed the command (6, 7). He saw a second vision, in which he was invested with the priesthood and received instructions from his grandfather Isaac (8, 9). He foreshadows the corruption of the priesthood by his family (11, 12), instructs them in their duties and again warns against corruption (13, 14); foretells the destruction of the Temple, and indicates from the Book of Enoch that the Captivity will last seventy years (15-17); he announces the Messiah, His rejection and the dispersion of Israel, and closes with an exhortation to choose well (18, 19).—(4) Judah, on Fortitude, Avarice, and Fornication. After introducing himself, Judah gives a glowing account of his physical strength and agility, with many illustrative incidents (1-9). He tells of how he chose Tamar as the wife of his son Er, of the wickedness of his sons and their death, and of his own relations with Tamar (10-12). Ascribing his fall to drunkenness and covetousness, he warns his children against these vices, as well as against fornication (13-17); he foresees from the Books of Enoch the wickedness into which they shall fall in the last days, and warns them (18-21); he urges them to love Levi, and predicts with sorrow their apostasies from the Lord and the wars and commotions until the time of Messias (22-24). This shall be followed by the resurrection of the patriarchs (25).—(5) Issachar, on Simplicity. Beginning with the circumstances of his birth, this patriarch gives an account of his early life and marriage (1-3), and points out his simplicity and singleness of mind as virtues to be imitated (4-7).—(6) Zebulun, on Compassion and Mercy. After naming himself and the prosperous circumstances in which he was born, he claims not to have sinned except in thought. Only in the affair of Joseph, which he describes at length, he had conspired with his brothers, but with sorrow and compassion for Joseph (1-5). He was the first to construct a boat and go fishing. He used the fish he caught in feeding the needy (6, 7). He urges his children to be compassionate (8) and united in action (9, 10).—(7) Dan, on Anger and Lying. This patriarch also begins with a confession. He had planned to slay Joseph out of envy, but the Lord had withheld the opportunity (1). He warns his children against the spirit of lying and anger (2-4); he predicts evil days in the future, of which he had learned from the Books of Enoch (5), and exhorts them to stand firm in righteousness (6, 7).—(8) Naphtali, on Natural Goodness. This Testament opens with an account of the mother of the patriarch, Bilhah (1). It proceeds with a description of his fleetness of foot, which gives occasion for a speech on the fitness of the body to the character of the soul (2). He exhorts his children not to force the order of nature (3, 4), and tells of a vision he saw when forty years of age. It was on the Mount of Olives, to the east of Jerusalem. The sun and moon stood still; Jacob called his sons to go and seize them. Levi took hold of the sun, Judah of the moon; they were lifted up. A bull with two horns on its head and two wings on its back made its appearance. They tried to capture it, and Joseph succeeded. Finally, a holy writing appeared telling of the captivity of Israel (5). Seven months later he saw another vision. Jacob and his sons were standing by the Sea of Jannia. A vessel full of dried fish appeared; but it had no rudder or sails. They embarked, and a storm arose. They were threatened with destruction; Levi prayed, and, though the vessel was wrecked, they were saved upon pieces of the wreckage (6). Naphtali told his visions to his father, who saw in them a token that Joseph was living (7). With the prediction of the Messiah (8, 9) the Testament closes.—(9) Gad, on Harvest. After the customary account of himself, Gad (1) confesses that he hated Joseph and brought about his sale to the Ishmaelites (2, 3). He warns his children against hatred, points out its evil, and urges them to cherish and exercise love (4-8).—(10) Asher, on the Two Aspects of Vice and Virtue. This patriarch begins with a portrayal of the two ways open before men, describing each carefully (1, 2). He commends simplicity of heart and devotion to virtue (3), gives reasons (4), and again commends the path of virtue (5, 6), closing with warnings and predictions (7, 8).—(11) Joseph, on Chastity. Joseph begins with the contrasts between his many-sided suffering and God's many-sided help and deliverance (1). He then proceeds to narrate the circumstances of his servitude in Egypt (2), his temptation (3-7), his imprisonment (8, 9), and exhorts to brotherly love (10) and the fear of God (11). He further goes back to tell the story once more of the circumstances of the temptation (12-15), and concludes with an exhortation to honour Levi and Judah, predicting that from them should arise the Lamb of God (17-20).—(12) Benjamin, on a Pure Mind. Benjamin begins by telling of his birth (1); then of the meeting with Joseph as the perfect man, who should be imitated (3, 4). A pure mind will be recognized by the wicked (5). Beliar himself cannot mislead the pure-minded (6). There is a sevenfold evil in wickedness, and a sevenfold punishment is to be measured out to those who practise it (7). Flee wickedness, he urges, and concludes with the prediction of corruption among his descendants (8, 9), and of the resurrection and the judgment which will follow.

Literary questions.—The book is extant in a Greek text, also in a complete Armenian and fragmentary Syriac and Aramaic versions. The Latin version, frequently reprinted from the 16th century onwards, is Gresseteste's. An ancient Latin translation is not known to exist. A Slavonic version of uncertain origin is also published by Tichonravoff (Denkni. d. afrass. Apoc. Lit., St. Petersburg, 1863). The original of the work was either Greek or Hebrew. Grabe (Spicileg. Patr. 2, 1714, 129-144) argued for the Hebrew. All other critics have favoured Greek until Prof. Charles revival of Grabe's contention. Charles reasons mainly from the language (cf. also Gaster, 'The Heb. Text of One of the Twelve Testaments of the Patriarchs' in PSBA, Dec. 1883). As it stands, the book presents the anomaly of a work intensely Jewish upon the whole, but containing passages of quite as intensely Christian colour. To explain the anomaly, it must be assumed either that a Christian of late date adopted the mask of a Jew of an earlier period, or that the work was originally that of a Jew, and the Christian passages are later interpolations. The former of these alternatives is practically excluded by the type of Judaism running through the work as a whole. This is not such as one would assume for the sake of literary effect. Accordingly the tendency of all later writers has been towards the view that the main part of the Testaments was composed in the 1st cent. B.C. It is found, however, that the author incorporated into this work parts of an apocalyptic composition of the century preceding (c. 200-150). The whole was later interpolated by a Christian, or rather a number of Christians, at least one of whom held Docetic views. These interpolations were made during the first three centuries of the Christian era.

10. The Book of Jubilees.—This book was known and often alluded to by the ancient and medieval ecclesiastical writers up to the days of Theodorus Metochita (A.D. 1332). It was called 'Jubilees' ('The Book of Jubilees'), or 'Little Genesis' (Parva Genesis, Aetroyvesca). Some time after the middle of the 14th cent. it disappeared, and was known only through the references to it of the earlier writers. Its recovery in modern times was accomplished by the African missionary Krapf in 1844. Krapf found an Ethiopic version of it in Abyssinia, which he sent to Europe. Here it came into the hands of Dillmann, and was by him translated and published first in German and afterwards in Ethiopic.

Contents.—The general plan of this book follows so closely that of the canonical Genesis that it will suffice to designate some of its distinctive features only. The book gives a haggadic version of the history contained in Genesis, including also Exodus as far as ch. 14. The main events are retical in all essential points, but very many additions and embellishments are introduced. First of all, the whole of time is represented as subdivided into jubilee periods, these into sabbatical periods, and these into years. This, it is said, was the original plan of God, and the knowledge of it was communicated to Moses by revelation. The account of the manner and time of the revelation is given in ch. 1, in which, further, the angelus interpretis (who is in this case the Angel of the Presence) furnishes an outlook into the future and foretells the apostasy of Israel and her restoration to God. In the rest of the book the feasts and observances of the Mosaic ritual are transferred to the days of Noah and Abraham, and in general the events of this earlier period are treated with much freedom and illustrated by amplification and tradition. In the account of the Creation, an addition is made with reference to the creation of the angels. The luminaries created on the fourth day are said to be for Sabbaths and festivals. Eve was created during the second week. Therefore the command 'that their defilement is to be seven days for a male child and fourteen days for a female.' Adam is said to have been set to keep the garden from the incursions of the beasts of the field. Before the Fall animals could speak. It was between the 63rd and 70th year of Adam's life that Cain was born; between the 70th and 77th that Abel was born; between the 77th and 84th that Awan his only daughter was born. Adam and Eve had nine other sons (making twelve children altogether). The names of the wives of antediluvians are generally given. Enoch's wife was Edna, the daughter of Daniel. The corruption of mankind which led to the Flood is said to have spread through the whole creation, so that even animals were made subject to it, for which reason they perished in the waters. The Nephilim, who sprang from the union of the sons of God with the daughters of men, were set at enmity with one another, and 'slew each man his neighbour.' After the Flood, Noah offered a sacrifice which is described as in every particular conforming to the Levitical law. The feast of the first-fruits was observed by Noah. The feast of the New Moon also had its origin at this time. The year consists of 13 months, each of 28 days, or altogether 364 days. After the Flood, Mastema (Satan) led men to sin through the building of the Tower of Babel and the worship of graven images. Abraham did not fall into this sin. He tried to convert his father from idolatry, and failing to do so he burned the house of idols, in which his brother Haran perished, and then was called to leave his native land. When Abraham had established himself in the Land of Canaan, and Ishmael and Isaac were born, after Hagar and Ishmael had been sent away, Mastema appeared before God to move him to try Abraham by demanding the offering of his son Isaac. Nine other events in Abraham's life were trials, thus making the complete number ten. Before his death, Abraham addressed his son Isaac, advising and warning him against idolatry. When he was about to die, he called Jacob his grandson and, taking his fingers, closed his own eyes with them and stretched himself on his bed. Jacob fell asleep with his fingers on his grandfather's eyes. When he awoke, he found that Abraham was cold and dead. The affair of Jacob's obtaining Esau's blessing from his father is narrated so as to circumvent direct falsehood. When Isaac asks, 'Who art thou?' Jacob answers simply, 'I am thy son.' The story of the massacre of the Shechemites by Simeon and Levi is also softened, so as to justify the deed. The relations of Jacob and Esau are presented in a light entirely unfavourable to Esau, who is made to act the part of a cowardly and cunning traitor. In the story of Joseph, the elements of envy and cruelty on the part of his brethren are left out. The account of Jacob's death is given without his final addresses to his sons. It is simply said that he blessed his sons. The death of Joseph gives occasion for the mention of a new king who ruled over Egypt after Menekeron, thus intimating the end of the Shepherd dynasty. In the account of Moses' early life, Hebrew maidens are represented as serving Pharaoh's daughter. The last chapter is occupied altogether with the Sabbath law, which is given with great precision and rigidity.

Literary questions.—The book is preserved as a whole in an Ethiopic version. A fragment, containing about one-third of it, is also found in Latin, probably made from a Greek copy. In addition to these, some smaller Syriac and Greek fragments are known to exist. The original was evidently in a Semitic language, but whether Hebrew or Aramaic is not absolutely certain. Hebrew was more usually the language of such apocalyptic books. Jerome, moreover, alludes to the 'Little Genesis' as a book in Hebrew. But neither of these considerations is quite decisive. In using the term 'Hebrew,' Jerome did not always keep in mind the distinction between that language and Aramaic. He followed the NT habit of calling Aramaic Hebrew (Jn 19:24). In favour of an Aramaic original, the use of the form Mastema as the name of Satan may be adduced. Mastema is the Aphel form from מָצַח 'to accuse,' and מָצַח is Aramaic for מָצַח. Further, it is said that when Abraham left Mesopotamia he took with him the books of his father (12:20), 'and they were written in Hebrew,' which would be uncalled for if the account itself was in Hebrew.

The date of the book is approximately fixed by its relation to 25th. Enoch on one side, and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs on the other. The Ethiopic Enoch is undoubtedly known and used by the author of Jubilees (cf. Jub 21 = Enoch 3; Jub 7 = Enoch 7; Jub 10 = Enoch 10; Jub 2 = Enoch 6:1-2). On the other hand, in all probability, the author of the Testaments had used Jubilees (Jub 30. 33 = Test. Reub. 1. 3; Jub 32 = Test. Lev. 8; Jub 32 = Test. Lev. 8; Jub 34 = Test. Jud. 3-4; Jub 23 = Test. Zeb. 9). Its chronological place is therefore after the end of the 2nd cent. B.C. and before the end of the 1st cent. A.D.

The author has been held to be an Essene (Jellinek), a Hellenist (Frankel), or a Sadducee; but there are strong reasons against any of these views. He was more probably a Pharisee (Dillmann, Rösch, Drummond).

11. The Ascension of Isaiah.—The ancients allude to non-canonical literature associated with the name of Isaiah under four different titles. Origen speaks of the Martyrdom of Isaiah; Epiphanius names an Anabaptikon, and Jerome an Ascension; in the list of canonical and kindred books published by Montfaucon (given by Westcott, Canon of the New Testament, App. D, xvii), a Vision (Spas) of Isaiah is included. Of these, the Vision is again named by Euthymius Zigabenus in the 11th cent., and a Testament of Hezekiah is spoken of by Georgius Cedrenus in the 12th century. Whatever the facts may have been as to the identity of these writings or their relations to one another, nothing was definitely known of them until 1819, when Archbishop Lawrence accidentally found an Ascension of Isaiah in a second-hand bookstore in London. It was an Ethiopic text, and Lawrence published it with a translation and notes. Upon this, together with two other MSS., later brought to light, Dillmann based his edition of the Ethiopic Ascension of Isaiah in 1877.

Contents.—The work consists of two parts. Part I. (1-5). In the 26th year of Hezekiah, Isaiah predicts that Manasseh would be led by Satan to apostatize. Hezekiah wishes to slay his son, but is prevented by the prophet (1). After the death of Hezekiah, Manasseh does give himself up to the service of Satan and practises all manner of wickedness. Isaiah takes refuge in the desert (2). Balkira, a Samaritan, accuses the prophet of uttering threats against Jerusalem and raising himself above Moses in authority, whereupon Manasseh, possessed by Satan, causes the capture of Isaiah (3<sup>1-2</sup>). The reason for this is the wrath of Satan, roused by Isaiah's disclosures regarding the coming of Christ from the seventh heaven, regarding His death, His resurrection, His ascension, His second coming, the sending of the twelve disciples, the persecutions of the Church, the advent of Antichrist, and his destruction (3<sup>3-4</sup>). Manasseh causes Isaiah to be sawn asunder, and the prophet endures the martyrdom with steadfast calmness in spite of the derision of Balkira and Satan (5).

Part II. (6-11). In the twentieth year of Hezekiah, Isaiah saw a vision which he narrated to the king and council of prominent men (6): an angel took him through the firmament and through the six lower heavens into the seventh. Here he saw the departed patriarchs—Adam, Abel, and Enoch—and God Himself. He learned that Christ should come into the earth; and having received this information, he was led by the same angel back into the firmament (7-10). In the firmament he saw the future birth, life, suffering, death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus into the seventh heaven. The angel left him, and Isaiah's soul returned into his earthly body. It was because of this vision, which he had related to Hezekiah, that Manasseh caused Isaiah to be put to death (11).

Literary questions.—The signs of the compositeness of the book are too plain to require critical demonstration. The question is simply whether it consists of two, three, or four independent writings. The most obvious partition is into two. The Vision of Isaiah is complete in itself and distinct from the Martyrdom. Even its being put after the Martyrdom, which it would precede in historical sequence, is an evidence of independence. But these two main sections have been enlarged by the addition of a preface and two minor passages in the second part. Thus the analysis is: (1) the Martyrdom of Isaiah (1-5, exc. 1 and 3<sup>1-5</sup>); (2) The Vision of Isaiah (6-11, exc. 11<sup>2-3</sup>); (3) An introduction by a later hand (1); (4) Additions by a later Christian writer (3<sup>3-5</sup>, and 11<sup>2-3</sup>). This is Dillmann's analysis, and has been generally accepted. The dates of these two sections are also widely apart. The Vision belongs to the class and period of Christian apocalypses which culminate in Dante's Divina Commedia. It was probably produced in the 2nd cent. A.D. The Martyrdom is the embodiment of an ancient tradition regarding the death of the prophet, and was probably composed just before the Christian era. Editions.—Ethiopic Text: Lawrence (1819), Dillmann (1877). Translations.—Latin (with both the above). 12. The Histories of Adam and Eve.—This work appears under two main forms, almost as distinct as two works: one in Greek and one in Latin. The Greek is entitled Narrative and Citizenship of Adam and Eve (Διγίγναις). It was published by Tischendorf in 1866 (Apocal. Apocr. pp. 1-23) under the misleading title of 'The Apocalypse of Moses.' The Latin version is entitled Vita Adæ et Evæ, and was published by W. Meyer (Abhandl. d. Münchener Akad. Phil. Hist. Klasse xiv. 3, 1878, pp. 185-250). A third slightly varying form exists in Slavonic, and a fourth in Armenian. Both of these are from the Greek narrative.

Contents.—The story opens with an account of the deeds of Adam and Eve immediately following the expulsion from the Garden of Eden. Adam and Eve seek for food, experience difficulties in obtaining it, and perform penance in order to secure God's mercy (1-8). Satan once more tempts Eve (9-11), and narrates at the request of Adam the circumstances of his own fall (12-17). Then follows an account of the birth of Cain and Abel, and Adam is taught how to cultivate the soil (18-22). Eve dreams of Abel's death, which presently occurs; but Seth and other children are born to Adam and Eve (23-24). Adam informs Seth of a vision given him through the archangel Michael, after he and Eve had been cast out of Eden. It was a chariot similar to the wind, but with wheels of fire. The Lord sat upon it, and many thousand angels stood on His right hand and on His left. Adam addressed a prayer to the Lord, and the Lord assured him that those who should know and serve Himself would not fall from the seed of Adam. Adam enjoins Seth to receive this knowledge and keep it (25-29). At the age of 930, Adam falls sick, and, calling his sons together, once more tells them of the circumstances of the Fall (30-34). He then sends Eve and Seth to the vicinity of Paradise in order that, putting dust upon their heads, they might plead for him and receive some of the oil of life to anoint him (35-36). On the way they are met by the Serpent, which bites Seth, but is persuaded by Eve to let him go (37-39). They reach the gates of Paradise, present their petition, but, instead of the oil for which they had asked, they receive the promise of a blessing in the distant future (40-42). They return to Adam, and report their experiences (43, 44). Adam then dies and is buried (45-51).

The Diagnosis gives a parallel account of the Fall by Eve (15-30), of Adam's last will and death (30, 31), of the intercession of the entire angel host in behalf of forgiveness for Adam (33-36), of the acceptance of the prayer (37), of the burial of Adam by the angel (38-42), and of Eve's death and burial (42, 43).

Literary questions.—This book (or couplet of books) is found in three recensions, Greek, Latin, and Slavonic. It is based on a Jewish original (Tischendorf, Conybeare, Spitta, Harnack, Fuchs). Others, however, do not believe in the Jewish original (Schürer, Geisler). The date of the composition is uncertain. The author was a Jew. (Hort, however, finds traces of Christian influence, and relegates the Adam story to post-Christian times.)

13. The Apocalypse of Abraham.—This is a work preserved only in a Slavonic translation. It was published in that language (1863), but only made known more widely through a German translation by Bonwetsch (1897). It tells of how Abraham took offence at the idolatry of his father, how he despised both the wooden image Barisat and the stone statue Marmath, and was on that ground made the subject of a special visit on the part of the angel Jael, who taught him to offer sacrifice, and then took him into heaven on the wings of a dove. Here Abraham received many revelations. This work should not be mistaken for the Testament of Abraham, edited by James in the Cambridge Texts and Studies (i. 2, 1892).

14. The Apocalypse of Elias.—Mention of this work occurs in Origen's Com. on Mt 27 (ed. de la Rue, iii. 916; ed. Lommatsch, v. 29). Here it is said to be the source from which St. Paul quotes 1 Co 2<sup>o</sup> 'Eye hath not seen,' etc. Cf. also Epiphanius, Hær. 42 [Dindorf, ii. 398]; and Jerome, Epist. 57 ad Pammachium. Fragments of this writing have been recovered in a Coptic manuscript brought from Akhmim. Some of these fragments were taken to Paris and some to Berlin. Those in the former place have been edited and published by Bouriant; those in Berlin by Steindorff (Texte u. Unters., Neue Folge, ii. 3a). This editor thinks that the original was a Jewish apocalypse interpolated by a later Christian writer.

15. The Apocalypse of Zephaniah.—This was a larger work than the preceding, and was known to Clement of Alexandria (Strom. v. 11. 77). Among the Akhmim fragments published by Bouriant and Steindorff there are portions of this apocalypse also, but they are not extensive enough to serve as a basis of any trustworthy judgment as to its origin and nature. The extracts recovered do not, however, contain Christian interpolations.

16. An Anonymous Apocalypse.—The Akhmim fragments contain, in addition to the above, portions of a purely Jewish apocalypse, which cannot be identified or associated with any special name. The author, speaking in the first person, names Elias among other saints whom he has seen in heaven (14). The fragments are published along with Steindorff's above-named edition of the Akhmim manuscripts.

17. The Prayer of Joseph.—Origen (ed. de la Rue, iv. 84; Lommatsch, i. 147) calls this 'a writing not to be despised, current among the Hebrews.' Nothing, however, besides Origen's quotations from it, is known of the contents of the work.

18. The Book of Eldad and Modad.—These names [EV Medad] occur in Nu 11<sup>26-29</sup>. A book bearing this name is mentioned in Hermas' Shepherd (Vis. ii. 3), but nothing more is known of it with certainty.

iv. GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS.—The general characteristics of apocalyptic literature may not all be found in ideal vividness in any single production of the class. Nevertheless, in so-called apocalypses, most of the following traits are predominant, and, with the majority of them, all appear in some degree of clearness.

1. The Vision Form.—This is what gives the name to the class, and, although not an indispensable feature, is quite determinative. The authors put themselves in the place of seers, and throw upon the canvas large, vivid, lifelike portraiture. The imagery is in many cases fantastic and unreal as compared with the actual world, but it is striking and clearly drawn. Conflicts and struggles, judicial assizes, conversations and debates, as well as cosmographical delineations, are placed before the eyes of the seer, and by him described more or less in detail.

2. Dualism.—The distinction between the world of sense and the world of Divine or spiritual realities is always prominently in the mind. The other world is, however, conceived as only imperceptible to the bodily senses, not as different in kind. A dualism as between matter and spirit underlies the philosophy of the apocalypse, but is necessarily ignored in the presentation of the realities of the spiritual. These are put before the bodily senses as if a simple heightening of the powers of the senses would bring them into view.

3. Symbolism.—The visions portrayed abound in conventional symbolical figures. Mixed organisms, partaking of the parts and characteristics of different creatures (beasts), frequently recur. Generally the different parts that enter into these mixed figures represent different abstract principles, and the mixed figure as a whole stands for combinations of powers. Mystic and symbolic numbers, too, constantly appear (seven heavens, seven archangels, ten shepherds). Sometimes this symbolism is explained in minute terms, but sometimes it is left for the seer to unravel. Sometimes the purpose of the use of such symbolism seems to be simply to harmonize the form of presentation to the mysterious nature of the subject-matter; but at other times it is evidently designed to conceal the exact import of the revelation from the uninitiated, and to keep it a secret within an esoteric circle. The method of interpretation known as Gematria is to this end frequently resorted to.

4. Angelology.—A system of mediators between the two worlds is pictured as establishing their connexion. In comparison with the angelology of the OT (with the exception of Daniel), this mediatorial hierarchy is complex and definite. It is, moreover, subdivided into two branches, the good and the evil, which are at enmity with one another. In some apocalypses one particular angel is commissioned to the task of acting as the companion and friendly interpreter of the seer (angelus interpres). To him the seer appeals in his ignorance of the meaning of the mystic visions, and from him he receives needed explanations. Here, too, a difference must be noted between the apocalypses and the earlier prophets (cf. Am 7-9), who see visions, but speak directly with the Almighty in person.

5. The Unknown as subject-matter.—The subject-matter revealed concerns one of two spheres, viz., either the inscrutable mechanism of the other world, or the purposes of God regarding the present world: (a) Under the first head are portrayed the characteristics, deeds, and destinies of angels, both good and evil, the secret forces and courses of the great nature-powers and elements, and the mode of the Creation. (b) Under the second head naturally two divisions are distinguishable, the historical and the eschatological. Such great landmarks in the history of the world as the entrance of sin, the fortunes of the first human pair, the Flood, the destinies of Israel, are given as known and decreed of God. The whole eschatology, including the final judgment, the Messianic Age, the fate of mankind, the resurrection of the dead, and the destruction of the world, are of the utmost interest to the apocalypticist. In fact, so prominent is this part of the world of mystery in the apocalypses that some authorities have yielded to the temptation of making it the sole test of an apocalypse. Apocalyptic is, according to this view, synonymous with eschatological. (So Lücke, and, among more recent scholars, Bousset).

6. Pseudonymity.—The author of an apocalypse generally assumes the name of a very ancient person, preferably of some one who is represented in the canonical books as having enjoyed direct communication with the spiritual world. Enoch, Moses, and Elijah stand out as those who passed from this world to the other in a preternatural manner, and therefore were favoured even while here with apocalyptic glimpses of the other. Others, because of their exceptional holiness and nearness to God, are easily put into the same place of favour. Such are Isaiah, Ezra, Baruch, and Daniel. The name of Ezekiel, however, quite singularly does not seem to have drawn any of these writings to itself. Jeremiah's began to be used, but did not become very popular. That of Solomon was attached to a body of psalms for quite obvious reasons. The Sibyl was probably drafted into the service in order to gain the confidence of heathen readers through the use of the voice of a trusted prophetess of their own. It was intended to propagate Jewish doctrines among the Gentiles (Schürer). This pseudonymity is accompanied by a not altogether accidental tendency to tamper with the apocalypses. More than any other class of writings they show signs of having been edited and modified. Many of them are manifestly collections or compilations of smaller productions. Others abound in interpolations and additions designed to embellish, clarify, and expand their portraits.

7. Optimism.—The design of the whole class is predominantly that of encouraging and comforting the chosen people under persecution. Some, of course, are more or less sectarian in their tendency, i.e. they address their words of encouragement and hope to a particular section of the people, who are regarded as faithful or righteous par excellence. The majority are meant to teach and comfort the whole nation.

v. THEOLOGICAL IDEAS.—The root of the apocalyptic theology is the sense of need. Though it may not be strictly accurate to call the apocalypses 'tracts for hard times,' it is quite true that they issue from a faith which looks to God for deliverance from evil days. The eye is turned into the future for the good which the God of the Covenant has promised to Israel. The darker the outlook, the brighter the hope which breaks through it and sees ultimate victory. The rallying point of thought is here furnished by the conception of the 'Day of Jahweh' in the prophets of the earlier period. But this hope for the future is impatient. It cannot await the working of the slow moral forces gradually evolving the consummation. It rather sees the Golden Age bursting forth in a sudden and supernatural manifestation of God's power and favour to His chosen people. Accordingly, the cardinal doctrines of the apocalyptic theology must begin with the contrast of the ages.

1. The doctrine of the two Aons (4 Ezz 7<sup>20</sup>).—

This is developed from the older idea of the 'latter days' (אַחֲרֵי הַיָּמִים) which the earlier prophets always held up as a source of comfort and encouragement whenever they were moved to denounce the existing evils of their day. A great day of Jehovah would bring about the righting of all that was wrong with the world. In the apocalypses, all that precedes the critical day is summed up under the conception of the present age (αἰὼν οὖτος, οὗτος αἰὼν), the future, with its ideally good conditions, is the coming age (αἰὼν ὁ μέλλων, ἐρχόμενος, οὗτος αἰὼν). The noteworthy feature about the conception of the aons is that each is a coherent unity, and has a character of its own. The present age is unpropitious, evil (4 Ezz 7<sup>12</sup>); the future will be good. The past is the age of the world-kingdom, portrayed under the symbolic figure of beasts; the future, the age of the Divine reign; it has a human aspect. All this is put forth as a source of comfort and encouragement to the faithful. The duration of the evil age is variously computed. Enoch makes it 10,000 years (Eth. Enoch 16<sup>18</sup> 21<sup>19</sup>); in the Assumption of Moses it is 5000; at any rate, it is definite and near its end. It is soon to pass away. The question is even pertinent whether those living shall continue to the end of it. This question, however, is not answered (4 Ezz 4<sup>27-28</sup> 6<sup>28</sup>, Syr. Bar 4<sup>17</sup>).

2. The impending Crisis.—The passing of the old will be accompanied by great changes in nature. The order of things will be reversed. The moon will alter her course, and not appear at her appointed times; the stars shall wander from their orbits and be concealed (Eth. Enoch 80<sup>7</sup>). Trees will flow with blood, and stones will cry out (Syr. Bar 27). In the heavens, dread signs of portentous significance will appear (Sib. Or 3<sup>78-80</sup>). Fountains will dry up, the earth will refuse to yield; the heavens will be turned into brass; the rains will fall, and springs of waters will be dried up. Among men, wars and rumours of wars will prevail (Eth. Enoch 99; 4 Ezz 9<sup>8</sup>), and private feuds and recklessness of the life of men will be the rule (Eth. Enoch 100; Sib. Or 3<sup>82-87</sup>, Syr. Bar 43<sup>82</sup> 70<sup>8</sup>). Women will cease to be fruitful, and miscarriages will occur (4 Ezz 5<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>10</sup>). These are the ἀρχὴ ἀδίκων of Mt 24, Mk 13.

3. The Conception of God is more definitely anthropomorphic than in the earlier period. He is pictured by the apocalypsts as seated on the highest heaven, and surrounded by a host of attendants. In the Slavonic Enoch, in the Ascension of Isaiah, in the Greek Baruch, and in general in all the apocalypses, God is regarded as a monarch with an army to fight His battles, and a retinue of servants to execute His orders. Much of this is naturally a part of the drapery of the vision, but it all tends to accentuate the gulf which separates God from man. Especially where the anthropomorphism is conscious of its own inadequacy, and is combined with descriptions of the fearfulness of God's person, the idea of transcendence is accentuated, and begins to dominate the apocalypsts' thought of God.

4. The cosmology is a corollary of the transcendence of God. The distance between heaven, His dwelling-place, and earth, the abode of man, is enlarged and filled with six stages, making altogether seven heavens. These are minutely described in the Slavonic Enoch, the Ascension of Isaiah, the Greek Baruch (cf. also Test. Lev. 2 and 3). The substance of which these heavens are made is light, or rather luminous matter (Eth. En 14<sup>8-9</sup>). The language is not metaphorical. This light becomes fuller and more intense as one approaches the throne of God Himself. With God are to be found in this sphere the forces and persons that wage His warfare and serve to carry out His plans. Besides the hierarchy of angels (already spoken of), there are here the abodes of the sun, moon, stars, and nature-powers; also the Messiah, ready to be manifested at the proper time.

5. An arch-enemy called Beliar, Mastema, Azazel (Satan), at every point undertakes to thwart the purposes of God. It was he who tempted and misled Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden (Life of Adam and Eve). As he takes on himself a body and appears on earth in order to defeat the Messiah, he is Antichrist. In this capacity he is sometimes represented as taking the form of a king (Antiochus Epiphanes, Nero, Caligula) and sometimes that of a false prophet (Sib. Or 3<sup>27</sup>).

6. Man.—There is a definite realization of the unity of the human race. Sin, need, and death are looked upon as affecting all men. They have one cause for all. The world was created for the sake of man (4 Ezr 8<sup>4</sup>, Syr. Bar 14<sup>18</sup>). Similarly, the plans of God have in view the welfare of men as such. The blessings of the Messianic age come to men in general, although with varying degrees of fullness (Sib. Or 3<sup>27</sup> 28<sup>11</sup>). But the distinction between those who please God by obeying His law and those who do not is never lost sight of. Israel is His chosen people, and He has given it the Law; but the Israelite who transgresses the Law is punished, whereas the Gentile who observes the Sabbath shall be holy and blessed like 'us,' says the author of Jubilees.

7. Sin.—All misery among men is the result of sin, and the fall of the first pair in the Garden of Eden is the cause of it. This is predominantly the lesson of the Life of Adam and Eve; but it is also clearly put in 4 Ezra and in the Syriac Baruch (Tennant, The Sources of the Doctrine of the Fall and Original Sin, 1905).

8. The coming Messiah.—The central development of apocalyptic literature is the figure of the Messiah; but it is nowhere outlined so clearly as in the Ethiopic Enoch. He is here designated as the Son of Man; He is also called the Righteous One, the Elect One, the Elect of Righteousness and the Faithful One, and the Anointed One. He is not a mere human being; He has His home in heaven with the Ancient of Days (30<sup>7</sup> 46<sup>1</sup>). Enoch sees Him as pre-existing. This pre-existence is also implied in the declaration that His name was named by the Creator of spirits before the creation of the sun and stars (48<sup>9</sup>), that He was chosen and concealed before the foundation of the world (48<sup>9</sup> 62<sup>9</sup>). He will become manifest in the day of consummation, taking His seat beside the Lord of the Spirits, and all creatures shall fall down before Him (51<sup>2</sup> 4 61<sup>1</sup> 63<sup>9</sup>). Other portraits are to be found in 4 Ezr 13<sup>9</sup> ('One in the form of a man'), and in the Psalms of Solomon (17 and 18).

9. The Resurrection.—The doctrine of Dn 12<sup>2</sup> is that 'many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt.' In the Eth. Enoch (51<sup>1</sup>) this is broadened into a universal resurrection, the object of which is defined as judgment for the deeds done in the body (Eth. Enoch 22). This idea is also taught elsewhere (4 Ezr 7<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>6</sup> 14<sup>8</sup>, Syr. Bar 42<sup>7</sup> 50<sup>5</sup>, Test. Benj. 10, almost in the words of Dn 12<sup>2</sup>, Life of Adam, 41, 10, 13, 28, 51).

10. The Judgment.—This undoubtedly developed from the prophetic conception of the Day of Jahweh. It is to be distinguished from the judgment which takes place during the course of the present age. It is called the Great Judgment (μεγάλη κρίσις, Eth. Enoch 10<sup>6</sup> 12 25<sup>4</sup> 43<sup>9</sup> 50<sup>1</sup> 53<sup>8</sup> 60<sup>9</sup> 63<sup>10</sup> 67<sup>10</sup>, Jub 5<sup>9</sup> 32<sup>1</sup>, Eth. En 91<sup>7</sup>, Test. of Levi 3, Assump. Mos 1<sup>18</sup>); Eternal Judgment (Slav. Enoch 7<sup>1</sup> 40<sup>12</sup>, 4 Ezr 7<sup>20-72</sup>, Syr. Bar 20<sup>4</sup> 57<sup>2</sup> 59<sup>8</sup> 83<sup>7</sup> 85<sup>12</sup>, Life of Adam, 39). It consists in a spectacular revelation of the wickedness of God's opponents, and their condemnation and punishment for their enmity to Him. The subjects of the judgment are both heavenly and earthly powers. Satan and Antichrist (if these two be looked at as different), the fallen angels, the world-powers, and wicked men are all included. The judgment will be upon the ground of books in which either the names or the deeds of men have been inscribed according to their good or evil. Sometimes the deeds are represented as being weighed in the scales. Each person judged must stand upon his own merits. Intercession in his behalf by another is of no avail. The judge is God Himself. He appears as the Ancient of Days (one having a Head of Days), with white hair and beard. He is seated on a glorious throne, and surrounded with myriads of angels (Eth. En 1<sup>4</sup> 2, Sib. Or 3<sup>21</sup> 22, Slav. En 20<sup>1</sup>, Test. Levi 4, Assump. Mos 12<sup>9</sup>). In some representations it is the Messiah who acts as the judge (uniformly in the Book of Similitudes, Eth. Enoch 37-71, with the exception of 47<sup>7</sup>). His sphere of judgment, however, includes the fallen angels and demons, not men. For the most part, the Messiah appears either before or after the judgment (4 Ezr 7<sup>23</sup>, before; Eth. Enoch 90, after). Again, Messiah is associated with God and acts as the judge while God executes sentence (Eth. En 62).

11. The Punishment of the Wicked.—The most manifest effect of the judgment is the overthrow of God's enemies and the infliction of fit penalties upon them. Of these enemies, three classes may be distinguished: (a) Spirits, including Satan and fallen angels (Test. Benj. 3, Sib. Or 3<sup>23</sup>, Test. Sim. 6, Zeb. 9). (b) Heathen world-powers, looked at either in the abstract or as special individual kings (4 Ezr 11, 12<sup>2</sup>, Sib. Or 3<sup>22-32</sup>, Ps-Sol 17<sup>22</sup>, Eth. En 51<sup>4</sup> 52<sup>2</sup> 53<sup>7</sup>). (c) Sinners in general. But special mention is made of Israelites who transgressed the law (Syr. Bar 85<sup>15</sup> 54<sup>22</sup>). Satan (Beliar) is cast into the fire (Test. Jud. 25), though he rules in hell with his angels (Eth. En 53<sup>8</sup> 56<sup>1</sup>). The fallen angels pass at the judgment into a permanent condition of damnation. The spirits who sprang from the union of the angels with the daughters of men are also confined in eternal torment. The heathen who have opposed God and oppressed Israel are destroyed. Destruction (ἀπώλεσθαι), however, is not conceived as equivalent to annihilation, but as involving existence in a wretched state.

12. The Reward of the Righteous.—The works of the pious are preserved as in a treasury in heaven (4 Ezr 7<sup>7</sup> 8<sup>2</sup>, Syr. Bar 14<sup>12</sup> 24<sup>1</sup>). When they are raised from the dead, it is in order that they may come into eternal life (Ps-Sol 3<sup>10</sup>). This they are said to inherit (Eth. En 37<sup>4</sup> 40<sup>9</sup>, Ps-Sol 9<sup>14</sup> 1<sup>3</sup>). Eternal life is sometimes looked at as simply a prolonged bodily life (Eth. En 5<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>10-17</sup> 62<sup>14</sup>, Jub 23<sup>27-29</sup>); but sometimes it appears as a superior kind of life in another world (4 Ezr 8<sup>28</sup>, Syr. Bar 21<sup>22</sup>, Test. Lev. 18).

13. The Renovation of the World.—This is the natural corollary of the idea that the world as at present constituted has been corrupted by rebellion against God and sin, and therefore cannot stand. Deutero-Isaiah (65<sup>17</sup> 66<sup>22</sup>) foreshadows the advent of 'a new heaven and a new earth.' The same world-reconstruction is held in prospect by the apocalypticists. The Ethiopic Enoch (91<sup>18</sup>) announces that 'the first heaven will vanish and pass away, and a new heaven will appear.' The present order of the material heavens will last only until the new eternal creation is brought into existence (Eth. En 72<sup>1</sup>). Time distinctions will cease when the new creation is accomplished (Jub 50<sup>9</sup>).

14. Predestination.—In the sense of the determination of the destiny of individuals beforehand, as elect or non-elect, the idea of predestination does not clearly appear in the apocalyptic literature. In the sense, however, that all the experiences of God's people are known and have always been known by Him, and do not come to pass without His consent, the doctrine is constant as the undertone of thought. All the events unfolded in the eschatological pictures are certain to come to pass because God wills that they should. Certainty of blessedness for the righteous is not dependent upon their own piety, but upon God's having foreordained it (Assump. Mos 12<sup>9</sup>). The age is as a whole fixed and measured (Book of Jubilees). When its course has run, it comes to an end (4 Ezr 4<sup>30</sup> 7<sup>24</sup>). A certain number of righteous must be gathered in. Only when this takes place can the consummation occur. It was this doctrine that made the whole apocalyptic theory a practical effective scheme, because it enabled it to impart the assurance of the realization of that good in the future which was missed in the present.

vi. CONTACT WITH THE NEW TESTAMENT.—The significance of apocalyptic literature for the NT is very large. In general, apocalyptic furnishes the atmosphere of the NT. Its form, its language, and its material are extensively used. In particular, this is true of the following main lines:—

1. The apocalyptic form is used as such in the literary composition of the NT. In the Apocalypse of John this becomes the form of the whole book. In other places it is introduced as a part of productions of a different literary type (cf. Mt 24 and parallels). Whether these passages were originally separate works and the Gospel writers incorporated them, or whether they make up integral parts of the plans of the Gospels, is a question for historical criticism to deal with. In their interpretation no satisfactory results will be reached if their formal affinity to the apocalypses be ignored. In 2 Th 2<sup>1-12</sup> the case is clear. The Apostle evidently weaves an apocalyptic passage of his own construction into his Epistle. A firm base of operations is thus furnished for the interpretation of the apocalyptic portions of the NT. These must be read as the apocalypses in general are read.

2. Some outstanding phrases in the NT terminology deserve special mention. The expression 'Son of Man' occurs first in Daniel (7<sup>13</sup>). From here, if the now predominant pre-Christian dating of the Book of Similitudes (Eth. En 37-71) be correct, it is adopted into that work, and this usage serves as the bridge of connexion between Daniel and Jesus, who treats this term constantly as His own title. Closely associated with this title is the phrase 'Head of Days' (Eth. En 47<sup>48</sup>), as applied to God. Other phrases of this class are the 'Day of Judgment,' the 'Great Day of Judgment' (Eth. En 19<sup>22-23</sup>).

3. Quotations from apocalyptic books are not very common in the NT. The most familiar is that in Jude<sup>14</sup> from Eth. En 1<sup>9</sup>. Jude<sup>9</sup> is also a quotation from the Assumption of Moses (Charles, Testament of Moses). The book is not named here, and the quotation is identified by ancient writers to whom this apocryph was familiar. But coincidences of phraseology, suggesting quotations either of one from the other or of both from a common source, are quite frequent (cf. Charles, Book of Enoch, pp. 42-49; Apocalypse of Baruch, pp. lxxvi-lxxix; Book of the Secrets of Enoch, pp. xxii, xxiii; Assumption of Moses, pp. 113; also Sinker, Testamentum XII Patriarcharum, pp. 209-210). Some of these parallelisms must be ascribed to the nature of the thought expressed, which perhaps would not admit, or at least would not easily lend itself to very different phraseology; but in a large number the coincidence can occur only where literary affiliation of some kind exists.

4. The most important point of contact, however, is that in subject-matter. And here it is no mere point of contact that we have to note, but a large and free adoption of the forms worked out by the apocalypticists. To undertake a list would be to repeat the summary given above of the apocalyptic theology. The simplest way to describe the relation is to say that Jesus and the writers of the NT found the forms of thought made use of in apocalyptic literature convenient vehicles, and have cast the gospel of God's redemptive love into these as into moulds. The Messianism of the apocalypticists has thus become unfolded into the Christology of the NT. The theocratic judgment has passed into the universal ethical discrimination between individuals according to the deeds done in the body. Other doctrines, such as angelology and demonology, have likewise been used as the vehicles of great eternal verities.

5. Solutions of some questions which St. Paul faced are proposed in some of the apocalypses (notably 4 Ezr and Syr. Bar). These are often as different as they can possibly be. Whether they are meant to be a secret form of attack on Christianity or simply independent ways of approaching the same subjects, they are of the utmost importance. In the first case, they throw light on the growth of Christian belief and the manner of the polemic waged against it. In the latter, they illustrate the nature of the setting in which the gospel found itself as soon as preached.

APOCRYPHA.—This term is here used for those Jewish writings included in the Gr., Lat., and Eng. Bibles to which the title is commonly applied, i.e. the Biblical Apocrypha. For the literary history and characteristics of the Apocrypha see Hastings' DB, vol. i. s.v. 'Apocrypha.' The relation of the Apocrypha to Christ and Christianity, which is the subject of this article, comes especially under four heads—the Messianic idea, the doctrine of Wisdom, the anticipation of Christian doctrines other than that of the Person or mission of Christ, the use of the Apocrypha in the Christian Church.

i. THE MESSIANIC IDEA.—While this idea is luxuriantly developed in Apocalyptic literature, it is singularly neglected in most of the Apocrypha. The stream of prophecy which ran clear and strong in the OT became turbid and obscure in those degenerate successors of the prophets, the Apocalyptic visionaries. But it was in the line of the prophetic schools of teaching that the Messianic idea was cherished. Accordingly the treatment of the later stage of that teaching as erratic and unauthoritative, not fit for inclusion in the Canon, involved the result that the remaining more sober literature, which was recognized as nearer to the standard of Scripture, and in Egypt included in the later canon (at all events as in one collection of sacred books), was for the most part associated with those schools in which the Messianic hope was not cultivated. Therefore it is not just to say that this hope had faded away or suffered temporary obscurity during the period when the Apocrypha was written, the truth being that it was then more vigorous than ever in certain circles. But these circles were not those of our Old Testament Apocrypha. Thus the question is literary rather than historical. It concerns the editing of certain books, not the actual life and thought of Israel.

This will be evident if we compare the Book of Daniel with 1 Maccabees. These two books deal with the same period. Yet the former, although it does not know a personal Messiah, is the very fount and spring of the Messianic conception of the golden age in subsequent Apocalypses. On the other hand, 1 Maccabees ignores the Messianic hope, at all events in its usually accepted form.

Only two passages in this book can be pointed to as suggesting the Messianic idea, and they will not bear the strain that is sometimes put upon them. The first is 1 Mac 2<sup>57</sup> 'David for being merciful inherited the throne of a kingdom for ever and ever.' We have here that very elementary form of the Messianic idea, if we may so call it, the permanence of David's throne. But it is evident that David as the founder of the royal line, not the Messiah, is here referred to, and that the permanence of the throne is for the succession of his descendants, not for any one person. Not only is this the most reasonable interpretation of the passage, but it rests on OT promises to that effect, where the family of David and not the personal Messiah is intended (e.g. 2 S 7<sup>14-16</sup>, cf. Ps 132<sup>11</sup>). Of this passage, however, as of the earlier Scriptures on which it rests, we may say that the idea contained in it is realized by the permanent reign of David's great Son, and in a much larger and higher way than had been anticipated. The other passage is 1 Mac 4<sup>46-48</sup>. 'And there came into their mind a good counsel, that they should pull it (i.e. the sanctuary) down, lest it should be a reproach to them, because the Gentiles had defiled it, and they pulled down the altar, and laid up the stones in the mountain of the house in a convenient place, until there should come a prophet to give an answer concerning them.' This is not even a reference to 'the prophet' of whom we read in Jn 1<sup>25</sup>. It is merely a case of waiting for some prophet to come and say when the temple was to be rebuilt, with no definite assurance that one specifically anticipated prophet was thus destined to arise.

Nevertheless, though we cannot point to any Messianic prophecy in 1 Mac., some of the Psalms attributed to this period indicate a prevalence of ideas that belong to the same circle of thought. Passionate patriotism fired by martyrdom and crowned with temporary success naturally painted great hopes for the nation. The reason why these were not connected with a coming Messiah may be twofold. (1) For a time it seemed likely that the Maccabees themselves were realizing those hopes, that this remarkable family of patriots was really restoring the glory of Israel. (2) Since these men were of the priestly line, the splendour of their achievements eclipsed for the time being the national dreams of the house of David.

The reaction of the later Hasidim, out of whom the Pharisaic party emerged, against the worldly methods of the Hasmonean family and their identification of the mission of Israel with military prowess, released the more spiritual religious hopes, and so prepared for a revival of Messianic ideas. This new movement, which saw the true good of the nation to lie in her religion and looked for her help from God, did not altogether coincide with the hope of a personal Christ, for God Himself was the Supreme King whose coming was to be expected by His people.

The book of Judith is a romance issuing from the Pharisaic reactionary party; but it is devoid of all specific Messianic ideas. In this case the human saviour of Israel is a woman.

Of the three other popular tales, two, The History of Susanna and Bel and the Dragon, contain nothing bearing on the Messianic idea; but the latter part of Tobit may be accounted Messianic in the general sense as giving a picture of the Golden Age of the future. Jerusalem is to be scourged for her children's works, but she is to give praise to the everlasting King that 'afterwards his tabernacle may be builded' in her 'again with joy.' Many nations are to come from far to the name of the Lord God with gifts in their hands. All generations shall praise her with great joy. The city is to be built and paved with precious stones. 'And all her streets shall say Hallelujah; and they shall praise him, saying, Blessed be God, which hath exalted it for ever' (To 13<sup>9-12</sup>). In all this there is no mention of the son of David or any human king and deliverer. (In the Hebrew variation of the text of this chapter as rendered by Neubauer, we read of 'the coming of the Redeemer and the building of Ariel,' i.e. Jerusalem; but evidently this Redeemer is Jahweh). We must go outside our Apocrypha to the Psalms of Solomon for the Pharisaic revival of the Messiah of the line of David.

Apocalyptic literature lends itself more readily to Messianic ideas, and these find full expression in the Book of Enoch, where—in the 'Similitudes'—the descriptions of the Messiah who appears in clouds as the Son of Man are assigned by Dr. Charles to the pre-Christian Jewish composition.

2 Esdras, also a Jewish Apocalyptic work, calls for closer examination, since it is contained in our Apocrypha, although its late date diminishes its value in the history of the development of thought. The Christian additions (chapters (a) 1, 2; (b) 15, 16) do not call for attention here; they could only come into the study of the development of Christian thought if they were in any way contributions to that subject; but the warnings of the styploplating of Israel by the Gentiles in (a), and the judgment of the nations in (b), cannot be regarded in that light. The original work (chapters 3-14) affords significant evidence of the melancholy condition into which Jewish Messianic hopes had sunk during the gloomy interval between the destruction of Jerusalem and the rise of Bar Cochba, the reign of Domitian (A.D. 81-96) being its generally accepted date (see Hastings' DB, vol. i. p. 765). Unlike the other Apocryphal writings, since it does not illustrate the transition from the OT to the NT, it is serviceable only in the study of post-Christian Judaism. Its Christian interpolations do not materially hinder us from recovering the original text. The Messianic passages are in chapters 7, 12, and 13. The insertion of the name 'Jesus' in 7<sup>28</sup> (not found in the Oriental versions) by a Christian hand is not sufficient reason for discrediting the Jewish character of the composition. The picture of the Messiah is quite un-Christian. It is startling to read that he is to die (7<sup>28</sup>); but (1) this is after reigning 400 years, and (2) without a subsequent resurrection. The first point indicates the visionary ideas of the Apocalyptic writer, not the known fact of our Lord's brief life on earth, and the second is in conflict with the great prominence which the early Christians gave to our Lord's resurrection. A Messiah who lived for 400 years and then died, and so ended his Messiahship, could not be Jesus Christ. Accordingly the Syriac reads '30' instead of '400,' evidently a Christian emendation. Undoubtedly this is a Jewish conception, and its mournful character, so unlike the triumphant tone of Enoch, is in keeping with the gloomy character of the book, and a reflection of the deep melancholy that took possession of the minds of earnest, patriotic Jews after the fearful scenes of the siege of Jerusalem and the overwhelming of their hopes in a deluge of blood. The reference to the death of the Messiah is not found in the Arabic or the Armenian versions; but it is easy to see how it came to be omitted, while there is no likelihood that it would be inserted later, either by a Jew, to whom the idea would be unwelcome, or by a Christian, since the resurrection is not also mentioned. A noteworthy fact is that the Messiah is addressed by God as 'My son.' The Ethiopic of 7<sup>28</sup>, instead of 'My son Jesus' reads 'My Messiah,' and the Armenian, 'the anointed of God.' But the reference to sonship occurs elsewhere frequently, e.g. 'My son Christ,' or 'My anointed son' (7<sup>28</sup>; see also 13<sup>22, 27, 32, 14<sup>9</sup></sup>, in most versions, but not in Arm.; see Dr. Sanday, art. 'Son of God' in Hastings' DB, vol. iv. p. 571). Since, as Dr. Sanday remarks in the article just referred to, the strongly Messianic passage in Ps-Sol 17<sup>23-24</sup> has not the title 'Son,' but clearly borrows from Ps 2 in v. 20, it is a likely inference that 2 Esdras is here based on that Psalm. Compare the words of the high priest in Mc 27<sup>67</sup>.

In chs. 12 and 13 the writer names Daniel, and manifestly bases his elaboration of the Messianic picture on the Book of Daniel. The Messiah appears as a lion rising up out of a wood and roaring. A certain pre-existence is implied in the assertion that the Most High had kept him (12<sup>20</sup>); the Latin has only 'for the end,' but the Syriac reads 'for the end of days, who shall spring up out of the seed of David.' He will come to upbraid and destroy the guilty people, but he will have mercy on a remnant and deliver them. Similar ideas are repeated in ch. 13, but in a different form. A man comes from the midst of the sea. This is unlike Daniel (7<sup>13-14</sup>), where the four beasts come up from the sea, but the 'one like unto a son of man' from the clouds. The Most High has kept him for a great season (v. 26), another reference to pre-existence. Similarly later on we read, 'Like as one can neither seek out nor know what is in the depths of the sea, even so can no man upon earth see my Son, or those that be with him, but in the time of his day' (v. 32). He exists, but hidden till the time when God will reveal him. When he comes and is revealed, 'it will be as a man ascending.' 'When all the nations hear his voice' they will draw together to fight against him. But he will stand on the top of Mount Zion, and there he will taunt the nations to their face and destroy them without any effort on his part, the instrument of destruction being the Law, which is compared to fire. Then in addition to the saved remnant of the Jews already referred to, the lost ten tribes will be brought back from their exile beyond the Euphrates, whither they had gone by a miraculous passage through the river, and whence they will return by a similar miraculous staying of 'the springs of the river' again. Thus we have the idea of a restoration of all Israel under the Messiah, but with no further extension of the happy future so as to include other nations, as in the Christian Apocalyptic conceptions; on the contrary, those nations will be humiliated and chagrined at the spectacle of the glorification of the former victims of their oppression. On the whole we must conclude with Paul Volz (Jüdische Eschatologie, p. 202) that 2 Ezra adopts the traditional hope of the Messiah, but does not see in it the chief ground of assurance for the future. He is hailed as God's son, but he appears to have only a temporary existence. He does not bring deliverance from sin; nor is he to come for judgment. His death is the end of his mission.

ii. THE DOCTRINE OF WISDOM.—Unlike the Prophetic and Apocalyptic literature which confessedly anticipated a great future, and so furnished a hope which Christianity subsequently claimed to fulfil, the Hebrew Wisdom writings profess to give absolute truth, and betray no consciousness of further developments. Nevertheless the Church was quick to seize on them as teaching the essential Divinity of Christ. The historical method of more recent times sees in them the germs of ideas on this subject which were subsequently developed by Christian theologians of the Alexandrian school. For the doctrine of Wisdom in the OT see DB, art. 'Wisdom.' That doctrine in the Apocrypha is in direct succession from the Hokhma teaching of Proverbs.

1. Sirach.—In the Palestinian school represented by Sirach it is difficult to see much, if any, advance on Proverbs. The idea of Wisdom itself is essentially the same, and the gnomic form of writing continues an identity of method.

(a) Literary Form.—There is no attempt at metaphysical analysis or philosophical argumentation. This Jewish philosophy is not elucidated by reasoning, or based on logical grounds. It is regarded as intuitive in origin and the treatment of it is didactic. Thus we have nothing like a philosophical or ethical treatise. Much of the writing is directly hortatory, and where the third person is used we have descriptions and reflections, accounts of the nature and function of wisdom, and illustrations of its operations in life and history.

(b) Unity of Wisdom.—In Sirach, as in Pr., Wisdom is described from two points of view: as found in God and His administration of the world, and as attainable by man in his own character and life. But it is not that God's wisdom is merely the model or the source of our wisdom. Wisdom throughout, though seen in such different relations, is taken as essentially one entity. It is wisdom, absolute wisdom, that God uses in the administration of the universe, and that man also is exhorted to pursue. This realism in dealing with an abstract notion is the first step towards personification.

(c) Personification.—As in Proverbs, wisdom is here personified. Wisdom is supposed to act, e.g. 'How exceeding harsh is she to the unlearned' (6<sup>20</sup>). In a fine passage she celebrates her own praises, glorying in the midst of her people, saying—

'I came forth from the mouth of the Most High,
And covered the earth as a mist,
I dwelt in high places,
And my throne is in the pillar of the cloud' (24<sup>4-5</sup>); and, further, after a rich description of the scenes of nature that she influences—

'In three things I was beautified,

And stood up beautiful before the Lord and men,' etc. (25<sup>1</sup>).

But there is nothing in this personification beyond a free use of the Oriental imagination. No doubt to this vivid imagination such writing presents wisdom as in some way a concrete entity, and more, as a gracious, queenly presence. But all along there are expressions which admit the imaginary character of the whole picture. For instance, the opening passage, describing how Wisdom stood up in the congregation of the Most High to celebrate her own praises, would lose all its force of appeal if it were taken in prosaic literalness. It is just because this is no actual person posing for admiration, but a truth set forth before us, that the whole picture appears to be sublime, and serves its purpose in leading to a high appreciation of wisdom. Then wisdom is identified with understanding: 'Whoso is wise, cleave thou unto him' (8<sup>24</sup>). 'If thou seeest a man of understanding, get thee betimes unto him' (v. 28). Thus cultivation of friendship with a man of wisdom or understanding is part of the pursuit of wisdom itself. Even Philo's much more explicit personification of the Logos does not mean that he held the Logos to be an actual person in our sense of the term. Here all we can say of the subject is that the allegorizing is very vivid, so vivid as to be on the verge of the mythopoetic, but still in the original intention of the writer not meant to be more than the glorification of a great quality found primarily in God, impressed on nature, and commended to mankind as a highly desirable attainment.

The difficulty of the question lies in the fact that the Oriental mind would not clearly face this question of personality. The imagination would so vividly realize the allegorical picture that the idea would seem to assume form and body, condensing to an apparently concrete and even personal presence, so that it would be regarded for the time being as a person, and yet in the course of the meditation this would melt again into an abstraction, and in the less imaginative passages be regarded in its original character purely as a mode of thought or action. To apply to the product of such a process the logic of the West, or to attempt to bring it into harmony, say, with Locke's theory of ideas, is unreasonable. The atmosphere does not allow of so hard a definition of personality as that which may be either affirmed or denied.

(d) Source.—Wisdom originates in God. She 'came forth from the mouth of the Most High' (24<sup>1</sup>). 'Wisdom was created together with the faithful in the womb' (1<sup>14</sup>). She exclaims, 'He created me from the beginning, before the world' (24<sup>9</sup>). As with Pr 8<sup>22</sup>, the Arian controversy has given a factitious importance to this sentence. Wisdom is identified with Christ; and thus the Arian doctrine that Christ is a creature, that He was created, not begotten by God and not eternal, appears to have clear support. It is probable that Sirach is dependent on Proverbs, and the rendering of LXX (ἐκασε) is doubtful.* But the much debated point is of little real importance; indeed, it is of no value till we grant that Wisdom in Proverbs and Sirach is (1) personal, and (2) identical with Christ. The denial of (1) in the previous paragraph carries with it the exclusion of (2). Nevertheless, apart from the Arian conception, we still have the idea of the creation of wisdom to account for. This, however, is but a consequence of the allegorical personification in conjunction with the thought that wisdom proceeds from God. That has a twofold signification, corresponding to the two aspects of wisdom. First, God is the source of His own wisdom. He has not to learn; all His plans and purposes spring from His own mind. Secondly, mankind learns wisdom from God; it is His gift to His children. Wisdom is with all flesh according to God's 'gift' (1<sup>19</sup>).

(e) Characteristics.—There is an intellectual element in wisdom, which is the highest exercise of the mind. The opposite of wisdom is folly, a stupid and brutish thing. The Divine side of wisdom most clearly exhibits this character. Wisdom created by God is with God, and therefore is seen in His presence and works. Nevertheless, Sirach makes very little reference to the manifestation of wisdom in Nature or Providence. The whole stress is on this Divine gift as an object of aspiration for mankind. Wisdom is seen as the best of all human possessions. The sublimity of wisdom is set forth in order to fire the enthusiasm of men to have their lives enriched with the Divine grace. This is just the same as in Proverbs. So also are two further characteristics of Hebrew wisdom. First, it is moral. It is concerned with the practical reason, not the speculative. Its realm is ethics, not metaphysics. It is not a philosophy for solving the riddle of the universe; it is a guide to conduct. The ethics is not discussed theoretically; there is no theory of ethics. The aim of the book is practical, and the treatment of wisdom is didactic and hortatory. Sirach even discourages speculation, in directing the attention solely to conduct—

'Seek not things that are too hard for thee,
And search not out things that are above thy strength.
The things that have been commanded thee, think thereupon;

For thou hast no need of the things that are secret' (32<sup>1-22</sup>).

Second, it is religious. Wisdom here, as in Proverbs, is identified with the fear of the Lord. The way to attain wisdom is to keep the Law—

'If thou desire wisdom, keep the commandments,
And the Lord shall give her unto thee freely' (1<sup>30</sup>).

* The Hebrew of Proverbs (חָכְמָה) is rendered in RV as well as AV 'possessed.' Still RVm has 'formed,' in agreement with Bertheau, Zöckler, Hitzig, and Ewald, and Delitzsch has the similar word 'produced'; moreover, Syr. and Targ. agree with the LXX. In Pr 4<sup>7</sup> חָכְמָה is rendered 'get,' and certainly there it can only have that meaning.

Like Proverbs, Sirach contains a quantity of shrewd worldly wisdom, and it is eminently prudential in aim; but it is the better self that is considered, and the higher interests, rather than wealth and pleasure, that are studied. In this way the whole book is concerned with the exposition of the nature and merits of wisdom.

2. Baruch.—The eloquent celebration of the praises of wisdom in this book, which probably dates from the 1st cent. A.D. (see DB, art. 'Baruch'), is on similar lines to Sirach. Wisdom is like choice treasure, to be sought out from far. But since she is above the clouds or beyond the sea, no man can be expected to reach so far. There is only One who can do this. 'He that knoweth all things knoweth her' (39<sup>1</sup>). Here the idea is different from that of Sirach. Wisdom is not created by God, but is found by Him, as though an independent pre-existence.—'He found her out with His understanding' (ib.). But the personification is thinner and more pallid than in Sirach. There is no real dualism. The language is little more than a metaphorical expression of the idea that God has the wisdom which is above human reach. Still it goes on into a sort of myth, for Wisdom thus discovered by God hidden in some remote region afterwards appears on earth and becomes conversant with men (37<sup>1</sup>). Here we have a curious parallel to the Johannine conception of the Word originally with God and then becoming incarnate and dwelling with men. But Baruch has no conception of incarnation, and the idea has no place in the Hebrew personification of wisdom.

3. Wisdom.—(a) The nature of Wisdom.—Although, as an Alexandrian work in touch with Greek philosophy, the Bk. of Wisdom carries the doctrine of ἰσοκράτεια a stage forward in the direction of Philo, it is essentially Jewish, and its idea of wisdom is fundamentally the same as that of Proverbs and Sirach, but with additions, some of which may be attributed to Hellenic influences. The essential Hebrew elements, however, remain. While a movement of intellect, wisdom is practical, moral, and religious. We are no more in the regions of metaphysics or even abstract ethical speculation than in the Palestinian literature. Thus we read—

'For her true beginning is desire of discipline;
And the care for discipline is love of her' (8<sup>17</sup>).

(b) Personification.—The personification of Wisdom, though still very shadowy, is a little more accentuated than in Sirach. Wisdom is described as 'a spirit' (1<sup>6</sup>), and as such seems to be identified with 'the spirit of God' (v. 7). In answer to Solomon's prayer God gave him 'a spirit of wisdom' (7<sup>7</sup>). 'She is a breath of the power of God' (7<sup>20</sup>). She sits as God's 'assessor' (Drummond) by His side on His throne (9<sup>4</sup>). When, however, various functions, such as Creation and Providence, seem to be ascribed to her, this cannot be as to a personal agent, because they are also ascribed to God (e.g. 9<sup>1-2</sup>). It must be, therefore, that God is thought of as doing these things by means of His wisdom.

(c) Attributes.—A string of 21 attributes, in thoroughly Greek style, is ascribed to the spirit of Wisdom (7<sup>22-32</sup>). Among other things, she is said to be 'only begotten' (μονογενής, the very word used of Christ in Jn 1<sup>14, 18</sup> 3<sup>16, 18</sup> and 1 Jn 4<sup>9</sup>, though RV of Wisdom renders it here 'alone in kind,' having 'sole born' in the margin). Further, wisdom is described as 'a clear effluence of the glory of the Almighty' and an 'effluence (ἀναπνοή, whence He 1<sup>3</sup>) from everlasting light' (7<sup>25, 26</sup>). She is free from all defilement, beneficent, beautiful.

(d) Functions.—Divine functions are ascribed to Wisdom, since it is by His wisdom that God performs them. (1) Creation. She is 'the artificer of all things' (7<sup>2</sup>), 'an artificer of the things that are' (8<sup>9</sup>). (2) Providence. The function of wisdom in providence is much dwelt on. Wisdom is regarded as a sort of guardian angel watching over men and directing the course of history. Patriarchal history from Adam downward is described as thus under the charge of wisdom. (3) Revelation. The picture of Wisdom as the effulgence from everlasting light points to this. She is also described as 'an unspotted mirror of the working of God, and an image (εἰκόνη, cf. 2 Cor 4<sup>4</sup>, Col 1<sup>2</sup>) of His goodness' (7<sup>2</sup>), 'in attaining to wisdom we come to know the ways of God.'

(e) Wisdom as a human acquisition.—While wisdom is described in its relation to God as co-extensive with the infinite range of the Divine activities, it is also represented from another point of view as a treasure which mankind is invited to seek. The difficulty of acquiring wisdom suggested in Baruch is not found here. On the contrary, we read that—

'Easily is she beheld of them that love her,
And found of them that seek her' (6<sup>21</sup>).

Moreover, there is no limitation of Jewish exclusiveness in the privilege of enjoying this greatest of God's gifts, 'for wisdom is a spirit that loveth man' (1<sup>5</sup>). When a little later we read that 'the spirit of the Lord hath filled the world' (τῆν οἰκουμένην, 'the inhabited earth,' RVm), the breadth of Hellenism seen throughout the Alexandrian movement, first Jewish, later Christian, is here apparent. While Wisdom is identified with the Law in the Palestinian work Sirach, here all true enlightenment, pagan as well as Jewish, must be included in this far-reaching wisdom. At the same time, this widespread wisdom is very different from Greek philosophy. The practical, ethical element which is essential to the Hebrew Hokhmah is always its chief constituent. Moreover, the homelier conception of wisdom as an exalted prudence serviceable in worldly affairs, which is often apparent in Proverbs and Sirach, is also to be found in the Bk. of Wisdom.

(f) Anticipations of Christology.—With this conception of wisdom we cannot claim the identity of terms (ἀπαύλασμα, εἰκόνη, λόγος) which are here applied to wisdom and in the NT to Jesus Christ as an indication of any clear anticipation of Christian truth. It is rather the other way. St. Paul and the author of Hebrews knew Wisdom, and made use of expressions in the book for their own purposes, giving to them a richer Christian meaning. Nor can it be allowed that the use of the word λόγος as closely associated with wisdom is any real anticipation of the λόγος doctrine of Philo. In Wis 9<sup>1</sup> we read—

'O God of the fathers, and Lord who keepest thy mercy, Who madest all things by thy word' (Ὁ ποιητὴς τῶν πάντων ἐν λόγῳ σου).

This is evidently an allusion to the Creation story in Gn 1, so that we must understand λόγος in the sense of 'word' (רִבְּרָא, in the familiar OT expression 'the word of the Lord'). But Philo uses λόγος in the Stoic sense of 'reason.' It may be conjectured that the transition to this meaning has begun in Wis, because the line immediately following that just quoted is, 'and by thy wisdom thou formedst man' (Wis 9<sup>1</sup>). Thus λόγος is treated as parallel to wisdom. In any case λόγος is a rational word, not a mere utterance of the voice, but a word with thought, reason in it. Still, the author elsewhere uses the term in the sense of 'word' as the implied reference to Gn 1 indicates that he does here.<sup>2</sup> It

<sup>2</sup> Λόγος occurs 15 times in Wisdom (viz. 13.15 22.17.20 28.11 7.14 8.15 9.1 12.19 10.17 13.15 22). In 13 of these instances there is no question that it means 'word'. Of the 2 remaining cases one is that now under consideration; the other is 22.17. And while our would be nearer the mark to say that Jn 1<sup>2</sup> is an echo of Wis 9<sup>1</sup>. Still there is much more in the prologue to the Fourth Gospel than can be derived in any way from this simple statement, and a great deal of that reminds us more of Philo than of Wisdom. The conclusion would seem to be that in John as in Wisdom λόγος is used in the common Biblical sense of 'word'; but that there are also associations with Philo, the author of the Fourth Gospel ascribing to the λόγος as 'word' some of the attributes which Philo had ascribed to his λόγος as 'reason'. Accordingly the prologue to the Fourth Gospel may be said to combine reminiscences both of Wisdom and of Philo, together with its own original Christian ideas.

iii. ANTICIPATION OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINES.—Anticipations of the Christ idea, either as Messiah or as Wisdom, have been dealt with in the previous sections. It remains to be seen for what other Christian doctrines preparation is made in the Apocrypha.

1. The Doctrine of God.—This subject is treated very fully in DB, Extra Vol. art. 'Development of Doctrine,' pp. 276-281. All that is called for here is to indicate those phases of the doctrine that approach the Christian idea. 1 Maccabees is remarkable for its omission of any direct reference to God. But although (according to the best text) the name of God does not appear, He is thought of under the euphemism 'heaven' (e.g. 1 Mac 3<sup>25</sup>). Therefore we must take the omission of the sacred name as an indication of the reverence that feared to mention it, which was characteristic of a later Judaism. This went with the growing conception of the Divine transcendence which was not an anticipation of Christianity, but the reverse, and against which Christianity was a reaction. Still it prepared for Christianity by emphasizing the need of some intermediary power to bring man into contact with God, a mediating Christ. While no hint of anything of the kind is dropped in the historical part of the Apocrypha, the soil is here prepared for it by the very barrenness of religion in lack of it. The popular tales in the Apocrypha contribute nothing material to the conception of God. The fierce patriotism of Judith falls back on the ancient appropriation of Jehovah for Israel; but this can scarcely be reckoned a theological narrowing, since the thought is not turned to any question concerning the nature of God. In the Wisdom literature, however, we may look for some development of the doctrine. Negatively we see this in the avoidance of the anthropomorphism that fearlessly asserted itself in the OT. Not only is there no approach to a theophany in human form, but the human features often poetically ascribed to God in the older literature do not appear. This, again, goes with the growing feeling of Divine transcendence, which is alien to Christianity. But it is also an indication of a spiritual conception that may be taken as anticipatory of the spiritual idea of God in the NT. In Sirach, God is not so much too remote, but rather too great for men to understand His nature.—

'When ye glorify the Lord, exalt him as much as ye can;
For even yet will he exceed' (Sir 43<sup>28</sup>).

God is addressed as 'Father and Master of my life' (23<sup>1</sup>), and 'Father and God of my life' (v. 4), which implies the Divine fatherhood of the individual, a doctrine only just reached in the latest OT teaching. Moreover, the goodness of God extends to all mankind (18<sup>23</sup>). In Wisdom, under the influence of Hellenic thought, the idealizing process is pushed further. God is the 'eternal light' (Wis 7<sup>2</sup>), so that wisdom which irradiates the world is the heart-beateth, reason is a spark'. Here it is human reason that is referred to. In every case where λόγος is predicated of God the sense is 'word'. See especially 12<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>2</sup>.

effluence from this central fountain of light. On the other hand, there is a narrowing of the idea of creation under the influence of the Greek notion of pre-existent matter. God creates the world out of 'formless matter' (11<sup>7</sup>), and creation is described as being 'impressed' like wax by the seal (19<sup>2</sup>). The motive of creation was love, and God hates nothing that He has made, loving all things that are (11<sup>24</sup>). Nevertheless, it is said in another place that God only loves him who dwells with wisdom (7<sup>28</sup>). The seeming inconsistency may be reconciled if we understand that here we have the more special personal affection of Divine friendship.

2. The Fall and Original Sin.—While Gn 3 contains the narrative of the fall of Adam, (1) it does not attribute this to the devil, not identifying the serpent with Satan, but treating it simply as the most subtle of beasts; and (2) it does not affirm that either sin or death visits the whole race in consequence of this primary offence and its doom. But both of these ideas appear in Christianity; and the latter is contained in the writings of St. Paul, who does not give it as part of the new teaching, but assumes that it is already an accepted belief. St. Paul simply appeals to it as a basis for his analogical teaching concerning Christ. Thus he writes, 'as through the one man's disobedience many were made sinners' (Ro 5<sup>19</sup>), and similarly with the second part of the doctrine, 'as in Adam all die' (1 Co 15<sup>22</sup>). Therefore these ideas must have grown up apart from the OT. Now we find them in the Apocr. Wisdom literature, both Palestinian and Alexandrian, e.g. the Palestinian teaching—an easy inference from Gn 3, but never made in the OT. Then there is the Alexandrian teaching, 'By the envy of the devil, death entered into the world' (Wis 2<sup>24</sup>).

'From a woman was the beginning of sin;
And because of her we all die' (Sir 25<sup>9</sup>).

Grätz regards this as a Christian interpolation; but Dr. Drummond shows that his three reasons for this view do not appear to have much force. (1) Grätz objects that the clause disturbs the connexion of the passage, but it balances the previous statement—

'God created man for incorruption,
And made him an image of his own proper being' (v. 22);
for thus we have the antithesis which is one of the common forms of Hebrew poetry. (2) For Grätz to assert that it has for him 'absolutely no sense,' is a criticism that would apply to it equally whoever wrote it. (3) The fact that it is without parallel in other Jewish writings must not be taken as condemning it. The idea is familiar in Christian literature; yet there is nothing specifically Christian about it, since it simply results from an application of the doctrine of a devil to the Genesis narrative, with the exercise of some imagination as to the Evil Spirit's motive. Moreover, Milton's adoption of the idea of envy as that motive in Paradise Lost, shows that, to a great poet at all events, the expression is not without a reasonable meaning. The author of Wisdom is a sufficiently brilliant writer to have struck out these ideas and made the inferences without any antecedent example. Dahre considers the passage to be allegorical, because the notion of 'an evil principle in opposition to the Divine is foreign to pure Alexandrianism.' Accordingly he applies Philo's interpretation of Gn 3 to it, and understands the word διδασκασ to stand for the serpent as an image of carnal pleasure. But why should not the writer mention the serpent if he meant it? Since διδασκασ appears in the LXX for 'the Satan,' it is impossible that a Jew who was familiar with that version would use the word in an entirely original way for a reptile. The story of fallen angels was not unfamiliar to Jewish Apocalyptic literature (see Drummond, Philo Judaeus, p. 196 f.). That, however, Wisdom does not teach the total depravity of the race, we may infer from its singling out the inhabitants of Canaan as deserving to be extirpated because of their innate vice. 'Their nature by birth was evil' (120); 'they were a seed accursed from the beginning' (v. 11). Here a doctrine of heredity is implied; but it is applied only to the Canaanites, who are regarded as of an inveterately and hopelessly evil stock. It is to be inferred that other peoples are not so bad.

The late date of 2 Esdras removes it out of the category of anticipations of Christianity. Still, as a Jewish work it witnesses to Jewish thoughts which have their roots in an earlier period. Now this book distinctly teaches the doctrine of original sin. The angel Uriel undertakes to teach Esdras 'wherefore the heart is wicked' (2 Es 4<sup>8</sup>). In an earlier passage the sin of the race was traced to Adam (3<sup>2</sup>). The pessimism of the book is especially gloomy in regard to this subject. Esdras declares that 'it had been better that the earth had not given thee Adam, or else, when it had given him, to have restrained him from sinning' (7<sup>46</sup>). Though it was Adam who sinned, the evil did not fall on him alone, but on all of us who come from him (v. 46).

3. Redemption.—There is nothing approaching the Christian doctrine of redemption in the Apocrypha. The NT teachers had to go back beyond all this literature to Is 53 for the seed thoughts of their specific teaching on this subject. In the Messianic ideas, as far as these appear in the Apocrypha, which we have seen is but meagrely, there are the two thoughts of God redeeming His people, and the Christ coming as a personal redemption. There is no anticipation of the doctrine of the cross. The sombre prediction of the death of the Christ in 2 Es. (later than the Christian gospel, as it is) contains no hint that this is either sacrificial or redemptive. The goodness and mercy of God in delivering His people are frequently celebrated, but with no specific doctrine of salvation. The Hokhmah teaching would suggest that escape from sin is to be had through the acquisition of wisdom, which is rooted in the fear of the Lord. It was wisdom that brought the first man out of his fall (Wis 10<sup>3</sup>). Tobit has the great OT teaching of God's forgiveness for His penitent people whom He scourges for their iniquity, but to whom He will show mercy. If they turn to Him with all their heart and soul to do truth before Him, He will turn to them (To 13<sup>6</sup>). Sinners must turn and do righteousness if they would receive His restoring grace. The Patristic idea that the 'blessed . . . wood . . . through which cometh righteousness' (Wis 14<sup>4</sup>, cf. Ae 5<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>2</sup>) is the cross, ignores the context, which plainly shows that the reference is to Noah's Ark (see v. 8).

4. Liberalizing of religion.—In several respects the Apocrypha shows advance beyond the narrower exclusiveness of Judaism. The historical situation in 1 Mac. did not encourage this movement. When the Jews were struggling for freedom of life and worship against the forcible intrusion of paganism, they were not in a condition for missionary enthusiasm. Judith breathes a spirit of fiercest Jewish patriotism. But Tobit in his prayer of rejoicing declares that many nations shall come from far to the name of the Lord God with gifts in their hands (To 13<sup>11</sup>). That this is not the reluctant homage of subject peoples is shown by the sequel, where we read about 'generations of generations' praising God with songs of rejoicing. Still all this is ministering to the glory of Jerusalem. Israel is exalted in the honour shown to her God. The Palestinian Hokhmah literature is not free from Jewish narrowness. In Sirach, God is prayed to send His fear on all nations. But this is to be by lifting up His hand against them, so that they may see His mighty power. Still some gracious end even in this stern treatment of the heathen may be desired, since the prayer proceeds, 'And let them know thee, as we also have known thee' (Sir 36<sup>3</sup>). God is asked to hear the prayer of His suppliants [Israel], in order that all on the earth may know that He is the Lord, the eternal God (v. 17). This may not mean more than the acknowledgment of God for His glory and for the reflexion of that on His privileged people. On the other hand, the importance attached to wisdom has a widening tendency; for this is an internal grace, not an external privilege. But the identification of wisdom in Sirach with interest in the Law (39<sup>f</sup>) tends to limit this grace itself and confine it to Israel.

When we turn to the Alexandrian teaching of the Book of Wisdom we expect a wider outlook. Here also the national privileges of Israel are accentuated. God gave oaths and covenants of good promises to the nation's ancestors (12<sup>21</sup> 18<sup>8</sup>). Moreover, 'the righteous' are to judge the nations and have rule over the people (3<sup>7</sup>). But since the domain of wisdom is world-wide and 'the spirit of God filleth the world' (17), it might be supposed that the world at large would benefit by that gracious presence. Princes of peoples are invited to honour wisdom that they may reign for ever (9<sup>2</sup>), an invitation necessarily applying to the Gentile world. It is stated in a general way that 'the ways of them which are on the earth' [more than Israel] were corrected by wisdom (9<sup>23</sup>). There is a magnificent universalism in the great saying that God loves all things that are, and abhors none of the things that He has made (11<sup>24</sup>). God's incorruptible spirit is in all things (12<sup>2</sup>); there is no other God that careth for all (v. 13); His sovereignty over all leads Him to forbear all (v. 13). But further than this the book does not go. It contains no explicit promise of redemption or of the blessings of the future for the world outside Israel, though it would be no illegitimate inference from these large ideas concerning the presence and activity and graciousness of God the whole world over to conclude that such good things were not to be confined to Israel. On the other hand, not only were the Canaanites a helplessly evil race, but the more recent oppressors of Israel, whose gross idolatry is scornfully portrayed at large, after the manner of Deutero-Isaiah, are described as 'prisoners of darkness . . . exiled from the eternal providence' (17<sup>2</sup>). For other heathen people allowance is made on account of their ignorance. 'For these men there is but small blame; for they too, peradventure, do but go astray' (13<sup>2</sup>).

B. Resurrection and Immortality.—With regard to no other subject is advance from the OT standpoint towards that of the NT more apparent in the Apocrypha. The distinction between Palestinian and Alexandrian conceptions is here very marked, the Palestinian writings promising resurrection, the Alexandrian making no reference to a resurrection, but adopting the Greek idea of the immortality of the soul. The more conservative books of the former school, Tobit, Sirach, and 1 Mac., contain no reference to the resurrection or the future life in any form, retaining only the old gloomy Hebrew notion of Sheol, which, on the other hand, in these writings is not Gehenna, not a place of punishment. 'There are no chastisements in Sheol' (Sir 41<sup>4</sup>, Heb. mar., and LXX).* According to Tobit, Sheol is an 'eternal place' (3<sup>6</sup>) where life is extinct. 'All the rewards of faithfulness enumerated by the dying Mattathias (1 Mac 2<sup>25-28</sup>) are limited to this life' (Charles, Eschat. p. 219). In Judith eternal punishment is threatened to the enemies of Israel (16<sup>21</sup>); but nothing is said about a future life for God's people. 2 Mac., an epitome of the five books of Jason of Cyrene (2<sup>27</sup>), contains a clear doctrine of resurrection to eternal life (7<sup>1</sup>), which is denied to the non-Israelite (v. 14); this is a bodily resurrection (7<sup>11, 22, 23</sup>), and it will be enjoyed in the fellowship of brethren similarly privileged (v. 29). In 2 Esdras we have 'the day of judgment' (12<sup>24</sup>). A first resurrection may be suggested by the reference to 'those that will be with him' in the day of God's Son (13<sup>2</sup>). The end will come when the number of those like Ezra is complete (4<sup>28</sup>). Till then the spirits of the wicked shall wander about in torment while God's servants will be at rest (7<sup>7</sup>). These spirits of the wicked will be tormented in seven ways (vv. 81-87), and after the final judgment even more grievously (v. 84). On the other hand, those who have kept the ways of the Most High shall have joy in seven ways, according to their seven orders, during the intermediate period, and after the judgment receive glory (v. 83), when 'their face shall shine as the sun, and they shall be made like unto the light of the stars, being henceforth incorruptible' (v. 77).

* Dr. Charles points out that the reference to Gehenna in Sir 7:17 is undoubtedly corrupt, since it is contrary to the whole outlook of the writer as to the future, and is not supported by the Heb., Syr., and best MSS of the Ethiopic (Eschatology, p. 164).

In Wisdom there is no idea of resurrection. The body is the temporary earthly burden (9<sup>2</sup>) of a pre-existent soul (3<sup>20</sup>). Immortality is for the soul, but not by nature or necessity. It is attained through wisdom (8<sup>12, 17</sup>). Still it was God's design that man should enjoy it, for He 'created man for incorruption' (22<sup>2</sup>). 'The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God' (3<sup>7</sup>), at peace, with a hope full of immortality. 'The righteous live for ever' (v. 13). The wicked have no hope in their death. They will be dashed speechless to the ground; and yet their fate does not seem to be annihilation, for 'they shall lie utterly waste, and they shall be in anguish' (4<sup>13</sup>). But there is no definite statement of eternal punishment.

IV. USE OF THE APOCRYPHA IN THE GOSPELS AND THE CHURCH.—Our Apoc., which consists of Jewish writings contained in the Vulg. but not found in the Hebrew OT, rests primarily on the LXX, and that was the version of the OT commonly used by the Greek-speaking Jews in the times of the Apostles, and subsequently by the Christians. Being thus the Scriptures in the hands of the NT writers, the LXX introduced the Apoc. to them together with the books of our OT. But most of the NT writers knew the Hebrew Bible. This is evident in the case of St. Paul, St. John, and St. Matthew. The only certain exception is the author of Hebrews, to whom probably we should add St. Luke; and it is reasonable to suppose that these two men, being the most scholarly NT writers, were not unacquainted with the limits of the Palestinian Canon. No NT writer names any book of the Apoc., nor is there any direct quotation from one of these books in the NT. Phrases from some of them indicate, however, that these books were used by the writers in whom they occur, although there is no evidence that they regarded them as authoritative. On the other hand, 2 Esdras borrows from the NT, especially from the Apocalypse. 2 Es 8<sup>2</sup> is an echo of Mt 20<sup>9</sup>. The only books of our Apoc. to which reference can be manifestly traced in the NT are the works of Wisdom literature, Wisdom and Sirach, especially the former; and the NT writers who most evidently make allusion to phrases in those books are St. Paul, St. James, and the author of Hebrews. Since these writers are beyond the scope of this Dictionary, the inquirer is referred to DB articles, 'Wisdom,' 'Sirach,' 'Apocrypha,' and those on the various NT books.

Coming to the special subject of the present volume, we note that Jesus Christ never names or distinctly cites any of the books of the Apoc., nor are any of them mentioned or directly quoted by any of the Evangelists. Nevertheless there seem to be several reminiscences of Wisdom and Sirach, if not direct allusions to those books in the Gospels.

Wis 3<sup>7</sup> has been connected with Mt 18<sup>8</sup>; but the Gospel phrase can be better derived from Dn 12<sup>1</sup>, for in both cases the same verb is used—ἀποκαταστήσει, while in Wis. the verb is ἀποκαταστήσει. Wis 3<sup>8</sup> 'They shall judge (ἐπιπέσει) the nations' may be alluded to in Mt 12<sup>30</sup> 'judging (ἐπιπέσει) the twelve tribes of Israel'; and, if so, the change is in accordance with our Lord's modifications of Jewish Messianic expectations, showing that the judgment which the Jews reserved for Gentiles was to come upon Israel. Possibly Wis 4<sup>s</sup> is alluded to in Mt 7<sup>s</sup>. But Wis 9<sup>s</sup> (ἐπιπέσει ἐν σκότεινῳ ὡς ὁ λαὸς οὗτος) may be more than anticipation of Jn 1<sup>s</sup>; it may have suggested the idea in the Gospel, though the entirely different language (ἐσθίοντες ἀπὸ τῆς ἰσθμῆς) with reference to the function of the Logos in creation excludes the notion of actual quotation. Wis 18<sup>s</sup> when he is required (ἀναμάρτητος) to render back the soul (ψυχὴ ἰσχυρῆ) which was lent him is suggested by Lk 12<sup>s</sup> 'this night is thy soul (ψυχή σου) required (ἀναμάρτητος) of thee.' Perhaps 'the darkness that should afterwards receive them' (Wis 17<sup>s</sup>) suggested our Lord's image of 'outer darkness' (Mt 23<sup>s</sup>) as the fate of the lost; but the idea is too general to make any connexion evident. On the other hand, Mt 23<sup>s</sup> should not be cited as a reference to Wis 4<sup>s</sup>; nor Lk 12<sup>s</sup> for Wis 9<sup>s</sup>; nor Jn 1<sup>s</sup> for Wis 6<sup>s</sup>; nor Mt 25<sup>s</sup> for Wis 9<sup>s</sup>; nor Mt 4<sup>s</sup> for Wis 16<sup>s</sup>. The last instance is a declared quotation from the OT, and the other cases are too vague to allow of any identification.

Sir 2<sup>s</sup> 'They that love (ἀγαποῦσιν) him will keep (ἐπιτηροῦσιν) his ways' may well have suggested the language in Jn 14<sup>s</sup> 'If a man love (ἀγαπᾷ) me he will keep (ἐπιτηροῦσιν) my words.' Sir 4<sup>s</sup> 'Turn not away (μὴ ἀποστρίψῃς) thy face from a poor man' suggests to us Mt 5<sup>s</sup> 'From him that would borrow of thee, turn not thou away (μὴ ἀποστρίψῃς).' Sir 7<sup>s</sup> 'Repeat not thy words in thy prayer' suggests Mt 6<sup>s</sup>, but here the Greek is very different; Sir 10<sup>s</sup> 'The Lord cast down the thrones of rulers, and set the meek in their stead,' is probably the source of Lk 14<sup>s</sup>, which is nearer to it than Job 5<sup>s</sup> or Ps 147<sup>s</sup>, especially in the use of the word 'thrones.' Possibly Sir 11<sup>s</sup> suggested Lk 12<sup>s</sup>; Sir 12<sup>s</sup> has been associated with Mt 7<sup>s</sup>, it is more likely to have suggested Didache 1; Sir 16<sup>s</sup> is too general and obvious to have suggested Mt 23<sup>s</sup>, which is more definite and specific; Sir 21<sup>s</sup> 'He that keepeth the law becometh master of the interest thereof' is a fine anticipation of Jn 1<sup>s</sup>; Sir 22<sup>s</sup> anticipates our Lord's rebuke of swearing (Mt 23<sup>s</sup>), but is less specific; the metaphor of the vine in Jn 15<sup>s</sup> is not to be referred to Sir 24<sup>s</sup>, it is more likely to have been suggested by Is 5<sup>s</sup>, if by any passage; Mt 6<sup>s</sup> seems to be a reference to Sir 25<sup>s</sup> 'Forgive thy neighbor the hurt that he hath done thee; and then thy sins shall be pardoned when thou prayest.' The association of Mt 6<sup>s</sup> with Sir 25<sup>s</sup>, proposed by Daubney, is very doubtful; equally vague is that of Mt 10<sup>s</sup> with Sir 25<sup>s</sup> 'He that trusteth in the Lord shall suffer no loss.' In both of these cases the slight resemblances are probably purely accidental. Lk 11<sup>s</sup> ἐπιπροσηύκατο ἁγιάζων ἑαυτὸν ἵνα ἴδωσιν τὸ πρόσωπον τοῦ κυρίου. The peculiarity of thought and phrase is too striking for an accidental coincidence. But that it is a reminiscence and not a direct quotation is clear from the three changes of words for which no reason can be assigned since the sense remains the same, viz. singular for plural; ἴδωσιν for ἴδω; κύριον for κύριον. The following clause in the parallelism is entirely different in the two texts, so that either the conclusion was quite forgotten or a new conclusion was deliberately formed. In Luke we have 'and the disobedient to walk in the wisdom of the just,' while the clause in Sir. is 'and to restore the tribes of Jacob.' The expression 'the wisdom of the just' in Luke seems to be a reference to the title of Sirach, which was probably originally simply 'Wisdom.' In codex B this is called ΣΟΦΙΑ ΣΕΡΑΧ; and in the Syriac, כְּסֵף בְּרַחֲמֵי שִׁירָא. Similarly at the end of the Hebrew text it is described as 'the wisdom of Simson ben Jeshua ben Eleazar ben Sir.' On the other hand, St. Luke has not the LXX word for wisdom (σοφία), his phrase being ἐπιπροσηύκατο. The conclusion to be drawn from these data seems to be that both Wisdom and Sirach were known to Mat., Luke, John, or to collectors of Logia of Jesus earlier than those Gospels, that Sirach especially was used by the author of the Magnificat, and that our Lord seems to have made use of both books, Sirach more probably than Wisdom.

While the special subjects of this Dictionary do not call for a study of the Apoc. in later times, a topic exhaustively treated in DB, vol. 1, pp. 120-123, a brief résumé of its history in the Church may be here added. The presence of the books which we designate Apocryphal in the LXX mixed up with the OT Scriptures of the narrower Heb. Canon would naturally tend to float them among the Greek-speaking Churches. Several of them are cited as Scripture by Irenaeus and Clement of Alexandria in the Greek Church, and by Tertullian and Cyprian in the Latin Church. While Melito of Sardis held to the Hebrew Canon, Origen championed the more comprehensive Greek Canon. A century later, Cyril of Jerusalem condemned this wider Canon, holding to the Heb. 22 books; and his position was confirmed by the Synod of Laodicea (c. 360 A.D.). Epiphanius and especially Athanasius introduced the intermediate course, a recognition of several of the Apoc., not, however, as in the Canon, but as good and useful. Since then, while from time to time scholars have declared the Apocryphal books to be non-canonical, the Eastern Church has used them, and they are in the Bible of the Greek Church. In the West, the Apoc. obtained acceptance as part of the Old Latin Version, which was based on the LXX, and as such formed part of Jerome's revision. But when Jerome translated the OT afresh from the Hebrew, seeing that the Apoc. was not there, he advised its rejection from the Canon. Still, he allowed it an intermediate position; and, in spite of its translator's opinion to the contrary, the books of the Apoc. took their place in the Vulgate as integral parts of Scripture. At the Council of Trent the Vulgate being pronounced infallibly inspired, the Apoc. was canonized with the rest of that version, and therefore it is now regarded as Scripture in the Roman Catholic Church. Among Protestants it has either taken an intermediate position, or has been rejected as not being Scripture. Luther placed it between the OT and the NT with the title 'Apocrypha,' and a statement that it was 'not equal to the Sacred Scriptures,' but nevertheless 'useful and good to read.' The Reformed Church is more severe; in the Zurich Bible the Apocryphal books come after the NT as 'not numbered among the canonical books,' and without a word of commendation. Coverdale translated the Apoc. and placed it between the OT and the NT with a statement that the books were in the Vulgate but not in the Hebrew. It has a similar position in subsequent revisions, including AV (1611), where it is marked 'Apocrypha.' But from 1629 onward editions of the AV began to appear without it.

APOSTLES.—

- Introduction.
- 1. The first disciples.
- 2. Beginning of our Lord's Galilean ministry.
- 3. Choice of the Twelve.
- 4. Training of the Apostles.

Introduction.—It is proposed to treat in this article the chief facts relating to that group of our Lord's personal disciples known to us by the name of 'apostles.' The sole authorities on the subject are the four Gospels and the first chapter of the Acts. The remaining books of the NT furnish no information as to the relations between Jesus and His Apostles during His ministry on earth; and nothing that is found in the Apocryphal Gospels can be regarded as historical.

The assumption so often made that the Synoptics possess a greater trustworthiness than the Fourth Gospel is baseless, and its baseness cannot be better seen than in the case of the Apostles. The Apostles of the Fourth Gospel are the Apostles of the first three. Their character, prejudices, limitations, ambitions, views, sympathies are the same in the four Gospels. How can this harmony be explained unless all our authorities draw from the life? But more than this. The Fourth Gospel contains information regarding the Twelve peculiar to itself which, properly weighed, enables us to understand much that is otherwise perplexing in the first three. How can this familiarity with the Apostles be accounted for if the writer was not himself one of them? What is the alternative hypothesis? That the writer of the Fourth Gospel, with the first three before him, was able to form so true and complete an apprehension of the intelligence, moral condition, modes of thought, and language of the Twelve as to be able to create situations where he represents them as speaking and acting with perfect verisimilitude, while all the time he was simply drawing on his imagination. The author of the Fourth Gospel was a man of genius, but his genius was religious, not intellectual or imaginative.

The achievement attributed to him was wholly beyond his powers or the powers of any man who has ever lived. The disciples of the Fourth Gospel are the disciples of the first three; their portraits are firm, exact, striking, because the writer knew them personally.

When the attention of a reader is called to the numerous occasions on which the Apostles figure in the Gospels, he might feel disposed to contend that the Apostles are so prominent in the Gospels because they are their ultimate authors. But this supposition, however ingenious, is unsubstantial. Great as is the place filled by the Apostles in the Gospels, they are never magnified; it is Jesus alone who is magnified. The many references made to the Apostles correspond exactly to the position they held; the Gospels are so much occupied with them only because Jesus Himself was constantly occupied with them, not the least of the tasks of His life being to teach and train them to understand His mind and heart, and to transmit to others a correct representation of what He was and said and did.

The Gospel of St. Mark has been characterized as pre-eminently the Gospel of the disciples. But this language does injustice to the rest of the Gospels, which are equally Gospels of the disciples. A judicious reader sees at once that the Apostles hold substantially the same place in all the Gospels. There is nothing to prove that one of the Evangelists took a deeper interest in the Twelve than any of the rest.

1. The first disciples.—It is clear from the Gospels that several of the Apostles had been on the most intimate terms with our Lord before He selected them to become Apostles. In fact the most prominent among them passed through two stages of relationship to our Lord before they were chosen as Apostles. They were first called to become disciples in the most general sense of the term, and thereafter they were summoned to leave their usual occupations and to become the personal companions of Jesus. It is therefore desirable to learn the connexion in which the most distinguished of them stood to Jesus before their formal appointment to the apostolate.

After the Temptation our Lord returned to Bethany in Perea. Whether this happened by arrangement between Himself and His forerunner we cannot tell, but nothing was more natural than for Him to go thither. The Baptist could best fulfil his duty if He were by his side. On two occasions John, fixing a steadfast gaze on our Lord, said in the hearing of some of his disciples, 'Behold the Lamb of God' (Jn 1st 36). The remarkable expression doubtless suggested to his hearers that this was the Messiah. Two of them sought an interview with our Lord, and ere they quitted the house were convinced that they had found the Messiah. Not a word is related of the considerations which brought them to this conclusion, but the explanation is to be found partly in the testimony of the Baptist, partly and pre-eminently in the impression produced on them by the personality of Jesus. There was that in His character, aims, and language which distinguished Him from all other men. Hence Andrew and John, the two disciples in question, had no doubt that the Messiah stood before them (v. 4). It is not quite clear whether each started to find his brother; but Andrew, at any rate, brought his brother Simon to Jesus. Reading his character and discerning its possibilities, Jesus bestowed on him the name by which he is now known to the world: the name Peter (v. 6). Our Lord, for reasons unknown to us, had determined to set out for Galilee, accompanied by His new disciples. On starting, He called Philip to follow Him, and the instant obedience rendered suggests that Philip had already believed that Jesus was the Messiah, probably through his friends and fellow-citizens Andrew and Peter. On the way Philip encountered his friend Nathanael, who lived in the village of Cana, at no great distance from his own home at Bethsaida, and informed him of the discovery of the Messiah, in the person of Jesus of Nazareth. Nathanael hesitated, but he came and saw and heard, and the knowledge which Jesus displayed of his character and of his inmost life convinced him that He was indeed what Philip had declared Him to be (v. 42nd). How many of these disciples accompanied Jesus to Cana and witnessed His first miracle (2nd) is not certain; possibly the majority, if not all. The same uncertainty arises in connexion with the journey to Jerusalem at the Passover. We do not know who witnessed the expulsion of the traffickers from the temple, heard the mysterious words spoken regarding the destruction of the temple, or saw the many miracles which He performed in the capital (v. 23rd), baptized at His command when He laboured in Judaea in the vicinity of the Baptist, and accompanied Him through Samaria on His return to Galilee (4th). It would seem as if thereafter the disciples returned to their usual occupations, and our Lord retired for a little from public life.

2. Beginning of our Lord's Galilean ministry.—After a short interval our Lord resumed His labours, and continued them without interruption until His death. The Baptist had just been imprisoned (Mk 1st 4 and 5), and He seemed to regard his imprisonment as a call to attempt more than He had yet done. So long as the Baptist laboured, the work done by Jesus does not seem to have differed much from his. Now that he was in prison, our Lord proceeded to develop a ministry of His own. This new type of ministry was marked by a change of residence from Nazareth to Capernaum (Mt 4th). He wished to influence as many of the inhabitants of Galilee as He could, and there was no better centre from which to approach them than Capernaum. The town was large, and was near many others of the same character. It lay on several great roads, and was therefore easily reached from all quarters. The people were genuinely Jewish, and not given to Gentile tastes or customs. No more suitable position from which to command Galilee could have been chosen. It was soon after He settled in Capernaum that He renewed His summons to four of the men whom He had already chosen as His disciples. Walking along the shore of the Sea of Galilee, He saw the brothers Simon and Andrew, who were fishermen, engaged in casting their net. In words the significance of which they could not fail to discern, He commanded them to follow Him and become fishers of men. Proceeding a little farther, He found James with his brother John repairing their nets, and addressed to them the same command. They, like Peter and Andrew, instantly obeyed (Mk 1st 16-20). It is clear that our Lord had a definite aim in calling these four disciples. The duty to which He now invited them was an advance on their former relationship. They were to be no longer fishermen. They must exchange their former calling for a new one. And the nature of that new calling was not wholly obscure. The allusion to the occupation which they were bidden to leave illustrated the character of the labours to which they were invited. They were to capture men instead of fish. Not one of the four could fail to perceive that they were to be employed continuously in the service of Jesus. The call would fill them with the less surprise because they had already served an apprenticeship to Jesus, when they baptized in obedience to His commands. It need not be inferred that Jesus intended to send the four immediately on a special mission. No particular time is specified in His command; and though St. Luke (5th) marks the capture of men as beginning with the moment of the call, this can only mean that their new career began as soon as they obeyed the call addressed to them. Only one other call of the same kind is related in the Gospels, that of Levi or Matthew (Mk 2<sup>14</sup>, Mt 9<sup>9</sup>). It, too, occurred in Capernaum. To the four fishermen a tax-gatherer was added. Capernaum was the seat of a custom-house, and the collector of customs, Levi by name, was called precisely as the two pairs of brothers had been. What previous acquaintance existed between Matthew and our Lord, what special qualities commended him we cannot tell; but the instant obedience he rendered to so extraordinary a command, and the feast which he gave in our Lord's honour as he bade farewell to his fellow-officials, suggest that they had known one another for some time. The interval which separated the call of Matthew from the call of the four cannot be ascertained, but as it is unlikely that he was a disciple of the Baptist, and as it is probable that he was not brought into contact with our Lord till he settled in Capernaum, some little time must have elapsed between his first knowledge of our Lord and his call. He could hardly have been with Jesus from the outset of His career in Galilee.

3. Choice of the Twelve.—It might have been supposed that our Lord would continue as He had begun, and summon a disciple after disciple to His side until He had obtained the number He required for His purpose. But this was not to be. He had determined to make a formal selection of a definite number from the body of His disciples (Mk 3<sup>13</sup>, Lk 6<sup>13</sup>). The importance of the step He was about to take is shown by the fact that He spent the preceding night in prayer (Lk 6<sup>12</sup>), doubtless seeking to learn His Father's will regarding the intention He had formed and the mode in which it was to be accomplished. One of the critical hours of His life was before Him. The nature of the selection He was about to make was of supreme consequence. A serious mistake would be followed by calamitous results. No wonder then that He sought specific guidance. He may even have gone over the names of all whom He judged competent, and have made His final choice.

The Gospels have not preserved any statement by our Lord Himself as to His aim in selecting a special group of disciples. That aim can be judged of only by the issue, for it is certain that what the Apostles proved to be, was what Jesus designed they should become. An account, indeed, is found in St. Mark's Gospel (3<sup>14</sup>), according to which the purpose of our Lord in choosing them was that they might be with Him and that He might send them forth to announce the approach of the Kingdom of God, endowed with the power to heal and to exorcize. That this is a correct description so far as it goes cannot be doubted, but it cannot be said to embrace the full scope of our Lord's purpose. It defines His immediate rather than His ultimate end. Its horizon is that of the first journey on which the Apostles were sent, not that world-wide commission afterwards committed to them. Hence when we speak of the reasons which induced our Lord to select the Twelve, we must look to the work actually entrusted to them. That work cannot be better described than by the words used by our Lord Himself to the Twelve on the eve of His death. He had been the envoy of the Father to earth. They were to be His envoys on earth. As He had interpreted the Father to men, so were they to interpret Him to men. Their chief, their supreme duty, was to bear witness to Him: to teach the world how He lived, what He said, what He wrought (Jn 17<sup>18</sup>, Ac 1<sup>8</sup>).

A comparison has often been drawn between the disciples of Plato or of the Pharisees and the disciples of Jesus. And such comparisons are not without suggestiveness. But a sagacious mind discerns that the apostolate of Jesus Christ is a unique institution. The Apostles differ from, far more than they agree with, the disciples of any thinker or teacher. They stand by themselves, devoted to the performance of an unexampled task. No one but Jesus could have conceived such a task; the Apostles were the fit instruments for its accomplishment.

It is a noteworthy circumstance that few writers have spent any time in describing the actual selection of the Twelve. The silence of the Gospels on this point is only what was to be expected, but it is surprising that those writers of our Lord's life who have given the freest rein to their imagination in endeavouring to reproduce the scenes of His career, have passed this event over as if it afforded no opportunity for their skill. Yet what materials lay ready to their hand! What were the sentiments with which our Lord addressed Himself to the task? What was His appearance as He stood on the mountain side and called His followers to Him? How did these followers feel as they perceived that He was about to make a choice among them? Was there excitement among the crowd? Was there strong desire on the part of many to be chosen? Was there any discussion as to the principles He followed in the choice, or did reverence prevent all debate? Was there much disappointment when the number was completed? Was there surprise at the persons named? Not less instructive would be some knowledge of the sentiments of the Apostles when they stood together for the first time in the presence of our Lord. What were their thoughts? Were they filled with exultation? Did they infer that the Kingdom of God would immediately appear? Did they anticipate a brilliant future for themselves? Or were there those among them who reflected with humility on their unfitness to be the generals and statesmen of the new Kingdom? Did it occur to even one of them, that the choice just made was a fresh disclosure of the view taken by Jesus of the Kingdom of God and of the means by which it was to be extended?

Who now were the objects of our Lord's choice? With some of them we are already acquainted. Simon, Andrew, James, John, Philip, and Levi or Matthew are already known to us. So too possibly is Bartholomew (wh. see). Bartholomew is not a proper name, but means simply 'son of Tolmai,' and there is much probability in the opinion that he is to be identified with Nathanael. These seven disciples our Lord must have known for some time. The remaining five names—Thomas, James the son of Alphaeus, Simon the Zealot, Judas or Lebbeus or Thaddeus, and Judas Iscariot are new. How long they had been known to Jesus is not told us; perhaps some of them had been in His company for several months. On the other hand, it is possible that He may have chosen some of the Twelve without much if any personal knowledge, relying on that power to read the heart which He undoubtedly possessed.

Who the Alphaeus was of whom James was a son (Mk 3<sup>15</sup>) we cannot tell. There is no reason except the similarity of name for connecting him with the father of Levi; and the assumption that he is the same person as Clopas is gratuitous. The force of the epithet Cananean is not free from doubt; the most likely meaning is that of zealot. But the sense of 'zealot' in turn is not perfectly clear; it may denote the political party known by that name; it may, again, simply designate unusual devotion to a cause. Reflection shows that this latter view has but scanty recommendation, and that the former has nearly everything in its favour. The Apostle who bears a triple name is commonly known as Jude. That there were two Judes among the Apostles is plain from the language of Jn 14<sup>22</sup>, where 'Judas not Iscariot' is mentioned. In two of the lists of the Apostles, those in Luke (6<sup>13</sup>) and Acts (1<sup>25</sup>), he is described as 'Judas of James'; that is almost certainly Judas the son not the brother of James. But who this James was is quite uncertain. In Mt 10<sup>3</sup> and Mk 3<sup>18</sup> this Judas is called Thaddeus, or, according to the Western text, Lebbeus; and he was probably known indifferently as Judas or as Thaddeus. The exact significance of the term Iscariot is still under discussion. Most commonly it is regarded as a geographical term signifying 'man of Kerioth,' but where Kerioth was situated is keenly canvassed, some placing it to the east of the Dead Sea and others in the south of Judah (see Judas Iscariot). Attempts have often been made to prove that several of the Apostles were related to our Lord. Many of those who have sought for traces of this relationship have been governed by motives very different from those influencing our Lord, who would have been the last person to allow His selection of an Apostle to be determined by the ties of blood. Still there is no reason why relatives of our Lord should not have been among the Apostles. But what evidence is there to this effect? It has been conjectured that James and John were cousins of our Lord, Mary and Salome being sisters. This is one possible interpretation and by no means the least satisfactory of the well-known verse in St. John (19<sup>25</sup>) which mentions the women at the cross. Whether the silence of Scripture regarding the relationship can outweigh the fitness of this interpretation will be answered variously, yet a reader will allow for the possibility that James and John were our Lord's cousins. But if he tolerate this view he will reject without hesitation the opinion once so common, that several of our Lord's brothers were among the Apostles. Practically nothing can be brought forward in support of this hypothesis; for who can attach any value to the fact that three of the Apostles bore the same names as three of our Lord's brothers, when it is known that these names were among the most common in the land? The statement made in Jn 7<sup>3</sup> that six months before the Crucifixion none of our Lord's brothers believed on Him is wholly inconsistent with the view that two or even three of them were Apostles. Scarcely less decisive is the distinction traced in the Acts between the brothers of Jesus and the Apostles (14). Much ingenuity and labour have been expended in the endeavour to prove that James the son of Alphaeus was a cousin of our Lord, his father being a brother of Joseph. But the steps by which this identification is made are numerous and all open to challenge, so that no gain can arise from an examination of the question. See art. BUSINESS OF THE LORD.

Four lists of the Apostles are contained in the NT, one in each of the Synoptics and one in the Acts (Mt 10<sup>2</sup>, Mk 3<sup>16</sup>, Lk 6<sup>13</sup>, Ac 1<sup>25</sup>). A careful examination of these lists shows that each of them consists of three groups of quaternions, and that in each group the same person is mentioned first. The first group contains the names of Peter, James, John, and Andrew. The second is made up of Philip, Nathanael, Thomas, and Matthew. The third is formed of James the son of Alphaeus, Simon the Zealot, Judas or Thaddeus, and Judas Iscariot. Is this arrangement due to accident, or does it rest on a perception of the historical importance of the disciples at the time at which it was drawn up? The places given to Peter and Judas and the contents of the different groups suggest that there is here an indication of the view taken of the Apostles in the early Church. By whom the catalogues were framed is unknown, but their value as historical witnesses is great. They form, as it were, a table of precedence dating from the earliest times, and embodying the verdict it may be of the Apostles themselves, or at least of those of them who survived when they were prepared. In all the lists the name of Peter occupies the first place. St. Matthew (10<sup>2</sup>) writes: 'Now the names of the twelve apostles are these; the first, Simon.' In what sense is this 'first' to be understood? It might refer to the fact that Peter was the first of the Apostles to be chosen. This is perfectly credible, but the fact that the order of the names is not uniform in the lists may be regarded as showing that the memory of the order in which the Twelve were called was not preserved in the Church. But why was Peter the first called? Must not an explanation of this fact be sought? And is it not to be found in the circumstance that he was the foremost of the Apostles, their leader, their spokesman? Primacy in the sense of jurisdiction or authority over his fellow-Apostles Peter never received and never exercised. His position is that of the foremost among equals; a position due not to any formal or official appointment, but to the ardour and force of his nature.

What kind of men were the Apostles? What was their character, education, social rank, ability, age? The Apostles were in an eminent sense religious men. The tie which bound them to Jesus was a religious tie. It was impossible for any person to become a follower of Jesus who did not believe in obedience to the will of God as the first of all duties. The Apostles were men who desired to fulfil the demands of the law of God. Their aims were high; their morals were pure; whatever their ignorance, misconceptions, defects, they were men of integrity, justice, and mercy; diligent, candid, honest, pious, God-fearing. None of the Apostles had received more than a common education. The range of their knowledge was that of most of their fellow-countrymen. But they were in no sense illiterate. It is probable that all of them could read and write. Most if not all of them spoke Aramaic and Greek. Their minds had been quickened and nourished by the services in the Synagogue. The education that springs from the truest knowledge of God and of man was theirs. And the discipline of their daily lives had rendered them alert, considerate, patient, energetic.

The Apostles without exception belonged to the working classes as they would be called to-day. There was no man of rank or distinction or of social consideration among them. Four of them, we know, were fishermen. One of them was a collector of taxes. The rest belonged to the same rank in life, and followed similar occupations. All of them knew what it was to labour to maintain themselves; they were familiar with life as it presents itself to the great body of mankind. There is no evidence that any of the Apostles was specially distinguished by intellectual force. There was no man of genius among them; no original thinker; no man dowered with the imaginative faculty; no man of great powers of organization. It does not appear that any of them had an unusually impressive or attractive personality. As far as can be ascertained, they were all young men, about the same age as, or younger than, our Lord Himself. No man of middle life, no grey head was included in the circle. Variety of taste, temper, mode of life found full expression among the Apostles. No one was the same as another. Their experience of life had differed. Their anticipations of the future differed. Their habits of thought and action differed. Perhaps the only common elements were their piety and their devotion to Jesus. Such then were the Apostles. They were pious men belonging to the people, full of the plain sense and judgment which mark the common man; slow to learn, but teachable; free from social prejudices; untrammelled by any fixed systems of thought; with keen eyes for character; anxious to win the favour of Jesus.

The most discordant criticisms have been passed on the choice of the Apostles, many of these betraying a complete failure to grasp the circumstances and facts of the case. The vindication of the wisdom shown in the selection is the future career and achievements of the Twelve. In judging it is necessary to bear in mind the materials at our Lord's command and the purposes which He had in view. The man who realizes these has no difficulty in appreciating and admiring the sagacity exhibited by Jesus. Here, too, he will perceive that originality which marks His entire career. The Twelve would never have chosen one another. Had the selection been left to them individually or to any two or three among them, the persons included would have been very different. Nobody but Jesus Himself would have acted in disregard, as it would appear, of the motives by which men are constantly swayed. No one will suppose that our Lord had any aversion to intellect, wealth, rank, genius, experience, in themselves, or that He preferred fishermen to lawyers, and tax-collectors to priests. But He was equally free from the bias which leads so many to believe that the success of any movement depends on its being supported by the higher classes, whether of intellect or rank. His one test of men was fitness or capacity for the special objects He had in view. The number of adherents at His command as Apostles was limited. His primary aim was to discover men who could be taught and trained to comprehend His character, aims, and labours, who could describe His life to their fellows, who could inform them as to what He said and as to the deeds of mercy and power which He wrought. The defects and the limitations of the Apostles were far better known to our Lord than they are to us or to His critics. Yet He called them despite of these, for after all they were the best instruments within His reach. Their faults of intellect, taste, manner, speech, their stupidity, folly, their prejudices and prepossessions, their unbalanced judgment and temperate zeal were all before His eyes; nevertheless He summoned them to be His Apostles in the confidence that He could make them become the very men best fitted to discharge the duties connected with the establishment of the Kingdom of God. He had no false anticipations as to the kind of men the Twelve would prove; He chose them knowing what they were and what they would become.

The Apostles were twelve in number. The number was intended to be significant. Its import could not have been lost on the Twelve themselves when they were first called, or on the multitude who witnessed their election. Our Lord was evidently thinking of the twelve tribes of Israel. Though ten of the tribes had largely disappeared, Israel still consisted ideally of twelve tribes, and the mission of the Messiah was to be to all the tribes of the nation. Hence the fitness of the number chosen by our Lord. There was one Apostle for each tribe. Nor should it be overlooked (that the employment of this number was a fresh claim on the part of Jesus to be the Messiah. His disciples would argue thus: Who but the Messiah could venture to create a body or group of twelve disciples only? Nobody had done so before, no prophet, not even the Baptist. Jesus then must be the Messiah.

It has been suggested that the number twelve was, so to speak, accidental; that our Lord did not choose a definite number of disciples, but that He allowed all who desired to do so to remain beside Himself. The alleged choice of the Twelve is pronounced not historical. They chose our Lord, not He them. The Twelve is but a name for His closest and most devoted adherents. The only arguments advanced for this view are the silence of the Gospel of St. Matthew as to the selection of the Twelve, and the omission of the list of the Twelve from the Gospel of St. John. But St. Matthew furnishes a list of the Twelve, and therefore presupposes their selection as self-evident that they had been appointed by our Lord. St. John not less than St. Matthew takes the selection of the Twelve (9:7-7) as known, and even makes our Lord refer to His appointment of them (15:15). To assert that the Twelve attached themselves to our Lord gradually and spontaneously is to misread the tenor of the statements regarding them.

The title 'Apostle' and its equivalents.—It is expressly stated that the Twelve received from our Lord the title 'apostles'; but it is doubtful whether the title was bestowed when they were chosen, and its exact sense has always been a subject of debate. It will be expedient at this point to examine the designations borne by the Apostles, because they are not called uniformly by one name.

The most common of all the appellations bestowed on them in the Gospels is that of disciples. This usage is as characteristic of the Fourth Gospel as of the Synoptics. And it is noteworthy that in none of the Gospels are the twelve disciples sharply discriminated from the other disciples of our Lord. They are called 'the disciples of Jesus,' 'his disciples,' 'the disciples,' but the context alone reveals whether the writer is speaking of a limited group or of the disciples of our Lord in general.

A peculiar usage appears in the Gospel of St. John. There the title is applied to those who first attached themselves to our Lord. 'The disciples' form a body or class by themselves long before the Apostles are chosen. From the narrative it looks as if no person belonged to this group who was not at a later stage included among the Apostles, but the point is not by any means certain.

The adoption of the term 'disciples' to denote the followers of our Lord requires no explanation. The primary sense of the word indicates the relation of a pupil to his teacher, and the designation was therefore the most natural and appropriate which could be employed.

The Twelve. This phrase explains itself. As soon as our Lord had selected a specific number of persons for a definite end, it was to be expected that they should be called by the number which they formed. They were twelve, and were accordingly known as 'the Twelve.' It is doubtful whether it is proper to supply such a substantive as 'disciples' or 'apostles.' There is authority in the NT for the use of both of these phrases, but it does not follow that the name first given to this innermost circle of our Lord's adherents was 'the twelve disciples' or 'the twelve apostles' rather than 'the Twelve.' A time came when all three designations were current. St. Matthew mentions 'the Twelve' four times (10: 26<sup>14</sup>, 28, 47), St. Mark nine times (4: 10, 9: 9, 10: 10, 11: 14, 13: 17, 20, 45), St. Luke six times (8: 9, 10: 13, 18: 22, 23, 47), and St. John four times (6: 70, 7: 20, 29). St. Matthew speaks four times (10: 11, 20: 26, 29) of 'the twelve disciples,' but he stands alone in his use of this description. It is worth while to observe that after the death of Judas the phrase 'the Eleven' was employed precisely as 'the Twelve' had been. It is found absolutely in Lk 24: 49; it is found with the substantive 'disciples' in Mt 28: 16, and with the substantive 'apostles' in Ac 1: 12.

The word ἀπόστολος occurs ten times in the Gospels. In the Gospel of St. John it is used only in its etymological sense of a person sent forth (13: 16); in the other three Gospels it refers to the twelve disciples of our Lord. But there is some doubt as to the meaning it bears in each of these Gospels. St. Matthew employs it once only—in the passage already quoted: 'The names of the twelve apostles are these' (10: 2). This language is used to introduce the list of the Apostles, together with the charge addressed to them. The term may be understood here in either of two senses; it may designate the Twelve as sent out on one special mission of evangelization, or it may bear the meaning which it has in Christendom to-day. A decision between these senses is hardly possible in the case of St. Matthew's Gospel. It is otherwise with the Gospel of St. Mark. Here the term is employed twice (3: 14, 6: 30), and apparently in both instances only with regard to the particular missionary tour or journey on which they were about to enter. The use of the term in St. Luke is noteworthy. It occurs six times. Once (11: 49) it is possibly used in its etymological meaning of messenger; in two other places (6: 12, 9: 10) it may be used to designate the special mission on which the Twelve were first sent; but in the remaining three (17: 22, 24, 24: 10) it is employed to designate the Twelve in their capacity as the representatives of Jesus, the sense which it commonly bears in the Acts.

It is unnecessary for our present purpose to enter on the history of the word 'apostle' in Greek. That the word was in use in NT times in its etymological sense of messenger is generally allowed. This fact is confirmed by the NT itself. Our Lord, in speaking to His disciples on the night of the betrayal, declared that the person sent (apostle) is not greater than he that sent him (Jn 13: 16). Again when our Lord is designated in He 3: 1 as 'the apostle and high priest of our confession,' the reference is probably to His own description of Himself as 'the sent of God' (Jn 17: 9). There is then clear evidence that the word was current in our Lord's time in its sense of messenger, delegate, envoy. Was it also in use in a technical sense to designate those who were despatched from the mother city by the rulers of the race on any foreign mission, especially such as were charged with collecting the tribute paid to the temple service? (Lightfoot, Gal. 93). And was it this usage which suggested to our Lord His own employment of the term? There is no evidence to show that the term was current in this technical sense before the Gospels were written. Besides, even though it had been in existence, it is doubtful whether our Lord would have employed a term which had already in the minds of His hearers distinct associations of its own. The absence of such associations would recommend a term to Him.

It was the very simplicity and directness of the expression 'apostle' which won for it the favour of our Lord. The Twelve were simply to be His messengers or envoys. The analogy between His own case and that of the men He had selected was always present to His mind. He had been sent by the Father; they were to be sent by Himself. A technical term could only have served to bewilder the Twelve and lead them to misconceive the object of their mission. What was necessary for our Lord's purpose was a word which set forth simply and apply the relations of the Twelve to Himself, and for this there was no more suitable term than 'messenger,' 'envoy.' The term 'apostle' then was not suggested to our Lord by its currency as a technical expression. He chose a common word and adapted it to His own purpose. He wished to give the most expressive title to the men whom He had chosen, and none seemed to Him so suitable as the word 'sent.' It reminded them perpetually that they were men with a mission.

It is generally held that the name 'apostles' was given to the Twelve on the occasion of their call. The language of St. Luke (6<sup>13</sup>) does not compel us to adopt this conclusion, nor is that of St. Mark (3<sup>14</sup>) decisive on the point.* The statements in both Gospels are consistent alike with the view that the Apostles were so named when they were first called, and with the view that this title was bestowed on them at a later date. The other considerations to which appeal may be made tell in opposite directions. It may be urged that the impression left on the mind of an ordinary reader is that the Apostles received their name at the time of their call; but it does not follow that this impression is correct. For it is said in the same context that our Lord gave to Simon the name Peter, and we know that this name was given to him long before he became an Apostle. This proves that the statements made in connexion with the appointment of the Twelve must not be pressed as if they referred to that event exclusively. Again, it may be contended with much propriety that there was a special fitness in our Lord assigning a new name to the men whom He had set apart for a new task. The new relation might well be designated by a new name. But it may be pointed out in reply that an interval elapsed between the choice of the Twelve and their being sent forth. Is it not probable that the new designation was given only when the new vocation was actually begun? Would the new title be understood apart from the experience by which it was illuminated? This argument is strengthened by the circumstance that St. Mark appears to employ the term 'apostle' only in connexion with the missionary journey of the Twelve. With him it is not so much a title belonging to them, as a term descriptive of the functions assigned to them on a special occasion. To decide between these conflicting opinions is not easy, but on the whole the suggestion that the disciples were not called 'apostles' till they were first sent out appears the more probable.

The Sermon on the Mount is regarded by many as an address delivered by our Lord when He chose the Twelve. The note of time in the Gospel of St. Luke ascribes it to this occasion, and there is no reason to reject this testimony. Besides, it has the greatest internal probability in its favour. The appointment of the Apostles formed an epoch in the ministry of our Lord; what more natural or suitable than that He should avail Himself of the occasion to explain and enforce His convictions as to the true life of man? The time was most opportune for such a deliverance. The hearts of the disciples were deeply moved; their whole natures were quickened and alert; why not sow seed which might afterwards bear abundant fruit? The character of the Sermon itself is another argument confirming this conclusion. It is didactic rather than hortatory. It expounds truth rather than proclaims the mercy of God. Finally, there is nothing in the Sermon which conflicts with this opinion. It may then be assumed with some confidence that the Sermon on the Mount was spoken in connexion with the call of the Twelve. Many writers go further and contend that it was spoken to them principally or exclusively. But this opinion is at variance with the statements of the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke, and is not required by the contents of the Sermon. The truths it announces were not intended for the Twelve alone; why then should they not have been heard by all the disciples? This result is in no way inconsistent with the opinion that the Sermon on the Mount formed, as it were, a special charge to the Twelve in view of the new position which they were henceforward to occupy. It is not necessary for our purpose to discuss the limits of the Sermon or do more than furnish a brief account of its teaching. Our Lord wished His followers to understand the meaning of righteousness; to know what the will of God really was; the true nature of the demands He made on them; how to frame their conduct if they were to obtain His approval. The subject of the address then is the true life of man. The characteristic features of that life are set forth in a series of blessings pronounced on those who possess the qualities spoken of; the mission of Christians as the light of the world and the salt of the earth is touched on; and then our Lord proceeds to contrast the perfect requirements of the Law of God as understood by Himself with the requirements of that Law as contained in the OT or as sanctioned by tradition; after which He illustrates the true nature of almsgiving, fasting, and prayer, and of devotion to the will of God. See SIMON'S SERMON below, and in Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. 1*H*.

It would have been most instructive had any record of the effect produced on the Apostles by this Sermon been preserved. Their surprise must have equalled their admiration. The severe requirements, the strictures on the Law, the novelty of the interpretations, the apparent paradoxes, must have astonished and perplexed them. It is doing them no injustice to say that much it contained was beyond their comprehension. They may have seen that the qualities required of them were embodied in our Lord's own life, and that the temper of the Beatitudes was exactly His temper. They may have felt that the sphere of the inner life was not less properly the sphere of law than that of speech and conduct. They may have discerned that the true greatness of man is to live not merely as God enjoins, but as God Himself lives. But they could hardly grasp what our Lord meant by the fulfilment of the Law. A fulfilment which was at the same time an abolition was a mystery to them. Nor would they perceive that He had transformed morality by reducing it to the principle of life according to God; the one supreme rule of duty being to love God and man. The paradoxical expressions, too, would be as puzzling to them as they have proved to thousands since. In their discussions there would be champions of literalism, but these would soon be brought to acknowledge that a perfectly literal obedience to the commands given was impracticable.

4. Training of the Apostles.—From the call of the Apostles the mission of our Lord was more a mission to them than to His fellow-countrymen at large. He had waited until the time that a proper selection from His disciples could be made; now that the choice had taken place He devoted Himself to their instruction and training. The Apostles were to accompany Jesus from place to place; they were to be with Him continually. This implied the relinquishment of their means of living. It was not possible for them to continue at their occupations and be Apostles of Jesus. The sacrifice made by each Apostle in obeying the summons to apostleship has seldom been adequately appreciated. In some instances the property left or sold, the income abandoned, might not be great intrinsically, but a man's all is great to him, hence the moral courage needed of every Apostle was not slight. How then were their wants supplied? Whence did they obtain money to meet their daily expenses? The arrangement followed was probably devised by our Lord, and formed one of the earliest lessons He intended them to master. In a sense this first lesson is the supreme and even the sole lesson which He sought to teach, that of absolute reliance on Himself for everything. Trust in the Father, trust in Himself, was the lesson which Jesus sought to inculcate at all times. The Twelve and our Lord formed, as it were, a single household, of which He was the head. He presided at the common meals. He gave directions as to their movements. The cost of their maintenance was borne by a common purse. One of the Twelve was the treasurer of the company (Jn 13<sup>29</sup>). The food needed was either carried with them, or purchased, or provided by the hospitality which is so characteristic of the East. The company could not only supply their own wants, but could minister to those of the poor (Jn 13<sup>29</sup>). The sources from which their supplies were drawn were doubtless various. Some among them had had or still had property, and the proceeds, contributed to the common stock, helped to defray the charges of each day. It is almost certain that presents were made to our Lord and the company from time to time by grateful friends and neighbours. But the principal source seems to have been the generosity of several women who accompanied them on some of their journeys, and placed their means and services at the command of our Lord. The names of some of these women have been preserved in a most instructive passage in St. Luke's Gospel (8<sup>3-8</sup>), which is the chief authority on the subject under consideration. Among these are mentioned Mary of Magdala, Joanna (possibly a widow whose husband had been a steward of Herod Antipas), and Susanna. It is evident from St. Luke's statement that the number of such women was large, and it was probably owing to their generosity that our Lord and the Twelve were able to devote themselves untroubled and untrammelled to their task. It should be noticed that the kind of life lived by the Twelve was itself a practical illustration of some of the cardinal lessons which Jesus desired to teach. The subordinate value of earthly possessions could not have been more effectively taught than by the life of dependence on the liberality of others. Their journeys, too, from place to place had also their value. They were stimulated by new scenes and new persons; new conditions had to be faced, new duties performed. They had leisure to ponder on what was said to them; they were not distracted from the great work of their life, the knowledge of their Master. This was their duty, and it became their glory. For in understanding Him they came to resemble Him. The education of the Twelve, the transformation of them from the men they were into the men they became, is one of the greatest of our Lord's achievements. The Apostles were to be our Lord's witnesses, but the witnessing of which He thought demanded insight, sympathy, courage, self-command, tolerance, patience, charity. It was inseparable from the highest moral endowments. It involved great receptive and assimilative power, issuing in vigorous and unceasing obedience and service.

In order that the Apostles might become His witnesses, our Lord made use of three principal agencies: (a) His personality, (b) His miracles, and (c) His teaching.

(a) To be with Jesus was in itself the best of all education and training. It was on this account that the Apostles were chosen to be with Him habitually. A complete knowledge of Him could be attained only in this way. For knowledge is acquired insensibly not less than sensibly, and the Apostles learned much regarding Jesus when it never struck them that they were doing so. Gradually His influence told on them. His ideals, motives, ends became clear to them. His manners, looks, tones, words, ways became their inspiration and guide. They felt what goodness, truth, duty were. Above all, they came to know God as the Father. It would, however, be a serious error to hold that the Twelve from the first moment of their selection appreciated the true grandeur of the life of Jesus. On the contrary, that life must often have presented to them a problem of no little difficulty. It was not the type of life which they had been accustomed to regard as specifically religious, still less as embodying religion in its perfection and integrity. It is probable that those of the Apostles who had been disciples of the Baptist were at first more impressed by his austere and solitary life than by the life of Jesus, which was substantially that of ordinary men. He ate and drank as they did. He dressed like them. He moved freely among them. He never sought to protect Himself from the approach of men, but on the contrary invited them to draw near. Nothing in His bearing or speech betrayed that He regarded Himself as standing on a different plane from other men, or that He expected them to treat Him as belonging to a different order of existence. He was simple, genial, affable, accessible. His mode of life, too, viewed as religious, must have filled them with surprise. He had no fixed hours or forms of prayer. His approach to the Father was the expression of His habitual reverence, adoration, and trust, but it was not determined, much less fettered, by rule. He prayed as He was moved to pray.

Again, He departed from a usage which was one of the chief features of the piety of the time. He declined to fast. Not only had He no regular fast days, He neither fasted Himself nor did He inculcate the observance on them. Another respect in which He deviated widely from the religious practices of His time was His disregard of ceremonial ablutions. He paid no attention to the rules affecting ritual purity. There is no evidence that He violated the usages of His nation as to foods, but His attitude towards these showed that He attached no value to them. Even that rite which was fundamental and distinctive, the pledge of salvation because the assurance of being a member of the covenant, the rite of circumcision, was unnoticed in His teaching. In yet another and hardly less important respect our Lord's life was largely different from the accepted type of sanctity. The Sabbath, like circumcision, was one of the peculiar glories of Judaism, and the teachers of our Lord's age and of preceding generations had framed a code of rules to protect it from desecration. These He trampled under foot. The endless regulations intended to stop the performance of any work whatever on that day He brushed aside as at variance with the true end of the Sabbath institution. He rejoiced in the Sabbath, esteeming it to be one of God's best gifts to man, but He was everywhere denounced as a Sabbath-breaker by those who regarded themselves as the interpreters of the law (Jn 5<sup>10</sup>). Even in the matter of almsgiving He was not as the men who professed to be specially religious. He was beneficent in the highest degree, but He followed no systematic rules.

Hence it is plain that the tenor of our Lord's life must have formed a problem of no little complexity to the Twelve during the first stages of their apprenticeship. Was this life—so simple, so natural—a truly religious life? Was the religious life bright, sunny, cheerful, full of hope and joy? Was this life of simple trust in the Father and of obedience to His will in the fulfilment of the common duties of life—was this religion? Nor was the perplexity of the Apostles lessened by the classes with which our Lord preferred to associate. He addressed Himself to the sick, the poor, and the outcast. The solicitude of Jesus for the least necessitous of these classes was a difficulty to some of them, but their surprise rose to the height when they saw Him mix freely with those under a social ban.

Doubtless the eyes of the Apostles were opened gradually. They came to perceive, as we do to-day, that the life spent by their Master was the typical life of man. Its likeness to the common life of men is its glory. For by it the common life which all must live is transfigured and made the ideal life of men. Its freedom from rule is discerned to be the reason why it is capable of becoming the model of all lives without exception. For that freedom teaches men that true religion creates its own forms, while its essence of trust in God and devotion to His will remains unalterable. The sympathy which He exhibited for all classes was a revelation of the truth that He was the Saviour of the world.

(b) Perhaps nothing impressed our Lord's disciples more when they first became acquainted with Him than His miracles. The expectation that the Messiah would work miracles seems to have been general. The Gospels leave the impression that the common people anticipated that works of a most marvellous description would be performed by the Messiah. The nature of these works was undefined, but they transcended the ordinary endowments of man. The Twelve then may have felt little surprise when they saw their Lord perform miracles, but every new miracle would serve to strengthen their conviction of His title to be the Messiah. It is not likely, however, that they were prepared for the kind of miracles which He worked. None of them could have foretold that the Messiah would confine Himself in great measure to the accomplishment of miraculous cures of body and mind; that He would spend many hours on many days in healing sickness and in expelling demons. The miracles of Jesus were as unexpected as His mode of life. The Apostles were dreaming of miracles of judgment at the very hour when He was performing miracles of mercy. Even the miracles over nature were not those of which they naturally thought.

The Apostles could not fail to perceive the range of the power wielded by their Master and be filled with amazement. No disease could withstand His word or touch. The very demons yielded to His sway. Death itself was powerless before Him. It is important to notice that some of the miracles were performed before the Apostles only. The miracles in which the Apostles as a whole or some of them were specially concerned are these: the Miraculous Draught of Fishes recorded by St. Luke (5<sup>1-7</sup>), the Stilling of the Storm (Mk 4<sup>35</sup>), the Walking on the Sea (6<sup>8</sup>, Jn 6<sup>16</sup>), the Stater in the Fish's Mouth (Mt 17<sup>2</sup>), the Cursing of the Fig-tree (Mk 11<sup>20</sup>), and the Second Miraculous Draught of Fishes (Jn 21<sup>11</sup>). These signs had a peculiar value for the Twelve. They were proofs of knowledge and of power fitted to promote faith and to enforce truth. There is a fitness in the circumstance that most of the miracles on nature were wrought before or on behalf of the Apostles. For they more than others were prepared to embrace the truth that Jesus was the Lord of nature. It was indispensable that they should be taught this fact, and how could it have been better illustrated than by the miracles wrought on the Sea of Galilee? What a revelation of the knowledge or power of Jesus; what a prophecy of the success of the new vocation to which they were summoned, was the first draught of fishes! What a lesson concerning the might of Jesus was contained in the instant obedience of the raging waves and winds to His command! What a fresh disclosure of His power was His walking towards them on the sea as they toiled to make the western shore of the lake! What instruction to Peter and to the rest when Peter first succeeded in imitating his Master's walking on the water and then began to sink! How fraught with suggestions to Peter the coin found in the mouth of the first fish which came to his hook as he lowered it into the lake! What confirmation of all that they had learned was found in the second draught of fishes, that after the Resurrection! The cursing of the fig-tree occupies a place by itself among our Lord's miracles, but the lesson it teaches is most weighty. A miracle of judgment is as suitable as a parable of judgment. The lesson of the need of correspondence between profession and practice could not have been more impressively taught than by the fate of the fig-tree.

No one can doubt that the number and variety of the miracles witnessed by the Apostles enhanced their conception of our Lord's person and powers. Perhaps, too, they discerned, even if imperfectly, what is so clear to us to-day, that the miracles were indeed what He called them, signs: manifestations of the character and qualities of the kingdom which He had come to set up. The boundless sympathy and compassion of their Master must have struck them; His life not less than His teaching was mercy and service. His works of mercy were the living embodiment of the principles of mercy He inculcated. He healed all who sought

His aid, making no inquiry into their past, their station, their gifts, but caring only for their needs. It was impossible for the Apostles not to discover that the miracles they beheld with such frequency were signs of the grace and love of the Father speaking to men through Jesus.

As the Apostles saw the miracles and heard what Jesus said respecting them, did they form a just conception of their nature and function? Were they able to compare them with the portents for which they had at one time longed? Did they perceive the relation of the signs to the person of Jesus? Did they discern that the signs could be fully understood only through His character? Did they recognize that the character and words of Jesus were greater than His signs, but that these were nevertheless such as to convince every impartial judge that His mission was of God? They knew that Jesus never regarded His miracles as the chief evidence for the validity of His claims; they were neither His sole nor His principal credentials; they were rather a part and element of His message and His work. Did they see clearly that the evidential value of the miracles did not consist in their departure from the established order of nature, in their capacity as marvels, but in their congruity with the character and aims of Jesus, and as illustrations of His spirit and ways? We would gladly learn whether the Apostles ever reflected on the use made by our Lord of His miraculous endowments. Believing in Him as the Lord of nature and of life, aware that He had unnumbered forces at His command, were they surprised that He never employed His powers to promote His advantage or to defend His disciples or Himself from injustice and violence? Whence this self-repression? Why was the sphere of the miraculous so strictly limited? Why were none of the miracles of a character to dazzle, compel, overwhelm? Why did Jesus refuse so often the request for a sign, and especially for a sign from heaven? Why was the thaumaturgic element wholly absent from His works? The fact that our Lord observed a peculiar temperance in the employment of His miraculous gifts must have imprinted itself on the minds of the Apostles, and it is probable that the significance of the fact became more and more obvious as their experience widened. Even before the Crucifixion they may have discerned that this self-restraint was in full harmony with His attitude towards the world, and only the corollary of His conception of the Kingdom. See, further, art. MIRACLES.

(c) From the first, the disciples had regarded Jesus as a teacher, and whatever more He became to them as their intercourse with Him deepened, a teacher He remained to the end. Or, to speak more correctly, from being a teacher He became the Teacher; and the greatest of teachers, measured by any proper standard, He certainly was and abides. The substance of His teaching is the truest, wisest, and best on the loftiest and weightiest of all topics—topics as to which all teachers before Him were as men groping in the dark. He and He alone speaks with the confidence of personal knowledge regarding the nature of God and His relations to man. It is sufficient for our present purpose to refer to the naturalness, the ease, the familiarity with which Jesus spoke concerning the Kingdom of God; the character and intentions of the Father; the righteousness He requires; the conditions on which entrance into the Kingdom depends; its history and its final issues; the testimony borne by Jesus to Himself; the place He assigns to His person and work. Never man so spake (Jn 7<sup>46</sup>). Yet He speaks what He knows, and testifies of what He has seen (Jn 3<sup>1</sup>). Here, if anywhere, the entire religious experience of mankind affirms the truth of the witness He bore. His message authenticates itself; it bears the seal of its Divine origin upon it. Such views never sprang up within the mind of man; they descended out of heaven from God.

And this teaching was conveyed to the disciples and to the people according to definite methods and in language which forms an epoch in human speech. It is unlikely that our Lord ever reflected on the problems which form the science and art of teaching, or that He ever laid down rules for His own guidance; but the essence of all that is best in the writings of the great educators is embodied in His practice. Let a reader come to the Gospels full of what he has learned regarding education from Plato and Aristotle and their successors, and he can perceive without difficulty, in the relations between our Lord and the Apostles; in His attitude towards them; in His modes of stimulating, enlarging, and enriching their minds; in His tact, patience, and wisdom,—the signs of skill which is incomparable because so spontaneous, so flexible, and so fertile of resource. Never for a moment did He lose sight of His object, to qualify the Apostles to be His witnesses and representatives; but He did not dwell on that purpose. He was aware that the power of personality is the strongest and most penetrating of all forces, and accordingly He separated the Apostles more and more, as the days went by, from their familiar scenes and labours, in order that they might, because of their complete intimacy with Him, breathe His spirit and share in His aims. They were ennobled, as it were, despite themselves. New ideals and motives took possession of them. He was so constantly before their eyes, so continually the subject of their speech, so much the centre of their interests and the goal of their hopes, that they grew into His image. Not less evident was His desire that the Apostles should not be mere echoes of Himself, but men of originality, courage, and resource. It was on this account that He delivered no systematic instruction; that He caused nothing to be committed to memory; that He did not store the minds of the Apostles with rules, lists of duties, tables of the forbidden and the permissible. Hence He gave no dogmas in fixed shape even on the greatest of all subjects. Hence, too, He furnished no directory for the duties of the day, and made no attempt to prescribe the hours to be employed in devotion or the words to be used, or to determine the provision to be made for the sick and the poor. Again, He taught only as His disciples were able to receive. Not that He never went beyond their capacity. This He frequently did, and of set purpose. But He observed an order in what He said. The most obvious illustration of this fact is His teaching regarding His person. He did not begin to tell at once who He was, nor did He open His lips as to His death until He had evoked from Peter's lips as the spokesman of the Twelve the confession that He was the Messiah (Mk 8<sup>29</sup>, Mt 16<sup>16</sup>, Lk 9<sup>20</sup>). It is expressly stated that He kept back much from His disciples, leaving them to the enlightenment of the Spirit, because they were unprepared to receive what He had to communicate (Jn 16<sup>12</sup>). If He spoke of what they did not comprehend at once, it was either that their intellects might be quickened or that they might treasure in their memories the truth mentioned, in view of their future experience. His references to His death had as their chief aim to render the Apostles certain of the fact and, above all, that it was foreknown by Him. Nor was He impatient for results. He never forced growth. He knew that to build durably is to build slowly; and so He bore with ignorance, with misapprehension, with imperfect views, with partial and hasty inferences, knowing that these would be corrected by the discipline of experience. He sought especially to preserve the individuality of His disciples, and to unfold the characteristic endowments of each. None of them was to be other than himself. No one was to be a model for the rest. He knew each so well that He could play on him as on an instrument, but this knowledge He used only to promote the welfare of the disciple. The manifestation of personal character, the personal discernment of truth, the exhibition of personal sympathy, appreciation, reverence, devotion, love, filled Him with delight.

The Gospels show on every page that our Lord encouraged the disciples to ask Him questions. Whatever difficulties presented themselves to their minds they were free to place before Him. This they did so constantly that the habit must have been created by our Lord. How large a portion of the Gospels is occupied with the questions and remarks of the Apostles! It is to these questions that we are indebted for the explanation of the parable of the Sower (Mk 4<sup>9</sup>). The same is true of His teaching regarding defilement (Mt 15<sup>10</sup>). How much we owe to Peter's questions—'How often shall my brother sin against me and I forgive him?' (Mt 18<sup>21</sup>); 'What shall we have therefore?' (Mt 19<sup>27</sup>). But perhaps the finest illustration of the relations of our Lord and the Apostles in this connexion is the intercourse on the night of the betrayal. No passage in the Gospels is so instructive as to the readiness of the disciples to break in by questions on what our Lord was saying, and the skill with which He availed Himself of these questions to open to them His deepest thoughts and purposes (Jn 13<sup>36-37</sup>).

The resources of human speech have been strained to the utmost to describe the grace and power of the language of Jesus, and yet the result is felt to be inadequate. Did the Apostles recognize the originality, the strength, the flexibility, the charm, the aptness, the simplicity, the depth of the words of Jesus? We cannot tell; it may have been that their apprehension of the beauty and majesty of His language was much less than ours, but even they must have felt a strange thrill as they heard the most sublime of all truths clothed in terms which they were in the habit of using every day of their lives. It was a new experience to have religion speak the tongue of the home, the workshop, and the street. Then, too, the illustrations which He used! The whole life of the ordinary man was laid under tribute to illustrate the Kingdom of God. The furniture of his home, his food, his clothing, his work, his intercourse with his fellows were made the symbol and the vesture of heavenly truths. Earth shone in the light of heaven. One form of speech is specially identified with the teaching of Jesus—the parable. The parable may be regarded as the creation of Jesus. The parables of the OT, and those found in Jewish writings, hardly deserve mention in this respect. Nor did Jesus teach in parables because the language of parable is the language of the East. He devised the parable to meet the requirements of His hearers. The parable is His own workmanship, the product of His mind and heart. The parables of Jesus are unique alike in literature and religion, and are as distinctive of Him as the miracles.

An ordinary reader of the Gospels is apt to suppose that the ministry of Jesus, from its beginning to its close, was distinguished by the use of parables. But this opinion is erroneous. No parables marked the opening of the ministry. The first use of the parable is noticed at length. To the question why Jesus finally adopted the parable most men would reply—to attract to interest, to stimulate, to find the readiest and most direct access to the mind for truth and duty. But when the Gospels are consulted they give an answer altogether different. They tell that our Lord, when questioned on the subject, affirmed that He taught in parables, not to reveal but to conceal the truth; not to instruct but to condemn men (Mk 4<sup>12</sup>). These words have always been a stumbling-block to interpreters. Perhaps their true significance may never be ascertained; but the view which reflects them as the correct description of the parables as a whole is justified, because they are at variance with the Gospels themselves. The most cursory examination of the parables shows that many of them are messages of grace. Who can fail to discern that the heart of God is represented in the parable of the Prodigal Son as the heart of a Father? Is this truth meant to extinguish hope? Again, an examination reveals that many of the parables were spoken to the disciples themselves. Was this the penalty of their blindness and hardness of heart? Accordingly, the common view of the parable is the true view, and our Lord spoke in parables to render his teaching as simple, vivid, stimulating, and effective as possible. See PARABLES, and ILLUSTRATIONS.

The extent to which the parables were addressed to the Twelve has scarcely received adequate recognition. Indeed the parables are seldom spoken of in connexion with the education of the Twelve. Yet one-third of them were, to all appearance, directed to the Apostles exclusively. These cover the period from the time when our Lord first began to speak in parables till His death. The ten parables belonging to this class, following the order first of St. Matthew and then of St. Luke, are: the Hidden Treasure, the Pearl, the Drag-net, the Unmerciful Servant, the Labourers in the Vineyard, the Ten Virgins, the Talents, the Friend at Midnight, the Unprofitable Servant, the Unjust Judge. A slight acquaintance with these parables shows that the lessons they teach were those our Lord was most anxious that His disciples should learn. The measureless value of the kingdom of God, the certainty of a final severance between the evil and the good, the necessity of a forgiving disposition, the nature and conditions of the future recompense, the obligation of watchfulness, the reward of perseverance in prayer, the truth that no man has claims of merit on God, are the subjects with which these parables deal, and these subjects were constantly in the heart and on the lips of our Lord. A flood of light was thrown on all these topics by the parables. The truth was now clearer, more comprehensible, more affecting, more subduing.

Is it possible to discover the sentiments with which the Twelve listened to the parables? Perhaps they were too plain men to perceive their exquisite naturalness and beauty. In all their discussions concerning them not a word may have been spoken in praise of that perfect felicity which secures for them an unequalled place in the literature of the world. But they would at least perceive their appropriateness. How they must have lived in their memories and illuminated truth and duty! Did the Twelve find any difficulty in understanding the import of the parables? Presumably their condition was just that of the diligent and devout reader of to-day. Some parables bear their meanings, as it were, on their forehead. Nobody doubts what is the meaning of the parable of the Good Samaritan or of the Ten Virgins. It is true that there are questions connected with their interpretation which are still under discussion, but the lessons which they inculcate are obvious. But what of the parables which perplex expositors to-day? What of the Unjust Steward? What of the Labourers in the Vineyard? The same difficulties which occur to us must have occurred to the disciples. But they had this immense advantage over us that they could ask their Master questions as to His meaning, and we know that these questions were freely put. The interpretations of the parables of the Sower and of the Tares are said to have been replies made to the request of the disciples for an explanation. What strikes one in these answers is the point, depth, freshness of the meaning. These explanations have sometimes been assigned to the Apostles themselves, but the supposition is without probability. Were it sound, it would form the most striking proof of the effect on them of their intercourse with Jesus, for it is impossible to suggest juster or more suitable interpretations of the parables concerned. One peculiarly instructive sentence was spoken by our Lord in this connexion (Mt 13<sup>35</sup>). He had been expounding some of the parables to His disciples, and asked if He had been understood. When they replied affirmatively, He remarked that every teacher of the Law instructed regarding the kingdom of heaven was like a householder who produced from his stores things new and old. The Apostles were the scribes of Jesus, taught to understand the nature, characteristics, and history of the Kingdom of God, and hence capable of furnishing most profitable instruction to their hearers. The old and the new alike were at their command in their mutual relations and connexions. They did not despise the one nor vaunt themselves concerning the other. The Law and the Gospel, prophecy and its accomplishment, the Law and its fulfilment, furnished them with the subjects which they could treat with knowledge and power.

After the Twelve had been some time with our Lord, they were sent forth on a missionary journey (mission of the Apostles, Mk 6<sup>7</sup>, Mt 10<sup>5</sup>, Lk 9<sup>1</sup>). The time at which the mission took place, the town from which they started, the duration of the mission, are uncertain. Two reasons probably influenced our Lord in despatching the Twelve on this enterprise. The first and most prominent was His profound sympathy for the condition of the people of Galilee. It was impossible for Him to evangelize all Galilee, to say nothing of the entire land; others must share His labours. This was one of the ends for which the Twelve had been chosen, and accordingly He sent them to announce everywhere that the Kingdom of God was nigh. A second reason was that He might in this way train them for their future career. The message which they were to proclaim corresponded with their own comparative immaturity on the one hand, and with the spiritual state of their audiences on the other. To have declared the Messiahship of Jesus would have led to misunderstanding, and have hindered rather than furthered the expansion of the kingdom; hence they were confined to the assertion, so full of promise and hope, that the Kingdom was at hand. To assist them in discharging their mission as the envoys of Jesus they were endowed with miraculous powers. They were enabled to cure disease and to expel demons. These powers they were to exercise gratuitously. This liberality was intended by Jesus to be an evidence of the nature of the kingdom, of which they announced the near approach. It was to be a kingdom of compassion, sympathy, tenderness. These endowments, besides serving to show the nature of the kingdom, were also a demonstration of the truth of their message. The Apostles were enjoined to make no special provision for the mission on which they were about to enter. They were to start on it just as they were. They were to take neither money, nor food, nor clothing for their journey. They were to rely for their maintenance on the providence of God, and on the hospitality which they were to seek. Because of the urgency of the case their attention was to be concentrated on the lost sheep of the house of Israel. It is, indeed, not probable that our Lord meant their mission to extend beyond Galilee, or even to the whole of the province, the Greek-speaking cities being excluded. The efforts of the Twelve were probably intended to be restricted to the homes of the people. No reference is made in the instructions given them to any appearance in the synagogue or in the marketplace. Their inexperience did not permit them to deliver addresses in public. The Twelve were sent on their mission by twos; that is, six different enterprises were carried on by them at once. The wisdom of this arrangement is obvious. It was desirable that they should overtake as many of the population as possible, but it was not less important that they should be encouraged and strengthened by one another's presence. Had each of the Twelve entered on the work alone, he would have felt isolated and discouraged, and often have been at a loss how to act. No agreement exists among scholars as to the length of time occupied by the mission. Some consider that it lasted only a single day, others two days, others several weeks, and others again, several months. It may be pronounced with confidence that it took up some weeks at least.

The Twelve strictly followed the commands they received, passing through the villages, preaching repentance and the gospel, and casting out demons and healing everywhere. How their message was received does not appear. It is simply known that on their return they told our Lord what they had done and taught. No reference is made to the experience they had acquired or to the conclusions they had been led to form. It would have been most profitable had any information on these points reached us. Not less advantageous would it have been for us to know how they felt when they wrought their first miracles. Were they startled? Did they exult? Or were they grateful and humble? We can only speculate on these points, but we may feel assured that the Apostles profited not a little by this their first mission. Besides those lessons of confidence in the wisdom and power of their Master which they were always receiving, they were taught how to apply the truths they had learned, and how to use the powers with which they were clothed. They were forced to act for themselves, to reflect and decide in a way which elicited their latent capabilities.

From this point the education and training of the Apostles may be regarded as merged in the life of our Lord, and the further treatment of the subject must be sought under the relevant articles. The intercourse between our Lord and the Apostles should be regarded from their side if the work He accomplished in their case is to be fully appreciated and understood. To study the life and teaching of Jesus through the eyes and minds of the Apostles is advantageous in no common degree, because of the many new questions which are thus raised, and which cannot be determined without a clearer and fuller insight being obtained into the wisdom of the methods He followed in preparing them to expound His thoughts and to extend His kingdom. A list of some of the more important topics to be considered may be serviceable. They are such as these: the question put to the Twelve at the crisis in Galilee, 'Will ye also go away?' the confession of Peter, and its significance for the Apostles; the predictions of the death and resurrection made, it would appear, to the Apostles only; the strife for the first places in the Kingdom, and the action taken by our Lord regarding it; the words spoken to the Apostles on the night of the betrayal, some of which form a parting charge to them; the appearances to the Eleven; the final commands addressed to them. Two subjects besides are deserving of particular notice: the inner circle of the Apostles—Peter, James, and John, the Three within the Twelve; and the many questions connected with the name of Judas Iscariot.

The Christian Church rests on the Apostles, for the Christian Church is their creation. But they, in turn, were the creation of Jesus. That He transformed them in so brief a space of time from the time they were when called, as to be able to convince the world that He was the Messiah of Israel, the Son of God, the Saviour of mankind, is not the least of His titles to the admiration and the gratitude of men; for His success proves what can be made of ordinary men when they surrender themselves to the guidance of His spirit.

LITERATURE.—The chief books to be consulted are the Commentaries on the Gospels and the Lives of Christ, together with art. 'Apostle' in the different Bible Dictionaries and Encyclopedias, though the best of these are meagre and inadequate for the purposes of the student of the Gospels. For a general treatment two valuable works in English should be named—Bruce's Training of the Twelve and Latham's Pastor Pastorum. On the name and office of an Apostle see Lightfoot, Gal. 2:101; Hort, Christian Ecclesia, 22-41; and on the Apostolic group, Expositor, i. 1. [1875] 29-43, iii. ix. #### APPARITION.—

In AV this word occurs thrice, in the Apoc. only: Wis 17<sup>3</sup> (Gr. ἐπιφανία, RV 'spectral form'), 2 Mac 2<sup>6</sup> (Gr. επιφανία, RV 'apparition,' RVm 'manifestation'), and 54 (Gr. επιφανία, RV 'vision,' RVm 'manifestation'). In RV it occurs thrice only: Mt 14<sup>18</sup> || Mk 6<sup>48</sup> (πνεύμα, AV 'spirit'), and 2 Mac 2<sup>6</sup> (as above).

The Revisers have used this word in its ordinary current sense of 'an immaterial appearance, as of a real being, a spectre, phantom, or ghost.' There is always connected with this term the idea of a startling or unexpected appearance, which seems also associated with the original ἐπιφανία. The immaterial appearance of a person supposed to be seen before (diabolus) or soon after death (ghost), is a wrath; but these three synonyms are often interchanged.

The Jews of Christ's time, like all unscientific minds (ancient and modern), believed in ghosts naturally, instinctively, uncritically. Dr. Swete (The Gospel according to St. Mark, London, 1898, p. 31) refers to Job 4:9-20<sup>8</sup>, and especially to Wis 17<sup>3</sup>(9) and 17<sup>4</sup>(9) for earlier evidence of a popular belief in apparitions among the Hebrew people. The disciples' sudden shriek of terror (ἀνέκραξαν, Mk 6<sup>48</sup>) shows that they thought the phantom was real; but if we try to realize their attitude and outlook, we shall understand the futility of attributing to such naive intelligences the discrimination of modern psychological research. The suggestions of excitable imaginations were indistinguishable from the actual presentations of objective reality. The best illustrations of their habits of thought must be sought in ancient and modern records of Oriental beliefs.

A. Erman (Life in Ancient Egypt, London, 1884, pp. 307, 308) says that 'the Egyptians did not consider man as a simple individuality; he consisted of at least three parts, the body, the soul, and the ghost, the image, the double, or the genius, according as we translate the Egyptian word Ka. . . After the death of a man, just as during his lifetime, the Ka was still considered to be the representative of his human personality, and so the body had to be preserved that the Ka might take possession of it when he pleased. . . It is to their faith in the Ka that we owe all our knowledge of the home life of the people of ancient Egypt.'

E. J. W. Gibb (History of Ottoman Poetry, London, 1900, pp. 56-59) says that 'according to the Sufi theory of the human soul it is a spirit, and therefore, by virtue of its own nature, in reality a citizen of the Spirit World. Its true home is there, and hence, for a certain season, it descends into this Physical Plane, where, to enable it to act upon its surroundings, it is clothed in a physical body. . . The power of passing from the Physical World into the Spiritual is potential in every soul, but is actualized only in a few.'

For the medieval conception of the nature of ghosts see the opus alacris—Dante, Purg. xxv. 88-102—in which Dante explains his conception of the disembodied soul as having the power of operating on matter and impressing upon the surrounding air the shape which it animated in life (Aquinas), thus forming for itself an aerial vesture (Origen and St. Augustine). See also Dante, Conv. tr. ii. c. 9, and Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theol. pt. II. suppl. qu. lxxix. art. 1.

Keim (Jesus of Nazareth, London, 1879, iv. 184-191) critically reviews the various explanations offered of the miracle of Jesus walking over the billows, but says nothing of the word ἐπιφανία, merely remarking (p. 190): 'If we adhere to the actual narrative, the going on the water was far from being an act of an ordinary character—it was something divine or ghostly.' APPEARANCE. See CHRIST IN ART, and PORTRAITS.

APPEARANCES.—See RESURRECTION.

APPRECIATION (OF CHRIST).—The whole NT is one long appreciation of Christ. It is no blind-fold acceptance of Him, no mere echo of a tradition, but a series of utterances of men personally convinced of the supreme value of Christ to the world. St. Paul speaks of Christ only as he himself has been influenced by the Lord, not as the disciples had described Jesus to him. His phrases—high, beautiful, and so often mystical—are the direct expressions of his own personal consciousness of Jesus Christ. No one has accused him of extravagance or of exaggeration. It is because he has felt that to be clothed with the Lord must be the perfection of power and joy, that he says, 'Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ' (Ro 13<sup>14</sup>). It is because he has seen the love eternal that nothing imaginable can utterly root out again from the awakened heart, that he says, 'Neither death, nor life, . . . nor any other creation, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord' (Ro 8<sup>38</sup>). And St. John opens his first Epistle with the strongest personal declaration of the whole of the Epistles, 'that which we have heard, . . . seen with our eyes, . . . and our hands have handled of the word of life . . . declare we unto you' (1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup>).

But the simplest appreciation of all—as natural as a bird's song or a child's praise—is that which threads its way through every page of the Gospels. In spite of all the enmity written there: remembering that there were those who saw in Him an ally of Beelzebub (Mt 12<sup>24</sup>), working with the devil's aid; that some called Him 'a gluttonous man, a wine-bibber, friend of publicans and sinners' (11<sup>19</sup>); that lawyers, and Pharisees, and Sadducees were ever watching to trip Him (22<sup>15</sup>), and plotting with Herodians (v. 15) to destroy Him; that the Galilean cities, which should have known Him best,—Chorazin, Bethsaida, Capernaum (11<sup>21, 22</sup>), and even Nazareth,—rejected Him (Lk 4<sup>26</sup>); and remembering the awful and lonely agonies of the last hours, we can yet point to the Gospels as abounding with witness to the wide contemporary appreciation of Christ.

It was most natural that it should be so, even when He is thought of entirely apart from any doctrine of His Divine personality. His own sympathy for others, and indeed for all things, was sure to attract others to Him. His quick perception of the good in all, His tender response to the least wave of the world's infinite music, show Him as destined to be the desired of men. He came upon the most diverse types, the most opposite of characters, and instantly knew their possibilities and their worth. He sees through the pure-minded hesitancy of Nathanael (Jn 1<sup>46</sup>), He recognizes the true value of the widow's mite (Lk 21<sup>4</sup>). He draws Nicodemus the timid to Him (Jn 3<sup>1</sup>). He knows what will satisfy Thomas (Jn 20<sup>27</sup>), and what will please and win Zacchæus (Lk 19<sup>5</sup>); and His immediate followers include a Mary Magdalene as well as a Mary of Bethany, a Judas as well as a John. Even the failures are appreciated by a standard of faith unknown to the world. He acknowledges the longing of the heart though a weak will robs it of fruition; He reads the zealous affection of Peter between the lines of a moment's Satanic pride (Mt 16<sup>22</sup>), or a terror-stricken denial (Mt 26<sup>70</sup>); He penetrates to the secret yearnings behind the materialistic questions of the woman at the well, and imparts to her His highest thought of God (Jn 4<sup>21</sup>). He cannot even look upon the earth or sky but He must read into it the indwelling of the Eternal, and in all its pages picture and parable of spiritual realities. To His all-sensitive being the universe of things seen is but a symbol. The sower with his seed, the harvest-fields, the birds of the air, the fox in his hole, the sheep in the fold or lost on the hills, the wind that foretells heat or rain (Lk 12<sup>24-26</sup>), the prophecies of the sunset (Mt 16<sup>2</sup>), or the springtide promise of the sprouting fig-tree (Mk 13<sup>28</sup>),—all passing through His appreciative spirit is treasured as the visible manuscript of God.

We might expect that such a receptive, comprehensive, and understanding nature would compel confidence. Men could not help trusting such deep and ready sympathy. And, as we read the Evangelists, one of their most notable traits is this—that they succeed in bringing together, almost without form, and apparently without intention, a wonderful accumulation of witness to the appreciation Jesus inspired from the first. The record is so varied. It is from no one school, or type, or rank. Almost every grade of life in the community is there—from the outcast and the leper to the Sanhedrist and the Roman centurion. From the first His gifts of healing attract the sufferers, and none are more definite in their acknowledgment of Him. The villagers bring their sick on beds to the market-places (Mk 6<sup>54-56</sup>), or lower the palsied through the roof at Capernaum (Mk 2<sup>4</sup>). The centurion in that town is satisfied that a word from Jesus will be enough to heal his sick servant (Mt 8<sup>8</sup>). Martha says, with such simple trust, 'Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died' (Jn 11<sup>21</sup>). The ruler of the synagogue feels that the touch of the Lord's hand would be enough to heal his dying daughter (Mt 9<sup>18</sup>). The woman with the issue of blood would but touch the hem of His garment to be cured (Mk 5<sup>28</sup>). The Syro-Phœnician woman persisted in her prayer for her sick daughter, eagerly claiming the rights, while bearing the reproach of being a Gentile 'dog' (Mk 7<sup>26</sup>). With one cry is He greeted alike by blind Bartimeus (Mk 10<sup>47</sup>), the two blind men (Mt 9<sup>27</sup>), and the ten lepers (Lk 17<sup>12</sup>)—'Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on us'; a cry the meaning of which is uttered by the leper (Mk 1<sup>40</sup>)—'Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.' When sight is given to the man born blind, the parents testify to the Divine origin of the power that has been exercised (Jn 9<sup>2</sup>). And the multitude at Nain, when they saw the dead raised, had no hesitation in crying—'A great prophet is risen among us' (Lk 7<sup>16</sup>). It was a glad welcome from the sufferers and their friends that greeted Jesus as the manifestation of God in all these things. But not less earnest is the witness of the crowds to the popular estimate of the teacher. 'There went great multitudes with him' is the frequent note that leads up to some great doctrine of life (Mt 19<sup>2</sup>, Lk 14<sup>25</sup>, Mk 6). The house filled at Capernaum (Mk 2<sup>2</sup>) is but the parallel of the occasion when His own mother 'could not come at him for the press' (Lk 8<sup>19</sup>), or of the thousands by the seashore (Mk 4<sup>1</sup>), or of the multitude that 'trod one upon another' (Lk 12<sup>1</sup>). Lives that He changes from darkness to light bear willing evidence to His power and charm: Mary Magdalene will not be held back by false shame from entering the Pharisee's house to acknowledge her Saviour (Lk 7<sup>36-40</sup>), nor be repulsed by the charge of wastefulness through sentiment (Mk 14<sup>4</sup>); and Zaccheus will boldly profess a practical conversion before those who know him intimately (Lk 19<sup>8</sup>).

We look for appreciation from His nearest disciples, a quick obedience, a joy that has no place for fasting (Mk 2<sup>20</sup>), the mother's confidence at the marriage-feast at Cana (Jn 2<sup>3</sup>), the great utterances of His forerunner the Baptist (Jn 1<sup>26-33</sup>), the exalted vision of the Transfiguration (Mk 9<sup>2</sup>), and that Petrine outburst, repeated by all, as they neared Gethsemane—'If I should die with thee, I will not deny thee.' From these His intimates we anticipate such trust. We look for it, too, from the band of holy women—Joanna, Susanna, Salome, the Marys, and those 'who ministered unto him of their substance' (Lk 8<sup>3</sup>). But beyond these we have the scribes (Mt 8<sup>10</sup>, Mk 12<sup>24</sup>) earnestly approaching Him, Pharisees inviting Him to their houses (Lk 11<sup>27-14</sup>); we have the confession of the council of priests and Pharisees—'If we let him alone, all will believe on him' (Jn 11<sup>48</sup>); we have the acknowledgment of Samaritans, convinced not by hearsay but by personal knowledge (Jn 4<sup>42</sup>), of centurions (Mt 8<sup>8-10</sup>, Mk 15<sup>39</sup>), and of the rich young man 'running and kneeling' and saying, 'Good Master' (Mk 10<sup>17</sup>). Strangers seek Him out—'Sir, we would see Jesus' (Jn 12<sup>26</sup>); and the common people of His own race 'heard him gladly' (Mk 12<sup>27</sup>), and acclaimed His entry into Jerusalem (Mk 11<sup>8-10</sup>). In the beginning, shepherds and magi, angels and stars bear witness to the newborn King; so that to the last it is a strange mixed company, that seems to include (by his long faltering before judgment) Pilate himself, the lone, mysterious figure of Joseph of Arimathea, and Nicodemus 'bringing myrrh and aloes' (Jn 19<sup>39</sup>).

This many-sided appreciation of our Lord in His own day, in addition to its obvious gain to the Christian preacher, is suggestive of the many differing points of view from which men may reverently regard Christ, each one expressive of a truth, though not the entirety of the truth. And it may also indicate the many successive ways of wonder, repentance, sympathy, and vision in which Christ speaks to each individual soul.

ARBITRATION.—The settlement of disputes by the acceptance of the judgment of a third party supposed to be impartial. The arrangement may be purely private, or in accordance with special statute; the application is multifarious. Some method of settlement by umpires is as old as civil government. In Job 9<sup>33</sup> the 'daysman' is perfectly described. The Greek term (μεσότης) translated 'mediator' (or middleman) has the same meaning; though as applied, in the NT, to Moses and to Christ (Gal 3<sup>20-21</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>5</sup>, He 9<sup>15</sup> 12<sup>24</sup>), as standing between man and God (cf. Dt 5<sup>5</sup>), it belongs to an essentially different order of ideas, inasmuch as God is not man. The complexity of modern life has multiplied the occasions; but the most important recent advance has been the application to international differences. Thereby questions such as have often led to wars become capable of amicable settlement. The first notable instance was the Geneva arbitration under the Washington Treaty (1871) in the Alabama Question. The principle, then disputed, has now found universal acceptance. Treaties of arbitration already exist or are being negotiated between most nations that have mutual relations. And in the future, except where ambitions and strong passions are involved, this means of agreement will be largely resorted to.

VOL. I.—8

The idea is based on the acknowledgment of the identity of moral law in the two spheres of individual and national life. Duty for persons or communities or nations is one. There is no valid distinction of private and public right; the code of ethics that is binding for the private individual is equally obligatory on kings and the representatives of peoples. This doctrine is opposed to the long history of statecraft, to the maxims of diplomats, and to the passions of despotism. But few now openly deny its truth; and the acknowledgments already made in treaties of arbitration may be reckoned one of the greatest triumphs of Christian civilization.

The principle may be said to be based on the Golden Rule (Mt 7<sup>12</sup>, Lk 6<sup>31</sup>), which teaches reciprocal obligation, or on the kindred command to love our neighbours as ourselves (Mt 22<sup>39</sup>, Mk 12<sup>31</sup>). These fundamental laws are given as the sum of practical duty. They condemn the egoistic attitude. They teach us to regard the position of others with full sympathy, to seek an impartial standpoint, and to make the individual will harmonize with the general mind. The principle of arbitration is also an illustration of the grace of peaceableness. 'Blessed are the peacemakers' (Mt 5<sup>9</sup>). This truth finds full expression in the Epistles, where peace, the fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5<sup>22</sup>), and the concomitant of righteousness, is contrasted with the strife and envy of sin, and is noted as a mark of the kingdom of God, who is the God of peace. Once more, the principle may be based on prudence; for a willing settlement may prevent a legal defeat, or even a worse disaster (Mt 5<sup>25-26</sup>, Lk 12<sup>58-59</sup>, cf. Pr 25<sup>5-9</sup>).

Christ declined on one occasion to be an arbiter (Lk 12<sup>58</sup>). He was addressing the multitude, when one of them said, 'Master, bid my brother divide the inheritance with me.' Jesus replied, 'Man, who made me a judge (κρίτης, so BDL and the crit. edd.; TR has μεσότης) or a divider (μεσότης, only here in NT) over you?' The words which follow (v. 15<sup>57</sup>) show that Jesus knew that this man was moved by covetousness; but apart from His censure of a wrong motive, He here affirms that it was no business of His to arbitrate between men. He would not interfere in civil disputes which fell properly to be decided by the regular law (cf. Dt 21<sup>17</sup>). But His saying goes far beyond the sphere of jurisprudence. Christ lays down universal laws of justice and love, but does not apply them. Moral casuistry was no part of His mission, and decisions of the kind this man wanted could only have weakened the sense of personal responsibility, and hindered the growth of those spiritual dispositions it was His chief aim to create.

R. SCOTT.

ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχελαός) is named once in the NT (Mt 22<sup>2</sup>), and probably is referred to in the parable of the Pounds (Lk 19<sup>12<sup>57</sup></sup>). He was the elder of the two sons of Herod the Great by Malthace, a Samaritan woman (Jos. BJ I. xxviii. 4, xxxiii. 7). Judea, with the title of 'king,' was bequeathed to him by his father's will; but he would not assume the royal dignity till he had obtained confirmation of that will from the emperor Augustus (Ant. XVII. viii. 2-4). Before his departure to Rome a rebellion broke out in Jerusalem; and in quelling it his soldiers put three thousand men to death, among whom were pilgrims visiting the Holy City for the passover (ib. XVII. ix. 3). Thus at the beginning of his reign an evil reputation was gained by Archelaus, and the alarm of Joseph may be understood ('But when he heard that Archelaus did reign in Judaea in the room of his father Herod, he was afraid to go thither').

After the rebellion, Archelaus proceeded to Rome (Ant. XVII. ix. 3-7, cf. Lk 19<sup>12</sup>). Augustus, dealing with Herod's will, received a deputation from the people of Judæa, who begged that neither Archelaus nor any of his brothers should be appointed king (cf. Lk 19<sup>4</sup>). The emperor finally decided that Archelaus should receive Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa, with the title not of 'king,' but of 'ethnarch' (Ant. xvii. xi. 1-4; BJ ii. vi. 3). On his return from Rome the ethnarch sought vengeance against his enemies (cf. Lk 19<sup>7</sup>) in Judæa and Samaria. In the ninth or tenth year of his reign, after many acts of tyranny and violence, he was banished by the emperor to Vienne in Gaul (Ant. xvii. xiii. 2). According to Jerome, the tomb of Archelaus was pointed out near Bethlehem (de Situ et Nomin. Loc. Hebræic. 101. 11).

LITERATURE.—Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, Wars of the Jews (BJ), as cited above; references s. 'Archelaus' in index to Schürer's Geschichte des Jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi, 1898-1901 (Eng. tr. of 2nd ed. 1885-90); and Hauswirth's Deutschementliche Zeitgeschichte, 1878-77 (Eng. tr. in 3 vols. 1878-80). Of the last named work, vol. i. (German) was published in a 3rd ed. in 1878. J. HERKLESS.

ARIMATHÆA (Ἀριμαθαία) is mentioned in Mt 27<sup>57</sup>, Mk 15<sup>42</sup>, Lk 23<sup>52</sup>, and Jn 19<sup>38</sup> as the place from which Joseph, who buried the body of Jesus, came up to Jerusalem. In the Onomasticon (225. 12) it is identified with Ἀριμαθίου Ζεβεδᾶ (Ramathaim-zophim), the city of Elkannah and Sannel (1 S 1), near Diospolis (Lydda) and in the district of Timnah (Ibneh). In 1 Mac 11<sup>34</sup>, Ramathem is referred to along with Apherema and Lydda as a Samaritan toparchy transferred, in 145 B.C., to Judæa. These notices of Ramathaim point to Beit-Bima, 13 miles E.N.E. of Lydda, and 2 miles N. of Timnah,—an identification adopted by G. A. Smith (HGHL 254 n. 7) and Buhl (GAP 170). Another possible site is Rām-Allah, 3 miles S.W. of Bethel, suggested by Ewald (Hist. ii. 421). The proposed sites S. of Jerusalem are not 'in the hill-country of Ephraim' (1 S 1). If Arimathæa, then, be identified with the Ramathaim of Elkannah, it may well be at the modern hill-village of Beit-Bima. The LXX form of Ramathaim is Ἀριμαθαία (1 S 1 and elsewhere), thus providing a link between Ramathaim and Arimathæa.

ARISTEAS (LETTER OF).—A. W. COOKE. This interesting piece of fiction may find a place in this Dictionary, because it gives the first account of that work which more than any other paved the way of the gospel in early times, namely, the Greek translation of the OT, the so-called Septuagint. There is no agreement as yet about either the age or the aim of this composition. That it is a fiction is now generally admitted. The author pretends to have been one of the two ambassadors—Andreas, ἀρχιερωματοφύλαξ of the king, being the other—sent by king Ptolemy's Philadelphus to the high priest Eleazar of Jerusalem in order to get for him a copy of the Law, and men to translate it for the Royal Library at Alexandria. The letter gives a long description of the gifts sent by Philadelphus to Jerusalem, of the city, its temple and the religious customs of the Jews, and of the table-talk between the king and each of the 72 interpreters. When the work was finished, a solemn curse was denounced on any one who should change anything in it (cf. Dt 4<sup>2</sup>, Rev 22<sup>18, 19</sup>). Schürer, I. Abrahams, and others fix the date about B.C. 200; Herriot (on Philo) dates it 170-150; Wellhausen (Isr. und Jüd. Gesch. 1897, p. 232) in the 1st cent. B.C. (but in 4th ed. 1901, p. 236, he assigns it to the 2nd cent.); Wendland, between 98 and 63,† nearer to 96; L.

* On this name (which is almost certainly based on a textual corruption), see Hastings' DB, vol. iv. p. 188 note. † In Hastings' DB iv. 488<sup>a</sup>, line 7 from bottom of text, read 93 for 98.

Cohn doubts whether it was known to Philo; Graetz placed it in the reign of Tiberius, and Willrich (Judaica, 1900, pp. 111-130) brings its composition down to 'later than A.D. 33.' Lombroso was the first to show that the 'author was well acquainted with the details of court life in the times of the Ptolemies'; and recent researches have confirmed this; on the other hand, there are interesting connexions with the Greek of the NT; compare καταβολή used absolutely for 'creation' (Mt 13<sup>32</sup> and Aristeas, § 129 [a usage apparently unknown to Hort ad 1 P 1<sup>20</sup>, and Swete, Introd. p. 397]); ἀνατίθειν (Lk 1<sup>1</sup> and Aristeas, § 144; Mt 6<sup>16</sup> and Aristeas, § 140, etc.).

While Jerome had already called attention to the fact that Aristeas speaks only of the Law as having been translated by the 72 interpreters, in later times it became customary to consider the whole Greek OT as the work of the 'Septuagint.' Philo seems to follow a somewhat different tradition, and mentions that in his days the Jews of Alexandria kept an annual festival in honour of the spot where the light of this translation first shone forth, thanking God for an old but ever new benefit. He is sure that God heard the prayer of the translators 'that the greater part of mankind, or even the whole of it, may profit by their work, when men shall use philosophical and excellent ordinances for regulating their lives.'

On the use made of the Greek OT in the NT see Swete, pp. 381-405, 'Quotations from the LXX in the NT.' That Jesus Himself was acquainted with it would seem to follow from the quotation in Mt 18<sup>17</sup>=Mk 7<sup>7</sup>. For the words μὴ γὰρ ἐθέλωμεν περὶ τῶν ἰσχυρῶν λέγειν are the Septuagint rendering of the Hebrew מִי יִצְרָח, which rendering rests on a confusing of the first word with יָרַח (noticed already by Grotius). But it is doubtful whether we are entitled to expect in our Greek Gospels such a verbatim report of the words of Jesus.

On the influence of the Septuagint on the spread of the Gospel, cf. in addition to older works like Grinfield, Oikonomos, etc.) Alfred Deissmann, 'Die Hellenisierung des semitischen Monotheismus,' Leipzig, 1903 (reprinted from Neue Jahrbücher für das klassische Altertum, 1903).

LITERATURE.—The Letter of Aristeas was first published in Latin (Rome, 1471 fol.) in the famous Latin Bible of Susenheim and Pannartz; first edition of the Greek text by Simon Schard, Biele, 1601; all subsequent editions superseded by that of (Mendelssohn) Wendland (Lipsiae, Teubner, 1900), and that of H. St. J. Thackeray in H. B. Swete's Introduction to the OT in Greek (Cambridge, 1900, 2nd ed. 1902). English translations by J. Dore, 1633 and 1688; Lewis, 1715; Whiston (Athenicæ Accurata, i. 423-385), 1727; recently by Thackeray (JQR xv., April 1903). ARISTION (ARISTO).—One of the principal authorities from whom Papias derived (written?) 'narratives of the sayings of the Lord' (τὰν τοῦ Κυρίου λόγων διηγήσεις; cf. Lk 1<sup>1</sup>), and (indirectly) oral traditions.

1. Importance and Difficulty of Identification.—According to Eusebius (HE iii. 39), Papias of Hierapolis in his five books of Interpretations (τοι. I. Interpretation of the Lord's Oracles 'referred frequently by name' to 'Aristion and the Elder John' as his authorities. From the Preface (προομιαν) Eusebius cited the following sentence to prove that Irenæus had misunderstood Papias in taking him to refer to the Apostle John as his authority, whereas the 'John' in question was not the 'disciple of the Lord,' but a comparatively obscure 'Elder.' We abridge the sentence, but give the relevant variants: εἰ δὲ πάλαι καὶ παρρηλοῦντως τις τοῖς πρεσβυτέρους ἔλεγε, τοῖς τῶν πρεσβυτέρων ἀνεκρινόντων ἑαυτοῦ τὸ Ἄσάριον ἢ τὸν Ἡέρος εἶπεν . . . ἢ τις ἕτερος τῶν τοῦ Κυρίου μαθητῶν, ἅτε Ἀριστίων καὶ ὁ πρεσβύτερος Ἰωάννης αἱ τοῦ Κυρίου μαθηταὶ λέγουσιν.

For Ἀριστίων Syr. and Arm. read Ἀριστων, and omit the clause αἱ τοῦ Κυρίου μαθηταὶ λέγουσιν, Arm. by compensation rendering Ἀριστο and John the Elders. Nicophorus (HE ii. 46, but not iii. 20) makes the same omission. Rufinus renders ceterisque discipulis dicebant. Jerome changes the tense (loquebantur). Four Greek MSS and Niceph. (iii. 20) omit αἱ Deferring the question of the significance of the variant readings, it is apparent that 'Aristion and the Elder John' are in several ways placed in contrast with the group of 'disciples of the Lord' mentioned immediately before, by whom Papias certainly means the twelve Apostles, enumerating seven (including James the Lord's brother; cf. Gal 1<sup>9</sup> 2<sup>9</sup>), from Andrew to 'John (author of the Revelation) and Matthew' (author of the Logia). The designation μαθηται instead of ἀπόστολοι is employed because the function in consideration is that of transmitting μαθήματα—the precepts (ἐντολαί) learned from the Lord. The disciples (including James) of the Lord Himself are the first generation of traditores. The group next mentioned, 'Aristion and the Elder John,' are distinguished expressly and implicitly as belonging to a subsequent generation.

(1) As Eusebius points out, the John spoken of in connexion with Aristion is (a) 'mentioned after an interval,' (b) 'classed with others outside the number of the Apostles,' (c) has 'Aristion mentioned before him,' (d) is 'distinctly called an Elder' (in contrast with the John mentioned just before, who is called a 'disciple of the Lord'). Nowhere in the context should the term 'Elder' be taken as = 'Apostle.'

(2) A distinction not referred to by Eusebius, but at least equally important, is the contrast of tense (disregarded by Rufinus and Jerome), whereby Papias makes it apparent that at the time of his inquiries the Apostles, including John, were dead; whereas Aristion and the Elder John were living. He 'used to inquire of those who came his way what had been said (τι εἶπεν) by Andrew, Peter, Philip, Thomas, James, John or Matthew, or any other of the Lord's disciples; as well as what was being said (ἅτε λέγουσιν) by Aristion and the Elder John.' Hence, as an authority of note, and a transmitter of Gospel traditions earlier than the time of Papias' writing (A.D. 145-160), Aristion is a witness of the first importance for the history of Gospel tradition. On the other hand, great difficulty and dispute are caused by the descriptive clause attached in most texts to his name and that of John the Elder, because it is identical with that by which the Apostles are appropriately designated as traditores of the first generation; whereas the distinctions already noted, especially the contrast of tense τι εἶπεν—ἅτε λέγουσιν, make it certain that Papias did not regard Aristion and the Elder John as belonging to this group. For Lightfoot's proposal (Essays on Sup. Rel. p. 150, n. 8) to regard λέγουσιν as 'a historical present introduced for the sake of variety,' is confessedly advanced only to escape the 'chronological difficulty' of supposing two 'disciples of the Lord' still living at the time of Papias' inquiries. It is certainly inadmissible.

The Armenian version makes a natural inference when it forms the second group by reading 'Aristo and John the Elders.' But the change is clearly arbitrary. Papias applies the title 'the Elder' only to 'John' to distinguish him from the Apostle. It was doubtless applicable to Aristion as well (Conybeare, Ec. visitor, 1893, p. 248, against Hilgenfeld, Ztschr. f. wissenschaftl. Theol. xxxvii. 1894, p. 628), but was superfluous. The excesses suggested above (Weiffenbach, Corsen, et al.) removes all difficulty by rendering τοῖς τῶν πρ. ἀνέκρων λέγουσι as an ellipsis: 'I would inquire the utterances of the Elders (reporting) what Andrew or Peter . . . had said,' because 'Elder' is then used consistently throughout the paragraph for traditor of the post-Apostolic generation (cf. Ac. 15<sup>2</sup> 4 6 21<sup>18</sup> and the Heb. [2]), though it is not relied on (as in Arm.) to make the distinction of the Apostolic from the post-Apostolic generation, but only of the two homonymous individuals, John the Apostle and John the Elder.

On this interpretation, Aristion and John were members of the group which perpetuated the traditions of the Apostles (in Palestine?) until Papias' day (cf. Hegesippus ap. Eus. HE iii. xxxii. 6-8, and Lk 1<sup>1</sup>; Ac 11<sup>30</sup> 15<sup>4</sup> 4 6 22 23 21<sup>18</sup>). But even if this exegesis be rejected, there is no escape from the following alternative: Either the descriptive phrase αἱ τοῦ Κυρίου μαθηταί, appended after 'Aristion and the Elder John' precisely as after the list of Apostles, is textually corrupt (assimilated to the preceding clause); or the designation is used in a different and very loose significance. On this view the only certainty is that Aristion was living at the time of Papias' inquiries (A.D. 120-140?) after 'Apostolic narratives' (ἀποστολικὰς διηγήσεις), and in a region whence Papias could obtain them only from 'travellers who came his way.' For Eusebius' statement that 'Papias was himself a hearer, not of the Apostles, but of Aristion and the Elder John,' is made in the interest of his desire to find 'some other John in Asia' besides the Apostle (Zahn, Forsch. vi. 117 f.), and is corrected by himself in the next clause: 'At all events he mentions them frequently by name, and sets down their traditions in his writings.'

(3) A second difficulty of more importance for the true reading of Papias and the identification of 'Aristion' than is generally recognized, is the spelling of the name, which Syr. and Arm. give as 'Aristo.' For this spelling, in combination with the omission of the designation 'the disciples of the Lord,' is not only traceable to about A.D. 400 (Syr. is extant in a MS of A.D. 462), but these two main variations are accompanied by minor ones in Syriac, Armenian, and Latin authorities which form a group in that they manifest a belief in common regarding the personality of Aristion-Aristo which differs from that of the received text of Eusebius.

2. Text of Eusebius. — Mommsen (ZNTW iii. 1902, p. 156 ff.) regarded this textual evidence as conclusive in conjunction with the admitted 'chronological difficulty.' He would therefore omit the epitheton from the text of Eusebius. Corsen (ib. iii. p. 242 ff.) rightly criticised Mommsen's proposal to omit, because some designation of this second link in the chain of traditores is indispensable to the sense. He thought Papias capable of the colossal anachronism of regarding his own contemporaries as 'disciples of the Lord.' The present writer had argued (Journ. of Bibl. Lit. xvii. 1898) for the reading αἱ τοῦ κυρίου μαθηταί (sc. τῶν ἀποστόλων) as the true text of Papias, on the internal evidence, and because 'the Elders' of Papias are twice referred to by Irenæus (Har. v. v. 1 and v. xxxvi. 1) as 'the disciples of the Apostles.' The corruption followed by Eusebius (and probably even by Irenæus in this passage, though he transcribed others where 'the Elders' were correctly described as 'disciples of the Apostles'), involves only the change (by assimilation) of three letters, ΟΙΤΟΤ-(ΤΩ)ΜΑΘΗΤΑΙ becoming ΟΙΤΟΤ(ΚΤ)ΜΑΘΗΤΑΙ. In the form wherein Edwin Abbott (Enc. Bibl. s.v. 'Gospels,' ii. col. 1815, n. 3) adopts the emendation, the change involves but two letters, ΟΙΤΟΤ-(ΤΩ)ΜΑΘΗΤΑΙ becoming ΟΙΤΟΤ(ΚΤ)ΜΑΘΗΤΑΙ, as in Jg 4<sup>24</sup> (LXX) ΤΩΝ ΤΩΝ Β becomes ΚΤ ΤΩΝ in A. This would largely explain the strange error of Irenaeus in taking Papias to belong to a generation even earlier than Polycarp ('some of them saw not only John but other Apostles also, and heard these same things from them and testify [present] these things'). The difficulty experienced by Eusebius in refuting it could hardly have been so great if his text of Papias had not the same corruption.

On this view the variants are of no help to improve the text of Eusebius, which is correct in the received form (Bacon, art. 'False Witness,' etc., in ZNTW vi. 1905). They have some importance, even if arbitrary, as indicating that in antiquity also the 'chronological difficulty' was felt as well as (in Arm.) the incompleteness of sense produced by simple omission of the descriptive clause and (in Rufinus) the incongruity of applying to 'Aristion and John the Elder' the same designation by which the Apostles had just been distinguished. They would have great importance if it could be made probable that they rest, directly or indirectly, upon a knowledge of Papias (or, much less probably, of Aristion-Aristo) independently of Eusebius.

3. Origin of Variants.—'Aristo' is not simply 'the Greek name Aristion badly spelt' (Conybeare, l.c. p. 243), nor even should it in strictness be called 'an equivalent (gleichbedeutende) form of the same proper name' (Hilgenfeld, Ztschr. f. wissenschaftl. Theol. 1875 ii. p. 256, 1883 i. p. 13, 1894 p. 626). It is at least the more usual, if not more correct form, and 'occurs very frequently in ancient writers. It has been calculated that about thirty persons of this name may be distinguished.' But Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Biogr., the authority for the statement just made (i. p. 310), knows of but two occurrences of the form 'Aristion,' once as the nickname of the adventurer Athenion (B.C. 87), once as designating a surgeon of small repute c. 150 B.C. In Jewish literature only the form 'Aristo' occurs (Jos. Ant. xix. 353 [ed. Niese]). Pape (s.v. 'Aparlan') adds four others from Antiph. vi. 12, Æsch. Idæarais 3. 162, Plut. Num. 9, and Pausanias. Patristic literature knows only the form 'Aristo' in Christian legend (Acta Barn. xiv. ed. Tisch. p. 68, knows a Christian host Aristio in Cyprus; Acta Petri, ed. Lipsius, p. 51, 14-53. 13, one in Puteoli; Constit. Apost. vii. 46, ed. Lagarde, p. 228, 21, gives to the first and third bishops of Smyrna the name Aristio). The form 'Aristion' is unknown. Eusebius himself (HE iv. 6) draws his account of the devastation of Judea in the insurrection against Hadrian (132-135) from a certain Aristio of Pella. This writer, accordingly, would be a contemporary of Papias in position to be referred to as a traditor of Apostolic teaching. To speak of him and 'the Elder John,' if by the latter were meant John the elder of the Jerusalem Church (Eus. HE iv. 6; cf. Schlatter, Kirche Jerusalems, 1898, p. 40), whose death is dated by Epiphanius (Har. lxvi. 20) in the 19th year of Trajan, as 'disciples of the Apostles,' would involve no greater looseness or exaggeration than we should expect in Asia c. 150 A.D. But as Eusebius gives no account of Aristio's writings, although making it a principal object of his work to describe early Christian authorities, it is probable that Aristio of Pella was not a Christian, but a Jewish or (more probably) pagan writer. To this supposition there is but one serious objection, for the references of Niesphorus (HE iii. 24) and the Paschal Chronicle may admittedly be disregarded as merely reproducing Eusebius. Maximus Confessor, however, in his scholion on the Theol. Mystica of Areopagiticus (c. i. p. 17, ed. Corder), undoubtedly refers to the same 'Aristo of Pella' (Ἀπέρων τῷ Ἰεζαλίῳ) as author of the Christian Dialogue of Jason and Papias, basing his statement on 'the sixth book of the Hypotyposesis of Clement of Alexandria,' who seems to have referred to this 'Jason' as 'mentioned by (ὁ ἀναγράφει) Luke' (Ac 17<sup>2-9</sup>). Only, while the Dialogue is known to Celsus (c. 167), Origen, Tertullian, Cyprian, and Jerome, if not to pseudo-Barnabas and Justin Martyr, and even probably survives in more or less altered form in the Altercatio Simonis et Theophili (TU i. iii. p. 116 ff.; P. Corsen, Altercatio S. et Th. 1890), it is known to none of these as the work of Aristio, nor do any of the later quotations, references, or other evidences indicate that the work in question contained ἀπέρων τῶν τοῦ Κυρίου λόγων (Eus. l.c.). If the name 'Aristo' was ever properly connected with the Dialogue, it circulated only anonymously after A.D. 200, and without the introductory narrative portion which it may have once possessed. The late and unsupported statement of Maximus is therefore much more likely to be due to some misunderstanding of the Hypotyposesis, especially as we have the explicit quotation of the same Aristio of Pella by Moses of Chorene (400-450?) extending to considerable length beyond the portion quoted by Eusebius, accompanied by the statement that Aristio was secretary of Arsaces, king of Armenia, when the latter was sent by Hadrian into Persia (Langlois, Coll. des. Hist. de l'Arménie, i. p. 391 ff., cf. ii. 110, n. 3, and Le Vaillant de Florival, Hist. Arm. ii. 57). Harnack (TU i. 2, p. 125) and Zahn, it is true, reject Moses' quotation as a fabrication; but it contains nothing 'fabulous,' and is defended with reason by Hilgenfeld (Zts. f. v. Th. 1883, p. 8 ff.). Besides this, Stephen of Byzantium, who knows of no Aristio of Pella, mentions an Aristio of Gerasa (less than 25 miles distant) simply as an ἀρτίος πύρρον.

Our conclusion must be that, while direct acquaintance with Papias is quite conceivable, the variant form 'Aristo' in Syriac and Armenian sources is best accounted for by a mistaken identification of this Aristio of HE iv. 6 with the 'Elder Aristion' of HE iii. 39 and Moses of Chorene.

4. The Appendix of Mark.—The most important addition to our data regarding Aristio was made by Conybeare's discovery at Esmiadzia in 1893 of an Armenian MS. of the Gospels dated A.D. 989, in which the longer ending of Mark (Mk 16<sup>a-20</sup>) has the separate title in red ink, corresponding to the other Gospel titles: 'From the Elder Aristio' (Expositor, Oct. 1893, pp. 241-254). This representation, though late, Conybeare takes to be based on very early authority (Expositor, Dec. 1895, pp. 401-421), appealing to the internal evidence of the verses in question. Undeniably the reference in Mk 16<sup>a</sup> to drinking of poison with impunity must have literary connexion with Papias' anecdote regarding Justus Barsabbas (Eus. HE iii. 39), whatever the source. Conybeare's citation of a gloss 'against the name Aristion' in a Bodleian 12th cent. codex of Rufinus' translation of this passage, which referred to this story of the poison cup, was even (to the discoverer's eye) a designation by the unknown glossator of Aristion as author of this story. But, besides the precariousness of this inference, it would scarcely be possible to write a gloss 'against the name Aristion' which would not be equally 'against the name of the Elder John' immediately adjoining; and as medieval legend reported the story of the poison cup of John (s.e. the Apostle, identified with the Elder in the glossator's period) this would seem to be the more natural reference and meaning of the gloss.

The evidence connecting the Appendix of Mark with the name 'Aristo' is thus reduced to the statement 'inserted by an afterthought' by the Armenian scribe John, A.D. 989, over Mk 16<sup>a-20</sup>, which he had attached, contrary to Syriac and Armenian tradition, to his text of the Gospel. This, however, is unquestionably important, especially if, as Conybeare maintains, 'it must have stood in the older copy transcribed.' The statement has been generally received at its face value, but with different identifications of 'the Elder Aristo.' Resch ('Ausserkanonische Paralleltexte,' TU x. 3, 1894, p. 449; Eng. tr. by Conybeare in Expos. 4th ser. x. [1894], pp. 226-232) regards Aristo of Pella as the only personality open to consideration as author of the Appendix. Hilgenfeld (Ztschr. f. wissenschaftl. Theol. xxxvii. 1894, p. 627) stands apparently alone in identifying the 'Aristion' of Papias with Aristo of Pella, 'a notable contemporary of Papias,' and refusing to the Aristo of the Ecmiadzin codex any significance beyond that of 'some Elder Aristo or other before c. 500 A.D., from whom a Syriac MS will have borrowed Mk 16<sup>28-29</sup>' (regarded by Hilg. as the original ending). Other critics regard it as 'practically certain' that the Mark-Appendix is really taken from the authority referred to by Papias. Harnack sets the example of peremptorily refusing the suggestion of Resch (TU x. 2, p. 453 ff.), that this 'Elder Aristo' may be no other than Aristo of Pella, but gives no other reason than the date (c. 140); which, as he rightly says, is irreconcilable with the (disputed) phrase οὗ τοῦ Κυρίου μαθητῆ (Chron. i. p. 269; on the textual question, see above, § 2). Zahn (Theol. Literaturzt., 22nd Dec. 1893 [Eng. tr. by Conybeare in Expos. l.c.] regards it as a conclusive objection to Resch's identification that 'Aristo of Pella, who wrote his (?) Dialogue of Jason and Papias after 135, and perhaps a good deal later, cannot be the author of a section (Mk 16<sup>28-29</sup>) which Tatian already read in his Mark at the latest in 170, and which Justin had already known so early as 150, though perhaps not (N.B.) as an integral part of Mark.' We may inquire later what authority the scribe John may have had for his insertion of the title.

5. Internal evidence of the Appendix.—The impression of Westcott and Hort (Gr. NT. ii. p. 51), corroborated by Conybeare (Expositor, 1893, p. 241 ff.), that the Appendix to Mark is not the original full narrative, but an excerpt, constitutes the next step in the solution of our problem. In particular, a real contribution is made by Zahn (Gesch. Kan. ii. App. xiv. 1a, and Forsch. vi. § 3, p. 219) in the demonstration that Jerome (c. Pelag. ii. 15, ed. Vall. ii. 758) had access to it in a fuller, more original form; for he adds after v. 14 'Et illi satisfaciebant dicentes: Saeculum istud incredulitas et incredulitatis substantia (cod. Vat. 1. 'sub Satana') est, que (l. qui) non sinit per im-mundos spiritus veram Dei apprehendi virtutem; idcirco jam nunc revela justitiam tuam' (cf. Ac 19). Jerome's source for this material, whose Hebraistic expressions and point of view confirm its authenticity, becomes a question of importance.

This source can scarcely have been the Dialogue of Jason and Papias, whoever its author; for while Jerome was acquainted with this work (Com. on Gal 3<sup>23</sup>, and Quaest. Heb. in lib. Gen., beginning), and while Celsus, who also used it, twice quotes the substance of Mk 16<sup>9</sup> (c. Cels. ii. 55 and 70), the nature of the work, so far as ascertainable, was not such as to admit material of this kind. Besides, we have seen that by all early authorities it is treated as anonymous. Zahn's supposition (Forsch. vi. p. 219) has stronger evidence in its favour, and still leaves room to account for the points of contact between the Appendix, the Dialogue, Celsus, and Jerome. According to Zahn, 'The ancient book in which Mk 16<sup>9-28</sup> was extant independently of the Second Gospel, and whence it was drawn by transcribers of Mark, can only have been the work of Papias, in which it was contained as a διήγησις of Ariston (sic). But Jerome, he holds, obtained his version indirectly, through his teacher Apollinaris of Laodicea. This explanation has in its favour certain evidences adduced by Conybeare (Expositor, Dec. 1893), to connect the cancellation of Mk 16<sup>28-29</sup> in Armenian MSS with knowledge derived from Papias of its true origin. In particular, the same Ecmiadzin codex which attributes the Appendix to 'the Elder Aristo' has a version of the Pericope Adulteræ (Jn 7<sup>53-81</sup> TR) independent of the received form, briefer, but with the explanatory comment after Jn 8<sup>8</sup> 'To declare their sins; and they were seeing their several sins on the stones.' Echoes of this addition are traceable in Jerome (Pelag. ii. 17), in uncial U, and perhaps elsewhere. Moreover, Conybeare's contention that this 'represents the form in which Papias . . . gave the episode,' is strongly supported by Eusebius' statement of what he found in Papias ('a story about a woman accused of many sins before the Lord, which the Gospel according to the Hebrews contains'). This applies to the Ecmiadzin text only ('A certain woman was taken in sins, against whom all bore witness,' etc. Cf. Eus. HE iii. 39). It has some further support in the express statement of Vartan (14th cent.) that this pericope was derived from Papias, though this may be merely dependent on Eusebius. Conybeare's suggestion that the story will have been one of the 'traditions of the Elder John,' and for this reason have become attached in most texts to the Fourth Gospel, is more probable than Zahn's attributing it to 'Aristion'; but see Blass, Philology of the Gospels, p. 156, who thinks it was simply appended at the end of the Gospel canon.

The Ecmiadzin Codex, accordingly, in the two most important questions of Gospel text makes a deliberate departure from the received Armenian tradition, in both cases relying on authority which might conceivably go back indirectly to Papias himself. (1) Until about this date (A.D. 989) Armenian tradition followed the Sinaitic, or older Syriac, in omitting the Mark-Appendix. In the 10th cent. it begins to be inserted as in the Curetonian and Tatian, but with various scribal notes of its secondary character. Our codex is simply more exact and specific than others of its time in adding a datum which could never have gone with the Appendix, but must have been derived, like the comment of Vartan on the Pericope Adulteræ, from comparison of Eusebius, which in the Arm. spells the name 'Aristo' and expressly designates him as 'Elder.' (2) It also goes beyond current Armenian tradition regarding Jn 8<sup>8-11</sup>. Instead of attaching the story after Lk 21<sup>28</sup>, as the Gosp. acc. to the Hebrews probably suggested, it adopts the position usually assigned it after Jn 7<sup>52</sup>, with the marginal scholion in red ink τῆς μοιχαλιῶτος, and an expurgated and embellished text, which Eusebius enables us to identify as that of Papias. To infer from this, however, that the scribe John had actual access to Papias would be rash in the extreme. On the contrary, the evidence is only too convincing that his title is based simply on a comparison of the two Eusebian passages regarding 'Aristo,' with the further statements of his own chief national historian, Moses of Chorene (400-450), regarding the Aristo of Pella quoted by Eusebius in HE iv. 6.

6. Aristo of Pella.—Moses of Chorene (cf. Langlois, l.c.), in writing of the death and obsequies of Ardasches, king and national hero of Armenia, transcribes first the quotation of Eusebius from Aristo of Pella regarding Hadrian's devastation of Jerusalem, to explain how Aristo came to be attached to his (Ardasches') person as secretary; for Ardasches had been sent by Hadrian into Persia. He then continues, quoting professedly from 'the same historian,' an elaborate account of Ardasches' death and obsequies. The connexion of this supplementary quotation, however, is so awkwardly managed as to leave it quite ambiguous to whose person Aristo was attached as secretary. In the text it follows the statement that Hadrian 'established in Jerusalem a community of pagans and Christians whose bishop was Mark. Langlois accordingly makes him secretary of Mark (cf. Eus. HE iv. 6). Zahn understands of Hadrian himself (1). The Ecmiadzin scribe seems to have been of Langlois' opinion, and to have drawn the inference that this Aristo, secretary of Mark the bishop of Jerusalem under Hadrian, could be no other than 'the Elder Aristo' of Eus. HE iii. 39, as well as the natural completer of 'Mark's' Gospel.

If the attribution of Mk 16<sup>23-28</sup> to 'the Elder Aristo' be dismissed as untrustworthy, our knowledge of the 'Aristion' from whom Papias derived (indirectly) his 'accounts of the Lord's sayings' is reduced to a minimum. Eusebius clearly did not identify him with Aristo of Pella, and from his silence would seem to have known nothing more about him than the statement of Papias that he was an elder, one of the 'disciples of the Apostles'; or, as his text of Papias would seem already to have read (by assimilation to the preceding), 'of the Lord.' Aristo of Pella, Eusebius certainly did not include in his chain of Christian writers, and save for the late and improbable statement of Maximus Confessor, all that we know of Aristo indicates that he does not belong there. He may, or may not, be the same as 'the cultured rhetorician Aristo of Gerasa.'

7. Conclusions.—The following may be taken as more or less probable conclusions from the foregoing data. (1) In the famous extract of Eusebius from Papias and the adjoining context (HE iii. 39), there is no warrant for substituting the reading 'Ἀρίστον', the common form of the name, for the rarer form Ἀριστίων. The Syriac, followed by Arm., assimilates it to Ἀπίστον (ὁ Πιελάλιος), quoted a few paragraphs farther on by Eusebius himself (HE iv. 6), or perhaps merely falls into the ordinary spelling. The reverse process is inconceivable. Of this Aristion, Eusebius seems unable to relate anything beyond what he found in Papias. He certainly did not regard him as identical with Aristo of Pella, whose narrative of the revolt of Bar Cochba was in his hands. Papias, however, knew of Aristion as a traditor (orally; cf. ὁ γὰρ ἐκ τῶν βιβλίων, κ.τ.λ.) of the teachings of the Apostles, himself 'one of the disciples of these,' probably in Palestine, since Papias obtained his traditions (Eusebius to the contrary notwithstanding) only from 'those who came his way.' Aristion was still living at the period of Papias' (youthful? καλῶς ἐμνημόνευσε) inquiries.

(2) From this otherwise unknown 'Aristion' of Papias we must sharply distinguish 'Aristo of Pella,' the historian of the revolt of Bar Cochba, quoted by Eusebius. Had this been a Christian writer, it is inexplicable that Eusebius, in spite of the avowed purpose of his book, elsewhere so consistently followed, should have omitted all mention whatsoever of his works. The Viri Illust. of Jerome is equally silent.

(3) The process of confusion of Papias' Aristion with Eusebius' Aristo of Pella begins with the Syriac translator (c. 400), followed by the Armenian; or, if Maximus Confessor be right in attributing to Clement's Hypotyposis the (conjectural?) assignment of the anonymous Dialogue of Jason and Papias to this author, perhaps with Clement. The late and unsupported statement of Maximus (c. 600), quite in conflict with all that is known either of the Dialogue or the writer, is really valueless.

(4) The Armenian historian Moses of Chorene (5th cent.?) appears really to have known, as he claims, Aristo of Pella. His quotation, where it goes beyond that of Eusebius, shows more and more manifestly the secular, non-Christian writer. His statement that Aristo was secretary of Ardasches, which was so unfortunately ambiguous as to seem to make him secretary of Mark, bishop of Jerusalem, seems to be the starting-point for the last stage of the process.

(5) The scribe 'John' who wrote the Armenian Codex of the Gospels in A.D. 989 (found by Conybeare at Ecmiadzin), departed from previous Armenian tradition by appending, after the row of discs by which he had marked the end of the Gospel of Mark, at Mk 16<sup>8</sup>, the spurions ending vv. 9<sup>28</sup>, literally translated from the ordinary Greek text. To justify this unusual insertion, he crowded in 'by an afterthought' between the first line and the row of discs, in small, cramped, red letters, the title 'Of the Elder Aristo.' That he knew the Eusebian passage about Papias' informant is indicated by his use of the title 'Elder' and the form 'Aristo'; for only the Armenian Eusebius has these peculiarities. That he should have identified the writer of the Markan appendix with 'the Elder Aristo' is most probably explained by his finding in Moses of Chorene what he took to be the statement that Aristo (of Pella) was secretary of Mark, the bishop of Jerusalem, in the time of Hadrian. Who indeed should venture to complete Mark's unfinished Gospel, if not his secretary?

B. W. BACON.
 ARMOUR.—Lk 11<sup>22</sup> speaks of the σωρηθία (serayia, in Gospels; also Eph 6<sup>11-13</sup>, with which cf. 1 Th 5<sup>8</sup>) of 'the strong man' = the Wicked One—the def. art. ὁ (v. 21) indicating a single and definite person. The 'armour' is the potent influences at his disposal, called by St. Paul (Eph 6<sup>11</sup>) 'wiles' and (6<sup>16</sup>) 'fiery darts,' by which he deludes and overcomes. Trusting to these, he with his possessions is 'at peace' until 'the stronger than he' (ισχυρότερος αὐτοῦ [cf. Lk 3<sup>31</sup>]) comes on the scene, when the armour is taken away and he is spoiled of his possessions.

The passage has a soteriological and an eschatological bearing. (1) It points to the power of Christ as able to dislodge evil passions and habits from the heart (cf. Mt 10<sup>28</sup> et pass.). He is 'stronger' than 'the strong man,' and has 'power to heal' (Lk 5<sup>17</sup>). He thus fulfils the prophecy of Is 49<sup>24, 25</sup> and 53<sup>7</sup>, delivering the prey and dividing the spoil. (2) Eschatologically it points to the final victory of good over evil. Cf. Col 2<sup>4</sup>, where we have the word ἀνεκδιαιρέτως (cf. Lightfoot's note, in loc.). The 'stronger' had already come into the 'strong one's' house and had delivered many; the conflict was continued by Him and against Him till His death, when He overcame him that had the power of death; the same conflict of evil against good is still continued, His 'spoiling' is going on, He is still taking from His adversary one and another of his possessions, till in the end He shall bind him in the abyss and utterly destroy him (cf. esp. 1 Co 15<sup>26-27</sup> and Rev 19<sup>11-14</sup>).

For passages descriptive of Roman armour of the time, in Polybius and Josephus, see Hastings' DB, s.v.; cf. also Martial, Epigr. ix. 57. With these St. Paul's description of the Christian's armour is in close harmony; but to find a 'diabolic' significance in the several details is rather fanciful than helpful.

also foretells (Lk 21<sup>20</sup>) the day when 'Jerusalem shall be compassed with armies' (συναρπάζεσθαι). Otherwise there is little allusion to armies in the Gospels, and comparatively small use is made of lessons or figures drawn from military life. The Roman soldier, the legionary, did not loom very large in Palestine. When the Church spreads into the Province Asia, to Rome and Corinth, the impression of the army of Rome is much stronger both in the incidents of the Acts and in the figurative allusions of the Epistles.

John the Baptist found soldiers (see art. SOLDIER) among the crowds who came to him to be baptized (Lk 3<sup>14</sup>); and the most remarkable bond of union between the military character and the character conformed to God, that of discipline and orderly subordination, was suggested to our Lord by the conduct of a centurion (Lk 7<sup>9</sup>).

ARREST (Jn 18<sup>11</sup>—Mt 26<sup>57-68</sup>—Mk 14<sup>48-62</sup>—Lk 22<sup>47-63</sup>). —When Judas, withdrawing from the Supper, betook himself to the high priests and informed them that he was ready to implement his agreement (see BETRAYAL), their simplest way would have been to accompany him back to the upper room and there arrest Jesus. It was, however, impossible for them to proceed thus summarily. They had, indeed, the officers of the temple at their command (cf. Jn 7<sup>53</sup>), but those were insufficient, since the Law forbade them to go armed on the Passover day,* and, though Jesus and the Eleven were defenceless, He was the popular hero, and should an alarm be raised, the multitude would be aroused and would come to the rescue. Moreover, had they taken such a step on their own authority, they would have offended the procurator, Pontius Pilate, who was ever jealous for the maintenance of order; especially at the festival seasons; and it was of the utmost moment that they should secure his sympathy and co-operation. Accordingly, though doubtless impatient of the delay, they first of all appealed to him and obtained from him a detachment of soldiers from Fort Antonia, under the command of a tribune.

The Roman garrison at Jerusalem consisted of a single cohort (στρατη), i.e. 600 men (cf. Schürer, III p. 11, p. 55). ἑσπέρην (in 18<sup>19</sup>) does not, of course, imply that the entire cohort was despatched on the errand. Cf. such phrases as 'call out the military,' 'summon the police.'

Ere all was arranged several hours had elapsed. Jesus had quitted the upper room and the city; but the traitor knew whither He had gone, and led the way to the garden on Mount Olivet, where each night during the Passion-week the Master had bivouacked with the Twelve in the open (Lk 22<sup>39</sup>). It was a motley band that followed Judas. The soldiers would march in order, but the temple-servants, armed with cudgels and carrying lamps and torches, gave it the appearance of a more rabble (cf. Mt 26<sup>47</sup>—Mk 14<sup>48</sup>—Lk 22<sup>47</sup>). And with the rest, forgetting their dignity in their eagerness to witness the success of their machinations, went some of the high priests, the temple-captains,† and the elders.

* Mishna, Schoḥ. vi. 4: 'No one shall go out with sword or bow, with shield or sling or lance. But if he go out, he shall be guilty of sin.'

† Lk 22<sup>52</sup> στρατηγῶν τοῦ ἱεροῦ, the 01119, officials next in dignity to the priests, charged with the preservation of order in the temple. Cf. Schürer, III p. 11, p. 267 ff.

When he had guided the band to the garden, Judas doubtless would fain have kept in the background, but he was doomed to drink his cup of degradation to the dregs. It was the business of the soldiers to make the arrest, but they did not know Jesus, and, seeing not one man but twelve, they were at a loss which was He. It was necessary that Judas should come forward and resolve their perplexity. Casting shame to the winds, he gave them a sign: 'The one whom I shall kiss is he. Take him.' Then he advanced and, greeting Jesus with feigned reverence: 'Hail, Rabbi!' kissed Him effusively.* It was the climax of his villainy, and Jesus repulsed him with a stinging sentence. 'Comrade!' He cried, in that one word summing up the traitor's baseness; 'to thine errand.'† Brushing the traitor aside, He stepped forward and demanded of the soldiers: 'Whom are ye seeking?' 'Jesus the Nazarene,' they faltered. 'I am he,' He answered, making perhaps to advance towards them and surrender Himself; and, overawed by His tone and bearing, they retreated and fell on the ground.

* Unless, says St. Jerome,† 'He had had even in His countenance something sidereal, the Apostles would never have followed Him at once, nor would those who had come to arrest Him have fallen to the ground.' It is, however, unnecessary to assume a miracle. Cf. the consternation of the mercenary soldier who came, sword in hand, to kill C. Marius at Minturnae. The chamber in which he happened to be lying having no very bright light but being gloomy, it is said that the eyes of Marius appeared to dart a great flame on the soldier, and a loud voice came from the old man: 'Darest thou, fellow, to slay C. Marius?' So the barbarian immediately rushed out, crying: 'I cannot kill C. Marius!'‡ It is related of John Bunyan that once, as he was preaching, a justice came with several constables to arrest him. 'The justice commanded him to come down from his stand, but he mildly told he was about his Master's business, and must rather obey His voice than that of man. Then a constable was ordered to fetch him down; who coming up, and taking hold of his coat, no sooner did Mr. Bunyan fix his eyes steadily upon him, having his Bible then open in his hand, but the man let go, looked pale and retired; upon which said he to his auditors, 'See how this man trembleth at the word of God!' And John Wesley was once assailed by a gang of ruffians. 'Which is he? which is he?' they cried, not recognizing him in the press. 'I am he,' said Wesley, confronting them fearlessly; and they fell back and let him go unmolested.

Jesus reiterated His question: 'Whom are ye seeking?' and, when they answered again: 'Jesus the Nazarene,' He once more gave Himself up to arrest, adding an intercession for the Eleven: 'If ye are seeking me, let these men go their way.' Recovering themselves, the soldiers seized Him, and, as they were proceeding to bind Him, the more roughly perhaps that they were ashamed of their weakness, the indignation of the disciples mastered their alarm, and Peter, with the courage of despair, drew a sword which he carried under his cloak|| and, assailing a slave of the high priest named Malchus, cut off his right ear. An uproar ensued, and the disciples must have paid the penalty of the rash act had not Jesus intervened. Working His hands free from the cords and craving a brief release: 'Let me go—just thus far,' He touched the wounded ear and healed it.¶ The miracle occasioned a diversion; and, while his mates were crowding about Malchus, Jesus reasoned with His excited followers. 'Put the sword into its sheath,' He commanded Peter. 'The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it? Dost thou suppose that I cannot appeal to my ¶ Cf. Lk 22<sup>38</sup>. Chrysostom thinks that these μαχαίραι were the knives (καταβύζων may mean either sword or knife) which Peter and John (cf. Lk 22<sup>35</sup>) had used in slaying and dressing the Paschal lamb. It evinces their sense of impending peril that they carried the μαχαίραι despite the legal prohibition.

¶ This miracle is recorded by Luke alone, but the immutability of Peter from instant vengeance is inexplicable without it.

Father, and he will even now send to my support more than twelve legions of angels (i.e. one for Himself and one for each of the Eleven)? How then are the scriptures to be fulfilled that even thus it must come to pass? St. Chrysostom* finds here an allusion to the destruction of Sennacherib's army (2 K 19<sup>9</sup>): If a single angel smote that host of 185,000 armed men, what could this rabble do against 72,000 angels?

Anxious to avert attention still further from the Eleven, Jesus addressed Himself to the Jewish rulers who with their officers had accompanied the soldiers. 'As though against a brigand,' He said scornfully, 'have ye come forth with swords and cudgels? Daily in the temple I was wont to sit teaching, and ye did not arrest me.' What had kept them from arresting Him in the temple-court? It was fear of the multitude (cf. Mt 26<sup>5</sup>= Mk 14<sup>1</sup>= Lk 22<sup>2</sup>). And they were cowards still, coming forth with an armed band against a defenceless man. It was a stroke of biting sarcasm, and they felt the sting of it. Apparently it provoked them to violence. At all events the Eleven were at that moment stricken with sudden panic, and 'all forsook him and fled.'

They made good their escape, but the infuriated rulers † laid hands on one who, though not a follower of Jesus, was evidently a friend and sympathizer. St. Mark alone has recorded the incident. A solitary figure (εἰς τῶν) strangely attired had been hovering near during the retroupe—a young man arrayed in a linen sheet ‡ over his undress. When the Eleven took to flight the rulers laid hold on him; and, dropping his garment, he left it in their grasp and escaped undressed. §

Who was he? and why should the Evangelist have recorded an incident which seems merely to introduce an incongruous element of comedy into the tragic narrative? Of all the conjectures which have been offered, ‖ the most reasonable seems to be that he was St. Mark himself (Olshaus, Gode). The conjecture is of recent date, but long ago it was alleged that he was from the house where Jesus had eaten the Passover (Euth. Zieg. Theophyl.); and it may well have been, as Ewald suggests, the house of Mary, that widow lady who resided in Jerusalem with her son John Mark, and showed hospitality to the Apostles in after days (Act 12<sup>12</sup>). Probably Mark had gone to rest that evening after the celebration of the Passover by his household, and, with a foreboding of trouble, had lain awake. He had heard Jesus and the Eleven descend after midnight from the upper room and quit the house, and, hastily rising and wrapping his sheet about him, had anxiously followed after them and the incident was less trivial than it appears. In early days St. Mark bore a singular epithet. He was styled 'the stumped-fingered,' ¶ and in the absence of any reasonable explanation of the epithet it may, perhaps, be conjectured that during the scuffle in Gethsemane his finger had been mutilated by the slash of a sword (see Expos. 1st ser. 1. [1875] pp. 438-440).

ART—There has been in Christian history no antagonism between religion and art as such; though there have been abuses of particular forms of art, and consequent reactions against those abuses. The NT affords little guidance, for it is not concerned with the subject. It is the revelation of a Person, not of a code of rules. It deals with fundamental spiritual facts, and it was not within the scope of the writers of its books to supply disquisitions on art or philosophy or science. Such problems were left to be settled from age to age by the spiritual instinct of a Church, to which Christ promised the abiding presence of the Spirit: the NT has no more to say about art than it has to say about economics or natural science, and therefore it neither praises any of these things nor condemns them; it is concerned with that which underlies them all.

The NT is neutral also in regard to the use of art in the worship of the Temple. The Jews were not an inartistic nation, though they had not the genius for art of some other races: they had music, poetry, sculpture, architecture, and the usual minor arts of their time; and, though in sculpture they were under strict regulations for the prevention of idolatry, this did not prevent them from using graven images within the sanctuary itself, while in the ornaments of their worship they had been guided by elaborate regulations as to form and colour and symbolism. Christianity grew up in these surroundings, and did not find any fault with them. Our Lord condemned the ethical formalism of current religion, but not its art: He condemned the trafficking in the Temple, but not its beauty. Nor did His disciples have anything to say against the art of the pagan cities where they went, though they had much to say about the wickedness: they are silent on the subject, except for a few illustrations from engraving and painting in He 1<sup>8</sup> and 10<sup>1</sup>. It is in the Apocalypse alone that we have any setting forth of visible beauty; and here there is a clearer recognition of the principle of art, because nothing else could express what the writer had to show forth. It is not enough to say that the imagery of the Apocalypse is merely symbolic: all religious art is symbolic. St. John envelops his conception of the highest form of being in an atmosphere of glowing beauty; and a Church which accepted his teaching could hardly mistrust material beauty as a handmaid of religion. It is not therefore to be wondered at that Christian worship, as we know of it after the Peace of the Church, was much influenced by the descriptions of the heavenly worship in the Apocalypse (see, e.g., the recently discovered Testament of our Lord, A.D. 350).

But, if we would find in the NT the final argument in favour of art, we must turn, as Westcott says in his great essay on the subject, to the central message of Christianity—the Word became flesh. Here is the justification and the sanctification of all that is truly human: Christianity embraces all life, and 'the inspiration of the new birth extends to every human interest and faculty.' The old conflict between the spiritual and the material is reconciled by the Incarnation; for by it the visible became the sacrament, or outward sign, of that which is inward and spiritual. Thus, like the Incarnation itself, 'Christian art embodies the twofold conception of the spiritual destiny of the visible, and of a spiritual revelation through the visible. The central fact of the Christian faith gives a solid unity to both truths.' The office of art, Westcott continues, is 'to present the truth of things under the aspect of beauty': the effect of Christianity upon art is that of 'a new birth, a transfiguration of all human powers by the revelation of their divine connexions and destiny'; and thus 'Christian art is the interpretation of beauty in life under the light of the Incarnation.' Thus the Christian artist is a teacher, his art is ministerial, and when it appears to be an end in itself idolatry has begun; his true function is both to interpret the world as God has made it in its beauty, in the light of a deeper understanding of its meaning, and also to embody to men his own visions of the truth—he is not a mirror but a prophet, and love is his guide. Thus he is led through the most patient and reverent regard of phenomena to the contemplation of the eternal'; for 'the beauty which is the aim of Christian art is referred to a Divine ideal. It is not "of the world," as finding its source or its final measure there, but "of the Father," as corresponding to an unseen truth. The visible to the Christian eye is in every part a revelation of the invisible.'

Westcott, however, assumes an 'antagonism of early Christians to contemporary art,' and points to the central message of Christianity as establishing a reconciliation between supposed 'elements of contrast.' Was there, we must ask any such antagonism as a matter of history? When Westcott wrote, Christian archaeology was still in its infancy; much that we now have was still undiscovered, and that which was known was uncertain in date and inaccurately reproduced; notions still held the field which have since been disproved, as, for instance, that which credits the early Church with the wanton destruction of pagan monuments, when, as a matter of fact, the ancient Roman temples were, after the triumph of Christianity, long kept in repair at the expense of the Christian State, as the chief glory of the city.

The question is of great importance, for modern writers frequently condemn Christianity because of its supposed depreciation of humanity. Thus the natural scientist Metchnikoff—writing, as people do, about matters which are outside his province—declares in The Nature of Man that Christianity lowered our conception of human nature, and gives as evidence this statement:—'Sculpture, which played so great a part in the ancient world, and which was intimately associated with Greek ideals, began to decline in the Christian era,—the real truth being, as we shall see, that sculpture had been declining for several generations in pagan hands, and that Christian artists did what they could with the decadent craft.'

Now Westcott himself states that 'the literary evidence is extremely scanty' as regards the relation of Christianity to art; and, writing twenty-two years later, we may add that archaeological evidence all points in the opposite direction to that which he supposed. The literary evidence, indeed, proves little as to the first two centuries, though recent discoveries have increased our knowledge of the 3rd century.

The usual quotations from the Fathers—such as Westcott gives—are, indeed, 'extremely scanty'; but the one extract which does deal directly and definitely with the subject has been curiously overlooked. It is from Clement of Alexandria in the chapter headed 'Human arts as well as Divine knowledge proceed from God' (Strom. i. 4), and is quite final as to Clement's opinion. After pertinently referring to the craftsman Bezalel the son of Uri (Ex 31<sup>2-6</sup>), whose 'understanding' was from God, he proceeds—

'For those who practise the common arts are in what pertains to the senses highly gifted: in hearing, he who is commonly called a musician; in touch, he who moulds clay; in voice, the singer; in smell, the perfumer; in sight, the engraver of devices on seals. . . . With reason, therefore, the Apostle has called the wisdom of God "manifest," which has manifested its power "in many departments and in many modes" (Eph 3<sup>9</sup>, He 11)—by art, by knowledge, by faith, by prophecy—for our benefit. "For all wisdom is from the Lord and is with him forever" (Sir 11), as says the Wisdom of Jesus.'

Though less comprehensive than this admirable statement, the passage to which Westcott himself alludes is also extremely interesting. Clement describes a number of subjects commonly engraved upon seals to which Christians could give a Christian meaning (see CHRIST IN ART), whilst he forbids the use of seals which bear idols, swords, bows, and drinking cups—condemning thus, not art, but idolatry, war, and drunkenness (Procl. iii.

3). Origen's answer to Celsus (c. Cels. viii. 17-20) is often quoted as denying the use of art. He meets Celsus' charge that 'we shrink from raising altars, statues, and temples,' by saying that Celsus 'does not perceive that we regard the spirit of every good man as an altar,' and that Christ is 'the most excellent image in all creation,' and 'that we do refuse to build lifeless temples to the Giver of all life, let anyone who chooses learn how we are taught that our bodies are the temple of God.' This rhetorical answer cannot be taken as denying the use of art by the African Christians: it is a vindication of the spiritual nature of Christian worship, and the 'lifeless temples' must be referred to paganism, since there was nowhere any shrinking from the erection of church buildings. Origen is not concerned with the question of art: he merely denies 'altars, statues, and temples' in the heathen sense.

Even Tertullian, Montanist though he was, is clear in not condemning artists for practising their art, though he has a good deal to say about their making idols; the artist who makes idols works 'illicitly' like Hermogenes, who 'despises God's law in his painting' (adv. Hermog. 1). An artist's profession was full of temptation from heathen patrons; so Tertullian warns them that 'every artificer of an idol is guilty of one and the same crime' as he who worships it (de Idol. 3), since to make an idol is to worship it (ib. 6); and he advises them to practise their art in other directions—'gild slippers instead of statues'—'We urge men generally to such kinds of handicrafts as do not come in contact with an idol' (ib. 8). Elsewhere he gives useful testimony by his incidental mention of Christian art work in the painting of the Good Shepherd and other subjects upon chalices (de Pudic. 7 and 10).

This is, in fact, the conclusion to which the literary evidence leads us: the early Christians were told to keep clear of paganism, which ought to be curbed, work was often so closely involved, but they were not told to forswear art.

If we wish to find a condemnation of art as such, we must turn not to Christianity, but to pre-Christian philosophy, and—in spite of all that has been said about the opposition between Hebraism and Hellenism—not to a Jewish but to a Greek writer. Plato knew what art was; he belonged to a race with whom art was not a mere incident but a most important part of life; in describing his ideal city he had to deal with the problem of art, and he settled it by excluding the artist altogether. Beginning with dramatic art, he proceeds, towards the end of the Republic, with a consistent adherence to principle that is as rare now as it was then, to include every form of art in his condemnation. His reasons are three—The artist creates without knowing or caring what is good or bad, and thus separates himself from morality; he is an imitator of appearances, and therefore a long way off the truth; and art, whether poetry or painting or the drama, excites passions which ought to be curbed. Plato fully recognized that if painting is wrong, poetry must be wrong too; and he decided that poetry also must be excluded from the perfect city. He was right at least in this, that all art must stand or fall together; and in the light of his clear thought it is easy to see that the three movements which have appeared in Christendom—Asceticism, Iconoclasm, and Puritanism—were not really movements against art. The Christian Church never adopted Plato's position: the ascetic precursors of Monasticism came nearest it, but they formulated no principle beyond that of complete renunciation of the world for the benefit of their own souls, and they did little or nothing to check the lavish decoration of churches which characterized their age.

The Iconoclasts of the Byzantine Empire were often great patrons of architecture, poetry, and the minor arts; and, though they carried their special principle down to the forbidding of pictures of sacred subjects even in books, they did not carry it beyond the question of images. The Puritans, being Englishmen, were naturally less logical than the Greek iconoclasts; thus, they accepted Judaism when it forbade images, and ignored it when it commanded ceremonial: in fact, they disliked art in so far as it embodied ideas which were distasteful to them, and no further. Puritanism was a mingling of the two earlier reactions, asceticism and iconoclasm: it can hardly be taken as embodying a principle of opposition to art.

The question is not, then, one between Puritanism and Catholicism, or between Hebraism and Hellenism, but between Platonism and Aristotelianism. For it was Aristotle who answered Plato; and he did so by pointing out that a true philosophy must make the whole of human nature rationally intelligible; for, the Universe being rationally organized, the existence of art proves that it must have a proper function in life. This is surely the philosophy also of the Incarnation: the Word became flesh, and in that the whole of human nature becomes intelligible; it is good in itself, and in its unstained perfection can become a fit manifestation of the Divine.

Sin, indeed, mars this perfection; and while sin remains, asceticism continues to have its function in the world. The love of the beautiful may degenerate into the lust of the eye, because the inward and spiritual is forgotten, and the sacramentalism of art is lost. It may then become necessary to pluck out the eye that sees, or to cut off the fashioning hand, in order to enter into life; but it is a choice of evils,—the man escapes Gehenna, but he enters into life 'maimed.'

So, though it is better to be maimed than to be lost, better to hate art than to make it a god, hiding the eternal which it should reveal, better, indeed, to break images than to worship them; yet the fulness of truth lies not in the severance, but in the union of the good and the beautiful. They have often appeared as rival tendencies in history. Religious men have often been narrow and inhuman, artists have often been weak in will and the creatures of their emotions, as Aristotle found them; but the one-sidedness of men serves only to illustrate the many-sidedness of truth. Christendom through all her struggles has loved righteousness, and has not forgotten to love art also. She has her fasts, but she has also her feasts.

It is certain as a historic fact that the early Church had no suspicion of art, but accepted without scruple the decorative motives and forms of the classical civilization to which, apart from religion and ethics, she belonged, eliminating only such themes as bore an idolatrous or immoral meaning. Limited at first in her resources, she did not for a while attain to magnificence; but all the evidence of archaeology, which is yearly accumulating, shows that she made use of art so far as she had opportunity. Nor did she try to create an art of her own; she used the art as she used the languages of the empire. The art of the early Church is not Christian in its form, but in its inspiration.

Most of the earliest Christian art that has been discovered is in the Catacombs of Rome. This does not mean, as Westcott supposes, that the Church of Italy was artistic while the rest of the Church was not; still less does it show, as is popularly imagined, that the Roman Christians used the Catacombs as their churches and permanent hiding-places. The art of the Catacombs has survived because it has been preserved underground; but it was not the only art, and the early Christians worshipped above ground like everybody else, except in the case of occasional services for the departed. But hardly anything has survived of the art above ground; in literature we have only hints that stir but do not satisfy the imagination,—as when Eusebius tells us (HE viii. 12) that in times of persecution the churches were pulled down (as by Diocletian in 302), and mentions that the church at Nicomedia, destroyed in 303, was of great size and importance (de Mort. Pers. 12, 'fanum illud editissimum'). At a time when not the buildings only, but the very books of the Christians were destroyed, it was in the burial-places—immune by Roman law from molestation, and hidden away from the ravages of sun and air, and of barbarians ancient and modern—that works of art survived; and to the Catacombs we must turn for our evidence. There is every reason to suppose that the art which we find there is typical of that of the whole Church; for (1) the Christian Churches were bound together by remarkably close ties in the first three centuries; (2) the symbolism of the Catacombs is shown by the early literature to have been that of the rest of the Church also; and (3) there was a uniformity of art throughout the empire, of which Rome was the cosmopolitan centre,—an Italian city indeed in which most of the art was executed by Greeks.

Enough description for our present purpose of the paintings in the Catacombs will be found in the article on CHRIST IN ART. To that article, which deals with Christian art on its most important side (the Christological), reference may also be made for illustrations from the other arts which are here more briefly mentioned. It will suffice here to make a few general statements. (1) Pictorial art is found in the earliest catacombs, belonging to a period before the end of the 1st cent., as well as in those of later date; (2) the first Christians must have been fond of art to use it so freely in the dark; the cubicula of the Catacombs, which were only visited occasionally, and where nothing could be painted or seen except by lamp-light, must represent art at its minimum. Yet that art is both good and abundant. (3) Among the very earliest examples, figures are included as well as merely decorative subjects of animals, flowers, etc. (4) The art is the highly developed art of the Roman Empire, which was at its height in the 1st and 2nd centuries, and declined after the reign of Hadrian. (5) The art of the Catacombs is therefore Christian only in that it generally represents Christian subjects, and that it acquires almost at once a certain marked character of mystic symbolism which is peculiar to the ages of persecution. Certainly there is something about this early painting which at once distinguishes it as Christian. Its authors were intent on expressing ideas,—not the technical theology of an ecclesiastical system, but the faith and hope of ordinary Christian people,—therefore they use suggestion and symbol, and are fond of a conventional treatment even of Scripture subjects, and thus their work is marked by a quiet reserve that excludes all reference to the sufferings and death of the martyrs, and dwells upon the life and power of Christ, not upon His death and passion. This art is marked by simplicity, happiness, and peace; it deals only with such OT and NT and other subjects as could bear a mystical interpretation in connexion with the deliverance and happiness of the departed through the power of Christ and the grace of the sacraments. It is sometimes of a high technical order and of great beauty, though the difficulties of its execution led to its being often sketchy in character. Born full-grown in the 1st cent., it passed in the 2nd into this second mystical period, declining after the 2nd cent. gradually in technique, as the pagan art was declining. After the Peace of the Church in the 4th cent. it passes into its third period, when its symbolism is more obvious, more didactic and dogmatic.

Sculpture naturally does not appear so early as painting. The dark catacombs were no place for its display, though in them it has its beginnings in the graffiti or incised designs which are common on the tombs. These were easily to be seen, and could be wrought on the spot, which was an important consideration in days when it was difficult to order Christian sculpture from pagan shops. It would be an easier matter to have executed in the public studios a subject that could bear a pagan interpretation; and thus it is that we do find a statue of the Good Shepherd which probably belongs to the 3rd cent., though one would naturally expect Christians who lived in pagan times to be shy of the use of statuary. In the 4th cent. the growing custom of burial above ground, coupled with the prosperity of the Church, encouraged the use of sculptured sarcophagi (cf. CHRIST IN ART). Excellent carved ivories are also found at this period, but art had been steadily declining since Hadrian's time, and after the 6th cent. no good sculpture of any sort is found. There was no opposition to it in the West, but in the East the Iconoclastic controversy (716-867) led to the wholesale destruction of 'images,' whether painted or carved; and though it ended in the restoration of pictures, there was a tacit compromise by which statues were not restored, in spite of the decision in favour of 'images' by the Second Council of Nicea (787). This renunciation of statuary in the Eastern Church grew into a passionate aversion to its use inside a place of worship,—an aversion which continues still.

Among the minor arts may be mentioned that of gold-glass, which commenced early in the 3rd cent., and has preserved for us many Christian pictures and symbols. Miniature illustration came into general use in the 4th cent. in MSS of books of the Bible; it was not decorative like that of the Middle Ages; the miniatures were separated from the text, and were devoted to giving pictures of the Scripture events described, much as in present-day book illustration. The handicrafts of pottery, metal, and jewel work, etc., gradually adopted Christian symbolism,—thus it first appears on lamps in the 3rd century. The magnificence of church plate after the Peace of the Church almost passes belief. An early instance is given in the Pilgrimage of Sylvia (A.D. 385), which was discovered in 1888.

'It is needless,' she says, describing her experiences in Syria, 'to write what was the ornamenting on that day of the Church of the Anastasis, or of the cross in Jerusalem or in Bethlehem; for there you would see nothing but gold and gems or silk; for if you see the veils, they are all of silk, with stripes of gold; if you see the curtains, they are the same. Every kind of gold and gemmed vessel is used on that day. It is impossible to relate the number and weight of the lights, tapers, and lamps and other utensils. And what shall I say of the adornment of the fabric, which Constantine, with all the power of his kingdom, in the presence of his mother, honoured with gold, mosaic, and precious stones?'

With this may be compared the gifts, recorded in the Liber Pontificalis, which Constantine made to certain churches; among them he gave to St. Peter's '3 golden chalices with emeralds and jacinths, each having 45 gems and weighing 12 pounds'; and 'a golden paten with a tower of purest gold, with a dove adorned with emeralds and jacinths, and 215 pearls, weighing 30 pounds'; while to St. John Lateran he gave no fewer than 174 candlesticks and chandeliers of various sorts, as to which Fleury reckons that altogether they furnished 8730 separate lights. These figures suggest a magnificence of the surroundings of worship that is far removed from the simple two-handled cup of the 2nd cent. fresco of the Fractio Panis. None the less, the fact that Constantine's gift was made shows that there was no tradition of dislike to such magnificence. Such descriptions bear out the general impression that the early Church made free use of whatever richness of art her opportunities could provide, though when necessity required she was content, as Jerome says, 'to carry the body of Christ in a basket of osiers and His blood in a cup of glass.'

Mosaic art, of which there are extant such splendid examples in the churches of the Imperial cities, Rome and Ravenna and Constantinople, followed upon architecture, and flourished between the 4th and 7th centuries. Its magnificence and durability make it to us the most characteristic feature of the Christian art of that period. The principal subjects represented are the great figures of Christ enthroned, figures of the Apostles and other saints, apocalyptic and other symbolic subjects, scenes from the Old and New Testaments, and pictures of imperial personages and bishops.

In architecture there have been many theories as to the origin of the basilica. It is now very generally agreed that the Christian church is a development of the classical atrium, the central colonnaded court of dwelling-houses in the Imperial age. The earliest gatherings for worship took place in the atrium of some wealthy convert, and were thus surrounded with all the greater and lesser arts of the period. Now, the Greek and Roman temples were constructed for a worship in which both the altar and the worshippers stood outside. The Christian worship began in the home (Ro 16<sup>9</sup> and perhaps Ac 2<sup>40</sup>), and the purpose of the earliest churches was to hold a large number of worshippers before the Lord's Table; thus, though the style was that of the age, the manner of its use was different from the first. The basilica is a distinctively Christian building, marked out by its oblong shape, clerestory, colonnaded aisles, and apse. It was probably in process of development in the centuries before the Peace of the Church,—we read, e.g., of church buildings in the newly found Canons of Hippolytus, c. 220-250 A.D.,—though no extant edifice is known (unless the startling theory just put forth by Dr. Richter and Mr. C. Taylor in their books on S. Maria Maggiore in Rome comes to be accepted—the theory being that this church and its mosaics belong to the 2nd century). The churches destroyed by Diocletian were rebuilt under Constantine, and it is to the Constantinian period that the earliest surviving basilicas belong, whether in Italy, Syria, or Africa. In the East there was later one marked development, the use of the dome, which culminated under Justinian in St. Sofia, and has continued to be characteristic of the Greek and Russian churches down to our own day. In the West the basilica continued unchanged till the 8th, and in some parts till the 10th cent., when it was modified by the growth of what is called Romanesque architecture, of which Gothic is but a development; but the main features of the basilica—nave, clerestory, aisles, projecting sanctuary, and often transepts—remain unchanged to-day.

The decline of Western art in what are called the Dark Ages is often attributed to Christianity and its supposed hatred of human nature. The truth is, that while Byzantium maintained a high culture far better and longer than used to be supposed, the whole Roman civilization well-nigh disappeared under the invasions of the northern races; these peoples were converted and gradually civilized by Christianity, and, as their civilization grew up, their art developed from the barbaric stage till it culminated in the perfection of Gothic. That art in its development had the limitations of the young races; it developed more rapidly in architecture and architectural carving than in painting or statuary; but all this has nothing to do with Christianity, as writers like Taine suppose.—If one considers the stained glass windows, or the windows in the cathedrals, or the rude paintings, it appears as if the human race had become degenerate, and its blood had been impoverished: pale saints, distorted martyrs, hermits withered and unsubstantial, etc. (Phil. de l'Art, 88, 332, 4th ed.). Passages like this are beside the mark: the art of the Middle Ages was full-blooded enough, and was admirable even in its rude beginnings, when it had not learnt the most difficult of lessons—the representation of the human form. In architecture and the kindred arts the Middle Ages brought a new revelation of beauty into the world,—an art that stands alone, not only for its lofty spirituality and technical excellence, but also for its homely democratic humanity.

Beyond this it is not necessary to go, since we are not dealing with the history of art in general, but only with the relation between it and Christianity. It has been necessary to sketch the beginnings because of the widespread idea that Christianity started with an aversion to the fine arts, and was reconciled to them only as worldliness increased upon her. Modern archaeology has proved this idea to be mistaken; and, having pointed out what is now known as to the early use of art by the Church, we need not follow the subsequent history of painting and sculpture, of architecture and the handicrafts, in their developments and decadences, except to say that, though art in the Christian era has been sometimes rude and sometimes pagan, it has at its best—when most perfect in technique and most imbued with spiritual purpose—excelled all else that the world has been able to produce: even the perfect statuary of Greece was outrivalled by such an artist as Michael Angelo, who reveals not only the body but the soul within the body also. The best Christian art is better than anything that has gone before, because it has more to express.

Christendom, then, began its career in natural association with art; and art is Christian, not by reason of any peculiarity of style, but when it is informed by the Christian ideal. Art is not an end in itself, but a language; the greatest artificers, like the greatest writers, are those who have the greatest things to say, and the fineness of any art is, as Ruskin says, 'an index of the moral purity and majesty of the emotion it expresses.' Pagan reaction has, indeed, more than once taken refuge in art, as it has also taken refuge in science; but the fault does not lie in either. There must always be reaction when the Church refuses to recognize the truth of science or the seriousness of art. And art is serious, for it is one of man's primal gifts, and, like nature, one of his most constant educators. Art is necessary because, in Ruskin's words, 'life without industry is guilt, and industry without art is brutality'; and though, as he found, religious men in his time despised art, they despised it at the peril of religion. He was himself the greatest exponent of the religious mission of art and of its moral value. And his conclusion was that the root of all good art lies in 'the two essential instincts of humanity, the love of order and the love of kindness, the one associated with righteousness, the other with charity. The 'love of beauty,' he proceeds, 'is an essential part of all healthy human nature, and though it can long coexist with states of life in many other respects unvirtuous, it is itself wholly good,—the direct adversary of envy, avarice, mean worldly care, and especially of cruelty. It entirely perishes when these are wilfully indulged.' If this be so, it is indeed of the gospel, and excellent in so far as it is close to the spirit of Christ. If this be so,—and no man had a better right to make bold generalizations on the subject than Ruskin,—artists and preachers can agree in his conclusion that the great arts 'have had, and can have, but three principal directions of purpose: first, that of enforcing the religion of men; secondly, that of perfecting their ethical state; thirdly, that of doing them material service.'

ASA.—A king of Judah (c. 918–878 B.C.), named in our Lord's genealogy, Mt 1<sup>7</sup>.

ASCENSION.—The Ascension is the name applied to that event in which the Risen Christ finally parted from His disciples and passed into the heavens. The traditional view is based on the passage Ac 1<sup>1-12</sup>, supported by Mk 16<sup>19</sup>, Lk 24<sup>49-51</sup> (which narrate the event), Jn 6<sup>62</sup> 20<sup>7</sup> (which look forward to it), Eph 4<sup>8-10</sup>, 1 Th 3<sup>16</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>22</sup>, He 4<sup>14</sup> (which imply it). To the foregoing list many would add references of Christ to His departure (from the context not identifiable with His death), Mt 9<sup>15</sup> 26<sup>11, 28, 64</sup>, Jn 7<sup>26</sup> 14–16; and allusions in Acts, Epistles, Revelation, to Christ being 'seated at the right hand of God' (Ac 2<sup>33</sup> 5<sup>27</sup> 7<sup>55</sup> 13<sup>30-7</sup>, Ph 2<sup>9</sup>, He 1<sup>13</sup> 2<sup>12</sup>, Rev 1<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>7</sup> etc.). The details are drawn from Ac 1: the scene, the Mt. of Olives; the time, forty days after the Resurrection; the occasion, a conversation concerning the Kingdom; the act of parting in being taken up; the vanishing in a cloud; the vision of two men in white apparel and their announcement of His coming again; all indicating a bodily disappearance by an upward movement into the sky.

The bodily Ascension is vindicated as possible, as necessary, and as adequately evidenced.

1. Possibility.—The wonderfulness of the event is not denied, but its acceptance is urged by a varied appeal. Sometimes the reference is to the Divine power operating in the fulfilment of the Divine purpose of salvation. The Ascension is then regarded as part and parcel of the redemptive scheme, and not more wonderful than the other redemptive facts, e.g. Incarnation, Resurrection, etc. Or the reference is to our ignorance of the physical universe and its constitution. 'Miraculous Christianity' does not 'imply an anti-scientific view of the world' (cf. Goldwin Smith, Guesses at the Riddle of Existence, p. 165). There is a vast uncomprehended region in nature not yet within the sweep of human faculties, which Science has not fathomed and to whose existence she has become recently profoundly sensitive. The world, as science interprets its phenomena, is not the complete world which may hold potentialities permissive of such an event as the Ascension. Or, again, the reference may be to our ignorance of the nature of the ascending body. Grant the cogency of the scientific objection to a body having gravity and normal dimensions rising in upward flight to a distance, is it certain that such was the body of Christ? There are hints which furnish the opposite suggestion. The only sure statement that may be affirmed with regard to it is that it was the same, yet not the same, as the pre-Resurrection body: it was a body which issued from the sepulchre with identity complete, yet physically changed, existing under new conditions of which we have only the faintest apprehension. Physically, the Ascension meant a complete change of conditions, the passing into a mode of existence having no longer direct physical relations with our ordinary experience, whither we cannot follow by the exercise of our sensitive intelligence, and which in our lack of material for comparison we cannot even imaginatively picture. The conjecture, further, is hazarded that if the process of spiritualizing the body was at the time of the Ascension so complete as to render it invisible to ordinary sense, the process of preparing the spiritual perception of the disciples was by that time also complete, so that what was hidden from others was manifested to them. Recent research also into psychical activities, both conscious and sub-conscious, has brought the question into renewed prominence especially among scientific men, and that in no spirit of hostility to the traditional view.

2. Necessity.—The necessity of the Ascension is obvious. It was at once the natural consequence of all that preceded and the only sufficient cause of the marvellous experiences that followed. The resurrection and the forty days demanded its occurrence. Apart from any explicit teaching on the subject during those days, the situation of itself must have provoked reflection and pointed to an exit from earthly scenes not by way of mortal dissolution but rather of glorification. The interval is clearly transitory. The relationship between Jesus and the disciples evinces a certain reserve on His side, a certain surprise and perplexity on theirs. It partakes in all the mystery that hangs over the world of spirits in general, as well as in that pertaining specially to the borderland of that world, the region where thought and matter meet. His appearances are only occasional. His movements are mysterious. His life is not of the bodily order. Whether the theory of progressive spiritualizing be tenable or not,—the conception is very obscure,—the facts of physical transformation and spiritual enhancement are indubitable. The disciples are convinced by the empty tomb and the apparitional body that He had not seen corruption in the grave, yet do not always recognize Him as He appears. He is no longer of them. Their mind must have been challenged again and again to inquire, What next? It was neither fitting that He should die again, nor that He should remain on the earth in His then state: death He had already sounded and survived, while for His departure He had aforetime prepared them. Further, His Person claimed it. His self-consciousness during the earthly ministry, and the teaching it prompted; the definite impression of these on the minds of the disciples leading to the expectation of further developments of His Being; as well as the most distinct intimations of the preparatory character of His present activity, the speciality of His saving mission, the uniqueness of His relation to the Father and heaven,—all combined in an impressive witness to the assurance that not this world but the heavenly life was His proper and rightful sphere, and that until He had attained to it He was not in possession of His own, the glory He had with the Father before the world was, which was as yet for the most part hid, revealing itself only in hints, and which He was bound to re-assume, accentuated, so to speak, with all that virtue He had won in His human nature for bestowal on men. In His human life He had been the subject of development in time,—a development, it is true, not from evil or imperfection to the good and perfect, but from strength to strength, involving living growth, a process prosumably capable of reaching its end. Underlying that process lay His Divine Being, in its inherent power incapable of growth, no attainment but original endowment. The return to the Father in the Ascension-act marked the perfection of the human process in harmonious realization within the Divine powers of His Person.

Still further, the work of Christ remained incomplete without the Ascension. It has been objected against His teaching that it is incomplete as a system and incoherent in its details. There is ground for the complaint. His ministry bears traces throughout of its preparatory character. His teaching is at times parabolic, His acts often typical, His method as much an effort to create a new power of insight as to offer a new sum of truths. He holds out hopes of a more immediate personal, if spiritual, direction, under the force of which a richer fulness of His truth shall be gained. He anticipates future acts of His work which are not simply symbolic of His utterances, but necessary to their interpretation. A future is always with Him: separate from the present in its conditions and gifts and in the nature of His agency, so separate as justly to be entitled to the name of a new 'dispensation.' The Ascension marks the transition. It has no substantial independence. It closes the public ministry; it opens the continuation of that ministry in the new age of the Spirit. It announces that the great human facts necessary to redemption are finished, and that the results are henceforth to be increasingly realized. His saving energies are consummated in His incarnate and glorified Personality: the departure is necessitated that they may not remain a legacy of dead and inoperative information. For this reason the Ascension, as the passing into exaltation, stands at the beginning of the fresh spiritual experiences of the Apostolic age. It explains the extraordinary change in the mind of the Apostles. They felt an intense conviction. Because there had been no loss, their conception of Christ had been cleared, His exaltation seen, His perpetual action promised. Under the new light they proceed to organize the momentous work of the Church. On precisely the same basis they instruct their hearers and develop their doctrine. The centre of the missionary discourses is the Exalted Christ; intimate communion with Him exalted is normative to their thought. That truth fills up their entire consciousness and crushes out every other thought. It forms the firm foundation on which their whole life and mind are built up. They are witnesses to one great fact. The NT documents set forth much in the way of new truths and new ethics, but their distinctive testimony is to a new intense experience, which has altered the entire character of those who share it. That experience is everywhere traced in direct derivation from Christ glorified.

But the Christ glorified is the Jesus of history. The new experience is related to the acts of His life in a vital way. A distinction may be drawn between them, but only as two aspects of one reality, not as two terms, the one of which may be regarded as the mythic symbol of the other. Both terms must be safeguarded. Hence, if the Lord now glorified was once within the conditions of human experience, cognoscible to human faculties, and has passed from them, the question cannot be silenced, How did He pass? The essential point is His passage out of those earthly conditions of life within which He had hitherto been known. Must not such passing have been visible? The bodily Ascension is the answer.

3. Historicity.—The evidence for the Ascension is direct and indirect. (a) The direct witness is meagre. There is but one description that may serve as a basis of fact, viz. the narrative in Ac

1<sup>13</sup>. The other passages (Mk 16<sup>9</sup>, Lk 24<sup>51</sup>) are under the highest critical suspicion as being not original to their texts. They suffer, moreover, under two further disadvantages: their vagueness, their summary character. They appear to give results, being less accounts of detail than confessions of faith. Their value is similar in character to that of the Epistles; they testify to the existence of a widespread crystallized tradition in the first century. Does the record in Ac 1<sup>9</sup> give more? It belongs to the less authentic of the sources of the author. If the author be St. Luke, he cannot be reckoned an eye-witness; but he may furnish the information of an eye-witness. The narrative bears every trace of careful statement and of non-reflective features. Even if indications of idealization of the past occur in this first part of the book elsewhere, there are none here; the phrasing is simple and matter of fact; there is no sentiment, nor sorrow: only a glad vision evoking worship, challenging thought, inspiring courage. The discrepancies between this account and that in Lk. are probably superficial. Bethany lay on the further or eastern slope of the Mt. of Olives, about a mile down from the summit. The road from Jerusalem passed along over the lower wooded ridges, on one of which in all likelihood, just above the village (βασ. π.β.) over against it, the Ascension took place. There was another route leading nearer the summit, on which later tradition sought the site and erected a church. Neither Acts nor Lk. means to give an exact spot. The fragmentariness of the narrative has created difficulty. Several considerations are adduced in reply. For one thing, the Ascension is plainly regarded as belonging to the Resurrection appearances, viz. as the appearance in which Christ's final vanishing took place, and notable simply on that ground. For another, it is pointed out that the NT writers take a view of history which does not correspond to modern requirements. They write not to prove truths denied, but to illustrate truths accepted. They do not seek to prove the occurrence of events or to escape 'discrepancies'; they seek rather to emphasize the significance of events. And to the significance of the Ascension there is abundant reference. A suggestion, again, of great interest as justifying the sparse particulars given in the Gospels, is that a sort of convention forbade the introduction of the theme into a narrative of Christ's life, the Resurrection being regarded as the culminating point of His earthly existence.

(b) The indirect evidence is remarkably strong. Both in the two Gospels which do not record the event and in the Epistles and discourses of Acts as well as in the visions of the Apocalypse it is implied. We thus have reference to the belief in sources for the greater part earlier than the Gospels. St. Matthew represents Christ as foretelling it (23<sup>39</sup>); St. John puts similar foreshadowings into His mouth (6<sup>62</sup> 13<sup>36</sup> 22 14<sup>23</sup> 16<sup>5</sup> 17<sup>12</sup> 23); St. Paul and St. Peter habitually assume it as a fact (Ac 2<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>21</sup> 5<sup>31</sup> 13<sup>30-37</sup>, Eph 4<sup>8-10</sup>, Ph 1<sup>23</sup> 2<sup>29</sup> 3<sup>20</sup>, Col 3<sup>1</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>14-16</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>22</sup>); St. Stephen declares the same (Ac 7<sup>55-56</sup>). The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews is equally explicit (He 2<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>14</sup> 9<sup>24</sup> 7<sup>26</sup> 9<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>12</sup>). In the Apocalypse many passages corroborate (Rev 1<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>6</sup> 14<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>11-15</sup> 22<sup>1</sup>). The conviction of His Ascension fills the mind of the Apostolic age. It is nowhere insisted upon or proved, it is assumed as a fact among the other facts of Christ's life, as consistent with them, and as real. There is no suggestion that it is an ideal historical than the other features described.

4. Modern departures from the traditional view.— Within recent years the traditional view of the Ascension has been vigorously contested in various interests. From the side of naturalistic theory the idea of corporeal ascension has been assailed as absurd. Different rationalistic tendencies have scouted the event as delusion (classical representatives are Roman in France; Strauss in Germany; Baur, Schenkel, or myth, whose growth was natural from the presence of contributory elements in the intellectual and religious atmosphere of the age which were not only not inharmonious with such an idea and event, but even rendered it necessary, (cf. Keim, M. Arnold, 'Supernatural Religion,' etc.). Even the necessities of a true spiritual experience have been urged against it by at least one considerable school (viz. that of Ritschl), which has vastly enriched present-day theological movements by a singularly impressive attempt to interpret the Christian facts through analysis of the ethical experience of the Christian personality, since such experience, it is maintained, best grows and is best explained by communion with the Exalted Christ, conceived not as 'reaching down within the realm of our earthly experience,' but as 'otherwise than we see Him in the mirror of history' (Herrmann, Communion of the Christian with God, Bks. ii., iii.),—a conception to which the Evangelical record as it stands is not adequate. In association with those attempts the relevant textual evidence has been painstakingly sifted and found insufficient (as, e.g., latest by Schmiedel in his Evange. Bibl. article on 'Resurrection and Ascension Narratives'). The departures from the traditional view here referred to are better dealt with under RESURRECTION. Here we may point merely to two considerations. First, the whole controversy between orthodox and liberal thought as to the miraculous features in the history of Christ's life has entered on a new phase. A separation is being made between the 'Jesus of history' and the 'Christ of faith' identified by ecclesiastical dogma. It is admitted that what we have in the Gospel narratives was written after the identification was practically complete. The 'Jesus of history,' therefore, can be resuscitated only by going behind even the oldest historical sources; where, the presumption is, it will be found that the miraculous incidents disappear. The various sources whence the 'myth of Christ' is derivable are inquired into; the ignorance of the times, the manifest prejudices of His biographers, and the natural tendency in Oriental minds to expand fact into fable.* The hypotheses of fraud, or delusion, or vision, previously entertained, are discarded and 'the intellectual atmosphere of the age' substituted. In particular, in the matter of the Ascension emphasis is laid on (a) current Jewish ideas concerning the departure of great men of God; (b) alleged similar ideas in ethnic religions; (c) contemporary apotheosis of the Roman emperors; (d) the natural working of the human mind, venerating a great name, to idealize the life and invest its close with marvel—as all contributory to the belief. Such analogies are pressed with ingenuity. It may be rejoined, however, that in reality they are not in point. Prevailing mental conceptions do not seem even to have favoured the acceptance of the doctrine, not to speak of having originated it. The narratives give the consistent impression of its novelty. It appears as not native, but alien to the disciples' thought. Comparison with the assumption of Enoch and of Moses or the translation of Elijah, or with the deification of the Imperial representative, or with the Buddha-legend, only serves to demonstrate its striking originality. It has a character, place, and use that cannot be assigned to these. It is not in the same plane or in the same department of thought. It possesses an inevitableness, a conscious connexion with previous conditions, a naturalness as another and new aspect of Jesus' life yet continuous with and necessarily complementary to it, which they all alike lack. It lacks their formality, spectacular effect, incoherence with real life. The motives, moreover, which prompted the Senate to give each successive emperor a place among the gods, or the Hindu devotee to regard his hero as divine, are easy to trace: in the former instance political; in the latter, religious indeed, but too naive for the Jew, who had no natural tendency to deify—such a tendency has not been proved, it is incompatible with the exclusive and stubborn monotheism of the race. The belief enshrines in simple and reticent phrase the reception by the disciples of a new fact of His Person, which brings new light and adds new mystery, yet for which they had been prepared.

Secondly, the attempt to separate the Christian facts from Christian experience is not well based. We may rejoice to witness that the life of faith now is the being in Christ in a richer sense than the being with Him before He ascended. The acknowledgment, however, neither disproves the necessity for His life before the Ascension, nor proves the necessity to visualize it after the Ascension. The increase of faith may not, indeed, come by a mere 'return to Jesus' as He was known before His death; but how can He as ascended be fruitfully contemplated by ignoring His earthly existence? Then, again, wherein lay the need for the disciples to give outward form to their emotions more than for us now? The narratives they have given us, it is averred, are due to their spiritual imagination embodying in mythic form their spiritual experience. The disciple lives by faith and not by sight, it is argued, hence Christian experience must dispense with outward events.* There is in both statements a gross exaggeration. The full glory of Christ's Person is, of course, immeasurable: no vision or bodily appearance can possibly exhibit it except in faint traces. Is the vision therefore useless? The contrary is the very principle of the Incarnation; God revealing Himself in personal, eventual form. The Christian facts underlie Christian faith, and make it progressively effective (Westcott, 'Work,' 2). And this because they manifest the Person of Christ, by them His Person is brought within the range of our experience; they are the channel of His communicating His power to us. The facts and the faith are vitally related. They form one reality. They are distinguishable as aspects of that reality, but not to be separated. In explaining the reality it is not legitimate to make the distinction and then proceed to reject one of its terms, resolving, as may happen, on the one hand, the experience into an aftermath of the event; or, on the other, the event into a vivid picture of the experience. In both cases the witness is invalidated by imagination. The second of those tendencies is aggressively in vogue. If carried to its logical issue, it must eviscerate the Ascension-experience of Christ of all objective substance, and expunge the narrative from the gospel. But to do this is to create a lacuna in the facts which will prove intolerable.

On the whole, the new method of psychological analysis of the primitive Church consciousness has brought no new danger. In at least three respects it is beneficial: it has given the coup de grace to earlier negations (cf. Schmiedel in above cited article); it has withdrawn attention from the details to the belief itself as the heart of the question, as the better mind of the Church insists;

* The references in the foregoing section are to the school of Ritschl on the one hand (cf. Herrmann Communion with God, etc.), and to such theistic theologians as Martineau and Estlin Carpenter (cf. the former's Seat of Authority, also sermon on 'Ascension' in vol. entitled National Duties; and the latter's The First Three Gospels).

it has broadened the range of points to be considered, opening the door for a class familiar to traditionalists but hitherto excluded by advanced critical investigation.

5. General consequences for Christian faith.—Belief in Christ's Ascension involves several general consequences of an interesting kind. From the earliest time it was seen, e.g., to be a type of the ascension of all believers. If Heaven is His true abode, it is also theirs; and this as the natural goal of human nature, the end continuous with the beginnings of human life on earth. For Christ, His Ascension was the assumption of His own proper life, the orderly passing into its full exercise and enjoyment; for the Christian, it is the orderly completion of his life recreated in Christ. It is not simply the ideal to be set before his natural life here, and to be realized by modification or development hereafter. The earthly life is renewed by being incorporated into Christ, through whose Spirit a new power enters into it; he is a 'new creature.' But the new creation is his own proper life, to live below it is to degrade his nature. The renewed earthly nature is already begun to be taken into God; like Christ, believers are ascending even here. To this process the ascension is but the natural close. As such it is at once the entering into the heavenly inheritance of blessing and the entering upon the triumph of them that endure.

Again, the Ascension of Christ assures and develops the desire for immortality. It has greatly quickened interest in the hope of life after death, and encouraged the conviction that it will be justified by the event. There are 'natural intimations of immortality.' There is a practically universal remonstrance of the human heart against the grave. The highest knowledge of this world has always been optimistic of reaching a world of solved problems and of realized ideals. The latest gift of science to mankind is the gospel of hope which is contained in the doctrine of evolution, 'man is not man as yet, but in completed man begins anew, a tendency to God' (Ascent through Christ, iii. 3). But of all this there never has been real certainty. The hope is but a longing and an inference at the best. Did Christ actually ascend? The conviction that He did has for centuries been rooted in Christian minds, and has reacted on the general hope. It has assured them that the spirit in man is more powerful than death; it has furnished the proof, as it is the illustration, of man's final destiny. That conviction, be it observed, is not an inference from the general hope. It is a fruit of fellowship with Christ. It is a religious experience: the experience, viz., of men who, united to Christ, share in the power of His Spirit, and by that power enter upon endless life. Further, Christ's Ascension offers a suggestion of important possibilities for the bodily nature. There is to be 'a redemption of our body' (Ro 8<sup>23</sup>); there is 'an image of the heavenly' (I Co 15<sup>49</sup>) we must bear; a 'spiritual body' (v. 44), the 'body of glory' (Ph 3<sup>21</sup>), that will be raised; 'our mortal bodies' are to be 'quickened' (Ro 8<sup>11</sup>). The future life is not to be one of pure spirit; it is to be 'clothed upon' (2 Co 5<sup>2</sup>). In no respect did Christ assume fundamental divergence between His nature and human nature. The Apostolic thought dwells on His oneness with His brethren. Later theology became audacious, and affirmed explicitly, 'Man is to be made God.' Manhood is to be taken up into the Godhead. That the body in some mysterious manner is to participate in this glorification would appear to be necessary, however difficult the conception. The one precedent for the thought is Christ's, whose body was not dissolved but transfigured. See BODY.

LITERATURE.—Milligan's The Ascension and Heavenly Priesthood of Our Lord still remains the most exhaustive book in English on the theological aspects of the subject. Every 'Life of Christ' deals, with more or less fulness, with the event in its historical details; see especially the studies of Fabiański, Gilbert, Farrar, Edersheim. Of brochures, the following are important:—Knowing, Witness of the Epistles, 387-414; Bernard in Expository Times, 1909-1901, pp. 132-155. There may be consulted also: Bruce in *Expos. Gr. A. S. MARTIN.

ASCETICISM.—Asceticism may be defined as a form of self-discipline which consists in the habitual renunciation of the things of the flesh, with a view to the cultivation of the life of the spirit. It is a deliberate attempt to eliminate and uproot the sensuous, to banish it altogether from the sphere of consciousness. It is not content with a doctrine of mere subordination. It does not stop short with teaching men to govern their wants, to subject them to the service of a higher end and purpose. It bids men stifle and suppress them, or at least resist them to the utmost of their ability. The body is represented as the enemy of the soul, and the way of perfection is identified with the progressive extirpation of the natural instincts and inclinations by means of fasting, celibacy, voluntary poverty, and similar exercises of devotion. Hence asceticism may be described as the gospel of negation,—negation of the world and negation of the flesh, each of which is apt to be confounded with negation of the devil.

It is the purpose of the present article to inquire what traces, if any, of such asceticism are to be found in the practice and preaching of Jesus. As a preliminary, however, it will be necessary to notice briefly the main forms of asceticism which were prevalent in Palestine in the time of Christ.

The Jewish ascetics of the 1st cent. may be divided roughly into three classes. (1) First, there were the Essenes, who lived together in monastic colonies, shared all things in common, and practised voluntary poverty. Philo says that they were indifferent to money, pleasure, and worldly position. Their food was limited in quantity and carefully regulated in respect of quality. They ate no animal flesh, drank no wine, and abstained from the use of oil for purposes of anointing. The stricter members of the brotherhood eschewed marriage. The idea of this rigorous asceticism seems to have been that the objects of sense, as such, were unholy, and that man's natural cravings could not be gratified without sin. Hence the Essenes may be said to have prepared the way for the Gnostic doctrine of dualism and of matter as the seat and abode of evil. In this place, however, the principles of the Essenes need not further be discussed. They are not referred to in the Gospels, and the suggestion that John the Baptist or Jesus Himself came under their influence cannot for a moment be entertained. (2) Secondly, there was a class of hermit ascetics who fled away from the allurements and temptations of society, and gave themselves up to a life of rigid self-discipline in the solitude of the wilderness. We meet with an example of this class in the Banus, mentioned by Josephus, who lived in the desert, clothed himself with the leaves of trees, ate nothing save the natural produce of the soil, and bathed day and night in cold water for purity's sake (Jos. Vit. 2). A hermit of a somewhat different type was John the Baptist. He, too, dwelt in the desert, wore for dress a rough garment of camel's hair with a leathern girdle, and subsisted on carob-beans (?) and wild honey. We learn from a saying of Jesus that his rigorous mode of life astonished the people, who gave out that he was possessed by a demon (Mt 11<sup>18</sup>, Lk 7<sup>25</sup>). But the asceticism of John seems to have been an incident of his environment and vocation, and was not regarded as an end in itself. He made no attempt to convert his hearers into ascetics. While it is true that his immediate disciples were addicted to fasting, presumably with his sanction (Mt 9<sup>14</sup>, Mk 2<sup>18</sup>, Lk 5<sup>33</sup>), yet in the fragments of his popular sermons which have been preserved there is no trace of any exhortation to ascetic exercises. The moral preparation for the Kingdom, by repentance and works of righteousness, was the substance of his teaching (Mt 3<sup>2-12</sup>, Lk 3<sup>1-14</sup>). (3) Lastly, there were many pious Jews who cultivated asceticism of a milder and less striking kind, who, like Anna, 'served God with fasting and prayers night and day' (Lk 2<sup>37</sup>). The more strict among the Pharisees paid particular attention to abstinence from food, and, in addition to ordinary fasts, were accustomed to observe all Mondays and Thursdays in the year as days of fasting (Lk 18<sup>12</sup>). The asceticism of the Pharisees, however, was a formal performance which resulted naturally from their legal and ceremonial conception of religion. It expressed itself chiefly in fasting, and did not include either voluntary poverty or abstinence from marriage.

Such being the principal types of contemporary asceticism, it remains to inquire, What attitude did Jesus Himself take up in relation to this asceticism? How far did He identify the life of righteousness with that 'vita religiosa' which has found its fullest expression in Monasticism? To answer this question we must consider (1) the practice of Jesus, and (2) the teaching of Jesus so far as it bears upon the subject.

1. The practice of Jesus.—Now it cannot be denied that from very early times there were circles of Christian ascetics who pointed to Jesus as the Founder and Example of the ascetic life (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 6). They emphasized His forty days' fast, His abstinence from marriage, His voluntary poverty, and leaped to the conclusion that the highest life, as exemplified by Jesus, was the life of asceticism or world-denial. Complete renunciation of the things of the present was 'the way of perfection according to the Saviour.' Even now large numbers of people are of this way of thinking; but a closer and more detailed examination of Jesus' mode of life seems scarcely to bear out such a conclusion. Offering, as He did, a most wonderful example of self-forgetfulness and self-denial in the service of others, Jesus exhibited nothing of that asceticism which characterized the Essenes, or John the Baptist, or Christian saints like St. Bernard, St. John of the Cross, and even St. Francis, who of all ascetics approached most nearly to the spirit of his Master. He showed no disposition to flee from the world, or hold aloof from it; He did not eschew the amenities of social life. He accepted the hospitality of rich men and poor. He was present at meals, He contributed to the gaiety of a marriage-feast, He permitted very precious ointment to be poured upon His feet, He had a love for children, welcomed the society of women, and clearly enjoyed the domestic life of the home in Bethany. There is no trace in the records that Jesus frowned on innocent pleasures. His life, entirely devoted to His mission, was undoubtedly hard and laborious in the highest degree; but the motive of His renunciation—e.g. of marriage or property—seems to have been, not the desire to avoid these things as in themselves incompatible with spiritual perfection, but the desire to leave Himself perfect freedom in the prosecution of His work. He did not, so far as we know, impose upon Himself unnecessary austerities, or go out of His way to seek suffering. He accepted pleasures and pains as they came, neither avoiding the one nor courting the other, but, with a sublime serenity, subordinating both to His main end and purpose. The so-called 'forty days' fast' need not cause us to modify our view. This fast is not mentioned in the oldest authority (Mk 1<sup>13</sup>); and at any rate it can scarcely have been a ceremonial observance of fasting, but was rather a necessity imposed on Jesus by His situation in the wilderness. The key to its meaning may perhaps be found in St. Luke's expression, 'in those days he did eat nothing' (Lk 4<sup>2</sup>), with which we may compare Christ's own description of the life of John the Baptist, 'John came neither eating nor drinking' (Mt 11<sup>18</sup>). The phrase as applied to Jesus may, as in the case of John, mean merely that He ate no ordinary food, but supported life on such means of subsistence as the wilderness afforded. But even if St. Matthew's vyporeitas (Mt 4<sup>4</sup>) be taken literally, yet, in the face of Christ's teaching on the subject (to be mentioned below), we cannot believe that He attributed any great importance to this abstinence from food. He was supremely indifferent to the traditional practices of asceticism; in the sphere of self-renunciation in which He moved, no one-sided principle of world-negation could find a place. Hence, while Jesus is presented to us by the Evangelists as the living type and embodiment of absolute self-denial,—self-sacrifice, as it were, incarnate,—yet the marks of the ascetic are not found in Him. And it is interesting to note that His unascetic deportment and manner of life attracted the observation of His contemporaries. 'John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, He hath a devil. The Son of man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a man gluttonous and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners' (Mt 11<sup>18-19</sup>, Lk 7<sup>33-34</sup>). There can be no question that the Jews were right when they pointed out the absence of asceticism from the practice of Jesus. We have but to contrast the life of the Son of Man, who 'came eating and drinking,' with that of such an one as St. John of the Cross, and the fact will immediately become apparent.

2. The teaching of Jesus.—Passing now to the consideration of the teaching of Jesus, we remark at the outset that, from first to last, it is instinct with the spirit of self-denial. 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself,' is the refrain which continually recurs. The principle laid down by Jesus is that the doing of the will of God and the promotion of His Kingdom is the absolute duty of man, to which all private and particular aims must necessarily give place. 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God' (Mt 6<sup>3</sup>, Lk 12<sup>31</sup>) is the categorical imperative. The Kingdom of God is the highest good, and as such establishes a claim on man's exclusive devotion. Hence all desires and strivings which have not righteousness as their ultimate goal must be ruthlessly suppressed; all lesser goods and blessings which hinder and obstruct a man in the pursuit of the summum bonum must unhesitatingly be sacrificed. Thus a man must sell all that he has in order to purchase the field with the treasure, or the pearl of great price (Mt 13<sup>44-46</sup>). If necessity arise, he must surrender all his possessions to come and follow Jesus (Mt 19<sup>21</sup>, Mk 10<sup>21</sup>); he must even renounce the closest ties of earthly relationship,—father and mother, children and wife (Mt 10<sup>37</sup>, Lk 14<sup>26</sup>), the last imperative duties of affection (Lk 9<sup>59-60</sup>), the courtesies of farewell (Lk 9<sup>61-62</sup>); nay, the most indispensable goods, the hand, the foot, the eye, must be abandoned if they cause offence (Mt 5<sup>29-30</sup>, Mk 9<sup>43-45</sup>); and, at the call of God, the very life itself must be laid down (Mt 16<sup>24</sup>, Mk 8<sup>34</sup>, Lk 9<sup>24</sup>). 'Who-soever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple' (Lk 14<sup>33</sup>). No teaching could be clearer or more forcible than this. With the greatest possible plainness Jesus declares that every earthly blessing must be made subordinate to the service of God and contributory thereto. All lesser goods which come to be sought for their own sake, whether in preference to, or even independently of, the highest good, must be instantly sacrificed. In other words, when the individual realizes that the gratification of any desire will impede or distract him in the performance of his duties as a member of the Kingdom, he is bound to forego such gratification if he would still be in truth a disciple of Christ.

It is important to notice that, in all Jesus' precepts about the sacrifice of earthly goods, there is a condition, explicit or implied. The condition in any given case is, that the particular good to be sacrificed shall have been ascertained to be an obstacle to the attainment of righteousness on the part of its possessor—'if it cause thee to stumble.' Thus the necessity of every sacrifice is determined by the special circumstances of the particular case. The rich young man is bidden to part with all his possessions and follow Jesus; Zacchæus gives half, and is told 'this day is salvation come to this house' (Lk 19<sup>9</sup>); Martha and Mary are not asked to leave their home. To one man Jesus denies permission to bid farewell to his relatives (Lk 9<sup>62</sup>); to another He says, 'Return to thine own house' (Lk 8<sup>2</sup>). A sacrifice which is imperative for one man need not necessarily be the duty of another, but the general rule is laid down that all must be prepared, if occasion arise, to surrender their dearest and most cherished blessings for the sake of the Kingdom of God.

Now the note of this doctrine is self-denial, not asceticism. Jesus nowhere teaches that earthly goods are of the devil, or that the gratification of the natural cravings is fraught with sin. He does not recommend men to treat their bodies with contempt. He does not suggest that flight from the world and disengagement from physical conditions is sanctification. He does not say that those who, for duty's sake, renounce the world, are on a higher spiritual level than those who do their duty in the world. He does not hint that the only way of avoiding sin lies in an austere renunciation of all those things from which an occasion of sin might arise. He nowhere implies that the lower goods are of no value in themselves, or that they ought under all circumstances to be foregone. The doctrine of Jesus is a doctrine not of annihilation, but of subordination. He admits, indeed, that special circumstances may make it incumbent on an individual to abstain from certain things which others, otherwise situated, may lawfully enjoy; but He does not say that earthly goods, as such, are irreconcilable with righteousness. His teaching on the subject may be summarized in the word subordination. The main point is that earthly goods are not to be retained or enjoyed for their own sake, but must be made subordinate and subservient to a higher end, and must ultimately be directed towards the promotion of the righteousness of the Kingdom of God.

Further to illustrate this point of view, we may briefly allude to Jesus' teaching on three prominent characteristics of the ascetic life—voluntary poverty, celibacy, and bodily discipline as exercised in the practice of fasting.

(1) No one could have been more alive than Jesus was to the dangers of wealth, and to the peculiar psychological difficulties which hinder the rich from entering the Kingdom. His warnings on the subject are more than usually vigorous. Wealth is represented as an idol; care about material things as a kind of heathenism. He even goes so far as to say that, humanly speaking, it is impossible for a rich man to be saved (Mt 19<sup>23</sup>, Mk

10<sup>27</sup>, Lk 18<sup>27</sup>). 'Woe unto you that are rich!' He cries again, 'for ye have received your consolation' (Lk 6<sup>24</sup>). He bids men not lay up treasures upon earth (Mt 6<sup>19</sup>), but rather sell what they have and give alms (Lk 12<sup>33</sup>). He says, 'Ye cannot serve God and mammon' (Mt 6<sup>24</sup>). Jesus knew that men tend to become absorbed in their property, to give their heart to it, to become its slaves instead of its masters; and the idea of such bondage filled Him with horror. Hence to those who were in danger of falling beneath the tyranny of money and material things He had but one word to say: 'Go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor . . . and come, follow me' (Mt 19<sup>21</sup>, Mk 10<sup>21</sup>, Lk 18<sup>22</sup>). This, however, is not a precept of universal validity; it is not, as some of the Fathers have wrongly conceived (e.g. Hieron. c. Vigilant. 14; Bede, Exp. in Marci Ev. iii. 10), a consilium evangelicum of poverty. It was addressed primarily to a particular person, and it can properly be applied only to those who are in danger of forgetting that 'a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth' (Lk 12<sup>30</sup>). The parables of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16<sup>1-13</sup>), of the Talents (Mt 25<sup>14-30</sup>), or the Pounds (Lk 19<sup>12-27</sup>), prove that Jesus was far from regarding wealth as evil in itself, or requiring that people in general should renounce its use. On the contrary, He insisted that riches are a deposit from God, which can and ought to be employed in His service; and He even declared that fidelity in such employment would be the standard for 'testing a man's capacity for higher tasks. 'If ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches?' (Lk 16<sup>11</sup>). There is nothing ascetic in such teaching. What Jesus rebukes is not wealth, but the abuse of it; what He recommends is not alienation of wealth, but subordination of it. He recognizes, indeed, that there may be special cases where the retention of wealth is incompatible with the service of God, but in general He bids men keep and use it in accordance with the purposes of Him who has bestowed it on them. Neither wealth nor poverty is in itself meritorious: only the disposition which makes either minister to the coming of the Kingdom.

(2) So, too, in respect of marriage. Jesus certainly teaches that a spiritual vocation is sometimes inconsistent with the married state. 'There be eunuchs which have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He that is able to receive it, let him receive it' (Mt 19<sup>12</sup>). 'This,' says Jerome, 'is the voice of the Lord exhorting and urging on His soldiers to the reward of chastity.' But to write thus is an exaggeration, if not a perversion of the truth. Nothing is more noticeable than the extremely guarded form of Christ's utterance here, in striking contrast with His very explicit injunctions concerning renunciation in other matters. Jesus weighs His words with the greatest care. He makes no general exhortation to celibacy. He merely points out that some people, in the enthusiasm of their heavenly calling, have suppressed the very instincts of nature, so that they have, as it were, undergone an operation of ethical self-emasculation, being dead to sexual desire; and He recommends those who have received the gift of abstinence, in this sense, not to neglect it. Just as elsewhere, in His pregnant, paradoxical way, Jesus bids men 'hate' father, and mother, and wife, and children (Lk 14<sup>26</sup>), if their claims tend to supersede the claims of God (Mt 10<sup>27</sup>); so here He bids those who are convinced that God's claims demand the whole of their time and energy, to refrain altogether from entering the marriage state. But this is no ascetic doctrine of celibacy. The Master who taught that matrimony was a divinely ordered condition, and emphasized in the strongest terms the sanctity of the conjugal relation (Mt 5<sup>22</sup> 19<sup>6-9</sup>, Mk 10<sup>2-13</sup>, Lk 16<sup>48</sup>), who practised (Lk 2<sup>21</sup>) and inculcated the duty of filial obedience and love towards parents (Mt 15<sup>4</sup>, Mk 7<sup>10-13</sup>), who habitually used the symbolism of the family to express the profoundest and holiest truths of religion, certainly did not mean to teach that family life, as such, was irreconcilable with righteousness. He uttered no word in disparagement of it; He never implied that the married attain a lower grade of perfection than the continent. On the contrary, it is clear that Jesus regarded marriage as the right and natural course for the majority of people, and He even chose a married man as the chief of His apostles. In short, while recognizing that through special circumstances the individual might be called upon to renounce the gratifications of marriage, Jesus appears to indicate that such renunciation is an exceptional duty imposed on the few, not a general rule for the many. Marriage in itself is not to be avoided as a thing debasing; it debases only when men refuse to subordinate it to the claims of the Kingdom.

(3) So, once more, towards the traditional discipline of asceticism Jesus took up an attitude of indifference. In His view, the value of such exercises depends solely upon the spirit in which they are undertaken. As forms through which devotion seeks to find expression, He does not condemn them; but, on the other hand, He does not suggest that they are the necessary or inevitable concomitants of the holy life. This will appear from His teaching on fasting—one of the most distinguishing characteristics of the Jewish piety of His time. Jesus points out that true fasting is not a parade of piety before the eyes of men, but an outward expression of a personal relation of the individual soul to the 'Father which seeth in secret' (Mt 6<sup>16-18</sup>). Hence fasting is not a matter of compulsion or prescription or external ordinance; it has value solely as the appropriate manifestation of a state of mind.

Thus Jesus refuses to impose fasts on His disciples in their days of gladness, but He foresees that 'the days will come when the bridegroom shall be taken from them,' and then the sorrow of their heart will seek an outlet through the forms of sorrow (Mt 9<sup>15</sup>, Mk 2<sup>18-20</sup>, Lk 5<sup>34-35</sup>). In justification of His refusal to lay down fixed rules upon the subject, Jesus goes on to say that, just as no wise man would sew a new patch on to an old garment, or pour new wine into old bottles, so it would be foolish to graft the new-found liberty of the gospel on to the mass of old observances, and still more foolish to attempt to force the new system as a whole within the forms of the old. The new piety must develop new forms of its own (Mt 9<sup>16-17</sup>, Mk 2<sup>21-22</sup>, Lk 5<sup>36-38</sup>). From all this we gather that Jesus refuses to bind religion to external acts of asceticism, or to declare such acts to be of obligation. Such performances as fasting, flagellation, or restriction of sleep may certainly have a conditional worth as the sincere expression of a sad and contrite spirit, but they are not of the essence of devotion. Jesus emphasizes the state of the heart, the self-denying disposition, the bent of the soul towards God; with anything besides this He is not concerned.

Hence in answer to the question, Was Jesus an ascetic? we are bound to reply in the negative. Neither in His practice nor in His teaching did He adopt the tone of asceticism. He called indeed for self-denial, self-sacrifice, self-forgetfulness. He demanded that all lower goods should be subordinated to the highest good, that all human strivings should be directed ultimately towards righteousness. But He does not condemn the lower goods or attempt to tear out the human instincts and cravings. Nor does He make fellowship with God depend on any kind of outward ascetical observances. Indeed, as Harnack writes, 'Asceticism has no place in the gospel at all; what it asks is that we should struggle against mammon, against care, against selfishness; what it demands and disengages is love; the love that serves and is self-sacrificing. This struggle and this love are the kind of asceticism which the gospel means, and whoever encumbers Jesus' message with any other kind fails to understand it. He fails to understand its grandeur and importance; for there is something still more important than "giving one's body to be burned, and bestowing all one's goods to feed the poor," namely, self-denial and love' (Harnack, What is Christianity? p. 88). See also art. SELF-DENIAL and the Literature cited at end of that article.

F. HOMES DUDDEN.

ASHER (LXX and NT Ἀσέρ, Jos. Ἀσρα) is the transliteration of the Heb. אָשֶׁר = 'fortunate.' In Gn 30<sup>13</sup> the origin of the name Asher is connected by J with this adjective, but perhaps its source should be found rather in the name of some Semitic divinity (cf. the goddess Ashera and perhaps also the Assyrian god Ashur). In Rev 7<sup>8</sup> Asher appears in the list of the twelve tribes of Israel (cf. Nu 1<sup>33-40</sup>, 2<sup>27</sup>, 7<sup>72-77</sup>, 10<sup>28</sup>, 13<sup>33</sup> [P], Dt 27<sup>12</sup> [D]). The patronymic ancestor of the tribe is presented in Gn 30<sup>13</sup> (J) and 35<sup>26</sup> (P) as the eighth son of Jacob (like Gad) of Zilpah, Leah's slave-girl. Asher is mentioned in the 'Blessings' of Jacob (Gn 49<sup>9</sup>) and of Moses (Dt 33<sup>24</sup>). It is put in possession of a territory in the land of Canaan (Jos 19<sup>24-25</sup> [P], cf. 21<sup>30-32</sup> [P]), but does not succeed in making itself thoroughly master of it (Jg 1<sup>31</sup>); the result of which is that its territory is sometimes confused with that of Manasseh (Jos 17<sup>11</sup> [J]), and that it holds a precarious situation in the midst of the Canaanites (contrast Jg 1<sup>31</sup> with v. 26). The district assigned to Asher corresponds to what was afterwards western Galilee, a very fertile country, but apparently never subdued completely by Israel; it is by a fiction that the possession of cities like Acco, Achzib, Tyre, and Sidon is attributed to it. Asher is named in the Song of Deborah (Jg 5<sup>17</sup>) as devoted to navigation; it figures also in the story of Gideon (Jg 6<sup>36</sup> 7<sup>2</sup>). But it quickly disappears from the page of history, where after all it had played a very small part. It is still mentioned incidentally in 1 K 4<sup>18</sup> under Solomon, and in 2 Ch 30<sup>11</sup> under Hezekiah, but there is no trace of it in the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. The genealogical tables will be found in Gn 46<sup>17</sup> (P), Nu 26<sup>34-41</sup> (P), and 1 Ch 7<sup>39-42</sup>.

According to Lk 2<sup>34</sup> the prophetess Anna, the daughter of Phanneel, was of the tribe of Asher. The source of this genealogical statement is unknown. Its correctness has been suspected in view of similar claims made for some Jews elsewhere to illustrious origin (descent from Aaron, David, etc.). It may, however, be remarked, that there is a cardinal difference between these and the present instance: there was nothing particularly glorious in descent from Asher.

ASHES.—Used twice in the Gospels, referring to an ancient and widespread Eastern mourning custom. The mourner, or the penitent, would throw dust, or dust mixed with ashes (σάβδα), into the air, as an expression of intense humiliation, due to penitence for sin, or grief because of affliction (Mt 11<sup>21</sup>; for this idea in the OT cf. Mic 1<sup>10</sup>, Job 42<sup>6</sup>). Such symbolic use of dust and ashes was not unnatural, since grief seems to call for a prostration of the body. These, being beneath the feet, suggest humiliation, and when thrown into the air they were allowed to fall upon the person of the mourner, that he might carry the evidences of his grief with him. Sometimes ashes is associated with σάκκος, sackcloth; the penitent or mourner sitting upon the ash-heap, his face begrimed with the dust. To this custom Christ referred when He said of Tyre and Sidon, 'They would have repented long ago, sitting in sackcloth and ashes' (Lk 10<sup>13</sup>; cf. use of σάβδα in Job 2<sup>8</sup>, Jon 2<sup>8</sup>).

ASS.—See ANIMALS, p. 63<sup>a</sup>.

ASTONISHMENT, ASTONISHED.—These terms occur with some frequency in EV of OT, but in NT only in the historical books (except John), and in the RV only in the Synoptic Gospels (except Ac 3<sup>7</sup>). They are always used in NT as an expression of one of the emotions aroused by supernatural manifestations. The noun occurs once only in either version (but in different passages: AV Mk 5<sup>42</sup>; RV Mk 16<sup>8</sup>); the verb more frequently. In AV the term translates sometimes ἐκπλήσσομαι (Mt 7<sup>28</sup> 13<sup>91</sup> 22<sup>23</sup>, Mk 6<sup>7</sup> 7<sup>37</sup> 10<sup>46</sup> 11<sup>18</sup>, Lk 4<sup>32</sup>, Ac 13<sup>9</sup>); sometimes ἐξίσταμαι or ἐκστασθε (Mk 5<sup>42</sup>, Lk 9<sup>40</sup> 8<sup>26</sup> 24<sup>23</sup>, Ac 10<sup>46</sup> 12<sup>16</sup>); and sometimes θαμβέθηναι or θάμβος (Mk 10<sup>34</sup>, Lk 5<sup>9</sup>, Ac 9<sup>8</sup>). In RV it is reserved for ἐκπλήσσομαι (except Mk 16<sup>8</sup>, where 'astonishment' represents ἐκστασις), of which it is the uniform rendering. In its etymological implication it very fairly represents ἐκπλήσσομαι, which is literally 'to be struck out (of the senses) by a blow' and hence, to be 'stunned', 'shocked', 'astonished.' For its relation to words implying 'fear,' see Schmidt, Synonymik d. gr. Sprache, No. 139. For its place among the terms descriptive of the effect of our Lord's ministry on its witnesses, see art. AMAZE-MENT.

BENJAMIN B. WARFIELD.

ASTROLOGY was an important element of all ancient astronomy. The scientific observation of the positions and movements of the heavenly bodies was closely associated with the belief in their Divine character, and their influence upon the destinies of men, and formed the basis of calculations and predictions of future events. Babylonia was the earliest home of this study, which continued to be prosecuted in that part of the world with special diligence, so that in later times the word 'Chaldean' was equivalent to 'Eastern astrologer.' It is to this class that we must refer the Magi or Wise Men from the East, who are mentioned in Mt 2<sup>1-2</sup>. They had seen in their own home the rising (for so perhaps we should understand the words ἐν τῷ ἀνατολῆ, rendered 'in the east,' in v. 2) of a star or constellation, which they connected with the expectation, already diffused in the East, of the birth of a great ruler among the Jews. Travelling to Palestine, they ascertained at Jerusalem that the Messiah was expected to be born in Bethlehem, and directing their steps thither they saw the 'star' in front of them all the way, till they came to the house where the infant Jesus was found. (This appears to be the only sense in which the popular and picturesque language of v. 9 can be understood.)

The first two chapters of the First Gospel are recognized as being taken from another source than the rest of the book, and different views have been held as to their historic value. But so far as the astrological references in ch. 2 are concerned, no difficulty need be felt about the narrative. The Evangelist, it is true, does not raise any question as to the reality of the connexion between the 'star' and the birth of Jesus. On the possibility of such a connexion, no doubt he shared the common beliefs of his time. But we may accept his statement of the facts without being compelled to admit that there is any truth in astrological theories. The famous calculation of Kepler shows that an unusual conjunction of Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn took place about B.C. 7, and it is quite conceivable that this or some similar phenomenon may in God's providence have led the Wise Men, even through the mistaken principles of their science, actually to visit Palestine about the time when Jesus was born. See further, artt. MAGI and STAR. JAMES PATRICK.

ASSURANCE.—This term stands for the fact and the doctrine of personal fellowship with God in Jesus Christ, made certain to the consciousness of the believer by the direct witness of the Holy Spirit. The prophetic ideal appears in the promise of a peaceful work of righteousness, the effect of which is quietness and confidence for ever (Is 32<sup>7</sup>). In Mt 11<sup>27</sup> Jesus declares that 'no one knoweth the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willet to reveal him.' Such a personal revelation of God to the believer in Christ would seem to be necessarily obvious and assuring to him who receives it. The immediate context also gives assurance of rest and comfort to the souls of all who labour and are heavy laden, and who come to Christ for help. This teaching is confirmed and enhanced by the doctrine of the Gospel of St. John concerning the Comforter. This heavenly Comforter, the Holy Spirit of truth, bears witness of Christ, and makes known the things of Christ, unto those who receive and love Him (Jn 15<sup>26</sup> 16<sup>4</sup>). The world cannot receive this Spirit of truth, for He is an invisible presence, known only to the believer with whom and in whom He abides (14<sup>17</sup>). Those disciples in whom the Spirit thus dwells are loved by the Father and realize the manifestation of Christ, so that Father, Son, and Spirit come unto them and make their abode with them (14<sup>23</sup> 2<sup>7</sup>). The doctrine also finds noteworthy confirmation in the First Epistle of St. John (3<sup>19-24</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>), where it is said that the Spirit of God and of Christ abides in the believer, and assures (persuades) his heart with the Divine conviction of His immediate presence, so that he has great 'boldness toward God' (παρρησία πρὸς τὸ θεόν).

That the Holy Spirit bears immediate and direct witness within the human spirit to the fact of one's being a child of God, is the explicit teaching of St. Paul (Ro 8<sup>16</sup>). In Col 2<sup>2</sup> we note the remarkable expression about Christian hearts being comforted and 'knit together in love unto all riches of the full assurance (ἰσχυροφροσύνη, 'fulness') of understanding' in knowing the mystery of God. The same truth appears in the phrases 'full assurance of hope' and 'full assurance of faith' (He 6<sup>11</sup> 10<sup>22</sup>). The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews declares faith itself to be 'assurance of things hoped for, conviction of things not seen' (11<sup>1</sup>).

This Biblical doctrine of Assurance presents one of the most precious truths of the gospel of Christ. It presupposes, as a matter of course, the believer's personal acquaintance with the saving truths of Christianity and the facts of Divine revelation; but it has been needlessly complicated with the dogmas of Election and the final Perseverance of the Saints. It should not be construed to involve a present assurance of final salvation, but it should be defined and guarded against the various delusions of mere subjective feeling. A spiritual conviction, however deep and assuring, needs the constant test of verification in a pure and upright life. It must have the 'testimony of our conscience, that in holiness and sincerity of God, not in fleshly wisdom but in the grace of God, we behaved ourselves in the world' (2 Co 1<sup>3</sup>). The fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5<sup>22-23</sup>) must supplement and continuously establish the personal witness of the Spirit. Therefore Jesus Himself gave the important admonition that the real character of a tree is known by its fruit (Mt 7<sup>18-20</sup>).

ATONEMENT.—The Atonement is the reconciling work of Jesus Christ the Son of God, in gracious fulfilment of the loving purpose of His Father; whereby, through the sacrifice of Himself upon the Cross once for all, on behalf and instead of sinful men, satisfaction was made for the sins of the world and communion between God and man restored.

The starting-point of Christian experience is the Resurrection of Jesus (1 Co 15<sup>4</sup>, Ro 4<sup>25</sup>). It may now be taken as accepted that the belief of the primitive community and the Apostolic preaching were based on this conviction (see Harnack, What is Christianity? Eng. tr. Lect. ix.; Schmiel, Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Resurrection'). This fact, reinforced by successive appearances of the risen Christ whether to individuals or the assembled disciples, led to the further conviction, the ultimate root of the doctrine of the Atonement, that Jesus of Nazareth, crucified, risen, ascended, was present in the midst of the Christian congregation. He who in the days of His ministry had claimed authority on earth to forgive sins (Mt 9<sup>1-9</sup>), confirming the word with signs following, who had awakened an implicit trust as alone having the words of eternal life (Jn 6<sup>28</sup> 16<sup>28</sup>), and who had manifested Himself as the one way by which men might come to the Father (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>), had fulfilled His own promise to return to His elect and abide with them to the end of the days (Mt 28<sup>20</sup>). The first corporate act of the disciples was to claim the promise to be present in the midst of two or three gathered in His name (Mt 18<sup>20</sup>), by calling upon their Master to choose into the Apostolate one of two set before Him conceived as invisibly present (Ac 1<sup>15-26</sup>). Moreover, He was present in power as exalted to God's right hand, not therefore limited by time and space, but acting under Divine, eternal conditions, arising to succour His martyr Stephen (Ac 7<sup>55-56</sup>), manifesting Himself as the Righteous One to St. Paul (22<sup>14</sup>), giving specific revelations of His will to Ananias and to St. Paul himself (9<sup>1-10</sup> 13<sup>3-10</sup> 23<sup>1</sup>), and performing those greater works of which He had spoken (Jn 14<sup>12</sup>) through those who wrought in His name (Ac 3<sup>6</sup> 9<sup>24</sup>). This conviction, peculiarly vivid in the earlier ages, is clearly traced in the hymns addressed to Christ 'as to a god' (Pliny's Letter to Trajan), and in the records of early martyrdoms. And the realism with which it was held even as late as the 4th cent. is attested by apologetic like that of Athanasius (see de Incarnatione, 46 ff.), or traditions like that of the consecration of St. John Lateran.

But proclamation of forgiveness of sins through faith in the name of Jesus, though arising out of the conviction that the Absolver was Himself in the power of His deity still present on earth, was not made until the realization of the promise of the Spirit in the Pentecostal gift. To this fact, the external results of which were present in the experience of his hearers, St. Peter appealed as witnessing to the reality of Jesus' exaltation and His power to remit sins (Ac 2<sup>38</sup>, cf. Gal 3<sup>14</sup>). This significant element in the first preaching of the Gospel answers by anticipation objections urged against the Atonement as involving immoral consequences and unworthy views of God. Not only in this passage but throughout the Acts the possession of the Spirit is emphasized as the essential mark of discipleship (Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 4<sup>31</sup> 5<sup>22</sup> 8<sup>14-19</sup> 9<sup>17</sup> 10<sup>47</sup> 11<sup>16</sup> 13<sup>52</sup> 19<sup>1-5</sup>). The call to repentance, intimately associated with the gift of the Holy Spirit (Ac 2<sup>38</sup>, cf. Mt 3<sup>11</sup>), necessarily involved a life conformed to the image of the Son of God. The Gospel, though a message of God's free favour with no condition of antecedent righteousness, referred to moral results, the manifestation of an imparted spirit, as evidence of the truth of the promise (Ro 8<sup>12, 14</sup>, Gal 5<sup>22-24</sup>). And when the doctrine of justification by faith was challenged by imperfectly instructed Christians, St. Paul met the charge by an abrupt appeal not only to elementary moral convictions, but to the implications of baptism as a new and spiritual birth (Ro 6<sup>1-4</sup>). Nor, again, was it possible for those to whom the possession of the Spirit was a fact of experience to regard God otherwise than as the Father. For He who dwelt within them was the Spirit of Christ Jesus (Ac 16<sup>7</sup>, Ro 8<sup>9</sup>, Ph 1<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>11</sup>), the promise of the Father (Ac 1<sup>4</sup>), whereby they had themselves attained the adoption, and were enabled to cry, 'Abba, Father' (Ro 8<sup>15-17</sup>, Gal 4<sup>6</sup>).

The fact of Pentecost was immediately explained as that outpouring of the Spirit upon all flesh which was to mark the establishment of the Messianic kingdom (Ac 2<sup>38-21</sup> 3<sup>21, 22</sup>). It stood directly related to the event of which the Apostles were the chosen witnesses, the Resurrection of Jesus, whereby He was exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour unto the remission of sins (Ac 2<sup>38, 39</sup>), of which, according to Hebrew expectation, the kingdom was to be the home (e.g. Jer 31, Ezk 36<sup>16-26</sup>). The assurance that Christ was the ever present source of forgiveness gave its supreme significance to the Cross by which He entered into His glory (Jn 12<sup>7</sup>). Later theologians have been charged with 'placing the emphasis too exclusively upon the death of Jesus as the means of redemption' (H. L. Wild, Contentio Veritatis, Essay iii.). But the evidence of the NT is irresistible. It is true that the earliest sermons lay stress rather upon the fact of the Resurrection, but always as closely following upon the Death, which, though inflicted by His enemies, resulted from the determinate counsel of God (Ac 2<sup>22</sup>), who glorified 'his Servant' Jesus. The frequent repetition of this OT expression (παῖς θεοῦ) in the early chapters of Acts (3<sup>13, 26</sup> 4<sup>27, 29</sup>), taken in connexion with explicit references to the things which God foreshadowed by the prophets that His Messiah should suffer (Ac 2<sup>22</sup> 3<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>11, 25-26</sup> 13<sup>27</sup>; cf. 1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>11</sup>), leaves no room for doubt that Philip the Evangelist was not alone in beginning from the picture of Jehovah's Suffering Servant to preach Jesus (Ac 8<sup>26</sup>), but that the Apostles gave their witness to the Resurrection by preaching what St. Paul called 'Christ crucified' (1 Co 1<sup>2</sup>, cf. Gal 3<sup>1</sup>). The Crucifixion was regarded neither as a bare fact nor as the symbol of a theological system, but as a 'gospel,' an event whose reality lay in its significance, a message of Divine favour and forgiveness. The central fact of Christ's life and work was complex, consisting of both the Cross and the Resurrection. The NT considers neither apart. The redeeming efficacy is attached to each in turn. While, according to the compressed formula in which St. Paul expresses the content of his gospel, 'Christ died for our sins and rose again the third day' (1 Co 15<sup>3, 4</sup>), the common form of the Petrine preaching represents God as raising up Jesus 'for to give repentance and remission of sins' (Ac 5<sup>30, 31</sup>; cf. 2<sup>38-39</sup> 3<sup>15, 26</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>31</sup> 3<sup>21</sup>, also Ro 4<sup>25</sup> and 1 Co 15<sup>17</sup>). But it was the Cross that tended to fix itself as the central fact, and therefore the characteristic symbol of Christendom. It is the figure of Him 'who bare our sins in his body on the tree' which dominates the First Epistle of Peter (1 P 2<sup>24</sup>). And the 2nd cent. Gospel according to Peter has contrived with singular fidelity to the Apostle's mind to give an imaginative picture of the Resurrection, wherein the Cross is curiously blended with the rending tomb (Gospel acc. to Peter, § 10, ed. Robinson and James). With St. Paul the gospel of Christ, which is the fixed point in his teaching (Gal 1<sup>11</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>1</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>11</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>8</sup>), the touchstone of all preaching (Gal 1<sup>6, 9</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>3</sup>), proclaimed alike to Jew and Gentile (1 Co 1<sup>24</sup>), delivered whether to St. Peter or to himself as the deposit of Christian truth (1 Co 3<sup>11</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>13, 14</sup>), is 'the word of the cross' (1 Co 1<sup>18, 23</sup>). So remarkable is the unanimity of the two great primary preachers of Christianity that it leaves no room to question the statement of Harnack (What is Christianity? Eng. tr. Lect. ix.) that 'the primitive community called Jesus its Lord because He sacrificed His life for it, and because its members were convinced that He had been raised from the dead and was then sitting at the right hand of God.'

To this must be added the general symmetry of the NT and the evidence of Christian institutions and Church History. The story of the Passion is out of all proportion to the rest of the Synoptic narrative, as given in each of the three Gospels, unless the foreground is rightly occupied by the Cross. And here the Fourth Gospel, though it emphasizes the function of revelation in the incarnate life of the Son of God, is found in close and almost unexpected agreement with its predecessors. The Apocalypse rings with the praises of 'the Lamb' (Rev 5<sup>6-6, 12, 13</sup> 7<sup>10, 14-17</sup> 12<sup>7-12</sup> 14<sup>1-5</sup> 19<sup>9-9</sup>; cf. 1<sup>5</sup> 13<sup>8</sup>). The Epistle to the Hebrews, though it opens with one of the classical Christological passages, yet makes the Death of Jesus the pivot of its teaching (He 2<sup>7</sup>). And the Epistle to the Romans, which elaborates the great argument of justification through a crucified and risen Saviour, is central to the theology of St. Paul.

Midway between the NT and Church History, as related in point of evidential value to either, come the Creed and Sacraments. The former represents the inviolable basis of the word concentrated in catechetical teaching. That its emphasis rested upon the Cross is apparent not only from such primitive formulæ as the Apostles' Creed, but from the NT itself (1 Co 15<sup>3, 4</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>11</sup>). Baptism is the initiatory Christian rite, and whether it conveys or only represents the forgiveness of sins, stood from the first in close relation to the Death and Resurrection of Christ (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, Mk 16<sup>16, 16</sup>, Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>12, 16, 26</sup> 9<sup>18</sup> 10<sup>47, 48</sup> 16<sup>33</sup> 19<sup>5</sup> 22<sup>16</sup>, Ro 6<sup>3, 4</sup>, Gal 3<sup>26, 27</sup>, Eph 4<sup>4-6</sup>, Col 2<sup>12</sup>, Tit 3<sup>5-6</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>21</sup>; cf. Jn 3<sup>5</sup>, Ac 11<sup>16</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>2</sup>, He 6<sup>1-2</sup> 10<sup>22</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>6-8</sup>). The Eucharist is the Christian counterpart of the sacrifice of the Passover, which commemorated the deliverance of God's people from Egypt; it is associated by the terms of its celebration with the Lord's Passion, and employs language of sacrificial import (Mt 26<sup>28-29</sup>, Mk 14<sup>22-24</sup>, Lk 22<sup>19, 20</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>23-24</sup> 10<sup>16-22</sup> [for ῥάψωφα Κυρίου=θυσιαστήριον, cf. Mal 1<sup>7</sup>], cf. Jn 6<sup>22-28</sup> [see Westcott, ad loc.], Ex 12<sup>7</sup>, He 13<sup>10</sup>).

Following upon the Sacraments is the witness of Church History—the worship, the dogma, the art, the experience of the Christian centuries—which have all consistently gathered round the Cross. We are therefore entitled to hold that any interpretation of the Christian facts which shifts the focus from Calvary to Bethlehem or Galilee represents a departure from the historic faith, and tends to distort the Christian revelation.

Theories of the Atonement, of which the view that identifies it with the Incarnation may be taken as the norm, have inevitably been popular in an age dominated by two great influences, physical science and Hegelian philosophy. But it may be doubted whether they have taken their rise in a study of the facts of Scripture and not rather in a determinist conception of the Universe, to which the Incarnation seemed to give a religious and Christian form. A consequence of this method of thought has been the revival, in this country by Bishop Westcott and others, of speculations like those of Rupert of Deutz and the Scotists, which postulate an Incarnation independent of those conditions of human life which demand the forgiveness of sins. It is perhaps enough to say of this line of thought, with Dr. A. B. Davidson (OT Prophecy, ch. x.), that it involves 'a kind of principle, according to which God develops Himself by an inward necessity,' and which 'is certainly not a Biblical principle.' Such thinking invariably regards the Atonement merely as a mode of the Incarnation required by the conditions under which it took place. And whether this theory be specifically held or not, it has been a tendency of recent theology to fix the mind rather upon the ethical principle of the Atonement, i.e. the obedience or penitence or assent to God's abhorrence of sin, of which death is the 'sacrament' or visible sign, than upon the Crucifixion as a work intrinsically efficacious apart from the moral qualities expressed in its accomplishment. Such views are defective, not because they fail to give expression to aspects of Christ's redeeming work, but because they stop short at the point where explanation is necessary, why these qualities of the spirit of Jesus should have been directed towards the particular end of the death of the Cross. The climax of the account which St. Paul gives in the Epistle to the Philippians of the exaltation of Jesus, is neither the assumption of human flesh nor the suffering of death, but the obedience which accepted the humiliation of the Cross as the act whereby He fulfilled, not the general, but the particular will of God (Ph 2<sup>8-11</sup>, cf. 1 P 1<sup>14</sup>).

The Apostles, as we have seen, saw the purpose, and therefore the explanation, of this concrete historical event through the medium of the OT. Whatever view it may be expedient to take of the relation between Hebrew prophecy and Jesus of Nazareth, this fact is of primary importance, because it exhibits what in the view of the first messengers of the Cross was the essential character of the good news it was their mission to proclaim; nor would the case be materially altered if the language of Law and Prophets had merely been chosen to illustrate the central idea of the Gospel. What we find is the remarkable manner in which the idea of the King and the Kingdom, consonant with contemporary Jewish expectation, is combined with that of the suffering Messiah, so alien to the current interpretation of the Scriptures as to present 'to the Jews a stumbling-block.' The antithesis between the Cross and the Resurrection was, indeed, such as to suggest that the death of Jesus was united to its marvellous sequel by a chain of causation removing it from the ordinary category of dissolution, and making it the interpretative fact of a career otherwise the most unintelligible in history. But the main point to observe is that the Resurrection, being in the first instance the crucial fact of experience which marked off for the disciples their Master Jesus as the Son of God (Ro 1<sup>4</sup> ερωθέρτος, cf. Ac 10<sup>38-41</sup> 13<sup>30-32</sup> 26<sup>23</sup>), ratified, in the minds of those who had continued with Him in His temptations, that view of His work which had been before the eye of the Divine Sufferer throughout His ministry, and which He had progressively disclosed to hearts slow of belief, until a hitherto invincible prejudice had succumbed to the decisive evidence of accomplishment.

The persistence with which early heresies connected themselves with the Baptism of Jesus reveals the prominence which the event assumed in the story of the ministry, and goes far to authenticate the details of the Synoptic narrative (Mt 3<sup>13-17</sup>, Mk 1<sup>9-11</sup>, Lk 3<sup>21-22</sup>, cf. Jn 1<sup>29-34</sup>), the correspondence of which with the Apostolic view of the Saviour's mission is too subtle to warrant the theory that they are the glosses of a later tradition. In this narrative Jesus is represented as doing something more than declaring the obligation which rested upon Him to fulfil that righteousness characteristic of the Hebrew covenant. 'Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness,' i.e. by submitting to the baptism which John would have withheld because it involved repentance and provided for the remission of sins. The Voice from Heaven, and the Temptation endured in the power of the baptismal Spirit (Mt 4, Mk 1<sup>12</sup>, Lk 4<sup>1</sup>), even if they be regarded merely as the interpretation of the subjective consciousness of Jesus, witness to the identity between the scheme of the ministerial life accepted from the first by the Son of Man and the gospel of the redeeming work preached by the Apostles. For the Voice blends the prophecy of the royal Son (Ps 2<sup>7</sup>) with that of the beloved Servant (Is 42<sup>1</sup>), and the Temptation is essentially the refusal of Messianic royalty on any condition but that of suffering service. It is no accident that the same Voice is heard again on the Mount of Transfiguration (Mt 17<sup>5</sup> and Mk 9<sup>7</sup> ὁ υἱὸς μου ὁ ἀγαπητός, Lk 9<sup>35</sup> ὁ υἱὸς μου ὁ ἐλεγχόμενος [i.e. ἀγαπητός], cf. Is 42<sup>1</sup>), when the manner in which righteousness is to be fulfilled is made explicit in the subject of Jesus' converse with Moses and Elijah, 'the decease which he was about to fulfil' (Lk 9<sup>31</sup> πληροῦν, cf. Mt 3<sup>12</sup> πληρώσαι); and that again, from the moment when He begins to make plain to the unwilling ears of His disciples that His throne can be reached only through resurrection after suffering and death, He has to cry, 'Get thee behind me, Satan' (Mt 16<sup>23</sup>). And the taunt of the rulers on Calvary, when the crucified Jesus is bidden to prove Himself the Christ of God, the chosen (Lk 23<sup>36</sup> ὁ ἐλεγχόμενος), makes it clear that the claim to be at once the Messiah and the Servant, if doubted by the disciples and derided by the Jews, was at least in the hour of its accomplishment sufficiently understood.

It is the Divine necessity of dying which is prominent in the later teaching of the Lord, beginning from that crisis of the ministry which is emphatically presented in all the Synoptics (Mt 16<sup>21-28</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31-9<sup>1</sup></sup>, Lk 9<sup>22-27</sup>). He sets His face towards it as the end (Lk 22<sup>27</sup> [cf. Is 53<sup>12</sup>] τελεσθῆναι and τέλος ἔχει, cf. Jn 19<sup>28-30</sup>), the goal to which His whole life moves. And in the hour when the things concerning Him had fulfilled, He singled out the leading feature in the portrait of the Servant as that which above all others fastened its application upon Himself. 'I say unto you that this which is written must be fulfilled in me, and he was reckoned with transgressors.' The Prophet, who at the outset of His ministry read in the synagogue of Nazareth the words foreshadowing the deliverance which was to issue in the Kingdom of God (Lk 4<sup>18-19</sup> = Is 61<sup>1-2</sup>), knew that for Himself it meant the Man of Sorrows, led like the lamb of the Hebrew ritual to the slaughter, and in the power of His healing wounds making intercession for the transgressors of His people (Is 53; for the connexion with the Ceremonial Law see Davidson, OT Prophecy, ch. xxii.) There is thus no inconsistency between the language of Jesus as recorded in the Synoptics and those utterances of the Fourth Gospel which seem to remove the Passion and Death from the immediate historical conditions, and to represent them as the decision of eternal issues by the voluntary activity of the Divine Sufferer, who lays down His life of Himself and judges the prince of this world on the uplifted throne of the Cross (Jn 3<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>17-18</sup> 12<sup>31-33</sup> 14<sup>30</sup> 16<sup>11, 33</sup>).

These considerations give peculiar point to the declaration which, according to both St. Matthew and St. Mark, stands in close relation to the request of the sons of Zebedee for eminent places in the Messianic kingdom. Messiah's kingship is based on service which takes specific form in the death He goes to accomplish—'The Son of Man came to give his life a ransom for many'—a substitution which made His soul an offering for sin, fulfilling all that was foreshadowed not only in the redemption of the people from Egypt, but also in the redemptions of the Ceremonial Law (Mk 10<sup>45</sup> Mt 20<sup>28</sup> ἄνθρωπος ἀντι τοῦ θανάτου 1 Ti 2<sup>6</sup>, λυτρώσεται Tit 2<sup>14</sup>, ἐλυτρώθη 1 P 1<sup>18</sup>, where also the τιμὴν αἵμα of Christ is the price; Is 53<sup>10</sup>, 2 S 7<sup>22</sup>, Ex 13<sup>15</sup>, Nu 18<sup>15</sup>, cf. Ps 49<sup>9</sup>).

That Jesus should thus have recognized the true significance of His death as a fact possessing not an accidental but an inherent worth is not inconsistent with a due acknowledgment of the historical circumstances which became its efficient cause. With regard to the prophecy of Jehovah's Servant, it must be remembered that the Sufferer, though offering a sacrifice for sin of which the liturgical oblation is the type, yet incurs pain and death only through setting His face as a flint (Is 50<sup>7</sup>) in maintaining truth and righteousness under conditions which inevitably made this witness a martyrdom. And it would be misreading the phenomena of the Gospel narrative to represent the propitiatory death of Christ as wantonly sought by our Lord in a manner inconsistent with the dictates of common morality. The Cross could not have been mediatorial if Jesus had been an official and conventional Messiah reaching Calvary by any other road than that which in the first instance made Him one with His brethren (He 2<sup>10-18</sup>) in the pursuit of His own moral end. His death, which affects the conscience (He 9<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>22</sup>), is not represented as self-immolation. He 'witnessed before Pontius Pilate a good confession' (1 Ti 6<sup>13</sup>, cf. 'the faithful witness,' Rev 1<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>14</sup>). His mission being to establish the kingdom upon a basis of surrender (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, Jn 13<sup>14-15</sup>), upon a gospel preached to the poor (Lk 4<sup>18</sup>) by one who is Himself lowly in heart (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>), He must not shrink till He send forth judgment unto victory (Mt 12<sup>29</sup>). When there is no more risk of quenching the smoking flax by appearing openly as the uncompromising foe of the hierarchy, He recognizes that His hour is come (Jn 12<sup>23</sup> 17<sup>1</sup> et al., Mk 14<sup>41</sup>, cf. Jn 2<sup>4</sup>, Lk 22<sup>28</sup>), changing the method of His discourse so that they who reject Him may perceive that He speaks of them (Mt 21<sup>45</sup>), and without further parley join the inevitable issue. There is, however, no warrant for Mr. F. W. Newman's theory, that Jesus' denunciation of scribes and Pharisees was a deliberate provocation of judicial murder; though it must be remarked that, assuming the knowledge of power to rise again the third day, we could not judge even such an action entirely by the ordinary standard. Still, if the one necessity of the case was a sacrificial death upon the stage of history, the event might have been accomplished amid accessories more suggestive of ritual than the Crucifixion. But this would have been something less than a moral act, whereas the NT shows the propitiation wrought by Jesus Christ 'the righteous' (1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup>, Ac 3<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>23</sup> 22<sup>14</sup>) to have been something more. The Agony in the Garden, followed by the Seven Words from the Cross, attests the naturalness of the Passion as suffering, though voluntarily endured, yet inflicted from without. It is only after the Resurrection that the human actors in the tragedy fall out of sight, and the Cross can be presented absolutely as that which it behoved the Christ to suffer, so entering into His glory (Lk 24<sup>26</sup>).

From what has been already said, it follows that an adequate soteriology, or theology of the Atonement which is genuinely evangelical, must be the expression of a spiritual experience resting upon Christ's death as the expiation of sin. With a few notable exceptions, foremost among them Dr. R. W. Dale, the trend of modern theology, since the publication of M'Leod Campbell's treatise on The Nature of the Atonement, has been on the whole to develop the doctrine on its ethical side, and to find its spiritual principle either in the sinless penitence or the perfect obedience of Jesus (e.g. Westcott, Wilson, Moberly, Scott Lidgett). The tendency of these writings has been, while dissipating theories of a non-moral 'transaction,' to obscure to a greater or less extent 'the offering of the body of Christ,' and to give an insufficient value to the Biblical account of His death as an objective act of propitiation addressed to the Father by the incarnate Son. No doubt English writers for the most part maintain that the 'penitence' and obedience of Christ are imparted by grace to the believer. But between the obedience and the grace, as that which gives meaning to both, NT theology places the substitutionary sacrifice.

St. Peter connects obedience with the 'sprinkling of the blood of Christ' (1 P 1<sup>2</sup> 19<sup>13, 15, 18</sup>) and the sin-bearing of the tree (2<sup>24</sup>). Involving as these expressions do 'the blood of the covenant' (Ex 24<sup>8-9</sup>, Lv 16<sup>14-19</sup> 17<sup>11, 13</sup>, Zec 9<sup>11</sup>; cf. He 10<sup>19</sup> 13<sup>20</sup>, and, for the 'new covenant,' Jer 31<sup>31-34</sup> 33<sup>3</sup>, Ezk 36<sup>25</sup>), and the laying of hands upon the head of the sin-offering (Lv 16<sup>21</sup>, cf. Is 53<sup>7</sup>; the whole passage [Is 53<sup>7</sup>] should be carefully compared with 1 P 2<sup>22-25</sup> and the influence of the Levitical code in moulding language and ideas noted), both familiar conceptions of the Hebrew ritual, they point undoubtedly to a real transfer of guilt, a genuine substitution, as the true meaning of the 'glad tidings' (1 P 1<sup>12</sup>), of which the Apostle was the witness (5<sup>1</sup>). The Christian society is the 'people of God's own possession' (2<sup>10</sup>), ransomed and brought into covenant by the precious blood. The obedience and sufferings of Christians are not, therefore, redemptive, for such are already dead to sin (2<sup>24</sup>).

With this the Johannine writings agree. Fellowship with God is the eternal life which Christians enjoy, but this mystical union* is effected by the purifying blood of Jesus His Son (1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup>), in whom is forgiveness (1<sup>9</sup> 2<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>9</sup>), who is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world (2<sup>24</sup>), cf. 5<sup>8</sup> [Jn 19<sup>34</sup>], Jn 4<sup>10</sup> 11<sup>5</sup>, Ro 3<sup>25</sup> ἱλαστήριον). The antecedent power of Christ's death is thus explained by the sacrificial term ἱλασμός to be an effectual means for turning away the wrath of God, which the impressive imagery of the Apocalypse represents as resting upon the wicked (Rev 6<sup>16, 17</sup> 14<sup>19</sup> and passim). Nowhere is the significant figure of the Lamb more emphatically applied to Christ than in the Johanne books (Jn 1<sup>23-25</sup> 19<sup>35</sup> [Ex 12<sup>30</sup>], the Apocalypse, passim).

* The unio mystica must not be confounded with atonement by pressing the etymology of the latter word (at-one-ment), the Pauline equivalent of which (ἁρταλωσά) St. John never uses. According to its proper meaning, the verb 'atone' is not transitive, but is followed by the preposition 'for.' Mr. Inge in Contentio Veritatis constantly ignores this.

With the Apostle Paul we reach the fullest statement of the doctrine of the Atonement. And here it must be noted that the Epistles of the first imprisonment, which develop the teaching concerning the Person of Christ in His eternal relation to the Universe and the Church, follow those which give detailed expression to the reconciliation of believers to God through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus. It would seem, therefore, that theologians like Westcott, who subordinate redemption to the Incarnation, are less true to Christian experience than those who reach the Incarnation through the Atonement. For St. Paul the Cross in its twofold aspect of Death and Resurrection is the central fact which forms the subject of his gospel (1 Co 1<sup>18-22</sup> 2<sup>2</sup>, Gal 5<sup>1</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>7</sup>), the basis of Baptism (see above) and of the Eucharist (see above), the source of the forgiveness of sins (Col 2<sup>13-14</sup>, cf. 3<sup>1</sup>, Eph 4<sup>25</sup>), the motive of Christian morality (Ro 6<sup>4</sup>), the spring of faith (1 Co 12<sup>9</sup>, cf. Ro 10<sup>9</sup>) and of spiritual life (2 Co 4<sup>10-11</sup>, Gal 2<sup>20</sup>), and the assurance of immortality (2 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>). To this fact there is a corresponding personal experience, so that baptism may be represented as involving an identification of the believer with his Lord so intimate that not only is the figure of putting on Christ as a garment felt to be appropriate to the initiatory Christian rite (see above), but His death, burial, and resurrection are regarded as reproduced in the believer (see above). From the Cross the Christian life takes its specific complexion, so that 'the new man created in righteousness' (Eph 4<sup>24</sup>) becomes 'crucified unto the world' (Gal 6<sup>14</sup>), branded in the body with the marks of the Lord Jesus (Gal 6<sup>17</sup>); glories in the Cross (v. 14); and fills up that which is lacking in the sufferings of Christ (Col 1<sup>24</sup>). Obviously, therefore, the interpretation of this fact and its consequent experience is from the point of view of St. Paul the primary task of the Christian theologian.

The interpretative word used in St. Paul's soteriology is καταλλαγή, 'reconciliation' (Ro 5<sup>11</sup> AV 'atonement'), the root idea of which is restoration of personal relations between parties hitherto estranged. This involves the explanation of the 'catastrophe in human life,' sufficiently evident in common experience but inexplicable apart from the Hebrew realization of the personal God, which is set forth in Ro 1<sup>18-28</sup> as the rebellion of the unthankful human will against the claim of the Divine Creator (v. 23). The need is universal (Ro 3<sup>23</sup>),* but the later Augustinian terminology, which, in spite of Luther's return to a fuller Paulinism, still dominates the language even of Protestant divinity, tends by the use of such figures as 'vice' (vitium), 'flaw,' 'disease,' to palliate the exceeding sinfulness of sin and to obscure the personal significance of the Cross, which is always uppermost in St. Paul. Three points must be noted.

1. Christ died 'to reconcile the Father to us.'—This phrase, if not strictly Biblical, conveys the essential idea of Scripture, which is quite obscured by the statement that His death reconciles men to God. Modern teachers, concerned to vindicate the love of God, have inclined to represent the Cross as intended to produce merely a change in the moral life of the sinner. Not only is this inconsistent with the idea of reconciliation, but St. Paul, while, with the NT generally, always representing the work of Christ as arising in the gracious will of the Father (2 Co 5<sup>18-19</sup>, Ro 5<sup>8-9</sup>, Col 1<sup>13-20</sup>, Eph 1<sup>13-19</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>8</sup>, Tit 3<sup>4</sup>; cf. 1 P 1<sup>1</sup>, Jn 3<sup>16</sup> and passim, 1 Jn 3<sup>1</sup>), yet invariably regards it as the loving act (2 Co 5<sup>14-8</sup>, Gal 1<sup>4</sup> 2<sup>20</sup>, Ro 8<sup>27</sup>, Eph 5<sup>2</sup>, cf. Jn 10<sup>11</sup>, Rev 1<sup>9</sup>) of a mediator (1 Ti 2<sup>5-6</sup>, cf. He 9<sup>14</sup>), producing in the first instance a change in God's attitude towards the sinner (2 Th 1<sup>9</sup>, Ro 8<sup>1</sup>, cf. vv. 7, 8), turning away wrath (1 Th 1<sup>10</sup>, Ro 5<sup>9</sup>), removing trespasses (2 Co 5<sup>19</sup>), and providing a channel through which God might forgive sins as an act not only of mercy but of justice (Ro 3<sup>25</sup>).

It is perhaps unnecessary to argue with the formality which sets up an abstract Law* to which even God must do homage. At this point even Dale becomes somewhat cumbersome. But it is obvious that even the parable of the Prodigal Son would not ring true in human ears unless it was for ever interpreted by a transaction which gives due weight to the enormity of a sin that entailed the sacrifice of the Father's only Son. Nor would St. Paul have succeeded in commending the death of Christ to the Christian conscience save by insisting that only thus could God reconcile a world unto Himself and be alike just and the justifier of the believer.

2. The death of Christ is the act of God (Tit 2<sup>13</sup> [cf. 2 P 1<sup>1</sup>], Ro 1<sup>4</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>4</sup>, Col 1<sup>15</sup>, Ph 2<sup>6</sup>, Ro 9<sup>6</sup>, Ac 20<sup>28</sup>).—It is at this point in the last resort that we become convinced of the deity of Christ (Denney). 'God was in Christ,' who was 'marked off as the Son of God by the resurrection.' Grace is always in St. Paul the free act of God's favour (Ro 3<sup>24</sup> 4<sup>5</sup> et al.), and it is 'the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ' (Ro 5<sup>15</sup> 16<sup>20</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>9</sup> 13<sup>14</sup>), whereby we have been enriched. The love of Christ which constrains us, because He died for all, is Divine (2 Co 5<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>20</sup> 'on behalf of Christ'—'as though God were entreating by us'). The position of the justified sinner is that of a restored sonship, because his redemption from first to last is the action towards him of the eternal God Himself. His right relation to the Father is witnessed by, or rather is, the presence of the Spirit of the Son 'sent forth' into his heart by that same God who had 'sent forth' the Son Himself to work out a redemption under the conditions which imposed this necessity of love upon the paternal heart of God (Gal 4<sup>6</sup>). When this is once apprehended, the objections to a doctrine of substitution ('ego sum peccatum tuum, tu es justitia mea'—2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>) are seen to have no application in fact. They are valid only if the activity of the Mediator is separated sharply from that of the Father. Such a distinction is neither Pauline nor Christian. The threefoldness of God is a revelation incidental to 'the unfolding of the work of Divine Atonement' (see Moberly, Atonement and Personality, ch. viii.). With St. Paul, as with St. John, it is the Father who is revealed in the Son (see above), whose work is manifest in the work of Christ. Redemption is parallel to Creation (Gal 6<sup>15</sup>, Col 1<sup>15</sup>, Eph 1<sup>10</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>20-22</sup>; cf. Jn 1<sup>1-3</sup>, Rev 21<sup>1-5</sup>). If the morality of the latter lies in the fact that 'God saw that it was good,' the justice of the former is witnessed not only by the 'new creation' but by the infinite worth of the Son (1 Co 6<sup>20</sup>), whom God gave up for us all and who endured the Cross.

* Such theories, like the attempt of Anselm in Cur Deus Homo to express the Atonement in terms of the feudal idea of society dominant in the Middle Age, to which they are akin, no doubt perform useful service in freeing the teaching of Scripture from unwarrantable and misleading accretions, but they are a method of expressing rather than of explaining the problem.

3. Reconciliation is antecedent to the renewal of the individual.—This is almost wholly ignored in modern German theology, which thereby goes far to forfeit its claim to be a true development of Lutheran teaching, losing touch with the NT generally and especially with St. Paul. Ritschl, for example, for whom the statement that 'Christ expiated sin by His passion' has 'very little warrant in the Biblical circle of thought,' regards the death of Jesus merely as 'the summary expression of the fact that Christ maintained His religious unity with God,' and places the forgiveness of sins in the 'effective union' of believers with God in that Divine kingdom which it was the vocation of Jesus to found (Justification and Reconciliation, Eng. tr. ch. viii.). Now, while Ritschl thus recovers a truly Apostolic conception in the Kingdom of God as the primary object of reconciliation (see below), he does so only at the expense of the 'finished work,' which is the glory of all true evangelicalism. St. Paul in particular leaves no doubt as to the objective character of the 'reconciliation' wrought by Christ, which stands complete before the preaching whereby comes hearing and faith. 'While we were enemies we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son' (Ro 5<sup>10</sup>, cf. vv. 8, 9, Col 1<sup>21, 22</sup>). He has previously shown (Ro 3<sup>24-26</sup>) that the vindication of God's righteousness (ἐπέδειξεν τῆς δικαιοσύνης αὐτοῦ), which conscience requires as a condition of the acquittal of sinners, has already been given in the redemption wrought by Christ, involving as it did the bloodshedding of the Son of God, which constituted the Redeemer a propitiation for sin. The equivalence adumbrated by the symbolic transfer of guilt to the head of the victim was consummated in Christ (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>, Gal 3<sup>13</sup>, cf. Lv 16<sup>8</sup> also Hebrews, passim, see below). The spectacle of such a substitution—not one man redeeming his brother, but God putting Himself in the sinner's place—was the manifestation of a Divine righteousness to which Law and Prophets, the Hebrew dispensation, had witnessed (Ro 3<sup>21</sup>). In Christ crucified that righteousness is complete, needing no human condition (ἔργον) to perfect it, but offered freely to him that believeth on the justifier of the ungodly, so that his faith can be reckoned instead of righteousness,* because through it the sinner appropriates Christ's finished work and becomes 'the righteousness of God in him' (2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>). Here the Atonement, as St. Paul interprets it, leads to the development of the doctrine of the Incarnation (Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup>, cf. 1 Co 15<sup>21-22</sup>). Christ is the second Adam; He recapitulates' (Eph 1<sup>10</sup>, cf. Protos, Jac. 1<sup>9</sup>, and Irenaeus, bk. iii. ch. xxx. 'recapitulans in se Adam') the human race, so that His redemptive, recreative act has more than a representative value. In Him 'all died' (2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>). This characteristic principle of Pauline theology—'in Christ'—expands on the other side into the doctrine of the new life through membership (Ro 12<sup>5-6</sup>, Eph 4<sup>7</sup>) in the body of Christ and fellowship of the one Spirit (1 Co 12<sup>13</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>). The second Adam is a quickening spirit, endowed with the grace of unction (Hooker, Eccles. Pol., bk. v. ch. lv.), imparting through the Resurrection a Spirit which dwells in the believer and finally quickens even his mortal body (Ro 8<sup>11</sup>).

That the communion of the elect people with God meant the indwelling of His Spirit, is a familiar idea of the OT (Is 63<sup>1-14</sup> Ezk 36<sup>27</sup>). So * Much harm has resulted from insisting on the 'forensic' character of this justification. No doubt δικαιοσύνη has associations of the law court; but it is as absurd to suppose that legal notions were present to the mind of St. Paul as to ascribe these ideas to the compiler of Genesis (Gn 15<sup>6</sup>) or the author of the thirty-second Psalm (Ps 32<sup>2</sup>). The word expresses only the free forgiveness of the Father's love.

the body of Christ, which is the Church (Col 1<sup>24</sup>), being the primary object of redemption (Ac 20<sup>28</sup>; Eph 1<sup>14, 22</sup> 2<sup>1-18</sup> 4<sup>2-8</sup>, Tit 2<sup>14</sup>; cf. 1 P 2<sup>1, 19</sup>), reconciled through death (Eph 2<sup>13</sup>), becomes a habitation of the Spirit (Eph 2<sup>21, 22</sup>), distributed according to the measure of faith to the several members (Eph 4<sup>7-16</sup>, Ro 12<sup>3</sup>), which through the Presence ('Christ in you,' 'the Spirit of the Son shed abroad in your hearts,' 'the fulness of God,' Eph 3<sup>19</sup>) have a common access to the Father (Eph 2<sup>18</sup>, cf. 3<sup>12</sup>), manifest the gifts of the Spirit (1 Co 12<sup>11</sup>, Ro 12<sup>6-8</sup>), and in mutual dependence grow together to 'the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ' (Eph 4<sup>13, 14, 15</sup>, Col 2<sup>10</sup>, Ro 12<sup>3</sup>). That this teaching, though given in St. Paul's individual manner, was no personal speculation of his own, may be gathered from its close relation to the great social sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist, which would be startling if, in view of their generally accepted significance in the primitive community, it were not obvious (Eph 4<sup>4-5</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>17</sup>).

To claim for the death of Christ that it is a completed act of reconciliation, the ground of the believing sinner's justification, and thus alike the subject of adoring gratitude and the source of renewed moral effort, is to establish a doctrine satisfactory to reason rather because it sets the several parts of Scripture and Christian teaching in an intelligible proportion to one another, than because it is itself rationally explained. The Cross establishes the Law (Ro 3<sup>20</sup>), and, as thus interpreted, manifests and supplies the need of the human spirit, and thus finds its justification in experience. But propitiatory sacrifice remains to be apprehended rather than understood. This is because it is a fact of religion rather than of ethics. Men have felt the need of something to set them right with God, even when they have been far from knowing that He is love. If this distinction be not perceived, we shall fail to see the true bearing of the evidence from Comparative Religion for the universality of the idea of atonement as manifested in myth, ritual, and custom. Thus Sir Oliver Lodge (see art. 'Suggestions towards the Reinterpretation of Christian Doctrine,' Hibbert Journal, vol. II, No. 3), while admitting the cogency of the universal belief in immortality, sees in the crudities of the widespread practice of sacrifice only a reason for discounting this element in traditional Christianity. There can be no doubt that atonement is fundamental to the idea of sacrifice (see Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, Lect. vi. p. 219; Lect. xi. pp. 377-384), and that this idea of 'covering' is prominent in the ritual of the OT (see Schultz, OT Theol., Eng. tr. vol. i. pp. 384-400).

Far from deprecating, or even ignoring the ancient sacrifices, the NT, as we have seen, presents Christ as the 'Lamb of God.' And in the Epistle to the Hebrews the Son is explicitly set forth as 'Himself the victim and Himself the priest,' manifested once at the consummation of the ages to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself (He 9<sup>26</sup>). Though, unlike St. Paul, who sees the analogy between heathen sacrifices and the Christian Eucharist (1 Co 10<sup>21</sup>), the author of this Epistle confines his attention to the worship of the Hebrews, the argument may be legitimately extended to embrace the 'blood of bulls and goats' offered under any system for what in view of the Cross is seen to be a typical, conventional purification and approach to God. There is, however, one important point in which the Mosaic sacrifices differ from all others. They fulfilled the primary condition of Divine appointment, and therefore availed within the limits of the institution. They were inadequate, not because, like the oblations of the heathen, they were material, but because, unlike the offering of Christ, they were transitory (He 10<sup>11</sup>), and alien to those who brought them (9<sup>12, 22</sup>). Christ, who elsewhere in the NT appears as the Mediator, Saviour, Word made flesh, here becomes specifically the Priest (2<sup>1</sup> [ὁ ἀγιάζων = 'priest'; the act of consecration is identified with the Cross in 13<sup>1</sup>, cf. 2<sup>20, 20</sup>]; 3<sup>1</sup> and passim), the appropriate scientific term, as we may call it, for whoever establishes the proper end of religion, communion with God. His is a 'finished work,' because by Divine appointment (3<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>1, 4, 5</sup>) He is 'a priest for ever' (5<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>24, 28</sup>), who 'through the eternal Spirit' (9<sup>14</sup>) obediently (5<sup>8</sup> 10<sup>9</sup>) fulfilled the priestly function (8<sup>3</sup>) in offering the body prepared for Him by the will of God (10<sup>2-9</sup>) as an eternal sacrifice (10<sup>1</sup>, cf. 5<sup>9</sup>). This is no metaphorical self-sacrifice, the essence of which is undeviating conformity to the general law which conditions human life. It is 'through his own blood' (9<sup>12</sup>) that He enters once for all into heaven. This lays the emphasis on His death as the means through which He makes that purification of sins (1<sup>3</sup> 9<sup>14</sup>) whereby access is gained to the throne of grace (10<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>14, 14</sup>). The open way witnesses to a sacrifice already offered and accepted (10<sup>10</sup> ἀγιασμένοι not ἀγιαζόμενοι, 10<sup>14</sup> τετελειώκεν [cf. Jn 19<sup>30</sup>] τοὺς ἀγιαζόμενους, which RV rightly translates 'them that are [not 'are being'] sanctified'). The new covenant is thus dedicated 'with blood' (9<sup>12-22</sup>), not because life is liberated through death (for why should death effect this result except according to Oriental mysticism?), but because a death must have taken place for the redemption of transgressions (9<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>2</sup>, cf. Mk 14<sup>24</sup> and parallels), which is, in the phraseology of sacrifices, what St. Peter says when he declares that 'Christ bore our sins in his body on the tree' (1 P 2<sup>24</sup>).

Minds to which sacerdotal ideas are repugnant will always resent such language as sophistical and superstitious, and, if they do not reject, will endeavour to explain away what is certainly the meaning of the Epistle to the Hebrews. No doubt this particular mould of thought is not necessary to the gospel, which is content to assert that Christ died for our sins. Yet the consequence of rejecting it is likely to be a denial of the atoning character of Christ's death. To describe the central fact of the gospel in ethical terms as a revelation of love, an exhibition of obedience, or a manifestation of the Divine character, expresses a side of truth, apart from which a doctrine of substitution may become, if not immoral, at least superstitious. But such descriptions cease to be true, if they are taken for definitions. The Cross is no longer a revelation, if it be not a redemption. If it be large enough to deal with a situation of which the factors are God, man, and sin; if it be a fact of religion through which men approach that Personality in whom they have their being, its significance cannot be understood unless it be recognized as a mystery, illuminating and illuminated by life and experience, but itself not reducible to simpler terms. It is at this point that 'mysteries,' in the Greek sense of the word, have their place. No organized religious system can entirely dispense with them. And Christianity with its sacraments of initiation and membership bears witness to the 'mystery of godliness' (1 Ti 3<sup>9</sup>) preached by it among the nations. Whatever may be the case with individuals, the race has found no language in which to express its need towards God but that of propitiatory sacrifice. To the method of its satisfaction many analogies point, but all taken together cannot sum up the Cross. For it is essentially an eternal fact, embracing but not embraced by experience; and its theory, though to the spiritual man increasingly rational, must ever be less than that which it seeks to explain. It is not distrust of reason, but the confidence of intelligent faith which, the more surely it realizes the reasonableness of the evangelical doctrine of the Atonement, will the more readily make the words of Bp. Butler its own: 'Some have endeavoured to explain the efficacy of what Christ has done and suffered for us, beyond what the Scripture has authorized; others, probably because they could not explain it, have been for taking it away, and confining His office as Redeemer of the world to His instruction, example, and government of the Church. Whereas the doctrine of the Gospel appears to be . . . not only that He revealed to sinners that they were in a capacity of salvation . . . but . . . that He put them into this capacity of salvation by what He did and suffered for them. . . . And it is our wisdom thankfully to accept the benefit, by performing the conditions upon which it is offered, on our part, without disputing how it was procured on His' (Analogy, pt. ii. ch. v.).

ATONEMENT, DAY OF.—See DAY OF ATONEMENT.

ATTRACTION.—Under this head we shall consider the attraction possessed and exerted by the character and the teaching of Christ as portrayed and expressed in the four Gospels. That character and that teaching are, of course, inseparable; for the work and the message of Christ are vitally and absolutely a personal work and a personal message. Thus the supreme appeal of the gracious invitation is: 'Come unto Me' (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>). Christ's character and teaching have an attraction, both extensive and intensive, which goes far beyond the merely æsthetic: it is a dynamical and spiritual attraction including and permeating man's personality. On the one hand, there is the uniqueness of the message (Jn 7<sup>9</sup>); on the other, the beauty of the character (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>); and yet the attraction of Christ for all men is something deeper than expression or analysis, the attraction of One lifted up from the earth, drawing all men to Himself (Jn 12<sup>32</sup>). This attraction is the continual directed pressure of His Holy Spirit in the hearts of men, and its reality is suggested by Ignatius' comparison of the Cross to a crane of which the Holy Spirit is the rope to draw mankind upwards to the Father in heaven (Eph. 9). The universality of this attraction is exemplified in the Gospel records. Jesus was the centre of attraction for multitudes, men and women and children (Mk 12<sup>27</sup> 22, Lk 19<sup>48</sup> etc.); and Zacchæus (Lk 19<sup>9</sup>), Nicodemus (Jn 3<sup>2</sup>), the 'Greeks' (Jn 12<sup>21</sup>) are only instances of this attractive power which had its culmination in the response of the Apostles to their Master's call. In these cases the attraction was visibly, audibly, and sensibly personal; the objects of it saw, heard, and often felt the Man that is called JESUS (Jn 9<sup>1</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup>).

To-day, the attraction of the teaching must be held to be personal still, through that action of the Holy Spirit which is implied in the inspiration of the Gospels. This attraction may also be said to have its seat in the fact of the revelation of God-in-man vouchsafed to the race of men fashioned in the likeness of God. Thus no limits can be set to the efficacy of the attraction of Christ which starts from such a source: witness the unending attractiveness of the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5-7) and the last discourses (Jn 13-17). The attraction, too, increases many-fold as it takes effect in drawing us nearer to the Master. One feature of this will be the more easy and quick perception of fresh beauties and glories in the four-fold Gospel of Christ, the acquisition of grace upon grace (Mt 11, Mk 10, Lk 15, Jn 9).

More difficult of expression, and intertwined with this attraction of the teaching, is the attraction of the character. Christ appealed to it. 'Me ye have not always' is the pathetic appeal He made as man (Mt 26<sup>11</sup>); 'I am with you all the days' is the glorious promise He makes as God (Mt 28<sup>20</sup>). Above all, however, it is the work of Christ in the sacrifice of self for love of others that draws the heart of man with cords stronger and surer than any variable and uncertain attractions. 'Having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end' (to the uttermost, εἰς τέλος, Jn 13<sup>1</sup>). It is the Cross of Christ which is the supreme instrument of the attraction, the Cross on which He was lifted up in glory and in shame.

ATTRIBUTES OF CHRIST.—In the Divine Person of Jesus Christ two perfect Natures were united. We shall therefore find attributes belonging to (1) His Divine Nature, (2) the union of the two Natures, (3) His true Human Nature. As in dealing with certain passages the extent of the Kenosis will weigh greatly, the present arrangement must be taken as largely provisional.

i. ATTRIBUTES BELONGING TO CHRIST'S DIVINE NATURE.—Jesus Christ is the manifestation of the Divine attributes. He is 'the image (εἰκών) of the invisible God' (Col 1<sup>9</sup>); 'the effulgence (ἀπαύρασμα) of his glory, and the very image (χαρακτῆρ) of his substance' (He 1<sup>3</sup>); 'the power of God and the wisdom of God' (1 Co 1<sup>24</sup>)—synonyms for Λόγος, in the phraseology of Jewish speculators. He applied to Himself words spoken of God, making the significant change of 'Me' to 'Thee' (Lk 7<sup>7</sup>, cf. Mt 3<sup>12</sup> and Lk 1<sup>7</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>); He asserted that He came forth from God (εκ Jn 8<sup>12</sup>, cf. παρά 17, ἀπό 13<sup>3</sup>), words which 'can only be interpreted of the true divinity of the Son of which the Father is the source and fountain' (Westcott); He claimed the power of interpreting and revising the Mosaic law (Mt 5<sup>21</sup>, Mk 10<sup>4</sup>); He acted in the temple as its master (Jn 2<sup>14</sup>, Mt 21<sup>12</sup>); He accepted from Thomas the supreme title (Jn 20<sup>28</sup>), and joined His name permanently with that of the Father (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>).

St John identified the Divine Person of Isaiah's vision with Christ (Jn 12<sup>41</sup>). St Paul charged the Ephesian elders to 'feed the Church of God which he purchased with his own blood' (Ac 20<sup>28</sup>) and applied to Christ the words of Joel, 'Whosoever shall call upon the name of the LORD shall be saved' (Ro 10<sup>13</sup>). Thus He is One to whom prayer is offered (Ac 7<sup>59</sup> 1<sup>14</sup> probably), cf. one of the earliest names for His disciples (Ac 9<sup>14</sup>, 21, 1 Cor 1<sup>3</sup>). In the Epistles His Divinity is everywhere assumed and is 'present in solution in whole pages from which not a single text could be quoted that explicitly declares it.* His name is joined with that of the Father, and a singular verb follows (1 Th 3<sup>11</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>16</sup>, 17); the title 'Lord' in the highest sense is given (Ro 10<sup>9</sup>, 1 Cor 12<sup>3</sup>, etc.); He is 'God blessed for ever' † (Ro 9<sup>24</sup>), and 'in him dwelleth all the fulness (πλήρωμα) of the Godhead bodily' ‡ (Col 2<sup>9</sup>, cf. 1<sup>19</sup> Jn 1<sup>16</sup>).

1. Eternal Existence.—Christ claimed that He came down from heaven without ceasing to be what He was before (Jn 3<sup>32</sup>). Existence without beginning is implied in 8<sup>58</sup> 'before Abraham was born (γενέσθαι) I am' (εἰμι), cf. Rev 21<sup>3</sup>; and He spoke of the glory which He had with the Father before the world was (Jn 17<sup>5</sup>). The Λόγος was in the beginning, He was the 'mediate Agent of Creation' (Jn 1<sup>1</sup>, Col 1<sup>16</sup>, He 1<sup>3</sup>, 10<sup>4</sup>); He is the upholder of all things (Col 1<sup>17</sup>, He 1<sup>3</sup>), the 'first-born of all creation' and 'before all things' (Col 1<sup>15</sup>, 17), cf. the use of 'manifested' (φανεροῦσθαι) in 1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>20</sup>, etc.

2. Unique Relation to God.—In a few passages only does Jesus call Himself the Son of God (Lk 22<sup>7</sup>, Jn 5<sup>25</sup> 9<sup>35</sup> 11<sup>4</sup>, cf. Mt 27<sup>43</sup>, Jn 10<sup>36</sup>); yet He was early conscious of His Sonship (Lk 2<sup>49</sup>). He frequently accepted the title (cf. Mt 16<sup>17</sup>), and this led to the charge of blasphemy (Jn 10<sup>33</sup>, cf. 5<sup>18</sup>). From the earliest time it was adopted as expressing the uniqueness of His Person (Ac 9<sup>20</sup>, Ro 1<sup>4</sup>, etc.). He is described as the 'Only-begotten' (μονογενής, Jn 1<sup>14</sup> 18 3<sup>16</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>9</sup>). He spoke of 'My Father,' 'Your Father,' but not of 'Our Father' (except as a form of address to be used by His disciples in prayer, Mt 6<sup>9</sup>, Lk 11<sup>2</sup> AV), thus drawing a sharp line of distinction between Himself and His disciples, from which, says Dalman, † 'it may be perceived that it was not the veneration of those that came after that first assigned to Him an exceptional relation to God incapable of being transferred to others.' In this respect Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, which forms the link between the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel, is quite explicit (cf. Hastings' DB ii. 623); cf. also Mk 13<sup>32</sup> and the clear distinction made in Jn 20<sup>17</sup>.

3. Union and Equality.—The Jews interpreted His words 'My Father worketh even until now and I work' as making Himself equal with God, and He did not correct them (Jn 5<sup>17</sup>, 18). 'I and the Father are one' (ἐγὼ ἕως) implies one essence not one Person (10<sup>30</sup>), cf. 5<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>38</sup> 14<sup>9</sup>, 17<sup>11</sup>, 21<sup>1</sup>. It is difficult to describe the manner in which St. Paul associates Him with the Father as the ground of the Church's being and the source of spiritual grace and peace, in any other terms than as ascribing to Him a coequal Godhead (1 Th 1<sup>3</sup> 3<sup>14</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>1</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>4</sup>), cf. Ph 2<sup>6</sup> (οὐχ ἀπαλαμῶν ἡγήσατο τὸ εἶναι ἰσα θεῶ). ‡

4. Subordination and Dependence—such as belong to the filial relation—are also clearly implied in Jn 5<sup>19</sup> ('The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father doing: for what things soever he doeth, these the Son also doeth in like manner'), and in Jn 14<sup>28</sup> ('The Father is greater than I'), cf. also Jn 5<sup>22</sup>, 26<sup>3</sup>, 6<sup>37</sup>. So in Epp. 'All things are yours; and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's' (1 Co 3<sup>21</sup>, 22), cf. 1 Co 11<sup>3</sup> 15<sup>28</sup>.

5. Universal Power is frequently claimed by Christ as His even on earth, although it could not be fully exercised until after the Ascension (Lk 10<sup>22</sup> 11 Jn 16<sup>32</sup>). He is given authority (ἐξουσία) over all flesh (Jn 17<sup>2</sup>); 'All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth' (Mt 28<sup>18</sup>), cf. Jn 3<sup>35</sup> 13<sup>3</sup>. Accordingly St. Peter describes Him as 'Lord of all' (Ac 10<sup>36</sup>); He is 'over all' (Ro 9<sup>2</sup>); and the 'head of all principality and power' (Col 2<sup>10</sup>).

† See Sanday-Headlam, Romans, pp. 233-238.
‡ The Words of Jesus, p. 190 (Eng. tr.).

6. Divine Consciousness and Knowledge.—Jesus claimed a unique knowledge of the Father and the exclusive power of revealing Him (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>). He spoke of heavenly things which could only be known by Divine consciousness (Mt 13<sup>35</sup>, Lk 15<sup>10</sup>, Jn 3<sup>12</sup> 14<sup>1</sup>). He was the great Prophet which was to come (Jn 6<sup>14</sup>, Ac 3<sup>22</sup>), the fullest revealer of God's will (He 1<sup>1</sup>), but He differed essentially from even the highest prophets, in that He spoke with authority as from Himself, and never introduced His message by such words as 'Thus saith the Lord.' 'In Him are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden' (Col 2<sup>3</sup>). He knew (Jn 18<sup>7</sup>) and made known the details of His Passion and Resurrection (Mk 8<sup>31</sup> 9<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>34</sup> etc., cf. 14<sup>29</sup>). He foretold the sufferings of His disciples (Mt 10<sup>35</sup>), the destruction of Jerusalem (Lk 19<sup>43</sup> 21<sup>21</sup>), events preceding the end of the world (Mt 24 ||) and the judgment of mankind (see below). Here too may be mentioned His power of knowing the thoughts of men. Such knowledge is described both as relative, acquired (γινώσκω, cf. Mk 2<sup>8</sup>), and absolute, possessed (εἶδεν, cf. Jn 6<sup>61</sup>, Lk 11<sup>17</sup>), cf. Lk 7<sup>35</sup> 49 9<sup>47</sup>. He seems to be addressed as καρδιογνώστης in Ac 1<sup>24</sup>, which agrees with what is told as His supernatural knowledge of the thoughts and lives of persons, cf. Jn 2<sup>24</sup> 25 ( 'He knew all men. . . he himself knew what was in man'), also Lk 19<sup>10</sup> Jn 1<sup>48</sup> 42. 29 6<sup>64</sup> 11. 14. It appears also with regard to things (Mt 17<sup>27</sup> 21<sup>26</sup>, Lk 5<sup>4</sup>, cf. Jn 21<sup>17</sup>). Whether such passages imply absolute omniscience, or omniscience conditioned by human nature, depends upon the view taken of the Kenosis (see Westcott, Aid. Note on Jn 2<sup>24</sup>; Gore, Bamp. Lect. p. 147).

7. Self-assertion and Exclusive Claims.—His works were such as no other man did (Jn 15<sup>22</sup>). His words shall outlast heaven and earth (Mt 24<sup>35</sup>), men will be judged by their relation to Him (Mt 7<sup>28</sup> 10<sup>42</sup>), and by their belief or unbelief on Him (Mk 16<sup>16</sup>, Jn 6<sup>29</sup> 12<sup>48</sup>). He requires the forsaking of everything which may prove a hindrance to following Him (Mt 8<sup>21</sup> 10<sup>33</sup>, Mk 10<sup>21</sup>, Lk 14<sup>33</sup>). Suffering and loss incurred for His Name's sake will be rewarded in the Regeneration (Mt 19<sup>29</sup> ||), even now those who suffer for His sake are blessed (Mt 5<sup>10</sup>). He claims to be the Light of the world (Jn 8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>12</sup>), the Way, the Truth, and the Life (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>). Eternal life, spiritual strength, and growth can come only from union with Him and feeding on Him (Jn 5<sup>40</sup> 6<sup>54</sup> 10<sup>28</sup> 15<sup>4</sup> 17<sup>3</sup>). He is the Giver of rest and peace (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>, Jn 14<sup>27</sup>). And such claims are endorsed by St. John (Jn 1<sup>9</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>12</sup>) and St. Paul (Ro 8<sup>1</sup>, Ph 4<sup>8</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>12</sup>).

8. ATTRIBUTES BELONGING TO THE UNION OF THE TWO NATURES.—4. Mediation.—There is a twofold Mediatorial activity ascribed to the Son of God which must be distinguished; that presented in the revelation of the Logos proceeding from God all-creating and all-sustaining; and that exhibited in the work of the Christ, leading back to God and transforming the relation of contrast into one of union, that God may be all in all.* The former has been already mentioned, the latter appears in passages which speak of Christ as delivering us from sin and Satan (Jn 12<sup>31</sup>, He 2<sup>14</sup> 1 Jn 3<sup>8</sup>), as obtaining for us eternal life (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>, Ro 6<sup>23</sup> etc.), as procuring the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit (Jn 14<sup>26</sup>, Ac 2<sup>38</sup>, Tit 3<sup>6</sup> etc.), conferring Christian graces (1 Co 1<sup>4</sup>, Eph 1<sup>3</sup> etc.), and acting as our representative High Priest (He 4<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>25</sup> etc.).† The title 'Mediator' (μεσίτης) occurs in 1 Ti 2<sup>5</sup>, He 8<sup>9</sup> 12<sup>24</sup>.

* See Martensen, Christian Dogmatics, § 180.
† Dale, Monument, p. 421.

2. Sovereignty.—One object of Christ's coming was to found a world-wide imperishable society, called the Kingdom of Heaven or the Kingdom of God. He was foretold in prophecy as King (Zec 9<sup>9</sup>, cf. Mt 21<sup>5</sup>). He Himself spoke of His Kingdom (Mt 13<sup>44</sup> 16<sup>28</sup>, Lk 22<sup>29</sup>) and accepted the title from Pilate, but explained that it was 'not of this world' (Jn 18<sup>36</sup>). Satan tempted Him to ante-date it by a short but sinful method (Mt 4<sup>8</sup> 9). He is 'King of Kings and Lord of Lords' (Rev 19<sup>16</sup>, cf. 11<sup>15</sup>).

Dalman (Words of Jesus, p. 133 f.) thinks, assuming an Aramaic original, that ἐν τῷ ἑαυτοῦ ἑαυτοῦ would have to be rendered 'when I am King'; etc., and Lk 22<sup>29</sup> 'as King'; cf. Dn 6<sup>28</sup> 21; 7<sup>13</sup> 27; 'in the reign of Darius'. On the 'originality' and 'audacity' of Christ's design to form a world-wide kingdom see Liddon, Bamp. Lect. iii.; Eccle Homo, ch. v.

3. Consciousness of His Mission was ever present to His mind. Frequently He uses such expressions as 'the Father that sent me' (Jn 6<sup>44</sup> 58, cf. 20<sup>21</sup>), 'Him that sent me' (Jn 7<sup>28</sup> 12<sup>44</sup> 16<sup>13</sup>), 'I am sent' (Mt 15<sup>24</sup>, Lk 4<sup>43</sup>). There was the sense of purpose in His life, 'To this end am I come into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth' (Jn 18<sup>37</sup>); it is implied in the repeated use of 'must' (δεῖ), implying moral obligation, especially that constraint which arises from Divine appointment' (Grimm-Thayer, see Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Lk 24<sup>46</sup> TR, Jn 3<sup>4</sup> etc.); and cf. Lk 9<sup>31</sup> 'He steadfastly set (ἑστήριξε) his face to go to Jerusalem.'

4. Sinlessness.—While He had the most perfect appreciation of sin and holiness, while He prescribed repentance and conversion, rebuking all self-righteousness and pride, He was absolutely without any consciousness of sin or need of repentance in Himself. He claimed to be free from it (Jn 14<sup>30</sup>); He challenged examination and conviction (Jn 8<sup>20</sup>); He could say at the end: 'I glorified thee on the earth, having accomplished the work which thou hast given me to do' (Jn 17<sup>4</sup>, cf. Jn 8<sup>29</sup> 10<sup>38</sup>, Mt 3<sup>17</sup>); and as to His best disciples, Lk 17<sup>10</sup>). The truth of His claim was testified by His forerunner (Mt 3<sup>15</sup>), most intimate friends (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>), enemies (Mk 14<sup>30</sup>), judges (Jn 18<sup>38</sup>, Mt 27<sup>24</sup> etc., Lk 23<sup>14</sup>), and betrayer (Mt 27<sup>4</sup>)—on Mk 10<sup>18</sup> see the Commentaries. Christ's moral perfection is recognized everywhere in the Epistles: 'who knew no sin' (2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>); 'who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth' (1 P 2<sup>22</sup>). He is holy (ἅγιος, Ac 3<sup>14</sup>, Rev 3<sup>7</sup>; ἅγιος, He 7<sup>26</sup>), righteous (δικαίος, 1 P 3<sup>18</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup>), pure (ἀγνός, 1 Jn 3<sup>3</sup>), guileless and undefiled (ἀκακός, ἀμώματος, He 7<sup>26</sup>); cf. He 4<sup>15</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>5</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>12</sup>.

5. Glory.—St. John, summing up his experience, writes: 'We beheld his glory, glory as of the only-begotten from the Father' (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>); here many find a reference to the Shekinah (note ἐκτείνωντες) and interpret δοξα as the 'totality of the Divine attributes' (cf. Liddon, B<sup>2</sup> 232); others, as 'a glory which corresponded with His filial relation to the Father even when He had laid aside His divine glory' (Westcott). Isaiah in his vision saw His glory (Jn 12<sup>41</sup>), it was manifested in His 'signs' (Jn 2<sup>11</sup>), and at the Transfiguration (2 P 1<sup>17</sup>). In some sense it was laid aside or veiled at the Incarnation (Jn 17<sup>5</sup>), but Christ constantly spoke of it as regained by means of His death and resurrection (Jn 12<sup>32</sup> 13<sup>31</sup> 17<sup>1</sup> 5), cf. Jn 12<sup>41</sup>, Ph 3<sup>21</sup>, and Rev 5<sup>12</sup> ('Worthy is the Lamb that hath been slain to receive the power and riches . . . and glory and blessing'). He will come hereafter in His glory as Judge (Mt 25<sup>31</sup>, cf. Mt 19<sup>28</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>13</sup>; and in Epp. He is styled 'the Lord of glory' (1 Co 2<sup>8</sup>, Ja 2<sup>1</sup>).

'Saviour of the world' given (Jn 4<sup>2</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>14</sup>, cf. 1 Ti 4<sup>9</sup>), but 'Saviour' is found frequently (Lk 2<sup>11</sup>, cf. 2<sup>30</sup>, Ac 5<sup>31</sup> 13<sup>3</sup>, Ph 3<sup>20</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>18</sup> etc.). In this connexion may be noted the power of forgiving sins which He claimed on earth as Son of Man; see His words to the man sick of the palsy, with the comment of the bystanders (Mt 9<sup>2</sup>), and to the woman who was a sinner (Lk 7<sup>40</sup>), cf. Ac 5<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>42</sup>.

7. Judgment.—One of the most momentous attributes is the power of judging mankind, involving complete and entire knowledge of the thoughts, actions, and circumstances of all men (cf. 1 Co 4<sup>5</sup>). That such should be His work was foretold by John the Baptist (Mt 3<sup>12</sup>) and asserted by Himself (Mt 16<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>31</sup> etc., cf. Rev 22<sup>13</sup>). It is committed to Him by the Father (Jn 5<sup>27</sup>), because He is a son of man (Jn 6<sup>57</sup> RVm), and His disciples should watch, making supplication that they may prevail . . . to stand before Him (Lk 21<sup>36</sup>). He is 'ordained by God to be the judge of quick and dead' (Ac 10<sup>42</sup>, cf. 17<sup>31</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>), and before His judgment-seat we all must be made manifest (2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, cf. Ro 14<sup>10</sup>).

8. Supreme Power.—He exercised power over nature (Jn 2<sup>1</sup>, Mt 8<sup>23</sup> 14<sup>29</sup> 21<sup>8</sup>, Mk 6<sup>45</sup>, Lk 6<sup>45</sup>). His various miracles of healing showed His power over disease. Sometimes the cure was accompanied by His touch (Mt 3<sup>18</sup> 12<sup>22</sup>, Lk 22<sup>51</sup>); sometimes the sufferer touched Him (Mk 5<sup>28</sup>, Lk 6<sup>19</sup>); it was wrought by a word (Mt 12<sup>29</sup>); or by visible and tangible means (Jn 9<sup>6-7</sup>); and even at a distance (Mt 8<sup>5</sup>, Mk 7<sup>3</sup>, Jn 4<sup>46</sup>). Three instances of power over death are recorded (Mt 6<sup>45</sup>, Lk 7<sup>14</sup>, Jn 11<sup>43</sup>); cf. Mt 11<sup>5</sup>. His power also over evil spirits was shown in many cases and acknowledged by them (Mk 1<sup>24</sup> 5<sup>13</sup>, Lk 4<sup>38</sup> etc., cf. Ac 10<sup>38</sup>). He was the One stronger than the strong man, Lk 11<sup>22</sup>, cf. Mt 12<sup>29</sup>. He excited astonishment in the people (noted chiefly in Mk. and Lk.). It was caused by His teaching (Mt 7<sup>28</sup>, Mk 1<sup>22</sup>), His words of grace (Lk 4<sup>22</sup>, cf. Jn 7<sup>18</sup> 46), and the authority with which He spoke (Lk 4<sup>32</sup>); in these instances θαυμάζειν and ἐκπλησσεῖσθαι are used. The effects produced by His miracles are expressed by similar words of amazement—θαυμάζειν (Mt 15<sup>31</sup>, Mk 5<sup>20</sup>, Lk 11<sup>14</sup>, Jn 7<sup>31</sup>); ἐκπλησσεῖσθαι (Mk 7<sup>29</sup>, Lk 9<sup>45</sup>); θάμβος and ἐκθαυβεῖσθαι (Mk 9<sup>18</sup>, Lk 4<sup>28</sup>); ἐκθαύω and ἐξίστασθαι (Mk 2<sup>23</sup>, Lk 5<sup>26</sup> 8<sup>26</sup>); φόβος (Lk 5<sup>26</sup> 7<sup>16</sup>). Among the disciples the same feelings were caused: 'they were sore amazed in themselves' (Μαθ ἐξίσταντο, Mk 6<sup>51</sup>); 'being afraid they marvelled' (φοβηθέντες θαύμασαν, Lk 8<sup>25</sup>); 'they were amazed (ἐθαυμάσθησαν) and astonished exceedingly' (ἐξεπλήσθησαν, Mk 10<sup>24</sup> 28); 'they were amazed (ἐθαυμάσθησαν) and afraid' (ἐφοβήθησαν) on the last journey to Jerusalem (Mk 10<sup>28</sup>).

9. Dignity.—An attribute commanding respect and reverence is closely connected with the above. The Baptist declared Christ to be immeasurably above himself (Jn 1<sup>27</sup>), while Christ described him as the greatest of the prophets because His forerunner (Mt 11<sup>11</sup>); the disciples 'were afraid to ask him' (Mk 9<sup>3</sup>, cf. Jn 4<sup>27</sup>); those who came to arrest Him fell to the ground (Jn 18<sup>6</sup>, cf. 10<sup>29</sup> RV), and Pilate was the more afraid hearing His claim to be the Son of God (Jn 19<sup>8</sup>); note His silence (Mt 26<sup>62</sup>, Mk 15<sup>2</sup>, Lk 23<sup>9</sup>). Other feelings, however, than reverence for His dignity were also excited, e.g. repulsion in the demons (Lk 4<sup>41</sup>) and in the Gerasenes (Mk 5<sup>17</sup>); worship (Lk 4<sup>42</sup>); shame in His adversaries, joy in the multitude (Lk 13<sup>17</sup>); consciousness of unworthiness in the centurion (Mt 8<sup>8</sup>), and of sinfulness in Peter (Lk 5<sup>8</sup>).

10. Restraint in the use of Power.—This attribute is strongly marked. Christ never used His Divine power for His own benefit (Mt 4<sup>23</sup>) nor for destroying life (on apparent exceptions, Mk 5<sup>13</sup>, Mt 21<sup>19</sup>, see Comm.). He restrained it that the Scriptures might be fulfilled (Mt 26<sup>54</sup>), and His exercise of it was often limited by want of faith on the part of those present (Mt 13<sup>12</sup>).

iii. ATTRIBUTES BELONGING TO CHRIST'S TRUE HUMAN NATURE.—Becoming truly man, He took upon Him our nature as the Fall had left it, with its limitations, its weaknesses, and its ordinary feelings so far as they are not tainted by sin. He partook of flesh and blood, and in all things was made like unto His brethren (He 2<sup>14</sup> 17, cf. Ro 8<sup>3</sup>). He possessed a true human will, but ever subject to the guidance of the Divine will (Jn 6<sup>38</sup>, Mt 26<sup>39</sup>); a human soul (ψυχή, Mt 26<sup>38</sup>, Jn 12<sup>27</sup>) and a human spirit (πνεῦμα, Mk 2<sup>8</sup>, Lk 23<sup>46</sup>, Jn 11<sup>33</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>18</sup>); He was representative Man (1 Co 15<sup>22</sup>); all which is implied in 'the Word became flesh' (6 λόγος ἐγένετο ἄνθρωπος, Jn 1<sup>14</sup>). The Permanence of His Manhood is evident since He was recognized after the Resurrection (cf. Jn 20<sup>27</sup>) and ascended with His glorified body into Heaven; there He intercedes as our High Priest (He 4<sup>14</sup> etc.), and will one day come again in like manner as He was seen to go into heaven (Ac 1<sup>9</sup>).

1. Limitation of Power seems to be implied in the Incarnation; it is noted especially by St. Mark, who has several passages expressing inability (οὐ δύνασθαι, Mk 1<sup>45</sup> 7<sup>24</sup> and 6<sup>5</sup>, which compare with Mt 13<sup>28</sup>).

2. Limitation of Knowledge is distinctly asserted by Jesus Himself on one point (Mt 24<sup>36</sup> RV, Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, cf. Ac 1<sup>7</sup>, He 10<sup>32</sup>). In His childhood He grew, 'becoming in wisdom' (ἐπιμαρτάνω); He advanced (προέκοτε) in wisdom (Lk 2<sup>40</sup> 52); the story of the fig-tree implies that He expected to find fruit (ἤλθεν εἰ ἄρα εἴρησαι τι ἐν αὐτῇ, Mk 11<sup>13</sup>). He prayed as if the future were not clear (Mt 26<sup>39</sup>); He asked questions for information (Mt 9<sup>28</sup>, Mk 6<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>27</sup> 9<sup>21</sup>, Lk 8<sup>30</sup>, Jn 11<sup>34</sup>), cf. Mk 11<sup>17</sup>.

3. Astonishment and Surprise.—In two cases only is Johannine used; it is noted especially by St. Mark, who has several passages expressing inability (οὐ δύνασθαι, Mk 1<sup>45</sup> 7<sup>24</sup> and 6<sup>5</sup>, which compare with Mt 13<sup>28</sup>).

6. Suffering came from such temptation (He 2<sup>18</sup>); but the word πάσχειν is specially used of the last days of His earthly life. Thus the prophecy of the Suffering Servant in Isaiah was fulfilled (Mk 9<sup>12</sup>, Lk 24<sup>26-27</sup>, cf. εἰ παθὴς ὁ Χριστός, Ac 26<sup>68</sup>). Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi marked the time when Jesus began to emphasize this side of the Messianic prophecies (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>, cf. Mt 4<sup>17</sup>). The only absolute use of the word in the Gospels occurs in Lk 22<sup>36</sup>. (See 'Sorrow' below.) By suffering He learned the moral discipline of human experience. He was 'made perfect' and 'learned obedience' (He 2<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>8-9</sup>), so that He can be a pattern and example for Christians (1 P 2<sup>21</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>6</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>). He exhibited faith (He 3<sup>2-6</sup>) and trust (Jn 11<sup>46</sup>, He 2<sup>13</sup>) in the highest forms. He is the 'author and perfecter (ἀρχηγὸς καὶ τελειωτὴς) of our faith' (He 12<sup>2</sup>); 'the perfect example—perfect in realization and effect—of that faith which we are to imitate trusting in Him' (Westcott). Submission and Obedience He showed to Mary and Joseph also (Lk 2<sup>51</sup>), and to His Heavenly Father (Mt 26<sup>52</sup>); cf. Ro 5<sup>12</sup>. The purpose of His life was summed up in the words 'to do thy will, O God' (He 10<sup>7</sup>).

Liability to Human Infirmities.—Jesus experienced hunger (Mt 4<sup>2</sup> 21<sup>12</sup>, cf. Jn 4<sup>31</sup>); thirst (Jn 4<sup>7</sup> 19<sup>28</sup>, cf. Mt 27<sup>34</sup>); weariness and pain: 'being wearied (κεκοπαισμένος) with His journey He sat thus (ὄντως) by the well' (Jn 4<sup>6</sup>); in the boat He 'fell asleep' (ἀφώνησε, Lk 8<sup>2</sup>); in the Garden there appeared an angel strengthening Him (ἐνισχύων, Lk 22<sup>43</sup>); He was unable to carry His cross (Mk 15<sup>21</sup>), and it would seem that He Himself required support (cf. φέρουσι v. 22 with ἐξάγουσι v. 20); cf. 2 Co 13<sup>4</sup>, He 4<sup>15</sup>. No sickness is mentioned (the quot. in Mk 8<sup>17</sup> can hardly bear this meaning); He truly died, but it was a voluntary death (Jn 10<sup>18</sup>); and note that in no Gospel is the word 'died' used of His passing from life); cf. Ro 6<sup>9</sup> 'death hath no more dominion over him' (οὐκ ἐν κυριότητι), and Ac 2<sup>24</sup>.

Sorrow.—The prophecy was amply fulfilled that the Messiah should be 'a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.' Sorrow was inevitable for one who had such insight into human nature, and so sympathized with his woes (cf. Jn 11<sup>35-38</sup>). It came also from 'the gainsaying' (ἀντιλογία) of sinners (He 12<sup>9</sup>, cf. 1 P 2<sup>21-24</sup>). One of the greatest causes of grief is misunderstanding of motive and action, which He experienced in abundance. On one occasion His relatives spoke of Him as 'mad' (ἐτήρη, Mk 3<sup>21</sup>); His enemies said He had a demon and was mad (Jn 10<sup>20</sup>), and ascribed His works to Beelzebub (Lk 11<sup>15</sup>). There was disappointment also (Lk 13<sup>34</sup>, Jn 5<sup>40</sup>). The knowledge of what was coming cast a shadow on His life (Lk 12<sup>35</sup>, Jn 12<sup>7</sup>); it is implied in the description of the last journey to Jerusalem (Mk 10<sup>32</sup>); at the Last Supper He was troubled in spirit (ἐταράχθη, Jn 13<sup>21</sup>); it is clearly expressed in the accounts of the Agony—Mt 26<sup>37</sup> ἤρξαστο λυπεῖσθαι καὶ ἀθροῦναι, the latter expressing 'utter loneliness, desertion, and desolation' (Eidersheim); Mk 14<sup>33</sup> ἤρξαστο ἐσθραβεῖσθαι καὶ ἀθροῦναι; Lk 22<sup>44</sup> γαῖανος ἐν ἁγίῳ, and the Bloody Sweat; His soul was περὶ ἅπαντος ἔως θανάτου (Mt 26<sup>38</sup>); the strong word ἀπεσπάσθη 'was parted' is used in Lk 22<sup>44</sup> as if the separation itself caused grief; and the sorrow culminated in the heart-broken cry on the cross (Mt 27<sup>46</sup>). Cf. He 5<sup>7</sup> μετὰ κρονῆς λεγομένης καὶ θάουρου.

Joy.—It would be a great mistake, however, to regard His whole life as one of continuous overwhelming sorrow.* Our accounts deal almost entirely with the last three years, and surely there must have been much real happiness in the previous thirty years spent in honest work amid the beautiful surroundings of Nazareth, especially as He was conscious of no stain of guilt or failure in duty, and felt no remorse. Even in the Gospels we see His pure appreciation of nature and of children's games. It is once recorded that He rejoiced in spirit (ἠγαλλιάσατο, Lk 10<sup>21</sup>), and several times He used 'joy' (γαῖα and χαῖρα) of Himself (Jn 11<sup>15</sup> 15<sup>11</sup> 17<sup>13</sup>, cf. Lk 15<sup>7-10</sup>). He must have felt joy in communion with His Father (Mt 11<sup>25</sup>, Jn 11<sup>41</sup>), and in the consciousness of success (Lk 10<sup>17</sup>, Jn 16<sup>33</sup>). Complaisance appears in His praise of the centurion (Mt 8<sup>10</sup>) and His words to Simon (Mt 16<sup>17</sup>); cf. Mt 21<sup>15</sup>, Lk 19<sup>40</sup>, Jn 4<sup>32</sup>. So He 12<sup>2</sup> ('for the joy that was set before him he endured the cross'). See 'Sociability' (22).

* See Brooks, New Starts in Life, Sermon on 'Joy and Sorrow'.

17. Fear in any unworthy sense (φόβος) is not attributed to Him. In He 5<sup>7</sup> it is said that He was 'heard for His godly fear' (εὐλαβείας). Westcott takes the word in 'its noblest sense', so Alford 'reverent submission' (see note); but Grimm-Thayer prefers to render as 'fear, anxiety, dread'; 'by using this more select word, the writer, skilled as he was in the Greek tongue, speaks more reverently of the Son of God than if he had used φόβος.' Caution, however, is often noted; cf. His withdrawals before opposition (Mk 3<sup>7-9</sup>, Jn 7<sup>11-13</sup>), also Jn 6<sup>15</sup> and the directions about the place of the Last Supper (Lk 22<sup>10</sup>).

18. Desire (ἐπιθυμία, see art. DESIRE) is once used of Himself (Lk 22<sup>15</sup>), and a longing for sympathy is apparent in His bringing of the three into the Garden and His returning to them between His prayers (Mt 26<sup>37</sup>): 'in magnis tentationibus juvat solitudo, sed tamen ut in propinquo sint amici' (Bengel).

19. That he felt shame at hearing a foul story seems a fair inference from Jn 8<sup>31</sup> (see Ecco Homo, ch. ix. end). He Himself says, 'Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words, of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed' (ἐτασχυθήσεται, Lk 9<sup>26</sup>); cf. He 12.

20. Anger and indignation He often showed, though ὄργη is attributed to Him in only one passage in the Gospels (Mk 3<sup>5</sup>; cf. ὄργη τοῦ Ἀπριου, Rev 6<sup>10</sup>). He was 'moved with indignation' at the action of the disciples (ἠναγκάσθη, Mk 10<sup>14</sup>); possibly this should also be the translation of ἐπιβουλεύεται in Jn 11<sup>32,38</sup> (RVm), on which see notes of Westcott and Godet. The same word is rendered 'strictly charge' ('threateningly to enjoin', Grimm-Thayer) in Mt 9<sup>29</sup>, Mk 1<sup>42</sup>. His rebukes (ἐπιτιμῶν) are noted (Mt 8<sup>32</sup>, Mk 1<sup>29</sup>, Lk 4<sup>39</sup>). Cf. also Mk 5<sup>27</sup>, 11<sup>27</sup>, Jn 2<sup>15</sup>, Mt 21<sup>21</sup>. Sometimes he used Irony and Sarcasm: Lk 13<sup>1</sup>, Mk 7<sup>9</sup> (καλὰς ἀθετεῖ); Lk 13<sup>2</sup> ('that fox'); Lk 16<sup>2</sup> ('and was buried' ['a sublime irony,' Trench]). Hypocrisy excited His deepest abhorrence. Cf. the Woes on the Scribes and Pharisees, Mt 23<sup>23</sup>; ending 'ye serpents, ye offspring of vipers'; also Mt 12<sup>24</sup>.

22. Sociability.—In this respect Jesus presented a marked contrast to the Baptist, which was commented upon (Lk 7<sup>33,34</sup>). He accepted invitations from Pharisees (Lk 7<sup>36</sup> 11<sup>37</sup> 14<sup>1</sup>) and from Publicans (Mt 9<sup>10</sup>, cf. Lk 19<sup>2</sup>). In the home at Bethany He was a welcome guest (Lk 10<sup>38</sup>). His first 'sign' was wrought at a marriage feast (Jn 2<sup>1</sup>), and much of His parabolic teaching was suggested by feasts and the incidents of ordinary life; cf. Mt 22<sup>2</sup> 25<sup>1-11</sup>, Lk 14<sup>16</sup> 19<sup>12</sup>.

23. His Catholicity is to be noted finally. Though a Jew on the human side, yet He rose entirely above all merely national limits. 'He can be equally claimed by both sexes, by all classes, by all men of all nations.'* Even in His earthly ministry, though necessarily confined to His own nation (Mt 15<sup>24</sup>), His sympathy went beyond these bounds; cf. Mt 8<sup>31</sup>, 15<sup>22</sup>, Lk 10<sup>32</sup>, 17<sup>35</sup>, Jn 4<sup>23,35</sup> 10<sup>16</sup> 12<sup>20,47</sup>. He looked forward to the time when 'they shall come from the east and west, and from the north and south' (Lk 13<sup>29</sup>); cf. Mk 13<sup>35</sup> and His last command, Mt 28<sup>19</sup>. So each race of men as it is gathered into the Church finds in Him its true ideal.

We have thus presented to us a Person in whom Divine power, wisdom, and goodness are joined with the highest and holiest type of manhood. The portrait is 'such as no human being could have invented. . . . We could not portray such an image without some features which would betray their origin, being introduced by our limited, erring, sinful minds. . . . And least of all could Jews have done so; for this was not by any means the ideal of their minds' (Luthardt, Fundamental Truths of Christianity, 236 f., and notes). See also art. W. H. DUNDAS.

AUGUSTUS.—The designation usually applied to Caius Octavius, son of Caius Octavius and Atia, grandson of Julia the sister of C. Julius Caesar, grand-nephew of the Dictator and ultimately his adopted son and heir. He was born 23rd Sept. B.C. 63, not far from the 'House' on the Palatine afterwards built for him; declared Emperor B.C. 29; honoured with the title of 'Augustus' B.C. 27; died 19th Aug. A.D. 14 at Nola, when he had almost reached the age of 77.

If we take B.C. 6 as the corrected date for the birth of Jesus, we find that Augustus was then in his 58th year, had already been Emperor 23 years, and had before him 20 more. Though his reign thus runs parallel with the Christian era for 20 years, there is but a single allusion to him in the Gospel history (Lk 2<sup>1</sup>). In the NT writings there are but three other instances of the use of the name Augustus. Of these one only (Ac 27<sup>1</sup>) can be held as possibly pointing to him, the other two (Ac 25<sup>21</sup> and 25<sup>26</sup>) mean the reigning Caesar (RV 'Emperor'), in both cases Nero. Even that solitary allusion to Caesar Augustus might have had no place in the Gospel record, had it not been St. Luke's aim to 'trace the course of all things accurately from the first.' In 'drawing up his narrative' he makes it evident that Nazareth, not Bethlehem, was the home of Joseph and Mary, and that the 'enrolment,' originating in a decree of Caesar Augustus, was the occasion of the journey from Nazareth within a little time of the expected birth. The Syrian governor is named with the view of fixing the date, as was the custom in those days. Theophilus, as a Roman official, would have access to the list of provincial governors, and must have at once understood the exact period meant. Thus Augustus' contact with Jesus, so far as Scripture deals with it, begins and ends with Lk 2<sup>1</sup>.

It need not surprise us that there is no further reference in the 20 years of contemporaneous history that followed. The birth of Jesus took place in a remote part of the Empire and in an insignificant town of Judah. The first 30 years of His life, with the exception of the brief sojourn in Egypt, were spent in the obscure, even despised, Nazareth. Among His townsmen He was known only as the carpenter (Mk 6<sup>3</sup>), or the carpenter's son (Mt 13<sup>55</sup>). Though the arrival of the wise men from the East, with the inquiry as to the birth of 'the King of the Jews,' troubled Herod and 'all Jerusalem with him' (Mt 2<sup>3</sup>), the commotion caused by their advent soon passed with the tyrant's death in B.C. 4. Even the Massacre of the Innocents 'from two years old and under' in Bethlehem may never have been heard of in the palace of Augustus, or, if heard of, would have made very little impression, owing to the many acts of cruelty that had marked Herod's reign. It was about this very time that Augustus is reported to have said that it was 'better to be Herod's sow than his son' (Macrob. Saturn. ii. 4).

For St. Luke, with his wider outlook as a cultured Greek writing to a Roman official, it was quite natural to give a distinct place in his record to the decree about the census as leading up to the birth in Bethlehem. The object of the decree is given in the RV correctly as 'an enrolment' (επιγραφῆς), not necessarily involving 'a taxing' as well. As on this occasion it did not lead to any serious uprising of the Jews, as in A.D. 6, it must have been only a census in accordance with Jewish customs: 'all went to enrol themselves, every one to his own city.' The historian is careful to point out that it was part only of a world-wide enrolment ('all the world'). In the light of later research, we can add that this decree seems to have introduced a periodic census in the Roman Empire. The carefully chosen language of St. Luke distinguishes between the going up from Galilee as an act once for all completed (ἐπισημασμένης), and an enrolment begun and having a continuance (ἐπισημασμένης ἀσπασταίας).<sup>2</sup> The further description of the census as 'the first' accords with this, not the first under Quirinus, but the first of a series. For those to whom St. Luke wrote the decree was memorable as 'the first' that affected the Jews. Other enrolments may have taken place before it under Augustus, as the review by the Emperor himself in the celebrated Monsumentum Aeneanum bears, but there is no contradiction between that and the Evangelist's testimony. Three distinct censuses are there named (in A.C. 23, A.C. 8, and in A.D. 14). Only the number of Roman citizens is given in each case, as all others might not have been considered worthy of being mentioned in the Emperor's Memorials. Important light has recently been thrown on the system of enrolments in the Roman Empire through the labours of various scholars referred to by Prof. W. M. Ramsay in his volume Was Christ born at Bethlehem? The tombs and even the dust-heaps of Egypt are proving that enrolments of households there were quite common, and even that a cycle of 14 years was observed. Applying this cycle to the period immediately before and after the Christian era, we bring out well-known dates, B.C. 8 and A.D. 8, the former marking a Roman-citizen census taken by Augustus, and the other that of the 'great census' when the disturbances took place in Palestine which were quelled by Quirinus. There is thus a strong presumption, amounting almost to proof, that A.C. 8 is the most likely date for the issue of the decree referred to in Lk. 23. The delay between B.C. 8 and A.C. 8, so as to have it coincide with the corrected date for the birth of Jesus, may be accounted for by the strained relations existing about the time between Augustus and Herod, and also between Herod and his subjects. As it seems to have been the first enrolment of Jews under the Empire, it is easy to conceive that time was needed to overcome Jewish prejudices.

The real difficulty, however, as to this alleged census under Quirinus lies in reconciling St. Luke's testimony with the facts of secular history. The Syrian governors in the period of B.C. 9-4 are given by Schürer as C. Sentius Saturninus (S.C. 9-6) and P. Quirinius Varus (A.C. 6-4). As to C. S. the general acceptance of Herod's death, the possibility of a governorship of Quirinus at the time of the execution of the decree of Caesar Augustus is thereby excluded. Many therefore have been ready to say, with Mommsen, that St. Luke has 'erred.' Even Tertullian is quoted against the Evangelist, when he affirms that an 'enrolment' made by Sentius Saturninus. And yet his testimony, while it differs from that of St. Luke as to the name of the governor of Syria, supports none the less the fact that there was a census earlier than the famous one of A.D. 6. The evidence in favour of an earlier as well as later governorship of Quirinus is now admitted to be so strong, that Mommsen and others have fully accepted it. The only question that remains is as to where we are to place it. Important help towards the solution of it has been found in the inscription discovered at Tivoli in 1764, now preserved in the Lateran Museum of Christian Antiquities. On it are recorded the exploits of a Roman official, with the honours awarded to him in the time of Augustus. While no name has been preserved, we are told that he was proconsul in Asia, and that he twice governed Syria and Phoenicia. The only one known to us, who satisfies these conditions is Quirinus. Where then, in the interval immediately before the birth of Jesus in A.C. 6 or at latest B.C. 4, are we to find room for his earlier Syrian governorship? It must be between Saturninus and Varus, or as a contemporary of the one or the other. If we can find proofs in history of a double 'hegemony' in provincial government, we may consider that only there can the solution lie. In the history of Josephus we have a singular confirmation of this twofold governorship. A Volumentis is named in relation to Sentius Saturninus as 'the hegemon of Caesar' (Schürer, HJP i. i. p. 350). Why might not Quirinus have been the military governor, while Saturninus was the civil administrator? In view of the progress of discovery in recent years, may we not hope that some additional fragment of the Tiburtine inscription will be found, and definitely settle the much debated question as to the historical accuracy of St. Luke? See art. CENSUS.

Though secular history from B.C. 6 to A.D. 14 furnishes us with no trace of any influence having been exerted by Augustus on Jesus or by Jesus on Augustus, we are able to trace, in the remarkable career of Augustus, a singular preparation for the Christian era. In nothing is this more manifest than in his unification of the Empire. When Augustus finally defeated Antony at Alexandria in B.C. 31, he was the one ruler left in the whole Roman world. The only adverse influence with which he had thereafter to contend was found among the heads of the old families in the Roman Senate. In the course of the next 10 or 12 years he so skillfully guided the affairs of the State, that he was clothed with every attribute of supremacy which it seemed possible for the State to bestow.

<sup>2</sup> It is true, indeed, that the imperf. may point, not to a repetition of the census, but simply to the fact of its going on for some time (cf. Wiesner, Gram. of N.T. Greek [Eng. tr.], p. 333).

The title of 'Prinsep Senatus' was revived in B.C. 29, and had new significance given to it. In B.C. 27 the Senate conferred upon him the proconsular imperium for 10 years. This put into his hands an all but absolute military power throughout the empire. At this same time he received the title of 'Augustus,' a name having to do with the science of augury (for from augo, as augustus from augo), and suggesting something akin to religious veneration. Though even then he wished himself to be considered as having a primacy only among equals, yet, as wielding the power both of purse and sword, he had become really the master of the Roman world. Nor was he content with this. The tribunicia potestas was granted to him in a sense more extended than ever before. While he appeared to assume it year by year, it really became his for life, and was the symbol of his sovereign authority, being used to mark the years of his reign. In B.C. 23 the whole machinery of the State had definitely and permanently passed into his hands. When the Christian era dawned, Augustus had for 17 years exercised a dominion unrivalled in its nature and extent, entitling it to be spoken of as over 'the whole world.' And yet there was no one in his day that felt so much the need of limiting the extension of the Empire. Among his last instructions there was one enjoining his successors not to seek enlargement, as it only made the work of guarding the frontiers more difficult. One of his greatest anxieties during his later years, owing to the deaths of Marcellus, Agrippa, Lucius, and Gaius, had to do with the succession to the Imperial throne. While the Christian era had not yet reached its first decade, he had only Tiberius, his step-son, to look to as his successor. At an early period of his reign Augustus had given himself to the development of a complete system of road-supervision for Italy and the provinces. The celebrated pillar of gilded bronze, the 'Milliarium Aureum,' of which but a fragment of the marble base can be seen to-day near the ascent of the Capitol, was set up by Augustus as 'his completion of the great survey and census of the Roman world' (Lanctani). On it were marked the distances of all the principal places along the main roads from the city gates. Where these roads led, civil government was found established, with a representative of the Emperor or the Senate, and with tribunals for the administration of justice. Anyone claiming to be a Roman citizen had the privilege of appeal to Caesar, and could be assured of a safe conduct to Rome. Safe and comparatively speedy modes of travel were assured.

Our knowledge of the government of the provinces under Augustus is too limited to admit of any clear and full description of it. Suetonius (August. 47) has given us the principles on which he acted in dividing the provinces between himself and the Senate, in these words: 'The provinces which could neither be easily nor safely governed by annual magistrates he exposed to attack on the part of restless and powerful enemies, he retained in his own hands. The others, which could be easily governed and had nothing to fear from surrounding peoples, he handed over to the Senate. This arrangement placed in his hands almost the whole military forces of the Empire. The Emperor's legates, commanding the provincial troops, were not only appointed by him, but could be suspended or dismissed at his pleasure. The provinces were divided into groups according as they were administered by consuls, praetors, or simply knights. Even those that appeared to be entirely under the control of the Senate were restricted in their appointments by the Emperor, as the list of those eligible had to be submitted to him, and all on the list must have served, with an interval of five years, as consuls or praetors. In the case of Syria we find an Imperial province exposed to inroads from warlike peoples on its Northern and Eastern borders, and therefore in need of a military more than a civil commander over it to act as its hegemon. The term answers best to our Viceroy. This was the position which Quirinus probably held, and he would have power from Augustus to allow in Herod's dominions a census that would as little as possible offend Jewish prejudices. Each set of provinces had its own separate treasury. The revenues from the Imperial provinces flowed into the Emperor's faena, and out of it were taken the enormous sums spent on the great military roads, which became the highways for Christianity. To the Senate, Augustus granted the right of mining copper only, reserving gold and silver for the Imperial treasury. As the result of these and other measures the Empire enjoyed unusual prosperity. Augustus also bestowed great care on the selection of his legates, closely watched over their administration, and made it all but impossible for a corrupt governor to escape swift punishment. To this in great measure the Empire owed its popularity in Augustus' time.

There was another remarkable preparation for the world-census in the ordinance survey initiated by Julius Caesar, and completed only after 25 years of labour on the part of four of the greatest surveyors of the age. The main object of it, no doubt, was the taxation of land, the most profitable source of revenue under the Empire. Thus a completely organized and a world-wide Empire, in absolute dependence upon its supreme ruler in Rome, had become an accomplished fact ere the Christian era had dawned.

As this new era approached, signs were multiplying of a desire for peace on the part of ruler and ruled, though it is scarcely true that the actual year of the birth at Bethlehem was distinguished by the prevalence of universal peace. To the immediately preceding period, B.C. 13-9, belongs the famous 'Altar of Peace,' whose actual site has been laid bare within very recent years (1903-1904) under the Via in Lucina, a little way off from the Corso, the old Flaminian Way. The very same year in which Augustus became Pontifex Maximus owing to the death of his former co-triumvir Lepidus, the Senate decreed the erection of an 'Altar of Peace,' which at first was to have been set up in the Senate-house, but was afterwards placed on the edge of the Campus Martius. One of the chief features of the period to which it belongs was the closing of the temple of Janus. Horace, writing in B.C. 13 (Epp. II. l. 255 and Odes IV. xv. 9), speaks of the closing as a recent occurrence. Twice before in the reign of Augustus, in B.C. 29 and B.C. 25, this temple had been closed (Mon. Anc. 13), 'when peace throughout the whole dominions of the Roman people by land and sea had been obtained by victories,' and 'only twice before his birth since the foundation of the city,' in all five times up to the Christian era. The Gades (Cadiz) inscription is a remarkable confirmation of B.C. 13 as the date of the third closing of the temple of Janus in Augustus' time.

The monument entitled the 'Ara Pacis Augusti' is of unusual proportions and of exquisite workmanship. Within the walls of a massive marble screen there was placed the altar on an elevated base, pyramidal, and having marble steps leading up to it. The screen was splendidly decorated both within and without with sculptures in high relief. The outer side of the screen had two distinct bands of ornamentation: the lower floral, the upper a procession with figures, many of which might have been actual portraits. The best known of these processional reliefs are to be found in the Gallery of the Uffizi at Florence, one is in the Cortile Belvedere of the Vatican, and one in the Louvre, Paris.

The altar was a splendid tribute to Peace, but it was a peace after many and bloody victories, reminding us of the saying, 'where they make a desert they call it peace' (Tac. Agricola, 30), and it was also a peace that was not to last. Yet there the altar stood on the field of Mars, as the reign of the 'Prince of Peace' was ushered in, and became for ages thereafter a witness to the Pax Romana of the Augustan age. Far more of it remains to the present time than of the triple arch of Augustus set up in celebration of his victories, of which only the bare foundations can be seen between the temple of Julius and that of Castor and Pollux.

The energies of Augustus found scope for themselves in other lines, and all with the object of building up his world-wide Empire that he meant to last in the ages to come. At the beginning of his reign he put his hand to the restoration of the State religion. In B.C. 28 he claims to have 'repaired 82 temples of the gods' (Mon. Anc. 20), earning for himself the title given him by Livy (Hist. IV. xx. 7), 'the builder or restorer of all the temples.' The sacred images, we are told, had become actually 'foul with smoke' or were 'mouldering with mildew.' The ancestral religion was dead, belief in the gods had all but disappeared. Nor was it only the repair of edifices for religious worship that he took in hand; from him the sacred colleges and brotherhoods received a new impulse by his becoming a member himself of one and all of them. Through him their endowments were greatly increased. With great ceremony was observed the centenary of the city, for which Horace prepared his well-known ode, as the inscription found in the Tiber in 1871 so strikingly confirms ('carmen compositum Q. Horatius Flaccus'). The worship of the Lares was restored. At crossways and street corners three hundred small shrines were set up, whose altars were adorned twice a year with flowers. One of the latest discoveries is that of a shrine of the Lares Publici in front of the Arch of Titus, on a branch of the Via Sacra leading up to the Palatine by the old Mugonian Gate. New temples were erected, the most notable being that of Apollo behind his own 'Domus.' A new spirit also was infused into the rites and ceremonies of the old worship, to which the writings of Virgil contributed in a special degree.

The hardest task yet remained in the social and moral reformation of his people. As early as B.C. 25 we find Horace (Od. III. vi.), in this reflecting probably the opinion of his master, affirming the necessity of 'a reformation of morals as well as a restoration of temples and a revival of religion.' In a later ode (xxiv.) he promises immortality to the statesman who shall bring back the morality of the olden time. The action taken by Augustus about that time was effective, temporarily at least, for his praises were celebrated as 'one who by his presence had cleansed the family from its foul stains, had curbed the licence of the age, and recalled the old morality.' The text of his laws enacted for this purpose has not come down to us, but their date may be taken as from B.C. 18 to 17, or about 12 years before the Christian era. His own example, unfortunately, did not enable him to take up a very high position on the subject of marriage. He had put away Scribonia in order to marry Livia, whom he took from her husband Tiberius Nero. Again and again he interposed to dissolve existing marriages, when his policy as to the succession required it. High motives, therefore, we do not expect to find in his legislation on marriage. Nothing could have brought out more clearly the impotence of such legislation than the openly scandalous character of his daughter Julia. In B.C. 2, the very year when he was hailed by the Senate as the father of his country, he became aware of what had long been in everyone's knowledge. So keenly did he feel the scandal that he shunned society for a time, and even absented himself from the city. His only remedy was her banishment to Pandataria. Never afterwards was she allowed to set foot in Rome. Nor did she see again the face of her father, whom she outlived only by a few short weeks. There were not wanting schools of philosophy that vied with each other in leading men to virtue. Greek philosophers of note were welcomed to the halls of the 'Domus Augusti.' But no system of morals or philosophy had yet appeared that could show the way of attaining to the Divine likeness by the bestowal of a new nature, until Christianity came upon the scene.

The same moulding hand that built up the Empire can be traced in the modification through which Caesar-worship passed under Augustus. The deification of Julius by the Senate in B.C. 42 was only what was to be expected. The decree ran: 'To the Genius of the divine Julius, father of his country, whom the Senate and Roman people placed among the number of the gods.' In the very heart of the Roman Forum, from B.C. 29, there was to be seen, on an elevated platform, a most beautiful marble temple proclaiming the deification of the great Julius. Augustus never allowed such worship of himself during his lifetime as had been the case with Julius. From the earliest period of his reign there is evidence that he allowed it in the provinces, but only in conjunction with 'Rome,' and the formula enjoined for all that were not Roman citizens was 'Rome and Augustus.' In the case of citizens the one name allowed, along with Rome, was that of 'the divine Julius.' For his Roman subjects he would be neither 'rex' nor 'divus,' but outside the favoured circle of Roman citizenship he had less scruple in receiving for himself a share of divine honour, believing that it formed the binding link that was needed to knit all the parts of his wide Empire into one great unity.

As to the permanence of this 'cult' in the provinces, under the joint title of 'Rome and Augustus,' there is still a measure of uncertainty. Dr. Lindsay believes the balance of evidence is in favour of 'Rome' having been left out even in Augustus' lifetime. In that case 'Augustus' signified not the person of the Emperor, but the symbol of the deification of the Roman State, personified in its ruler. Certainly that might have admirably served to establish his State policy, and make him believe that he had accomplished all that human ingenuity could to make his Empire as enduring as it was world-wide.

On his death in A.D. 14 a modification necessarily came, when the Senate decreed that thereafter he should be known as 'Divus Augustus.'

The priesthood of this Imperial 'cult' was divided into two classes, the one representing the State religion in a province, and the other having charge of religious ceremonies in the cities. The provincial priests were responsible only to the Emperor as Pontifex Maximus, and had, in the West at least, jurisdiction over the municipal priests. The way was thus prepared for the development of a full hierarchical system, which became afterwards the model for the Roman Church, with its Pontifex Maximus in Rome, its Metropolitans in each province, and the municipal priests in the cities. The 'cult' itself spread with great rapidity, was binding on every Roman subject with the exception of the Jews only, and prepared the way for the application of the prime test for the Christians of the early ages: 'Sacrifice to the Emperor or death.' The man of all others, who created the conditions in which Christianity was to find that supreme test, was Augustus. The Universal Empire, with its ruler as an object of worship, had not long become an accomplished fact when the God-man, in contrast with the man-god, appeared,—'the Word became flesh and dwelt among us.' No contrast could well be greater than that which distinguished (in B.C. 6—A.D. 14) this world-ruler from the Founder of Christianity.—Augustus, a perfect master in State-craft, merciful to his foes only when he had made his position absolutely sure, only somewhat more advanced in his morality than the men of his age, full of self-esteem, as the last scene of his life reveals, yet entitled to be considered by the world in which he lived as its 'chief benefactor' (Lk 22<sup>29</sup>); Jesus, though in His twelfth year able to claim a relationship with the Father in heaven such as distinguishes Him from every other son of man, yet remaining for those 20 years of His life at Nazareth as the carpenter's son, all unknown to the great world without, subject to His reputed father and His 'highly favoured' mother, 'advancing in wisdom' as in stature, and above all 'in favour with God and man.' Of the whole of Augustus' work there now remains little but crumbling or half-buried ruins, but the name of Jesus 'endures,' and gives evidence of the truth of the prophecy which points to the world's kingdom as becoming His, and His reign as being 'for ever and ever' (Rev 11<sup>15</sup>).

AUTHORITY OF CHRIST.—The first recorded comment on the teaching of Jesus is that of Mt 7<sup>28</sup> (Mk 1<sup>22</sup>, Lk 4<sup>22</sup>): 'They were astonished at his teaching, for he taught them as one having authority, and not as their scribes.' The scribes said nothing of themselves; they appealed in every utterance to tradition (παράδοσις); the message they delivered was not self-authenticating; it had not the moral weight of the speaker's personality behind it; it was a deduction or application of some legal maxim connected with a respectable name. They claimed authority, of course, but men had no immediate and irresistible consciousness that the claim was just. With Jesus it was the opposite. He appealed to no tradition, sheltered himself behind no venerable name, claimed no official status; but those who heard Him could not escape the consciousness that His word was with authority (Lk 4<sup>22</sup>). He spoke a final truth, laid down an ultimate law.

In one respect, He continued, in so doing, the work and power of the prophets. There was a succession of prophets in Israel, but not a prophetic tradition. It was a mark of degeneration and of insincerity when self-styled prophets repeated each other, stealing God's words every one from his neighbour (Jer 23<sup>20</sup>). The true prophet may have his mind nourished on earlier inspired utterances, but his own message must spring from an immediate prompting of God. It is only when his message is of this kind that his word is with power. No mind was ever more full than the mind of Jesus of all that God had spoken in the past, but no one was ever so spontaneous as He, so free from mere reminiscence, so completely determined in His utterance by the conditions to which it was addressed. It is necessary to keep both things in view in considering His authority as a teacher. Abstract formulæ about the seat of authority in religion are not of much service in this connexion. It is, of course, always true to say that truth and the mind are made for each other, and that the mind recognizes the authority of truth because in truth it meets its counterpart, that which enables it to realize its proper being. It is always correct, also, to apply this in the region of morals and religion, and to say that the words of Jesus and the prophets are authoritative because our moral personality instinctively responds to them. We have no choice, as beings made for morality and religion, to do anything but bow before them. The difficulty is that the 'mind,' or 'conscience,' or 'moral personality,' on which our recognition of the truth and authority of Jesus' teaching is here made dependent, is not a fixed quantity, and still less a ready-made faculty; it is rather a possibility or potentiality in our nature, which needs to be evoked into actual existence; and among the powers which are to evoke it, and make it actual and valuable, by far the most important is that teaching of Jesus which it is in some sense allowed to judge. We may say in Coleridge's phrase that we believe the teaching of Jesus, or acknowledge its (or His) authority, because it 'finds' us more deeply than anything else; but any Christian will admit that 'find' is an inadequate expression. The teaching of Jesus does not simply find, it evokes or creates the personality by which it is acknowledged. We are born again by the words of eternal life which come from His lips, and it is the new man so born to whom His word is known in all its power. There is a real analogy between this truth and the familiar phenomenon that a new poet or artist has to create the taste which is necessary for the appreciation of his work. Dismissing, therefore, the abstract and general consideration of the idea of authority in religion (see next art.), our course must be (1) to examine the actual exercise of authority by Jesus in the Gospels, referring especially to occasions on which His authority was challenged, or on which He gave hints as to the conditions on which alone it could be recognized; (2) by way of supplement we can consider the authority of the exalted Christ as it is asserted in the Epistles and exercised in the Church through the NT as a whole.

1. The exercise of authority by Jesus on earth.—
(a) The simplest but most far-reaching form in which Jesus exercised authority was the practical one. He claimed other men, other moral personalities, for Himself and His work, and required their unconditional renunciation of all other ties and interests that they might become His disciples. He said, 'Follow me,' and they rose, and left all and followed Him (Mt 4<sup>18-22</sup> 9<sup>9</sup>). He made this kind of claim because He identified Himself with the gospel (Mk 8<sup>38</sup> 10<sup>45</sup>) or with the cause of God and His Kingdom in the world, and for this cause no sacrifice could be too great, no devotion too profound. 'He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me. He that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me. Whosoever he be of you that renounceth not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple' (Mt 10<sup>37</sup>, Lk 14<sup>26</sup>). Nothing is less like Jesus than to do violence to anyone's liberty, or to invade the sacredness of conscience and of personal responsibility; but the broad fact is unquestionable, that without coercing others Jesus dominated them, without breaking their wills He imposed His own will upon them, and became for them a supreme moral authority to which they submitted absolutely, and by which they were inspired. His authority was unconditionally acknowledged because men in His presence were conscious of His moral ascendancy, of His own devotion to and identification with what they could not but feel to be the supreme good. We cannot explain this kind of moral or practical authority further than by saying that it is one with the authority which the right and the good exercise over all moral beings.

Not that Jesus was able in every case to carry His own will through in the wills of other men. Moral ascendancy has to be exercised under moral conditions, and it is always possible, even for one who acknowledges its right, to fail to give it practical recognition by obedience. When Jesus said to the rich ruler, 'Sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, follow me' (Mk 10<sup>21</sup>), He failed to win the will of one who nevertheless was conscious that in refusing obedience he chose the worse part. 'He went away sorrowful'—his sorrow implying that it was within the right on the part of Jesus to put him to this tremendous test. He acknowledges by his sorrow that he would have been a better man—in the sense of the gospel a perfect man—if he had allowed the authority of Jesus to have its perfect work in him. These are the facts of the case, and they are ignored by those who argue that it is no man's business to part with all he has for the sake of the poor; that property is a trust which we have to administer, not to renounce; that the commandment to sell all cannot be generalized, and is therefore not moral; and that it is, in short, an instance of fanaticism in Jesus, due to His belief in the nearness of the Kingdom, and the literal worthlessness of everything in comparison with entering into it at His side. There is nothing here to generalize about. There is a single case of conscience which Jesus diagnoses, and for which He prescribes heroic treatment; but it is not in the patient to rise to such treatment. The high calling of God in Christ Jesus is too high for him; he counts himself unworthy of the eternal life (Ac 13<sup>46</sup>). The authority of Jesus is in a sense acknowledged in this man; it is felt and owned though it is declined. Where the authority lay is clear enough. It lay in the Good Master Himself, in His own identification with the good cause, in His own renunciation of all things for the Kingdom of God's sake; it lay in His power to reveal to this man the weak spot in his moral constitution, and in the inward witness of the man's conscience (attested by his sorrow as he turned away) that the voice of Jesus was the voice of God, and that through obedience to it he would have entered into life. It lay in the whole relation of these two concrete personalities to each other, and it cannot be reduced to an abstract formula.

This holds true whenever we think of the moral or practical authority of Jesus. It is never legal; that is, we can never take the letter in which it is expressed and regard it as a statute, incapable of interpretation or modification, and binding in its literal meaning for all persons, all times, all social conditions. This is plain in regard to such a command of Jesus as the one given to the rich ruler: no one will say that this is to be obeyed to the letter by all who would enter into the Kingdom of God. But it is equally true of precepts which are addressed to a far wider circle, and which are sometimes supposed (like this one) to rest in a peculiar sense on the authority of Jesus. Take, e.g., the case of the Sermon on the Mount in Mt 5<sup>21-48</sup>. From beginning to end this may be read as an assertion of the moral authority of Jesus, an authority which is conscious of transcending the highest yet known in Israel. 'It was said to them of old time . . . but I say unto you.' On what do the words of Jesus throughout this passage depend for their actual weight with men? They depend on the consciousness of men that through these words the principle of morality, for which our nature has an abiding affinity, is finding expression. But just because we are conscious of this principle and of the affinity of our nature for it, we are free with regard to any particular expression of it; the particular words in which it is embodied even by Jesus do not possess the authority of a statute to which we can only conform, but about which we must not think. When Jesus says, 'Whoso shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him also the other; to him that would go to law with thee and take thy coat, leave also thy cloak': it is not to keep us from thinking about moral problems by giving us a rule to be blindly obeyed, it is rather to stimulate thought and deliver us from rules. His precepts are legal in form, but He came to abolish legalism, and therefore they were never meant to be literally read. When they are literally read, conscience simply refuses to take them in. They are casuistic in form, but anti-casuistic in intention, and their authority lies in the intention, not in the form. What the precepts of non-resistance and non-retaliation mean is that under no circumstances, under no provocation, must the disciple of Jesus allow his conduct to be determined by any other motive than that of love. He must be prepared to go all lengths with love, and no matter how love is tried, he must never renounce it for an inferior principle, still less for an instinctive natural passion, such as the desire for revenge. Put thus, the moral authority of Jesus is unquestionable, and it asserts itself over us the more, the more we feel that He embodied in His own life and conduct the principle which He proclaims. But there is nothing in this which binds us to take in the letter what Jesus says about oaths, or non-resistance, or revenge; and still less is there anything to support the idea that His words on these subjects are part of a fanatical renunciation of the world in the region of honour as well as of property,—a literal surrender, in view of the imminence of the Kingdom, of all that makes life on earth worth having. It is not uncommon now for those who regard the Kingdom of God as purely transcendent and eschatological to match this paradoxical doctrine with an ethical system equally paradoxical, a system made up purely of renunciation and negation, and to fasten it also upon Jesus; but it is hardly necessary to refute either the one paradox or the other. What commands conscience in the most startling words of Jesus is the truth and love which dictate them, but to recognize the truth and love is to recognize that no form of words is binding of itself. It is the supreme task of the moral being to discover what in his own situation truth and love require; and there is no short cut to the discovery of this, even in the Sermon on the Mount. Jesus is our authority, but His words are not our statutes: we are not under law, even the law of His words, but under grace—that is, under the inspiration of His personality; and though His words are one of the ways in which His moral ascendancy is established over us, they are only one. There is an authority in Him to which no words, not even His own, can ever be equal.

The final form which this practical or moral authority of Jesus assumes in the NT is the recognition of Him as Judge of all. Probably in the generation before that in which He lived the Jews had come to regard the Messiah as God's viceroy in the great judgment which ushered in the world to come; but what we find in the NT in this connexion is not the formal transference of a piece of Messianic dogmatic to Jesus; it is the moral recognition of the moral supremacy of Jesus, and of His right to pronounce finally on the moral worth of men and things. Experiences like that which inspired Lk 5<sup>8</sup> ('Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord'), Jn 4<sup>20</sup> ('Come see a man which told me all things that ever I did'), 21<sup>17</sup> ('Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee'), are the basis on which the soul recognizes Christ as Judge. The claim to be Judge appears also in His own teaching (Mt 7<sup>28</sup>, Lk 13<sup>28</sup>, Mt 25<sup>31</sup>); and if the form of the words in the first of these passages has been modified in tradition in order to bring out their bearing for those for whom the Evangelist wrote, no one doubts that their substance goes back to Jesus. It is He who contemplates the vain pleas which men will address to Him 'in that day'—men who with religious profession and service to the Church have nevertheless been morally unsound. The standard of judgment is variously represented: it is 'the will of my Father which is in heaven' (Mt 7<sup>21</sup>) or 'these sayings of mine' (7<sup>24</sup>) or it is what we might call in a word 'humanity' (25<sup>38-42</sup>); and in its way each of these is a synonym for the moral authority of Jesus. As far as we are sensitive to their demands we are sensitive to His moral claim. Into the representations of Jesus as Judge outside of the Gospels it is not necessary to enter.

(b) The authority of Jesus comes before us in another aspect when we think of Him not as commanding but as teaching, not as Legislator or Judge, but as Revealer. In the first case, authority means His title to obedience; in this case, it may be said to mean His title to belief.

Perhaps of all theological questions the nature and limits of this last authority are those which have excited the keenest discussion in recent times. On the one hand, there are those who, fixing their minds on the Divinity of Jesus, regard it as essentially un-Christian to question His utterances at any point. Whatever Jesus believed, or seemed to believe, on any subject is by that very fact raised above question. The mind has simply to receive it on His authority. Thus when He refers to Jonah (Mt 12<sup>38</sup>, Lk 11<sup>29</sup>), the literal historicity of the Book of Jonah is guaranteed; when He ascribes the 110th Psalm to David (Mt 22<sup>43</sup> and 11), critical discussion of the authorship is foreclosed; when He recognizes possession by unclean spirits (Mk 1<sup>26</sup> and often), possession is no longer a theory to explain certain facts, and therefore open to revision; it is itself a fact: it gives us a glimpse into the constitution of the spiritual universe which we are not at liberty to question. On the other hand, there are those who, while they declare their faith in the Incarnation, argue that it belongs to the very truth of the Incarnation that Jesus should not merely be man, but man of a particular time and environment; not man in the abstract, but man defined (and therefore in some sense limited) by the conditions which constitute reality. He had not simply intelligence, but intelligence which had been moulded by a certain education, and could only reveal itself through a certain language; and both of these are conditions which (while essential to historical reality) nevertheless involve limitation. Hence with regard to the class of subjects just referred to, those who are here in question feel quite at liberty to form their own opinions on relevant grounds. They do not, as they think, set aside the authority of Jesus in doing so: their idea rather is that in these regions Jesus never claimed to have or to exercise any authority. Thus in the first two instances adduced above, He simply takes the OT as it stands, and He appeals to it to confirm a spiritual truth which He is teaching on its own merits. In Mt 12<sup>38</sup> He is reproaching an impenitent people, and He refers to the Book of Jonah for a great example of repentance, and that on the part of a heathen race; the men of Nineveh who repented will condemn His unrepentant contemporaries in the day of judgment. In Mt 22<sup>43</sup> He is teaching that the essential thing in Messiahship is not a relation to David, but a relation to God; and He refers to the 110th Psalm, and to David as its author, as unintelligible except on this hypothesis. In both cases (it is argued) the truths which rest on the authority of Jesus are independent of the OT appeal which is associated with them. That repentance is an essential condition of entering into the Kingdom of God, and that there is no responsibility so heavy as that of those who will not repent even when Jesus calls, are truths which are not affected though the Book of Jonah is read as an allegory or a poem; that the fundamental thing in the person of Jesus is not His relation to David (which He shared with others) but His relation to God (which belonged to Him alone), is a truth which is not affected though the 110th Psalm is ascribed to the Maccabean period. In other words, the authority of Jesus as a revealer of God and of the laws of His Kingdom is not touched, though we suppose Him to share on such matters as are here in question the views which were current among His contemporaries. It is not denying His Divinity to say this; it is rather denying His humanity if we say the opposite. Parallel considerations apply to the belief in possession which Jesus undoubtedly shared with His fellow-countrymen, and in fact with His contemporaries generally. Possession was the current theory of certain morbid conditions of human nature, physical, mental, and probably in some cases also moral; but the one thing of consequence in the Gospel is not that Jesus held this or any other theory about these morbid conditions, but that in Him the power of God was present to heal them. Our theory of them may be different, but that only means that we belong to a different age; it does not touch the truth that from these terrible and mysterious woes Jesus was mighty to save. It does not matter that His notions of medicine and psychology were different from ours; He did not come to reveal medicine or psychology—to 'reveal' such things is a contradiction in terms; He came to reveal the Father, and His authority has its centre there.

There is, no doubt, great possibility of error in arguing from such abstract ideas as 'Divinity' and 'humanity,' especially when they are in some way opposed to one another in our minds: however we may define them, we must remember that they were in no sense opposed or inconsistent in Christ. He was at once and consistently all that we mean by Divine and all that we mean by human, but we cannot learn what that was by looking up 'divine' and 'human' in the dictionary, or in a book of dogmatic theology. We must look at Jesus Himself as He is presented to us in the Gospels. And further, we must consider that there is a vast region of things in which there neither is nor can be any such thing as authority—the region, namely, which is covered by science. Now questions of the kind to which reference has just been made all belong to the domain of science. The nature of the Book of Jonah, the date and authorship of the 110th Psalm, the explanation of the morbid phenomena which the ancients ascribed to evil spirits inhabiting the bodies of men: these are questions for literary, for historical, for medical science. It is a misleading way of speaking about them, and needlessly hurts some Christian feelings, to say that the authority of Jesus was limited, and did not extend to such matters. The truth rather is that such matters belong to a region where there is no such thing as authority, or where the only authority is that of facts, which those in quest of knowledge must apprehend and interpret for themselves. It is a negation of the very idea of science to suppose that any constituent of it could be revealed, or could rest upon authority, even the authority of Jesus. Hence in regard to all such subjects the question of Jesus' authority ought never to be raised: it is not only misleading, but unreal. On the other hand, when we come to the authority which Jesus actually claims as a revealer of God, and of the things of His Kingdom, we find that it is not only real but absolute—an authority to which the soul renders unreserved acknowledgment.

This is brought out most clearly in Mt 11<sup>27</sup>. Here Jesus speaks in explicit terms of His function as Revealer, and we see at once the absoluteness of His authority, and its sphere. 'All things have been delivered unto me by my Father, and no one knoweth the Son save the Father, neither doth any know the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him.'

Whatever else these words express, they express Jesus' sense of absolute competence in His vocation: He had everything given to Him which belonged to the work He had to do, and He was conscious of being equal to His task. If we try to interpret 'all things' by reference to the context, then whether we look before or after we must say that the 'all things' in view are those involved in the revelation of God: in the work of revelation, and especially in the revelation of Himself as Father, God has no organ but Christ, and in Christ He has an adequate organ. The passage anticipates Jn 14<sup>6</sup> 'I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father but by me.' It is in a word like this—I am the truth—that we find the key to the problems which have been raised about the authority of Jesus as a Teacher or Revealer. The truth which we accept on His authority is the truth which we recognize in Him: It is not announced by Him from a world into which we cannot enter: it is present here, in Him, in the world in which we live. It is not declared on authority to which we blindly surrender; it is exhibited in a Person and a Life which pass before us and win our hearts. To put it otherwise, the truth which we owe to Jesus, and for which He is our authority, is not information; it is not a contribution to science, physical or historical—for this we are cast by God on our own resources; it is the truth which is identical with His own being and life in the world, which is embodied or incarnate in Him. It is the truth which is involved in His own relation to God and man, and in His perfect consciousness of that relation: it is the truth of His own personality, not any casual scientific fact. He does not claim to know everything, and it would be difficult to reconcile such a claim with true manhood; but He does claim full knowledge of the Father, and not His words only, but His whole being and life are the justification of His claim.*

The authority of Christ as a Teacher and Revealer has been called in question mainly in connexion with His words about the future. There is no doubt that these present great difficulty to those who believe in Him. They seem to say quite unmistakably that certain things will happen, and happen within a comparatively short time, which (if we are to read literally) have not happened yet. 'Ye shall not have gone through the cities of Israel till the Son of man be come' (Mt 10<sup>23</sup>); 'Verily I say unto you, there be some of them that stand here which shall in no wise taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom' (Mt 16<sup>28</sup>; cf. Mc 24<sup>29-30</sup>, Mk 13<sup>30</sup>, Lk 21<sup>32</sup>). The coming of the Son of man in His kingdom was conceived quite definitely by the Apostolic Church as a supernatural visible coming on the clouds of * Loisy (L'Évangile et l'Église, 451, Autour d'un petit Livre, 1901) has attacked Mt 11<sup>27</sup> on the ground that the unique Divine Sonship which it ascribes to Jesus is of a sort which it was not historically possible for Him to conceive or assert. Jesus, he holds, could only have used 'Son of God' in the Messianic official sense of Ps 27; here, therefore, where the meaning is clearly more than official, it cannot be the voice of a Jewish Messiah which is heard, but the voice of the Christian consciousness in a Gentile environment: the larger Church has universalized the Jewish conception, elevated the official Son—the Messianic King—into a Son by nature, and put its own faith and its own experience of Jesus into Jesus' own lips. Perhaps it is enough to say in refutation of this, that the words here in question, as found both in Mt. and Lk., in all probability belong to Weiss's 'apostolic source,' the oldest record of words of Jesus; and that the same unique relation of 'the Father' and 'the Son' is implied in Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, the genuineness of which no one doubts. Schmiedel (Encyc. Bibl. li. 2527), without disputing the words in Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, tries by recurring to the Western text to reduce them to the 'official' Messianic meaning which Loisy could recognize as possibly historical. Harnack, on the other hand, treats them as authentic, and indeed as the most important and characteristic words of Jesus on record for determining His thought regarding Himself (Das Wesen des Christentums, p. 81).

heaven, and it is a strong measure to assume that in cherishing this hope, by which the NT is inspired from beginning to end, the early Church was completely misapprehending the Master. He must have said something—when we consider the intensity of the Apostolic hope, surely we may say He must have said much—to create and sustain an expectation so keen. But there are considerations we must keep in mind if we would do justice to all the facts. (1) The final triumph of His cause, which was the cause of God and His kingdom, was not for Jesus an item in a list of dogmas, but a living personal faith and hope; in this sense it has the authority of His personality behind it. It was as sure to Him as His own being that the cause for which He stood in the world would triumph; and it is as sure for everyone who believes in Him. (2) He Himself, with all this assurance of faith, explicitly declares His ignorance of the day and hour at which the final triumph comes. He longed for it intensely; He felt that it was urgent that it should come; and urgency, when expressed in terms of time, means imminence; but the disclaimer of knowledge remains. The one thing certain is that He spoke of the time as uncertain, as sometimes sooner than men would expect, and sometimes later; the moral attitude required being always that of watching (Bruce, Kingdom of God, p. 278 ff.; Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, i. p. 127). (3) When Jesus bodied forth this hope of the future triumph of His cause, and of His own glorious coming, He did it in language borrowed mainly from the OT apocalypse, the Book of Daniel. It would be hard to say that the Apostles completely misunderstood Him when He did so, but it is hard for anyone in using such language to say what is literal in it and what has to be spiritualized. No one in reading Dn 7 takes the four great beasts, and the sea out of which they rise, literally; why, then, must we be compelled to take the human form and the clouds of heaven, literally? The Book of Acts (2<sup>16-21</sup>) sees in the experience of the Church at Pentecost the fulfilment of a prophecy in Joel (2<sup>29</sup>) which speaks of 'blood and fire and vapour of smoke, of the sun turning into darkness and the moon into blood,' though no such phenomena actually accompanied the gift of the Spirit. May not modern Christians, and even the early believers, have taken poetic expressions of the living hope of Jesus more prosaically than He meant them? (4) We must allow for the possibility that in the reports of Jesus' words which we possess, the reporters may sometimes have allowed the hopes kindled in their own hearts by Jesus to give a turn or a colour, quite involuntarily, to what they tell us. They might not be able to distinguish precisely between the hopes they owed to Him and the very words in which He had declared His own assurance of victory. And finally (5), we must remember that in a spiritual sense the prophecies of Jesus have been fulfilled. He came again in power. He came in the resurrection, and He came at Pentecost. He filled Jerusalem with His presence in the early days of the Church as He had never done while He lived on earth; from the very hour when they condemned Him (Mt 26<sup>64</sup>) it was possible for His judges to be conscious of His exaltation and of His coming in power. It may be that in all prophecy, even in the prophecy of Jesus, there is the element which we can call illusive, without having to call it delusive. To be intelligible, it must speak the language of the age, but it is going to be fulfilled in another age, the realities and experiences of which transcend the conceptions and the speech of the present. Even if this be so, it does not shake our faith in Jesus and His authority. The truth which is incarnate in His person is the truth of the final—and who will not sometimes say the speedy!—triumph of His cause. We may misconceive the mode of it, even when we try to guide ourselves by His words; but the important thing is not the mode but the fact, and of that we are as sure as we are sure of Him.

(c) Besides the authority which He exercised in establishing His ascendancy over men, and that which we recognize in Him as the Truth, we may distinguish (though it is but part of His revelation of the Father) the gracious authority exercised by Christ in forgiving sins. That He did forgive sins is not to be doubted. The narrative in Mk 2<sup>1-12</sup> makes this clear. Jesus no more declared that the paralytic's sins were forgiven than He declared that he was not lame: the meaning of the whole incident is that His word conferred with equal power the gift of pardon and the gift of bodily strength. The one miracle of redemption—'who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases'—reaches through the whole of human nature, and Jesus has authority to perform it all. It is in this sense that we must interpret passages like Lk 7<sup>47-48</sup>, 23<sup>34</sup> as well as Mk 2<sup>17</sup>, Lk 15, and ultimately Mt 18<sup>18</sup> and Jn 20<sup>23</sup>. There is not anything to be said of this authority but that it must vindicate itself. No one can believe that Jesus has authority to forgive sins except the man who through Jesus has had the experience of forgiveness. The Divine love that dwelt in Jesus, that received sinners and ate with them, that spent itself to seek and save the lost, that saw what was of God in men and touched it; that Divine love made forgiveness not only credible to sinners, but real. It entered into their hearts with God's own authority, and in penitent faith and love the burden passed from their consciences and they were born again. When He was challenged by the scribes, Jesus appealed to the physical miracle, which was indisputable, in support of the spiritual one, which lay beyond the reach of sense; but it was only the scribes, not the forgiven man, who needed this seal of His authority to pardon. Those whom He forgave had the witness in themselves, and ultimately there can be no other. The authority which Jesus exercised in this gracious sense He extended to His disciples alike during their brief mission while He was on earth (Mk 3<sup>14-15</sup>), and in view of their wider calling when He was exalted (Mt 18<sup>18</sup>, Jn 20<sup>23</sup>).

Some light is thrown upon the authority of Jesus if we consider the occasions on which it was challenged, and the way in which Jesus met them.

(a) It was tacitly challenged wherever men were 'offended' in Him. To be offended (εκαρβαλισθη) is to stumble at His claims, to find something in Him which one cannot get over and which is incompatible with absolute surrender to Him; it is to deny His right to impose upon men the consequences (persecution, poverty, even death) which may be involved in accepting His authority (see Mt 11<sup>19</sup>, 13<sup>21</sup>, 28<sup>18</sup>, 15<sup>12</sup>, 24<sup>10</sup>, 26<sup>31</sup>; the other Gospels here add nothing to Mt.). Sometimes Jesus met this tacit challenge by pointing to the general character of His work as vindicating His claims. This is what He does in the case of John the Baptist (Mt 11<sup>2-6</sup>). Whether we read this passage—the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, etc.—in the physical or the spiritual sense, the works in question are the signs that God's Anointed has come, and it can only mean loss and ruin to men if they fail to see and to acknowledge Him as what He is. Sometimes, again, Jesus encountered those who were 'offended' in Him with a severity amounting to scorn. When the Pharisees 'stumbled' because His word about things that do and do not defile cut straight across their traditional prejudices, He did nothing to conciliate them. 'Every plant that my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up. Let them alone. They are blind guides of blind men. And if the blind man leads the blind, both shall fall into the ditch' (Mt 15<sup>13f.</sup>). In reality the 'offence' in this case meant that sham holiness would not acknowledge true; and in this situation it can only be war à l'outrance. As a rule, however, Jesus only speaks of men being offended, or offended in Him, by way of warning; and He assumes that to the solemn tones of His warning conscience will respond. His authority is inherent in Himself and His actions, and cannot with a good conscience be repudiated by any one who sees what He is. This is the tone of Mt 13<sup>21</sup> 24<sup>29</sup> 26<sup>21</sup>.

(2) It is a more explicit challenge of His authority when Jesus is asked to show a sign, or a sign from heaven (Mt 12<sup>28a</sup> 16<sup>17</sup>, Lk 23<sup>8</sup>, Jn 6<sup>30</sup>). This was the recurrence of the temptation of the pinnacle, and Jesus consistently rejected it. He never consented (not even in the case of the paralytic of Mk 2<sup>1-9</sup>, see above) to present the physical as evidence for the spiritual. The proof of the authority with which He spoke did not lie outside His word, in something which could be attached to it, but in the word itself; if it was not self-attesting, nothing else could attest it. This is put with peculiar force in the Fourth Gospel. It is true that an evidential value is recognized in the miracles, but it is only by an afterthought, or as a second best: 'I though ye believe not me, believe the words' (Jn 10<sup>38</sup>); 'believe that I am in the Father and the Father in me; or else, believe for the very works' sake' (14<sup>11</sup>). The main line of thought is that which deprecates faith based on signs and wonders (4<sup>46</sup>). When the multitudes ask, 'What sign doest thou then? our fathers did eat the manna in the wilderness, the answer of Jesus virtually is, 'I am the bread of life. . . He that eateth me shall live by me. . . the words that I speak unto you are spirit and are life' (Jn 6<sup>26f.</sup>). In other words, the authority of Jesus does not depend upon any external credentials; it is involved in what He is, and must be immediately apprehended and responded to by the soul. What enables men to recognize Jesus as what He is, and so to acknowledge His authority, is, according to the representation of the central chapters in John (chs. 6-10), a need in their nature or state which He can supply. If we wish to be sure that He is the Christ, the King in the Kingdom of God, the way to certainty is not to prove that He was born at Bethlehem of the seed of David (7<sup>4</sup>), nor that He came into the world mysteriously (7<sup>27</sup>), nor that He has done many miracles (7<sup>31</sup>); it is to see in Him the living bread (ch. 6), the living water (ch. 4 and 7<sup>37</sup>), the light of the world (chs. 8 and 9), the Good Shepherd (ch. 10), the Giver of Life (chs. 5 and 11). These are ideas or experiences which are relative to universal human needs, and therefore they are universally intelligible; every one who knows what it is to be hungry, thirsty, forlorn, in the dark, dead, knows how to appreciate Jesus; and apart from these experiences no cleverness in applying prophetic or other theological signs to Him is of any value. All this is strictly relevant, for it is through experiences in which we become debtors to Jesus for meat and drink, for light and life, that we become conscious of what His authority means.

(7) Once, at least, the authority of Jesus was challenged in a quasi-legal fashion. When He drove the traders from the Temple, the chief priests and the elders of the people came to Him, saying, 'By what authority doest thou these things, and who gave thee this authority?' (Mt 21<sup>23f.</sup>, Mk 11<sup>27f.</sup>, Lk 20<sup>2f.</sup>). Formally, by His counter question about the Baptist, Jesus only silences His adversaries; but more than this is meant. If, He suggests, they had been true to the earlier messenger of God, they would have had no difficulty about His claims. If they had repented at John's summons, and been right with God, then to their simple and humble hearts Jesus' action would have vindicated itself; as it is, to their insincere souls He has no advance to make. The ambassador of an earthly king has credentials external to his person and his message, but not the ambassador in whom God Himself visits His people. His actions like His words speak for themselves. Throughout the Fourth Gospel it is an affinity of spirit with Jesus on which the recognition of His authority depends. It is those who are of God (Jn 8<sup>47</sup>), of the truth (13<sup>37</sup>), those who are His sheep (10<sup>4f. 26</sup>), who hear His voice: those who are not of God, especially the insincere, who seek honour from one another (5<sup>4</sup>), are inevitably offended in Him.

2. Thus far we have considered the authority of Christ as it was exercised, acknowledged, or denied during His life on earth. But the NT exhibits much more than this. It is not merely as historical, but as exalted, that Christ exercises authority—in the Church. In all its aspects the authority which we have studied in the Gospels reappears in the Epistles. It is perpetuated in the Christian society in an effective, if somewhat undeniably way.

What strikes one first in the NT literature, apart from the Gospels, is the almost complete absence of literal appeal to Jesus. The Apostles, whatever be the explanation, do not, except on rare occasions, quote the Lord. It is true that when they do so, His word is regarded as decisive in a sense in which even the word of an apostle is not (cf. 1 Co 7<sup>10</sup> with vv. 12, 25, 40). It is true also that passages like Ro 12.13, and much in the Epistle of James, could only have been written (in all probability) by men who not only had the Spirit of Christ, but whose minds were full of echoes of His words. Nevertheless the fact remains that Jesus is hardly appealed to formally as an authority in the NT writings. There could be no more striking proof of the fact that Christianity was apprehended from the first as a free and spiritual religion to which everything statutory was alien. Not even the word of Jesus had legal character for it. What Jesus sought and found in His disciples was a spiritual remembrance of Himself. His words were preserved not in a phonograph, or in a stenographic report, but in the impression they made, in the insight they gave, in the thoughts and experiences they produced in the lives of living men. They were perpetuated not merely by being put on record, but still more by being preached. Now to preach is not only to report, but to apply; and the application of the word of Christ to new circumstances inevitably and unconsciously brings with it a certain or rather an uncertain amount of interpretation, of bringing out the point, of emphasis on this or that which at the moment demands it. What we wish to know is whether the men whose ministry perpetuated the word of Christ, and perpetuated it in this free and spiritual fashion, had the qualifications demanded by their task. Could Christ so fit them for their ministry that they should be under no legal constraint, and yet should never be unfaithful to His meaning, or misrepresent Him or His work? In other words, could He in any sense transmit His authority to His witnesses, so that it should be felt in them as in Him?

The answer of the NT is in the affirmative, and it is not too much to say that the NT as a whole is the proof that this answer is right. 'We have the mind of Christ,' says St. Paul (1 Co 2<sup>9</sup>), and again (in 2 Co 13<sup>9</sup>). 'Ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me'—a proof which he is quite ready to give. He was conscious that in the discharge of his Apostolic ministry he was not alone: Christ was in him pleading His own cause. Of course the authority of Christ in this case cannot be other than we have already seen it to be in the earthly life of Christ. Its range is the same, and its recognition is conditioned in the same way. The Apostle is no more bound literally to reproduce Jesus than Jesus is bound literally to reproduce Himself. He is no more bound than Jesus is to prove the truth of his message by credentials external to it. He no more hesitates than Jesus does to trace the rejection of his message, the refusal to call Jesus Lord, to a want of moral affinity with Jesus which is the final definition of sin. 'If our gospel is veiled, it is veiled in them that are perishing, in whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of the unbelieving' (2 Co 4<sup>4</sup>). It is not possible to say beforehand, on the basis of any doctrine of inspiration, whether there are elements in the Apostolic writings, and if so what, which have no authority for us. Nothing in them has legal or statutory authority, and spiritual authority must be trusted to win for itself the recognition which is its due. There is something to be said for the distinction that while the testimony of the Apostles to Jesus—a testimony resting on their experience of what He was and of what He had done for them—is perennially authoritative, the theology of the Apostles—a theology conditioned by the intellectual environment in which they lived and to which they had to vindicate their message—has only a transient importance. The difficulty is just to draw the distinction between testimony and theology: as a matter of fact, the two things interpenetrate in the NT, and there is a point at which the distinction disappears. To insist upon it as if it were absolute is really to introduce again into Christianity (under the form of the Apostolic testimony) that legal or statutory or dogmatic element from which Jesus set all religion free. It is better to read the Apostles as men through whose minds Christ pleads His own cause in the Spirit. The minds may be more or less adequate instruments for His service; they may be more adequate in some relations, and less so in others; but they are indivisible, and it is not helpful in the long run to introduce into them the schism of testimony and theology. We must let them tell upon us in their integrity, and acknowledge their authority whenever it proves irresistible. (More detailed consideration of this point will be found in the article on PREACHING CHRIST).

The part of the NT which raises in the acutest form the question of the authority of Christ—or perhaps we should say here of His Apostle—is the Fourth Gospel. It is practically agreed among scholars that the style of the discourses in that Gospel is due to the author, not to the speakers. Every one speaks in the same style—John the Baptist, Jesus, the Evangelist himself. The words of an actor in the history (Jesus, for example, in the first part of ch. 3, and the Baptist in the latter part) pass over insensibly into words of the historian. The first person plural is used by Jesus (e.g. 3<sup>2</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>) where it is tempting to say that it is the Christian consciousness which is expressed, the common mind of the Church which owes its being to Him. Further, Jesus says things about Himself in the Fourth Gospel to which there is no parallel in the other three. He speaks plainly of His pre-existence, of the glory which He had with the Father before the world was, of an eternal being which was His before Abraham was born; He makes Himself the content and the subject of His teaching—'I am the bread of life, the light of the world, the resurrection and the life'; He identifies Himself in a mysterious way with the redeeming purpose and power of God—'I and the Father are one,' 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father.' It may be difficult for the historian, on purely historical grounds, to prove that Jesus uttered all the words thus ascribed to Him, and if the difficulty presses, the authority of the words may seem to disappear. But is this really so? May not the Fourth Gospel itself be the fulfilment of one of the words in question—'I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. But when he is come, the Spirit of truth, he shall guide you into all the truth: for he shall not speak from himself, but whatsoever things he shall hear, these shall he speak . . . He shall take of mine, and shall announce it to you' (Jn 16<sup>12</sup>). These words would not be satisfied by a merely literal reproduction of what Jesus had uttered; they imply that with the gift of the Spirit will come a profounder insight into all that He had meant, and ability to render a more adequate testimony to the truth embodied in Him. Twice in the Gospel (2<sup>22</sup> 12<sup>25</sup>) the writer tells us expressly that after Jesus was glorified the disciples remembered incidents in His career and saw a meaning in them unnoticed at the time; and this principle may well reach further. When Jesus fed the multitudes, He did not, so far as the Synoptics record, say anything to explain His act; all they were conscious of was that He had compassion on their hunger. But the Spirit-taught Apostle, long afterwards, saw what He meant, and felt that if they had only had ears to hear as the bread passed from hand to hand, they would have caught the voice of Jesus—'I am the bread of life.' So when He opened the eyes of the blind, what He meant was, 'I am the light of the world'; and when He raised the dead, 'I am the resurrection and the life.' If John did not hear Him say so at the moment, he heard Him afterwards, and the authority of the words need not be less though we have to think of them as spoken, not by the historical Christ in Galilee or Judæa, but by the exalted Christ through His Spirit in the soul of the beloved disciple. They would be in this case a sublime illustration of what St. Paul calls 'Christ speaking in me.' The peculiarity that they are put into the lips of Jesus Himself, in connexion with definite scenes and incidents in His earthly life, was possibly quite intelligible to those who first read the Gospel; they knew that it was a spiritual Gospel, and that it was never intended to be taken as a literal record of Jesus' discourses, but as an inspired interpretation of all that He was and did. Read in this light, it has its authority in itself, as the other NT books have, and as Jesus Himself had when He spoke with men face to face; and it is an authority, as experience proves, not less potent than that which is claimed and wielded by Christ in any other of His witnesses. If we compare it with the other Gospels, which have in a higher degree the character of literal transcripts of word and deed, we may even say that it is a fulfilment of the words found in the lips of Jesus in 14<sup>12</sup> 'He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he also do: and greater works than these shall he do; because I go to the Father.' Faith in Jesus has never achieved anything surpassing the witness—the true witness—of this Gospel to the Son of God. The final and supremely authoritative testimony to Jesus is no doubt that which is given in His being and in His work in the world; but so dull of eye and slow of heart were the disciples, that had He put all the import of this into words they could not have taken it in. What He could not say on earth, however. He was able to say by His Spirit from heaven; and when that one of the disciples who was able to hear puts what he has heard into the Master's lips, he is only giving Him His own. The authority of the word of Jesus here, as everywhere in the NT, lies in itself, and in the fact which it interprets. It is an authority which has never failed to win recognition, and it may be said of it with emphasis, 'Every one that is of the truth heareth this voice.'

JAMES DENNEY.
AUTHORITY IN RELIGION.—I. Various connotations of the word 'authority.'—The familiar distinction between legislative, judicial, and executive authority is one that is not only convenient, but rational and necessary. These several kinds of authority differ in their respective sources and appropriate modes of expression, and may differ also in their respective repositories. Again, authority may be original or delegated. The latter, moreover, while on a different plane, is not one whit less real than the former. And, passing by other uses of the word, it will be found that the idea lying at the heart of them all is that of a right on the part of somebody to submission of some sort and in some degree on the part of somebody else. In other words, the use of the term 'authority' implies the existence of an ethical standard. We shall not, therefore, have reached the ultimate authority along any line until we have arrived at this ultimate standard of right, by which the reality of all other authorities is tested. To avoid confusion, then, in considering Christ's teachings regarding authority in religion, we shall have at every step to take account of the particular kind of authority then being dealt with.

2. Christ's conception of religion.—That Christ's conception of religion must have conditioned and shaped His teachings upon authority in religion is too obvious to be questioned. Hence we must at least glance at His conception of religion; but as this subject is itself a large one, we can at most merely glance at it. Our Lord, of course, has nowhere given us a formal definition of religion, nor has He anywhere formally discussed its nature. At the same time, few, we presume, will affirm that Christ has left us wholly at sea upon such a point. By common consent, religion is a term of relation. For present purposes we may, without unwarrantable assumption, say that the terms of this relation are God and man. Further, without undue assumption, we may add that true religion and right relation between God and man are equivalent expressions. Our present question, then, resolves itself into this, What, according to Christ, are the essentials of right relation between God and man?

Now, for answering this question, three statements of our Lord seem to the writer to be of fundamental importance. (1) The first of these occurs in His high priestly prayer. 'This,' says He, 'is eternal life, that they should know thee the only true God, and him whom thou didst send, even Jesus Christ' (Jn 17<sup>3</sup>). Here the last clause may be an exegetical addition of the Evangelist himself. With this statement naturally associate themselves, among others, those in Jn 10<sup>30</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>, Mt 11<sup>27</sup>. Now, certainly no one will even for a moment suppose that our Lord here lends any countenance to anything that can properly be called intellectualism. And yet it would be violent exegesis indeed that eradicated from His words the idea that right relations to God invariably imply, and ground themselves on, right conceptions of God. On any other view, what would be the propriety of the pronoun 'thee,' which certainly singles out from all other possible individuals or entities Him in the knowledge of whom Christ declares that 'eternal life' consists? If right conceptions of God are not essential to right relation between God and man, where, again, would be the propriety of the words 'the only true,' and the emphasis evidently centred upon them? (cf. also Mt 11<sup>27</sup>).

(2) A second passage of fundamental significance for Christ's conception of religion is Mt 22<sup>37</sup> || Mk 12<sup>28</sup>. 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, etc. Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, etc. On these two commandments hangeth the whole law and the prophets.' But that, according to the teaching of Christ, there is an emotional element in religion, is so generally recognized that it would be superfluous to multiply references, especially in such an incidental treatment of the subject as the present.

(3) The third passage that may be regarded as fundamental for our Lord's conception of religion is Mt. 7<sup>21</sup>. 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven.' This, like the last passage cited, is typical. It represents a group of statements that need not be reproduced here.

While, therefore, the first of these three great passages implicates man's understanding in religion, and the second his emotions, this last implicates his will, as controlling his conduct and finding its legitimate expression through it.

What may be called, then, a qualitative analysis of Christ's conception of religion reveals the fact, that it contains this trinity of elements bound together in the indissoluble unity of the rational soul. Were any of them totally lacking, there would be no real religion. On the other hand, the necessary interrelation and interaction between them are recognized by Christ in such declarations as, 'If any man willet to do his will, he shall know of the teaching whether it be of God, or whether I speak from myself' (Jn 7<sup>17</sup>); 'How can ye believe which receive glory one of another, and the glory that cometh from the only God ye seek not' (Jn 5<sup>41</sup>); 'While ye have the light, believe on the light, that ye may become sons of light' (Jn 12<sup>35</sup>). Such is the essential unity of the soul, that it cannot experience deprivation in one of its functions without all of the others being more or less affected thereby.

While, however, we can with a measure both of ease and of certainty make what we have ventured to call a qualitative analysis of Christ's conception of religion, it would not be so easy to arrive at a quantitative analysis of it, and say just how much knowledge, how much emotion, and how much volitional activity must be present in order to the existence in the soul of any real religion. Indeed, it is hard to conceive of Christ as elaborating any views upon such a subject. We may refrain, then, from pressing our investigation into what would only be a region of arid and empty speculation. It is enough, if it has been shown that Christ's conception of religion recognizes the essential unity of the soul, and involves its right relation to God in all its several powers or functions. To this conception His teachings regarding authority in religion will be found to conform. See, further, art. RELIGION.

i. CHRIST'S TEACHING AS TO THE ULTIMATE STANDARD OF RIGHT, AND THE ULTIMATE SOURCE OF RIGHTS.—Obviously we need not expect to find Christ dealing with the ultimate standard of right under the forms of Western dialectics, or in the abstract terms of philosophy. At the same time, we need not despair of obtaining some insight into His mind even upon this question. For one thing, His mode of addressing His Father is significant. Especially is it so when we take into account the circumstances under which it was employed. 'Holy Father,' He says in His intercessory prayer; and again, 'O righteous Father.' Now, under the circumstances, this language is more, far more, than the ascription to His Father of the possession of the qualities expressed by the words 'holy' and 'righteous.' For we must not forget that Christ's intercessory prayer was offered at the very crisis of His career. We cannot pretend to fathom the experiences of His soul in that hour. The prayer itself, however, as recorded in Jn 17, is tense with the emotions that wrought in our Lord's soul as He poured it forth. He was, so to speak, getting His footing as the floods of great waters gathered around Him in their mysterious energy. And the bed-rock upon which He plants Himself is one lying out of sight so far as the visible providence of God is concerned. He assures Himself of its existence as a reality by turning away from what is taking place under the providence of God, and fixing His mind upon the nature of God. God's nature is His voucher for the righteousness of the course of God's providence towards Himself. In the time of stress that was upon Him, He fixes His eye upon God's holiness and righteousness as His sole but sufficient guarantee for the existence of the qualities for which these words stand.

But, further, that Christ found the ultimate standard of right in God's nature as expressed through God's will, is clear also from such statements as these: 'Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour? but for this cause came I unto this hour. Father, glorify thy name' (Jn 12<sup>27</sup>). Here, it will be seen, our Lord places Himself absolutely at the disposal of the Divine will. But this would have been sheer moral insanity, unless God's nature contained the final norm of righteousness. And this language is by no means exceptional; for, as all know, the Gospel of John abounds with expressions of Christ making the will of God the standard to which everything is to be referred (e.g. 4<sup>34</sup> 5<sup>30</sup> 6<sup>38c</sup>). Nor is the case different when we turn to the Synoptics (cf. Mt 5<sup>6</sup> 6<sup>10</sup> 11<sup>21</sup>, Lk 22<sup>29</sup>). All these passages and others leave no room to doubt that Christ taught that the nature of God, as finding expression through His will, is the ultimate standard of right.

And as, for Christ, God's nature is the ultimate norm of right, so for Him God's will is the fountain and source of all particular rights. Wherever there exists a right upon the part of anybody to submission of any kind or degree from anybody else, such right exists in virtue of God's ordering, and is delimited by God's will. These statements, it seems to us, are involved in the passages already cited. All authority, in other words, is simply authority writ short and differently pronounced. A free creature, like man, may be, in a limited sense, an original source of power, but never of rights. His rights are all derived from, and bear the stamp of, the author of his being. Not only the primary and all-comprehending dependence, but all subordinate dependences and interdependences ground themselves ultimately on the relation that subsists between the Creator, as Creator, and the creature, as creature.

II. LEGISLATIVE AUTHORITY IN RELIGION.—1. Term defined.—What we have called legislative authority is concerned primarily with duty. Its prescriptions, while mediated, at least so far as the knowledge of them goes, through the understanding, terminate upon the conscience and the will. It is the right to require or to forbid. It is the right to establish relations and define the duties or the privileges attaching to them. It is the first and most fundamental form of authority, cleaving closest to the etymological and logical sense of the word, which as already noted is simply authority. Legislative authority is really or approximately a creative function. In the case of God, of course, it is really creative. Behind it lies only the Divine nature, which alone conditions and regulates its exercise. From it arise all the relations of the creature to the Creator, and to his fellow-creatures, with the duties and the privileges that inhere in them, or that, in the wisdom of God, are, from time to time and under the particular circumstances, attached to them.

Now, according to our Lord's teaching, all legislative authority in religion vests exclusively in God. He represents God as in the most absolute sense 'Lord of the conscience.' To Him it belongs to say, 'Thou shalt,' and to Him also to say, 'Thou shalt not.' As He has determined the relations between Himself and His creatures ('Father, Lord of heaven and earth,' Mt 11<sup>2</sup>, cf. also 10<sup>9</sup>), it is for Him to define the duties emerging from those relations.

2. If, now, we pass to Christ's teaching as to how this legislative authority belonging exclusively to God comes to expression, we find—(1) That our Lord is wholly silent as to the manifestation of God's legislative authority in what we call 'the laws of nature,' using this phrase so as to include not only the laws of matter, but of mind as well, and also so as to include what St. Paul calls 'the law written in the heart.' For instance, nowhere does He directly advert to 'the ordinance of heaven' (Jer 31<sup>34</sup>, Job 38<sup>33</sup>) as an expression of the Divine will; nowhere does He refer His hearers to the constitution of their own nature, physical, mental, or moral, as embodying an expression of the Divine will regarding this or that. There is, it may be, the glimmer of such a reference in passages like Jn 10<sup>17</sup>, Mt 10<sup>28</sup>, but it is at most a glimmer, and need not detain us.

(2) But that the legislative authority of God is exercised mediately as well as immediately is also taught by Christ. (a) Thus the preceptive portions of the OT, though mediated by 'Moses and the prophets,' are really 'the commandments of God.' Moses and the prophets, quoad this matter, are, so to speak, merely the heralds of the 'Great King,' or, to borrow an OT account of the relation between the prophet and God, the former is the 'mouth' of the latter (Ex 4<sup>16</sup>, cf. 7<sup>1</sup>). And so, while 'Moses said, Honour thy father and thy mother' (Mt 7<sup>19</sup>), this is still for Christ 'the commandment of God.' Further, that 'the law of Moses' was for Him the law of God appears from the fact that, when He was Himself tempted, and had to choose between two courses, what was written in Deuteronomy prescribed for Him the path of duty (Mt 4<sup>7-10, 11</sup>). In the parable of Dives and Lazarus, our Lord puts these very significant words into the mouth of Abraham, 'They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them' (Lk 16<sup>29</sup>). The law in Nu 23<sup>19</sup> (or perhaps in 1 Cl 9<sup>2</sup>), according to which 'the priests in the temple profane' (ironical thrust at His adversaries) 'the Sabbath and are guiltless' (Mt 12<sup>2</sup>), was for Christ determinative of duty and of privilege. Indeed, He virtually puts it upon the same plane for authority as the primary intuition and verdict of conscience, namely, that 'it is lawful to do good—on the Sabbath day' (Mt 12<sup>11</sup>). Further, Christ's summaries of 'the law and the prophets' (Mt 7<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>37</sup>) bear impressive testimony to the fact that He regarded the whole preceptive portion of the OT as an expression of the will of God. ' whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, even so do ye also unto them,' is, according to our Lord, but a just summary of 'the law and the prophets' in terms that may be appreciated by the moral sense of all men. He teaches that the whole OT, so far as it has to do with duty towards man, is but an unfolding, in relation to this or that set of circumstances, of the 'Golden Rule,' whose Divine origin and authority are self-evidencing (cf. Mk 12<sup>28</sup>).

(b) Whether Christ represents the Apostles also as organs through whom God exercises His legislative authority is, perhaps, not quite so clear. Doubtless they were. But even passages such as Mt 10<sup>8</sup> 16<sup>18</sup>, Jn 20<sup>23</sup> 16<sup>19</sup> may refer to a grant of judicial rather than of strictly legislative authority. The authority conferred in these passages is, indeed, large and significant, but none of them necessarily implies that the Apostles were to be organs through whom God would make substantive additions to the commands laid upon the human conscience. Nor has the writer been able to satisfy himself that Christ anywhere uses of them language either demanding, or even susceptible of such an interpretation. In other words, while he thinks it unquestionable that the Apostles were media through whom God exercised His legislative authority, he is of opinion that we have to go outside of the Gospels for the evidence of this fact.

(c) With Christ Himself, however, the case is different. No doubt much of the authority we find Him using in the Gospels is judicial and not legislative. At the same time, intermingled with His judicial expositions of the law of God, we hear Him lay His own commands upon the conscience. Not only does He declare what is the Law, and what its meaning (see above), but He enunciates many specific precepts that stand related to His comprehensive summaries very much as the statutes of the land stand related to its constitution.

'Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth,' etc. (Mt 6<sup>19</sup>); 'Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast your pearls before the swine,' etc. (Mt 7<sup>9</sup>); 'Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you,' etc. (Lk 6<sup>27</sup>); 'Repent ye, and believe in the gospel' (Mk 1<sup>15</sup>)—will serve as samples. Very significant for Christ's claims to be a special organ of the legislative authority of the Godhead is such a statement as, 'The Son of man is Lord of the Sabbath' (Mt 12<sup>8</sup>), and equally so this other, 'Ye call me Teacher and Lord: and ye say well; for so I am' (Jn 13<sup>13</sup>). In both these instances it is clear that Christ asserts for Himself an authority going beyond any that can with propriety be considered as merely judicial. The 'Lord' is a giver of law, not simply its interpreter. The same conclusion follows even more stringently, perhaps, when our Lord says, 'I and the Father are one,' thereby, as the Jews affirmed, and He Himself did not deny, 'making himself (himself) equal with God' (Jn 10<sup>30</sup>, cf. 10<sup>38</sup>, Mt 11<sup>27</sup>; note the word 'yoke'). And, finally, here we must not overlook Mt 23<sup>10</sup>—'all authority is given to me in heaven and on earth,' which certainly constitutes a claim comprehensive enough to include the authority to prescribe laws to the conscience. See preceding article.

(3) But to say that Christ teaches that all legislative authority in religion vests exclusively in God, is hardly to put the case either as fully or as strongly as it needs to be put. For not only does our Lord represent God as 'Lord of the conscience', but with equal emphasis and great explicitness He teaches that 'God alone is Lord of the conscience, and hath left it free from the doctrines and commandments of men which are in anything contrary to His word, or beside it in matters of religious truth and duty.' (For the purposes of this article 'His word' here may be taken quite broadly for any form in which God has made His will known).

This explains His word at the baptism, when the Baptist 'would have hindered him,' and He said, 'suffer it now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness' (Mt 3<sup>15</sup>). So saying, He denies to the human reason the prerogative, by annulling or setting them aside, to pass judgment upon the propriety or the expediency of Divine prescriptions. Recognizing what is praiseworthy in the spirit of the Baptist, He at the same time sets the seal of His disapprobation upon all man-devised substitutions for, or modifications of, Divine ordinances. These are all either acts of open rebellion, or well meant but real usurpations of legislative functions pertaining exclusively to God. The same view finds yet more palpable and pungent expression in His rebuke to the Pharisees (Mk 7<sup>8</sup>). And, as is well known, it was His resistance in word and deed to the traditions of the elders regarding the Sabbath—these being 'beside' God's word—that earned for Him, with the Pharisees, the odium of being Himself a Sabbath-breaker (Jn 5, Mt 12, Mk 3).

Indeed, at the beginning of His Galilean ministry, our Lord is careful to disclaim, even for Himself, either purpose or authority to disannul any of God's commandments. 'Think not,' said He, 'that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets: I came not to destroy, but to fulfil' (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>). See, further, article COMMANDMENT, below. Thus He, as it were, anticipated and forestalled the malice of His own, and the mistaken zeal of a later day. The former made it a charge against Him that He taught contrary to Moses and the prophets; and the latter, strangely enough, has supposed that it honours Him by affirming the same. And, lofty as were the claims that He made for Himself, Christ still impressed it upon His hearers that He not only did not assume to lay upon them anything contrary to God's revealed will but that He taught, and could teach nothing that was 'beside' that will (Jn 5<sup>30</sup>, cf. 5<sup>30</sup> 8<sup>28</sup>), and that nothing 'contrary to or beside' the Scriptures correctly interpreted was to be tolerated, is abundantly evident from the finality attached to them in all Christ's appeals to the OT. For Him its declarations were an end of controversy (Mt 22<sup>29</sup> 19<sup>4</sup> 12<sup>36</sup>, Jn 10<sup>38</sup>).

iii. JUDICIAL AUTHORITY IN RELIGION.—1. Term defined.—As legislative authority has particularly to do with duty, so judicial authority has particularly to do with truth: the former prescribes what one is to do or to be; the latter, what he is to believe: the former creates and defines relation and obligations; the latter declares and interprets them: the former is mainly concerned with the conscience; the latter, with the understanding. It is worth noting further that legislative differs from judicial authority in that the former is original and the latter derivative. Legislative authority, along with other things, prescribes who is to interpret the laws it makes, and how much of finality shall attach to their interpretation by different persons. At the same time, we should not overlook the fact that the most limited judicial authority, so far as it goes, is no less real than the most absolute. Further, judicial authority, though derived, is just as real authority as is legislative authority. And, finally, when the judicial function vests in the same person as the legislative, then the maxim, 'The interpretation of the law is the law,' receives its highest exemplification; for then the law and the interpretation of the law are but different modal manifestations of one and the same personal will or authority. For, in this case, the same character that guarantees to the conscience the righteousness of the relation or obligation created by the will of the lawgiver, guarantees also to the understanding the truth of the finding of the judge. And this, be it observed, is precisely the function of judicial authority, namely, not to create a right, not to make an idea correspond with reality, but to certify to the understanding the existence or non-existence of a right, the truth or the falsity of an idea or a statement. The vital importance of this distinction will appear more and more as the discussion proceeds.

2. Repositories.—As to judicial authority, our Lord teaches that it is distributed among a number of repositories, somewhat as the same kind of authority in a modern State is distributed among a number of courts from the lowest to the highest.

In the case of such courts, no one thinks of denying to the least and lowest of them the character of a true court. Its jurisdiction may be limited, its decisions liable to reversal, but so long as it keeps within its jurisdiction, so long as the appeal from its decisions is pending, its authority is not only as real but as absolute as that of the highest court. Further, even the lowest court possesses a genuine independence: its functions cannot be discharged for it, nor can they be wrested from it by any other court. Further still, it is for each court, at least in the first instance, to interpret and declare the law by which it was created, and its duties and prerogatives under the law. Nor does the fact that it may err in the exercise of this right either nullify or invalidate the right itself. We elaborate this analogy thus in detail, because we believe that it will prove helpful in enabling us to understand our Lord's teachings concerning judicial authority in the sphere of religion.

Proceeding now to note His distribution itself, we find that He accords the fullest recognition (1) to what is commonly known as the right of private judgment. For Him each individual is clothed with a large, though not an absolute or final, judicial authority. Indeed, it is safe to say that no one has surpassed Christ in the honour, and even—if such words may be used of Him—in the deference with which in practice He treated the judicial rights of the darkest and humblest human souls. Despite the supreme claims that He made for Himself, He habitually permitted both Himself and His claims to be put upon proof at the bar of such souls. Not only did He consent, like any other man of His day, to plead at the bar of the ecclesiastical and civil authorities, but, while He always spake as one having authority, He never failed to submit His credentials along with His claims at the bar of the individual reason and conscience. But here we must particularize.

Christ taught, then, (a) That it is the inalienable prerogative of every man to verify for himself the truth of a proposition before assenting to it as true; and to verify for himself the rectitude of a command before yielding obedience to it as right (cf. Jn 15<sup>24</sup>, Mt 16<sup>4</sup> 11<sup>47</sup>, 9<sup>8</sup> 11<sup>20</sup>).

(b) Further, as is involved in what has already said, Christ teaches that the conclusions reached in the exercise of this prerogative are not to be, if, indeed, we should not say cannot be, dictated by any form of external compulsion. In many ways He emphasizes the position that the individual is to be left wholly untrammelled in the exercise of his judicial rights. What else, after all, is the meaning of His words to Pilate, 'My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews: but now is my kingdom not from hence' (Jn 18<sup>36</sup>)? If men were to be left free to deal with His own claims, including, of course, His teachings, without constraint or compulsion of any kind, and to do this even when the decision reached affected not only His liberty but His very life, certainly He would have them no less untrammelled in dealing with every other question of truth or of duty with which they might find themselves confronted. Nor was it only the compulsion of physical force that Christ declined to countenance. He set the seal of His disapproval upon the more subtle and spiritual, but no less real compulsion of a tyrannical public or ecclesiastical opinion, whether formulated into a tradition or into a usage.

His 'Do not your alms before men, to be seen of them' (Mt 6), was designed hardly more to eradicate pride from the souls of His disciples, than it was to hearten them to throw off the incubus of a perverted public and ecclesiastical sentiment which threatened to stifle Christian humility and Godwardness in their very birth. It was to disenchant the souls of His disciples from all fear tending to paralyze the free action of the spirit in its quest for truth and in its witness to the truth, that He said, 'Be not afraid of them that kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him,' etc. (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>); cf. Mk 10<sup>28</sup>, 7<sup>8</sup>, Mt 12<sup>14</sup>, Jn 5. 9.

(c) If what has been said be true, we are not surprised to find Christ teaching that every mind is equipped for the exercise of this high prerogative, that in a certain very true sense the mind has 'the supreme norm of its ideas and acts, not outside of itself, but within itself, in its very constitution' (Sabatier, Religions of Authority, p. xvii).

This also is involved in the passages already quoted. And what else can we make of such statements as these: 'Ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo, these eighteen years, to be loosed from this bond on the day of the Sabbath' (Lk 13<sup>16</sup>)? Where would have been the use of submitting such a case to 'the stupid country archi-synagogos' (Eldersheim), unless, stupid as he was, even he was so equipped as to be able to subject it to some sort of process of 'inner verification'? Or, take the question put to the disciples, 'Who do the multitudes say that I am?' and what propriety would there be in it, unless it carried with it the implication that men generally—the multitudes—were equipped for the forming of a rational judgment upon the truth and righteousness of His claims, and had some touchstone each within himself by which he could determine the truth or falsity of those claims, and the moral quality of the character and of the teachings that lay behind them? The possession of such a norm is involved in every argument framed, in every appeal made, and in every rebuke administered by Christ.

Not only does Christ recognize in every man the existence of such a norm, but He goes farther, and shows that He regards this norm as 'supreme,' in the sense, at least, that for the individual man there is no standard of truth or of right more ultimate than that embedded in his very constitution. Nothing can be substituted for it. Nothing can be used to supplement or to correct it. No appeal lies from it. 'Man has thought that he can do but to abide by the decisions reached in the use of it. 'If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins' (Jn 8<sup>24</sup>) is no arbitrary sentence; but simply the announcement of the momentous truth, that the beliefs or unbeliefs of those whom He addressed would involve certain consequences for them, precisely because those beliefs or unbeliefs were theirs. Christ does not teach, of course, that men can make or unmake truth or right for themselves any more than for others. But He does teach that the conclusions that men reach in the use of the norm that is embedded in the very constitution of the mind are for them severally and individually final. It is this fact that constitutes the very heart of the solemnity of His words, when He says, 'If the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness' (Mt 6<sup>23</sup>). The light that is in a man is the only light that is available for him. It is the light in which he sees light. It cannot itself be tested, so far, at least, as the user of it is concerned, by any other light (cf. also Mt 13<sup>9</sup> and the principle laid down in Ro 14<sup>20</sup>).

(d) Christ, moreover, is equally clear in teaching that in the proper use of the equipment given them, men may and always will arrive at correct judgments in regard both to truth and to duty—that is, in all cases and as regards all matters in reference to which they are called upon, or indeed are entitled, to form judgments. He recognizes, to be sure, the sad fact that men not only may, but as a matter of fact often do, give hospitable entertainment both to error and to evil. He is very emphatic, however, in asserting that this is their fault, and in no sense their misfortune. Whatever the difficulties of the teaching, they need not leave the soul in error or even in doubt. 'If any man willeth to do his will,' says our Lord, 'he shall know of the teaching, whether it be of God, or whether I speak from myself' (Jn 7<sup>17</sup>).

Any account of Christ's teachings as to the judicial authority vested in the individual would be fatally defective if it overlooked a saying like Mt 11<sup>27</sup> (cf. Jn 14<sup>6</sup>, 31<sup>8</sup>, 17<sup>26</sup>). 'No one knoweth the Son,' says Christ, 'save the Father: neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him.' This is not the place for a detailed exposition of these remarkable words. So much, however, is clear upon their very face, namely, that there is a knowledge of

AUTHORITY IN RELIGION

God for which men are wholly dependent upon Christ. Again, it is evident from Jn 14<sup>6b</sup>, that whatever other elements this knowledge of God contains, it is a knowledge that is mediated through the understanding. 'He that hath seen me,' says our Lord, 'hath seen the Father.' The same conclusion follows inevitably from the great emphasis which Christ laid upon His teaching function. But how is a man to test the correctness of propositions for the very knowledge of the contents of which, and much more for their accuracy, he is ex hypothesi wholly dependent upon Christ? We have said that Christ teaches that it is the prerogative of every man to bring every proposition, to the truth of which he is expected to assent, to some sort of process of 'inner verification'; but here are matters which, ex hypothesi, men must accept upon testimony, albeit it is the testimony of no less a witness than Christ Himself. Have we here, then, an inconsistency in Christ's teaching? We think not. We test our telescope; we satisfy ourselves that the laws of its structure are the same as those that obtain in the structure of the eye itself. It is just as truly an organ of vision as is the eye itself, though, of course, an organ of vastly greater range. What it discloses to us we could not apprehend without it. Much that it discloses to us, we either only gradually come to comprehend, or find to be at present incomprehensible to us. But whether we comprehend what we apprehend through the telescope or not, we accept its disclosures, and at least refer them to the large and vague category of what we call facts of existence, and wait expecting to be able to make a closer classification with our advancing knowledge, or the further development of our powers. And, while we never reach the point where we are able with our own eyes to verify the facts given us through the telescope, yet, when we have used the norm in our eye upon the norm in the telescope, and have thus proved a complete correspondence between the two, we have an unshakable conviction that they are not two but one, and that what has been disclosed by the norm in the telescope is assented to by the norm in our eye, as much so as if we had been in a position to bring the norm in our eye to bear directly upon the phenomena revealed to us through the telescope. Just so it is in the case of the individual and Christ. For this knowledge of certain facts regarding God and Christ, and concerning God in Christ, we are absolutely dependent upon the testimony of Christ. We cannot verify the correspondence between that testimony and the reality by ourselves comparing it with the reality. The reality here is as inaccessible to our immediate inspection as the phenomena of stellar space would be, apart from the telescope. What then? Does Christ call upon us to surrender the very badge of our individuality, when we are dealing with His statements? Does He claim that His statements must be accepted without our being able to subject them to any process of 'inner verification,' the latter being, of course, the only possible real verification? Not at all. What He does claim, however, is that when we have assented to His trustworthiness, we have assented to the trustworthiness of His statements. Obviously, if He is as He claims to be, 'the Truth,' and we have satisfied ourselves of this by the same rational and moral processes by which we satisfy ourselves of any other propositions whatever, then in verifying Him, so to speak, we have verified His statements, as truly and as certainly as if we were capable of comparing those statements with the great realities to which they relate. Otherwise, where would be the sense in examining witnesses in our courts? And how else do we verify the ultimate facts given us, in the frame of nature and in the constitution of our own being—which, be it observed, are after all but the testimony of God,—except by verifying God? That we can do, of which proposition the simple proof is that we do it. For nothing is more certain than that 'It is impossible for God to lie.' This is the ultimate axiom upon which not only all certainty, but the possibility of any certainty depends.

Christ's teaching in reference to an external revelation, and our absolute dependence upon His veracity for the truth and the righteousness of its contents, do not impinge in the least either upon His teaching as to the judicial authority with which each individual is invested, or upon the true and proper autonomy of the soul. For He constantly teaches both by implication and by direct assertion that it is possible for men to verify Him, so to speak, and that it is at once their privilege and their duty to do so. And how exquisitely tender is His subtle appeal to His disciples to apply to His moral being that norm embedded in the constitution of their minds, when He says, 'In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you' (14<sup>2</sup>).

(2) While Christ accords a large judicial authority to the individual, it is, as already stated, neither an unlimited, nor an absolutely final authority. In His famous words to St. Peter, He speaks of 'my church' (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>), and in His equally celebrated words to Pilate, of 'my kingdom' (Jn 18<sup>36</sup>). Now it is no doubt true, as Dr. Vos has shown (The Kingdom of God and the Church, ch. ix.), that these expressions are not absolutely coterminous in their respective connotations, the 'church' being but one phase of the 'kingdom.' Still, even this being true, it follows that the Church is an organized body, with officers, laws, and members. Now it is clear, from what Christ says of the Church, that the authority vested in her, and exercised through her officers, is a purely judicial authority. The Lord is her lawgiver. From Him alone she receives all the laws by which she binds the consciences of men. Her sole functions are to declare and to apply the law of Christ. To make any laws for her own members or for others is beyond her prerogative.

That such is her authority as set forth in the teachings of Christ appears from such statements as, 'If thy brother sin against thee, go show him his fault between thee and him alone: . . . But if he hear thee not, take with thee one or two more, etc. And if he refuse to hear them, tell it unto the church: and if he refuse to hear the church also, let him be unto thee as the Gentile and the publican' (Mt 18<sup>15-17</sup>); 'Go ye, therefore, and make disciples of all nations, etc.: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you,' etc. (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>).

The criticism of the former passage by B. Weiss can hardly be regarded as invalidating it as a proper source of information as to our Lord's teaching concerning the Church (see his NT Theol. i. p. 141). It is fair, we think, to assume that the charge contained in the latter passage was addressed to the Apostles, not as such, but as representatives of the Church in all ages.

As will be observed, the judicial authority ascribed to the Church in these sayings of our Lord has a twofold aspect. In Mt 28 she is authorized to declare the law of Christ to those without her fold with a view to bringing them into subjection to Him. And in both sayings she is empowered to unfold that law to those within her pale. The necessity for both aspects of her judicial authority is as obvious as is the grant of it. If it be her function to extend the Kingdom, then it must also be her prerogative authoritatively to declare the nature and laws of the Kingdom. And again, if the term 'kingdom' as applied to the Church is not a hopeless misnomer, then she must have authority to determine what the law of Christ demands of the citizens of the Kingdom, and when this or that citizen is conforming to the law. See, further, art. CHURCH.

(3) The supreme and final judicial authority belongs to the Holy Spirit, whose findings are mediated proximately through the Scriptures, and ultimately through the Prophets, Apostles, and Christ Himself. We have seen that, while both the individual and the Church may, in the proper use of their respective equipments, arrive at a knowledge of truth and right in reference to all matters of truth and duty upon which they are respectively entitled to formulate a judgment; yet, as a matter of fact, neither the Church nor the individual does always arrive at such knowledge. Now the very statement of this position implies the existence of some standard by the use of which faulty judgments, when reached, may be detected as such, and corrected. This standard, according to Christ, is, in the last resort, to be found nowhere else than in the teachings of the Prophets, Apostles, and Himself. The finality and the infallibility of these teachings are, so our Lord teaches, guaranteed by the fact that they proceed directly from the Godhead, through the immediate agency of its great executive, the Holy Spirit, whose instruments or organs the Prophets, Apostles, and He Himself were. If we may use the term 'Scriptures' as a somewhat loose synonym for the teachings of the Prophets, Apostles, and Christ, then the Scriptures are, or, as with admirable accuracy the Westminster Confession puts it, 'the Holy Spirit speaking in the Scripture' is, 'the Supreme Judge by which all controversies of religion are to be determined . . . and in whose sentence we are to rest' (ch. i. sec. x.).

(a) That Christ conceived of the teachings of the Prophets, or the OT, as constituting, as far as it went, a court of last appeal in matters of religion, is strikingly evinced in His two summaries of those teachings already referred to: 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, etc. . . . Thou shalt love thy neighbour, etc. . . . On these two commandments hangeth the whole law and the prophets' (Mt 22<sup>37</sup>, Mk 12<sup>28</sup>, Mt 7<sup>12</sup>). But God being love, it is just in love that religion finds its highest and fullest expression. That standard, therefore, which being adhered to leads to love, is the final standard.

The same point of view as regards the OT finds expression in the words, 'They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them. . . . If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, if one rise from the dead' (Lk 16<sup>29-31</sup>). The implication in Blives' plea was that it was his misfortune that he had come to that place of torment. These words distinctly disallow that implication. They affirm both the sufficiency and the finality of the OT in all matters connected with the salvation of those to whom that revelation was given. And so the Sadducees are told (Mt 22<sup>29</sup>), 'Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures, etc., which means, of course, that they need not have erred had they only gone to the Scriptures in the right spirit. Upon all questions raised by His adversaries, it was to the teachings of the OT that Christ Himself continually appealed as the final authority. Quoting Hosea, He said to the Pharisees, 'If ye had known what this meant, I desire mercy and not sacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltless' (Mt 12<sup>7</sup>). Thus the standard to which He brings their judgment of Himself and by which He exposes its falsity and wickedness, is the teaching of the OT. His 'Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye tithe mint and anise and cummin, and have left undone the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith; but these ye ought to have done, and not to have left the other undone' (Mt 23<sup>23</sup>), is but an application of the standard of the OT for the testing of Pharisaic teachings and practices. Further, He recognizes the oughtness of these teachings, when they concern the tithing of mint, anise, and cummin, as truly as in the weightier matters of judgment, mercy, and faith. Especially significant are words like those in Mk 12<sup>28</sup> (cf. Mt 22<sup>37</sup>, Lk 20<sup>37</sup>): 'How say the scribes that the Christ is the son of David? For David said in the Holy Spirit, The Lord said unto my Lord, etc. David himself calleth him Lord, and whence is he his son?'

(b) Besides the passages already cited, the following show that Christ represents His Apostles as being the organs of the Holy Spirit in such sense that their teachings, quæ Apostles, are ultimate and infallible in all matters of faith and duty: 'And I also say unto thee, That thou art Peter, etc. . . . I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven' (Mt 16<sup>19</sup>). The same promise is made to the Apostles, no doubt to all of them, in Mt 18<sup>18</sup>. In Jn 20<sup>22</sup> we read, 'And when he had said this he breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Spirit: whose soever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven; whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained.'

B. Weiss (NT Theol. i. 142, footnote) regards Mt 18<sup>18</sup> as addressed to 'the disciples in the wider sense,' and avoids bringing the statement into collision with the facts of history only by finding in them 'nothing else than the authorization of the Apostles to proclaim the message by means of which men are called into the Kingdom' (ib. p. 138, where he is commenting more particularly upon Mt 16<sup>19</sup>). On the other side see art. 'Power of the Keys' in Hastings' DB, vol. iv. To most persons, however, such a view of this passage will appear inadequate. Dr. Chaas. Hodge, believing that the grant of power made in these words was not designed to be limited to the Apostles, seeks to avoid collision with the facts of history by representing it as made to the invisible Church (Church Polity, p. 36 ff.). This, however, will seem to many as little satisfactory as is Weiss' view. That the words were addressed to the Apostles, and to no others, appears probable, not only from Mt 18<sup>18</sup> and Jn 20<sup>22</sup>, but even more so from a comparison of Mt 18<sup>18</sup> with Mk 9<sup>37</sup>. That the Church also, according to Christ, was invested with a limited judicial authority, has already been shown.

The full character and extent of the power with which Christ represents His Apostles as being clothed appear conspicuously in the words, 'And whosoever shall not receive you nor hear your words, as ye go forth out of that house, or that city, shake off the dust of your feet. Verily, I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for that city' (Mt 10<sup>14</sup>). With this should be compared Mt 11<sup>24</sup>. The sufficient ground for such a statement is furnished by the words also spoken of the Apostles (and subsequently of 'the seventy,' who received a similar, but more temporary commission, Lk 10<sup>10</sup>)—'He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me' (Mt 10<sup>40</sup>, cf. Jn 13<sup>20</sup>).

(c) That Christ claimed for Himself a judicial authority that was absolute and final, needs hardly to be illustrated. It appears from such facts as that He taught as one having authority (Mk 12<sup>27</sup>, Lk 4<sup>8</sup>); He always commanded and never merely counselled (Mt 23<sup>3</sup>, Lk 8<sup>8</sup>, Mt 10<sup>7</sup>); while unflinchingly tender, He did not tolerate even well-meant correction (Mt 16<sup>22</sup>); He invited, expected, and demanded of His disciples the most complete and unreserved surrender to His teachings and to His will.

His 'hypocoristic expressions' or 'endearing diminutives' (see art. by Professor B. B. Warfield in Bible Student and Teacher, Sept. 1884, p. 515 ff.) indicate not only His attitude towards His disciples, but, indirectly, that He expected their attitude towards Him to be one of unquestioning docility, dependence, and submission (Lk 12<sup>29</sup>, Jn 12<sup>18</sup>, Mt 13<sup>13</sup> et passim). Both His authority and the nature of it are less veiled behind the very common designation of 'disciple.' 'A disciple,' says our Lord, using the figure of metoikos, 'is not above his teacher' (Mt 10<sup>24</sup>). The very terms of discipleship demand the same absolute self-abnegation upon the disciple's part that Christ Himself had manifested towards His Father. 'If any man,' says He, 'will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me' (Mt 8<sup>9</sup>, Lk 9<sup>23</sup>). In the saying, 'Ye call me Teacher and Lord: and ye say well; for so I am' (Jn 13<sup>13</sup>), 'teacher' is suggestively united with 'Lord.' And not less suited to arrest the attention is the statement, 'But ye are not called Rabbis: for one is your teacher, and all ye are brethren' (Mt 23<sup>8</sup>).

Once more, Christ declared Himself to be 'The Way, and the Truth, and the Life' (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>); He invited men to believe in Himself just as they believed in God (v. 1); He conditioned His blessings upon the acceptance of His 'yoke' and His teachings (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>). Nay, He conditioned men's everlasting salvation upon their unquestioning acceptance of His statements about Himself (Jn 8<sup>24</sup>; for the repetition of this thought in a slightly different form see Mt 23<sup>37</sup>, Lk 13<sup>34</sup>, 19<sup>44</sup>). The word that He spake was to judge them at the last day (Jn 12<sup>48</sup>). His words are God's words: 'The words that I say unto you, I speak not from myself: but the Father abiding in me he doeth the works' (Jn 14<sup>10</sup>). In a word, He and the Father are one (Jn 10<sup>30</sup>); seeing Him, one sees the Father (14<sup>9</sup>); the 'Spirit of truth' in guiding into all truth was to glorify Him, 'for' said our Lord, 'he shall take of mine, and shall declare it unto you. All things whatsoever the Father hath are mine: therefore said I that he shall take of mine and shall declare it unto you' (16<sup>14</sup>).

Thus when we reach Christ in the matter of religion, we have reached the fountainhead. It were idle to look for a court in which to review and put to the test His findings in regard either to truth or to duty. Such, certainly, is His own teaching upon the subject. See preceding article.

iv. EXECUTIVE AUTHORITY IN RELIGION.—1. Term defined.—The function of executive authority, as needs scarcely be said, is simply and solely to give effect to the legislative will and to judicial findings. Of itself it originates nothing, interprets and declares nothing. It simply does. More need not be said, because executive authority is so obviously and so markedly distinct from both legislative and judicial, that there is no danger of its being confused with either the one or the other.

2. Repositories.—(1) Our Lord obviously teaches that as every individual is a repository of judicial authority, so every individual was designed to be, and every individual Christian is, an executive agent of the Godhead. It is His constant contention that it is for doing the will of God that men exist, whether as creatures or as Christians. The end of His whole teaching function was to set men doing, and to guide them in doing, the will of God. It was the gravamen of His complaint against those, like the Pharisees, who ought to have been His disciples, but were not, that instead of doing the will of God, they did the insts of their father, the devil (Jn 8<sup>4</sup>). The end that He set before those professing to be His disciples was, 'So let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven' (Mt 5<sup>16</sup>). The first three petitions that He puts on their lips are, 'Hallowed be thy name, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth.' The badge of discipleship (Mt 12<sup>5</sup>), the only accepted evidence of love and of loyalty (Jn 14<sup>15</sup>), a condition sine qua non to salvation (Mt 7<sup>21</sup>), was that His followers should do the will of God. It was His ceaseless theme, elaborated now in this form and now in that, that the end of life is not getting, or having, or being ministered unto, or thinking, but being and doing the will of God. To go into details here would require the incorporation in this article of a very considerable part of all four Gospels, and would be superfluous.

(2) The passages already cited show that Christ represents the Church in her corporate capacity as the great executive agency of God for the preaching of the gospel of the Kingdom as a witness among all nations, making disciples of all nations, and teaching them to observe all things whatsoever He has commanded. Executive and judicial authority here complement each other.

(3) That Christ ascribes executive authority to the Prophets is perhaps a fair inference from such a passage as Mk 7<sup>1</sup>, in which our Lord refers to Isaiah not merely as an interpreter of God's law, but as a teacher of God's people. But the inference is not to be strained. And for evidence of the executive authority unquestionably exercised by the Prophets, we have to turn elsewhere than to the Gospels. The case is different with the Apostles. The mission of 'the Twelve' (Mt 10) points clearly to the fact that they were invested with authority to diffuse the knowledge of the gospel, and to use a variety of agencies to gain men's attention and win their allegiance to it. The same follows from Lk 24<sup>47</sup> and Ac 1<sup>8</sup>. But as to the details of their executive functions we learn but little from the Gospels. It is different, however, in the case of Christ. He applies to Himself (Lk 4<sup>43</sup>), the famous passage from Is 61, 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me,' etc. This is not the place to unfold in detail the several features of the wondrous programme outlined in the words of the prophet: it is hardly necessary, for they are as plain as they are precious. The title of 'The Good Shepherd,' which our Lord appropriated to Himself (perhaps from Ezk 34), is evidence both of the fact and of the nature of His executive functions (Jn 10). The same fact underlies such statements as 'I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened until it be accomplished' (Lk 12<sup>30</sup>). This last passage also brings before us the central feature of the work committed to Christ. Here, again, we must forbear from going into details, which belong properly to another field of discussion. It must suffice merely to recall to the reader's mind such sayings of our Lord as 'Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I may take it again. No one taketh it away from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have authority to lay it down, and I have authority to take it again. This commandment received I from my Father' (Jn 10<sup>17</sup>); 'This is my body . . . for this is my blood of the covenant, which is shed for many unto the remission of sins' (Mt 26<sup>28, 29</sup>); and the word from the cross, 'It is accomplished' (Jn 19<sup>30</sup>). Surely the prophet went not amiss when he spoke of Him as the great 'Ehbedh Jakweh' (עֶבֶד יְקֻוֹעַ).

(4) According to our Lord, the great executive of the Godhead is the Holy Spirit. It belongs to another article (see HOLY SPIRIT) to unfold His doctrine of the Holy Spirit. But we may, without intruding into that discussion, call attention to passages like Jn 3<sup>16</sup>, 14<sup>16</sup>, 16<sup>7</sup>, 16<sup>13</sup>, Ac 1<sup>5</sup>.

LITERATURE.—The literature bearing formally upon the teachings of Christ concerning authority in religion is very much scattered and somewhat meagre. We must content ourselves, therefore, with mentioning some works and articles that deal with the question of authority in religion without treating specifically of the teachings of our Lord upon this point. Dr. James Martineau's The Seat of Authority in Religion is still the first in its class. (Dr. Martineau denies, of course, the existence of any external authority in religion; and supports his contention with an acuteness and vigour that still remain not only unsurpassed, but wholly unequalled by any who have given in their adhesion to his general position.) More recent works, representing substantially Dr. Martineau's view, but adding little to what may be called his historical, and nothing whatever to his psychological and philosophical defence of it, are: Religions of Authority and the Religion of the Spirit, by the late Prof. Auguste Sabatier; Liberal Christianity, by his pupil and after colleague, Prof. Jean Réville; The Religion of a Mature Mind, by Prof. George A. Coe. Prof. Sabatier and Dr. Coe both claim the support of Christ for their position. But Prof. Sabatier's presentation of the teachings of Christ is lacking not only in completeness, but in cogency, and Prof. Coe's comes perilously near being mere caricature. For as (in some vital particulars) opposite view of the general subject, the reader may be referred to Stanton, The Place of Authority in Matters of Religious Belief; Dale, Protestantism (ch. ii); Elliott, Christian Compromiser; Oman, Vision and Authority; Strong, Authority in the Church; and also to the following articles: 'The Philosophy of Authority in Religion,' by Wilfrid Ward in The Hibbert Journal, vol. Warfield in The Presbyterian and Reformed Review, July 1900; 'Authority in Religion,' by Dr. Henry Collin Minton, ib. April 1900. Dr. Warfield's article, besides the always valuable matter from his own pen, contains a number of useful references and extracts.

AVARICE.—See COVETOUSNESS.

AVE MARIA.—This well-known devotion of the Latin Church is based upon the salutations addressed to the Virgin Mary by the angel Gabriel and by Elizabeth the mother of John the Baptist (Lk 1<sup>28-49</sup>). Its earlier and shorter form follows closely the words of Scripture, with the addition only of the names 'Mary' and 'Jesus'; 'Hail (Mary), full of grace; blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb (Jesus).' As thus recited, it cannot be called a prayer, but may be considered either as a memorial of thanksgiving for the Incarnation; or as one of those devotional apostrophes of departed saints which are found even in the writings of the Christian Fathers and in early Christian inscriptions.

The use of the Ave Maria in the fixed liturgical services of the Latin Church is of comparatively late origin. Its devotional use is, however, much older: it is even said to be traceable as far back as the 7th century. In the 14th cent. it is found in the popular handbooks of devotion. The Mirror of our Lady (first half of the 15th cent.) alludes to it as forming part of the preliminary prayers said privately by the worshipper before the office began. An interesting example of its use is given by Maskell (Monumenta Rituaia, ii, 71). The foundation statutes of the Abbey of Moxtoke in the reign of Edward III. order its recital daily.

But the Ave was not definitely placed in the offices of the Breviary until the 16th cent.; and curiously enough by the liturgical reformer, Cardinal Quignonez. In the present Roman Breviary, dating from Pope Pius V. (1568), it is directed to be said with the Lord's Prayer at the beginning of each office, and after Compline.

The pre-Reformation Ave was usually the shorter and Scriptural form as given above. But as it stands now in the Breviary, it ends with a direct prayer addressed to the Virgin, said to date from the middle of the 15th cent.: 'Holy Mary, mother of God, pray for us sinners, now and in the hour of our death.'

It is fair to remember that, whatever lines the devotions to Mary ultimately followed, they were, in their original intention, undoubtedly devotions to Christ. Like the title Theotokos, sanctioned by the Third (Œumenical Council (Ephesus 431), they were intended to safeguard and emphasize the true humanity of Christ. Not only was Christ perfect God, but He was truly conceived and born of a human mother, so that the Son of Mary is indissolubly God and man in one person. The devotions addressed to His mother were therefore a commemoration of the intimate union between the Godhead and human nature, of which union Mary was both the willing instrument and the sign.

AWE.—The adoration of what is mysterious and sublime is an essential element in religion. When expressed towards unworthy objects the result is superstition, but the motive itself is the soul of worship. As the feeling is thus fundamental to the relationship between the human and the Divine, increase of knowledge, while testing and purifying this relationship, should protect and strengthen it.

In the service of the missionary gospel, the complaint is made to-day by Eastern heathen religions that our Western Christianity, which comes to them as the aggressive herald of a higher life, is gravely deficient in religious veneration. It becomes, therefore, of practical interest to inquire how Christ's first disciples were influenced in this direction by His presence among them, and to what extent the same feeling towards the person of the living Christ pervades the Church of modern times.

When Christ took upon Him our nature, it was under such circumstances of poverty and humble birth as could not inspire the conventional regard which the world bestows upon rank and title. Further, His life was lived in such daily intimacy with those around Him, and was so thoroughly affected by the local customs of Israel and the social conditions of the time, that His disciples could speak of their fellowship with Him in terms of exact knowledge and distinct impression. They could afterwards refer to His life as something that they had seen with their eyes and their hands had handled (1 Jn 1st).

Nevertheless, there is nothing more evident in the story of the Evangelists than the fact that a permanent and increasing mystery, passing into reverence and awe, accompanied that familiar acquaintance. The feeling was usually called forth by some manifestation of knowledge or power, and deeper even than the impression thus produced by His wonderful teaching and miraculous works was the trustful consciousness of their being in contact with a personality that was altogether holy and separate from sin. Finally, the reverent submission thus instilled into the minds of the disciples was exemplified in Christ Himself towards the will of God, as in the temptation in the wilderness and in the Garden of Gethsemane.

As their power of spiritual perception increased, the disciples learnt to apprehend and accept the startling renovation, the sudden depth, and the delightful expansion that the Master gave to old religious truths, but there were always meanings about which they had to seek an interpretation in private, and to the end of their fellowship they had often to confess that they knew not what He said. The difficulty thus created by His personality and actions was so far recognized by the Lord Jesus, that on one occasion He encouraged His disciples to make known their own thoughts and the thoughts of others about Himself (Mt 16th). Thus Nathanael was overawed by the knowledge that He had been watching him in his place of seclusion (Jn 1st); and this feeling soon became a general persuasion that He knew all men and what was in man (2nd 23). Peter felt himself so immediately in the presence of Divine power that he confessed his own sinfulness, and he and James and John decided to leave all and follow Him (Lk 5th 11). The bereaved sisters at Bethany repeat the conviction that if He had been there, their brother would not have died (Jn 11th 22). And among those who came into more incidental contact with Him by simple inquiry or importunate need, Nicodemus was attracted by the persuasion that He was a teacher come from God (Jn 3rd); an admission to the same effect was made on one occasion by the Pharisees and Herodians (Mk 12th); the chief priests and scribes were driven to assign a Satanic origin to His unquestionable power (Mt 12th); while the Pharisees reached a stage in their controversy with Him after which no man durst ask Him any question (Mt 22nd, Mk 12th). The privileged traffickers in the temple quailed under His exposure and rebuke (Mt 21st), and to the end the challenge to convict Him of sin remained unanswered (Jn 8th). All the miracles of Christ, while expressing His pity and love, accentuated this Divine power, and His teaching bore the distinguishing mark of authority (Mt 7th).

To His first, Jewish disciples the name Messiah was the unveiling of a historical mystery, the justification of the calling, preservation, and discipline of Israel. They found in Him the fulfilment of the prophecy 'and his name shall be called Wonderful' (Is 9th). With so much that attracted them to His person and depended upon His presence, it is doubtful if they could have ventured upon our depersonalized formula about 'the plan of salvation.' And so, while the Fourth Gospel, like the ancient epics, begins with the introduction of its principal theme, namely, 'The Word became flesh, and dwelt among us' (Jn 1st), the Evangelist could add that even through that obscuring medium Christ's disciples were enabled to behold His glory (ib.).

After the Resurrection this veil was so completely removed, and the awe of Christ's presence became so unclouded and continuous, that one of the Apostles could write, 'Though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now we know him so no more' (2 Co 5th).

Thereafter it became the commission of the Church to proclaim and teach and exemplify how the flesh may in turn become the Word, and every believer be a dwelling-place for the Spirit of Christ. The reverence that once gathered around His own visible person could still influence men through every witness in whom His Spirit dwelt. The condition of life and service was fixed, namely, 'As he is, so are we in this world' (1 Jn 4th). And so in the Apostolic preaching of the gospel the living personality of Christ was never lost in the analysis of His mind and nature. Instead of the parched abstractions that with us so often take the place of the mystical indwelling, they preached 'Jesus and the resurrection' (Ac 17th), 'Jesus Christ and him crucified' (1 Co 2nd).

Can it be said to-day of Christian sainthood and the service of the missionary gospel, that the person of Christ is thus central, His presence an indispensable necessity, likeness to Him the recognition mark of His Church, and the conquest of the world the consummation of its appointed labours? If it be otherwise, certain signs may be expected to manifest themselves. Christ will be little more than a beautiful name in His Church, an idea developed and resident in our minds. The work of the Holy Spirit in bringing and revealing the things of Christ will be shadowy and almost superfluous to those who have already reached a complete conception of Christ by philosophical method applied to the study of doctrine. The question, 'Is Christ divided?' (1 Co 12<sup>29</sup>) will cease to startle and distress, and the loyalty due to the Head of the Church and to the universal Kingdom will be pledged to sectarian trusts and the watchwords of exhausted controversy. When the one standard of elevation, the stature of Christ, is withdrawn, Church distinctions will be restricted to the superficial dimensions of mere historical length and doctrinal width. In the ideal picture of the future fold, the one flock still needs the presence of the one Shepherd (Jn 10<sup>10</sup>). Through this visible union in Him, Christ will be glorified (17<sup>24</sup>), and solely to its manifestation is promised the conquest of the world (v. 23).

AXE.—This word occurs twice in the Gospels (Mt 3<sup>9</sup>, Lk 3<sup>9</sup>), each time in the report of the preaching of the Baptist. The old familiar tool of peace and weapon of war (1 K 6<sup>7</sup>, Ps 74<sup>5</sup>, Jer 51<sup>20</sup>) has become a metaphor for the ministry of men with a mission of reform. This suits the spirit of one who, like John the Baptist, is filled with the teaching of the OT. For the axe gleams in its histories and flashes in its songs, while in prophetic mood the tool is changed to the person—the wielder is himself the weapon (Is 10<sup>34</sup>, Dn 4<sup>14</sup>, Jer 51<sup>20</sup>). All this is the forerunner's inherited world of ideas on this implement of industry and weapon of attack. He is a part of all that his race has been. He sees the men of old times 'as men that lifted up axes upon a thicket of trees' (Ps 74<sup>3</sup>). The Messiah, the Coming One, is the last of the line. Nor are all in that line of the lineage of the house of David. 'As the Assyrian axe in the days of old, so now the Roman axe was laid at the root of Israel' (Philochristus, ch. 4). Thoroughly as these powers had done their part, yet more drastic was to be the work of the future ('every tree,' Mt 3<sup>10</sup>). Under this image of the axe, the road-maker (Mt 3<sup>3</sup>) has his vision of the wood-cutter and his effectual working (v. 10).

But 'God fulfils Himself in many ways.' And when the Carpenter laid aside the axe of the workshop in Nazareth, the wood-cutter, 'thoroughly furnished unto every good work, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed,' was already prepared for going up against the trees. Jesus had been tempered by waiting, in solitude and temptation. And the stroke of His axe, when it fell, was deliberate, radical, universal (cf. He 4<sup>12</sup>). Men and institutions, the priests, the temple felt it. He would save the tree of humanity, even 'as a tree whose stock remaineth when they are felled' (Is 6<sup>13</sup>). Therefore He struck at the root of the evil in man and nature—sin. And because the strokes were meant to be regenerating and reforming, they were clean, swift, sharp, and stout (Jn 2<sup>17</sup> 3<sup>14</sup>, Lk 13<sup>16</sup>).

Finally, the axe is not only the sign-manual of the mission of the forerunner and the Fulfiller, it is that of reformers in general. As the axe of the backwoodsman has been tempered in fire and water past the useless state of brittleness and beyond the extremity of hardness, so the tempering of the reformer is done, on the one hand, in a series of Divine and delicate processes in the personality of him who is being touched to fine issues by the Spirit, for the service of God and man, and, on the other hand, in a parallel series of providential dispensations in the mind and environment of the people, the race, or the institution with which he has to deal.

BABE.—1. βρέφος, lit. 'nourished'—by the mother, is used of an unborn infant (Lk 14<sup>14</sup>), of an infant still in swaddling-bands (2<sup>12</sup> 16), and also of young children brought by their mothers to Jesus that He might touch them (18<sup>9</sup>). 2. νήπιος, literally, 'one that cannot yet speak' (νή = 'not,' and ερος, 'word'); cf. Lat. in-fans, 'infant,' which is a better rendering of νήπιος, though neither AV nor RV is consistent in the translation of the two Greek words. νήπιος is a child as contrasted with an older person, e.g. with 'the wise and prudent' in Lk 10<sup>6</sup> and Mt 11<sup>23</sup> (cf. Gal 4<sup>3</sup>, Eph 4<sup>14</sup>). It is used also with θηλάστρον, 'sucklings,' in Mt 21<sup>18</sup>, in which passage the root meaning of νήπιος is specially suggestive, 'Out of the mouth of speechless (babes) thou hast perfected praise.'

Jesus' fondness for these little ones was shown, both by His rebuke of the disciples who would have sent them and their mothers away when they came to Him for a blessing (Lk 18<sup>16</sup>, cf. Mt 19<sup>14</sup>), and by His frequent use of children to illustrate the Christian disposition (cf. Mt 18<sup>2-6</sup>, Mk 10<sup>15</sup>, Lk 18<sup>16-17</sup>). See, further, artt. INFANCY, CHILDREN.

The word 'babe' (Spizet) is twice used of the infant Jesus Himself (Lk 2<sup>23</sup> 28). And it is worth noting that in v. 23 RV brings out a significance of meaning which is lost in AV. In the Gr. there is no art. prefixed to βρέφος in this verse; the sign given to the shepherds was 'the sign of a babe.' Moreover, according to the reading which is most strongly supported, εωχλίας should have the art., so that what the shepherds were told was 'The sign is a babe.' The meaning therefore is, not as AV suggests, 'you shall find the babe you are looking for in such and such a condition,' but rather 'this most extraordinary and suggestive one. You shall find the Saviour you are looking for, Christ the Lord, in the form of a babe, wrapped in swaddling-clothes, and lying in a manger.' See Dr. Mouro Gibson in Sunday Mag., Dec. 1891; and cf. Dr. Hastings in Expos. Times, iii. [1892] 196, and [1894] 147.

BACK TO CHRIST.—The movement or tendency described in the phrase 'back to Christ' belongs mainly to the past half century, and both its wide extent and its far-reaching consequences for religious thought justify us in regarding it as the most important theological event of the period. The phrase can be received as a correct description of the movement, only under the explanation that the return has not been to the Christ of dogma, but to the Christ of history. This distinction must be kept clearly in view. The Christ of dogma is Christ as exhibited in the creeds—the eternally begotten Son of God, the second Person in the Trinity, who, for our redemption, assumed our human nature and submitted to death as an atonement for our sins. He is the God-man, a Divine Person with two natures and two wills. It is evident that these determinations move in a different region from that of empirical reality. They cannot be established on merely historical evidence; they have their ground in a judgment of faith. What we have in dogma is not a portrait of the historical Jesus in the religious and ethical traits of His character, but a speculative construction of His Person; not an account of His historical ministry, but a doctrinal interpretation of it. The Christ of history is the concrete Person whose image meets us in the Gospels; the Christ of dogma is the complex metaphysical or doctrinal characters which the Church, on the ground of its faith, attributed to this Person. So far the distinction is clear enough, and meets with general acceptance. The difficulty begins when we raise the question whether such facts as the Virgin-birth, the Miracles (in the strict sense of the word), and the Resurrection are to be included in our conception of the historical Christ as resting upon historical evidence, or whether they are not rather to be transferred from the domain of history to that of faith. The question will come up again in the meantime it may be sufficient to call attention to the ambiguity which must attach to the term 'historical Christ' so long as it remains undecided.

When we speak of a return to the Christ of history, we imply that His image has been lost, sight of, or at least obscured. It was not doubtless the intention of the Church that its doctrinal determinations should supplant the concrete reality in the thought and faith of the community. But this was what actually happened. More and more the historical Person was overshadowed by the speculative construction, the historical ministry by the formulas in which its significance was summed up. The figure of Jesus disappeared behind the pre-existent Logos, the earthly ministry behind the idea of the Incarnation, the cross behind the doctrine of the Atonement. This result is not to be explained by the fact that dogma, from its controversial character, attracted to itself an undue share of attention and interest as compared with matters that had never been in dispute. The cause lay deeper. It is to be found in the conception of Revelation and of Faith that has dominated the Catholic and also, to a large extent, the Protestant Church. Revelation has been understood as the supernatural communication of a system of doctrine; Faith, as the submission of the mind to doctrine on the ground of its authority. The emphasis has thus been thrown, not on the historical life, but on the dogmatic construction. The historical life has occupied only a secondary place, its significance being found mainly in the basis it supplies for this construction or interpretation.

A. Causes of the movement.—What are the causes that have contributed to restore the figure of Jesus to its place in the centre of religious thought? We shall mention three as the chief.

(a) The first is the application of historical criticism to the Gospel narrative. In 1835, D. F. Strauss published his Leben Jesu, and this book proved the starting-point of a critical movement the end of which is not yet in sight. The results of Strauss' criticism were almost purely negative:

the Gospel story was resolved into a tissue of myths. There are still writers who find in that story only the most meagre basis of fact; but their conclusions are far from representing the general results of the movement, which are much more positive than negative in their character, much more constructive than destructive. If doubt has been cast on some of the facts related about Jesus, and if the influence of subsequent ideas has been detected here and there in the presentation of His life and teaching, the substantial truth of the Gospel narrative has been amply vindicated. Moreover, the critical study of the NT has done for Christ what that of the OT has done for the prophets. It has reconstructed the contemporary background, given us a better understanding of His teaching, and enabled us to see the Man and His work in their human environment. To this enlarged historical knowledge and new feeling for the historical, we owe the recognition of the fact that the Christ of history is one thing and the conception of His Person that sprang up on the soil of the Church's faith another. As early as the Fourth Gospel the two images had been blended into one. Still further, criticism has contributed to the return to Christ by the mere fact that it has brought the problem of His historical reality and significance into the centre of attention and interest. Up to the appearance of the Leben Jesu the problems that occupied the theological field were almost purely speculative: when Christ was considered, it was as the vehicle or symbol of certain speculative ideas. The retirement of the speculative behind the historical is one of the signs of the times.

(b) A second and even more important factor in the movement 'back to Christ' is the widespread dissatisfaction with the traditional statements of Christianity. Since the rationalistic movement of the 18th cent. the history of dogma has been in the main a history of disintegration. Those who seek to go behind the creeds, back to the source of our religion, proceed on the ground that the creeds do not represent, with any sufficient correctness or adequacy, either the conceptions that Jesus taught or the significance that His Person has for faith. All we can do here is to indicate the main lines which the criticism of dogma has followed.

When we examine the formulas of Nicea and Chalcedon, in which the Being of God and the Person of Christ are determined, we find one basal conception underlying them all. It is the conception of Substance. God is conceived primarily as the Absolute Substance; that is to say, as the indeterminate, unchanging and permanent ground of the knowable world of variety, change, and transience. Christ is true God because He shares in the Divine Substance; and because He has taken up human nature or substance into union with His Divine substance, He is also true man. The inner relations of the Godhead—Fatherhood, Sonship, the Procession of the Holy Spirit—are all expressed in terms of this category. It is true that the Church had other things to say about God and Christ than those of its formulas; still the formulas were regarded as conveying the deepest and most vital truths, and their acceptance was made the criterion of orthodoxy and the condition of salvation. If the ethical was recognized, it occupied only a subordinate position in comparison with the metaphysical. Now, what is this idea of Substance which plays so great a rôle in the creeds? It was not derived from Christ or the New Testament. It was borrowed from Hellenistic philosophy; and what it originally answered was not any religious need, but the purely intellectual demand that all the manifoldness of this time-world shall be reducible to the unity of a single principle. Even from a philosophical point of view the idea of Substance is open to fatal objections as a principle by which to explain personal or, indeed, any relations. To modern thought Substance is not a concrete reality; it is nothing more than the most abstract of all ideas. To hypostatize abstractions, equip them with causal power, and employ them as principles of explanation, was a peculiarity of Greek thought, and one that it is hopeless to revive. The use which the creeds make of this idea is even more objectionable when considered from the standpoint of religion. Absolute Substance has nothing in common with the holy, personal Will of the prophets, or with the gracious Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. One cannot, on such a foundation, build up a Christian conception of God. And to say that Christ is Divine in virtue of His participation in the Divine Substance, is not to present Him in any character that makes Him the object of our trust. What gives Christ His significance for faith is the fact that in His Person and ministry faith recognizes the revelation of God's gracious will towards sinful men. To substitute a divinity of Substance for a divinity of Revelation is to remove Christ from the realm of faith into that of speculation; and, further, since the category of substance is at bottom a physical category, it is to rank the physical above the personal and ethical.

In formulating these metaphysical doctrines, the Church no doubt believed that it was safeguarding vital religious interests. What seemed at stake was nothing less than the reality of the salvation mediated by Christ. But, it is contended, the conception of salvation that the Nicene and Chalcedon formulas were designed to safeguard is not an ethical, but a metaphysical, or, more correctly, physical, conception. The evil from which deliverance is sought is not primarily sin; it is the mortality that belongs to our fallen nature; and the good salvation brings is not ethical communion with God, but participation in eternal life, which is thought of as a natural quality of the Divine substance. Human substance is deified, invested with the quality of immortality, by being taken up into and penetrated by Divine substance. It is this metaphysical conception of salvation that requires a metaphysical Christ. Christ must be God and man in the substantial sense, since it was in His Person that the penetration (ενοχλοῦμαι) of human substance by Divine took place. It is obvious that such a conception of Christ's Person can have little or no significance for those who regard religious relationships as being at their deepest and highest personal and ethical. An ethical conception of Redemption, as a change in our relation to God effected within our consciousness, requires us to seek the significance of Christ not in the metaphysical background of His nature, but in the ethical and religious traits of His character, which disclose to us the heart of God, and have the power to awaken within us the response of love and faith.

In the theology of the Greek Church the work of Christ was summed up in His Incarnation. In that act salvation was already achieved. A more practical and ethical conception entered the Church with the great figure of Augustine. The metaphysical entithesis of mortal, creaturely life and eternal, Divine life retired before the ethical antithesis of sin and grace. There was a transference of emphasis from the metaphysical Incarnation to the ethical Atonement. The change marked an important advance. Yet in the doctrine of the Atonement as formulated by Anselm, and even as subsequently modified, the ethical does not appear in its purity, but only under the form of the juristic. The work of Christ is interpreted by means of categories borrowed from the legal discipline of the Roman Church. But ethical relationships and ethical ends cannot be adequately expressed in terms of criminal law. The juristic no less than the metaphysical conceptions of the old theology have lost their hold on the modern mind. We interpret religious relations now in terms of ethics and psychology.

(c) The third cause that has operated in bringing the historical Person and work of Christ into the foreground, has been the new sense—reflected in the writings of men like Goethe, Emerson, and Carlyle—of the importance of great personalities as factors of historical change and progress. Neither Catholicism nor traditional Protestantism can be said to have shown much appreciation of the religious and ethical forces that radiate from Jesus as a historical personality. The saving activity of God in Christ has been conceived either in a mystical, semi-mechanical way, as affecting us through an operation in the substance or background of our being; or, again, rationalistically, as mediated through ideas or doctrines. The Rationalism of the 18th century and the speculative philosophy of the 19th, while rejecting the former of these views, only accentuated the latter. History was resolved into dialectic of ideas: not personalities but ideas were regarded as the creative forces. In the speculative theology of the Hegelian period, the religious importance of Jesus was found almost solely in the fact that He was the introducer or the symbol of the supreme religious idea. This idea—the essential oneness of God and man, man as the eternal Son of God—is the active and creative thing. There is still a large and important school, represented by writers like Green, Edward Caird, Pfeiderer, A. Dorner, which continues the Hegelian tradition. But the past half century has witnessed a reaction from this exaggerated intellectualism. It is being more and more widely recognized that the elevation and enrichment of man's spiritual life have been effected far less by the movements and instincts of the mass, or by the introduction and development of ideas, than by the appearance on the stage of history of great creative personalities. Such personalities are fountains of life for many succeeding generations. In no province is their importance so marked as in that of religion. And Christ is the supreme personality. It was the impression produced by His Person, even more than the new ideas He taught, that created the Christian Church. 'The life was the light of men.' And in whatever way we account for it, it is certain that Christian ideas cannot be separated from Christ without being stripped of much of their power to maintain themselves in men's minds and hearts. The recognition of such facts has had no small share in bringing the Person of Christ into the centre of religious thought.

2. Theological reconstruction.—We pass from the causes that have brought about a return to the historical Christ, to consider some of the attempts at theological reconstruction or revision to which the movement has led. What is its dogmatic significance? The movement is not a uniform one; it has taken various directions; and while most of the thought of the day confesses its influence, this influence is much more marked in some cases than in others. We need not take into account a writer like Gore, who, though insisting on the importance of a knowledge of the historical Christ, yet derives his theology not from Christ, but from the Ecumenical Councils; or like Loisy, who, indeed, distinguishes between the Christ of history and the Christ of faith, but yet allows the former little significance except as the starting-point of the movement known as Christianity. Our attention must be limited to the theologies in which the new feeling for the historical Christ has exerted some marked influence.

(1) We begin with that form of the movement which departs least from traditional orthodoxy, and to which the term 'Christo-centric' is usually applied. In this case the return to Christ has not led to anything like a reconstruction of doctrine; the most that has been undertaken is a revision. The traditional doctrines receive a reinterpretation and a fresh grounding in the light of the fuller knowledge of, and keener feeling for, the Christ of history. In the words of the most distinguished representative of the Christo-centric movement in this country, 'We cannot conceive and describe the supreme historical Person without coming face to face with the profoundest of all the problems in theology; but then we may come to them from an entirely changed point of view, through the Person that has to be interpreted rather than through the interpretations of His Person. When this change has been effected, theology ceases to be scholastic and becomes historical.'<sup>2</sup>

This claim to break with the scholastic method is partially, but only partially, justified. The doctrines of the Church are no longer treated as sacrosanct, and as the first principles of theological construction. Still further, it is recognized that even Scripture cannot be received as the ultimate source and norm of doctrine. The Apostolic conception of Christianity is not formally authoritative. We must not look at Christ merely through St. Paul's eyes; it is possible for us to see the Christ whom St. Paul saw, and to estimate St. Paul's thoughts from the vantage ground of this immediate knowledge. The idea of an external authority is not, however, surrendered; it is only carried back to the last possible resort, the consciousness of Christ. Whatever can be derived from the consciousness of Christ has an authoritative claim on our acceptance. And since His history is of a piece with His consciousness, the two must be taken together. The theological task is therefore to interpret God through the history and the consciousness of the historical Christ.

But here the question postponed at the beginning presses for an answer. The term 'historical Christ' is not unambiguous. What are the contents of His consciousness, what are the facts in His history, which give to Him His meaning for faith, and which must be regarded as constituting His historical personality? We know Jesus from the Synoptic Gospels as the teacher of an ethical ideal supreme in its depth and height, and of a religion of pure inwardness and spirituality. We obtain glimpses into an inner life of intimate and unbroken fellowship with God. He was conscious of a unique vocation, to bring men to the knowledge and service of the Father in heaven, and to introduce the Reign of God on earth. In His consciousness of this vocation and of His equipment for it, He accepted the title of Messiah. He carried out His vocation with an obedience to God that never wavered, with a trust in God that no storm could shake, with a love that shrank from no sacrifice, and that never grew cold. He accepted the cross in the confidence that God's purpose would not be overthrown by His death, but established. This at least criticism leaves untouched; and for some this human Jesus is the Jesus of history, and, at the same time, the Divine Christ, the Saviour of the world. The constitutive facts in His Person and history are the religious and ethical facts. But such is not the view of those whose position we are now describing. Accepting these facts, they do not regard them as supplying an adequate conception of the Christ of history, or as disclosing the deepest meaning of His life. For Christo-centric as for traditional theology, the elements of cardinal importance in Christ's consciousness and history are the miraculous elements. The facts that give to His inner life its character are His moral perfection and consciousness of sinlessness, His assertion of a unique knowledge of God, and of a Sonship different in kind from that possible to His disciples, His assertion of His Messiahship and pre-existence, His demand for absolute devotion to His Person, His claim to a superhuman authority in forgiving sins and in dealing with OT institutions and laws, His claim to be the Saviour of the world, the arbiter of human destiny, the final Judge. Similarly His outer life receives its character from the Virgin-birth, the Miracles (interpreted in the strict sense), and, above all, from the bodily Resurrection. The historical Christ is the transcendent and miraculous Christ, the Christ who was conscious of a superhuman dignity, and who was declared by the resurrection from the dead to be the Son of God with power (Ro 1<sup>4</sup>).

This conception of Christ, with its subordination of the moral and religious in His consciousness and history to the miraculous, carries with it two momentous consequences. In the first place, it involves the view, is indeed founded upon it, that the Revelation of God is to be found not primarily in Christ's Person and ministry, but in the doctrines in which these are interpreted. Christ is brought before us as primarily a problem that demands solution. What constitute Him a problem are the above-mentioned facts in His consciousness and history, which cannot be accounted for except on the hypothesis that He was a superhuman, supernatural Being—a Being that stood in a relation to God beyond any that can be described in ethical terms. These facts are singled out as the essential ones, just because they set the problem and provide the basis for the transcendental hypothesis. The solution of the problem is given in the NT doctrines of Christ's Person and work. The Person and work constitute the facts; the doctrines supply their explanation or interpretation. Apart from the doctrinal interpretation the facts might still retain a certain ethico-religious significance, but they would lose their highest, their essential, meaning. It is the interpretation or construction that is the essential thing in Christianity. The gospel is not given with the character, teaching, and ministry of Christ, in their direct appeal to the heart and conscience; only the doctrinal interpretation of these facts—that the pre-existent Son of God assumed human nature, lived among men, and atoned by His death for their sin—has a right to the name. Christianity is given only when Christ is speculatively construed.<sup>3</sup>

Though the need for such a construction can be demonstrated, the construction itself is not to be regarded as a work of human freedom. We receive it as authoritatively given. To traditional theology the authority is inspired Scripture, the witness of the Apostolic writers no less than Christ's self-witness. It is characteristic of the Christo-centric school that, with a freer view of inspiration, it admits only the self-witness as the ultimate authority. Only Christ Himself could know and reveal the secret of His unique personality. The doctrine of the Apostolic writers is not to be regarded as the product of a religious experience created by Christ, but as the reproduction or development of ideas received from Christ's lips. These writers are only the channel by which the interpretation has reached us, not its source.

A doctrinal conception of Revelation requires as its correlate a conception of Faith as primarily an intellectual act. Faith must be defined as the assent of the mind to a proposition on the ground of authority. This assent, however, though the primary element in faith, is not treated as the whole of it; it becomes effective only when reinforced by the practical elements of feeling and will.

More fruitful, perhaps, than its attempt at a fresh grounding of doctrine has been the contribution of the Christo-centric school to the revision of doctrine. It has sought to free the formulas that describe the Triune Being of God and the Person and work of Christ from their over-refinement, to translate them into the categories of modern thought, and to make them more ethical and less metaphysical.

(2) We pass to a second, and much more radical phase of the movement. To many, 'back to Christ' means back from historical Christianity, the religion founded upon Christ, to the religion which Christ taught, and which we see embodied in His life. More than a century ago the position was summed up by Lessing in his famous saying, 'The Christian religion has been tried for eighteen centuries; the religion of Christ remains to be tried.'

That the stream of religion flows purer at its fountainhead than at its lower reaches is a fact which the study of every historical religion confirms. As a religion advances through history, it loses something of its idealism and becomes more secular, takes up foreign elements, accumulates dogmas and ceremonies, parts with its simplicity and spontaneity, and becomes more and more a human construction. And every religious reform has signified a throwing off of foreign accretions, and a return to the simplicity and purity of the source. Did not Christ Himself represent a reaction from the elaborate legal and ceremonial system of Judaism to the simpler and more ethical faith of the prophets? The Reformation was a return to primitive Christianity, but less to Christ than to St. Paul. But we must, it is maintained, go behind even St. Paul and the early disciples. It is true, indeed, that, in the NT, Christianity is not the complex thing it afterwards became; still, the process of intellectual and ceremonial elaboration has begun. If we have not the fully-developed system of dogma and sacrament, we have at least the germs out of which it arose; and while much must be regarded as the legitimate development of principles implicit in Christ's gospel, there is also the introduction of a foreign element.

Let us contrast at one or two points the gospel as proclaimed by Jesus with the Church's rendering of it. Jesus' gospel contains no Christology. It is the glad tidings of a Father in heaven, whose love and care embrace all His creatures, in whose eyes every human soul is precious, and who is at once the righteous Judge and the pitiful, forgiving Saviour. Jesus was conscious of His unique position as the Mediator of salvation, but He never (according to the Synoptic tradition) required faith in Himself in the same sense as He required faith in God. God was the one object of faith; and if Jesus called men to Himself, it was only that He might lead them to God, and teach them to love, trust, and obey God. Turning to the gospel of the Church, we find a doctrine of Christ's Person at the heart of it. To believe the gospel is no longer, in the first place at least, to receive God's message of love and forgiveness, and to obey His summons to repentance, trust, and service; it is to believe that Jesus is Messiah, a pre-existent, Heavenly Being, the second Person in the Trinity.

A doctrine of Jesus' Person is substituted for the Heavenly Father as the immediate object of faith.

Again, Jesus' gospel contains nothing like a developed doctrine of Redemption. The question as to the rationale of forgiveness is never raised, and there is no hint of the inability of God to forgive without a propitiation. Forgiveness is presented as flowing directly from God's fatherly love (Lk 15). And as little do we find the other propositions included in the Church's doctrine of Redemption. Jesus, indeed, teaches that none is good (Mt 19<sup>7</sup>), that even at the best we are unprofitable servants, who have done no more than our duty (Lk 17<sup>10</sup>); but He knows nothing of inherited guilt, radical corruption of human nature, human inability to do any good work. In the gospel of Jesus we are in the region of direct moral intuition; nothing is there merely because apologetic or system required it. We are also in the region of moral sanity. There is nothing of asceticism, and no attempt to cultivate a feeling of sinfulness. Men are bidden strive to be perfect as their Father in heaven is perfect (Mt 5<sup>48</sup>). Comparing the gospel of the Church with that of Christ, we find complication instead of simplicity, theological construction instead of intuition, and sometimes morbidness and exaggeration in place of sanity. Finally, while the teaching of Jesus places the centre of gravity in the will, the Church transfers it to the intellect. 'This do and thou shalt live' (Lk 10<sup>28</sup>) is the command of Jesus: what the Church requires is belief rather than conduct.

The gospel of Jesus represents the crown of religion; it is the highest and, in its innermost nature, the final stage of religious development. No other historical religion can endure a moment's comparison with it. And the religions manufactured out of a few philosophical principles have still less claim to serious consideration, since they are wholly lacking in everything that gives a religion vitality. It can be said with literal truth that, for any civilized community, the choice is not between Christianity and some other religion, but between Christianity and no religion at all.

While the religion of Jesus is regarded as the one faith capable of meeting the need of this and of every age, it is not meant that it can be reproduced in every detail. We must distinguish between central and peripheral elements, and between the enduring spirit and the passing form of manifestation. We cannot, for example, revive the primitive expectation of the world's speedy end, or the ideas about angels, Satan, unclean spirits as the agents in disease, which Jesus shared with His contemporaries. The gospel must be translated into the language of to-day, and its spirit applied to the relations of our modern life.

How is Jesus Himself regarded by those who represent this type of thought? All speculative Christology, whether Biblical or ecclesiastical, is rejected, and it is asserted that such Christology has no basis in the language which Jesus used about Himself. Further, it is held that not Jesus, but the God whom Jesus revealed, is the immediate object of our faith. At the same time, the unique significance of Jesus, not only in the history of religion but also for the individual, is earnestly recognized. We quote the confession of Bousset: 'Thou art our leader, to whom there is none like, the leader in the highest things, the leader of our soul to God, the Way, the Truth, and the Life.'* The figure of Jesus is the grandest and most perfect that God has bestowed on humanity throughout the long course of its upward journey. Bousset can even adopt the confession of St. Paul, 'God was in Christ' (2 Co 5<sup>19</sup>). Harnack goes a step further. 'Jesus,' he says, 'is the way to the Father, and He is also the judge ordained by the Father. Not as a constituent does He belong to the Gospel, but He has been its personal realization and power, and will always be felt as such.'* But in thus insisting on the dependence of the gospel on the Person behind it for its power in awakening faith, Harnack is to be regarded as representing the type of thought to be described in the next section rather than that described here.

(3) The last type of theological thought which has to be considered, as bearing upon it the impress of the modern feeling for the historical Christ, is the most important of all. It is that represented by the great name of Ritschl. For Ritschlianism, even more than for traditional orthodoxy, Christ is the sum and substance of Christianity. In Him the living God reveals Himself to men; He is the fact in history in which God meets us, to awaken our faith and lead us into the blessedness of His fellowship. What is it in Christ that gives Him His so momentous significance? The answer which Ritschlianism gives to this question involves a new interpretation of the great Christian ideas,—Revelation, Gospel, Doctrine, Faith,—only it is claimed that this interpretation is nothing more than a carrying out of the fundamental principles of the Reformation.

In Catholic, and not less in traditional Protestant, theology the significance of Christ is concentrated in the doctrines in which His Person and work have received their interpretation. Christianity is summed up in the great speculative ideas of the eternal Sonship, the Incarnation, and the atoning Death. These ideas are regarded as constituting the content of Revelation and the object of faith; into them the meaning and power of Jesus' life are gathered, and to believe them is to believe the gospel. Doctrine, Gospel, Revelation are treated as one and the same thing. For Ritschlianism, on the other hand, it is not the doctrinal interpretation that is the vital thing, but the Person and work interpreted. Doctrine has its own importance, but it must not be identified with Revelation or with the Gospel; and consequently it is not the object of faith. The importance of doctrine lies in this, that it brings to expression what faith has found in Christ. The appropriation of the Revelation of God in Christ results in a new knowledge of God and of human life, and it is the task of dogmatics to exhibit this knowledge in its purity, free from any admixture of philosophical speculation, and in its connexion with the inner life. Doctrine is the explicitly formulated knowledge of faith. But the doctrines in which another's faith has expressed itself cannot be received by us as the ground of our faith. It is not by appropriating St. Paul's thoughts about Christ—that He was a propitiatory offering, a pre-existent heavenly Being, etc.—that we become Christians, but only by trusting Christ as St. Paul trusted Him. When there is this direct contact with Christ, St. Paul's thoughts will be reproduced as the fruit of our own experience, and only then will they have real meaning for us. To substitute for Christ as the object of faith a doctrine of His Person and work is to remove faith from its genetic ground. For the creative thing in Christianity is not the doctrines which, with more or less truth and fulness, describe Christ's significance; it is the personal life in its inexhaustible wealth of meaning and power, and as it manifests itself to us in word and deed. Doctrine is a product of faith, not its causal ground. Moreover, the substitution of doctrine for Christ has this further result, that it carries with it a false view of faith. Faith is then necessarily conceived in the Catholic manner as the submission of the mind to a proposition on the ground of its authority. But if the Reformation has taught us anything, it is that faith is not assent to a doctrine, but trust in the living God. Faith is no product of our own activity; it is God-created—the result of the contact of the soul with Divine reality. In the Person of Christ, God so reveals Himself to us as to command our reverence, trust, and devotion.

Not a doctrine, therefore, but a life is for Ritschlian theology the medium of Revelation and the object of faith. But the further question arises, What are the facts in the life that clothe it with Divine meaning and power? In traditional theology the main emphasis falls upon the element of the miraculous. This follows necessarily from the position assigned to doctrine. Doctrine is the object of faith, and it is the miraculous facts—Virgin-birth, Miracles, Sinlessness, unique Knowledge of God, bodily Resurrection—that supply the basis for the dogmatic structure. But in the Ritschlian system no importance is attached to the miraculous as such. The attempt to demonstrate the Divine significance of Jesus in a theoretical (or causal) way is abandoned, as at once impossible and mistaken. It is not possible, it is maintained, by means of the facts to which traditional theology appeals, to prove scientifically that Jesus cannot be explained by the causes operative in history, and that the hypothesis of a transcendental origin and nature must be brought into the field. Only for faith is a miracle a proof of God's working; for science it is either an unexplained fact or a deceptive appearance. Moreover, it is not through breaches in the continuity of nature or of history that God makes His presence and activity certain to us. The religious view of nature or history is no product of causal explanation. To faith alone does God reveal Himself, and the judgment that God is in Christ is a judgment of faith. To consider Jesus in the light of a problem that has to be explained is to abandon the religious attitude for the scientific.

The vital facts in Christ's life are, for Ritschlianism, those that exhibit the living Person, and His activity in His vocation. The Christ who knew God as Father, who never turned aside from doing the Father's will, who never in the darkest vicissitudes of His life lost His confidence in the Father's wisdom, power, and love, and who by His faith overcame the world and conquered death; the Christ who, understanding and feeling the evil of sin as none else, in holy love and pity sought out the sinful, making them His companions and opening for them the door into the Kingdom of God, and who for their sakes surrendered His life as an offering, enduring the cross and despising the shame—this is at once the Christ of history and the Christ of faith. His unique consciousness of God and His sinlessness—or, as it is better described, His moral perfection—do not owe their religious importance to their serviceableness as proofs of a transcendental 'nature'; their importance lies in their inherent worth and power as elements in His personality. That there is something inscrutable in Jesus' consciousness of God is strongly maintained; only it is not our inability to account for Him that gives Him His religious significance. Similarly the miracles are not to be viewed as proofs, but as exhibiting His gracious activity in His vocation. What of the Resurrection? Within the Ritschlian school there are some who include this as part of the historically given ground of faith. The view of the majority, however, and the one that seems most consistent with the general position, is that belief in Jesus' eternal existence is rather the final outcome of faith than its preliminary condition. Apart from the difficulties which the Resurrection narratives present, our belief that Jesus lives is not one that rests on human testimony. It depends on the impression produced on us by His Person,—He could not be holden of death (Ac 2<sup>24</sup>),—and on our acceptance of His revelation of the Father-God.

The question has been raised whether it is the historical or the exalted Christ that is the object of faith. These alternatives are not, however, so opposed as they seem. Most would admit that our conception of the exalted Christ, if it is not to pass into the region of pure phantasy, must derive its content from the historical life; and also, that the historical Christ must be thought of, not merely as a figure of the past, but as alive for evermore. The exalted Christ is the Christ of history, with the superadded thought that He is not dead but risen, and at the right hand of God.

The gospel, the glad message of God's Fatherly love and forgiveness, is, according to Ritschlian thought, already given in the simple proclamation of Jesus. To complicate this simple proclamation with doctrine is to pervert it. But this is not to say that Christ has no place in His gospel. In the first place, it is from Christ's Personality, and from His activity in His vocation, that the gospel derives its meaning. Apart from His ministry of love, our conception of the Fatherly love of God can have but little living content. That his ministry in its inexhaustible richness stands as the enduring exhibition of what Divine love means. The dogmatic conception of the Father surrendering His eternal Son to death is much poorer as an exhibition of love than the historical reality. So also one can rise to the height of the gospel conception of God's righteousness and mercy only as one keeps in view the mind and character of Christ, and His treatment of sinners. The reconciliation of these two attributes is not a matter of jurisprudence, as the Atonement doctrine makes it; it is the secret of a personal life. We see them reconciled in the mind and ministry of Jesus, who, undefiled and separate from sinners, yet received them into His fellowship.

But this is not all. In analyzing Christ's significance, Ritschlian theology attaches even greater importance to the idea of Power. Christ is that fact through which God enters as a force into history, to awaken and sustain faith. It is not natural for us to believe the gospel of God's forgiveness and Fatherly love and care. Rather does faith arise as a victory over nature. When we contemplate the iron system of mechanical forces and laws that beset us behind and before, and beyond which no theoretical knowledge can conduct us, it is a hard matter to persuade ourselves that these forces and laws are but the angels and ministers of a gracious personal will. It is supremely through Christ that we reach this assurance. He is the Divine fact that so masters us as to convince us that not mechanism, but the Good is the ultimate reality. The spiritual might of God becomes real to us as we contemplate the power of the Good in Jesus' life. Forgiveness becomes real and guilt becomes real when we feel behind them the throbbing of Jesus' holy love. The great redemptive forces—faith, love, self-sacrifice, moral fidelity—have their supreme seat and centre in the Person and life and cross of the man Christ Jesus. We may sum up the position by saying that in Him the will of God for man's salvation becomes effective.

Such are the three theological types in which the influence of the movement 'back to Christ' is most apparent. It would be premature to forecast the ultimate issue of the movement. But one thing is certain. So momentous an event as the recovery of the historical figure of Christ cannot leave theology exactly as it found it.

BAG (Jn 12<sup>6</sup> 13<sup>28</sup> γαροσάκκομος; in Lk 12<sup>38</sup> σαδάρια is tr. 'bags' in AV, but RV 'purses'; see PURSE).

Γαροσάκκομος (in NT peculiar to St. John) meant originally a case for keeping the mouth-pieces of wind instruments (γάρσον, saxum); so Phrynios, who gives γαροσάκκομος as the proper form, rejecting that of NT, which, however, is found in an old Doric inscription, in later Comic writers and in LXX (see Liddell and Scott). The RVm. 'box' seems the better rendering. Field (GN) has a very full note, in which he concludes that γά., both in its general and in its special sense, means not a bag, but a box or chest, always of wood or other hard material. Thus Hesychius defines it as a wooden receptacle of remnants (ἄσπις ἰσθμίου τῶν ἀπολείπων); Arrian mentions γαροσάκκομος made of tortoise-shell; in the Antiochian γά. is apparently a coffin ("when I look at Nicanor the coffin-maker [ἐσθροφίτης], and consider for what purpose he makes these wooden boxes [γαροσάκκομα]"); and in an inscription quoted by Hatch (Essays in Biblical Greek) γά. means the strong box or monument chest of an association. The LXX translates ἰσθμίου in 2 Ch 24<sup>6</sup> by γά. (the chest for the offerings, but ἀσπίς in 2 K 12<sup>9</sup> as usually), which God. A also gives in 2 S 61 (the Ark). Aquila uses γά. for ἰσθμίου in all its significations, e.g. coffin (Gn 50<sup>26</sup>), the Ark (Ex 37<sup>2</sup>, 1 S 5<sup>1</sup>, 2 S 61). Ancient Versions of Jn. agree with this view; Vulg. gives loculus, the plural, says Field, "indicating several paritions," a small portable cash-box; D lat. loculum; Nonnus ἐσθροφίτης γάκκο, ἰσθμίου ἀσπίδαμ. In favour of EV it may be urged that something small and easily carried is required by the context, whereas the above instances are chiefly larger boxes (but note use of γά. by Hesychius and Arrian above). Again, in 1 S 6<sup>5</sup> 17<sup>18</sup> (EV 'coffer') is tr. γαροσάκκομος by Josephus, and is from a root γά. to tremble, wag, move to and fro, whence in Arabic there is a similar word meaning a bag filled with stones hung at the sides of camels to preserve equilibrium (see Gesenius, Lex.). In modern Greek also γά. means purse or bag (Hatch).

The γά. was the receptacle for the money of Jesus and the disciples; it contained, no doubt, the proceeds of the sale of their goods, and gave the idea later of the common fund (Ac 4<sup>32</sup>); it was replenished by the gifts of friends (Lk 8<sup>3</sup>); and from it the poor were helped (Jn 13<sup>29</sup>). Judas may have been entrusted with it as being the best fitted for such work; but what might have proved a blessing, as giving useful employment for his talents, became the means of his ruin. Other suggested explanations are: that Christ thought fit to call forth a manifestation of his sin as the only means of cure (Hengstenberg); or that it was simply a private arrangement between the disciples (Godeſt). The 'bag' could not have been taken from him, as Edersheim (Life and Times, ii. 472) remarks, without exposing him to the others, and precipitating his moral destruction. See JUDAS ISCARIOT. W. H. DUNDAS.

BAND.—A Roman legion, the full strength of which was about 6000 men, was divided into ten cohorts (600), and each cohort into three maniples (200). Greek writers use the word στέρια, rendered 'band' in our versions, sometimes for maniple but usually for cohort; hence RVm has regularly 'cohort.' The troops in Judæa, however, as in other provinces governed by a procurator, consisted simply of auxiliaries, not Roman citizens, but provincials; these were not formed into legions, but merely into cohorts, of strength varying from 500 to 1000, sometimes consisting purely of infantry, sometimes including cavalry also. The forces in Palestine seem to have been originally Herod's troops, taken over by the Romans; they were recruited in the Greek cities in or around the country, such as Caesarea, Ascalon, Sebaste. One such cohort formed the garrison of Jerusalem, stationed in the fortress of Antonia, adjoining the Temple, under a chiliarch or tribune ('the chief captain of the band,' Ac 21<sup>31</sup>). From the account of the force at the disposal of Lysias (Ac 23<sup>28</sup>), his cohort must have been a cohors miliaria equestris, consisting of 700 infantry and 240 cavalry; but this may not have been the case in our Lord's time, some 30 years earlier. This Roman force was probably granted by Pilate to effect our Lord's arrest (Jn 18<sup>3-12</sup>, where 'the band' under its 'chief captain' [RV] seems distinguished from 'the officers of the Jews,' i.e. the Temple police; see Westcott, ad loc.). Of course, only a portion of the whole cohort would be needed. In Mt 27<sup>7</sup> || Mk 15<sup>6</sup>, the soldiers gather together 'the whole band' to mock our Lord; obviously all who were at hand and not on duty.

BANK.—1. In the parable of the Pounds, Christ upbraids the slothful servant because he had not given his pound to the bank (ἐν τῷ τραπεζῆναι), i.e. the office of the money-changers (Lk 19<sup>26</sup>), who would have kept it safe, and also paid interest for it. 'Bankers' (τραπεζῆται) is used in RV of Mt 25<sup>7</sup> for 'money-changers' of the AV. In Greek cities the bankers sat at their tables (τραπεζαί) in the market-place. They changed coins, but also took money on deposit, giving what would now seem very high interest (see articles 'Money-Changers' and 'Usury' in vols. III. and IV. of Hastings' DB).

In this parable some suppose that Christ meant by 'the bank' to indicate the Synagogue, or the Christian Church as an organized body, which might use the gifts or powers of a disciple, when he could not, through timidity or lack of energy, exercise them himself. Others have supposed that He pointed to prayer as a substitute for good works, when the disciple was unable to do such. But all this is very precarious. (Cf. Bruce, Parabolic Teaching of Christ, p. 209 f.).

There is an apocryphal saying of Christ which may be connected with this parable. Origen (de Genesim, xix. etc.) gives it thus: ἡμεῖς ἐπειρήσαμεν διαμαρτυρίας, 'Be ye tried money-changers.' This is explained in the Clementine Homilies (iii. 61) to mean that Christians should prove the words of Christ, as the bankers test and approve the gold and silver on their tables. But it may perhaps be looked at rather as connected with the stewardship of gifts and talents by the Lord's disciples, finding its parallel in such sayings as Lk 16<sup>12</sup>: 'If ye have not been faithful in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own?' The duty of a timid servant, may be to use his gifts under the guidance and authority of others, but growing experience might advance him to be a πραξιάρχης himself, who is able to trade boldly with that which has been entrusted to him.

2. In Lk 19<sup>8</sup> 'bank,' AV 'trench' (Gr. χάραξ), probably stands for a palisade (see RVm) of stakes, strengthened with branches and earth, with a ditch behind, used by besiegers as a protection against arrows or attacking parties (Lat. vallum). Such a palisade was actually employed by the soldiers of Titus in the siege of Jerusalem, A.D. 70 (Jos. BJ v. vi. 2). DAVID M. W. LAIRD.

BANQUET.—The people of Palestine in Christ's day—as, indeed, throughout the East generally—were fond of social feasting. The word δοχή, rendered 'feast,' from δέχομαι, 'to receive' (cf. Eng. 'reception'), is used with ποιέω, 'to make' (cf. Heb. עָשָׂה עִשְׂתָּ Job 1<sup>4</sup>). This is the social feast or banquet, as distinguished from the religious feast (ἑσπέρη). Levi made a great feast in his house (Lk 5<sup>29</sup>); and Christ advised His followers, when they gave a banquet, to invite the poor and afflicted rather than the rich and influential (14<sup>13</sup>). Such banquets were usually given in the house of the host to invited guests (Lk 14<sup>15</sup>, Jn 2<sup>2</sup>), but there was more freedom accorded the uninvited than is common in Western social life (Lk 7<sup>36-38</sup>). Guests reclined on couches, leaning upon the left arm, and eating with the aid of the right hand, as in ordinary meals. Eating, and especially drinking of wine (cf. Heb. שָׂתָה 'drink,' and יַיִן 'wine,' used for 'banquet,' and Gr. συμφοῖον, 'drinking together'), music, dancing, joyous conversation, merriment, usually characterized such a festivity. Such a banquet was a part of wedding occasions. Jesus accepted an invitation to one of these at Cana in Galilee (Jn 2<sup>2</sup>). Levi gave a banquet in His honour (Lk 5<sup>29</sup>). There were often large numbers present (5<sup>29</sup>), and gradations in the places (Mt 23<sup>6</sup>, Lk 14<sup>9</sup>, Mk 12<sup>36</sup>). One of the guests was usually appointed 'ruler of the feast,' or ἀρχιτεράωνος (Jn 2<sup>8-9</sup>), who superintended the drinking, etc. (cf. Lk 2<sup>20</sup>).

BAPTISM (βάπτισμα = 'the rite of Baptism,' always in NT distinguished from βαπτίζω, 'a washing,' Mk 7<sup>4</sup>, He 6<sup>2</sup> 9<sup>10</sup> but see Lightfoot, Com. on Colossians, p. 184); but this distinction is not maintained in Josephus [cf. Ant. XVIII. v. 2]; and in the Latin versions and Fathers baptisma and baptismus and even baptismum are used indiscriminately; see Plummer's art. 'Baptism' in Hastings' DB.—A rite wherein by immersion in water the participant symbolizes and signalizes his transition from an impure to a pure life, his death to a past he abandons, and his new birth to a future he desires.

The points for consideration are (1) the Origin of Baptism, (2) its Mode, (3) John's Baptism of the people, (4) John's Baptism of Jesus, (5) Baptism by the disciples of Jesus.

1. The Origin of Baptism.—Baptism, as we find it in the Gospels, may be traced to a threefold source, natural symbolism, the illustrations of the Mosaic Law, and the baptism of proselytes. In many of the appointments of non-Christian religions the cleansing of the soul from sin is symbolized by the washing of the body (see the Vendidad Fargard, ix.; Williams, Religious Thought in India, 347; Vergil, Aeneid, II. 720; Ovid, Fasts, v. 680; and esp. MacCulloch, Compar. Theol.). As in other religions, so in Israel washings were the means appointed for restoring the person who had incurred ceremonial defilement to his place among the worshipping congregation. The Mosaic Law prescribed certain regulations for the removal of uncleanness by washing with water; Lv 15<sup>8, 13, 16</sup> (λοβρέται ὕδατι πάν τὸ σῶμα αὐτοῦ) 16<sup>30, 38</sup>, etc. But if the Jew himself needed almost daily washing ('Judeus quotidie lavat, quia quotidie inquinatur,' Tertull. de Baptismo, xv.), much more was the bath of purification necessary for the Gentile who desired to pass into Judaism. For the proselyte this baptism (מִטְוָה) seemed the appropriate initiation. 'Whosoever any heathen will betake himself and be joined to the covenant of Israel, and place himself under the wings of the Divine Majesty, and take the yoke of the Law upon him, voluntary circumcision, baptism, and oblation are required.' (See this and other passages in Lightfoot, Horæ Heb. on Mt 3<sup>6</sup>; Schürer, HJP § 31; and Edersheim's Life and Times of Jesus, Appendix xii. on 'Baptism of Proselytes.' The question whether the baptism of proselytes was in vogue as early as the time of the Baptist has been laid to rest by Edersheim and Schürer). It may almost be said, then, that when John baptized the people, he meant to impress them with the idea that they must be re-born before they could enter the kingdom. He, as it were, excommunicated them, and by requiring them to submit to Baptism, declared that their natural birth as Jews was insufficient for participation in the Messianic blessings. No doubt also he believed himself to be fulfilling the predictions of Zec 13, Ezk 36<sup>2</sup>, as well as the craving expressed in Ps 51!

2. The Mode of Baptism.—That the normal mode was by immersion of the whole body may be inferred (a) from the meaning of βαπτίζω, which is the intensive or frequentative form of βάπτω, 'I dip,' and denotes to immerse or submerge. In Polybius, iii. 72, it is used of soldiers wading through a flooded river, 'immersed' to their breasts (ἐκ τῶν μασθῶν αὐτῶν βαπτίζοντο). It is used also of sinking ships (in i. 51, the Carthaginians sank many of the Roman ships, πολλὰ τῶν ἐκαφῶν ἐβάπτισαν). [Many examples are given in Stephanus, and esp. in Classic Baptism: An enquiry into the meaning of the word βαπτίζω, by James W. Dale, 4th ed. Philadelphia, 1872]. The point is that 'dip' or 'immerse' is the primary, 'wash' the secondary meaning of βάπτω and βαπτίζω. (b) The same inference may be drawn from the law laid down regarding the baptism of proselytes: 'As soon as he grows whole of the wound of circumcision, they bring him to Baptism, and being placed in the water, they again instruct him in some weightier and in some lighter commands of the Law. Which being heard, he plunges himself and comes up, and behold, he is an Israelite in all things.' (See Lightfoot, l.c.) To use Pauline language, his old man is dead and buried in the water, and he rises from this cleansing grave a new man. The full significance of the rite would have been lost had immersion not been practised. Again, it was required in proselyte baptism that 'every person baptized must dip his whole body, now stripped and made naked, at one dipping. And wheresoever in the Law washing of the body or garments is mentioned, it means nothing else than the washing of the whole body.' (c) That immersion was the mode of Baptism adopted by John is the natural conclusion from his choosing the neighbourhood of the Jordan as the scene of his labours; and from the statement of Jn 3<sup>2</sup> that he was baptizing in Anon 'because there was much water there.' (d) That this form was continued into the Christian Church appears from the expression ἄσπρον πλυνεῖσθαι (Tit 3), and from the use made by St. Paul in Ro 6 of the symbolism. This is well put by Bingham (Antiq. xi. 11): 'The ancients thought that immersion, or burying under water, did more likely represent the death and burial and resurrection of Christ as well as our own death unto sin and rising again unto righteousness; and the divesting or unclothing the person to be baptized did also represent the putting off the body of sin in order to put on the new man, which is created in righteousness and true holiness. For which reason they observed the way of baptizing all persons naked and divested, by a total immersion under water, except in some particular cases of great exigence, wherein they allow of sprinkling, as in the case of clinic Baptism, or where there is a scarcity of water.' This statement exactly reflects the ideas of the Pauline Epistles and the Didache. This early document enjoins that Baptism be performed in running water; but if that is not to be had, then in other water: 'And if thou canst not in cold, then in warm; but if thou hast neither, pour water thrice upon the head.' Here it is obvious that affusion is to be practised only where immersion is inconvenient or impossible. The Eastern Church has in the main adhered to the primitive form. But in the Western Church the exigencies of climate and the alteration of manners have favoured affusion and sprinkling. Judging from the representations of the performance of the rite collected by Mr. C. F. Rogers (Studia Bibl. et Eccles. vol. v. pt. iv.),—whose collection is more valuable than his inferences,—it would seem that at an early period a common form of administration required that the baptized person should stand in some kind of bath or tub, naked or nearly so, while the baptizer poured water three times over him. This restricted form gradually gave place to the still more meagre sprinkling of the head. But theoretically the form of Baptism by immersion was retained alike in the Roman, the Anglican, and the Presbyterian Churches. Thus Aquinas (Summa, iii. lxvi. 7) determines: 'si totum corpus aqua non possit perfundi propter aquae paucitatem, vel propter aliquam aliam causam, oportet caput perfundere, in quo manifestatur principium animalis vite.' The Anglican Church in her rubric for Baptism directs the ministrant to dip the child discreetly and warily, if the sponsors certify him that the child may well endure it; if not, 'it shall suffice to pour water upon it.' And the Westminster Confession guardedly says: 'Dipping of the person into water is not necessary; but Baptism is rightly administered by pouring or sprinkling water upon the person' (cf. Calvin, Inst. iv. 15, 19). This form of Baptism by sprinkling gives prominence to the 'pouring out' of the Spirit (cf. Tit 3), but fails to indicate the dying to sin and rising to righteousness.

3. John's Baptism of the people.—The message of the Baptist as herald of the Messiah was, 'The kingdom of heaven is at hand.' The imminence of the kingdom produced in the people a sense of their unpreparedness for its enjoyment. A new sense of sin was created within them, answering to the forerunner's cry, 'Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand' (Mt 3). The hunger for cleanness of conscience thus awakened within them was responded to by John's Baptism of repentance 'for (eis) remission of sins' (Mk 1). True repentance cleanses the soul, and Baptism represented and sealed this inward cleansing. The reality of the repentance, as John insisted, would be determined by its fruits. Many writers (cf. Reynolds, John the Baptist, pp. 288-289; and Lambert, The Sacraments, p. 60) hold that the preposition eis denotes that the remission of sins was not actually bestowed, but only guaranteed in John's Baptism. 'John proclaimed, with the voice of thunder, the need of repentance as a condition of the remission of sins; his Baptism was the external symbol of the frame of mind with which the penitent approached the great forerunner.' This seems, both exegetically and psychologically, untenable. The whole expression, 'Baptism of repentance for forgiveness of sins,' denotes a Baptism which the penitent submitted to that he might therein receive the pledge and assurance that he was forgiven. The Baptism meant the cleansing of the people from past sin that they might be fitted for entrance on the kingdom.

But John's Baptism had a forward look also. It was the formal incorporation of the individual into the new community, his initiation into the kingdom. It was therefore in a very true sense Christian Baptism. That is, it pledged the recipient to the acceptance of Christ,—a feature of it which perhaps accounts for the Baptist continuing to baptize after Jesus had been proclaimed the Christ. In the same act, then, John excommunicated the whole people, putting them in the position of Gentiles who required to be re-born in Baptism, and gave them entrance to the coming kingdom.

The propriety of Baptism as the symbol of such initiation is obvious, and finds illustration in the forms of initiation commonly used in various races. The ceremonies which mark, among rude tribes, the transition from boyhood to manhood, frequently take the form of a pretended death and resurrection (Frazer, The Golden Bough<sup>2</sup>, iii. 422 ff.). Among ourselves we have titles which preserve a memory of the old customs, though the customs themselves have died out. We still have 'Knights of the Bath.' Originally, the bath to purify from the past was first taken, and the novice then passed the night in a church with his armour beside him, as if he were dead, until in the morning he was raised to life by the touch of his sovereign, 'Rise, Sir M. or N.'

4. John's Baptism of Jesus.—When John began to baptize, Jesus was still an unknown artisan in Nazareth. But in this new movement He hears a call He cannot resist. He is conscious that He must attach Himself to it; possibly already conscious that He can guide, utilize, and prosper it. He appears, therefore, as a candidate for Baptism. But to the Baptist this presented a difficulty he had not foreseen: 'I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?' (Mt 3<sup>14</sup>). Evidently what was in John's mind was not the initiatory, but the cleansing aspect of the rite. To this, therefore, the answer of Jesus must apply when He said, 'Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness.' It would seem, therefore, that Jesus felt so keen a sympathy with His fellow-men that, as one with an unclean race, He judged Baptism to be appropriate. It is idle to tell the wife that she need not be ashamed though her husband is committed for fraud; idle to tell Jesus that He need not be baptized because He has no personal guilt. And it is to be noted that it is precisely at this point of truest union with men and of deepest humiliation that Jesus is recognized as King. It seems to have flashed upon John, 'Why, this is the very spirit of the Messiah. Here is the fulness of the Divine Spirit.'

The account given in the Fourth Gospel is different. The Baptist is there (Jn 1<sup>33</sup>) represented as saying, 'I knew him not (which, as the context shows, means, 'I did not know that he was the Messiah'), but he that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and abiding on him, the same is he that baptizeth with the Holy Spirit. In this Gospel there is no mention of an actual dove being seen. John merely affirms that he saw the Spirit descending 'like a dove' (ὡς περιστερά). He wishes to emphasize two things, that he saw the Spirit so clearly that it almost seemed a sensible presence, and that it was a Spirit of gentleness. Naturally, the Messianic Spirit might have been more appropriately symbolized by an eagle, but at the moment it was the overcoming humility and meekness of Jesus that convinced John that He was the Messiah.

The Baptism of Jesus thus became His anointing as King. Jesus becomes the Christ, the Anointed of God, not only nominated to the Messianic throne, but actually equipped with the fulness of the Divine Spirit. Here two points are to be noted: (1) Although Son of God, Jesus yet lived in human form and under human conditions, and therefore needed the indwelling of the Spirit. As His body was sustained by bread, as all human bodies are, so did His soul require the aids of the Divine Spirit, as all human souls do. ('Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one, that is, God,' Mk 10<sup>18</sup>). His human nature, by which He manifested God to men, was now endowed with the fulness of God's Spirit. (2) It was not a new thing that was conferred upon Jesus at His Baptism. From the first the Divine Spirit was His. But now, having reached the flower of manhood and being called to the greatest work, His human nature expands and girds itself to the most strenuous endeavour, and so gives scope to the fullest energy of the indwelling God.

5. Baptism by the disciples of Jesus.—Of Christian Baptism very little mention is made in the Gospels. That it was in use during the life of Jesus is apparent from the references to it in Jn 3 and 4. These references are interesting as showing that Baptism by the disciples of Jesus existed alongside of Baptism by John. The Baptist himself apparently never renounced his position as forerunner nor merged himself in the kingdom. The re-baptism of those mentioned in Ac 19<sup>1-6</sup>, who had been baptized with John's Baptism, suggests the question whether all who had originally been baptized as disciples of John were re-baptized when they professed allegiance to Jesus. And although this can scarcely be considered likely, this case has been used as sanctioning re-baptism in certain circumstances. Calvin's answer is rather an evasion. He denies that the persons spoken of in Ac 19 were re-baptized. They only had the Apostle's hands laid upon them. The text no doubt says, 'They were baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus; and when Paul had laid his hands upon them,' etc. But 'hac posteriori locutione describitur, qualls ille fuerit Baptismus.' That is possible, but barely. It is more likely that those concerned, troubled by no questions as to the legitimacy of the renewal of Baptism, and accustomed to the many lustrations then in use, were re-baptized and were conscious of no inconsistency. Apparently they had only seen one half, and that the less important half, of the significance of John's Baptism, its relation to repentance, and not its efficacy as the ordinance of initiation into the kingdom of Jesus. This defect was now supplied.

Baptism could scarcely have gained so universal a currency as the initiatory rite of the Christian Church had it not been instituted by Christ Himself. No other initial ordinance seems ever to have been suggested. Yet it is expressly said (Jn 4<sup>2</sup>) that He Himself did not baptize; and it is doubted whether the explicit injunction of Mt 28<sup>19</sup> can be accepted as uttered by Jesus. Thus Harnack (Hist. of Dogma, i. 79 note) says: 'It cannot be directly proved that Jesus instituted Baptism, for Mt 28<sup>19</sup> is not a saying of the Lord. The reasons for this assertion are: (1) It is only a later stage of the tradition that represents the risen Christ as delivering speeches and giving commandments. Paul knows nothing of it. (2) The Trinitarian formula is foreign to the mouth of Jesus, and has not the authority in the Apostolic age which it must have had if it had descended from Jesus Himself.' (See the literature in Holtzmann's NT Theol. i. 379). That our Lord appeared to His disciples after the Resurrection and said nothing is inconceivable. Better deny the Resurrection altogether than think of a dumb, unsocial ghost floating before the eyes of the disciples. But the Trinitarian formula in the mouth of Jesus is certainly unexpected. For what may be said in its favour Lambert (The Sacraments, pp. 49-51) may be consulted. In any case the essential feature of Baptism was its marking the union of the soul to Christ, and therefore it sufficed to call it 'Baptism into the name of the Lord Jesus.' Further discussion of the genuineness of the ascription of these words to our Lord belongs rather to the Trinitarian than to the Baptistian problems.

BARABBAS (Aramaic Bar-Abba, 'son of Abba' or 'son of father.' There is very slight documentary authority for the reading Bar-Rabban, 'son of a Rabbi,' which is adopted by Ewald and Renan. On the other hand, if Bar-Abba = 'son of father,' it would hardly differ in meaning from Bar-Rabban; for in the time of Jesus 'Abba' was a common appellation of honour given to a Rabbi. But after all 'Abba' may have been a proper name; for though it is sometimes affirmed [e.g. by Schmiedel in his article 'Barabbas' in Encyc. Bibl.] that it was not till after the time of our Lord that the word began to be used in this way, the authors of the corresponding article in the Jewish Encyclopedia assure us that 'Abba' is found as a pronomen as early as Tannaitic times).

Only one Barabbas meets us in the Gospels, the criminal whom Pilate released instead of Jesus at the demand of the people. All the four Evangelists relate the incident (Mt 27<sup>15-26</sup>, Mk 15<sup>7-15</sup>, Lk 23<sup>17-25</sup>, Jn 18<sup>38-40</sup>), which is again referred to in Acts in the account of St. Peter's sermon in the Temple's portico (Ac 3<sup>14</sup>). From the narrative we gather that Barabbas was 'a notable prisoner,' 'a robber,' one who had taken part in 'a certain insurrection made in the city,' and who in this disturbance had 'committed murder.' It had probably been an old Jewish custom to release a prisoner at the Passover feast (Jn 18<sup>39</sup>). According to the Roman habit in such matters, the procurators of Judæa had accommodated themselves to the Jewish practice. In his desire to save Jesus, Pilate bethought himself of this custom as offering a loophole of escape from the dilemma in which he found himself between his own sense of justice and his unwillingness to give offence to the multitude. So he offered them the choice between the life of Jesus and the life of Barabbas, probably never doubting that to Jesus the preference would be given. The fact that he seems to have expected this precludes the view which some have held that Barabbas was a pseudo-Messiah, and even the notion that he was no vulgar bandit, but the leader of a party of Zealots, since popular sympathy might have been anticipated on behalf of a bold Zealot or insurrectionary Messiah. The probability accordingly is that Barabbas was simply a criminal of the lowest type, a hater of the Romans it may be, but at the same time a pest to society at large. And unless we are to suppose, on the ground of the possible etymology, 'son of father' = 'son of teacher,' and the 'plurimi magistri eorum' which Jerome quotes from the account of the incident in the Gospel of the Hebrews, that he was popular among the people because he was the son of a Rabbi, we have no reason to think that either the Jewish leaders or the multitude had any ground for preferring him to Jesus except their passionate hatred of the latter. According to an old reading of Mt 27<sup>16-17</sup>, the name 'Jesus' in both verses is prefixed to Barabbas, so that Pilate's question runs, 'Whom will ye that I release unto you? Jesus Barabbas, or Jesus which is called Christ?' If this reading were accepted, Barabbas would not have the force of a proper name (like Bartimæus), but would be only a patronymic added for the sake of distinction (cf. 'Simon Bar-jona'). In his exposition of the passage, Origen refers to this reading, which is favoured by some cursive MSS and by the Armenian and Jerusalem Syriac Versions, and has been defended by Ewald, Lange, Meyer, and others, who have supposed that the accidental similarity of the name may have helped to suggest to Pilate the alternative which he presented to the Jews. Olshausen not only adopts this view, but finds a mournful significance in both of the (supposed) names of the condemned criminal.—Jesus' and 'son of the father,' and in the fact that the nation preferred this caricature of Jesus to the heavenly reality. Both dramatically and homiletically, no doubt, these ideas are tempting—the meeting of the two Jesuses, the irony of the popular choice, the sense of a Divine 'Iustus' in human affairs. But the truth remains that the grounds on which this construction rests are very inadequate. There is ingenuity certainly in the suggestion, first made by Origen (who, however, prefers the ordinary reading), that 'Jesus' may have been dropped out of the early MSS of Matthew after the name had become a sacred one, because it appeared unseemly that it should be borne by a murderer; but it is of too hypothetical a kind to counterbalance the immense weight of the documentary evidence against the presence of the name 'Jesus' at all. The fact that, even in the scanty MSS and VSS in which 'Jesus Barabbas' is found in vv. 16 and 17, 'Barabbas' and 'Jesus' are set in direct antithesis in v. 20 tells strongly against the reading, as well as the circumstance that no trace of it is found in any MS of the other three Gospels. There is much to be said for the suggestion of Tregelles, by way of explaining the appearance of the 'Jesus' in some copies of Matthew, that at a very early date a careless transcriber repeated the last two letters of Ἰησοῦ (v. 17), and that the IN was afterwards taken to be the familiar abbreviation of Ἰησοῦς.

BARACHIAH—Mt 23<sup>35</sup> (om. N<sup>o</sup> and 4 cursives), Lk 11<sup>51</sup> (ms. D<sup>8</sup> and 2 cursives). The name occurs in Mt. in a passage, recorded in substantial agreement by Mt. and Lk., in which the Lord declares that the blood of all the prophets (Lk.) or all the righteous blood (Mt.) will be sought from or come upon that generation, from the blood of Abel to the blood of Zechariah. In 2 Ch 24<sup>20</sup> is an account of the stoning of Zechariah the son of Jehoiada (LXX B has 'Azariah' for 'Zechariah,' but Lagarde prints 'Zechariah') in the court of the house of the Lord. This incident is repeatedly referred to in the later Jewish literature. In the Babylonian Talmud (Sanh. 96b; Gittin. 57b), in the Jerusalem Talmud (Taanith. 69a), and in the Midrashim (e.g. Echa Rabbati, Introd. v. H. 2; Koheloth iii. 18; Pesikta Rab. Kabana xv.) it is recorded that Nebuzardan slew many Jews in order to quiet 'the blood of Zechariah, who is called a prophet' (Sanh. 96b; Midr. Echa R., Koheloth) with reference to 2 Ch 24<sup>20</sup>. It seems natural, therefore, to suppose that the Zechariah of the Gospels is the Zechariah of 2 Chronicles. Abel's was the first murder of a righteous man recorded in the OT, Zechariah's the last (2 Chron. is the last book of the Hebrew Canon). Abel's blood cried from the ground (Gn 4<sup>10</sup>). Zechariah when dying said, 'The Lord look upon it and require it' (2 Ch 24<sup>22</sup>).

But how are we to account for Mt.'s 'son of Barachiah,' when we should expect 'son of Jehoiada'?' In Is 8<sup>2</sup> we read of Zechariah 'son of Jeberechiah' (the LXX has υἱὸν Βαραχίου), in Zec 1<sup>1</sup> of Zechariah the son of Berechiah the son of Iddo (LXX, τὸν υἱὸν Βαραχίου υἱὸν Ἰδδοῦ). The later Jewish tradition identified the two. So the Babylonian Talmud (Makboth, 24b; cf. Pesikta Rab. Kahana xv., Targum of Is 8<sup>2</sup>; Rashi on Is 8<sup>2</sup>). Further, there seems to have been a tendency to identify Zechariah son of Berechiah son of Iddo with Zechariah son of Jehoiada, for the Targum of La 3<sup>2</sup> calls the Zechariah of Chronicles 'son of Iddo.' We might therefore suppose that Christ spoke of Zechariah, who was really son of Jehoiada, as son of Barachiah, because the Jewish tradition of His age identified or confused the priest and the prophet; cf. the 'priest and prophet' applied to Zechariah son of Jehoiada in Sanh. 97b. In this case the omission of υἱὸν Βαραχίου from Mt 23<sup>35</sup> in 8* would be due to someone who wondered at the 'Barachiah' instead of 'Jehoiada.' Or the 'son of Barachiah' might be an insertion on the part of the editor of the Gospel, either on the ground of Jewish tradition, or in remembrance of the two LXX passages, Is 8<sup>2</sup>, Zec 1<sup>1</sup>. The fact that this editor elsewhere employs LXX forms of proper names, as in Λαζάρου, Ἀμαρῆ (1<sup>8-10</sup>), is in favour of the latter. Or 'son of Barachiah' may be a later insertion in the Gospel (so Merx). The insertion of the clause in Western texts in Lk. is due to assimilation to the text of Matthew.

The difficulty of the appearance of 'Barachiah' in Mt. has led to other and less probable identifications. Origen (de la Rue, iv. 845) supposed that Zacharias the father of John the Baptist was referred to, and quotes a tradition that this Zacharias was murdered in the temple. Cf. the Protoc., Isaiah, 23, 24, which has a different account of the cause of the murder. Others refer to Jos. EJ iv. v. 4, where it is recorded that shortly before the last siege of Jerusalem one Zacharias the son of Baruch or Bariscaeus was murdered in the temple by the Zealots. It is therefore argued that the Evangelist has either blundered by writing 'of Barachiah' in reminiscence of this event, when he should have written 'of Jehoiada,' or that he is responsible for the whole of the clause in which this phrase occurs, and has put into Christ's mouth an anachronistic statement. But, apart from the difference between the Βαραχίου of the Gospels and the Βαραχίου or Βαρισκου or Βαρισκαιου of Josephus, the reference to 2 Chron. seems to satisfy the data better. The reckoning from Abel to Zechariah is Jewish in character, the 'of Barachiah' may be due to Jewish tradition, and the 'between the temple and the altar' is perhaps also due to current Jewish speculation or tradition. In the Jerusalem Talmud (Taanith 68a) the question is raised where Zechariah was killed, with the answer that it was in the court of the priests (cf. also the same tradition in Midr. Koheloth iii. 16, Pesikta R. Kahana xv., Echa Rabbati, Introd. 12).

BARLEY.—In the Gospels, barley is mentioned only in the account given by St. John (8<sup>13</sup>) of the miraculous feeding of the five thousand with five barley loaves and two fishes. The word occurs twice (vv. 9, 13), and in both cases represents the adjectival form κριθίνος in the original. The noun κριθῆ (in ordinary Gr. usage almost invariably in the plur. κριθάι), which is employed in the LXX to render the Heb. בָּרֵכָה, occurs only once in NT (Rev 6<sup>1</sup>). Barley was one of the most important of Biblical food-products. According to the elder Pliny (HN xviii. 72), it was the most ancient nutriment of mankind. It certainly dates back to a very remote antiquity. It was cultivated by the Canaanites prior to the time of the Hebrew conquest (Dt 8<sup>8</sup>), and by the ancient Egyptians, as appears from Ex 9<sup>3</sup> and from the representations on the oldest Egyptian monuments. Among the Jews it was used for making bread (Ezk 4<sup>9</sup>), and it seems to have been the principal food of the poorer classes (Ru 2<sup>17</sup> 3<sup>15</sup>, 1 K 4<sup>2</sup>, Jn 6<sup>9</sup>). This is confirmed by Jg 7<sup>13</sup>, where a cake of barley-bread is the symbol of an army of peasants, and is also in accordance with modern usage. Thus Dr. Thomson says: 'Barley bread is only eaten by the poor and the unfortunate. Nothing is more common than for these people, at this day, to complain that their oppressors have left them nothing but barley bread to eat' (Land and Book [1878 ed.], p. 449). He also mentions that the Bedawin often ridicule their enemies by calling them 'eaters of barley bread' (l.c.). Barley was also grown as a forage crop. Its employment as provender for horses is mentioned in 1 K 4<sup>2</sup>, and the chopped straw from the threshing-floor was likewise used as fodder. This practice continues to the present day, oats and hay being unknown.

In Palestine the normal time for sowing barley is about the beginning of October: when the winter is exceptionally cold and wet, sowing takes place early in February. In the Jordan Valley, the harvest begins in April, but it varies according to the elevation of the different regions. At the highest altitudes the crop is not ripe till July or even August.

BARN.—The same word (ἀποθήκη) is rendered 'barn' in Mt 6<sup>9</sup> 13<sup>2</sup>, Lk 12<sup>18</sup> 24, and 'garmer' in Mt 3<sup>9</sup>, Lk 3<sup>7</sup>. In Greco-Roman times, buildings above ground were probably in use. καταπέτα, 'to pull down' (Lk 12<sup>18</sup>) could apply only to such. But from ancient times until now Palestinian farmers have stored their grain in cistern-like pits. These are dug in dry places, often out of the solid rock, carefully cemented to keep out damp, with a circular opening at the top, through which a man may pass. When the mouth is plastered over and made air-tight, the corn will keep sound for several years. For security in a lawless country, the 'barn' is sometimes under the floor of the inmost part of the house, that of the women (cf. 2 S 4<sup>1</sup>). To escape the tax-gatherer, again, it is frequently made in a secluded spot, and so skillfully turfed over that discovery is almost impossible (cf. Jer 41<sup>1</sup>). Pits found near ruined sites, in districts that have lain desolate for ages, prove the antiquity of this method. Natural caves in the limestone rock, improved by art, with heavy stone doors blocking the entrance, have also served as barns, and may be seen in use at Gadara to-day.

W. EWING.

BARTHOLOMEW (Βαρθολομαῖος) appears as an apostle in all four lists of the Twelve (Mt 10<sup>3</sup>, Mk 3<sup>18</sup>, Lk 6<sup>13</sup>, Ac 1<sup>13</sup>), always in the second of the three groups of four. In the Gospels he comes next after Philip (who in all four lists heads the second quaternion), and is followed by Matthew and Thomas: in Acts the order is 'Philip and Thomas, Bartholomew and Matthew.' The name, as the first syllable indicates, is a patronymic, and it is commonly interpreted 'son of Talmai.' In the LXX Talmai has many variants (Θολμαί, Θολμαί, Θαλαμαί, Θολομαί, Θολμαίλημα): and in Josephus (Ant. xx. i. 1) we have a bandit chief named Θολομαῖος. It is often assumed that 'Talmai' represents 'Ptolemy,' and that Bartholomew means 'son of Ptolemy'; but the Θ is against this. Edersheim (Messiah, i. p. 521) makes it mean 'son of Telamyon.' Bartholomew may be either a genuine patronymic used in addition to a proper name, like Simon Bar-jons; or it may have become an independent proper name, like Barnabas. If the apostle Bartholomew had no other name, we know nothing about him from Scripture, and the later traditions about him are very untrustworthy (Lipsius, Apokryphen Apostelgeschichten und Apostellegenden, iii. pp. 54-108). These traditions begin with Eusebius (HE v. x. 3), and ascribe to him widely different fields of missionary labour, with different apostles as his companions, and different forms of martyrdom. He is often made to be one of the Seventy.*

But both by the early Church and by most modern writers Bartholomew is commonly identified with Nathanael. To treat this as almost certain (Schaff-Herzog) is to go beyond the evidence; to call it 'the merest conjecture' (Encyc. Bibl.) is to err in the opposite direction.

In favour of the identification are the following points. (1) Bartholomew being a patronymic, the bearer may easily have had another name; (2) the Synoptists never mention Nathanael, St. John never mentions Bartholomew; (3) the Synoptists in their lists place Bartholomew next to Philip, as James next to his probable caller John, and Peter (in Mt. and Lk.) next to his caller Andrew; (4) all the other disciples mentioned in Jn 1<sup>38-22</sup> became apostles, and none of them is so commended as Nathanael; (5) all the companions of Nathanael who are named in Jn 21<sup>2</sup> are apostles. But all these reasons do not make the identification more than probable. St. John nowhere calls Nathanael an apostle, and we are not obliged to find room for him among the Twelve. The conjecture that he is Matthew or Matthias (Hilgenfeld) is supported by no reasonable evidence; and that he is John himself under a symbolical name (Späth) is contradicted by Jn 21<sup>2</sup>, where the sons of Zebedee are mentioned in addition to Nathanael.

On the other hand, there is nothing against the identification: it creates no difficulty. To say that a Galilean would have remembered Is 9<sup>1</sup>, and therefore would not have asked whether any good could come out of Nazareth, is unsound criticism. A person with Is 9<sup>1</sup> in his mind, and convinced that rich blessings would come from Galilee, might nevertheless think that Nazareth was not a likely place to be the dwelling-place of the Messiah. And who can tell whether a particular Galilean would or would not remember a particular text?

A. PLUMMER.

BARTIMEUS (Βαρτιμαῖος).—Named only in Mk 10<sup>46-52</sup>, where he is described as a blind beggar who was cured by Jesus as He left Jericho on His last journey to Jerusalem. But there can be little doubt that we have also accounts of the same miracle in the closely parallel narratives Mt 20<sup>29-34</sup>, Lk 18<sup>35-43</sup>. There are, however, various divergences between the three narratives which have caused difficulty. Thus St. Matthew, while agreeing with St. Mark that the miracle took place on the Lord's departure from Jericho, speaks of two blind men as having been healed; but St. Luke, reverting to the mention of a single sufferer, says his cure took place as the Lord drove nigh to the city. And again, while St. Mark is content to describe the healing as the result of a word of comfort, 'Go thy way, thy faith hath made thee whole,' St. Matthew tells us that it was effected by a touch, 'Jesus . . . touched their eyes'; and St. Luke assigns it to a direct command, 'Receive thy sight.' The divergences, no doubt, are very considerable, and have taxed the ingenuity of the harmonists both in ancient and modern times. Thus it has been supposed that St. Matthew combines the cure of one blind man at the entrance into Jericho (so St. Luke) with the cure of another at the departure from Jericho (so St. Mark), or that Bartimeus, begging at the gate, became aware of Jesus' entrance into the city, and, seeking out a blind companion, along with him intercepted the Saviour the next day as He was leaving Jericho, and was then healed. But it cannot be said that any such explanations are very satisfactory. And it is better simply to content ourselves with noting the divergences between the three accounts as an additional proof of the independence of the Evangelists in matters of detail, without, however, abandoning our belief in the general trustworthiness of their narratives. There are few miracles, indeed, in the Gospel story better vouched for than the one before us, authenticated as it is by the triple Synoptic tradition and by the preciseness of the details, while the very mention of the name of the healed man has been regarded as a proof that he must still have been known in the time of the Apostles ('valde notus Apostolorum tempore Bartimeus,' Bengel).

It has been conjectured, indeed, that Bartimeus is not really a proper name, but a designation derived from an Aramaic root sonja, 'blind,' so that 'Bartimeus the son of Timaeus' might mean no more than 'the blind son of a blind father' (see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Mk 10<sup>46</sup>; and for the various derivations that have been proposed, Keim, Jesus of Nazareth, Eng. tr. v. p. 61 f.). But the word, as St. Mark interprets it for us, is clearly a patronymic (cf. Βαρτιμαῖος), and the defining clause ὁ υἱὸς Τιμαίου is quite in the style of the Second Evangelist, though it is placed before the patronymic and not after it as usually (cf., however, v. 48; and see Swete, St. Mark, p. 228).

It is unnecessary to recall further the details of the Gospel narrative; but, from whatever point of view we regard it, it is full of instruction. Thus, in the case of Bartimeus himself, we have a notable instance of a determination that resolved to let no opportunity of being healed escape it; of a perseverance that continued its efforts notwithstanding the difficulties placed in its path; of an eagerness that cast off all that hindered its free approach; of a faith that recognized in Jesus the Divinely-appointed Messiah ('Thou Son of David') before and not after the cure; and of a thankfulness that showed itself in ready obedience and triumphant praise when the cure was complete ('followed him, glorifying God'). And if thus the narrative has much to tell us regarding Bartimeus, no less does it throw a vivid light on the character of our Lord Himself, when we remember the sympathy with which, notwithstanding His own approaching sufferings, He regarded the beggar's cry; the readiness with which He placed Himself at his disposal ('What wilt thou . . .?'); and the saving power with which He bestowed on the sufferer even more than he asked.

GEORGE MILLIGAN.

BASKET.—All four Evangelists, in narrating the miracle of the feeding of the five thousand, describe the baskets in which the fragments were placed as κόφιναι (Mt 14<sup>20</sup>=Mk 6<sup>42</sup>=Lk 9<sup>17</sup>=Jn 6<sup>13</sup>); while the two who report the other miracle of feeding the four thousand, state that the fragments were placed in στυβάδες (Mt 15<sup>37</sup>=Mk 8<sup>9</sup>). It is clear from Mt 13<sup>9</sup> (=Mk 8<sup>18</sup>) that the variation is intentional. The baskets used on the one occasion differed either in size, shape, or material from those used on the other (cf. R.Vm in Mt 16<sup>9</sup> and Mk 8<sup>9a</sup>). Our Lord preserved the distinction, and our present Gospels have also done so.

'Basket' occurs in the EV Gospels in the above passages only. The older English versions use the confusing rendering of 'baskets' for both words, except that Wyclif has 'coffyns' and 'leppis'. By 'coffyn' he evidently meant a small basket. Rheims renders σπυρίδες, 'manides', i.e. hand-baskets. Davidson (JV, 1875) at Mk 8:19-20 has 'basketfuls' for σπυρίδες and 'walletful' for σπυρίδες, as if he had found σπυρίδες.

The authors of such renderings as the above forgot that St. Paul (Ac 9<sup>35</sup>) made his escape in a σπυρίς. This fact at once excludes wallets or hand-baskets. If the distinction was one of size at all, which is not certain, we should perhaps have to assume that the σπυρίς was the larger. Bevan (Smith's DB i. 172) says that the κόφινος was the larger, quoting Etym. Mag., κόφινος καὶ κέλον κόφινος, and the use of κόφινος in Latin, e.g. Colum. xi. 3, p. 460, as containing manure enough to make a hotbed. Greswell (Diss. viii. pt. 4, vol. ii.) thought that the κόφινος was big enough to sleep in. He probably misunderstood the passage in Juvenal quoted below; for though the hay may have been used as a bed, it is not said that it was in the κόφινος. Nor is it clear that the Latin κόφινος and the Greek κόφινος were at all times identical in meaning (so the French balle is not a cannon-ball but a musket bullet, while our cannon-ball is a doublet). Let us examine the two words more closely.

(1) κόφινος is said to be derived from κόφινος; but this appears to be more than doubtful, and the grammarians considered it less Attic than κόφινος, which was clearly a wicker or flag basket. In the Gr. OT it is used by LXX and Symm. Herod. did in Pa 80 (81)<sup>5</sup>, and by Symm. only in Jer 24:2 (where LXX has κόφινος), and for pad by Ag. in Gn 40:6 (where LXX has κόφινος). Certainly in the two latter passages a small basket carried in the hand, or on the head, would suit the contexts. Suidas defines κ. as κόφινος πίπλονος. In ClO 1025, lines 44-46, it is clearly a corn-basket of a recognized size; cf. also ClO 2847 k. In Xen. Anab. iii. 8. 6 it occurs as a dung-basket (see the Latin κόφινος in Columella, as cited above). It is said that the Jews at Rome carried κόφινος about with them to avoid the chance of food contracting any Levitical pollution in heathen places. The reason given appears fanciful, and anyhow would hardly apply to the journey of our Lord and His apostles. But the fact is vouched for by Juvenal (Sat. iii. 14: 'Judais, quorum κόφινος femurque supplex'; vi. 542: 'κόφινος femurque relicto') Arcaman Judaea truncat mendicant in aurem) and Martial (Epigr. v. 7).

(2) σπυρίς (or σπυρίς, as WH prefer) is not found in the LXX. It is generally connected with σπυρίς = anything twisted (Vulg. sporia, of which the diminutives sporella and sporecula occur, as small fruit- or provision-baskets). Hesychius explains σπυρίς as στῆ τὸν σπυρίς ἀγροῦ, as though from σπυρίς; cf. δύσανος ἀπὸ σπυρίδος (Athenaeus, viii. 17). Hence Greswell thought that before Pentecost, the season of wheat harvest, when the second miracle took place, the disciples were able to use corn-baskets, while the first miracle happening before Passover time, they used another kind of basket! Besides the improbability of this, we may note that there is no proof that in either case the baskets belonged to or were carried about by the disciples, for they may have been borrowed when needed. Yet Trench (Miracles, p. 280 note 2) inquires why the apostles should have been provided with either kind, and mentions (a) that perhaps they carried their provisions with them while travelling through a polluted land, such as Samaria (yet cf. Jn 4<sup>8</sup> 43 44<sup>6</sup>, Lk 9<sup>5</sup>); and (b) he also mentions Greswell's theory, that the disciples carried these baskets in order to sleep in them sub dio. This all comes from applying to the Twelve in the Holy Land what Roman satirists said about Jewish beggars at Rome.

As σπυρίς in Ac 9<sup>35</sup> = σπυρίς in 2 Co 11<sup>35</sup>, and as the Vulg. has sporia in both places (and also in the Gospels for σπυρίς but not for κόφινος), we are led to inquire as to the force of σπυρίς. It is used of anything twisted like a rope, or woven of rope (Esch. Suppl. 781—σπυρίς τι τε σπυρίς, Suid.). Fish-baskets were specially so made (ἀπὸ ἑστῆσαν πλέγματος ἐκ τριβόλων ἰχθυῶν, Etym. Mag.), as rush-baskets are used in London.

Meyer considered the difference between σπυρίς and κόφινος to lie not in size, but in κόφινος being a general term, and σπυρίς specially a food-basket. Perhaps the true force of the words we have discussed is to be discovered in the use made of them by Greek-speaking working people at the present day. The writer of this article has therefore consulted a Greek priest, the Rev. H. A. Teknonopolos. In his reply he says: 'In Asia Minor and in Constantinople our porters call κόφινος that big and deep basket in which they carry different things.

σπυρίς is a smaller and round and shallow basket. Σαργάνη is a long bag, knitted by (i.e. of) rope, which is in one way very like the διαιριν of fish, but is different from it in other way(s).

One might ask whether the σπυρίς of Ac 9<sup>35</sup> is not an error of memory on the part of St. Luke. St. Paul in his own account of his escape would surely use the right word. If so, the supposed need for a σπυρίς being big enough to hold a person disappears, and we may accept the decision of those who consider it the smaller of the two kinds mentioned in the Gospels.

BASON* (βαστήρα only in Jn 13<sup>5</sup> εἰς βάλλει ὕδωρ εἰς τὸν βαστήρα: Vulg. deinde mittit aquam in pelvium: AV 'after that he poureth water into a bason': RV 'then he poureth water into the bason').

The Gr. βαστήρα is not found elsewhere in NT, nor in LXX, nor in Gr. profane literature (except in Esch. writers dealing with this passage). Hence Liddell and Scott, s.v., refer only to this instance. The Vulg. pelvis, though found in Juvenal, etc., occurs in the Bible only in Jer 52<sup>10</sup>.

The general sense of βαστήρα is, of course, plain, both from the context and from the cognate verbs βάπτειν and βίβω both in the Bible and in profane Greek. (The former is the Biblical form, 17 times in NT, including our passage (8 times), and 25 times in LXX. It is usually 'to wash a part of the body'—e.g. the face, Mt 6<sup>17</sup>; the hands, Mt 15<sup>2</sup> = Mk 7<sup>3</sup>; the feet, 1 Ti 5<sup>10</sup>,—so Ex 30<sup>18,19</sup> etc. Jn 9<sup>9,11,15</sup> seem to be exceptions, because the washing was in the Pool of Siloam; but here it is only the eyes that are concerned, and therefore we need not assume that the man 'bathed.' A real exception is Lv 15<sup>12</sup>, where the wooden vessel βαστήραται; but note contrasted use of βάπτειν, πλύνειν, and λούεσθαι in 15<sup>11</sup>.)

The noun βαστήρα therefore denotes an article (not necessarily a vessel) specially suitable or intended for use in washing part of the body. We note the article τὸν βαστήρα, neglected by AV (a bason) but noticed by RV (the bason). Was it the ordinary βαστήρα of the house? In that case the use of the article is like that in τὸν μόδιον, τὴν λεχάνην in Mt 5<sup>10</sup> etc. Or was it a vessel set apart for ceremonial ablution, such as would be required by the religious feast in which they were engaged?

But, in spite of the Vulg. and modern versions, it is doubtful if the word 'bason' conveys to us a good idea of the article and of the scene.

The Eastern mode of washing either hands or feet, when performed by an attendant, seems to have been always by the attendant pouring water on the member, not by dipping the member in the water. Cf. 2 K 3<sup>11</sup> 'Elisha the son of Shaphat, which poured water on the hands of Elijah.' Kitto's note in Pictorial Bible, ii. 330, with two illustrations, is convincing on this point.

The Hebrews were accustomed to wash their hands in the manner which is now universal in the East, and which, whatever may be thought of its convenience, is unquestionably more refreshing and cleanly than washing in the water as it stands in a basin—which is a process regarded by Orientals with great disgust. The hands are therefore held over a basin, the use of which is only to receive the water which has been poured upon the hands from the jug or ewer which is held above them. This cannot very conveniently be managed without the aid of a servant or some other person.

Of course, this extract refers only to the washing of hands.

(1) The incident of the sinful woman who wept over our Lord's feet, and wiped them with her hair of her head (Lk 7<sup>37,38</sup>), is much better explained by comparing her action with that of the host or his servant pouring water on a guest's feet, than by supposing that the guest immersed his feet in a footbath (Lk 7<sup>44</sup>). (2) It is true that βαστήρα is found in Pollux, Onom. x. 78, but here a definition of the μπατήρ is contained in the word. 'Basins' are such common articles, that if St. John had meant to name one he need not have used an unique word. (3) The position of the Apostles and of the guests at the feast of Lk 7 was a reclining one. This would not be compatible with the use of a basin or footbath in the ordinary sense of even partially immersing the foot. (4) Dr. A. R. S. Kennedy (art. 'Bath, Bathing' in Hastings' DB i. 237<sup>7</sup>) shows that 'affusion, pouring on' of water, was probably meant in many cases where we read 'bathe' or 'wash.'

* In the appendix Revised OT of 'Readings and Renderings preferred by the American Revisers,' § viii, we read: 'The modern spelling is preferred for the following words: "basin" for "bason," etc., but no such note appears in the appendix to Revised NT.

We therefore think that the μπατήρ was a jug or ewer, with a dish, saucer or basin, under it to catch the drippings, but that the stress of the word is not on this under-basin. We also think that it was kept chiefly in the house, and used for the many 'hand-washings' which the Jews practised (Mt 15<sup>2</sup>, Mk 7<sup>3</sup> etc.), but also for any ceremonial ablution. Hence it was ready in the upper room, as part of the preparation made by the 'goodman of the house' (Mk 14<sup>15</sup>, Lk 22<sup>12</sup>), and therefore is distinguished by the article.

It may be asked whether the feet-washing in Jn 13 was ceremonial. As we understand the matter, the Galilean disciples, either because they had never adopted the Pharisaic strictness about 'washings,' or (less probably) because our Lord had condemned them, were not in the habit of observing them (Mt 15<sup>2</sup>, Mk 7<sup>3-4</sup>). Our Lord defended His followers (Mt 7<sup>28</sup>, Mt 15<sup>2-3</sup>). In the upper room they found all things ready for the observance. Whether they did observe it before a meal which was not an ordinary one, we do not know. But there was another observance, not of ceremony but of courtesy and comfort (Lk 7<sup>34</sup>), in which each might have acted as host or as servant to the other if the spirit of love had ruled in their hearts. Christ would teach them this lesson (Jn 13<sup>12, 16</sup>). Incidentally He taught them other lessons, which they could not fully understand at the time, about the cleansing of the soul, daily defilement, and the duty of preparation before receiving the Eucharist. In this Christian sense the feet-washing was ceremonial, or rather typical, but it was not a recognition of any validity in the 'traditions of the elders.' The main lessons for the time were those of humility, self-abasement, and love. Our Lord used the μπατήρ standing by to teach these.

Kitto (Pictorial Bible, ii. 331) says: 'In the East, the basin, which, as well as the ewer, is usually of tinned copper, has commonly a sort of cover, rising in the middle, and sunk into the basin at the margin, which, being pierced with holes, allows the water to pass through, thus concealing it after being defiled by use. The ewer has a long spout, and a long narrow neck, with a cover, and is altogether not unlike our coffee-pots in general appearance: it is the same which the Orientals use in all their ablutions.'

We notice that the assistance of a servant or of a friend is necessary. This is sometimes mentioned, e.g. 1 Ti 5<sup>10</sup>, 1 S 25<sup>4</sup>, and is probably implied in Gn 18<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>24</sup> etc. But in the cases where the English versions suggest nothing of the kind, the Heb. is the Kal of פָּרַג as in 1 S 25<sup>4</sup> (cf. Dr. Kennedy's article cited above).

Lane's account (Modern Egyptians, ch. 5) is similar: 'A servant brings him a basin and ewer (called fish and ibreek) of tinned copper or brass. The former of these has a cover pierced with holes, with a raised receptacle for the soap in the middle; and the water being poured upon the hands, passes through this cover into the space below, so that when the basin is brought to a second person the water with which the former one has washed is not seen.'

Our conclusion therefore is that the μπατήρ was most probably not a 'large basin,' but the set of ewer and basin combined, kept in every Jewish house for the purpose of cleansing either the hands or the feet by means of affusion.

Dr. Anton Tien,* in a full communication to the writer of this article, which we abridge, says basin is the most correct rendering of μπατήρ. The Bible Society's Arabic NT has maghsal, a noun of time and place—'washing' and 'a place for washing,' not a correct rendering. The SPCK version has mathar (cf. Heb. מָטַהַר)='purification,' 'place or time of purification,' also an incorrect rendering. The word basin is the exact rendering of the Gr. word μπατήρ. It comes from a root 'to pour or rain slightly.'

The basin and ibreek are made of either metal or earthenware, with a strainer of the same material placed inside the basin (or basin), never outside or under, and in the middle of the strainer there is a small raised place for the soap. The ibreek (Syrian and Egyptian Arabic) is a water-jug, with a spout for the water to come through like a coffee-pot, from which the water is poured on the hands or feet, which are held over the basin. They are to be found in every Eastern house, especially in Mohammedan houses; they are used continually in the mornings. There are no washstands in the houses. The servant holds the basin on the palm of his left hand and the ibreek in his right hand, and a clean towel placed on his left shoulder for each person (Jn 13<sup>9</sup>), who washes his face and hands, taking the towel from off the servant's shoulder. The towel is thrown down, and the servant puts a fresh one for the next person to use.

BATH, BATHING.—The immersing or washing of the whole person may be a matter of cleanliness, or of luxury, or of religious observance, or of health.

(1) Cleanliness per se may be set aside. It is possible to be cleanly with less elaborate apparatus; and the majority in OT (or even NT) times would have 'neither privacy nor inclination' for bathing.

(2) Luxury in the classical world (diffused even among the people, under Roman influence, at least subsequently to NT times) included plunge-baths and much besides. When Greek culture tried to invade Judaea under Antiochus Epiphanes (c. 168 B.C.), it doubtless brought Greek bathing establishments with it. And when Western culture came in resistlessly under Herod (B.C. 40-4), it must have introduced the practice in many places; cf. an anecdote of Gamaliel II. in Schürer, HJP II. i. 18, 53. (3) Religious observance, under OT law, according to Professor Kennedy (art. 'Bath, Bathing' in Hastings' DB i. 237<sup>7</sup>), required a partial washing, or a washing with water rather than bathing. 'The Heb. of the OT does not distinguish' between bathing and a partial washing. 'Both are expressed by פָּרַג.' However, Schürer insists that Talmudic usage codifies the custom which had long been in vogue; and Kennedy grants that 'the bath became,' even

'for the laity . . . an all-important factor in the religious life.' Nay, proselyte baptism must be earlier than the NT, and it requires a bath, tebilah (tebal is used in one unambiguous OT passage, the miracle of Naaman's cleansing, 2 K 5<sup>14</sup>). We hear also of daily bathing among the Essenes (Jos. BJ II. viii. 5). And, finally, John's baptism was by immersion (as was that also of the early Christian Church, Ac 8<sup>38</sup>, Ro 6<sup>3-4</sup>). (4) The use of mineral baths for health's sake is always popular. There are remains of such baths near Tiberias; those at Gadara and at Callirhoë were very celebrated in ancient times. Jn 5<sup>2-7</sup> gives us an example of such bathing, though Christ's miracle dispensed with the waters of Bethesda. In another passage (Jn 9<sup>7</sup>) we have a partial washing (at the Pool of Siloam) as a stage towards completion of a miracle.

Thus bathing was well enough known in NT times. Our Lord's language in Jn 13<sup>10</sup> turns on the distinction between bathing (the whole person) and washing (the feet). Quite conceivably a Christian sacrament might have grown out of this incident. Nothing is more impressive at Oberammergau than the threefold journey of the Christus round the company—so it is represented—ministering to the disciples (1) the feet-washing, (2) the bread, (3) the cup. See, further, artt. BASON, PURIFICATION. ROBERT MACKINTOSH.

BATH KOL.—See VOICE.

BEACH.—The RV tr. of ἀγιάλας, which the AV renders 'shore.' In the Gospels the word occurs only in Mt 13<sup>a-48</sup> and Jn 21<sup>4</sup>. In classical Greek αἰχμή usually, though not always, means that part of the seashore on which the tide ebbs and flows, and in the above passages in the Gospels it stands for the sandy or pebbly part of the shore of the Lake of Galilee washed by the waves. The derivation is doubtful, but is probably from εὔρημα and ἄνα, i.e. the place where the sea breaks. The greater part of the western margin of the Lake of Galilee is girdled with a belt of 'silver strand' composed of pebbles and sand mingled with delicate white shells. On such a beach, if the traditional scene be correct, the multitude was gathered listening as Jesus spoke from the boat; and on such a 'beach' He stood waiting for the disciples to come ashore in the morning, when for 'the third time he was manifested to them after that he was risen from the dead' (Jn 21<sup>4</sup>). J. CROMARTY SMITH.

BEAM AND MOTE.—The proverb of the 'beam' and the 'mote' occurs in Mt 7<sup>3-5</sup> and in the parallel passage Lk 6<sup>41-42</sup>. It condemns the man who looks at the 'mote' in another's eye while a 'beam' unconsidered is in his own; and it points out the fatality and hypocrisy of the attempt to cast out the mote from the eye of a brother while the beam remains in one's own eye. The proverb appears to have been current in various forms among Jews and Arabs. Tholuck, in his Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount, gives several illustrations; e.g. from the Baba Bahira: 'In the days when the judges were judged themselves, said the judge to one of them, Take the splinter out of thine eye; whereat he made reply, Take thou the beam out of thine eye'; and from Meidani (ap. Freytag): 'How seest thou the splinter in thy brother's eye and seest not the cross-beam in thine eye?'

There is no obscurity in the terms used. The word δοκός is common in classical writers for a beam of wood, and is used in the LXX (Gn 19<sup>8</sup>, I K 6<sup>9</sup>, Ca 1<sup>17</sup>) to translate קִרְיָה, a beam used in the roof of a house. Grimm-Thayer derives from δέκωμαι Ion. for δέχομαι with the idea of bearing; so that δοκός is that which supports a building. So Plummer ('St. Luke' in Internat. Crit. Com.) says: 'The δοκός is the bearing beam, the main beam, that which receives the other beams in a roof or floor.' A. B. Bruce ('St. Matthew' in Expositor's Greek Test.) says: 'δοκός, a wooden beam ('let in,' from δέχομαι) or joist.' Clearly a large piece of timber is suggested, such as could not literally be in the eye. The symbol has the touch of exaggeration familiar in Oriental proverbs, as, e.g., in the camel and the needle's eye.

The 'mote' (τὸ κάρφος, from κάρφω, 'to contract,' 'dry up,' 'wither') may be a dry stalk or twig, or any small dry body. The word is used in the LXX (Gn 8<sup>11</sup>) to render קָרַב, the adj. applied to the olive-leaf brought by the dove. Weymouth (NT in Modern Speech) renders 'speck.'

It is clear, therefore, that the point of the proverb lies in the contrast between a smaller fault in the person criticised and a greater one in the critic. The figures chosen express the contrast in a very emphatic way, pushing it, indeed, to the verge of absurdity, to suggest the essential folly of the unbrotherly and insincere faultfinder.

Various illustrations are given by commentators of the possibly greater defect of the man who is finding fault with his neighbour. Morison, e.g., quotes Augustine as comparing 'settled hatred' (the beam) with a passing burst of anger (the mote). A. B. Bruce (l.c.) says: 'The faults may be of the same kind: κάρφος a petty theft, δοκός commercial dishonesty on a large scale . . . ; or a different sort: moral laxity in the publican, pride and inhumanity in the Pharisee who despised him.'

All such illustrations are to the point, for the proverb is capable of many applications; and it is very often true that men eager to correct others have great and obvious faults of their own which disqualify them for the office. It seems clear, however, that 'the beam' is very definitely the censorious spirit. Our passage, as it stands in St. Matthew, follows immediately upon the general exhortation 'judge not,' and the warning, 'with what measure ye mete it shall be measured unto you.' There is a spirit which sees and notes faults in others where true goodness would be blind. The 'beholding' is in the judgment of Jesus often a much greater evil than the fault it beholds. Such a spirit leads a man on to the officious attempt to correct others, and makes him doubly unfit for the task. To cast out the mote from another's eye is always difficult. It needs clear sight and wonderful delicacy of touch. To the censorious man, blind in his fancied superiority, it is of all tasks the most impossible. Moreover, the censorious spirit is closely akin to hypocrisy. It pretends to zeal for righteousness, but really cares only for personal superiority. A sincere man begins with that humble self-judgment which is fatal to uncharitable judgments of others. A zeal for righteousness which begins with correction of others stands convicted of dishonesty at the outset. If a man has once taken the true ground of lowly penitence, if he has cast out the proud, self-sufficient, censorious spirit, he will leave no other beam unnoted in his own eye. He will be too much occupied with the task of self-discipline to be the quick and eager censor of others. Yet he will not be blind to moral distinctions. On the contrary, the single eye will be full of light; and while he will have no wish to 'behold' the mote in his brother's, he will see clearly to cast it out. Love and pride are both quick to observe; but with what different results!

In St. Luke's Gospel our passage stands in a slightly different connexion. There the command 'judge not' is separated from the proverb of the Mote and the Beam by the verses which speak of the reward of generous giving, of blind leaders of the blind, of the disciple not above his master. A. B. Bruce suggests that the parable comes in at this point, because censoriousness is a natural fault of young disciples. In any case the essential meaning of the passage remains unchanged.

- iv. The 'Beatitudes' in Matthew and Luke.

i. DERIVATION AND MEANING.—The Latin word beatitudo is derived from beatus, the past participle of beare, 'to make happy,' 'to bless' (cf. bene and bonus). Trench says that beatitas and beatitudo are both words of Cicero's coinage; yet, 'as he owns himself, with something strange and unattractive about them.'* On this account they 'found almost no acceptance at all in the classical literature of Rome. Beatitudo, indeed, found a home, as it deserved to do, in the Christian Church, but beatitas none' (Study of Words<sup>18</sup>, p. 210).

The primary meaning of 'beatitude' is blessedness. In the earliest example of its use quoted in Murray's Dictionary (1491, Caxton), it signifies supreme blessedness; hence it was frequently used to describe the bliss of heaven. Cf. Milton, Par. Lost, iii. 62—

'About Him all the Sanctities of Heaven
Stood thick as stars, and from His sight received Beatitude past utterance.'

Trapp applies the word to 'such as are set out of the reach of evil in the most joyous condition, having just cause to be everlastingly merry as being beatire et spe, "blessed in hand and in hope." But there is nothing in the connotation of the word itself to suggest whether the blessedness is enjoyed on earth or in heaven; the context must show whether it refers to an experience in the present or to a hope for the future.

The secondary meaning of 'beatitude' is a declaration of blessedness. This declaration may be made of glorified saints in heaven, as in the Beatitudes of the Apocalypse; or of disciples on earth, as in nearly all the Beatitudes of the Gospels. But the word is unduly restricted in its significance when it is used as a synonym for beatification,—a Roman Catholic ceremony wherein an inferior degree of canonization is conferred on a deceased person. The Pope considers his claims to beatitude; and if these are approved, proclaims his admission to the Beatific Vision, and sanctions the ascription to him by the faithful of the title 'Blessed.'

ii. SIGNIFICANCE OF μακάριος. — In our Lord's declarations of blessedness He used a word (μακάριος) which has an instructive history, and passed by the pagan word for 'happiness' or 'well-being' (εὐδαιμονία) which is not found in the New Testament. In Homer the gods are the blessed (μακάριοι) ones, because they excel mortal men in power or in knowledge rather than in virtue. 'As compared with men, in conduct they are generally characterized by superior force and intellect, but by inferior morality' (Gladstone, Homer and the Homeric Age). The Greek despair of attaining blessedness on earth led to the frequent use of 'blessed' as synonymous with dead; Aristotle also distinguishes between μακαριστός or Divine blessedness, and εὐδαιμονία or human blessedness (Ethic. Nicom. x. 8). It is therefore suggestive that the Christian conception of beatitude should find expression in a word closely associated with descriptions of the blessedness of the gods and 'originally stronger and more ideal than εὐδαιμονία. . . . This is manifest in Aristotle, with whom the μακάριος as opposed to εὐδής is he who lacks no good' (Cremer, Biblico-Theol. Lex. of NT Greek, p. 776).

But the word which describes the blessedness of those who lack no good is ennobled by our Lord's use of it. He turns the thoughts of His disciples from outward to inward good; He teaches that blessedness is determined not by fortune, but by goodness, and that it is attainable on earth by all who put themselves into right relation to God. In His Beatitudes, therefore, it is desirable to translate μακάριος 'blessed' rather than 'happy.' (Cf. the saying of Carlyle that those who 'find blessedness' can 'do without happiness'). Since the word 'blessed' fell from the lips of Christ, His Beatitudes have worthily set forth an ideal of character loftier than the aristocratic virtue of the Platonists, a joy unknown to the most noble-minded of the pleasure-seeking Epicureans, a satisfaction of soul beyond the reach of the self-sufficient Stoic. Like the chiming of sweet bells, the Beatitudes call men to enter the kingdom in which to be righteous is to be blessed; they appeal to a universal longing of the human heart, and they promise a satisfaction of soul which can be found only in obedience to the law which the Son of Man proclaims in order that His brethren may be blessed. Beatitude is the final purpose of the most perfect law; beatitude is the experience of the humble in whose heart there reigns the grace which came by Jesus Christ. The Beatitudes of our Lord bring the word 'blessed' down to earth and there set up the kingdom of heaven; they portray no remote bliss, nor even a pleasure near at hand, but a fulness of joy within the soul. Henceforth blessedness is seen to be the privilege not only of those who are exalted above all earthly care and suffering, but also of those who still share the limitations of this mortal life; it depends not on outward conditions such as wealth or education (cf. Plato, Republic, 354 A, 335 E), but on inward conditions such as meekness of spirit and purity of heart; it is not the prerogative of the few who have been initiated into the secrets of a Divine philosophy, but the privilege of all who become loyal disciples of Him in whose life the perfect Law was perfectly fulfilled.

VOL. I.—12

iii. THE NT BEATITUDES. — 'Beatitude' is not a Biblical word, but it is properly applied to all the sayings of our Lord which contain a declaration of the conditions of human blessedness.

1. Single Sayings.—Isolated Beatitudes are recorded in Matthew, Luke, and John. They describe a blissful state which is the accompaniment of certain conditions of soul, or the reward of virtuous acts; but the blissful state is almost always represented as attainable in this life. (The exceptions are Lk 14<sup>14</sup>, 15). The following is a list (omitting Lk 14<sup>15</sup>) of the single sayings of Jesus in which He declares the blessedness of those who possess spiritual graces, or who exemplify some quality of virtue in their actions.

'Blessed is he, whosoever shall find none occasion of stumbling in me.' (Mt 11<sup>6</sup>, cf. Lk 7<sup>23</sup>).
'Blessed are your eyes, for they see; and your ears, for they hear.' (Mt 13<sup>16</sup>, cf. Lk 10<sup>23</sup>).
'Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven.' (Mt 16<sup>17</sup>).
'Blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it.' (Lk 11<sup>28</sup>).
'Blessed are those servants, whom the Lord when he cometh shall find watching.' (Lk 12<sup>37</sup>, cf. vv. 38, 45, Mt 24<sup>46</sup>).
'If ye know these things, blessed are ye if ye do them.' (Jn 13<sup>17</sup>).
'Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed.' (Jn 20<sup>29</sup>).
[In Mt 25<sup>34</sup> a different word (εὐλογημένοι) is used].
These scattered sayings suffice to indicate how often our Lord's teaching was expressed in words of blessing. With these Beatitudes in the canonical Gospels should be compared one preserved by St. Paul, and one found in the Codex Bezae—
'It is more blessed to give than to receive.' (Ac 20<sup>35</sup>).
'If thou knowest what thou doest, thou art blessed; but if thou knowest not, thou art under a curse, and a transgressor of the law.' (Lk 6<sup>4</sup> D).

The latter saying is addressed to a man who was working on the Sabbath; probably it embodies a genuine tradition, but certainly it bears witness to the early recognition of the Beatitude as one of our Lord's favourite methods of imparting truth. In the fifth of the New Sayings of Jesus (see Grenfell and Hunt's ed. 1904) the word μακάριος can be restored, although the subject of the Beatitude has been lost. Prof. Adeney directs attention to the presence in the Acts of Paul and Thekla of a number of fresh Beatitudes. St. Paul is represented as giving utterance not only to some of the Beatitudes of Jesus, but also to such sayings as these—

'Blessed are they that keep themselves chaste, because they shall be called the temple of God.'

'Blessed be they who keep the baptism, for they shall rest in Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.'

The writer of this apocryphal book imitates our Lord's Beatitudes, and expresses in this form both Pauline teaching and his own ascetic doctrine (Expositor, 5th series [1895], vol. ii, p. 375).

2. The Group of Sayings.—When the word 'Beatitude' is used in the plural, it refers as a rule to those sayings of Jesus, grouped at the beginning of the Sermon on the Mount, in which He solemnly announces who are the blessed in the Kingdom of heaven. Early examples of its use in this significance are—'The eight beatitudes that of spryngeth of grace' (1531, Pilgr. Perf.); 'This quihik S. Ambrose callis our Lord's beatitudes' (1588, H. King Canisius' Catech.). In his De Offic. (i. 6) Ambrose says: 'He octo Christi Beatitudines sunt quasi Christi Paradoxa.'

iv. THE BEATITUDES IN MATTHEW AND LUKE.

—1. Their number in Matthew.—The 'Beatitudes' are recorded in Mt 5<sup>1-11</sup> and Lk 6<sup>20-22</sup>. In regard to the number of Beatitudes in Matthew there have been diverse opinions; the decision depends upon the view taken of vv. 10-12.

v. 10. 'Blessed are they that have been persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.'

v. 11. 'Blessed are ye when men shall reproach you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake.'

v. 12. 'Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you.'

The seven Beatitudes in vv. 3-9 describe the graces of the Christian character; these are followed in v. 10 by another Beatitude which assumes that those who possess these graces, and are, therefore, not of the world, will, so long as they are in the world, be exposed to its hatred. This general truth is first expressed; it is immediately afterwards brought home to the disciples as our Lord, using 'ye' instead of 'they,' reaffirms (v. 11) the blessedness of His hearers, should they endure reproach for His sake. If this interpretation be correct, there are eight Beatitudes in Matthew. In the first seven we behold the several rainbow hues of the light which reflects in human conduct the glory of the heavenly Father (v. 12); in the eighth that light is seen in conflict with the darkness it is destined to overcome.

If Mt 5<sup>10-12</sup> is not counted as a Beatitude, the number of perfection—seven—is obtained. This course is followed by some because the eighth Beatitude is not a declaration of the blessedness of character, and by others because its promise of the Kingdom of heaven merely repeats what has already been said. Augustine speaks of a 'heptad of Beatitudes,' and regards the eighth as returning upon the first ('octava tanquam ad caput redit'). Bruce refers to the 'seven golden sentences' which sum up the felicity of the Kingdom, though he afterwards enumerates eight classes of the blessed (The Training of the Twelve, p. 42). Wordsworth (ibid.) prefers the mystical significance of eight to similar interpretations of seven; for if seven is the number of rest after labour, 'eight is the number of blessedness and glory after rest'; he also dwells on the annexing of the promise of the Kingdom of heaven to the eighth Beatitude as well as to the first: 'This is the consummation of blessedness; the recurring note of the beatific octave; also in the eighth Beatitude the word "blessed" is repeated for the sake of greater certainty and emphasis.'

This repetition of the word 'blessed' in what is here called the eighth Beatitude is the ground assigned by some for dividing it into two Beatitudes. Wright (Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek, p. 161) speaks of nine Beatitudes. In his judgment, however, the ninth, which is longer and in the second person, is an 'explanatory enlargement'; he is also disposed to regard the eighth short Beatitude as 'an editorial compilation, for the second half of it is repeated from the first Beatitude, and the commencement is an abbreviation of the ninth.' The so-called ninth Beatitude is best regarded as an enlargement of the eighth, but no sufficient reason is given for rejecting the eighth.

Delitzsch is alone in holding that there are ten Beatitudes in Matthew to correspond with the Decalogue. To obtain the number ten he not only counts vv. 9 and 11 as the eighth and ninth Beatitudes respectively, but also treats v. 12 as the tenth Beatitude. The words 'rejoice and be exceeding glad' (v. 12) are regarded as equivalent to 'blessed.'

2. The relation of the two versions.—Only four Beatitudes are given in Lk 6<sup>20-22</sup>; the relation of these to the eight Beatitudes in Matthew is one of the unsolved problems in NT criticism. The difference between Matthew and Luke is shown in the following table, the variations in Luke being printed in italics:—

The chief elements in the problem to be solved are: the presence in Matthew alone of Beatitudes 3, 5, 6, 7; Luke's variations from Matthew's wording of Beatitudes 1, 2, 4, 8, especially (a) the absence from 1 and 4 of words which make blessedness depend upon spiritual conditions, and (b) the use of the second person throughout. This problem is part of a larger problem, viz., Do Matthew and Luke report the same discourse? and if they do, which account is the more primitive? (See art. SERMON ON THE MOUNT).

The view that Matthew and Luke narrate two different discourses is now generally abandoned. This theory accounts for all the variations, but it leaves unexplained the remarkable resemblances in the general purport of the teaching, the frequent identity of phraseology, and the close agreement of the introductory narratives and of the closing parables. Therefore, the question to be asked in regard to the two versions of the Beatitudes is part of the larger question: How is it that in two reports of the same discourse there are so many variations?

Some modern critics distinguish between primary and secondary Beatitudes, though different reasons are assigned in support of this distinction. (1) Wright (op. cit.) regards Beatitudes 1, 2, 4 as primary; they belong to 'the proto-Matthews,' because they are also found in Luke. The other Beatitudes have been 'added at different dates as recollections occurred.' But the non-occurrence of a saying in Luke is no proof that it is 'secondary,' unless it is certain that Luke is more primitive, and not a selection from the more original tradition in Matthew. (2) Weiss (in Meyer's Com.) describes the same three Beatitudes as authentic, because they point to the righteousness of the Kingdom as the summum bonum; the first to righteousness as not yet possessed, the second to the want of righteousness as a cause of sorrow, and the fourth to righteousness as an object of desire. The reasoning is entirely subjective. Weiss tests the authenticity of a Beatitude by its accord with his theory that the theme of the discourse is the nature of true and false righteousness; on his own principles other Beatitudes might be proved authentic. The seventh might be said to point to the righteousness whose work is peace.

When the narratives in Matthew and Luke are taken as they stand, the question remains: Which version of the Beatitudes more correctly represents the actual words of Christ?

That the shorter form in Luke is more genuine is the opinion of many scholars. Dr. E. A. Abbott thinks 'it is more probable that Luke represents the letter of the original words of Jesus more closely than Matthew, however much the latter may better represent the spirit of them' (Enc. Brit. x. 798<sup>a</sup>). But the words which better represent the spirit of the teaching may also rest on the authority of Jesus. Though the two versions represent the same discourse, the one discourse may not have been delivered with such formality as many theories imply. It is more than probable that the longer form in Matthew omits some of our Lord's comments on these sayings. The different versions of the eighth Beatitude in Matthew point to this conclusion. The declaration of blessedness having been made in its most general form, it is then reaffirmed and expounded in its special bearing upon the men to whom our Lord was speaking. The Apostles will have the privilege of bearing 'the reproach of Christ,' and as sharers in the experience of the prophets they shall receive the prophets' reward (cf. He 11<sup>29</sup>). Other Beatitudes may in like manner have been restated in a more specific form. For example, all who would enter the Kingdom of heaven need to be told that its blessings are bestowed on the poor in spirit; but it is to His true disciples and not to the multitude that Jesus says, 'Ye, in your poverty, are blessed.' The argument for the primitive character of Luke is stated (Expositor, 5th series [1895], vol. ii.) succinctly and forcefully by Professor Adeney. The sayings of which Matthew gives a longer version than Luke are described as expositions of 'the hidden truth contained in the shorter utterances.' The Beatitudes peculiar to Matthew are not relegated to an editor, but are held to be the true teaching of our Lord, though probably not in their original context. The literary problem is complicated by the absence from Matthew of the four Woes, which in Luke (6<sup>34-36</sup>) correspond to the four Beatitudes. The theory that Luke gives the more primitive form involves the assumption that Matthew omitted the Woes and inserted an equal number of Blessings. Yet Wright's conclusion, after a thorough study of the Synoptic problem, is that the Woes in Luke are either 'conflated from another source' or 'editorial inversions of the Blessings.'

The theory that Matthew gives the Beatitudes in their more primitive form has the support of Tholuck and Meyer among older writers, and more recently of H. Holtzmann and Beyschlag. On the authority of one who probably heard these words of Blessing, the Beatitudes peculiar to Matthew are regarded not only as authentic sayings of Jesus, but also as parts of the original discourse. Holtzmann also holds that Luke modified the language of Matthew in accordance with his own ascetic views (Hand-Comm., 'Die Synop.,' p. 100); but this supposition is not essential to the theory. The shorter form of some Beatitudes in Luke may faithfully represent the words of Christ, perhaps His own special application of a general truth to His disciples. Dr. Bruce, who has no bias in favour of 'antiquated Harmonistic,' suggests that, as a critical description of Mt 5-7, 'The Teaching on the Hill' is probably more correct than 'The Sermon on the Mount'; 'teaching' (διδασχῆ) as distinguished from 'preaching' (κηρυγμα) implies both the announcement of a theme and its expansion. It follows that two forms of a Beatitude may be authentic, 'the one as theme, the other as comment.' According to this view, the theme of the first Beatitude is given in Luke, but in Matthew 'one of the expansions, not necessarily the only one.' It is of little moment whether the shorter form is primary, i. e. the enunciation of a theme afterwards expounded by our Lord; or secondary, i. e. His own narrowing of a general assertion previously made. On either supposition, Luke, 'while faithfully reproducing at least a part of our Lord's teaching on the hill,' may state that teaching 'not in its original setting, but readapted so as to serve the practical purpose of Christian instruction' (The Expositor's Greek Test., vol. i. pp. 94 ff., 509).

3. Order and connexion of thought.—The order of the second and third Beatitudes is reversed in Codex Beza and the Vulgate; so also Clem. Alex., Aug., Orig., Eus., Greg. of Nyssa. Tholuck thinks that this change from the best authenticated order was made on mystical grounds; either because the promise of the lower good should immediately follow that of heaven (Orig.), or because τῆ represents mystically a higher stage of blessedness (Greg. of Nyssa).

In the generally accepted order of the Beatitudes a sequence of thought may be traced, though the 'scale of grace and glory' is perhaps not so carefully 'graduated' as some have supposed (cf. Amb. on Lk 6). The first grace—poverty of spirit—is the germ of all the rest; the first and last Beatitude is the all-comprising word—'theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' The six Beatitudes that intervene unfold different aspects of Christian virtue and set forth its peculiar blessedness, for each blessing promised is the fitting reward of the inward grace, and each is included in the promise of the Kingdom. Dr. Fairbairn (Studies in the Life of Christ) divides the Beatitudes into two classes—'those of resignation and those of hope'; the first four Beatitudes are placed in the former class, the last four in the latter class. This division is simple, and serves to emphasize the distinction between the passive and active graces of the Christian character. Yet it seems better to distinguish the eighth Beatitude from the other seven; it differs from them essentially, for it attaches blessedness to endurance of opposition and not to inward qualities, to conduct and not to character, to something a man does and not to what he is. In the seven Beatitudes on character, there are two triads. The first three, as Dr. Dykes points out (The Manifesto of the King, p. 101), are closely connected and refer to negative graces; in the last three, positive graces are intimately combined as elements of righteousness; the fourth or central Beatitude is the link between these first groups. 'As the first three, the trilogy of spiritual humiliation, lead up to and produce that blessed hunger after Divine righteousness; so the second three, a trilogy of characteristic Christian graces, are the fulfilment of the soul's hunger.'

With a 'proposal of the end—blessedness,' says Jeremy Taylor, 'our excellent and gracious Lawgiver begins His sermon' (The Great Exemplar, pt. 2, sec. xl.). Beatitude is the essence of Christianity, its beginning and end. The 'Beatitudes' reveal the nature of true blessedness and the conditions of its attainment; they reflect the light which shines from the Hebrew Scriptures that declare the blessedness of the righteous; but they are illumined not only by the Prophets and Psalmists who went before, but also by the Apostles and Teachers who come after. Wernle says with true insight: 'Jesus Himself made of Christianity a religion of hope. . . . If Paul in a later age preaches the religion of longing in words of enthralling eloquence, he is merely continuing in his own language the Beatitudes of Jesus' (The Beginnings of Christianity, I, 68).

BEAUTY.—This term is applied alike to the physical grace of men and animals, to external nature and works of art, and to moral character and action. In every relationship it is a quality capable of imparting exquisite pleasure, and a power that commands and captivates. The appreciation of beauty for its own intrinsic charm was a special characteristic of the Greeks, to whom the world was a wonder of order and adaptation, and who found an element of worship in the beauty that was a prerogative of the gods. With the Israelites, and in the East generally, beauty was esteemed rather as a sign of dignity and noble birth (Jg 8<sup>24</sup>), and beautiful things were valued as the accessories of official decoration. Much in the Gospels that we feel to be beautiful and describe by that name, is there specialized by such terms as 'grace,' 'glory,' 'excellency,' as indicating in each particular case the arresting feature of charm, sublimity, or pre-eminence that makes it beautiful. Thus in the appeal, 'If God so clothe the grass of the field' (Lk 12<sup>28</sup>), and in the declaration concerning the lilies of the field, that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of them (v. 37), the beauty was due to external investiture rather than to any inherent fact of symmetry and proportion. So when the merchantman is described as seeking goodly pearls (Mt 13<sup>45</sup>), and the righteousness of Christ's disciples is expected to exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 23<sup>23</sup>), the quality of beauty arises from the surprising rarity and recognized pre-eminence of the things referred to.

1. Personal appearance of Christ.—Much has been written about the face of Christ. Tradition, gathering its data from the apocryphal 'Letter of Lentulus,' the portrait which Jesus is said to have sent to king Abgar of Edessa, the story of Veronica's veil, the pictures and eikons of the early and mediæval Church, and accumulated literary traditions, has given to Art its typical presentation of Christ's countenance. The subject, however, is one about which there is no certain information. On the mount of Transfiguration the three disciples had a brief glimpse of the heavenly beauty that then shone out from the face of Christ. But those who were then eye-witnesses of His majesty (2 P 1<sup>16</sup>) tell us that the glorious vision surpassed all description. It remained with them as a restful and inspiring memory, like the 'unspeakable words' of St. Paul's ecstatic experience (2 Co 12<sup>4</sup>).

2. Beauty in external nature.—It is profoundly suggestive of the reality of the Incarnation that He by whom the worlds were made spoke so little about them. When He called Himself and His disciples 'the light of the world' (Jn 8<sup>12</sup>, Mt 5<sup>14</sup>), the allusion to light was not in the spirit of Milton's sublime apostrophe (Par. Lost, iii, 1 ff.), but with reference to its conflict with darkness. When He pointed to the redness of the evening sky (Mt 16<sup>27</sup>), it was not to speak of a Presence immanent in the light of setting suns, but to express the feeling of wonder that those who could draw a practical lesson from something so remote could not hear the footsteps of moral destiny so close behind themselves. And so in the instances of the trail, beautiful grass and the lilies of the field (Mt 6<sup>28</sup>), the allusion served as an argument for God's still greater care of things more precious.

3. Ethical beauty.—The life of Christ witnessed in every detail to His inspiring and impressive personality. It is surely a torso presentation of that life that would make 'sweet reasonableness' its prevailing characteristic. Rather it is marked by the absence of that philosophic detachment that would live and let live. In His mind truth took precedence even of the heavenly hope, and He assured His disciples that if that hope were a sweet but baseless imagination, He would have told them (Jn 14<sup>7</sup>). He had come as light into the world, and questionings not only of the defiant darkness (Jn 1<sup>9</sup>), but of the bewildering twilight (16<sup>17</sup>), sprang up around His path. In His presence men were greater and less than they had been before. Even in the days of His flesh those who were Christ's were impelled to put on Christ, and were afterwards recognized as having been with Him (Ac 4<sup>13</sup>). He exemplified in His own life the principle by which His disciples were to live and extend His kingdom. His outward power was the measure of His inward submission. He came not to do His own will (Jn 6<sup>38</sup>). It was when He was lifted up that He would draw all men unto Himself (12<sup>32</sup>). Even so the life of the Christian has its condition of complete and continuous surrender, and in the service of the gospel it is found that men do not yield to the messenger, but to what they see that he yields to.

In the course of Christ's life on earth, along with the general impression of His teaching and ministry there were various incidents that showed in a special manner with what tender sympathy He took upon Him our nature and bore our infirmities. Among these may be mentioned the conversation with the Samaritan woman at Jacob's well (Jn 4), the blessing of the little children that were almost sent away (Mt 19<sup>13</sup>), the touching of the leper in the act of healing (Mt 8<sup>3</sup>), and the words of hope concerning Nineveh (Mt 12<sup>41</sup>) and Tyre (Lk 10<sup>34</sup>), and those who should come into the Kingdom from the distant East and West (Mt 8<sup>11</sup>). On the cross we have the prayer for His persecutors (Lk 23<sup>34</sup>), His comradeship with the penitent thief (v. 41), and the commending of His mother to the care of the disciple John (Jn 19<sup>26</sup>).

Also in the lives of others, chiefly of women, He met with intuitions and actions which through His affinity of soul were noticed and commended by Him as bearing the stamp of moral and spiritual beauty. Such were the return of the Samaritan leper to give glory to God (Lk 17<sup>16</sup>); the humble insistence of the Syro-Phoenician woman (Mk 7<sup>28</sup>); the courage and consecration of the widow who gave her mites to the Lord (12<sup>42</sup>); the act of the sinful woman who bathed His feet with her tears (Lk 7<sup>38</sup>), and of her also who unsealed, as for His burial, the alabaster vase of precious ointment (Jn 12).

BED.—The word 'bed' (κλίνη, κλῆβητος, κούρη) is found in the Gospels only in Mt 9<sup>9</sup>, Mk 2<sup>19</sup> 8<sup>23</sup>, Lk 3<sup>18</sup> 8<sup>11</sup> 17<sup>14</sup>, Jn 5<sup>12</sup>. There is little here to indicate the kind of bed, or beds, that were in use among the Hebrews in the time of Christ. Among the ancient Hebrews, however, as among other Oriental peoples of that day, the bed usually consisted of a wadded quilt, or thin mattress, to be used, according to the season, or the condition of the owner, with or without covering (cf. Ex 22<sup>27</sup> 'For that [the outer garment worn in the daytime] is his only covering: it is his garment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep?'). The very poor often made their bed of the skins of animals, old cloaks or rugs, or slept in their ordinary clothing on the bare ground floor, as they do to-day in the East.

The bedding ordinarily in use among Orientals now is, doubtless, much the same as it was in Christ's day: a mat made of rushes or straw to be laid down first; sheep or goat skins, or a quilt stuffed with hair or vegetable fibre, or both, to lie upon; and a covering consisting often only of the 'cloak,' or outer garment, of the poor man, but sometimes in summer of some light stuff in addition, or in winter of skins, or some heavier quilted stuff.

Various allusions are made in the Gospels to beds that could be carried: 'Arise, take up thy bed, and go into thine house' (Mt 9<sup>9</sup>); 'Rise, take up thy bed, and walk'; 'And immediately the man . . . took up his bed, and walked' (Jn 5<sup>8-9</sup>); 'Behold men bringing on a bed a man that was palsied' (Lk 5<sup>18</sup> RV). St. Luke and St. Mark tell us that on this occasion, when, because of the crowd in the house, the four men could not reach Jesus with the paralytic, they took him up on the house-top, broke through the roof, and 'let him down through the tiling with the couch (κλῆβητος; in v. 18, however, the word κλίνη, 'bed,' is used) into the midst before Jesus' (Lk 5<sup>19</sup>), or, as St. Mark puts it, 'let down the bed (κλῆβητος) wherein the sick of the palsy lay' (24).

For ordinary use at night the bed was laid on the floor, generally on the mat, which served to keep it off the ground, frequently on a light portable frame of wood which served a like purpose; but sometimes on a more elevated bedstead ('under the bed,' Mk 4<sup>21</sup> RV). In the morning the bedding was all rolled up, and, after being aired and sunned, was put aside on the raised platform, or packed away for the day in a chest or closet. A bedstead of any pretensions was rare among the Hebrews, and was looked upon as a luxury; the nearest approach to it being in general the raised platform on the side of the room. The richness of beds and of bedsteads among some of the Asiatic peoples, however, was at least equal to that of the Greeks and Romans (cf. Pr 7<sup>16-17</sup>, 1 S 28<sup>23</sup>). The degree of richness would depend, of course, upon the wealth of the family and the style of the house or tent, as it does to-day among the Bedawin.

Usually a room was set apart as a bedroom, where the whole family slept. 'My children are with me in bed, I cannot rise and give thee' (Lk 11<sup>28</sup>). Among the poorest a portion of the single room occupied by the family was set apart for sleeping, and, generally, this was raised above the level of the floor. When the house was of two storeys, the beds were laid in one of the rooms of the upper storey, or, during the summer, preferably, on the flat roof. See, further, art. COUCH.

BEEZEBUB OR BEELZEBUL.—It is strange that this name has never yet been satisfactorily explained; stranger still that no trace of it has been found as yet among the scores of Jewish names for angels and spirits. The first part of the name is clear enough; it is the Aramaic form of the Hebrew 'Baal'; nor is there anything strange in the dropping of λ before β in the MSS followed by modern editors like Westcott-Hort and Weiss (Chrysostom in his art. 'Beelzebub' in the Evangel. Bihl. finds 'this scepticism as to λ in βελ paradoxical,' 'the word βεεζεβουλ inexplicable and hardly pronounceable,' and urges against it 'the famous passage Mt 10<sup>23</sup>, where the οικουσεσθους implies the speaker's consciousness that βυζ is one element in the title,' but his objection completely misses the mark. The dropping of the λ is merely phonetic; cf. in Josephus βεεζεβουλ in codd. MVRG for βελζεβουλ (BJ iii. 25), Βεεζουρος for Βελζεουρος (c. Apion. i. 124), Βεεζουρος for Βελζεουρος (Ant. xiv. 330); 'Αμεσαδ in Cod. Q of Dn 11<sup>11</sup> [Theod.] for 'Αμεσαδ; 'Philadelphia' in the Syriac Version of Euseb.'s HE, etc.* More difficult is the change of β into λ at the end of the word, supposing the common explanation to be correct, that the name comes from βελζεβουλ. It has been explained as an intentional cacophonous corruption (= 'god of the dung') or a dialectical or phonetic variation (cf. Beliar for Belial or Bab el-Mandef for Mandef). The spelling with δ was retained in the NT by Luther, though his Greek text had λ, and by RV in text; it was introduced by Jerome in the Vulgate, see the Index of Wordsworth-White, where 15 Latin spellings of the name are given, and cf. Jerome's remark in OS 66, 11: 'in fine ergo nominis b litera legenda est, non l; musca enim zebub vocatur.' λ is even found in Cod. 243 of the text of Symmachus in 2 K 1<sup>2</sup>; but see the Syriac Hexapla in v. 5, and note, what has generally been overlooked, that the Septuagint took זבוב not זבוב זבוב for the name of the god of Ekron: ἐπισημαίεται ἐν τῇ Βάβυλ (dative) Μύσαν (accusative) θεὸν Ἀκκαρῶν; likewise Jos.: πρὸς τῆν Ἀκκαρῶν θεὸν Μύσαν, τούτο γὰρ ἦν ὄνομα τῷ θεῷ.

On the fly in worship and legend see Plin. HN x. 28, 75; Pausan. Descr. Gr. v. xiv. 1; Elian, Nat. Anim. v. 17, xl. 8; Usener, Götternamen, p. 260. There were Jewish legends about flies, such as that there were none in the temple (Aboth

* The best analogy is the Syr. name זבוב, 'son of the Bel of heaven,' explained by Barheb. as 'he with four names.'

v. 8); Elisha was recognized as a prophet by the woman of Shunem, because no fly crept over his place at the table (Berakh. 10b); on the yezer ha-rá as a fly see Berakh. 61a, Targ. Jer. on Ec 10<sup>1</sup>). The supposition that the name corresponds to Aramaic ܥܘܘܢܝܢ 'enemy' is not very likely, nor the other that it is the Baal of the heavenly mansion who became the Baal of the nether world (J.A.S., 1878, pp. 220-221). Later Jews identified Baal-zebul with Baal-berith, and told that some would carry an image of him (in the shape of a fly) in their pockets, producing it and kissing it from time to time (Shab. 83b, 83b). Procopius states (ad 2 K 1): πλην ἔστι μαθεῖν ἐξ ὧν Εὐσέβιος ἐν Ἀρχῇ τῆς Ἐσαγγελικῆς Προσταρακευῆς ἐκ τῶν Φιδωνος παραίθερα, ὡς δαίμων ἦν, οὕτω λεγόμενος μάλλον δὲ γυνὴ παλαιὰ τις, ἢν ἑθεσώθησαν. Zahn (on Mt 12<sup>24</sup>) lays stress on the fact that the article is missing before ἀρχοντι τῶν δαιμόνων ('a prince of the devils, not the prince'); but the definite article is found in Mark and Luke, and in Mt 9<sup>34</sup> (if this verse be not a later addition) where several Latin documents have the name.

How scanty is our knowledge of NT times, when such a name, which appears quite popular in the NT, defies as yet all explanation, and is not found anywhere else! Origen on John xix. (p. 315, ed. Preuschen) remarks: πάντως γὰρ δαιμόνων τι μεταθήσειαν καὶ τοῦ ἀρχοντος αὐτῶν, ὃ ὄνομα Βελ-ζεβοῦλ' ταῦτα δὲ οὐ πᾶν τι ἐν τοῖς φερομένοις κείται ἐπιβάλλας.

BEGETTING.—

The idea of begetting, as applied in the natural or in a metaphorical or spiritual sense, is expressed in the Gospels by the common words γενέσθαι, 'to beget' (which occurs in the LXX as the equivalent of the Heb. יָלַד, meaning either 'to beget' or 'to bear', and is similarly used in the NT); γεννητός, properly 'begotten', but which, like the verb, is also found in the sense of 'born'; μονογενής, 'only-begotten.' The common word γενέσθαι, with its derivatives, is, as might be expected, used to express natural begetting and natural birth. So μονογενής, used in the Fourth Gospel only of the relation of Christ to God the Father, occurs in Lk 7<sup>34</sup> of the son of the widow of Nain, meaning simply 'only son' (cf. 52, Jairus' daughter, and 628 the demoniac boy); and γεννητός in the sense of 'born' in Mt 11<sup>11</sup>, Lk 7<sup>28</sup> ('among those that are born of women'). In Matthew and Luke again, ἐκ γεννητός and ἐκ γεννημένων are used to describe the miraculous conception of our Lord in the womb of the Virgin Mary; Mt 19<sup>16</sup> has 'that which is conceived in her (AVm 'begotten') is of the Holy Ghost', and Lk 19<sup>2</sup> 'that which shall be born of thee (RVm 'is begotten') shall be called the Son of God.' In both cases obviously the expression will bear the rendering 'which is begotten' or 'which is conceived', according to the ordinary sense in which the verb is known to occur.

The Messianic and the spiritual uses of the words for begetting are those which alone call for remark in connexion with the Gospels and the NT generally. In the Gospels, and there particularly in the Gospel of John, we find them applied to Christ and His relation to God the Father, and, in connexion with that reference, to the case of believers who, receiving Christ by faith, are, in virtue of the new principle of life thus imparted to them, born again, become children of God. This latter thought is suggested in the Gospels, and dwelt upon at length in the Epistles.

We may regard as the locus classicus of the theological or spiritual application of the idea of begetting, as we find it in the Gospels, the well-known passage in the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel: 'No man hath seen God at any time; the only-begotten Son (ὁ μονογενὴς υἱός),* who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him' (Jn 1<sup>18</sup>). Here the use of the term μονογενής in this connexion at once raises the question as to the precise sense in which it is applied to Christ, whether it refers to His being by Divine nature and essence Son of God, or merely to His manifestation in time as Messiah, as one specially chosen to reveal to mankind the will of the invisible God. A little study of the history of the term 'only-begotten' shows that it is by no means peculiar to the Gospels, but is rather a familiar Messianic term, which depends, for a clear understanding of the thoughts denoted and connoted by it, upon what, we may gather from other sources, was the national belief as to God's self-revelation in the history of grace. We are reminded, for instance, that Israel (Ex 4<sup>22</sup>, Hos 10<sup>10</sup>), the kings of Israel (1 Ch 28<sup>9</sup>), and the Messiah (Ps 2<sup>7</sup>), of whom the latter were types, were successively called sons of God, or God's firstborn. Again, St. Paul (in Ac 13<sup>33</sup>) and the Epistle to the Hebrews (1<sup>5</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>) quote Ps 2<sup>7</sup> as a Messianic prophecy which had been fulfilled in the mission of Jesus: 'Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee' (σήμερον γενένηκά σε).

In view of this Messianic, spiritual application of the idea referred to, the words of Ps 2<sup>7</sup> have been supposed to allude to some typical king like David or Solomon, and the expression, 'Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee,' to denote an act performed by God on the person addressed, as by constituting him king. He had moulded his life afresh and set him in a special relation to Himself. Applied to Christ, this might be taken as referring to such an event as the Resurrection, with reference to which St. Paul says in Ro 1<sup>4</sup> that by it God 'declared him to be the Son of God with power.' This might be accepted as a fairly adequate account of the Messianic ideas held by the early disciples, and of the interpretation which they were likely to put upon the passage in the Second Psalm, when they studied it, as St. Paul did, by the light of the Resurrection of Jesus. They must have been largely influenced by traditional opinions on the subject of the Messiah, and would therefore interpret the words, 'This day have I begotten thee,' as referring not to any event in a past eternity or to any period prior to the Incarnation of the Son of God, but to some definite point in the history of His manifestation to the world, as, for example, to the period of the birth of Jesus, or of the Baptism, when the voice from heaven declared Him to be God's Beloved Son, or, as St. Paul appears to teach in his discourse in Acts (13<sup>33</sup>) and in his Epistle to the Romans, to the period of the Resurrection.

Such an interpretation, however, of the passage referred to as we find in the teachings of St. Paul and of the Epistle to the Hebrews, does not adequately explain the language of the Fourth Gospel or the author's allusions to the pre-existence of Christ as Logos, and to His relation to the Father as the Only-begotten Son. The Evangelist speaks in such a way of the nature and mission of the Logos or the Son of God as plainly to assume the eternal pre-existence of that Logos or Son. When John, speaking for himself, says in the Prologue (1<sup>14</sup>), 'The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father,' the subject of the sentence is He of whom he has just spoken as having been in the beginning with God, and as having been God's agent in the work of Creation. Again, in v. 18: 'No man hath seen God at any time; the only-begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him,' the expression 'which is in the bosom of the Father' is apparently meant for a further explanation or definition of the expression 'only-begotten Son,' the present participle ὢν signifying, as Alford puts it, essentially united without any particular regard to time, while the peculiar construction εἰς τὸν κόλπον, literally 'into' not 'in' 'the bosom' (as might have been expected — εἰς τὸν κόλπον), is, as that commentator again points out, 'a pregnant construction, involving the beget-ting of the Son and His being the lógos of the Father,—His proceeding forth from God.' 'It is a similar expression on the side of His Unity with the Father to ἐκεί παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ on the side of His manifestation to men.' The meaning of the passage is that Christ, who is by nature the Son of God, begotten before all worlds, is He who alone could and did declare the nature and the will of that God whom no man hath seen or could have known apart from such a revelation. Here it is evident that the begetting referred to by the use of the word 'only-begotten' (μονογενής) is different from that which is spoken of in the Second Psalm.

Again, in His discourse to Nicodemus, Jesus Himself alludes clearly to His pre-existence and essential Sonship when He says that God 'gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life'; and in the next sentence it is added, 'For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world' (Jn 3<sup>16, 17</sup>). There the words 'gave' and 'sent' imply pre-existence on the part of the Son. Similar references occur elsewhere in the discourses of Jesus as recorded in the Fourth Gospel, for example, that of Jn 6<sup>46</sup>. 'Not that any man hath seen the Father, save he which is of God (lit. 'from God,' παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ), he hath seen the Father,' with which cf. v. 28 'I came down from heaven,' and v. 62 'What and if ye shall see the Son of Man ascend up where he was before?' passages which, as H. Holtzmann points out, 'connect the historic with the preter-historic being of the pre-existent Logos—the Son of God, that is, in the theological, not the Messianic sense.'

A comparison of these passages in the Fourth Gospel with Ps 2<sup>7</sup> shows that the thought of 'begetting,' as it affects the relations between the Father and the Son, has more than one meaning. Dörner notes even in the Synoptic Gospels three senses in which it is applied—the physical, the ethical, and the official. If we extend our view so as to include the Fourth Gospel, a similar division suggests itself: the theological, or, as it is sometimes called, the metaphysical; the official or Messianic; and the ethical or spiritual. Jesus as Logos is Son of God by nature. Essential Sonship, eternal generation, is predicated of Him. Then, in a special official sense, His setting apart to the Messianic office is, according to a familiar Scripture figure (cf. Ps 2<sup>7</sup>), regarded as 'a begetting,' that is, the inauguration of a new vocation or a new order of things. This notion of begetting is practically the idea conveyed by the word 'Messiah' or 'Christ' itself, and by what Jesus Himself says, according to Jn 10<sup>36</sup>, 'Say ye of him, whom the Father hath sanctified, and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest; because I said, I am the Son of God?' Lastly, the thought of begetting is applied in the sense of a Divine communication of life, as when the Spirit of God descended and abode upon Christ. Thus when the Baptist saw the sign, the dove from heaven alighting upon Jesus, he tells us, 'And I saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God' (Jn 1<sup>34</sup>). This third aspect is important as illustrating the point of connexion between the Sonship of Christ and that of believers, the Divine Sonship based on a generation, that is, a Divine communication of life. Each of these aspects has its own significance.

1. The theological is associated with the apologetic aim of the Fourth Gospel. It was an important part of the object of the Evangelist to enable the Church to rid herself of the influence of the mischievous speculations of the time, of a humanitarian Ebionism on the one side, and of Gnosticism on the other. That Jesus is God from the beginning,—eternally God,—was his answer to those who would detract from the Divine dignity of Jesus. Again, by his doctrine of Sonship, the application of the thought of generation to the relation of God the Father to Christ the Son, St. John gave a new meaning to the expression 'Logos,' which represented a well-known philosophical conception long current in the East and among the later Platonists and Stoics, while the speculations of Philo and the Alexandrian School had brought it into still greater prominence. According to the Fourth Gospel, Christ as Logos is the Revealer of the Father, not as Philo and others imagined, as being an 'emanation,' an outflow from the Inaccessible Deity, a shadowy existence to be described only by analogies and metaphors, or by mere negations, but as being the Son of God, who shared the Divine nature and glory. One who came at the Father's bidding to do the Father's will. What that mysterious 'begetting' meant, in virtue of which the Son of God was Son of God, John did not attempt to explain. To him it was a Divine mystery which none could penetrate. It was enough for him that God so loved the world as to send forth His Son, sharer of His Divine nature, for that world's salvation. Thus, according to the testimony of St. John, Jesus 'is μονογενής, the Only-begotten, as Logos—He ἀπεκάλυψε as μονογενής through the Incarnation' (Beyschlag).

2. Again, in all four Gospels the idea of begetting is applied in an official or Messianic sense in connexion with Christ's actual appearing among men and with His redemptive mission. The three Synoptists record the Divine proclamation with which, at the Baptism, the first stage of Christ's ministry was solemnly inaugurated: 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased' (Mt 3<sup>17</sup>). The same Evangelists testify to the events of the Transfiguration, when again the voice from heaven addressed the disciples in similar language, as if to inaugurate the final stage of Christ's ministry (Mt 17<sup>5</sup>). In the latter case the addition of the words 'hear ye him' to the original form of the Divine testimony would naturally suggest to persons familiar, as the disciples probably were, with the current Messianic interpretation of Ps 2<sup>7</sup>, the thought of the Divine decree there spoken of, which constituted the subject of the prophecy King of God's people, having a Divine right to their loyalty and obedience. In the Fourth Gospel this official aspect of the idea of begetting in connexion with Christ is expressed in those passages in which Jesus speaks of Himself as One sent of God, and by that mission brought into a new relation to God and to mankind. That 'sanctification' and that 'sending' of which He speaks (10<sup>36</sup>) correspond to the begetting referred to by the Psalmist, though in this case they point to the Incarnation, and not, as in Ro 1<sup>4</sup>, to the Resurrection. In illustration of this we may compare with the passages already quoted in another connexion (Jn 3<sup>17, 6<sup>38, 44, 62</sup></sup>) such utterances as these: 'I proceeded and came forth from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me' (8<sup>12</sup>); 'Ye have believed that I came out from God. . . . I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world' (15<sup>27, 28</sup>). 'Sending forth' and 'coming forth' appear, according to the Fourth Gospel, to have been favourite expressions in the mouth of Jesus with which to describe His Messianic commission, and that act of Divine grace which was, as it were, the genesis of the New Dispensation—the reign of 'grace and truth' inaugurated by Christ as Messiah; as St. John himself laid special stress upon the Incarnation of the Logos as an event which meant the manifestation of that 'life' (1<sup>4</sup>) which 'was the light of men.' The thought is the same. The idea—coming from heaven, being sent of God—is practically identical with that of 'became flesh.'

In this Messianic sense, then, the thought of 'begetting' may fitly apply to the beginning of Christ's manifestation in history.

3. The third aspect is the spiritual or ethical. In Christ, as the Only-begotten, the proofs of the Divine Sonship are found in His absolute sinlessness (Jn 8<sup>46</sup>), in that He did always those things which pleased God (8<sup>29</sup>); that there was perfect harmony between Christ and the Father in all things, in willing and in working, and in the fact that Jesus was habitually conscious of the Father's presence, so that during the season of His sorest trial, when He was deserted by His disciples, He was 'not alone, for the Father was with him' (Jn 16<sup>29</sup>). This aspect of the doctrine of the Divine Sonship of Jesus is of great interest and importance in connexion with the idea of 'begetting,' being the point at which the doctrine of the sonship of believers is linked on to that of the Sonship of Christ Himself. It is in this connexion that St. John introduces at once the conception of Christ as the Word made flesh, and that of the regeneration of believers. The two thoughts are indeed, in the Prologue and elsewhere, so closely related that the one almost imperceptibly shades off into the other. Thus (1<sup>12</sup>) we read, 'As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God'; (v. <sup>13</sup>) 'which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.' At this point the Evangelist proceeds at once to state the doctrine of the Incarnation of the Divine Logos. As has been remarked, 'the subject of the λογος is introduced only after we have learned what is involved in the thought of believers becoming children of God.' The same idea of the relation between the Divine descent of Christ, the Only-begotten of the Father, and the sonship of believers, is noted and emphasized in the First Epistle of John (in which the teaching of John's Gospel on this subject is worked out in greater detail), as when we read, 'If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one that doeth righteousness is born of him' (1 Jn 2<sup>29</sup>); and again, 'Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God' (3<sup>9</sup>). The relation of the Son to the Father, His Divine setting apart for the accomplishment of the Father's will, the absolute oneness of Father and Son in respect of will and of work, and the mystery of Christ's miraculous entrance into the world, being conceived by the power of the Divine Spirit, are, throughout the Gospel of John, treated as analogues of the regeneration which must be wrought out in the heart and life of all who would enter the Kingdom of God. Thus those expressions which, in the case of Christ as the Incarnate Word, or in the case of believers who share the life and the grace of Christ, speak of a Divine begetting, of a birth from above, of regeneration by the Spirit, denote a new commencement of the personal life, traceable back to a (creative) operation of God.'

* As equivalents for 'beg,' 'beggar' of EV, we find two radically different words in the text of the Gospels—on the one hand, the verb ἠσπαρτίσθαι (Mk 10<sup>46</sup>, Lk 18<sup>30</sup>), ἠσπαρτίσθαι (Lk 16<sup>5</sup>), and evident both from the references to almsgiving in the Sermon on the Mount and from the mention of beggars in connexion with places of a public character: the entrance to Jericho (Mt 20<sup>30</sup> and parallels), a city through which so many pilgrims went at festival seasons, the neighbourhood of rich men's houses (Lk 16<sup>20</sup>), and the gates of the temple (Ac 3<sup>2</sup>).

The prevalence of the beggar class was due to various causes besides indolence—to the want of any system of poor relief, to the ignorance of proper medical remedies for common diseases like ophthalmia, and to the impoverishment of Palestine under the Romans owing to cruel and excessive taxation. (For the last, see Hausrath, History of NT Times, vol. i. 188 [Eng. tr., Williams & Norgate].) Edersheim thinks that the beggar's appeal for alms may have been enforced by some such cry as 'Gain merit by me,' 'O tender-hearted, by me gain merit, to thine own benefit' (Life and Times of Jesus, vol. ii. 178). It is worthy of notice, however, that no beggar is recorded to have enforced his appeal to Christ by any reference to the merit to be gained by a favourable response to his appeal (though it must be remembered, on the other hand, that the appeal of a blind beggar to one who had power to restore his sight would naturally differ from his attitude to those from whom he merely sought an alms). It is also observable that the begging 'saint' of Mohammedan countries is not found in the Gospels.

The remark of the unjust steward in the parable (Lk 16<sup>3</sup>)—'To beg I am ashamed'—favours the conclusion that begging, under any circumstances, was regarded as an unfortunate mode of existence, and, in the case of the indolent, was condemned as strongly by public opinion as it was in the days of Jesus the son of Sirach (Sir 40<sup>28-29</sup>).

BELIEF.—Belief is the mental action, condition, or habit of trusting in or confiding in a person or a thing. Trust, confidence, reliance, dependence, faith are from this point of view aspects of belief. More narrowly considered, belief is the mental acceptance of a proposition, statement, or fact on the testimony of another, or on the ground of authority. The fact may be beyond our observation, or the statement beyond our powers of verification, yet we may believe that Britain is an island though we may never have sailed round it, and we may believe in the law of gravitation though we may not be able to follow the reasoning which proves it.

This is not the place to deal with all the phases or aspects of belief, or to trace the history of opinion on the question. It is an interesting chapter in the history of human thought, and it is of the highest importance in its practical reference. But we may only indicate the main outline of it in both respects. The contributions towards the right understanding of the province and character of belief in more recent years have been of great value. Recent psychology has become aware of the magnitude and complexity of the problem, and in the hands of such writers as Bain, James, Stout, Baldwin, and others it has received a treatment which may be described as adequate. Nor should we omit the name of Dr. James Ward, whose work in this relation is of the highest merit. These have endeavoured to mark the noun ἠσπαρτίσθαι (Jn 9<sup>8</sup> Revised Text); on the other, the adj. ἠσπαρτίσθαι (Lk 16<sup>5</sup>, 22). In the former case the root idea is that of asking (ἠσπαρτίσθαι), while ἠσπαρτίσθαι suggests the crouching or crawling (ἠσπαρτίσθαι) of a beggar. But ἠσπαρτίσθαι is the ordinary NT word for 'poor,' whether in the sense of needy (Mt 19<sup>21</sup>) or humble (Mt 6<sup>5</sup>).

off the field of belief, and to distinguish it from other mental states. Is it active or passive? Is it a state of mind which belongs to the sphere of feeling? or is it something which belongs to the sphere of action? and is it a result of the 'will to believe'? Weighty names may be adduced in favour of each of these views. But before the question is asked to what sphere of human nature belief is to be assigned, there is a previous question to be settled. Are we to give the name of belief to every mental state which relates to an object? Is every state of consciousness which arises in response to a stimulus and in relation to an object to be described as a state of belief? Can we say we believe in our sensations as we say we believe in our reasoned conclusions? The state of the question may be set forth most vividly in two characteristic descriptions of the nature of belief. Hume says: 'A belief may be most accurately described as a lively idea related to or associated with a present impression.' Professor Stout says: 'All belief involves objective control of subjective activity' (Manual of Psychology, ii. 544).

According to Hume, 'an opinion or belief is nothing but an idea that is different from a fiction, not in the nature or in the order of its parts, but in the manner of its being conceived. But when I would explain this manner, I scarce find any word that fully answers the case, but am obliged to have recourse to every one's feeling, in order to give him a perfect notion of this operation of the mind. An idea assented to feels different from a fictitious idea that the fancy presents to us; and this feeling I endeavour to explain by calling it a superior force, or vivacity, or solidity or firmness, or steadiness' (Hume's Works, i. 397 f., Green's ed.). The description of belief given by Hume is distinguished by the sense of that 'objective control of subjective activity' which, according to Professor Stout, is the mark of all belief. A closer examination of Hume's statement enables us to see that the superior force or vivacity of a belief is due not merely to the manner of conceiving it, but to a certain coerciveness which fact has and which a fancy has not. The feeling of belief is not a gratuitous addition made by the mind to the experience, it is dictated by the fact itself.

Without entering into the discussion in any detail, it is sufficient for the present purpose to say that all belief in the first place is teleological, that it is the tendency of the mind to make itself at home in the world in which it has to live. This general description includes the naive uncritical belief of the child, and the reasoned critical belief of the mature man. In its simplicity it is a postulate. It may be almost called an instinct, an expectation that the world will afford to man a place in which to live and grow and work. Be the origin and character of instinct what they may, be they due to original endowment or to the accumulated and transmitted inheritance of the race, yet the instincts are there, and are of a kind to enable life to act before individual experience has had time to work. Our organic nature is related to its environment, and it postulates an environment with which it can interact. Thus all our organic instincts which find expression in appropriate acts, such as sucking, eating, moving our limbs in response to a stimulus, and so on, are called into action on the presentation of their appropriate objects. Action begets belief, and belief is again the mental situation which leads to further action. At the outset belief is dominated by our practical needs. In truth, the new school of Humanism holds that all activities whatsoever are in the interest of the practical needs of man, and by the emphasis it has laid on this aspect it has called attention to a factor of human experience which has been too much neglected. For there is no doubt that the character of belief is to be explained, in the first place at all events, from its function in relation to the practical needs of man. And all through the experience of man, belief is an expression of human need, and is the demand which a living creature makes on the Universe for a place to live in, to grow in, and to furnish itself with what shall satisfy its need. Thus the initial postulate of belief is that it is in a world in which it may make itself at home, and the final demand of belief in developed humanity is that it shall find itself in a rational, intelligible world, in which its ideals of unity, intelligibility, beauty, and worth may and will find their realization.

Our beliefs, then, in their generality are our postulates. They set forth our expectations, our desires, our wishes. They proceed on the assumption that our needs are related to reality, and that reality has a way of satisfying our needs. In all belief there is, of course, a certain risk. We may mistake our real needs, and we may make mistakes as to the nature of reality. But the postulate is there notwithstanding. In fact, to believe that a thing exists is to act as if it existed. To believe that the properties of a thing are so and so, is to act on that supposition. Thus, apart from any theory, we all postulate a kind of uniformity of nature.

From this point of view all axioms are postulates. They are unavoidable assumptions. Students of science are familiar with these. We do not at present raise the question whether the universal formulae of science are more than postulates. They are postulates, and are demands which our nature makes on the Universe.

Our postulates, however, may mislead; they may be unwarrantable, and not unavoidable. Along, therefore, with the predisposition to believe in the reality and modes of being of the objects of experience, there goes the necessity of verification, criticism, and investigation. For postulates may be too readily made. Passing needs may be taken for permanent, and beliefs may be based on wrong impressions. Subjective hopes or fears may objectify their objects, and attribute reality to objects which have none. Thus we have beliefs which are irresistible and unavoidable. They are absolutely based in the constitution of the mind itself, and are the assumptions without which experience is impossible. Students of Kant will readily recognize them. They lie at the basis of our life and activity, they are acted on before we are conscious of them, and when they arise into clear consciousness we recognize that they are unavoidable and inevitable. In like manner there are other principles arising out of our intercourse with the external world which strike us as inevitable and unavoidable. To enumerate these would lead us too far afield.

Between the necessary and universal beliefs on the one hand, and the practical necessity which coerces our beliefs on the other hand, there lies a wide field of beliefs, the validity of which depends on our ability to sift, examine, and criticize them. The process of sifting and criticism is coextensive with experience. Man is ever sifting his beliefs, is ever criticising them, and is, more or less, successfully active in the endeavour to make them correspond with reality as he is able to apprehend and conceive reality. He ventures in the belief that there is a correspondence between his inward nature and the world in which he lives; he believes that there is a constancy in things, that the qualities of things will remain constant. He makes the venture, and the venture is justified, and his faith increases as his expectation is verified. Beginning with the need to live and to make himself at home in the world, going on to satisfy his dominant and controlling need to obtain some mastery of the world, he reaches the time when he pursues knowledge for its own sake, and, in a disinterested manner, seeks to obtain a consistent and complete view of the scheme of things. So the sciences, the philosophies, the poesies of the world arise, and all the manifold works of the human spirit.

The beliefs of man can, as we see, be looked at as movements of the human spirit arising out of his intercourse with the world in which he lives. Our account of the matter would be most imperfect were we to confine our attention to man considered only as an individual. Belief is largely a social product. The working beliefs of the civilized man are largely due to inheritance. Without entering on the mysterious question of heredity, and without inquiry into the amount or quality of our organic inheritance, there is no doubt that a large proportion of our working beliefs arise out of our social environment, and out of the intellectual, moral, and spiritual atmosphere of the society around us. The language we learn to speak is the registration of the beliefs of those who made and used it; it tells the meaning which men found in the world and in their own life. It throbs with the life of all the past, is directive of the life of the present and the future. We learn the meanings as we learn to speak, and the meanings of those who speak to us become our meanings. Our beliefs and our meanings belong together. And ere we know it, we are furnished with a working body of beliefs which mainly represent the experience of our ancestors. As we speak with the accent of the family and the district, as our voices repeat the swing and cadence of the sentence, so we take over also the beliefs which sway the minds of those with whom we live. It is a mixed inheritance which we receive and actively appropriate. Beliefs unsifted, uncriticized, results of prejudice often, often of superstition, form part of the inheritance we receive. And the mind assents readily enough to the strange amalgam. For behind the beliefs are the trust which the young have in the old, and the natural homage which they yield to experience.

The persistence of beliefs from age to age is itself a proof that they have a certain correspondence with reality. As all belief is a venture and a risk, failure to realize an expectation is a questioning of its validity, and gives occasion for inquiry. Thus belief is always under the criticism of reality, and the stress of circumstance and the strain of living compel us to revise our beliefs and strive to make them correspond with the facts. It is a process that never ends; and as experience widens and knowledge grows, the circle of our beliefs may contract in one direction and expand in another. Beliefs may take the rank of universal and necessary convictions, or they may be classed as merely probable, or may sink to the level of bare possibility. Our postulates may pass into the region of certainty, or may have to be abandoned as mere possibilities.

Looking at the matter from a historical point of view, perhaps the most striking factor in the genesis and growth of belief is that of trust in a person. Into this state of mind many elements enter. The earliest manifestation of belief among human beings is that which we call Animism, or the belief that all things have an inward life, and have their own nature and activity. A spirit dwells in all objects, whether it is in them originally, or has been put into them by some process or act. Crude as this belief is, it yet has in it the germs of growth, and by refinement of its terms and by the removal of its grosser elements it has become the spirit and the meaning of the higher philosophy of to-day. What is the Hegelian conception of the final correspondence of thought and reality, but a higher form of the original belief of man that the world around him, and the objects with which he came into contact, had a thought and meaning in them akin to those which he found in himself? It were an easy task to extend this observation to other philosophies, but space forbids.

Animism itself was a form of belief which came to higher issues in the social intercourse of man with man. The belief which man came to hold as to the animistic character of all objects whatsoever attained to vividness and certainty when applied to his fellow-men. In this sphere there was certainty, for was there not the interchange of influence, of feeling and thought, between himself and his fellows? Mutual help, power of working together, concerted action with friends and against enemies, the need of increased adaptation to the conditions of life, all conspired to raise belief in one's fellow-men to a dominant height. Out of this social co-operation have arisen the sciences, the arts, the philosophies, and especially the institutions of civilized life. But in considering the rise and growth of these achievements of human life, we must always remember that they are the outcome of the striving of conscious beings. This has been so well put by Professor Villa that we quote his statement.

"The mainspring of the mental development of the individual and the species thus consists in two contrary forces, on whose equilibrium both individual and social progress depend. One—namely, "imitation"—is a conservative, the other—"invention" is a progressive force. The former corresponds to biological heredity, and is responsible for social and individual habits and instincts; the latter corresponds to the biological law of variations and finds its highest expression in "genius." The naturalistic and positive schools of the nineteenth century were too much inclined to consider social development as a purely natural and unconscious evolution, and omitted accordingly to take these two forces into consideration. Instead of considering social institutions, ideas, and phenomena as spontaneous products of the nameless multitude, modern Psychology rightly considers them the outcome of individual genius, subsequently consolidated, diffused, and preserved for the whole species by imitation. This idea, admirably developed by Tarde, on which Baldwin founds his studies of social Psychology, has transformed the theories which were current with regard to the evolution of the collective mind, which is thus presented in the light of a conscious, and not of an unconscious evolution like that of geological phenomena. Genius, therefore, is not to be understood as a degeneration, a violation of the natural and conservative law of heredity, but as the integrating factor of the latter, expressive of variation, impulse, and motion, as a dynamic force, without which evolution itself would be impossible" (Contemporary Psychology, by Guido Villa, Eng. tr. p. 256).

Thus the whirligig of time brings about its revenges, and the uniform tradition of history as to the influence of great personalities on the race is being justified by modern Psychology. In this tradition every movement of advance was ascribed to great men. Advances in the practical control of nature, the making of tools, the use of fire, the sowing of grain, and so on, are in the tradition of the race ascribed to individual men. More particularly is this the case with regard to the founders of cities, the makers of laws, the founders or the reformers of religions, and the framers of institutions. The 19th cent. was celebrated for its endeavours to disintegrate great men, to minimize their influence, and to trace great historic movements to a process and not to a person. How much influence this predilection has had on historic criticism we shall not here inquire. But in the light of modern Psychology, perhaps, Romulus, Numa Pompilius, Solon, Lycurgus, and many others may be looked at as real persons, benefactors of the race, whose names represent real forces in the development of humanity. Perhaps modern Psychology may help men to have some real apprehension of Moses, as ancient Psychology had so much to do with his disintegration.

In the sphere of religious belief we have clear and overwhelming evidence of the weight and influence of personality in the shaping of belief, and in the advance of men to clearer thought and purer embodiment of the religious ideals. It has been through the striving, the toil, the agony of great men that the ideals of religion have attained to form and reality. To them it was given to toil for the race, and the vision they saw and the moral and spiritual truth they won became the inheritance of other men, and through them were conserved for the good of the race. Nor is it the fact that the work and influence of great personalities on other persons have been of a narrow and cramping kind. On the contrary, all the religious truth we possess may be traced back to the moral, spiritual, and intellectual insight of great men, just as every great discovery of science is associated with some great historic name. This personal element in our belief is of universal validity. As a matter of fact, only those religions which have had a personal founder have become universal, or at least international. For, after all, personality is our highest category of thought and life.

Belief in great personalities may be historically and scientifically vindicated. They were needed to make the new departure, they were the first to see the vision, they made the discovery, or thought out the truth; but those unfitted to be pioneers may be quite able to think over again what is made plain to them by him who was the first to think out that truth. The insight of a great man may be verified by the experience of other men. In fact, we have daily illustrations of this in our own experience. We use telephones, we drive by means of steam or electricity, we command nature by using the means which others have placed at our disposal, though we may not have the power of making these discoveries. Plato, Aristotle, Kant opened out paths on which the feet of others may safely tread, and we may rise to the height of the vision of Dante, and rejoice in the universality of Shakespeare, though these would have remained undiscovered countries had not those great personalities opened the gates of entrance to us.

Yet the man in the street has something in common with the greatest and the highest. If he cannot imitate he may imitate, and if he cannot make the discovery he may appreciate and act on it when it has been made. For in the long-run the achievements of great men in any sphere, just in proportion to their truth and value, turn out to have elements of permanent value. Though the discoveries of a person, they have no mere personal value. They are objective, and because objective they may become the possession of every man. We have spoken up to this point of the work of great personalities only so far as that work was a help towards the discovery of truth and a help to life. Belief in them, trust in them, is thus far justified. But no great personality answers to the ideal of greatness in all the aspects of greatness. Great men have had their limitations, and greatness from one point of view has been accompanied with littleness in other respects. The leaders of men have had their limitations. Some have been great in action, some in thought, some in invention, some in power of poetic or prophetic vision, and some in other ways. Others have been great in gathering into a system the results of the work of former generations, and have thus marked out the stage to which humanity has come. But the limitations of great men have had their effect, and their achievements may come to hinder and not to help progress. In all spheres of human thought and action this has been true, and the imitative mind of man has striven to live in formulæ which have become outworn and effete. There has been also imitation of great men in those aspects of their activity in which they were not good or great. Illustrations of these facts abound, and need not be dwelt on at length.

But trust in personality as one of the greatest forces of human progress and one of the strongest elements in belief is justified notwithstanding. It alone can give the enthusiasm which confronts difficulties, the personal devotion and love which make men willing to live and die for a great cause. The great epochs of human life, the times which stand out in history as full of heroic endeavour, of far-reaching aspiration, and of substantial gain for other ages, have been pre-eminently periods of abounding trust in great ideals; and these ideals appear in all their grandeur as embodied in some great personality. The imitative mind found its ideal embodied in the great man of its time; and was touched as with a flame, and followed on and became greater than it knew. The great personality became for the lesser men the embodiment of the highest ideal they had ever known; and they, so far as they saw it, embodied it in their own action and character, and wrought it so far into the very constitution of humanity. So the vision grew; and as one personality after another revealed to men the possible synthesis of the ideal greatness of a perfect personality, men were educated to perceive what they ought to demand in the ideal of a perfect personality in whom they might completely and absolutely trust.

In the perfect personality in whom man may absolutely trust all kinds of ideals must meet, and be harmonized in a perfect unity. That is the postulate of the nature of man. And each part of man's complex nature makes its own demand and contributes its own share towards the realization of the ideal. Our intelligent nature demands unity and intelligibility in the Universe, and in Him in whom the Universe lives and moves, and has its being. Our moral nature demands its ideal of perfect goodness, righteousness, and holiness in order to meet the needs of our moral nature, and to give us scope for the exercise of reverence towards that which is above us, love towards all that helps and sustains us, and benevolence towards all that needs our help. The aesthetic nature furnishes its ideal of perfect beauty and harmony, and demands that reality shall meet this as it meets every other demand. The heart demands goodness and love, and furnishes in its own action the type of what it demands. The Christian belief is that all these ideals meet and are realized in God. It is the business of Theism to show how these ideals are realized in God, and it is the business of the metaphysician, the ethicist, the aestheticist, and the poet to show how the various ideals converge to the one great ideal whom we reverently call God. Our intellectual, ethical, spiritual, artistic, and emotional ideals agree, must agree, if we are to attain to harmony of life and fulness of being. We repeat again that these are our needs, and our needs have their roots in reality, and reality does not disappoint us.

Is there a Personality who can be to all men what some personalities have been to some men and to some nations? Is there one who can be to all nations what the national heroes have been to particular peoples, one who can embody their highest ideals, and who can so react on them as to make them work out these ideals in themselves? That is the claim which history makes for Christ, which Christians make for Him, and which they believe has been verified in human experience by all who have trusted and followed Him. He Himself makes the claim: 'I am the way, the truth, and the life' (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>). St. Paul makes it for Him: 'in whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden' (Col 2<sup>3</sup>). This is not the place to unfold the meaning of the claim of Christ to the reverence and trust of all men, nor to set forth His ability to meet all the needs of our nature and to satisfy all our ideals. It would take many treatises to do that work, instead of one brief article. But the scope of the proof may be indicated. First, as to the demands which our needs make on Christ; and, second, as to His ability to meet them. The main demands of our nature may be summed up in the ideals we have noted above: the demand for unity, the demand for purity, the longing for beauty and harmony, the thirst for love and goodness and fullness of life. The demand for unity, and the belief that unity is there, have led men on towards the conquest of the world,—which conquest has embodied itself, so far as it has gone, in the sciences and their practical applications and in the philosophies of the world. The demand for beauty and harmony, and its result in the poetries, arts, and beautiful human constructions, and in increasing appreciations of the beauty of the Universe; the demand for goodness, righteousness, love, which has embodied itself in the ethical and spiritual life of the world, are illustrations of the faith of man in the unity, beauty, goodness, and worth of reality, and his own achievements are tributes to the validity of his faith.

But the needs of man make this claim on the perfect human personality. We need One who can reveal to us what human life ought to be and what it may become. We need One who gathers into Himself all the types of greatness that have ever entered into the thoughts of men; and One who has realized them in His own life and action. But we need to be educated and trained to appreciate the ideal, for it may be, nay, it is, the reversal of many human ideals. Man has often mistaken his real needs, and has also mistaken the ideals which alone can satisfy them. The first must become last and the last first. The intellectual, moral, aesthetic, and religious needs of man have sought satisfaction in the pursuit of false ideals, and have not found it. Yet the needs are real and the search was good, and the satisfaction is attainable. The perfect human Personality reveals to man how to show reverence to what is above man, love to all his equals, and benevolence to all that is subject to him. He has shown it in His own action, and inspires it in those who trust Him.

Belief in Christ is thus the outcome of the deepest needs of man's manifold nature, and the prophecy of their complete satisfaction. It means also that there is a revelation to man of what his real needs are. It means instruction, education, training into a true and adequate apprehension of his own nature and calling. He learns from Christ his own value and worth, and the sphere in which these may be realized. He learns how this supreme Personality has thought about him, cared for him, suffered for him, lives for him, and is ever working and striving in him and for him. Then, too, he learns, as he trusts Christ, what life and conduct ought to be, and he learns that it is possible through union with Christ to live that life and imitate that conduct. For the further development of this part of our theme we have to refer to Christian dogmatics, and specially to the NT documents. We may also refer to the practical experience of the Christian through the Christian centuries, and to what it has felt and accomplished.

As to the ability of Christ to satisfy our needs and meet our ideals, we have just to make the same reference. We are beginning to understand the cosmical significance of Christ. As our knowledge of the primary revelation of God is widened by the patient and triumphant labours of scientific workers through the ages, we find increased validity in the process when we reflect that we are following in the footsteps of Him by whom every thing was made that was made. 'In Him all things consist,' and our faith in the Eternal Logos is confirmed as we trace out the logos of things. Then in the sphere of history we desire a meaning and a unity, we need the belief that a purpose runs through the ages, and we find that of Him, and through Him, and to Him are all things; that 'God was in Christ reconciling the world to Himself,' and that there is a ministry of reconciliation in history. Then comes the personal knowledge of Him, in His perfect grace, love, wisdom, power; and the union with Him, till He becomes the atmosphere we breathe, our outlook on life and its possibilities, the source of all our strivings, the goal of all our efforts; and the only true description of it all is that we are 'in Christ Jesus.'

The correspondence is perfect between our needs and their satisfaction in Jesus Christ. Here the subjective is controlled by the objective, and the coercive power of Christ over the belief of those who trust Him is perfect. Much might be said on the educative power of Christ on man as to the true needs of man, and much might be said on the reasonableness of trust in this perfect Personality; but enough has been said to indicate the congruity of this belief with the whole nature of belief in general, and to show that it is the outcome of all the factors which enter into and justify that attitude of the human mind which we call belief. See, further, art. FAITH.

It may be well to refer to Kant in his three great Critiques, and specially to his treatment of 'Glaube' in the Critique of the Practical Reason. In the works of Sir William Hamilton, Mansel, and Herbert Spencer the reader will find discussions of some value. In truth, the literature which in one form or other deals with the nature and validity of belief is so enormous, that an exhaustive reference is out of the question. But reference ought to be made to Balfour's Foundations of Belief and to Kidd's Social Evolution, as these books present a somewhat peculiar view of the nature and validity of belief, specially in its relation to knowledge.

As to belief in Christ we need not give any reference, for all the literature of Christianity would be relevant here.

BELOVED.—Wherever the word rendered 'beloved' (ἀγαπητός—in 9 places AV has 'dearly beloved' and in 3 places 'well-beloved'; in every case RV has 'beloved' only) is used in the NT, it seems to imply a love deeper and more intimate than the common affections, and is therefore but sparingly employed. In the Epistles it is the indication of the inner brotherhood, and its very form 'beloved brethren' has passed into every liturgy. St. Paul uses it to distinguish, as with peculiar honour, those whom he has personally enlightened with the new faith, as Epenetus (Ro 16<sup>5</sup>), Timothy (1 Co 4<sup>17</sup>), or a whole community (1 Co 10<sup>14</sup>, Ph 2<sup>12</sup>). But in the Gospels the word is used solely concerning Christ, and marks out the Son's special relationship to the Father: There is abundance of love throughout the Gospels: whether of Jesus for John and the rest, or of the disciples and others for Him: and there is no weakness or timidity in the expression of the love. But to none other save Himself is the word 'beloved' applied. He Himself uses it but once, and then in the parable of the Lord of the Vineyard, wherein the 'beloved son' is the evident picture of the Son of Man (Mk 12<sup>a</sup> [AV 'well-beloved'], Lk 20<sup>b</sup>). Elsewhere the Evangelists (Synoptists only), who give the word, report it as the utterance of God, the Divine recognition and approval of the Son. The influence of the OT is plainly visible in the words heard at the Baptism. Jesus hears the voice of God pronouncing a benediction in clearest remembrance of Ps 27, 'Thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee,' and of Is 42, 'My chosen, in whom my soul delighteth' (quoted in Mt 12<sup>b</sup>; cf. Bruce, Expos. Gr. Test., in loc.); for the Synoptists agree in the phrase 'My beloved son in (thee) whom I am well pleased' (Mt 3<sup>17</sup>, Mk 1<sup>11</sup>, Lk 3<sup>22</sup>). And there is something beautifully fitting in this consecration of the opening of His ministry by a blended echo of psalm and prophecy. The other occasion of the word is that record of another great revealing moment of His life—the Transfiguration, when two of the three tell of 'a voice out of the cloud (saying), This is my beloved son, hear ye him' (Mt 17<sup>5</sup>, Mk 9<sup>7</sup>; in the || Lk 9<sup>35</sup> the true reading is ἐκλελεγμένος).

BENEDICTION.—Benedictions on the assembled people pronounced by an officiating priest or minister were a regular part of the liturgies of the temple and the synagogue, but no direct mention is made of these in the Gospel narratives. Quite similar in character, however, are the benedictions on persons, which are not a part of the ceremonial of Divine worship. Of these there are several examples in the Gospels (Lk 24<sup>a</sup> 6<sup>24</sup> and Mk 10<sup>41</sup>). All such words of blessing are liable to have magical power attributed to them, but in form and origin they are simply a prayer addressed to God for the wellbeing of some person or persons in whose presence they are uttered. They may be exemplified from the benediction of the Jewish liturgy: 'The Lord bless thee, and keep thee; the Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace' (Nu 6<sup>24-27</sup>). In the NT the verbs εὐλογεῖν (Lk 24<sup>a</sup> 6<sup>24</sup>) and κατεὐλογεῖν (Mk 10<sup>41</sup>) denote 'to utter a benediction' in this sense.

εὐλογεῖν properly means to ascribe (to God) praise and honour (benedicere). In accordance with the usage of the OT and NT and of the Christian Church, this act also is termed 'benediction.' It is of the nature of thanksgiving and praise to God for His goodness, and differs essentially from that kind of benediction which is a prayer that Divine favour may be shown to those whom the speaker 'blesses.' In the NT this second kind of benediction is expressed by εὐχαριστεῖν, 'give thanks,' as well as by εὐλογεῖν. The Jewish custom of blessing God on every possible occasion (see below) supplies a probable explanation of the designation of God in Mk 14<sup>61</sup> ὁ εὐλογητός, 'the Blessed.' It does not, however, appear that this title was current in Jewish literature (Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 200).* Elsewhere in the NT εὐλογητός is used as an epithet of God (e.g. Lk 1<sup>7</sup>). This is the Jewish usage of בְּרַכְיָהּ.

The double sense of εὐλογεῖν, just explained, is due to the meaning of בְּרַכְיָהּ and the LXX use of εὐλογεῖν. It has a third signification when God is the subject, namely 'bless,' i.e. prosper. This also is a meaning of בְּרַכְיָהּ (see Bussinos). In the Gospels the only instances of the third usage are cases where the participle εὐλογημένος, 'blessed,' is employed. εὐλογεῖν means—ing to pronounce a benediction never occurs in John, but εὐλογεῖσθαι appears in Jn 12<sup>3</sup>.

* Enoch 77 seems to supply a parallel. In Berakoth vii. 3 (ed. Surenhusius) בְּרַכְיָהּ is an epithet qualifying יְיָ.

1. Benedictions on men.—In Jewish life the occasions of pronouncing benedictions on men were numerous. Besides those of the temple and the synagogue, and perhaps even older than these, were the salutations customary at meeting and parting, entering a house and leaving it, which were all benedictions. The blessings of the aged and of parents were specially valued, and were often a part of the solemn farewell of the dying. In the temple a benediction was regularly pronounced at the conclusion of the morning and evening sacrifices. The statement in Lk 1<sup>11</sup> that the people waited for Zacharias may be an indirect reference to this custom. But the intercessory benedictions recorded in the Gospels are chiefly of the nature of greetings or salutations (Lk 1<sup>28</sup> 1<sup>42</sup> 13<sup>30</sup> = Mt 23<sup>39</sup> = Ps 118<sup>26</sup>). Our Lord commends to His disciples the practice of saluting a house when they enter it, i.e., of pronouncing a benediction on those resident in it (Mt 10<sup>13</sup> = Lk 10<sup>5</sup>). The actual words of such a benediction are given in Lk 10<sup>4</sup> 'May peace rest on this house' (cf. Lk 1<sup>40</sup>). Christ's farewell to His disciples before His ascension was expressed in words of blessing (Lk 24<sup>49</sup>). It is to be understood in the light of what has already been said regarding Jewish customs. Simeon's benediction (Lk 2<sup>29</sup>) was that of an old man and a priest. But in any circumstances benedictions were appropriate as expressions of goodwill (cf. Lk 6<sup>28</sup> and Mk 11<sup>4</sup>).

εὐλογημένος (= בְּרַכְיָהּ) in formulas of blessing may be understood to express a wish, 'Blessed be thou.' This is clearly the meaning in Ps 118<sup>26</sup> (LXX), and consequently in Mk 11<sup>4</sup> = Mt 21<sup>9</sup> = Lk 19<sup>38</sup> = Jn 12<sup>13</sup> and Mt 23<sup>39</sup> = Lk 13<sup>30</sup>, where the Psalm is quoted. In the Gospels RV makes the phrase a statement, and so does AV except in Lk 19<sup>38</sup> (cf. Mk 11<sup>4</sup>). There are similar phrases in Mk 11<sup>10</sup> and Lk 1<sup>42</sup>, μακάριος, although translated in the EV 'blessed,' is not used in benedictions, and has a different meaning (see BLESSING).

There is at least one clear reference to the attitude adopted in the act of benediction (Lk 24<sup>49</sup>). The uplifting of the hands there spoken of (cf. Lv 9<sup>2</sup>) is not peculiar to benedictions; according to ancient custom, Babylonian and Egyptian as well as Hebrew, when prayer was offered in a standing posture the hands were uplifted or spread out (Ps 28<sup>2</sup>, Is 1<sup>15</sup> etc.). It is not equally certain that the laying of hands upon the children who were blessed by Christ (Mk 10<sup>13</sup>) is directly connected with the act of benediction as such, although Gn 48<sup>14</sup> may be quoted in support of that view. The request made to Christ is that He should touch the children (Mk 10<sup>13</sup> = Lk 18<sup>15</sup>; but cf. || Mt 19<sup>13</sup>), and that is something different from a request that He should bless them (see Mk 5<sup>41</sup> and cf. possibly Lk 2<sup>29</sup>). Mt 19<sup>13</sup> may be regarded as an interpretation of Mk 10<sup>13</sup>; benedictions of persons are intercessory prayers on their behalf.

2. Benedictions of God.—The practice of uttering benedictions on God is a highly characteristic expression of Jewish religious life. It is broadly formulated as a duty in the Talmud in the words, 'Whoever benefits from this world without (re-citing) a benediction, acts as if he robbed God' (Berakoth, 35a). Any circumstance or event which recalls or exhibits God's goodness or power is an appropriate occasion for 'blessing' God. At circumstances, redemptions of the first-born, marriages, etc., benedictions of this class were employed along with others invoking blessings on men. Sometimes unusual experiences and special circumstances called them forth. But the ordinary routine of life, and particularly the daily meals of the family and the individual, equally fulfil the conditions which prompt their use. The Jewish 'grace' pronounced at meal-times was an act of thanksgiving to God, that and nothing more. The procedure is described in the Mishna (Barakboth) and in other Jewish sources. When several sat down to a meal together, one usually gave thanks for all, although each in certain circumstances was expected to do so for himself. A company is said to be constituted by the presence of three persons. The meal commenced with a benediction and with the breaking of bread. Whoever broke the bread also spoke the benediction. This was the part of the master of the house, the giver of the feast, or the most important person in the company. There were differences in the words of blessing, according to the formality of the occasion and the character of the dishes that were served. During one meal several benedictions might be pronounced, referring to the various articles of food, separately (for the ordinary formulas used in blessing bread and wine, see BLESSING). During the Passover meal benedictions were pronounced at several fixed points. Every meal was concluded with a benediction. In the Passover meal the last benediction was spoken before the actual conclusion; a hymn was sung at the very end.

It is not easy to draw a line in principle between the thanksgiving of God which is benediction and that which is denoted by the word 'praise' (ainio). But there is a practical distinction. The use of special formulas, and especially of the word εὐλογέω 'bless' (aino), is characteristic of benedictions.

There are only three references in the Gospels to benedictions of God other than those pronounced at meal-times. In each case they are prompted by unusual manifestations of Divine favour to the speakers (Lk 14 RV, 28 24th). The actual words of benediction are not recorded in any case. Lk 22nd is a prayer supplementing the benediction proper.

Four narratives in the Gospels allude to blessings pronounced at meal-times. The occasions are the miracles of the feeding of the 5000 and of the 4000, the institution of the Lord's Supper, and the evening meal at Emmaus. The reference in every case to the breaking of bread is noteworthy. It emphasizes the character of the act as one in accordance with Jewish custom. The Jewish formulas of blessing at meal-times make it perfectly certain that no blessing on the food is asked, but that God is thanked for the food. Illustrations of this meaning of the word 'bless' are found in the parallel narratives of the Gospels themselves. Lk 22nd has 'give thanks' (εὐχαριστήσας) in place of the 'bless' (εὐλογήσας) of Mk 14th and Mt 26th; Jn 6th has 'give thanks' where the Synoptists have 'bless' (cf. also the parallel expressions in 1 Co 14th). When the grammatical object of the verb is an article of food, 'bless' then signifies 'pronounce a benediction over,' i.e. 'give thanks to God for' the food in question (so Mk 8th and Lk 9th). The same construction occurs in the OT (1 S 9th), (in the Mishna ברך is generally used). Christ's blessing of the elements in the institution of the Lord's Supper should no doubt be understood in the light of these facts.

The only other passage in the NT where a material object is said to be blessed is 1 Co 10th, and it really belongs to the category just explained. The expression 'cup' which we bless means simply 'cup for which we give thanks,' over which we pronounce our benediction. In Jewish phraseology material objects may be consecrated or hallowed, but they cannot be said in the same sense to be blessed.

Mk 6th (and so the parallels) speaks of Christ looking up to the sky, and implies, no doubt, in accordance with the circumstances, that He stood while He offered His prayer of thanksgiving. But the ordinary Jewish practice seems to have been to sit while grace was being said. In Jn 6th it is not obvious at first sight why the words 'when the Lord gave thanks' have been added. Perhaps they were intended to mean 'when the Lord was giver of the feast.' The statement in Lk 24th that the risen Christ was recognized in the breaking of bread seems to imply that the disciples were familiar with the manner in which He acted on such occasions, and that there was something peculiar or characteristic in the procedure which He followed. Doubtless the act as He performed it was always deliberate and impressive.

The application of the word εὐλογέω to meals is common to the Synoptists, but St. Matthew (15th) and St. Luke (22nd) both substitute on one occasion εὐχαριστέω for St. Mark's εὐλογέω (8th 14th). εὐλογέω with God as explicit object occurs in St. Luke only (18th 28 24th). St. John does not use the word at all in this sense (see 6th and cf. also 11th).

BENEDICTUS.—The Song of Zacharias (wh. see), preserved in Lk 186-9, is usually spoken of under the name familiar to us in the offices of the Church—a name derived from its opening word in the Latin version. St. Luke introduces it immediately after his narrative of the circumcision and naming of the future Baptist, with the copulative and, in these terms: 'And his father Zacharias was filled with the Holy Ghost, and prophesied, saying' (v. 27). But while he thus asserts the author's inspiration, and claims the Song as an outcome thereof, it does not follow either that the Holy Ghost came on Zacharias then and there,—He may have rested on him during the whole period of his miraculous dumbness, teaching him in that penitential silence, and bringing to his remembrance the dealings and promises of God,—or that the Song was extempore (it was while the old psalmist was musing, that the fire burned, Ps 39th). Zacharias may have had it ready for the long anticipated moment; may have recited it then, and written it afterwards.

Nor, again, does the fullest acceptance of its inspiration as a fact forbid that it should bear the marks of the time at which it was composed, and of the feelings of devout Israelites under the trials of their age. The Holy Spirit speaks through men, not through pipes. Their character, proved and purified by calamities,—public as well as private,—is of no small importance to Him. They were 'holy men of God,' who 'spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost' (2 P 1st). Zacharias was an old man (Lk 1st), he might easily remember the capture of Jerusalem by Pompey (B.C. 63), and his pushing forward, like Antiochus Epiphanes, into the Holy of Holies. There were chief priests who 'opened the gates' to the heathen conqueror as 'sons to receive a father' (Ps-Sol 8th 30th); but among the ministering priesthood there then lived (as there still survived in Zacharias himself) a piety so genuine and fearless that, when the victorious Romans burst into the Temple courts, the officiating priests went on with the service as if nothing unusual were happening, and suffered themselves to be cut down at their posts. That awful day was the end of Jewish independence. Zacharias had lived through all the shame that followed, and the further Roman outrages of Crassus, who robbed the Temple (B.C. 54), and of Cassius, who sold 30,000 Jews into captivity (B.C. 51). The usurpations, the feuds, the subserviences to Herod and the Romans, the Sadducean unbelief of the high-priestly families, the immoralities which disgraced them,—must all have been fresh in his recollection, and may well have led him, as these things led the more quiet and religious Pharisees around him, to turn back for comfort to the Divine promise to David and his seed for evermore.

That such a terrible state of things should have deeply affected Zacharias was as right as it was natural. That it wrought within him affections altogether good and holy is just a sign that it was the Spirit of Christ who taught him by them. The book already referred to, the Psalter (or Psalms) of Solomon, is the nearest Jewish work in point of time to the Benedictus and its fellows in the first two chapters of St. Luke: it is also the likeliest to them in style and character. Like these Songs, the Psalms of Solomon are a proof that sacred poetry, so far from being extinct among the Jews at this period, was living, and was being made the vehicle of intensest religious feeling. Nor are these Psalms deficient in merit. They are forceful, vivid, full of noble indignation against Roman oppression and Jewish secularism alike, of shame for 'the dragged purples' of the Hasmonean princes, of acknowledgments that God is justified in His chastening of Israel. They look, like the Benedictus, for a Messiah of the House of David. They assign to Him the double work of 'thrusting' sinners out of the holy place, 'purging Jerusalem and making it holy as in the days of old,' and avenging her upon the Romans. But with all this, they lack the characteristic elements of evangelical prophecy. They have little insight and less foresight. They emanated from the better sort of Pharisees, and they betray all the elements of Pharisaism as we see it in the Gospels. The Messiah they expect is purely human (cf. our Lord's contention on this point with the Pharisees, Mt 22<sup>42</sup>, Mk 12<sup>35-37</sup>, Lk 20<sup>41-44</sup>). Their idea of God's salvation is political mainly: vengeance on their enemies rather than undisturbed devotion is the thing they long for. The whole tone of the book is hence, narrow, separatist, self-righteous. The Benedictus, on the other hand, in its closing notes very strikingly predictive; the father foretells with proud exultation, the future ministry of his infant son. Even had this element been wanting, the Song is in the truest sense a prophecy, for it discerns the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom with a clearness unknown even to the Apostles after Christ had been some time with them. It tells of 'salvation in the remission of sins' (v. 77 RV) through the mercy of God (v. 78, cf. Tit 3) in Christ (v. 78), of human need and darkness, of reconciliation to life and peace, and of the worship of God without fear (cf. 1 Jn 4<sup>18</sup>) as its climax (v. 74). There is deliverance from every enemy, not from the Romans only, but no hint of revenge upon them. The tone of the Song is eminently gentle. The salvation is from God, according to His promise by the mouth of all His holy prophets from the beginning of the world; it embraces in its range our fathers (v. 72) who are gone, as well as the living (cf. 1 P 2<sup>9</sup>, and Rev 6<sup>9</sup>); and is all given us through and in the Horn of Salvation, whom God has raised up 'in the house of his servant David' (v. 78), indeed, but who Himself is 'the Most High,' and 'the Lord' (v. 79), and 'the Day-spring from on High'—not rising gradually as does Nature's dawn, but bursting, as it were, upon our wondering eyes, full-orbed from the zenith (v. 78). It is very remarkable how subordinate to Him who is the subject of his Song is the position assigned by Zacharias to his own miraculously-born child. Even while he predicts John's office, it is in contrast with the greater dignity of the Redeemer. Alford justly remarks that the Benedictus 'shows the exact religious view under which John was educated by his father.' The fruit may be seen in all that is recorded of the Baptist (cf. Mt 3<sup>11-12</sup>, 11<sup>10</sup>, Mk 1<sup>8</sup>, Lk 9<sup>17</sup>, Jn 1<sup>7</sup> & 12, 12<sup>34</sup> 3<sup>9</sup>). It is abundantly clear that the Song was composed in the light both of the Annunciation made to the Virgin Mary (Lk 1<sup>28-29</sup>) and of the inspired salutation wherewith she was greeted by Elisabeth (v. 42).

The Benedictus is thus emphatically a 'Hymn of the Incarnation'—'Canticum de Evangelio,' as the Antiphony of Bangor styles it.

It differs from the other hymns in these two chapters of St. Luke mainly in this, that whereas the Magnificat (St. Mary's Song) is of Christ's kingship, whereby He casts down the proud and exalts the humble, and the Ave dimittis (Simon's) is of His prophetic or enlightening office, the Benedictus, as becometh the song of the blameless priest, is of Christ's priesthood. It is priestly throughout; it begins with blessing and ends with peace. The work of the Deliverer is remission of sins and reconciliation with God, and its culmination is seen in a people of priests 'serving God (i.e. worshipping Him—ἀρπάζειν, same word as in Rev 22<sup>3</sup>) in holiness and righteousness before Him all the days of their life.' It is evident that Zacharias has in his mind the history of Melchizedek (Gn 14) and the oracle, even then ascribed to the pen of David, which forms so important a commentary on that history (Ps 110).

The 'sources' of the Song, as of the two chapters of which it forms an integral part, will be discussed in art. LUKE (GOSPEL OF). It may be mentioned here that the text of the Benedictus varies little either in MSS or Versions. The one reading which exhibits an important difference from that of the Textus Receptus is in v. 78, where a future tense takes the place of a past. This has been adopted in the RV, but with a marginal note, 'Many ancient authorities read hath visited us.'

The structure of the Benedictus is simple. It consists of three stanzas—the first (vv. 68-70) setting forth the fact of God's interposition in the approaching birth of the long-looked-for Saviour; the second (vv. 71-73) telling the purpose of His incarnation; and the third (vv. 74-79) an apostrophe to Zacharias' babe, declaring his office as the forerunner of Christ.

The references in the hymn are marvellous alike in their number, range, and depth. The opening words remind us of the opening of Melchizedek's address to Abram (Gn 14); 'visited and redeemed,' of Israel's deliverance from Egypt (Ex 4<sup>21</sup> 6<sup>9</sup>); the 'Horn of Salvation,' of Hannah's Song at the beginning of the story of the kings (1 S 2<sup>9</sup>); 'in the house of David' is from 1 Ch 17<sup>1</sup>; in 'from the beginning of the world,' ἀπ' αἰῶνος, we have possibly an allusion to the Prot-evangelium (Gn 3<sup>15</sup>); in 'in holiness' we may see reference to Ps 110<sup>2</sup>; while the Baptist's mission is described by quotation from Is 40<sup>6</sup>. Nor is the opinion of Bishop Wordsworth, accepted somewhat grudgingly by Alford, to be dismissed as fanciful, that in vv. 72-78 there is a paronomasia on the three names of the parties chiefly concerned with the Baptist's birth. The name of John had been fixed by the Angel (v. 18); Zacharias knew that it must be significant, and it means 'the grace or mercy of God,' ἰσχος. He could hardly help reflecting that his own name Zacharias (from זַכַּר recordatus fuit, and יָרָח Jach (Jehovah)), means θεὸς ἰσχυρῶν; while Elisabeth (from ἐλ Deus, and שָׁבָא juravit) is just εὐχος θεοῦ. He puts all these together. '... The tender mercy of our God . . . in remembrance of his holy covenant . . . the oath which he swore.' If the paronomasia as a literary figure is out of fashion for the moment, we may remember that neither Dante nor Shakespeare thought it beneath their genius; and Zacharias had sacred precedents for employing it in the histories of the births and blessings of the twelve patriarchs (Gn 30 and 49), and still more strikingly in Is 7 and 8, where, as Matthew Arnold has observed, the significant names are the keynote of the whole prophecy.

BENEFACTOR (εὐεργέτης).—A title conferred by a grateful sovereign or country for useful services rendered, often in time of difficulty or danger (Est 2<sup>28</sup> 6<sup>r</sup>). The names of royal benefactors were enrolled in a register (Herod. viii. 85, where see Rawlinson's note; Thuc. i. 129). In the Persian tongue the king's benefactors enjoyed a special title, possibly implying that their names were recorded. Besides the special appellation given to all who had done public service, the title 'benefactor' is occasionally mentioned as a perpetual epithet of kings, merely enhancing their dignity. So Antiochus VII. of Syria, Ptolemy III. of Egypt, and at a later period Ptolemy VII. (B.C. 145-117), were called benefactors. It is evidently this latter, complimentary or official, title to which our Lord chiefly alludes in Lk 22<sup>28</sup>, and so RV rightly spells with a capital, 'Benefactors.' In worldly societies men reign in virtue of superior power, and εὐεργέτης, 'Benefactor,' is a title of flattery which may be applied to the most cruel despot—as in the case of Ptolemy VII., otherwise known as Physeon ('Big-Belly'), and also called Κακεργέτης by a play upon his official designation. But in this new society which Jesus is instituting, the greatest is to be as the least, and he that is chief as he that doth serve. And thus after the example of the Lord Himself, who, being the true εὐεργέτης, 'came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (see the parallel passage Mt 20<sup>28-29</sup>, and cf. the ὅτι ἐπὶ ὑμῶν διδόμενος, ὅτι ἐπὶ ὑμῶν ἐχώρησεν which Jesus had just spoken at the Last Supper [Lk 22<sup>19, 20</sup>]).

BENEVOLENCE.—The disposition which sets itself to desire steadfastly the welfare and happiness of others. Christian benevolence is this disposition of heart informed by the example and precept of Christ, this informing of the heart being the work of His Holy Spirit. Continual active benevolence is perhaps the most striking feature in the whole of the Gospel records. It is the keynote of the Sermon on the Mount, and merges into the harmony of love in the final discourses recorded in the Fourth Gospel. The sons of the Most High are to do good to their enemies as well as to their friends (Lk 6<sup>27</sup>). The sons of the Father which is in heaven are to be kindly disposed and actively beneficent both to the just and to the unjust (Mt 5<sup>44</sup>). And this benevolence, which is to reign in the hearts of His disciples, must have been included in that great last prayer (Jn 17<sup>20</sup>) that 'the love wherewith thou lovedst me may be in them. A simple rule is given to the follower of Christ for securing and testing this attitude of benevolence: 'All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them' (Mt 7<sup>12</sup>). The Divine image is not so marred in any man as to destroy the intention and desire to do good to relations and friends (Mt 5<sup>44</sup> 7<sup>12</sup>, Lk 6<sup>27</sup> 11<sup>14</sup>), but the benevolence of the Christian heart is to be a kindly feeling towards all without exception (Mt 5<sup>44</sup>, Lk 6<sup>27, 35</sup>). There is to be no single blot on the escutcheon; Christians are to be perfect, as their Heavenly Father is perfect (Mt 5<sup>48</sup>). Natural benevolence expresses itself in the exclamation of those who heard of the fate of the wicked husbandmen in the parable, 'God forbid' (Lk 20<sup>16</sup>). Christian benevolence meets us in the story of the arrest in Gethsemane, when the Lord addressed His betrayer as 'comrade' (εταίρε, Mt 26<sup>30</sup>).

Such being the intensive character, the extensive character of benevolence may be observed in Christ's compassion on the multitudes (Mk 8<sup>7</sup>, Mt 14<sup>14</sup>), namely, on each individual; and, again, in His healing every one of those around Him on a well-known occasion at Capernaum (Lk 4<sup>40</sup>). By precept as well as by example benevolence is enjoined upon the ministry in the first commission to the Twelve: 'Freely ye have received, freely give' (Mt 10<sup>9</sup>). Not least beautiful and consoling is the assurance that it prevails in the angelic spheres, even towards poor sinners (Lk 15<sup>7, 10</sup>).

BETHABARA (בֵּית אֲבָרָה) 'house of the ford or crossing'.—The name is found in the New Testament only in Jn 1<sup>28</sup> (AV): 'These things were done in Bethabara beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing.' The place was, therefore, one suitable for the purposes of the Baptist in preaching and baptizing; and it has been usually identified, though this is not precisely stated in the text, with the scene of the baptism of our Lord.

With the great majority of Gr. MSS (including N<sup>a</sup>ABC*) the RV has retained here the reading 'Bethany,' with marginal alternatives 'Bethabarah' and 'Betharabah.' The latter (בֵּית אֲבָרָה) 'house of the prairie,' cf. Is 40<sup>5</sup> et al.; or 'house of the Arabah or Jordan Valley,' cf. Dt 1<sup>7</sup>; or perhaps 'house of the poplar,' cf. בֵּית אֲבָרָה Is 15<sup>7</sup>) is possibly a reminiscence of the Beth-arabah of Jos 15<sup>6, 61</sup> in the plain of Jericho, or it may be due merely to an accidental transposition of letters.

The form 'Bethabara,' on the other hand, is found in a few extant manuscripts of the Greek text, both uncial and cursive, and in the Curetonian and Sinaitic Syriac. Origen adopted this reading, and it seems to have gained general currency mainly on his authority. He writes (in Evang. Joannis, vi. 24) that Bethany is found in almost all copies and in Hieracon, but after personal investigation of the district (γενόμενοι ἐν τοῖς τόποις ἐπὶ Ἰσραήλ τῶν ἰσχυρῶν Ἰησοῦ καὶ τῶν μαθητῶν αὐτοῦ) he prefers 'Bethabara,' on the twofold ground of the distance of Bethany, the country of Lazarus and Martha and Mary, from the Jordan, and of the non-existence of any place bearing the latter name within the Jordan Valley. He further reports (λέγουσι) a place Βηθαρά where he had been told (ἰσχυροῦσι) that John baptized, and says that the word means ὄϊκος κατασκευῆς (possibly a confusion with בֵּית, cf. LXX in Ex 35<sup>2</sup>), Bethany being ὄϊκος ὑρασσῆς, adding a play upon the name as befitting the spot where the messenger sent to prepare (κατασκευάσειν, Mt 11<sup>10</sup>) the way of the Lord should baptize.

Origen's view, therefore, was mainly a priori, and it has seemed worth while to set it out at length, because later writers, as Epiphanius, Chrysostom, et al., apparently adopt and repeat it with more or less amplification; nor is it easy to decide how much weight is due to additional details they may give. According to Chrysostom, for instance, the more accurate copies read 'Bethabara,' a result that might readily be conceived to follow from Origen's criticism; and he adds that Bethany was neither across the Jordan nor in the wilderness, but near Jerusalem.* The ancient writers do not seem to take into account the possibility of the names occurring more than once in Palestine. It is clear, however, that either 'Bethany' or 'Bethabara' would lend itself readily to duplication.

The only indication of position which the narrative itself gives is in the phrase πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, 'across (i.e. east of) the Jordan.' And if Bethabara or Bethany is the scene of the Baptism, then it would seem that the site must be looked for in the northern part of the Jordan Valley, since Christ comes hither apparently direct from Galilee (Mt 3<sup>12</sup>, Mk 1<sup>9</sup>). Conder finds all the necessary conditions satisfied by a ford Abarah on the Jordan E.N.E. of Beisan, and at a distance of four or five miles from the latter place; and he explains the name 'Bethany' as equivalent to Batanea, Basanitis, or Bashan, the district immediately east of the Jordan, south and south-east of the Sea of Galilee (see C. R. Conder in Pal. Expl. Fund Mem. ii. p. 891, Quart. Statement, 1875, p. 72, Handbook to the Bible, p. 3191; Hastings' DB, art. 'Bethabara').

* Suidas, s.v. Βηθανία, says expressly that the right reading is Βηθαβάρη; and he also inserts ἐν in the text before τοῦ Ἰορδάνου.

BETHANY

Bethabara has also been supposed to be the same as the Beth-barash (בֵּית בָּרַשׁ, LXX Βαβραβή, of Jg 7<sup>24</sup>) which lay on or near the Jordan. This is on the assumption that a guttural has been accidentally lost from the Hebrew text, and that we ought to read בֵּית בָּרַשׁ. Dr. Sanday (Sacred Sites of the Gospels, p. 23) accepts the identification with Abarah. But beyond the coincidence of the name, on which much stress cannot be laid, there is no direct evidence in its favour; and the indirect evidence is slight. The inference, moreover, which has been drawn from Jn 2<sup>1</sup>, that Bethabara or Bethany lay not more than a day's journey from Cana of Galilee, is precarious. The marriage festivities at Cana would in all probability extend over several days, towards the close of which the supply of wine failed; and the language used is perhaps intended to convey that Christ and His disciples were not present at the beginning. (See on the prolongation of the ceremonies attendant on an Eastern wedding, P. Baldensperger, 'Woman in the East' in PEFS, 1900 p. 181 ff., 1901 p. 173 ff.; H. B. Tristram, Eastern Customs in Bible Lands, ch. v.)

The traditional site of the baptism of Christ at Makhadet Hajlah in the Jordan Valley near Jericho, though defended by Sir Charles Wilson and others, seems to be too far south. Others would read, by conjecture, in the text of St. John's Gospel, Βηθαβαβη, i.e. Beth-nimrah, on the Wady Shealb, five miles east of the Jordan, E.N.E. from Jericho (see T. K. Cheyne in Encyc. Bibl. s.vv.).

BETHANY (Βηθανία).—1. A village whose interest arises mainly from its having been the residence of Lazarus, Martha and Mary. As to this it is well to note the following points. (1) None of the three Synoptists mentions Lazarus. (2) St. Matthew and St. Mark maintain the same silence as to Martha and Mary. (3) St. Luke (10<sup>38-42</sup>) records a sojourn of Jesus in 'a village' (κώμην τι), which he leaves unnamed. (4) St. John alone (11<sup>1, 12</sup>) names Bethany as the place where the brother and the two sisters lived. (5) St. Matthew and St. Mark state that Bethany afforded hospitality to Jesus during the days that preceded His death (Mt 21<sup>17</sup>, Mk 11<sup>11</sup>); but in connexion with His stay there they make mention only of the house of 'Simon the leper' (Mt 26<sup>68</sup>, Mk 14<sup>30</sup>), and give no name to the woman who anoints the feet of the Lord. (6) St. Luke does not speak of this sojourn at Bethany, but simply says in a more general way that Jesus passed the night 'at the mount called the Mt. of Olives' (21<sup>37</sup>). (7) The data usually accepted regarding Bethany and the family that lived there and entertained Jesus in their house, are thus derived essentially from the Fourth Gospel.

BETHESDA

Bethany is mentioned neither in the Canonical books nor in the Apocrypha of the OT; it makes its appearance for the first time in the NT, and is not named in Josephus. Its situation is relatively easy to determine. We know (Mk 10<sup>46</sup> 11<sup>1</sup>, Lk 19<sup>28-29</sup>) that it was on the road from Jericho to Jerusalem, at a distance of 15 furlongs from the latter (Jn 11<sup>18</sup>), lying thus on the E. or rather S.E. side of the Mt. of Olives. Origen asserts that in his time the position of Bethany was known. In the 4th cent. the Bordeaux Pilgrim (333) mentions a place where the 'crypta' of Lazarus was to be seen. Eusebius records that the place of Lazarus' was shown, and Jerome adds that it was 2 miles from Jerusalem (OS 2 108, 3, 239, 10). According to Niceph. Callist. (HE viii. 30 [Patr. Gr. cxlvi. 113]), a church containing the tomb of Lazarus was built by the empress Helena. Another sanctuary marked the spot where Jesus met Mary (Jn 11<sup>20</sup>). A number of ecclesiastical buildings have risen at Bethany; as many as three churches have been counted there. In its present condition it is a village without importance or interest, with a population of about 200. It bears the name el-Azariyeh, derived from 'Lazarus' or from 'Lazarium' (Λαζαριον), a form found as early as the Pilgrimage of Silvia (383); the initial L has been taken for the Arab. article.

According to the Talmud, Bethany is = Aram. Beth-Ainich or Beth-Elim, 'place of distress' (?), but this etymology is uncertain. The same may be said of that which traces it to the root ny, and would yield the sense of 'place of affliction' or 'place of the afflicted one,' which may be simply a popular etymology (cf. Nestle, Philologica Sacra, 1896, p. 20).

The buildings which are shown at the present day as possessing a historical interest are—1. The 'castle' of Lazarus, a tower which dates from the time of the Crusades, and was probably built in 1147 by Queen Melissenda for the Benedictine nuns; according to others, its construction is still earlier. The name 'castle' is explained by the fact that the Vulgate renders the NT κώμην by castellum. 2. The tomb of Lazarus is shown to modern pilgrims, but its genuineness is so doubtful that it is questioned even by Roman Catholic writers, e.g. Mgr. Le Camus, bishop of La Rochelle (Notre Voyage aux pays bibliques, i. 245). 3. There are still shown—or there used to be shown—at el-Azariyeh the house of Martha, that of Mary, and that of Simon the leper.

In Lk 24<sup>9</sup> the scene of the Ascension is placed, if not at Bethany, at least in its immediate vicinity: 'He led them εως πρὸς Βηθανίαν' (AV 'as far as to Bethany,' RV less satisfactorily, 'until they were over against Bethany'). On the other hand, Ac 1<sup>12</sup> relates that after the Ascension the Apostles 'returned unto Jerusalem from the mount called Olivet, which is nigh unto Jerusalem, a Sabbath day's journey off.' The statement in Luke's Gospel deserves the preference; it fixes the place of the Ascension itself near Bethany, while the text of Acts simply connects the return of the Apostles with the Mt. of Olives, on the slope of which Bethany lies, and does not speak necessarily of the summit of the mountain, as ecclesiastical tradition supposed (cf. Tobler, Die Sionshügel und der Ölberg, p. 83).

BETHESDA.—Jn 5<sup>2</sup> 'Now there is in Jerusalem by the sheep-gate (ἐν τῇ προβατικῇ) a pool, which is called in Hebrew Bethesda, having five porches'

(RV). Instead of  $\text{B}\eta\theta\epsilon\delta\acute{\alpha}$  (TR), the most ancient authorities have other spellings, as  $\text{N}\text{B}\eta\theta\acute{\iota}\delta\acute{\alpha}$ , L and  $\text{Eus. B}\eta\theta\acute{\iota}\delta\acute{\alpha}$  (? for  $\text{B}\eta\theta\acute{\iota}\delta\acute{\alpha}$  =  $\text{B}\eta\theta\acute{\iota}$  'house of the olive'),  $\text{D}\text{B}\eta\theta\acute{\iota}\delta\acute{\alpha}$ ,  $\text{D}\text{B}\eta\theta\acute{\iota}\delta\acute{\alpha}$ . As to the derivation, Delitzsch suggests  $\eta\theta\epsilon\delta$  'house of pillars,' and Calvin  $\eta\theta\epsilon\delta$  'house of outpouring'; but the most natural etymology is  $\eta\theta\epsilon\delta$  'house of mercy,' possibly in allusion to the munificence of some charitable person who had these porches built to shelter the sick, or to the goodness of God in providing this healing spring.

As the adjective  $\eta\theta\epsilon\delta\acute{\iota}\kappa\eta$ , 'pertaining to sheep,' requires some substantive to be introduced, the AV supplies 'market,' the RV 'gate.' Since there is no reference to any sheep-market in the OT, while the sheep-gate is repeatedly referred to ( $\text{Neh } 3^{1-2}$  129), the latter method of supplying the sense is the more probable one. Now the sheep-gate is known to have been north of the Temple, and, as Bovet says, 'the small cattle which entered Jerusalem came there certainly by the east; for it is on this side that the immense pastures of the wilderness of Judaea lie.' The modern St. Stephen's Gate answers to these data. It is at the north-east angle of the Temple area, and is the gate through which the Bedawin still lead their flocks to Jerusalem for sale. We must therefore look for the Pool of Bethesda in this vicinity, and may at once eliminate several proposed identifications elsewhere, such as the Tammanah es-Salf, near the 'Gate of the Cotton Merchants,' about the middle of the west side of the Temple area, where there is a pool with pillars and masonry, some sixty feet below the present surface, the waters of which are still supposed to possess healing properties (Furrer); and the Pool of Siloam, where the remains of four columns in the east wall, with four others in the centre, 'show that a structure with five openings or porches might easily have been erected' (Alford); and the Fountain of the Virgin, the intermittent spring at the bottom of a deep cavern at the foot of the Ophel slope south-east of the Temple (Robinson). These are all too far from the sheep-gate as probably identified above.

Conder, who adopts the suggestion of Robinson that Bethesda was at the present Fountain of the Virgin, says, 'This answers the requirements that it still presents the phenomenon of intermittent "troubling of the water," which overflows from a natural syphon under the cave, and that it is still the custom of the Jews to bathe in the waters of the cave, when this overflow occurs, for the cure of rheumatism and of other disorders.' Against this view Grove (Smith's DB, art. 'Bethesda') and Barclay (City of the Great King, 325) urge the inaccessibility of the deep subterranean water to invalids, the confined size of the pool, and the difficulty of finding room for the five porches capable of accommodating 'a multitude'; and to the present writer, examining the cave in person, these objections seemed conclusive, apart from the difficulty of the locality.

Turning now to the neighbourhood of the sheep-gate, we find three proposed identifications. (1) Modern tradition identifies Bethesda with the Birket Israil, an empty reservoir, 360 feet long, 120 feet wide, and 80 feet deep, half filled with rubbish, which lies close to St. Stephen's Gate and under the north-east wall of the Haram area. (2) Warren and others would place Bethesda at the so-called Twin Pools, in the ditch at the north-west angle of Antonia, under the convent of the Sisters of Zion. Neither of these can be the true site, as both the Birket Israil and the Twin Pools were constructed after the events narrated in Jn 5. (3) In 1872 it was pointed out by M. Clermont-Ganneau that 'the Pool of Bethesda should be sought near the Church of St. Anne, where an old tradition has placed the house of the mother of Mary, calling it Beit Hanna, 'House of Anne.' This expression is exactly identical with Bethesda, both expressions signifying "house of mercy, or compassion." Sixteen years later this anticipation was verified by the discovery of what is now very generally conceded to be the ancient Pool of Bethesda, a short distance north-west of the present Church of St. Anne. In the autumn of 1888, 'certain works carried on by the Algerian monks laid bare a large tank or cistern cut in the rock to a depth of 30 feet, and Herr Schick recognized this as the Pool of Bethesda. It is 55 feet long from east to west, and measures 12½ feet in breadth. A flight of twenty-four steps leads down into the pool from the eastern scarp of rock. Herr Schick, who at once saw the great interest of this discovery, soon found a sister-pool, lying end to end, 60 feet long, and of the same breadth as the first. The first pool was arched in by five arches, while five corresponding porches ran along the side of the pool. At a later period a church was built over the pool by the Crusaders, and they seem to have been so far impressed by the fact of five arches below that they shaped their crypt into five arches in imitation. They left an opening for getting down to the water; and further, as the crowning proof that they regarded the pool as Bethesda, they painted on the wall of the crypt a fresco representing the angel troubling the water of the pool.' (Geo. St. Clair, Buried Cities and Bible Countries, 327-328. See also PEFS, July 1888 and Jan. 1891).

This site is thus supported not only by the mediæval tradition, but by the early tradition as well. The Bordeaux pilgrim, who visited Jerusalem in A.D. 333, after mentioning two large fish-pools by the side of the temple, one at the right hand, the other at the left, says in another place (Itin. Hierosol. 589): 'But farther in the city are twin fish-pools having five porches which are called Bethesda. There the sick of many years were wont to be healed. But these pools have water which, when agitated, is of a kind of red colour.' This is evidently the same place described by Eusebius (Onomasticon, 240. 15) in the same century and called by him Bezatha, though he gives no other clue to the situation—a pool at Jerusalem, which is the Piscina Probatica, and had formerly five porches, and now is pointed out at the twin pools there, of which one is filled by the rains of the year, but the other exhibits its water tinged in an extraordinary manner with red, retaining a trace, they say, of the victims that were formerly cleansed in it.' Clearly, too, it is of the same place that Eucherius speaks in the 5th cent.: 'Bethesda, peculiar for being a double lake, of which one pool is for the most part filled by winter rains, the other is discoloured by reddish waters.' It has been commonly assumed of late that the two tunnels under the convent of the Sisters of Zion are the twin pools mentioned by these writers; but the traditions of the 6th, 7th, and 8th centuries, to be presently quoted, place the pool with the five porches and the church called Probatica (cf.  $\eta\theta\epsilon\delta\acute{\iota}\kappa\eta$ , Jn 5) at or near the traditional birthplace of Mary, which is undoubtedly under the present Church of St. Anne. Thus Antoninus Martyr (A.D. 570) says: 'Returning into the city we come to the Piscina Natatoria, which has five porches; and in one of these is the basilica of St. Mary, in which many miraculous cures are wrought.' Sophronius, patriarch of Jerusalem (A.D. 632), says: 'I will enter the holy Probatica, where the illustrious Anna brought forth Mary.' John of Damascus (about A.D. 750) says: 'May all things be propitious to thee, O

Probatia, the most holy temple of the Mother of God! May all things be propitious to thee, O Probatia, ancestral domicile of a queen! May all things be propitious to thee, O Probatia, formerly the fold of Joachim's flocks, but now a church, heaven-resembling, of the rational flock of Christ! Brocardus also speaks (A.D. 1238) of a large reservoir near St. Anne's Church, called Piscina Interior, just opposite Birket Israel.

Early tradition, therefore, as well as medieval, seems to favour the site discovered in 1888. This is the site now generally accepted, though some recent writers are still unconvinced, such as Sanday (Sacred Sites of the Gospels, 53), who rejects Schick's identification but reaches no positive conclusion of his own, and Conder (Hastings' DB, article 'Bethesda'), who argues for the Virgin's Pool. The intermittent troubling of the water at the Fountain of the Virgin is, indeed, a point in its favour; but this phenomenon is not uncommon in the springs of Palestine (Thomson, Land and Book, iii, 288; Barclay, City of Great King, 500), and, while nothing of the kind is now seen at the pool under the Crusaders' church, it is not, perhaps, a too violent supposition that the same intermittence now observed in the Virgin's Fountain may have characterized this pool also in that early time of more copious 'rains of the year,' as Eusebius calls them, especially if, as some think, they both lie upon the same concealed watercourse.

The last clause of Jn 6<sup>2</sup> and the whole of v. 4, containing the account of the troubling of the water by an angel and the miraculous healing that followed, are relegated to the margin in RV, on the ground of their omission by the ancient manuscripts NBD, and the exceptional number of variants in the other MSS. Popular superstition seems to have attributed the periodic bubbling of the water to the action of an invisible angel. These passages were probably at first written on the margin as an expression of that opinion, and later were introduced into the body of the text.

W. W. MOORE.

BETHLEHEM.—Two towns of this name are mentioned in the Old Testament. 1. Bethlehem (בֵּית לֵחֶם 'house of bread') of Zebulun, Jos 19<sup>2</sup>. The site is now occupied by a miserable village, 6 miles south-west of Sepphoris and about the same distance north-west of Nazareth, in a well-wooded district of country, planted with oaks (Robinson, Biblical Researches, iii, 113). That this Bethlehem cannot have been the scene of the Nativity, near as it is to Nazareth, is clear from the fact that both St. Matthew and St. Luke expressly place the birth of Christ at Bethlehem of Judaea. These narratives being independent of each other and derived from different sources, we have for the southern Bethlehem the convergence of two distinct traditions. These two Evangelists are joined in their testimony by the author of the Fourth Gospel, who assumes acquaintance on the part of his readers with the story of the birth of Christ at Bethlehem, the Bethlehem associated with David and his royal line. 'Some said, Shall Christ come out of Galilee? Hath not the Scripture said that Christ cometh of the seed of David, and out of the town of Bethlehem where David was?' (Jn 7<sup>41-42</sup>). It is noteworthy that Bethlehem is never mentioned as having been visited by our Lord or in any way associated with His ministry. But all Christian history and tradition maintain that the southern Bethlehem was the scene of the Nativity.

2. Bethlehem of Judah (בֵּית לֵחֶם Jg 17<sup>7-9</sup> Ru 1<sup>1-2</sup> etc.) or Judaea (Mt 2, Lk 24). This town (the modern Beit Lahm) is situated about 6 miles S.S.W. of Jerusalem, lying high up on a grey limestone ridge running from east to west, and occupying the projecting summits at each end, with a sort of saddle between. The ridge rises to a height of 2550 ft. above sea-level, and falls away in terraced slopes on all sides, the descent to the north and east being specially steep. The terraces, as they sweep in graceful curves round the ridge from top to bottom, give to the little town the appearance of an amphitheatre, and serve to make to the approaching traveller a picture which closer acquaintance does not wholly disappoint. The names by which it has been known for millenniums, and is still known, are expressive of the fertility of the place—Beth-lehem, 'house of bread,' and Beit Lahm, 'house of flesh.' The hillsides around, merging into the hill country of Judaea, though they look bare to the eye at a distance, afford pastures for flocks of sheep and goats. The valleys below and the fields lying to the east produce crops of wheat and barley, as in the days when Ruth gleaned in the fields of Boaz; and the terraced slopes, under diligent cultivation, bear olives, almonds, pomegranates, figs, and vines. Wine and honey are named among the most notable of its natural products, and the wine of Bethlehem is said to be preferable to that of Jerusalem.

The modern town is highly picturesque. There is just one main street or thoroughfare, extending about half a mile, and largely occupied by workshops, which are little better than arches open to the street. The population is differently given as from 4000 to 8000 souls. Palmer ('Das alte Bethlehem' in ZDPV xvii, 90), writing in 1893, and founding upon personally ascertained figures, gives 8035 as the population, which he classifies in respect of religion as follows: Latins, 3827; Greeks, 3662; Moslems, 290; Armenians, 185; Protestants, 54; Copts and Syrians, 47. The small number of Moslems is said to be due to the severity of Ibrahim Pasha, who drove out the Moslem inhabitants and demolished their houses in the insurrection of 1834. It will be observed from the above enumeration that Bethlehem does not contain a single Jew. As in Nazareth so in Bethlehem, the associations with Jesus make residence repugnant to the Jews, and they have accordingly no desire to settle in the Christian Holy Places. They are, in fact, tolerated only as temporary visitors, but not as residents. 'In the cradle of his royal race,' says Canon Tristram (Bible Places, p. 72), 'the Jew is even more a stranger than in any other spot of his own land; and during the Middle Ages neither Crusader nor Saracen suffered him to settle there. The inhabitants of Bethlehem are of superior physique and comeliness. The men have a character for energy and even turbulence; the women are noticeable for their graceful carriage and becoming attire. In the crowds which throng the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem at the Easter services, the women of Bethlehem, wearing a light veil descending on each side of the face, and closed across the bosom, with a low but handsome headdress composed of strings of silver coins plaited in among the hair and hanging down below the chin as a sort of necklace,—are easily recognizable, and make a favourable impression. The industries of Bethlehem, apart from the cultivation of the soil, are intimately associated with the Nativity, consisting of memorial relics and souvenirs manufactured for sale to the thousands of pilgrims and tourists who visit Jerusalem and Bethlehem every year. Models of the cave of the Nativity, figures of Christ and the Virgin, apostles and saints, are in great demand. Olive wood, and mother-of-pearl obtained from the Red Sea, with basaltic stone from the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea, are carved and wrought into useful and ornamental articles with no small degree of skill and taste.

Palmer mentions (l.c. p. 91) that an increasing number of the inhabitants go abroad with their products,—their mother-of-pearl carvings and other wares,—and, especially in America, find a good return for their enterprise.

Bethlehem, notwithstanding its royal associations and its renown as the birthplace of the world's Redeemer, has never been, and is never likely to be, more in the eye of the world than 'little among the thousands of Judah' (Mic 5). 'In spite,' says Palmer, 'of the numerous visits of strangers and pilgrims, which are year by year on the increase, and in spite of the market-place which Bethlehem affords for the whole neighbourhood, and especially for the Bedawin, who come from long distances from the southern end of the Dead Sea to make their purchases of clothing, tools, and weapons, and to leave the produce of their harvest and their pastures, Bethlehem appears likely to remain, unencumbered by trade and progress, what it has been for many years bygone—a shrunken, untidy village.' Even so, it can never be deprived of its associations with the Messianic King of Israel, 'whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting' (Mic 5), associations which exalt it to the loftiest eminence, and surround it with a glory that cannot fade. These associations in their salient features are now to be set forth.

It is in the early patriarchal history that we meet first with Bethlehem, under its ancient name of Ephrath. 'When I came from Padan,' said Jacob on his deathbed, recounting to Joseph in Egypt his chequered history, 'Rachel died by me in the land of Canaan in the way, when yet there was but a little way to come unto Ephrath: and I buried her there in the way of Ephrath; the same is Bethlehem' (Gn 48, cf. 35<sup>9c</sup>). The sacred historian records that Jacob set a pillar upon her grave: 'that is the pillar of Rachel's grave unto this day' (Gn 35<sup>12</sup>). Rachel's grave is marked now by a Mohammedan wely, or monumental mosque, at the point where the Bethlehem road breaks off the road leading from Jerusalem to Hebron; and though the monument has been repaired and renewed from generation to generation, it serves still to recall a real event, and to distinguish the spot where Rachel's 'strength failed her, and she sank, as did all the ancient saints, on the way to the birthplace of hope' (Dr. John Ker, Sermons, 8th ed. p. 153). Bethlehem becomes more definitely associated with the Messianic hope when it becomes the home of Ruth the Moabitess, the ancestress of David and of David's greater Son. From the heights near Bethlehem a glimpse is obtained of the Dead Sea—the sea of Lot—shimmering at the foot of the long blue wall of the mountains of Moab; and the land of Moab seems to have had close relations with Bethlehem and its people in patriarchal as well as later times. With Ruth the Moabitess, through her marriage with Boaz, the 'mighty man of wealth' of Bethlehem-judah (Ru 2), there entered a strain of Gentile blood,—although we remember that Lot, the ancestor of Moab, was the nephew of the great ancestor of Israel—into the pedigree of Christ according to the flesh (Mt 1<sup>1</sup>), as if in token that, in a day still far off, Jew and Gentile should be one in Him. With David, the great-grandson of Ruth, there entered the royal element into the genealogy of Jesus; and Bethlehem has no associations more sacred and tender than its associations with the shepherd king of Israel, unless it be those that link it for ever with God manifest in the flesh. The stream of Messianic hope, as it flows onwards and broadens from age to age, is not unlike that river of Spain which for a considerable part of its course flows underground, and only at intervals miles apart throws up pools to the surface, which the inhabitants call 'the eyes' of the Guadiana. The pools trace the onward progress of the river, till at length it bursts forth in a broad stream seeking the distant sea. So the hope of a great Deliverer from spiritual misery and death flows onward in the story of God's ancient people, throwing up its pools in the days of Abraham, Moses, David, Isaiah and the prophets; and Micah indicates the direction of its flow with more explicitness than any who went before when he says: 'But thou, Bethlehem Ephrath, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be Ruler in Israel; whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting' (Mic 5). When the fulness of the time had come, the Messianic hope became the place of broad rivers and streams which we happily know and enjoy, and the glad tidings was heard on the plains of Bethlehem, addressed to the watchful shepherds: 'Fear not: for, behold, I bring you glad tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord' (Lk 21<sup>11</sup>).

The story of the Nativity is told by St. Matthew and St. Luke with a simplicity and delicacy and beauty which are of themselves an evidence of its historical truth. Both narratives, as has been indicated, assign to Bethlehem the high honour of being the place of the Nativity and the scene of the stupendous fact of the Incarnation. The details are too familiar to require rehearsal here.

There is one particular handed down by early Christian tradition which may be regarded not as a variation from, but an addition to, the Evangelic narrative,—the statement made by Justin Martyr (A.p. 140-150), and repeated in the Apocryphal Gospels, that the birth of Jesus took place in a cave. Justin (Dialogue with Trypho, ch. 73) relates that, since Joseph had in that village no place where to lodge, he lodged in a cave near by. Justin relates other particulars which may have come to him—he was a native of Nablos, not 40 miles from Bethlehem—by oral tradition or from apocryphal narratives; such as that the Magi came from Arabia, and that Herod slew all the children of Bethlehem. That the stable where the Infant Saviour was born may have been a cave is quite in keeping with the practice of utilizing the limestone caves of the hill country of Judaea as places of shelter for cattle and other beasts. Those Apocryphal Gospels which deal with the Infancy, notably the Protocospelium Jacobi and the pseudo-Mattheus, make mention of the cave. Pseudo-Mattheus (ch. 13) says, 'The angel commanded the beast to stop, for her time to bear had come; and he directed the Blessed Mary to come down from the animal and to enter a cave below a cavern in which there was never any light, but always darkness, because it could not receive the light of day. And when the Blessed Mary had entered it, it began to become light with all lightness, as if it had been the sixth hour of the day. . . . And then she brought forth a male child, whom angels instantly surrounded at his birth, and whom, when born and standing at once upon His feet, they adored, saying, Glory to God on high, and on earth peace to men of good will.' The Protocospelium relates the story with curious imagery (ch. 18). 'And he (Joseph) found a cave there and took her in, and set his sons by her, and he went out and sought a midwife in the country of Bethlehem. And I Joseph walked and I walked not; and I looked up into the sky and saw the sky violently agitated; and I looked up at the pole of heaven, and I saw it standing still and the birds of the air still; and I directed my gaze on the earth, and I saw a vessel lying and workmen reclining by it and their hands in the vessel, and those who handled did not handle it, and those who presented it to the mouth did not present it, but the faces of all were looking up; and I saw the sheep scattered and the shepherd lifted up his hand to strike them and his hand remained up; and I looked at the stream of the river, and I saw that the mouths of the kids were down and not drinking; and everything which was being impelled forward was intercepted in its course.'

The Protocospelium Jacobi is generally recognized as belonging to the 2nd cent., and its testimony is a valuable confirmation of the early Christian tradition. Few scholars, if any, will agree in assigning it the place of importance attributed to it recently by the fantastic theory of Comrad (Die Quelle der kanonischen Kindheitsgeschichten Jesu, Göttingen, 1900), who regards the Protocospelium as the source of the Gospel narratives of the Infancy. The author of it, according to him, is an Egyptian, most likely of Alexandria, who introduced Bethlehem into the narrative not because of its place in Hebrew prophecy,

BETHLEHEM

but because it was formerly a seat of the worship of Isis, and he wishes to incorporate this worship with Christianity. In concert with the priests of Isis and Serapis, he aided with his inventive pen the appropriation of this sacred site by the Church, and it was from the Protévangélistes that the writers of the First and Third Gospels drew their separate narratives of the Infancy. Conrady returns to the subject with an article full of equally curious and perverted learning in SK, 1904, Heft 2, 'Die Flucht nach Ägypten.'

It is in the 4th century that Bethlehem begins to receive that veneration as a Christian Holy Place in which it is now equalled only by Jerusalem and Nazareth. As early as Justin Martyr attention is specially directed to Bethlehem as the birthplace of the world's Redeemer. In addition to the reference, already mentioned, to the cave, we find Justin quoting the well-known prophecy of Isaiah (83rd), 'He shall dwell in a lofty cave of a strong rock,' in the same connexion (Dialogue with Trypho, ch. 70). Even earlier than Justin's day it would appear that this particular cave was venerated by the followers of Christ; for, as Jerome tells in one of his letters to Paulinus, the emperor Hadrian (A.D. 117-138), in his zeal to extirpate the very remembrance of Christ, caused a grove sacred to Adonis to be planted over the grotto of the Nativity, as he caused a temple to Venus to be erected over the site of the sepulchre of our Lord. Origen (c. Celsum, l. 51) says: 'If any one desires certainty as to the birth of Jesus at Bethlehem apart from the Gospels and Micah's prophecy, let him know that in conformity with the narrative in the Gospel regarding His birth there is shown at Bethlehem the cave where He was born and the manger in the cave where He was wrapped in swaddling clothes. And this sign is greatly talked of in surrounding places, even among the enemies of the faith, it being said that in this cave was born that Jesus who is worshipped and revered by the Christians.' The site is now marked by the oldest church in Christendom, the Church of St. Mary of the Nativity, built by order of the Emperor Constantine. It is a massive pile of buildings extending along the ridge from west to east, and comprising the church proper with the three convents, Latin, Greek, and Armenian, abutting respectively upon its north-eastern, south-eastern, and south-western extremities. The proportions of the church and its related structures are more commanding from its elevation and from the shabbiness of the town in comparison. The nave of the church is common to all the sects, and is shared by them together—Latins, Greeks, Armenians. From the double line of Corinthian pillars sustaining the basilica sixteen centuries look down upon the visitor, and the footsteps of nearly fifty generations of Christians have trodden the ground upon which he treads. Says Dean Stanley: 'The long double lines of Corinthian pillars, the faded mosaics, the rough ceiling of beams of cedar from Lebanon still preserve the outlines of the church, once blazing with gold and marble, in which Baldwin was crowned, and which received its latest repairs from our own English Edward IV.' (Sinai and Palestine, p. 433). It is the subterranean vault that continues to be of perennial interest. Descending the steps from the raised floor of the eastern end of the nave, and turning sharply to the left, the visitor finds a half-sunk arched doorway which leads down by thirteen steps to the Chapel of the Nativity—the rude cave now paved and walled with marble and lighted up by numerous lamps. This chamber is about 40 feet from east to west, 16 feet wide, and 10 feet high. The roof is covered with what had once been striped cloth of gold. At the east end there is a shrine where fifteen silver lamps burn night and day, and in the floor, let into the pavement, a silver star of Greek pattern marks the very spot of the Nativity with the inscription: 'Hic de Virgine Mariâ Jesus Christus natus est.' To the Christian the associations of the place make it full of impressiveness, and the visitor has no more sacred or tender recollections of holy ground than those which cluster round the Church and the Grotto of the Nativity. Not far off is a cave, cut out of the same limestone ridge, which was the abode of St. Jerome for over thirty years. Here, with the noble ladies whom he had won to the religious life, Paula and her daughter Eustochium, he laboured totus in lectione, totus in libris, preparing the Vulgate translation of the Holy Scriptures, which for more than a thousand years was the Bible of Western Christendom, and is a powerful tribute to his piety and learning. 'It is the touch of Christ that has made Bethlehem' (Kelman and Fulleylove, The Holy Land, p. 234). And the touch of Christ is making itself felt still in the works of Christian philanthropy and missionary zeal that are being performed there. There are schools and other missionary agencies maintained by Protestants and Roman Catholics to instruct in His truth and to enrich with His grace the community who occupy the place of His birth. Bethlehem appears among the stations of the Church Missionary Society, and the work done there among women and girls has borne good fruit. The Germans have built an Evangelical Church, which was dedicated in 1893. There is much superstition and error among the nominally Christian inhabitants of the place, but the efforts of the Protestant and Roman Catholic missionaries have stirred up the Greek Orthodox and Armenian Christians to activity for the moral and spiritual welfare of their people.

T. NICOL.

BETHPHAGE (Βηθφαγή).—A place unknown to the OT, the Apocrypha, or Josephus, and mentioned in the NT only once—on the occasion of our Lord's triumphal entry into Jerusalem five days before His death. It was certainly situated upon the slope of the Mt. of Olives, on or near the road from Jericho to Jerusalem (Mk 10th 11, Lk 19th 28), and in the immediate neighbourhood of Bethany. The site of the latter being accurately determined as the modern el-'Azariyeh (see art. BETHANY, 4), it might be expected that there would be little difficulty in locating Bethphage. Unfortunately, however, the texts of the three Synoptists [St. John does not mention Bethphage] are obscure on two points—

(1) As to the relation between Bethphage and Bethany, St. Luke (10th) alone mentions both places ('as he drew near to Bethphage and Bethany'). His language seems to imply that a traveller coming from Jericho would come first to Bethphage, then to Bethany, and finally to Jerusalem. St. Matthew (21st) mentions only Bethphage. As for St. Mark, his original text (11th) probably contained no reference to Bethphage, but this name has been inserted, and in the majority of MSS stands between Jerusalem and Bethany in such a way that, if this reading were accepted as the original one, we should have to place Bethphage in a different position in relation to Bethany from what is implied in the text of St. Luke.

To reconcile these divergent statements, a hypothesis has been started to the effect that Bethany may have lain a little off the direct route from Jericho to Jerusalem, upon a side road, and Bethphage at the point where this joined the main road. It would thus have been necessary to pass Bethphage both in going to Bethany and in returning from it. Support for this conjecture has been sought in the use of the word  $\beta\eta\theta\phi\alpha\gamma$  in Mk 11<sup>4</sup>.

(2) In all three Synoptics, Jesus sends two of His disciples to a village ( $\kappa\acute{\alpha}\lambda\upsilon\eta$ ) to bring the ass on which He was to ride. Is this village, which is 'over against' ( $\kappa\alpha\tau\acute{\alpha}\pi\alpha\alpha\tau\iota$ ), to be identified with Bethphage, or with Bethany, or with some third locality? Each of these views is capable of defence; the traditional identification of the village of the ass's colt with Bethphage is at least questionable, especially in view of Mt 21<sup>1</sup>. 'When they had reached Bethphage . . . then Jesus sent two disciples to the village over against.' A site for the village of the colt might be suggested at Silae, or rather at Kefr el-Tur, on the top of the Mt. of Olives. [It is known that in the time of Jesus Christ there were houses on its summit]. In the circumstances of the case it would be hazardous to offer any opinion as to the probable situation of Bethphage.

Etymologically the name Bethphage appears to mean 'house (or place) of unripe fruits,' more especially 'of unripe figs' (cf. Ca 2<sup>3</sup>, and see Dalman, Grammatik des jüd. pal.-Aramäisch, 1894, p. 182, and Arnold Meyer, Jesu Muttersprache, 1896, p. 166). Recently a connexion has been suggested by Nestle ('Etymologische Legenden' in ZWZ xl. [1897], p. 148) between this etymology of the name Bethphage and the story of the barren fig-tree. But it may be noted that the latter is associated in the Gospels (Mt 21<sup>17-22</sup>, Mk 11<sup>11-14, 20-23</sup>) with Bethany, not Bethphage. Formerly Nestle (SK, 1896, p. 323 ff., and in his Philologische Studien, 1896, p. 161.) had pointed to the possibility of connecting, from the point of view of popular etymology, Bethphage (=  $\beta\eta\theta\phi\alpha\gamma$  'place of meeting') and the  $\beta\eta\theta\phi\alpha\gamma$  of Mk 11<sup>4</sup>. Finally, another explanation of Bethphage, viewed as a dwelling-place of priests (1), is furnished by Origen, and rests upon a curious combination of the Aramaic word  $\text{בית}$  'jaw,' with Dt 18<sup>2</sup>, which assigns to the priests the jaws of sacrificial victims as part of their portion.

In the Middle Ages, Bethphage was shown to the north of Bethany, higher up the slope of the Mt. of Olives. The site of this medieval Bethphage (which proves nothing for the Bethphage of Scripture) was recovered nearly thirty years ago, thanks to the discovery made by the Franciscan Fathers, controlled and described by Guillemot and Clermont-Ganneau, of a stone (the fragment of an altar?) bearing inscriptions and pictures relating to Christ's entry into Jerusalem.

LUCIEN GAUTIER.

BETHSAIDA ('house of fishing').—The supposition that there were two places on the shore of the Sea of Galilee to which this name appropriately applies has been disputed or rejected by many writers (Buhl, G. A. Smith, Sanday, et al.); but the evidence in its favour, direct and indirect, has the support of a long list of authorities on Palestinian geography from the days of Reland to the present time. There are differences of opinion with respect to the precise location of both places, but there is a general agreement that one was on the east and the other on the west side of the Jordan or its expanse into the Galilean Lake. Prominent on the list of those who advocate two Bethsaiidas are the names of Ritter, Robinson, Caspari, Stanley, Ederheim, Wieseler, Weiss, Tristram, Thomson, van de Velde, Porter, Merrill, Macgregor, and Ewing. The facts and suggestions which bear upon the supposition itself may be summed up as follows:—

1. Bethsaida of Gaulanitis.—The historic evidence for the existence and general location of this city is not disputed. Josephus describes it as a village 'situate at the Lake of Gennesaret which Philip the tetrarch advanced unto the dignity of a city, both by the number of inhabitants it contained, and its other grandeur, and called it by the name "Julias," the same name with Cesar's daughter' (Ant. XVIII. ii. 1). In other passages he indicates its position as in 'Lower Gaulanitis' (Jaulán), 'in Perea,' and as near the Jordan, which 'first passes by the city and then passes through the middle of the Lake' (BJ II. ix. 1, xiii. 2, also BJ III. x. 7, and Life, 72). In every instance, except the one above quoted, which gives a reason for the change of designation, Josephus drops the old name and calls it 'Julias.' Pliny and Jerome give it the same appellation, and locate it on the eastern side of the Jordan (Plin. HN v. 16; Jer. Com. on Mt 16<sup>3</sup>). The modern designation, 'Bethsaida-Julias,' is not to be found in ancient history, sacred or secular. The site of the city which thus became the successor, under another name, of Bethsaida of Gaulanitis, has not been identified with certainty. After careful research, Dr. Robinson came to the conclusion that a mound of ruins, known as el-Tell, was the most probable location of the long-lost city.

The tell extends from the foot of the northern mountains southwards, near the point where the Jordan issues from them. The ruins cover a large portion of it, and are quite extensive; but so far as could be observed, consist entirely of unburnt stones, without any distinct trace of ancient architecture (BRP ii. p. 413).

The site is over against one of the fording-places of the Jordan, and about 2 miles above its mouth. This tentative identification has been accepted by many recent explorers, but mainly for the reason that the location seems to be the most favourable, because of its commanding position, for such a city as Josephus describes. The objections to it are its distance from the Lake, and the absence of anything which would suggest its original name—'the house (or place) of fishing.'

Another site, to which these objections do not apply, has been suggested by Dr. Thomson at el-Masadiyeh, not far from the eastern bank of the river, and near the Lake, 'distinguished by a few palm trees, foundations of old walls, and fragments of basaltic columns' (Land and Book, ii. 422). This writer advocates the existence of a double city, lying on both sides of the Jordan, as the true solution of the Bethsaida problem, and indicates a site over against el-Masadiyeh, where a few ruins have been found, as the probable location of the Galilean portion of the city. The apparent objections to this site are the boggy and treacherous ground in the vicinity, and the absence of anything that would suggest the existence in former times of a fording-place or a connexion by means of bridges. Wilson accepts Thomson's views; and Schumacher, the noted explorer of the Jaulán region, agrees with him in locating the eastern city at el-Masadiyeh. He suggests also that the royal residence of Philip may have been on the hill at el-Tell, and the fishing village at el-Araj, near the mouth of the Jordan, where are ruins, and that both were connected by a good road still visible (see Jaulán Quarterly Statement, April 1888). Conder, who favours el-Tell, makes the plea on its behalf that local changes in the river delta may have increased the distance materially between this site and the head of the Lake.

Assuming this as a possibility, the place must always have been a considerable distance from the mouth of the Jordan. It is not unlikely, however, as Merrill suggests, that the landing-place of Julius was the original site of the town, and that among the local fishermen it retained the old name for some time after the building of the city of Philip, which would naturally be laid out on higher ground. In the only NT references which can with certainty be attributed to this place, the Evangelists make use of the older name (Lk 9<sup>10</sup>, Mk 8<sup>22</sup>). In the first, the scene of the miracle of the five loaves, it is described as 'a desert,' or vacant place, 'belonging to the city called Bethsaida.' All the Evangelists concur in the statement that it was a place apart from the town, but evidently near it, where the native grass thickly covered the fallow ground and made a comfortable resting-place for the weary multitude. The location which fulfils all the conditions of the narrative is on the eastern ridge of the Batjiba plain, in the immediate vicinity of the Lake.

In the second reference it appears that Jesus, after crossing to the other side from Dalmanutha on the west coast, came to Bethsaida en route to the towns of Caesarea Philippi. While in the city a blind man was brought to Him. It is a significant fact, in keeping with His uniform attitude towards the Gentile cities of this region, that He took the blind man by the hand and led him out of the town, before He restored his sight. In this, says Farrar, 'all that we can dimly see is Christ's dislike and avoidance of these heathenish Herodian towns, with their borrowed Hellenic architecture, their careless customs, and even their very names commemorating, as was the case with Bethsaida-Julias, some of the most contemptible of the human race' (Life of Christ, ch. xxxv).

2. Bethsaida of Galilee.—It has been alleged by some writers that the existence of a western Bethsaida was invented to meet a supposed difficulty in the narrative of the Evangelists. This is not a fair statement of the case. A Bethsaida belonging to the province of Galilee is designated by name as well as implied by incidental reference. Its claims are advocated mainly, if not solely, on the ground that it is in the Gospel record. The objection sometimes urged, that the existence of two towns of the same name in such close proximity is improbable, has little weight in view of the fact that these towns were in different provinces, under different rulers, and in many respects had little in common. The name itself suggests a place favourably situated for fishermen, and might be appropriately applied to more places than one by the Lake side. But see art. CAPERNAUM.

The main points of the argument in favour of a western Bethsaida are as follows:—

(1) The direct testimony given in John's Gospel.—In one passage it is affirmed that Philip, one of the Apostolic band, was of Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter (14<sup>1</sup>); in another (12<sup>2</sup>), that Philip was of Bethsaida of Galilee. This is the testimony of one who is noted for his accuracy in geographical details, who knew every foot of this lake-side region, and who, in common with the other Evangelists, speaks of this trio of disciples as partners in a common industry, and as 'men of Galilee.' 'Gans of Galilee' is a similar expression in the same Gospel, and the fact that the writer mentions the province as all in this connection, is a strong presumptive proof that he wished to distinguish it from the other Bethsaida on the eastern side. The mention of Galilee in John's Gospel determines this place on the west of the Jordan as decidedly as that of Galanitis does the other Bethsaida on the east. The assertion of G. A. Smith, that the province of Galilee included most of the level coastland east of the Lake,—if it applies to Galilee in the time of Christ,—is apparently in conflict with all the evidence which the history of that time has given us. It conflicts also with the positive testimony of Josephus, who places Julius—the city which Dr. Smith associates with Bethsaida—in Galanitis, and under the jurisdiction of Herod Philip.

(2) The well-attested fact that all of the Apostles, except Judas Iscariot, were men of Galilee (Ac 11), furnishes another corroborative proof that the place of residence of the three above mentioned could not have been in the city of Philip (see also Mk 14<sup>7</sup>). They were typical Jews, and their place of employment and all their associations were with their brethren of the same faith on or near the plain of Gennesaret.

(3) In the narrative of the return journey from the place of the feeding of the multitude, it is distinctly mentioned that the disciples embarked in a ship to go before to the 'other side' unto Bethsaida (Mk 6<sup>9</sup>). If the word 'unto' stood alone, there might be some ground for the supposition that the disciples aimed at sailing along the shore towards Julius, but in the description which follows, the Evangelist makes it plain that the 'other side,' as he uses the expression, meant the west shore of the Lake. 'And when they had passed over, they came into the land of Gennesaret.' The parallel accounts convey the same impression and are equally decisive on this point (Mt 14<sup>22-24</sup>, Jn 6<sup>18</sup>). It is true that John adds that 'they went over the sea towards Capernaum,' but there is no discrepancy between the several statements if Robinson is right in identifying Bethsaida with 'Ain et-Tabigha.' The general direction would be the same, and the distance between the two points does not exceed three-quarters of a mile. In keeping with these statements is the mention of the fact that the multitude on the east side, noting the direction taken by the vessel in which the disciples sailed, took shipping the next day and came to Capernaum, seeking for Jesus (Jn 6<sup>22-24</sup>). These passages, interpreted in their natural and ordinary sense, show that the disciples aimed at going to the western side of the Lake in obedience to the command of Jesus. The contrary wind retarded their progress, but it did not take them far out of their course. The mention of Bethsaida, in this connection, with Capernaum makes it highly probable also that its site was somewhere in the same neighbourhood.

(4) There is a manifest verification and corroboration of this testimony in the close association of Bethsaida with Capernaum and Chorazin in the judgment pronounced upon them by our Lord because of their peculiar privileges (Mt 11<sup>20-29</sup>). There is no uncertainty with respect to the import of this denunciation. It could not apply to a Gentile city like Julius, for it is here contrasted with the Gentile cities of Tyre and Sidon. It is evident, also, that its significance inheres in the peculiar privileges of Bethsaida through oft-repeated manifestations of supernatural power in connection with the ministry of Jesus. In other words, it was in the very centre of that field of wonders in Galilee, honoured above all other places in the land as the residence of Jesus, to which multitudes flocked from every quarter. We have the record of three brief visits of Jesus to the semi-heathen population on the eastern side of the Lake, mainly for rest and retirement, but there is no record of 'many mighty works' in any of the towns or cities of this region. This of itself seems to be an unanswerable argument against the proposed identification of the city to which Jesus refers in this connection with the Herodian city of Julius in the province of Galanitis.

The generally accepted site of Bethsaida of Galilee is 'Ain et-Tabigha.' It is situated at the head of a charming little bay on the northern side of the spur which runs out into the Lake at Khan Mingsh. Here, by the ruins of some old mills, is a copious stream of warm, brackish water, fed by several fountains, one of which is the largest spring-head in Galilee. Its course, which now winds and descends amid a tangled mass of rank vegetation to the Lake, was formerly diverted to the plain of Gennesaret by a strongly built reservoir, still standing, which raised the water to an elevation of twenty feet or more. Thence it was carried by an aqueduct and a rock-hewn trench to the northern end of the plain. There is little to indicate the site of the city, except an occasional pier of the aqueduct and the substructures of a few ancient buildings long since overthrown and forgotten.

The natural features of 'Ain et-Tabigha' are a safe harbour, a good anchorage, a lovely outlook over the entire lake, a shelving, shelly beach, admirably adapted to the landing of fishing boats, a coast free from debris and driftwood; and a warm bath of water, where shoals of fish oftentimes crowd together by myriads, 'their backs gleaming above the surface as they bask and tumble in the water' (Macgregor, Red Bay on the Jordan, p. 337). Although surrounded by desolate wastes, this is still the chief 'Fishertown' on the Lake, where nets are dried and mended, and where fish are taken and sorted for the market, as in the days of Andrew, Simon, and Philip.

BETRAYAL—

The Gr. verb for 'betray' is παραδίδομι. παραδίδομι never occurs in the sense of 'betrayal' in the NT; in the Gospels it is used of 'the tradition of the elders' (Mt 15:3-6=Mk 7:8-13), by St. Paul also of the Christian tradition (1 Co 11:2, 2 Th 2:15-16). παραδίδομι, 'traitor,' occurs in Lk 6:16; cf. Ac 7:2, 2 Ti 3:4.

Had Jesus not been betrayed into the hands of His enemies, His death would hardly have been averted, but it would have been delayed. They would fain have seized Him and made short work of Him, but they dared not. He was the popular hero, and they perceived that His arrest would excite a dangerous tumult. The goodwill of the multitude was as a bulwark about Him and kept His enemies at bay, malignant but impotent. The crisis came on 13th Nisan, two days before the Passover (Mt 26:1-2=Mk 14:1-2=Lk 22:1-2). He had met the rulers in a succession of dialectical encounters in the court of the Temple, and had completed their discomfiture by hurling at them in presence of the multitude a crushing indictment. Enraged beyond endurance, they met and debated what they should do. They were resolved upon His death, and they would fain have seized Him and slain Him out of hand; but they dared not, and they agreed to wait until the Feast was over, and the throng of worshippers had quitted Jerusalem. They took counsel together to arrest Jesus by stealth and kill him; but they said: Not during the Feast, lest there arise a tumult among the people.*

Such was the situation when, all unexpectedly, an opportunity for immediate action presented itself. Judas, 'the man of Kerioth,' one of the Twelve, waited on the high priests, probably while Jesus was engaged with the Greeks (Jn 12:30-36), and offered, for sufficient remuneration, to betray Him into their hands. Judas was a disappointed man. He had attached himself to Jesus, believing Him to be the Messiah, and expecting, in accordance with the current conception of the Messianic Kingdom, a rich recompense when the Master should ascend the throne of His father David, and confer offices and honours upon His faithful followers. The period of his discipleship had been a process of disillusionment, and latterly, when he perceived the inevitable issue, he had determined to abandon what he deemed a sinking cause, and save what he might from the wreck. It may be also that he desired to be avenged on the Master who, as he deemed, had fooled him with a false hope.† He therefore went to the high priests and asked what they would give him to betray Jesus into their hands. They leaped at the proposal, and offered him thirty shekels. It was the price of a slave;† and they named it in contempt not of Jesus but of Judas. Even while they trafficked with him, they despised the wretch. Impervious to contempt, he accepted their offer; and, as though in haste to be rid of him, they paid him the money on the spot.

Such, at least, is St. Matthew's report. St. Mark and St. Luke represent them as merely promising money, the amount unspecified. It might be supposed that St. Matthew's account is

* It seems hardly necessary to refer to the theory popularized by De Quincey (Works, vi. 21 ff.), which has since his time found favour with not a few. This ingenious theory seeks to explain the conduct of Judas by attributing the betrayal not to covetousness or spite, but to an honest, if mistaken, determination to 'force the hand' of Jesus and compel Him to assert His Messianic dignity and hasten the establishment of His Kingdom. It may suffice here to remark that this explanation, while psychologically possible, finds no support in the Gospel narratives, and appears to be quite irreconcilable with the stern words of condemnation spoken by our Lord with reference to the action of Judas (cf. e.g. Mt 26:24). 'Woe unto that man through whom the Son of man is betrayed! good were it for that man if he had not been born'. For a full discussion of the motives of the traitor see art. JUDAS ISCARIOT.

† Cf. Ex 21:2; Arak. xiv. 2: 'If anyone kills a slave, good or bad, he has to pay 30 shekels.'

assimilated to Zeo 11:12, 13 (cf. Mt 27:10); but (1) Mt 27:10 proves Jesus by the Sanhedrin. (2) Issevas, even if it be taken in its literal sense, 'weighed,' need not be an unhistorical embellishment borrowed from the prophecy. Cf. PEPES, Apr. 1898, p. 157: 'To this day it is usual in Jerusalem to examine and test carefully all coins received. Thus a Medjide (silver) is examined not only by the eye, but also by noticing its ring on the stone pavement, and English sterling gold is carefully weighed, and returned when defaced.'

It remained that Judas should perform his part of the bargain, but he encountered a difficulty which he had hardly anticipated. Jesus was aware of his design, and, anxious to eat the Passover with His disciples ere He suffered (Lk 22:15), He took pains to checkmate it. The next day was the Preparation, and, when His disciples asked where He would eat the Supper, He gave them a mysterious direction. 'Away into the city,' He said to Peter and John, 'and there shall meet you a man carrying a pitcher of water: follow him.' Some friend in Jerusalem had engaged to provide a room in his house, and Jesus had arranged this stratagem with him, in order that Judas might not know the place and bring in the rulers in the course of the Supper* (Mt 26:17-19=Mk 14:12-13=Lk 22:13).

That evening, as they reclined at table, Jesus, desirous of being alone with His faithful followers, made the startling announcement: 'One of you shall betray me,' and, amid the consternation which ensued, secretly gave Judas his dismissal. The traitor left the room, and, hastening to the high priests, summoned them to action. See ARREST.

DAVID SMITH.

BETROTHAL.—Betrothal among the Jews in the time of Jesus, like so many other social institutions, was in process of transition. Jewish marriage customs were in origin the same as those of other Semitic peoples, but Jewish civilization was far removed from its primitive stages. Unfortunately there is little positive information concerning the ceremony of betrothal in NT times proper. The Talmudic eder on marriage includes two tractates, Kethuboth and Kiddushin, dealing largely with the preliminaries of marriage, the latter especially with betrothal, but it is considerably later than the NT period. Accordingly, one cannot be sure that the elaborate laws therein set forth obtained in the time of Jesus. Yet it is possible by the study of betrothal customs in Hebrew and in Talmudic times to form a highly probable hypothesis as to such customs in the time of Jesus.

1. The OT betrothal ceremony perpetuated in a conventional fashion the recollection of the time when a woman was purchased from her family. This appears in the Heb. word קָנָה (Dt 20<sup>7</sup>, Hos 10<sup>2</sup>). Yet it would be a mistake to regard the use of this word as anything more than a conventional survival. In the days of the codes and the prophets the time was long past when a man's wife was strictly his property. At the same time it is clear that when a woman was designated (qan; Ex 21<sup>8, 9</sup>) by the head of her family as the future wife of another man, there was paid over by the prospective bridegroom a certain sum of money (or service, as in the case of Jacob), and a contract which was inviolable was then entered into (Gn 34<sup>12</sup>, Ex 22<sup>17</sup>). Until the time of the marriage proper the bride-to-be remained in her own family. It was not permissible to betroth her to any other man except by action amounting to divorce, and any violation of the rights established by the betrothal was as serious as if the two persons had been actually married (Dt 22<sup>23, 24</sup>). In the OT period it is not possible to say with precision just how soon the betrothal was followed by the wedding. In later times, in the case of a virgin it was after the lapse of a year, and at least thirty days in the case of a widow; but it is impossible to establish more than a possibility of these periods in OT times. So, too, it is impossible to describe with any great precision the betrothal ceremony, but it certainly included the payment of some sum (môhar; in addition to above references, see 1 S 18<sup>25</sup>), and the making of a betrothal contract (either in vivo, Ezk 16<sup>8</sup>, or in writing) by the prospective bridegroom. We know nothing of any formal ceremony or of the use of a ring (unless [unlikely] it may be in Gn 24<sup>46</sup>). The money payment belonged originally to the family of the woman, but gradually came to belong in part or wholly to the woman herself. The woman might bring wealth to her husband, as in the case of Rachel and Leah, but this was not obligatory in the Hebrew period, and cannot be said to belong to betrothal as such. The first advances might come from the family of either party. There is no clear evidence that the young woman had any right of appeal from the choice of her family. The bridegroom himself very probably did not conduct the negotiations, but this matter was in the hands of a third party, as his parents, or some trusted servant or friend.

After the Exile the custom of the earlier period seems to have continued, although with certain modifications. The payment to the bride's father on the part of the prospective groom had been increasingly regarded as the property, at least in part, of the bride. Such a payment during this period was often supplemented by a dowry in the true sense (To 8<sup>2</sup>, Sir 25<sup>22</sup>). No consent of the girl was demanded, nor do we know of the recognition of any legal age of consent, unless, as in somewhat later times, it was not expected that boys would marry before the age of eighteen or girls before twelve (Aboth v. 21). Although families undoubtedly reached some sort of early arrangement, there is no clear reference to the betrothal of children.

2. In Talmudic times proper there was a distinct tendency to combine betrothal with the wedding. At present the wedding ceremony among orthodox Jews combines the two elements of the two older ceremonies. Possibly because of Western influences the Rabbis became more insistent upon the right of the girl (at least if she had reached her majority, whenever that may have been, Kiddushin, 41a) to give consent, Rab especially urging it. As the two ceremonies were united, in addition to the former betrothal there grew up a much less permanent form of engagement similar to that which obtains among Western peoples to-day. In Jerusalem, at least, there seem to have been certain opportunities (15 of Ab and Kippurim) for young people to become acquainted before the union was determined upon. All men were supposed to marry before the age of 20, and the age of women was a few years less. Other tendencies in Talmudic times were the fixing of the amount of the dowry at not less than 50 zuz, that of the môhar at 200 zuz, and the use of a peculiarly shaped ring. It is interesting to note that the conventionalizing of the môhar is evidenced in the words which are now used for the ceremony of betrothal: קנין 'consecration', אירוסין 'betrothal', קנין 'compact', אירוסין 'conditions'.

3. Thus the ceremony of betrothal in NT times probably involved the following acts: (1) A contract drawn up by the parents or by the 'friend of the bridegroom.' (2) The meeting of the two families concerned, with other witnesses, at which time the groom gave the bride a ring and declared his intention to observe the terms of the contract already arranged. (3) The payment of the môhar. The act of betrothal gained in importance, and the two parties seem to have been seated under a canopy during the procedure, and the company to have joined in an increasingly jovial celebration. Strictly speaking, there was no religious ceremony connected with the act, but if a priest were present he doubtless pronounced some benediction which was subsequently elaborated into that used by later orthodox Judaism. The status of the man and woman was now, as in Hebrew times, practically the same as that of married persons, although it was now generally customary for the wedding ceremony proper to be celebrated at the expiration of a year in the case of a virgin, and in thirty days in the case of a widow. As in the older times, separation of betrothed persons demanded a divorce, and there seems to have been no reason why they should not live together as man and wife without a subsequent wedding ceremony. The children of such a union would be regarded as legitimate.

So far as the relations of Mary and Joseph are concerned, it would appear from the narrative in both Matthew and Luke that in their case the custom of the Jews was followed. The description of the betrothal in the Gospel of Mary is clearly unhistorical and born of pious imagination; but we are justified in believing that Joseph drew up the customary contract, paid a môhar of approximately 200 zuz, and gave Mary a ring. After the formal betrothal (μνηστεύει, Mt 1<sup>8</sup>, Lk 1<sup>27 28</sup>) they are reported to have lived together without a second, or wedding, ceremony. As has already appeared, there would be no question as to the legitimacy of children born of such a union.

SHAILER MATTHEWS.

BIER.—The Gr. word σάβη (Heb. קבר, 2 S 3<sup>31</sup>), 'bier,' more strictly means 'a coffin.' Lk 7<sup>14</sup> is the only place where the word appears in the NT. The bier was an open coffin, or simply a flat wooden frame on which the body of the dead was carried to the grave. Closed coffins were not used in the time of our Lord. According to the Levitical Law, contact with a dead body was forbidden as a source of defilement (Nu 19<sup>11-14</sup>). In raising to life the widow's son at Nain, Jesus, by touching the bier only, avoided any infringement of the letter of the Law. But the miracle, prompted by that same intense sympathy with human sorrow which He so strikingly manifested on another occasion (Jn 11<sup>35</sup>), pointed to a higher and more authoritative law—that Divine eternal law of compassion which received its freest and fullest expression for the first time in His own life, and which forms one of the most distinctive features of His Gospel.

DUGALD CLARK.

BILL.—1. Bill of divorcement: Mk 10<sup>4</sup>, Mt 19<sup>7</sup> (RV): Gr. βιβλίον (a scroll or letter) ἀποστροφίου; shorter equivalent, ἀποστροφίου Mt 5<sup>31</sup>. In all three passages the expression is used of the קטן קנין demanded in Dt 24<sup>1-4</sup> of the husband who divorces his wife. In contrast with the older usage—still prevalent in the East—of divorce by a merely verbal process, the need of preparing a written document was calculated to be a bar against hasty or frivolous action, while the bill itself served the divorced wife as a certificate of her right to marry again. The Rabbin, who dwelt with special gusto ('non sine complacentia quadam'—Lightfoot) on the subject of divorce, had drawn up regulations as to the proper wording of the bill of divorcement, its sealing and witnessing, and the number of lines—neither less nor more than twelve—the writing must occupy. In the eyes of Jesus, no document, however formal, could prevent divorce from being a violation of God's purpose in instituting marriage. See Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in Mt 5<sup>3</sup>.

2. A bond (so RV) or written acknowledgment of debt, Lk 16<sup>7</sup>: Gr. (Ti, Tr, WH) τὰ γράμματα, (TR) τὸ γράμμα. The word itself is indefinite (literally—'the letters'), and throws no light upon a question much discussed by commentators on the parable of the Unjust Steward, viz. Was the bond merely an acknowledgment of a debt, or was it an undertaking to pay a fixed annual rental from the produce of a farm? Edersheim decides, though without giving his reasons, for the former alternative: Lightfoot inclines to the latter. Against the theory of a simple debt is the fact that the amount of the obligation is stated in kind—wheat and oil—and not in money; and the probability of the story is heightened if we are to understand that the remissions authorized by the steward—amounting in money value, according to Edersheim, to the not very considerable sums of £5 and £25 respectively—affected not a single but an annual payment. But, on the other hand, as van Koetsfeld, who argues strongly for the view that the document was of the nature of a lease, admits, there is no precedent for the word (γραμμάτιον) rendered 'debtors' being used for tenants. Jülicher dismisses the whole controversy as irrelevant. Another point in dispute is whether the old bond was altered, or a new one substituted for it. Lightfoot and Edersheim again take different sides. The alteration of the old bond is suggested, though not absolutely demanded, by the language of the passage, and would be, according to Edersheim, in accordance with the probabilities of the case. Acknowledgments of debt were usually written on wax-covered tablets, and could easily be altered, the stylus in use being provided, not only with a sharp-pointed kithēbbē or writer, but with a flat thick mishkē or eraser. In any case it is clear that the 'bill' was written by the person undertaking the obligation; that it was the only formal evidence of the obligation; and that its supervision belonged to the functions of the steward. Hence, should the steward conspire with the debtors against his master's interests, the latter had no check upon the fraud.

I. ST. LUKE'S ACCOUNT.—1. Jewish element and colouring.—The two accounts of our Lord's birth in the Gospels carry us at once into the very heart of Jewish home life. In the fuller account of the two, that of St. Luke, the evidence of this Jewish element has been materially strengthened by recent literature and discussion. No one, e.g., can read the early Canticles in St. Luke's Gospel without noticing their intensely Jewish character. This was amply shown by Eyle and James in their edition of the Psalms of Solomon (see esp. pp. xci, xcii), a work which may fairly be placed some half century or so before our Lord's Advent. In the same manner Chase has illustrated many points of contact between these Canticles and the language of the Eighteen Prayers of the synagogue.* More recently Sanclay has emphasized the same argument, more especially in relation to the Benedictus, in which he finds quite a piling up of expressions characteristic of the old popular Messianic expectation; the first five or six verses are quite sufficient to mark this essentially pre-Christian character (Critical Questions, p. 133; see also Nebe, Die Kindheitsgeschichte unseres Herrn Jesu Christi nach Matthäus und Lukas ausgelegt, 1893, p. 166 ff.; and even Gunkel, Zum religionsgeschichtlichen Verständnis des NT, 1903, p. 67).†

This question of the composition of the Canticles in St. Luke is a very important one, because it is constantly assumed that they were the invention of the author of the Third Gospel. But in this case we have to assume that the Greek Luke, or some unknown writer, was able to transfer himself in thought to times when Jewish national hopes, which were shattered by the loss of the capital, were still vividly cherished in Jewish circles, and that he was able to express those hopes in the popular language current at the date of our Lord's birth with a marked absence of any later Christian conceptions.

And yet with all this Jewish colouring there is in these Canticles a depth and a charm which have appealed to men everywhere throughout the Christian centuries. No one recognized the Jewish element in these early chapters of St. Luke more frankly than M. Renan; but he could also write of the Magnificat, Gloria in Excelsis, Benedictus, Nunc Dimittis: 'Never were sweeter songs invented to put to sleep the sorrows of poor humanity' (Les Évangiles, p. 278).

2. Objections taken to the contents of Lk 1. 2.—The extravagant assertion must, of course, not be forgotten, that we owe these opening chapters of St. Luke, or at least some of their details, to the influence of other great Eastern religions. A discussion of this assertion may more properly be referred to the art. VIRGIN BIRTH.‡ But a word

* 'The Lord's Prayer in the Early Church' (TS 1. 3, p. 147 ff.).
 † Harnack, in his Lectures and Aufsätze, i. p. 307 ff. (1894), maintains that while St. Luke has undoubtedly used a Jewish-Christian document in chs. 1 and 2, he has also introduced touches acceptable to a Greek, and that one word, in common use to-day, was wanting in the original Christian phraseology, the word 'Saviour.' According to Harnack, we owe this word to St. Luke, a word so often used by the Greeks to designate their gods, and thus it found its way into Lk 2<sup>11</sup>. St. Paul scarcely knew it; but shortly after his time, when we come to St. Luke, it is otherwise. It is further argued that we look for the word in vain in St. Mark or St. Matthew. But, to say nothing of its use by St. John, cf. Jn 4<sup>18</sup> and 1 Jn 4<sup>14</sup>, St. Matthew (12) emphasizes the meaning of the word Jesus, 'for it is he that shall save (ἀγαθός) his people from their sins'; and St. Paul in his first recorded missionary address speaks of 'a Saviour Jesus' (σωτήρ Ἰησοῦς), and connects His coming with the remission of sins (Ac 13<sup>26-29</sup>). Cf. Ph 3<sup>20</sup> and Ac 5<sup>21</sup>, an admittedly early source; also Ps-Sol 109 169.

 § See, however, amongst the most recent writers, A. Jeremias, Babylonisches im NT, pp. 48, 49, and his able criticism.

may here be said upon the most recent attempt to trace this alleged influence, in Indische Einflüsse auf evangelische Erzählungen, by G. A. van den Burgh van Eysinga, 1904. On p. 22 ff. a whole series of alleged parallels is quoted between the coming of the aged Simeon into the Temple and the coming of the sage Asita into the Palace to do homage to the infant Buddha. While the writer is constrained (p. 23) to admit that the whole of the story of Simeon is told in a strongly Hebraistic style, he maintains that it is not said that the original motive of the incident is also of Hebrew origin. But in this connexion it is very significant that, while a supposed parallel is alleged between every verse which tells of Simeon (Lk 2<sup>28-32</sup>) and the story of Asita, there is one verse (v. 32) for which no parallel is adduced; and it is difficult to see that any other than a motive of Hebrew origin could inspire such words as these: 'and it had been revealed unto him by the Holy Spirit that he should not see death before he had seen the Lord's Christ.' The contrast is rightly marked between the pious resignation of Simeon and the wail of Asita over his departure amid the ruins of old age and death. But what could be more absurd than to find a parallel (p. 22) between Asita taking his path across the sky by the way of the wind, and the statement of St. Luke that Simeon came ἐν τῷ πνεύματι into the Temple?

From a somewhat different point of view these Jewish conceptions are noteworthy. In Lk 1<sup>32</sup> we read: 'He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Most High: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the throne of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end.' Here again we have language closely resembling that of the Psalms of Solomon, e.g. 17<sup>4-8, 23</sup>, full of Jewish thought and expectation, expressing the hopes of the times at which it purports to be written, but scarcely such as would have been invented by a Christian composer.* But we are asked to believe that into the midst of this Jewish language some Christian writer wished to introduce a statement of our Lord's virgin birth, and that he did so by the interpolation of the next two verses, Lk 1<sup>34-35</sup>. As a matter of fact, there is no valid ground for regarding these two verses as interpolated. They are retained by the most distinguished editors of the NT both in England and Germany, e.g. WH, Blass, Nestle; even Gunkel can see no reason for their excision (Zum religions-geschichtlichen Verständnis des NT, 1903, p. 66).

There are one or two points connected with this alleged interpolation which we may notice without encroaching upon the art. VIRGIN BIRTH.

(a) We are struck with the extraordinary reserve and brevity of the statement, a reserve which characterizes the whole story in Lk 1. 2. These two verses (1<sup>34-35</sup>) contain, we are told, the only reference to the virgin birth. Let us suppose for a moment that this is so; and if so we cannot but contrast the language with that of the Protevangelium Jacobi, with its fantastic and prurient details, or even with that portion of the Ascension of Isaiah, viz. the Vision of Isaiah, which carries us back, according to Charles, within the lines of the first Christian century (Ascen. Is. p. xxiii ff.).

(b) Let us suppose that these two verses are no longer to find a place in the story, what then? It has been urged with truth that the whole of St. Luke's narrative is impregnated with the underlying idea that when Christ was born His mother was a virgin, and that it is impossible to omit this element without destroying the whole (Church Quarterly Review, July 1904, p. 383).

* The phraseology of the suspected vv. 34, 35 is unmistakably Hebraistic' (G. H. Box in ZNTW, 1906, Heft 1, p. 62).

'The Christian belief,' writes Professor V. Rose of Fribourg, 'is manifest from the whole trend of the Gospel of the Infancy, Mary it is who, contrary to all Hebrew use, appears alone upon the scene. While Zacharias receives the celestial promise of the birth of a son, while he himself hymns the opening of the Messianic era and the destiny of John, Joseph plays not the smallest part in the mystery of Jesus. Mary is entirely in the foreground: to her the angel addresses himself; the prophecy of Zachariah has to do with her; she speaks to the child found in the Temple; Joseph says nothing; he keeps in the background. His position in the family is that of guardian, the supporter of Mary, the protector of Jesus' (Studies in the Gospels, 1903, p. 72).

(c) If the interpolator of these two verses in question had done his work so 'clearly and effectively' as Schmiedel maintains, it is surely surprising that he should have allowed any of those passages in the original document to stand which could refer in any way to Joseph's parentage. These references, e.g. 27<sup>38-41</sup>, 8, 8, would have seriously impaired both the clearness and effectiveness of his work. But suppose, on the other hand, that the whole story comes to us from one who was well acquainted with all the facts of the case, we can then understand why he could allow the passages about Joseph to stand; in common estimation our Lord passed for the son of Joseph; probably in the register of births He was thus described; and from a social point of view it was necessary, as we shall see, that this should be so.

3. Probable sources of St. Luke's information.—St. Luke's account gives us not only a picture of Jewish home life, but it also reveals the workings of a Jewish mother's heart; it gives us with unmistakable clearness, and yet with the utmost delicacy and reserve, information which could scarcely have come from any one in the first instance but a woman (this is admirably shown by Ramsay in the second chapter of Was Christ born at Bethlehem?). Whether this information reached St. Luke through a written document or whether it came to him orally, we cannot say, and from the present point of view it does not matter. For the impression which is derived from his account is twofold,—not only that it is of Palestinian origin, but also that it is derived from Mary the mother of the Lord, or from those who were closely acquainted with her.*

It has been lately suggested, with much force and learning, that the information derived in the first place from the Virgin herself may have reached St. Luke through Joanna (Sanday, Critical Questions, p. 157). Evidently St. Luke had some special source of information connected with the court of the Herods, and Joanna the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, appears no fewer than four times upon the stage of the Gospel history. She accompanies our Lord amongst the other women in Galilee; she was one of the group of women who had witnessed the Crucifixion, and who afterwards went to the grave on the morning of the first Easter Day; and it may be safely inferred that she was one of the women in the upper room after the Ascension. We can scarcely doubt that she and the Virgin Mother were often in each other's company. It may, of course, be alleged that St. Luke's news about the Herods may have reached him through other channels, and that there is no proof that he was personally acquainted with Joanna.

If credit be allowed to the Acts of the Apostles, it would seem that St. Luke himself, as also St.

* See the remarks of Wright, Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek, p. 292; Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, I, 31. Recent attempts have been made to ascribe the Magnificat to Elizabeth, and the arguments for and against this view will be found in PRE vol. xii, (1903), p. 72 f. But in spite of all that has been urged by Harnack (Sitzungsb. d. Königl. Preuss. Akad. der Wissensch. zu Berlin, xxvii, 1900), it is difficult to believe that the words 'the lowliness of his handmaid,' are not most naturally connected with the words of Mary to the angel, 'Behold, the handmaid of the Lord' (Lk 1<sup>48</sup>), and that the words 'shall call me blessed' are not best referred to the words spoken by Elizabeth to Mary (vv. 43-45). On the proposal to find in the words of Mary, 'all generations shall call me blessed,' an imitation of the words of Leah in Gn 30<sup>23</sup> see Nebe, Die Kindheitsgeschichte, p. 136; Flummer, St. Luke, ad loc., also Jacquier, Histoire de NT, II, 504 (1905). The contrast far exceeds any comparison, as these writers show. The combination in Mary of the deepest humility with a firm consciousness of her own high calling and future renown is very striking. See, further, Burn, Niceta of Remesiana, 1206, p. ciii ff.

Paul, may well have come into personal contact with one or more members of the Holy Family. We read, for instance, in Ac 21<sup>8</sup>, in one of the 'We' sections of that book: 'And the day following Paul went in with us unto James; and all the elders were present.' How much St. Luke may have learnt from St. James the Lord's brother, it is, of course, presumptuous to say; but he may at least have learnt something during his stay in Jerusalem as to the place and the circumstances connected with our Lord's birth. We cannot forget the Evangelist's claim to have traced the course of all things accurately from the first (Lk 1), and he would scarcely have neglected the opportunities of information which were open to him in Jerusalem and afterwards in Caesarea.

4. Bethlehem as our Lord's birthplace.—The intercourse just referred to would at least have saved St. Luke from the gross geographical blunder which he has been accused of making at the outset of his history, the blunder of confusing Bethlehem-Judah with another Bethlehem in Galilee (see, in relation to this alleged blunder, Knowling, Our Lord's Virgin Birth and the Criticism of To-day, pp. 6-13). But the recently published remarks of Sanday may well be remembered in this connexion (Sacred Sites of the Gospels, p. 25):—

'There are two Bethlehems, the second in Galilee, about seven miles west of Nazareth, and it has recently been suggested in the Encyc. Biblica that the Galilean Bethlehem was the true scene of the Nativity. There would be real advantages if Bethlehem could be thought of as near to Nazareth. But to obtain this result we have to go entirely behind our Gospels. Both St. Matthew and St. Luke are express in placing the birth of Christ at Bethlehem of Judaea. And as their narratives are wholly independent of each other, and differ in most other respects, it is clear that we have on this point a convergence of two distinct traditions.'

Professor Usener, indeed, fastens upon the passage Jn 7<sup>41</sup>, and sees in it the hidden path by which Bethlehem found its way into the Gospel tradition (Encyc. Bibl. iii. 3347). But there is no reason for supposing that the writer of the Fourth Gospel was himself unaware of our Lord's birth at Bethlehem, because he expresses the popular expectation of the ignorant multitude. If the Gospel was written at the late date demanded by advanced critics, his ignorance of such a belief would be altogether unaccountable. Quite apart from our Gospels, Charles would refer the remarkable passage in the Assession of Isaiah, 11<sup>2-22</sup> to a very early date, deriving it from the archetype which he carries back to the close of the 1st cent. (Intrad. pp. xxii-xlv); and from a comparison of v.<sup>2</sup> and v.<sup>12</sup> it can scarcely be doubted that Bethlehem-Judah was meant throughout the narrative as the scene of our Lord's birth. But if the writer of the Fourth Gospel was St. John, it is a most arbitrary procedure to see in this passage (7<sup>41</sup>) any proof that the place of the Nativity was unknown to him. Are we to suppose that St. John was also ignorant of our Lord's descent from David? * an inference which might equally seem to follow from the passage before us, unless we remember that the Evangelist is presupposing that his readers would be well aware of the true descent of Jesus and the actual place of His birth (see this point admirably put by Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 96).

Nor does the fact that our Lord was popularly known as Jesus of Nazareth in any way interfere with the truth that He was born at Bethlehem. It has, indeed, not unfrequently happened that a man has been associated with, or even named after, a town where his youth and early manhood have been passed, rather than after the actual place of his birth, in which his parents may have sojourned for a while (B. Weiss, Leben Jesu, i. 227). It will, of course, be said that prophecy pointed to our Lord's birth at Bethlehem, and that St. Matthew (2) distinctly quotes Micah's words in this connexion. But was the prophecy fulfilled? On the one hand, we are asked to believe that St. Luke starts his narrative not only with a geographical, but also with a grave historical blunder, and that he confuses an enrolment of Herod with the subsequent enrolment, some ten years later, of Ac 5<sup>7</sup>. On the other hand, it is urged that St. Luke's accuracy, so well attested in other respects, would have saved him from making an initial and needless error, and that the least consideration would have prevented him from connecting such an event as an enrolment of the people with the birth of the Messiah at Bethlehem, unless it was true. Undoubtedly both OT prediction and Rabbinic teaching pointed to Bethlehem, yet the prophecy was fulfilled according to the Gospel story by the introduction of a set of circumstances which were strangely alien to Jewish national thought and prestige: 'a counting of the people, or census, and that census taken at the bidding of a heathen emperor, and executed by one so universally hated as Herod, would represent the ne plus ultra of all that was most repugnant to Jewish feeling' (Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, i. 181). As any rate, we know quite enough of Jewish susceptibilities and of Jewish fanaticism in the 1st cent. of our era to be sure that a ruler like Herod, and in his position, would naturally guard against any undue exasperation of Jewish national and religious feeling. If it is urged that the story of the Nativity was bound in any case to bring Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, the city of David, it would have been easier and more significant to have adopted the theory of Strauss, to the effect that the parents were led to go to Bethlehem by the appearance of an angel, especially when we remember that the frequent introduction of angelic visitors is described as one of the special characteristics of the writings of St. Luke.

5. The census of Quirinius.—It is one of the great merits of Professor Ramsay's theory, that it not only claims credibility for the enrolment of Lk 2<sup>2</sup> as an historical event, but that it also combines with that claim a due recognition of Jewish national prejudices. The word for 'enrolment' (ἀπογραφή), or its plural, was the word for the periodic enrolments which beyond all doubt were made in Egypt, probably initiated by Augustus. These enrolments were numberings of the people according to households, and had nothing to do with the valuation for purposes of taxation. But H. Holtzmann urges in objection that Egypt is not Syria (Hand-Commentar zum NT, 1901, p. 316). On the other hand, however, it does not seem unreasonable to suppose that such enrolments would take place in other parts of the empire,* especially under a ruler so systematic as Augustus; and this probability Ramsay has not forgotten to illustrate. Moreover, as the same writer urges, we have to take into account the delicate and difficult position of Herod, who was obliged, on the one hand, to carry out the imperial policy, whilst, on the other hand, he was called upon to rule over a fanatical people full of stubborn pride and inherent suspicions. What under such circumstances would be more likely than that Herod would endeavour to give a tribal and family character to the enrolment, in fact, to conduct it on national lines which would harmonize as far as possible with Jewish sentiment.* Here probably lies the true distinction between the first enrolment, which was one of a series, and the enrolment (Ac 5<sup>7</sup>) which was conducted after the Roman fashion, and became the cause not only of indignation, but of rebellion. Here, too, we have the probable explanation as to why Joseph and the Virgin Mother left their home at Nazareth for Bethlehem. If the enrolment had been taken on Roman lines, there would have been no motive for the journey, since in that case only a recognition of existing political and social facts would have been involved; but in the present instance the Roman method was judiciously modified by the introduction of a numbering not only by households, but by tribes. There is, then, no confusion between this enrolment of Herod's and the subsequent enrolment of 6-7 A.D.,—a confusion that would involve a blunder of some ten years,—as Schmiedel and Pfeiderer maintain; but, on the contrary, a careful distinction is drawn between them.

* Percy Gardner (art. 'Quirinius' in Encyc. Bibl. iv. 3 ff.) admits that 'one or two definite, though not conclusive pieces of evidence seem to indicate that this periodical census was not confined to Egypt, but was, in some cases at all events, extended to Syria.'

Moreover, since the publication of his first book on the subject, Ramsay has collected fresh details to support his thesis.† The year, for instance, which he claims for the first periodic census seems to demand an interval of some two years between it and the earliest date for the Birth of our Lord. This somewhat lengthy interval, which has been urged against the theory, may perhaps be accounted for by the situation of affairs in Palestine, which presented at the time considerable difficulty and anxiety. But a fair and contemporary analogy, so far as length of time is concerned, may be found in another part of the Roman Empire, and in a much simpler operation than that of a census. The kingdom of Paphlagonia was incorporated in the Roman province Galatia; but although the taking of the oath of allegiance was, as compared with a census, a matter which required little preparation and instruction of officials, yet nearly, or perhaps more than, two years elapsed before the oath was actually administered (Expositor, Nov. 1901, p. 221 ff.).

One of the most acute and prominent opponents of St. Luke's accuracy in regard to the question before us is Professor Schürer, who in GHF (vol. I, [1901] pp. 508-548) deals seriatim with the difficulties which, in his opinion, St. Luke's statement involves.

(1) Schürer, first of all, points out that history knows nothing of a general census of the empire in the time of Augustus. But, as Ramsay rightly says, the contrary assertion stands on a very different level of probability from that which it occupied before the Egyptian discovery. And if there is evidence that the periods of the Egyptian enrolments were frequently coincident with the holding of a census in other parts of the empire, we come very near to St. Luke's statement, that Augustus laid down a general principle of taking a census of the whole Roman world.

(2) It is maintained by Schürer that if St. Luke describes Joseph as travelling to Bethlehem because he was of the house and lineage of David, this presupposes that the lists for the census were prepared according to descent and families, which was by no means the Roman method. But Ramsay's whole contention is that the 'enrolment' in question was conducted not according to Roman, but according to Jewish, methods.

It is urged, says Schürer, 'that in this census an accommodation was made to Jewish customs and prejudice.' But he argues that although this was often the case under the Empire, yet in this instance such a method would have been too burdensome and inconvenient; and, further, that it is very questionable whether such an 'enrolment' according to tribes and families was practicable, since in many cases it was no longer possible to trace the link of connexion with some particular tribe or family. But with regard to the former of these points, it is quite consistent with Ramsay's theory that the 'enrolment' should have taken a considerable time, and with regard to the second point we are fortunately able to quote Dalman as to the accuracy with which family registers were kept among the Jews. He points out that the title 'Son of David' would not have been ascribed to Jesus if it had been believed that He did not satisfy the genealogical conditions implied by the name. The Book of Chronicles, which gives (1 Ch 17) the promise of 2 S 7, revived afresh the idea of the royal destiny of the family of David, and thereby contributed to the preservation of the household traditions of descendants of David. Dalman adds, 'Where, in addition to proud recollections, national hopes of the greatest moment were bound up with a particular lineage, those belonging to it would be as unlikely to forget their origin as, in our own day, for instance, the numerous descendants of Muhammad, or the peasant families of Norway who are descended from ancient kings.' And he adds, 'Hence it results that no serious doubts need be offered to the idea of a trustworthy tradition of Davidic descent in the family of Joseph' (Die Worte Jesu, i. p. 296).

* On this practical method of thus avoiding any outrage upon Jewish national feeling, see, further, B. Weiss, Leben Jesu, i. 221. Turner (art. 'Chronology' in Hastings' DB i. 406) also points out that Herod may well have been mindful of the susceptibilities of the Jews, and so, in avoiding the scandal caused by the later census (Ac 5<sup>7</sup>), avoided also the notice of history.

† Zöckler (art. 'Jesus Christus' in PRE) speaks of Ramsay's theory in terms of approval; Chassé speaks of the same theory as having advanced many steps the probability that St. Luke's reference to the enrolment under Quirinus is historical (Supernatural Element in our Lord's earthly Life, p. 21); while Kenyon (art. 'Papyri' in Hastings' DB, Ed. Vol. 309) speaks of the light which the discovery of the census-records in Egypt has thrown upon the chronology of the NT, although, as he adds, Professor Ramsay's is the only attempt to work out the problem in detail.

(3) But Schürer has by no means come to the end of his arguments. The decisive proof against a census in the time of Herod is this, that Josephus characterizes the census of Ac 5<sup>7</sup> as something entirely new and unheard of, and that it became on that account the cause of indignation and rebellion.* But admitting these statements of Josephus, what then? Simply this, that his language is amply justified with reference to the passage mentioned, viz. Ac 5<sup>7</sup>. The year a.d. 7, as Josephus has it, did mark a new departure; the taxing then made was made after the Roman fashion; it was wholly removed in its method and in its consequences from the earlier enrolment under Herod. It is therefore evident that whilst Josephus might well refer to the revolt under Judas of Galilee as the cause of the taxation, there was no reason why St. Luke should not refer to the enrolment of some ten to fourteen years earlier with which no rebellious excitement was connected.

(4) In his latest edition Schürer is very severe with regard to Ramsay's theory that Quirinus was associated with Quintilius Varus, the latter being the regular governor of Syria for its internal administration, while the former administered the military resources of the province. This, according to Ramsay, would bring Quirinus to Syria a.c. 7-6, and the 'enrolment' of Palestine took place at the same time. St. Luke does not say that Quirinus was governor; he uses a vague word with regard to him, a word which might mean that the 'enrolment' was made while Quirinus was acting as leader (synes) in Syria; and it seems quite possible that St. Luke should speak of Quirinus in this way, since he was holding the delegated synes of the Emperor in his command of the armies of Syria. But Schürer presses his point, and makes much of the unlikelihood that St. Luke would date his census not from the ordinary governor, but from one who had nothing to do with the taking of the census. Yet it must be remembered that there are undoubtedly examples of frequent temporary associations of duties in Roman administration, and it is quite possible that Quirinus may have been concerned in the census, as Plummer suggests (art. 'Quirinus' in Hastings' DB iv. 183).† Moreover, it may be fairly urged, as it is in fact by Ramsay, that Quirinus ruled for a shorter time than Varus, and that as he controlled the foreign relations of the province he furnished the best means of dating (Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 246; see also p. 105). But if we once admit that St. Luke's words do not involve the belief that Quirinus was the actual governor of Syria, the view that Quirinus may have been sent as an extraordinary legate to Syria, and as such had undertaken the administration of the census, is well worthy of consideration. This view is mentioned by Schürer (loc. cit. p. 549), although only to be rejected. But Ramsay (p. 245) points out that if this supposition is accepted, it may be observed that Quirinus as the commissioner for Syria and Palestine would be a delegate exercising the emperor's authority, and might rightly be said to represent the synes. At all events this view offends against no method of Roman procedure (as Schürer apparently allows), and it may fairly be said to be quite compatible with the language which St. Luke employs.

When we consider the many difficulties which surround this sezata questio, it is somewhat surprising that Professor Schürer should affirm that all possible means of escape from the conclusion are closed, the conclusion being that St. Luke's statement conflicts with the facts of history (l.c. p. 642). Having arrived at this very dogmatic result, he points out that anyone who cannot attribute such an error to Luke should bear in mind that the Evangelist is not free from the perpetration of other blunders. He confuses, e.g., the Theudas in Ac 21, the Theudas who rises up before Judas of Galilee, with the Theudas who lived some forty years later. But Schürer must be well aware that many able critics do not accept this further summary assertion on his part of St. Luke's ignorance, and that his own learned countryman Dr. F. Blass passes the sensible judgment in his Commentary on Ac 27, that St. Luke's accuracy in other respects should prevent us from attributing to him here such a grave error as is sometimes alleged. Moreover, it should be remembered that it is precisely in points connected with the administration of the Roman provinces that St. Luke's accuracy has been so repeatedly proved. Consider as a single instance the manner in which in the acts he is able not merely to distinguish between Imperial and Senatorial provinces, but also to note accurately the particular period during which a certain province was under one or the other kind of rule. Or if we turn to the Gospel, we recall how a keen controversy has raged around the statement in Lk 31 with regard to Lysanias the tetrarch of Abilene. Here, too, St. Luke has been accused of manifest inaccuracy. But, to say nothing of the recent discovery of two inscriptions which have been fairly cited in support of St. Luke's correctness, it may be observed that Schmiedel reluctantly allows (art. 'Lysanias' in Encyc. Bibl. III, 2342) that it cannot possibly be shown, or even assumed, that St. Luke is here mistaken, while Schürer entertains no such hesitation, and frankly states that 'the Evangelist Luke is thoroughly correct when he assumes that in the fifteenth year of Tiberius there was a Lysanias tetrarch of Abilene (l.c. p. 719). And yet within a few lines of this evidence of correctness we are asked to believe that the same Evangelist was guilty of a gratuitous and stupid blunder in relation to the enrolment under Quirinus.

† In this connexion Plummer points out that Justin Martyr refers to Quirinus at the time of the Nativity by a word equivalent to one holding the office of procurator, and not by a word signifying legate, as Quirinus afterwards became in a.d. 6. The only other place in which St. Luke uses the word employed in the phrase 'when Quirinus was governor of Syria' refers to a procurator (Lk 3), and this fact adds weight to the supposition that, while at the time of the enrolment Varus was actually legate, Quirinus may have held some such command as that indicated above. H. Holtmann (Hilfsm., 1901, i. p. 317) dismisses Ramsay's proposed explanation somewhat contemptuously; but he has nothing to say with regard to the analogous case of a temporary division of duties in Roman administration, or to those quoted by R. S. Bour, who is essentially in agreement with Ramsay in the proposed solution.

ii. ST. MATTHEW'S ACCOUNT.—1. Use of OT prophecy.—While St. Luke narrates the events which lead to the Birth at Bethlehem without making any definite reference to OT prophecy, it is noticeable that St. Matthew (2<sup>d</sup>) quotes definitely the prophecy of Micah (5th) with reference to the home of David: 'And thou Bethlehem, land of Judah, art in nowise least among the princes of Judah: for out of thee shall come forth a governor, which shall be shepherd of my people Israel.' The prophecy was undoubtedly regarded as Messianic (Zahn, Das Evangelium des Matthäus, 1903, p. 94; Schürer, l.c. ii. 527-530).

The difference in the wording of Mt 28 and Mic 5th is easily accounted for, if we bear in mind that the Evangelist reproduces the prophecy in the manner popular at the time, i.e. he quotes some Targum on the passage, or, as Edersheim puts it, Mic 5th is rendered paraphrastically, and this would fairly cover the variations in the two renderings (Jesus die Messiasch. I, p. 206; cf. also Delitzsch, Messianische Weissagungen, p. 126). But if Schürer is correct in seeing in the prophecy of Micah the Messiah's goings forth had been from of old, from everlasting, i.e. to signify the Messiah's pre-existence, yet it cannot be said that Jewish theology pointed to a birth such as that recorded by St. Matthew.

It is no wonder that Zahn (l.c. p. 83) should characterize as altogether fantastic the attempt to derive the stories of St. Matthew and St. Luke from the Rabbinic exegesis of Is 71, when there is no reason to assume that the prophet's words were taken at the time of our Lord's birth to refer to the Messiah at all (see also Weber, Jüdische Theologie, pp. 854, 857; and von Orelli, art. 'Messias' in REB, 1902, and esp. Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, i. 226). But this is a subject for which reference may be made to art. VIRGIN BIRTH.

2. Relation to Jewish legal requirements.—St. Matthew's account, which with every due concession may fairly be regarded as dating in its present form within the limits of the 1st cent., demands our attention for further reasons. It is remarkable, for example, how strictly it adheres to Jewish legality, and yet at the same time how delicately the feelings and thoughts of Joseph are portrayed (cf. G. H. Box, l.c. p. 82).

With regard to the first point, it may be noted that 'after the betrothal the bride was under the same restrictions as a wife. If unfaithful, she ranked and was punished as an adulteress (Dt 22<sup>28</sup>); and, on the other hand, the bridegroom, if he wished to break the contract, had the same privileges, and had also to observe the same formalities, as in the case of divorce. The situation is illustrated in the history of Joseph and Mary, who were on the footing of betrothal' (art. 'Marriage' in Hastings' DB iii.; cf. also Nebe, Kindheitsgeschichte, pp. 199, 200, and Zahn, l.c. p. 71). In this connexion one may also refer to another passage in Dalman with reference to the descent of Jesus: 'A case such as that of Jesus,' he writes, 'was, of course, not anticipated by the Law; but if no other human fatherhood was alleged, then the child must have been regarded as bestowed by God upon the house of Joseph; for a betrothed woman, according to Jewish law, already occupied the same status as a wife' (Die Worte Jesu, i. p. 253). See BETROTHAL.

If we bear this in mind, we can see how easy it is to interpret the reading of the Sinaitic-Syriac palimpsest, of which so much has been made, in Lk 28 'he and Mary his wife, that they might be enrolled.' All that the words show, if we allow that they are the correct reading, is that Mary was under the full legal protection of Joseph: 'unless, indeed, our Lord had passed in common estimation as the son of Joseph,' it has been well pointed out that it is difficult to see how Joseph, according to Mt 19, could have gratified his wish 'not to expose' Mary. And so again 'Joseph was without doubt the foster-father of our Lord; and if any register of births was kept in the Temple or elsewhere, he would probably be there described as the actual father. Such he was from a social point of view, and it was therefore no wilful suppression of the truth when the most blessed amongst women said to her Son, "Thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing" (Mrs. Lewis in the Essex Times, 1900, 1901, where illustrations from Eastern social customs may be also found). Cf. W. C. Allen, Interpreter, Feb. 1905, p. 118.

3. Sobriety and delicacy of the narrative.—If we turn again to what we may call the inwardness of St. Matthew's story, we can scarcely fail to be struck with its singular sobriety and reserve. We hear nothing of any anger or reproach on the part of Joseph against his betrothed, although as 'a righteous man' he feels that only one course is open to him. But with this decision other considerations were evidently still contending,—considerations the very existence of which bore testimony to the purity and fidelity of Mary. The words of the angel (Mt 19) say nothing of the appeasement of indignation, they speak rather of the befitting conquest of hesitation and doubt: 'fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife,' i.e. to take unto thee one who had and still has a claim to that honoured and cherished name. No wonder that Dean Plumptre could write that the glimpse given us into the character of Joseph is one of singular tenderness and beauty (see Elliott's Commentary, in loco). If any one will read this delicate and beautiful description and place it side by side with that given us in the Protöevangelium Jacobi, where, e.g., both Joseph and the priest bitterly reproach Mary, and a whole series of prurient details is given, he will again become painfully aware of the gulf which separates the Canonical from the Apocryphal Gospels.

4. Objections taken to the contents of Mt 1. 2.—St. Matthew's record, no less than that of St. Luke, has been the object of vehement and relentless attack. It is asserted, for instance, by Usener that in the whole Birth and Childhood story of St. Matthew a pagan substratum can be traced (art. 'Nativity' in Encyc. Bibl. iii. 3352, and also to the same effect ZATW, 1903, p. 21). Thus we are asked to find the origin of the story of the Magi worshipping at the cradle of the infant Jesus in the visit paid by the Parthian king Tiridates with magi in his train to do homage in Rome to the emperor Nero. But the magi of the Parthian king were evidently, like many of other magi of the East, claimants to the possession of secret and magical arts, and there is nothing strange in the fact that they are found among the retinue of a Parthian king. But what actual points of resemblance exist between this visit to Nero and the visit of the Magi to Bethlehem it is difficult to see. One crucial contrast, at any rate, has been rightly emphasized. Tiridates came to Nero, not of his own accord, but because his only choice was to do homage to Nero or to lose his crown. Here there is no comparison with, but rather an obvious and essential contrast to, the Wise Men of St. Matthew, who came with joy and gladness to worship the Babe of Bethlehem.

Soltau, who also supports the same origin for St. Matthew's story, adduces the parallels which in his opinion may be fitly drawn between the visit of the Parthian king to Rome and the visit of the Magi to Bethlehem (Die Geburtsgeschichte Jesu Christi, 1902, p. 37). As might be expected, he makes much of the fact that Tiridates is said to have knelt and worshipped Nero just as the Wise Men fell down to worship Jesus. But the only other verbal parallel which he is able to adduce is this: Tiridates, according to Dio Cassius (lxxiii. 2 ff.), did not return by the way which he came; beneath the quotation of this statement Soltau writes as a parallel the words of St. Matthew: 'and they departed into their own country another way' (Mt 2<sup>12</sup>). A strong case scarcely stands in need of such parallels as these.*

But an attempt is often made to trace St. Matthew's story to Jewish sources, and reference is made to the words and expectations of the prophets. And no doubt it is easy to affirm that such a passage as Is 61<sup>1-2</sup> might have contributed to the formation of the legend of the adoration of the Magi. But the Evangelist, who loves to quote prophecies apposite in any degree to the events connected with our Lord's birth, makes no reference to this passage of Isaiah which Christian thought has so often associated with the Epiphany. As a matter of fact, it would seem that the prophecy referred primarily, not to the Messiah, but to the city of Jerusalem and to the day of its latter glory.

No doubt the Evangelist does definitely connect at least two Old Testament prophecies with the visit of the Magi and the events immediately subsequent to it. But the question may be fairly asked, Which is more probable, that the flight into Egypt actually took place, or that the Jewish Evangelist, or some later hand, introduced the incident as the fulfilment of an OT prophecy which had primarily no definite or obvious connexion, to say the least of it, with the Messiah?† Or, again, if some such event as the Massacre of the Innocents at Bethlehem actually occurred, we can understand that a Jewish Evangelist could find in that event, and in the mourning of the mothers of Israel, a further fulfilment of Jeremiah's words (31<sup>15</sup>).‡ But there is no obvious reason why he should have hit upon and introduced such words unless some event had happened at Bethlehem which recalled to his mind the picture which the prophet had drawn, and the scene once enacted within a few miles of the city of David.

Other explanations are, of course, forthcoming. 'Why,' asks Deane, 'is Egypt selected as the place of refuge?' and one answer is that mythological ideas may have had their unconscious influence; it is to Egypt that the Olympian gods take their flight when attacked by the giant Typhon! (art. 'Nativity' in Encyc. Bibl. iii. 835; and ZNTW p. 217).§ In any consideration of such statements it is well to remember first of all that, whatever date we assign to St. Matthew,§ we are dealing with ‡ Indications are not wanting that this constant and somewhat reckless appeal to supposed pagan analogies is being overdone; see, e.g., Farnell's remarks in the Hibbert Journal, July 1904, p. 827.

§ In art. 'Gospels' in Encyc. Bibl. ii. 1893, mention is made of the Syriac writing attributed to Eusebius, and it is maintained that, according to this document, the story of the Magi, committed to writing in the interior of Persia, was, in a.d. 119, in the episcopate of Xystus of Rome, made search for, disan historic period of the world's history, and that the writer at least claims to place his events in relation to historical data. Nothing was more natural than that Egypt should be chosen as the place of refuge; it was high at hand, the communication by caravan was very frequent; in earlier days Jeroboam had fled thither from Solomon (1 K 11<sup>40</sup>), and it was to Tabanthes that Johanan, the son of Kareah, and his companions had gone to save themselves out of the hands of the Chaldeans (Jer 37).

Nothing was more in accordance with the character of Herod than the deed of bloodshed ascribed to him, and modern days supply many proofs of the unscrupulous manner in which a jealous and suspicious potentate has not hesitated to rid himself of anyone likely to render his tenure of sovereignty insecure (see, e.g., amongst recent writers Kreyher, Die jungfräuliche Geburt des Herrn, 1904, p. 83).¶ On the other hand, it is very improbable that the Evangelist would have invented a story in which the birth of the Messiah was made to bring bitter sorrow into so many Jewish homes.†

Nothing, again, was more likely than that Joseph should withdraw into Galilee after the return from Egypt, since we have evidence that Archelaus very soon after his accession gave proof of the same cruel and crafty behaviour as had characterized his father (Jos. B. J. ii. vi. 2).‡

In the next place, it is well to remember that there is at all events one instance of a prophecy cited in this part of the Gospel of St. Matthew the fulfilment of which is beyond doubt, if we can be said to know anything at all of the historical Jesus (27). And yet no one with any discernment could possibly maintain that our Lord's residence and bringing up in Nazareth were introduced for the sake of finding a fulfilment for a prophecy which it is so difficult to trace to any one source in OT literature. But if in this case it is certain that the prophecy could not have created the fact, why in the case of the other prophecies cited should their alleged fulfilment be credited to the extravagant imagination of the Evangelist, and to that alone?§

iii. APOCRYPHAL ACCOUNTS.—It is of the greatest significance that just in that portion of our Lord's life concerning which the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke are most silent, the Apocryphal covered, and written in Greek. But Zahn (Einführung, ii. p. 296) points out that this statement at least shows that by the date named the year of the coming of the Magi was discussed not only in Rome, but in various places. He further argues, with good reason, from the same statement of the pseudo-Eusebius, that the narrative of Mt 2 had already been incorporated in the Gospel before a.d. 119. See, further, Ch. Quart. Rev. July 1904, p. 889. In this connexion it may be noted that it is difficult to see why the statement of St. Ignatius, exaggerated as it is, should not be taken to refer to the star of the Magi (Ephes. xix. 2, 3). On the significance of this early reference to the Gospel narrative in St. Ignatius, see Headlam, Criticisms of the NT, p. 169 (St. Margaret's Lectures). In his recent Commentary on St. Matthew's Gospel, Wellhausen begins with 21, which is certainly a short and easy method of dealing with the two earlier chapters.

¶ See, further, art. MAGI. It may, however, be here noted that Ramsay remarks on Macrobius, Sat. ii. 4, that it is not probable that Macrobius (a pagan, about a.d. 400) was indebted to a Christian writer for his information, and that therefore the story of the Massacre of the Infants was recorded in some pagan source (Was Christ born at Bethlehem? pp. 219, 220). Zöckler also refers to Macrobius as affording a testimony from a non-biblical source to the truth of the Massacre at Bethlehem (art. 'Jesus Christus' in FRP). On the silence of Josephus see, further, Zahn, Evangelium des Matthäus, p. 103; and Ederhelm, The Temple at the Time of Jesus Christ, p. 85 f.

‡ Zahn, Evangelium des Matthäus, p. 103. See, too, the same reference for the improbability of supposing that the story in St. Matthew was derived from the rescue of Moses (Ex 15:20; Jos. Ant. ii. ix. 2); and cf. art. MAGI.

§ There is a noticeable difference between St. Matthew's references to the political situation in Palestine and St. Luke's. St. Luke speaks with the air of painstaking investigation; St. Matthew, with that of easy familiarity, all the more noteworthy that the frequent and somewhat complicated succession of rulers would have made error easy. This important point is noted by Burton in his Introduction to the Gospels (Chicago), 1904, p. 4.

¶ See some excellent remarks of Bruce in the Expositor's Greek Testament, I, p. 78.

Gospels are most effusive.* Here was an opportunity for them to occupy a vacant space, and they lost no endeavour in trying to fill it. Both in the details of the Nativity and in the events just referred to as subsequent to it, we find ample proofs of this. Thus Elisabeth is fearful that in accordance with the commands of Herod her son John may be slain. And when she can find no place of concealment, she begs a mountain to receive mother and child, and instantly the mountain is cleft to receive her; and a light shines round about, for an angel of the Lord is watching for her preservation. And upon this there follows a tragic scene of the murder of Zacharias, who is slain for his refusal to betray his son. As the Holy Family pass through Egypt, the marvellous accompanies them at every step. In these apocryphal stories, lions, dragons, and panthers adore the infant Jesus; a palm tree bends at His word that His Mother may eat the fruit; in one day the travellers accomplish a journey of thirty days; the idols prostrate themselves in the temples before the Mother and her Child. And we know how the long silence of our Lord's life in our Gospels, which is broken only by one incident in St. Luke, and by the brief summary of St. Matthew, † He shall be called a Nazarene, ‡ affords further opportunity for the introduction of the same insipid and fantastic tales. † Even in modern days there have not been wanting writers who have boldly essayed to occupy the same ground with an equal lack of historical data. ‡ In all this and much else we mark again and again the reserve so characteristic of St. Matthew and St. Luke alike, a reserve and restraint often emphasized by earlier commentators, and again recently referred to by German writers so far apart in point of view as Gunkel and Hermann Cremer. §

IV. CONVERGENT TRADITIONS AND THE MAIN FACTS.—It is often said that the narratives in our two canonical Gospels contradict one another. But although, no doubt, it is difficult to harmonize them in their particulars and sequences, their independence is evident proof that there was no attempt on the part of one Evangelist to make his work the complement or corrector of the other. † Antecedently we might have expected that St. Luke, the Gentile Evangelist, would have told us of the adoration of the Magi, and that the Hebrew Evangelist would have given us the picture of obedience on the part of Mother and Child to the details of the Law and the worship of the Temple. And it is justly urged as no small proof of the truth of the narratives that each Evangelist could

† In the same volume (art. 'Papyri', p. 352) it is of interest to note that Kenyon in commenting upon the later Egyptian papyri remarks that one document written about the end of the 1st cent. has been held to show certain resemblances to the narrative of the Nativity of our Lord, but that the resemblance is, in truth, very slight and unessential.

‡ It cannot be said that Conrady's attempt to derive our Gospel accounts of the Nativity from the Apocryphal Gospels, especially from the Protevangelium Jacobi, is likely to gain acceptance. Die Quelle der kanonischen Kindheitsgeschichte Jesu, see, further, his article in StB, 1904, Heft 2). Such a derivation might well be called a literary miracle. For a criticism of Conrady's attempt, see Theol. Literaturblatt, 1901, p. 28.

‡ See especially Swete, The Apostles' Creed, p. 50, for the distinctness of the two accounts and the almost entirely different ground covered. For a probable order of the events see Plummer, St. Luke, p. 64; Andrews, Life of our Lord upon the Earth, 1892, p. 92; Rose, Studies in the Gospels, p. 64 ff., also Evangelie selon St. Matthieu, p. 37.

thus transcend his own special standpoint and purpose (Fairbairn, Stud. in Life of Christ, p. 36).*

It is indeed urged that this same contradiction may be found in those parts of the canonical narratives which relate most closely to our Lord's birth (Lobstein, The Virgin Birth of Christ, p. 42, Eng. tr.). But the details vouchsafed to us, it may be fairly said, present no essential incompatibility, and two convergent traditions coming from distinct sources may be rightly affirmed to corroborate and sustain each other as to the main facts which they describe (Church Quarterly Review, Oct. 1904, pp. 200, 201; W. C. Allen, l.c. p. 115).

The belief that St. Matthew gives us an account which comes primarily from Joseph, while St. Luke gives us an account that comes primarily from Mary, has long been maintained by many able critics, and it is a belief which still commends itself as the most satisfactory explanation of the two stories. It is the simplest thing to see how in the one case the frequent repetition of the name 'Joseph' points to him as the primary source of information, and how in the other case the twice repeated reference to Mary points to her as occupying the same position: 'Mary kept all these sayings, pondering them in her heart' (Lk 2<sup>29</sup>); 'and his mother kept all these sayings in her heart' (v. 51). One thing may be safely asserted, that if these two accounts had come to us agreeing in every particular, we should have been asked to discredit them on account of this very agreement.

BIRTHDAY.—In Mt 14<sup>a</sup> and Mk 6<sup>a</sup> this word represents the Gr. ἡμέρα in the account of the king's (Herod Antipas) feast to his nobles, at which John the Baptist was condemned to death. It has been suggested, however, though without much acceptance, that the anniversary referred to was that of Herod's accession, not strictly that of his birth. ἡμέρα, which in Attic Greek means 'the commemoration of the dead,' is in the later language interchangeable with γενέθλια (birthday celebrations), and there seems no reason why the translation of RV and AV should not be right (see Swete on Mk 6<sup>a</sup>, and Hastings' DB, s.v.). The custom of observing the birthday of a king was widely spread in ancient times (cf. Gn 40<sup>20</sup>, 2 Mac 6<sup>7</sup>; Herod. ix. 110).

For the question of the date of our Lord's birth, and the authority for the traditional 25th December, see art. CALENDAR. C. L. FELTOE.

BLASPHEMY (βλασφημία; for derivation of word see Hastings' DB, vol. i. p. 305<sup>b</sup>).—This word is used in the Gospels, as in other parts of the NT, for abusive speech generally, as well as for language that is insulting to God. Thus we read of * A careful study of Resch's attempt (1897) to reconstruct a Kindheits-evangelium from the first two chapters of St. Luke and St. Matthew with the help of some extra-canonical parallels, and to restore the Hebrew original of the narrative, can scarcely be said to carry conviction with it.

Jesus was 'for blasphemy,' adding 'because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God' (Jn 10<sup>33</sup>). This was just after He had said, 'I and the Father are one (ἐγὼ).' The third occasion is at the trial of Jesus. According to Mt 26<sup>66</sup> and Mk 14<sup>68-69</sup> when Jesus, after being adjured by the high priest to declare if He were the Christ, declared that they would 'see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of power and coming with the clouds of heaven,' the high priest treated this as blasphemy, rending his garments as a token of horror at the words. Yet the claim was not for more than the Book of Enoch assigned to the Messiah. But the Messiah in that Apocalyptic book is a heavenly being. Such a being Caiaphas would understand Jesus to claim to be, and he reckoned the profession of such a claim blasphemous. This was the formal ground of the condemnation of Jesus to death by the Sanhedrin. The first charge, that of threatening to destroy the Temple and rebuild it in three days, had broken down because of the inconsistency of the witnesses. The second charge is suddenly sprung upon Jesus by the high priest on the ground of His words at the council; and, on this account, as guilty of blasphemy, He was condemned to death, although it was useless to cite the words before Pilate, who would have dismissed the case as Gallo in Corinth dismissed what he regarded as 'a question about words and names' (Ac 18<sup>13</sup>). Therefore a third charge, never mentioned in the Jewish trial, — Jasa majestatis, treason against Caesar, — was concocted for use at the Roman trial.

It is to be observed that there is one common character in all these accusations of blasphemy brought against Jesus. He is never accused of direct blasphemy, speaking insulting words about God. The alleged blasphemy is indirect, in each case claiming more or less Divine rights and powers for Himself.

Lastly, it may be noted that Lk 22<sup>65</sup> AV has the word 'blasphemously' for the way in which the mockers spoke of Jesus; but RV has 'reviling,' which is the evident meaning. There is no reference to our narrower sense of blasphemy as insulting the Divine; the word (βλασφημοῦντες) is used in the common wider sense.

W. F. ADENEY.— Though the word 'blessedness' itself is never found in the recorded utterances of our Lord nor in the pages of the Gospels, the idea conveyed by it is very frequent. The adjective 'blessed' occurs in many contexts, and may, indeed, be termed a characteristic epithet on Christ's lips. The thought expressed by it was inherited, like so many others, from the Old Testament. It is one of the dominant notes of the Psalter (Heb. בֵּרַךְ 'O the happiness of'), and constitutes one of the clearest and most common terms whereby to denote the ideal of Israel's highest hopes. It was natural, therefore, that Jesus should take the word to set forth the great spiritual realities of His kingdom. It is in this sense that it meets us on the earliest pages of St. Matthew's Gospel. The famous form of the sayings there collected (see art. BEATITUDES) is one of the best-known sections of the narrative. So throughout the pages of the Gospels and elsewhere in the NT we find sayings cast in the same mould. All of them are expressive of the spiritual graces to be looked for in disciples of the kingdom (e.g. Mt 11<sup>10</sup>, Lk 7<sup>22</sup>, Mt 24<sup>46</sup>, Ac 20<sup>32</sup>), or are indicative of high privileges open to believers in its message (e.g. Mt 13<sup>12</sup>, Lk 11<sup>33</sup>, Jn 20<sup>30</sup>). Spiritual gladness is not only a note of service in the kingdom, but is to accompany all its true and inalienable rewards.

When we set ourselves to discover the significance of these sayings we are struck (1) by their spiritual character. Twice (Lk 11<sup>27</sup> and 14<sup>17</sup>) beatitudes of a material character are uttered by our Lord's hearers, and He at once rebukes them, and shows the necessity of fixing the desires of the heart on the inward and unseen. The main qualities designated and praised are meekness, purity, tenderness of heart, peaceableness, faith, patience, contrition, qualities which have no sooner been named than we are reminded of such lists of the fruits of the Spirit as we find in Gal 5<sup>22, 23</sup> or Eph 4<sup>30-32</sup>. Blessedness, as Christ presented it, was therefore a condition of the mind and heart that expressed an attitude of faith and love towards God and men, and obtained the reward with certainty even if the sowing were 'in tears' and the 'interest far off.'

(2) Several of these sayings are marked by the sense of the futurity of their fulfilment. It is noteworthy that in the list of Beatitudes in Mt 5, while the majority speak of futurity, 'shall be comforted,' 'shall inherit,' etc., one or two are written in the present tense, e.g. 'theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' In v. 19 we have the unique form of expression, 'have been persecuted . . . theirs is.' In St. Luke also we find the same mingling of present and future. This reflects a state of opinion that prevails throughout the Gospels, and gives rise to some of the greatest problems of interpretation, viz. in what sense the kingdom of God is to be understood—as a present or as a future condition. The Beatitudes are not only closely related to this question—they constitute a special aspect of it. As Titus puts it, 'Over every saying of Jesus may be written the inscription, "Concerning the kingdom of God."' These sayings, then, reveal the nature of the kingdom in its twofold aspect as an inward, spiritual, present reality which exists, progresses, suffers, is in perpetual conflict; and, as a great future fulfilment, when conflict shall turn to peace, failure to victory, suffering to reward, and the inward desire and the outward attainment be one in the presence of perfected power.

Blessedness may therefore be regarded as one of the forms under which our Lord presented the character of His kingdom, and so it becomes an illuminative idea whereby to read the whole Gospel narratives. They all illustrate it. They all serve to make up its content. The word and thought derived from the Old Testament receive richer significance, and may be taken as equivalent to those other great terms, such as 'eternal life' and 'the kingdom of heaven,' under which, in the pages of St. John and St. Matthew, the great purposes of God in Christ are set forth.

BLESSING.—

1. Introductory.
2. Terms.
3. Jewish usage.
4. Usage in the Gospels.

Literature.

1. Introductory.—The main underlying idea of the characteristic New Testament word for 'blessing' (εὐλογεῖν) seems to be that of goodwill, which, on the part of man towards God, has its appropriate expression in praise and thanksgiving. The close connexion of these two last ideas is clearly seen in the New Testament in the interchange of the expressions for 'to bless' (εὐλογεῖν) and 'to give thanks,' namely to God (εὐχαριστεῖν, cf. e.g. Mk 6<sup>41</sup> and Jn 6<sup>21</sup>; and see, further, below, § 4), and is explained by the Jewish development of the term for 'blessing' (בְּרָכָה; cf. further, § 4 b). In Jewish religious terminology, under the influence of the high ethical views of God's character and uniqueness, and His relation to Israel and mankind, that had been developed, 'blessing' acquires a lofty spiritual connotation. God 'blesses' man and his world by His ever active, beneficent Providence; man 'blesses' God by thankful recognition of this, and by pure acts of praise; man 'blesses' man by invoking the Divine favour for his fellows' benefit (cf. e.g. Ps 120<sup>6</sup>); and even when material things are the objects of blessing, this finds its proper expression in an act of thanksgiving to the Divine Giver.

The original sense of the Heb. verb bērakh (Piel, denominative from berēkh, 'knee') is more probably 'to cause to make progress' (so Chytrus) than any notion of adoration ('to bend the knee'). The primitive conception of blessing and cursing, according to which they were regarded as possessing an objective existence, more or less independent of the speaker after utterance (cf. Gn 27<sup>39</sup>), naturally became moralized with the progress of monotheistic religion (cf. Pr 26<sup>2</sup> for a denunciation of 'the causeless curse').

2. Terms.—The terms for 'blessing' used in the Gospels are—

(a) εὐλογεῖν, 'to bless,' and εὐλογητός, εὐλογημένος, 'blessed.' All these forms are common in the LXX, where, in the vast majority of instances, they correspond to some form of the Heb. word בָּרַךְ or its derivatives.

εὐλογεῖν is used—

(A) of men: (1) as in Greek writings, in the sense of 'to praise,' 'celebrate with praises,' viz. God. So several times in the Gospels: e.g. Lk 1<sup>47</sup> 2<sup>28</sup> 24<sup>49</sup> (syn. αἰνεῖν, 'to praise,' and δοξάζειν, 'to glorify'; see under αἰνεῖν, below). (2) 'To invoke blessings upon' (a sense peculiar to Biblical Greek): e.g. Lk 6<sup>28</sup>. (3) 'To bless' material objects (i.e. to bless God for their bestowal): e.g. Lk 9<sup>41</sup>.

(B) of God: (4) 'To bestow blessings, favour, upon men': e.g. Lk 1<sup>42</sup> (ἀνευκαίμην). [The compound παντοῦ εὐλογεῖν, 'to call down blessings upon' occurs, according to the best attested reading, in Mk 10<sup>34</sup>.]

(b) εὐχαριστέω, 'to give thanks,' viz. to God, esp. for food: e.g. Mt 15<sup>36</sup> 23<sup>7</sup>. With this compare also—

(c) ἐφοιλοῦν, 'to celebrate,' 'give praise or thanks to' (τῷ): Mt 11<sup>25</sup> and Jn, and—

(d) αἰνεῖν, 'to praise, extol' God: Lk 2<sup>13</sup> 30 19<sup>37</sup> 24<sup>48</sup> (reading doubtful). [Cf. the use of the synonymous expression δοξάζειν, Lk 17<sup>13</sup>, and διδοῦναι δόξαν τῷ θεῷ, 'to give glory to God,' Lk 17<sup>13</sup>—both of thanksgiving].

(e) μακαρίζω, 'to pronounce blessed': once only in Gospels, Lk 1<sup>9</sup>; and μακάριος, 'blessed,' 'happy' (esp. in a congratulatory sense): e.g. in the Beatitudes (Mt 5<sup>3-11</sup>, Lk 6<sup>20-23</sup>; cf. Jn 20<sup>26</sup>). Both words are common in the LXX.

It is remarkable that the term εὐχαριστεῖν occurs very rarely (and only in the Apocryphal books) in the LXX. The common LXX equivalent for 'to give thanks' (Heb. hōdāh) is ἱερολογεῖν, αἰνεῖν is also of frequent occurrence there. The Bishop of Salisbury (The Holy Communion, p. 155 n. 24) suggests that εὐλογεῖν in the NT was 'often purposely exchanged . . . for the more classical and intelligible εὐχαριστεῖν.'

3. Jewish usage.—The elements that entered into the Hebrew idea of 'blessing' † sketched above (§ 1) were elaborately developed in later Jewish usage. Here the most important points for the illustration of the Gospels may be briefly summarized.

* The derivatives εὐχαριστία ('giving of thanks') and εὐχαριστία ('thankful') do not occur in the Gospels.

† See, further, on this expression Grün-Thayer, Lex. n. v. 246, II.

‡ The wide variety of meaning attached to בָּרַךְ in the OT (cf. Oxford Hebrew Lexicon, s.v.) well illustrates this.

(A) Blessing of persons.—According to Jewish ideas, God is the sole source of all blessing, both material and spiritual; and to Him alone, therefore, praise and thanksgiving are due (cf. Eph 1<sup>3</sup> for a beautiful Christian application of the idea). Thus, even in the great Priestly Blessing (Nu 6<sup>22-27</sup>), which filled so large a place in Jewish liturgical worship both in the temple and (in a less degree) in the synagogue, it was not the priest per se who blessed, but God (Sifre, ad loc.)*. The blessing of man by man finds one of its most prominent expressions in greeting and farewell, a custom of great antiquity, and not, of course, in itself specifically Jewish.† But the formulas connected with it naturally reflect Jewish religious sentiment in a marked degree. The fundamental idea of goodwill is worked out into an invocation of the Divine favour and providence, and consequent prosperity, on the recipient. These ideas find beautiful expression in the Priestly Blessing, and in the poetical amplification of it embodied in Ps 67. The characteristic word employed in greeting and farewell is 'peace' (Heb. shalôm, Greek eirēnē), which has a wide connotation, embracing the notions of security, safety, prosperity, and felicity.‡ Thus the regular formula of greeting is 'Peace be to thee' (ὀ γ 6<sup>8</sup>, Dn 10<sup>19</sup>), and for farewell, 'Go in peace' (cf. 1 S 1<sup>17</sup> etc.). 'To greet' is expressed in Hebrew by the phrase 'to ask of a person concerning peace (welfare)' (cf. Gn 43<sup>27</sup>, Ex 18<sup>7</sup> etc.), and similar formulas. The use of the word 'blessed' (Heb. bārūk), both in solemn greeting (1 S 15<sup>14</sup> 'Blessed be thou of J', cf. Ps 118<sup>26</sup> 'Blessed is he that cometh') and parting (1 K 10<sup>9</sup>), should also be noted in this connexion.

The custom of imparting a solemn blessing at final departure (from life) is attested in the Talmud (e.g. Ber. 28b—death of Johanan ben Zakkai, c. 75-80 A.D.).

Besides the salutation, other forms of blessing prevailed, notably the Blessing of children by parents (and sometimes by others). This custom is well attested in the OT (cf. e.g. Gn 3<sup>28</sup> 27<sup>7</sup> 48<sup>9</sup>). Jacob's blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh is esp. notable, because it fixed the formula which has been used among the Jews in later times.** The earliest literary evidence for the existence of this particular custom is quite late (17th cent.); but that some form of parental blessing was well known by the NT period may be inferred from Sir 3<sup>9</sup> (cf. Mk 10<sup>13-15</sup> and Jn).

According to the minor Talmudical tractate Sopherim (xviii. 5), which contains valuable old traditional material: 'In Jerusalem there was the godly custom to initiate the children at the beginning of the thirteenth year by fasting the whole Day of Atonement. During this year they took the boy to the

* The special sanctity with which the Aaronic blessing was invested in the later period lay in the pronunciation of 'the ineffable name,' which was permitted to the priests only. Originally, however, this restriction was not in force. Thus the Mishna (Ber. x. 4) cites Ru 2<sup>4</sup> as proving that 'the name' was used in ordinary greetings; cf. also Ps 135<sup>6</sup>.

† See the article 'Salutation' (with ref.), in Kittó's Biblical Cyclopaedia, iii. p. 739 f.

‡ The whole Psalm gives a fine analysis of the contents of the Hebrew idea of blessing. Other echoes of the Priestly Blessing occur in the Psalter (Ps 49 81<sup>16</sup> 80<sup>8</sup> 7. 19).

§ Note that this word forms the climax of the Priestly Blessing (Nu 6<sup>27</sup>).

¶ For further details see the Hebrew Lexicon, s.v. שָׁלוֹם.

‡ Cf. 2 K 2<sup>1</sup>.

‡ For boys the formula runs: 'May God make thee like Ephraim and Manasseh'; for girls: 'May God make thee like Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, and Leah' (cf. Ru 4<sup>1</sup>). Any other blessing suggested by the occasion or special circumstances might be added. See, further, Jewish Encyc. (as cited below, § 4, end).

priests and learned men that they might bless him, and pray for him that God might think him worthy of a life devoted to the study of the Torah and pious works.*

(B) Blessing of things.—The feeling of praise and thanksgiving, which is so striking and prominent a feature of Jewish devotional life and worship, has crystallized itself into a regular form of benediction known as Bērākāh (lit. 'Blessing'). In its technical sense the term denotes a set form of prayer, which opens with the words, 'Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the Universe, who, etc., and, in its fully developed form, closes with a repetition of the same words. This class† plays an important part in the Jewish Liturgy.

In its simplest and shortest form the Bērākāh opens as described, but has no closing refrain. It contains a brief expression of thanks to God for some benefit conferred or privilege enjoyed.‡

Undoubtedly the most ancient kind of benediction is that recited at the meal. The Book of Samuel attests the antiquity of the custom, for in one passage (1 S 9<sup>b</sup>) we are told that the people refused to eat the sacrificial meal until it had been blessed.

The Biblical command on which the obligation of grace at meals (Heb. berkakh ha-mizabon)—i.e. according to the Rabbis (Ber. 21a, 48<sup>b</sup>; To. Ber. vii. 1), grace both before and after eating—is founded, occurs in Dt 8<sup>10</sup> ('When thou hast eaten and art full, thou shalt bless the Lord thy God for the good land which he hath given thee').

The Benediction over bread, which is recited before the meal begins, and which may have been known to our Lord, runs: 'Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the Universe, who bringest forth bread from the earth.' The corresponding one said before drinking wine is: 'Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God, King of the Universe, who createst the fruit of the vine' (cf. Lk 22<sup>19</sup>).

Note.—The Benediction (thanksgiving) over wine was especially associated with the hallowing of the Sabbath and festival days embodied in the ceremonies of Kiddush ('Sanctification') and Habdalah ('Separation' or 'Disinction'). For a full description of these observances see the Jewish Encyc. s.v. 'Kiddush' and 'Habdalah'; and for a possible connexion with the Gospels reference may be made to an article by the present writer in the Journal of Theol. Studies (iii. [1902] p. 257 ff.) on 'The Jewish Antecedents of the Eucharist.' Though thanksgiving is an essential, and indeed the most prominent, element in consecration or sanctification, the ideas must be kept distinct. Cf. Sp. of Salisbury, op. cit. p. 135.

The more important Benedictions in this connexion are reserved for the recitation that follows the meal. Of these there are now four (see Singer's Prayer-Book, p. 286). The first ('Blessed art Thou, O Lord . . . who givest food unto all') is ascribed by the Talmud (Ber. 48b) to Moses; the second ('for the land and for the food') to Joshua, who led Israel into the land; the third ('Blessed art Thou, O Lord, who in Thy compassion rebuildest Jerusalem') to king Solomon; the fourth ('Blessed art Thou, O Lord our God . . . who art kind and dealest kindly with all') to the Rabbis of Jamnia in the 2nd cent. A.D.‡

The act of thanksgiving after the meal is not explicitly alluded to in the Gospels. That the custom is an ancient one, however, appears from the fact that, by the time of the compilation of the Mishna, rules as to its ordering had been fully developed (cf. Ber. vii.). It constitutes a sort of service, with responses (which vary according to the number, etc., of those * Quoted by Schechter, Studies in Judaism, p. 380.

† The most important example is the well-known group of the 'Eighteen Blessings' (Shemoneh Esrei), the nucleus of which is undoubtedly pre-Christian. It is notable that here the element of petition accompanies that of praise and thanksgiving (for text of these in English see Singer's Heb.-Eng. Prayer-Book, pp. 44-54).

‡ A very large number of these short Benedictions, expressive of thankful recognition of God's goodness and providence as shown in various ways, has been developed. For a full enumeration see Jewish Encyc. s.v. 'Benedictions,' or the Prayer-Books.

§ Cf. Jewish Encyc. iii. 9.

present). Details and text of prayers can be read in Singer, pp. 278-285.

Another ancient form of Benediction (with response), which, however, is not alluded to in the Gospels, is that offered before and after the reading of Scripture (for the modern forms cf. Singer, p. 147 ff.). This has a Biblical basis in the practice of Ezra mentioned in Neh 9, and was doubtless well known in the time of Jesus.

Enough has been said above to make it clear that the set form of Benediction, based as it is upon Biblical precedents, had been developed by the NT period. The first tractate of the Mishna (compiled in its present form, probably from earlier collections, at end of 2nd cent. A.D.) deals with the various forms of the Bērākāh (hence its name Bērākhot—'Blessings'), and embodies the earliest Rabbinical tradition on the subject. According to the Talmud (Ber. 33a), the recognized Benedictions were formulated by the 'men of the Great Synagogue.' Later the rule was deduced that a Benediction, to be regular, must contain the name of God and the attribute of God's kingship (Ber. 40b).

4. Usage in the Gospels.—The Jewish conception of 'blessing' (cf. §§ 1 and 2) is reflected in the Gospel narratives in its purest and most elevated form. The central thought of God as the sole object of praise, of God's favour as the highest form of felicity (cf. Lk 1<sup>25</sup>), the duty of rendering thanks to Him as the Great Giver and Father, are strikingly enforced, especially in some of the sayings of Jesus. The Gospel usage may best be illustrated by an analysis of the passages in which the terms enumerated above (§ 2) respectively occur. These may be grouped as follows:—

(a) Passages involving the use of εὐλογεῖν, 'to bless,' and its derivatives:

(1) With a personal object expressed, viz. —

With this division should be considered the use of εὐλογεῖσθαι, 'Blessed,' which is always explicitly applied to God in the NT. The term occurs twice in the Gospels, once as a periphrasis for God, Mk 14<sup>6</sup> (cf. the regular Jewish periphrasis, 'The Holy One,' 'Blessed be He'), and once in a liturgical ascription of praise, Lk 1<sup>28</sup> (opening line of the Benedictus).

Note.—Here it may be remarked that the blessing was imparted either by the imposition of hands, in the case of one or a small number (cf. Gn 48<sup>10-12</sup>, Mt 19<sup>13</sup>, Mk 10<sup>10</sup>); or, in other cases, with uplifted hands (Lv 9<sup>22</sup>, Lk 24<sup>50</sup>; cf. Sir 50<sup>22</sup>).

Here naturally comes to be considered the use of εὐλογημένος = 'blessed' (viz. by God): it occurs six times in the acclamation, borrowed from Ps 118 [117]<sup>25</sup>, of 'him that cometh'; Mt 21<sup>9</sup> 23<sup>38</sup> and the // passages, Mk 11<sup>9</sup>, Lk 13<sup>35</sup> 19<sup>38</sup>, Jn 12<sup>13</sup> (where D reads εὐλογητός); once of the mother of the Lord and her Son, Lk 1<sup>22</sup> (εὐλογημένη, κ.τ.λ., in 1<sup>22</sup> is not well attested); also of 'the nations on the King's right hand' (Mt 25<sup>31</sup>), and of 'the kingdom of David' (Mk 11<sup>10</sup>).

(2) With a material object: Mk 8<sup>7</sup>, Lk 9<sup>16</sup> (both of food). 'In these cases blessing the bread must be understood as "blessing God the giver of the bread"' (Westcott), in accordance with the Jewish usage illustrated above (§ 3).

(3) Absolutely, without any object expressed (always of food and sustenance): Mk 6<sup>41</sup> || Mt 14<sup>19</sup> (feeding of the five thousand), Mk 14<sup>22</sup> || Mt 26<sup>26</sup> (in ref. to bread at Last Supper), and Lk 24<sup>30</sup>.

In close connexion with the above we have to consider here—

(b) The use of εὐχαριστεῖν, 'to give thanks,' in the Gospels.

(1) Of food and wine. The word occurs eleven times, and in eight of these has reference either to food or wine, viz.: Mk 8<sup>8</sup> || Mt 15<sup>36</sup> (of the feeding of the four thousand), Lk 22<sup>19</sup> (in ref. to the bread at the Last Supper), Jn 6<sup>11, 23</sup> (of feeding of the five thousand), of thanksgiving over the cup at the Last Supper, Mk 14<sup>23</sup> || Mt 26<sup>27</sup> and Lk 22<sup>17</sup>. It is clear from a comparison of the parallel passages noted above that εὐχαριστέω and εὐχαριστῶ are freely interchanged (cf. Cremer, Bib.-Theol. Lex. s.v.; Swete, JThSt iii. [1902] 163). It thus appears that the predominant idea in the Gospel usage of such expressions as 'blessing the bread' is not so much that of sanctification or consecration as of thanksgiving to God for the gift.*

(2) Of thanksgiving to God in other connexions: Lk 18<sup>11</sup>, Jn 11<sup>41</sup>.

(3) Of thanksgiving to Christ: Lk 17<sup>13</sup>.
(Note here that the act of thanksgiving was accompanied by 'glorifying God' (v. 15), and that it is on this feature that Jesus lays stress (v. 16), 'Were there none found that returned to give glory [there - 'to render thanks'] to God save this stranger?')

(c) and (d) The use of the terms εὐχαριστέω, 'thank, and αἰνεῖν, 'praise' (cf. δοξάζειν, 'glorify'), in a more or less synonymous sense (the sense of thanksgiving), has been sufficiently explained above (§2), and does not call for further remark here.

Note, however, that αἰνεῖν is never used of or by Jesus.
(e) The use of μακάριος, 'blessed,' is frequent in the sayings of Jesus (its employment in the 'Beatitudes' has already been noted above). It is used especially in a congratulatory sense, corresponding in the LXX to the Hebrew term 'ashrê = 'happy' (lit. 'O the happiness of'). In this way it is employed, especially in personal address (a good instance occurs in Mt 16<sup>7</sup> 'Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona,' etc.). Especially notable are such sayings as that recorded in Lk 11<sup>27, 28</sup> ('Blessed is the womb that bare thee' . . . 'Yea, rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it'), in which Jesus pointedly insists on the idea that true blessing and true blessedness are to be found in thought and action that are immediately related and directed to God and the Divine requirements. The Jewish conception of blessing and blessedness is thus set forth in its purest and most elevated phase.

LITERATURE.—The most important original authorities for the Jewish data are the recensions of the tractate Berâkhôt extant in the Mishna (various ed. of Heb. text; Eng. tr. in Barclay's Talmud, 1877, and De Sola and Raphael's Mishnah, 1845), and the Tosephta (Heb. text, ed. Zuckerman), for a full account of these see Jewish Encyclopedia, s.v. 'Berakot'. For an account of the various Jewish forms of blessing see the articles 'Benedictions,' 'Blessing of Children,' and 'Blessing (Priestly)' with the literature cited, in the same work. Cf. also the art. 'Abschied' in Hamburger's EE für Bibel und Talmud, vol. ii. Some relevant data are also to be found in the article 'Benedictions' (by R. Sinker) in Smith's Dictionary of Christian Antiquities. There is a valuable 'Additional Note' in Westcott's Hebrews on 'The Biblical Idea of Blessing' (p. 206 ff.); and a careful synopsis of references in Harper (V. R.), Faithful Element in OT (1905) 136 ff. References may also be made to the works of Eilersheim (esp. The Temple: its Ministry, etc., where the Jewish material is set forth fully) and those of the editor Lightfoot. BLINDNESS.—Blindness is a very common disease in the East. It is mainly due to ophthalmia caused partly by the sun-glare and partly by lack of cleanliness. The word 'blindness' or 'blind' is used in the Bible, however, very frequently of a spiritual condition; and the references in the Gospels are especially interesting as the physical and the spiritual states are sometimes intertwined, the former being used as emblematic of the latter.

* Cf. the valuable remarks of the Bp. of Salisbury on this point (op. cit. p. 136 l.). He notes the occurrence of the expressions εὐχαριστῶντες τῷ θεῷ, εὐχαριστῶντες ἀλλήλοις, etc., 'thanksgiving food,' 'thanksgiving bread,' where we should say 'consecrated food or bread' (ib.). Cf. also Didache x. and xv.

In Mt 11<sup>5</sup> the first evidence of His Messiahship, adduced by Jesus to the disciples of John the Baptist, is that the blind receive their sight. The first miracle of this nature in the life of Jesus is recorded by St. Matthew (9<sup>27</sup>) as occurring at Capernaum.

Two blind men followed Him, crying, 'Thou Son of David, have mercy on us.' Jesus seems unwilling at first to grant their request, as we are told that it was not till they had entered the house with Him that He turned a favourable ear to their entreaty. Satisfied of their faith, and of the spirit in which they approached Him, He pronounced the word of healing.

In St. Mark (8<sup>23</sup>) another miracle of restoring sight to the blind is recorded which has features of its own.

Jesus leads the blind man out of the village (Bethsaida), and, having spit upon his eyes, touches them. Sight is only gradually restored, as at first he sees men like trees walking. This is one of the many instances of the realism of St. Mark. Probably it is a reminiscence of the well-known difficulty experienced by the blind-born, to whom sight has been given through a surgical operation, of adjusting the knowledge acquired by the new faculty with that derived through the other avenues of sense-perception.

The story of the blind man or men at Jericho is recorded in all three Synoptics (Mt 20<sup>31</sup>, Mk 10<sup>46</sup>, Lk 18<sup>35</sup>). It has also features in common with the incident narrated in Mt 9<sup>27</sup>.

St. Mark and St. Luke speak of only one blind man, St. Matthew has two. All three give the words of healing differently. There have been many attempts made to harmonize the various accounts,* but the necessity for making such attempts arises out of a mechanical theory of inspiration which is difficult to maintain. Is it not enough for all practical purposes to hold the substantial accuracy of the Evangelic narrative without troubling ourselves about those minute divergences which occur in different versions of the same event narrated by the most trustworthy witnesses?

The miracles recorded in Mt 12<sup>22</sup> and Jn 9 stand by themselves as having a very close relation to the teaching of Jesus which follows. St. Matthew tells us that there was brought to Jesus one possessed with a devil, blind and dumb; and He healed him, inasmuch that the blind and dumb both saw and spake. This gave rise to the charge of the Pharisees, that the miraculous power of Jesus was not a God-given, but a devil-given power. 'This fellow doth not cast out devils, but by Beelzebub the prince of the devils.' To the clear moral vision of Jesus the attitude implied in this objection showed a radical depravity of nature, an inability to discriminate between fundamental ethical distinctions. 'A house divided against itself cannot stand.' If Satan inspires to deeds of beneficence, then he ceases to be Satan. He who does good is inspired by God, and the measure of the good he does is the measure of his conquest over Satan. It is in this connexion that Jesus utters the remarkable reference to blasphemy against the Holy Ghost as the unforgivable sin. See art. BLASPHEMY.

The other instance where the miraculous cure of blindness is made a text for the most characteristic teaching of Jesus is that recorded in Jn 9. Here it is a man blind from his birth that Jesus cures. And when the Pharisees seek to persuade him of their peculiar theological tenet that the power of Jesus is derived from Satan, the man has strength of mind enough to fall back on that primary moral instinct to which Jesus always appeals. 'Whereas I was blind, now I see. This man has done good to me, and for me, therefore, he is good. It is not the function of the prince of darkness to give sight to the blind.' He cannot, therefore, accept their theory of the source whence Jesus derives His power.

This leads us to a predominant feature of the teaching of Jesus—His presentation of the gospel as vision. Jesus claims to be the Light of the world. Light to those who see is its own evidence, and

* For a summary of these see Plummer, Internat. Crit. Com., 'St. Luke,' in loco.

Jesus, therefore, in making this claim can desire no recognition other than that spontaneously made by the soul when purged from the sinful passions that obscure or deflect its vision. To secure effective vision there must be not only light, but also a healthy visual organ. Blindness may arise from the absence of light, from mere functional derangement of the organ of vision, or from some fatal organic defect in the organ. It is to those whose blindness comes from either of the first two causes that Jesus appeals. He comes as Light, strengthening the visual faculty, dispelling the darkness that envelops the soul, and revealing to it the spiritual realm. 'I am come into this world that they which see not might see' (Jn 9<sup>39</sup>). This presentation of Jesus as Light appealing to the organ of spiritual vision and vindicating empirically His unique Divinity dominates the whole of the Fourth Gospel. But the principle is as clearly enunciated in the Synoptics. It is the pure in heart who see God (Mt 5<sup>8</sup>), because the pure heart is the organ of the God-consciousness. In the great confession of St. Peter the real point of our Lord's commendation lies not in the clear enunciation of the Messiahship and the Divine Sonship of Jesus, but in the manner in which the profoundest of all spiritual truths has been reached. 'Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven' (Mt 16<sup>7</sup>).

Jesus, the Light of the world, can appeal only to those who have the faculty of sight. Where the faculty of sight is impaired or destroyed, however clearly the light may shine, there is no vision. This obscuration of the spiritual orb is what is called 'judicial blindness.' The phrase implies that there never can be such radical defect of vision without personal guilt in the person so affected. It is a penalty of sin, the judgment that comes through neglecting the light (cf. Jn 9<sup>41</sup>). Inasmuch as Jesus is the true Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world, there is in human nature, as such, the capacity of spiritual vision; but this capacity, either by disuse or perversity, may be so radically corrupted as to be impervious to the light. And when this is so, the sinner rushes to his doom heedless of the plainest warnings. This is a truth always recognized in the Gospels. St. John in his Prologue says that the Light shineth in darkness, but the darkness comprehended it not (cf. Mt 6<sup>22</sup>). It is the meaning of the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, a sin unforgivable, inasmuch as it does not recognize itself as sin, and thus renders impossible that repentance which is the condition of forgiveness (but see art. BLASPHEMY).

BLOOD (צַד, Aram. כְּדָ, Gr. αἷμα).—Underlying the use of the term 'blood' in the Gospels is its root conception, as contained in the OT. This root conception is clearly seen, e.g., in Lv 17<sup>11, 14</sup> 'The life ("soul" נַפְשׁ) of the flesh is in the blood . . . it is the blood that maketh atonement by reason of the life. . . . For as to the life of all flesh, the blood thereof is all one with the life thereof. . . . for the life of all flesh is the blood thereof.' The close connexion between 'life' and 'blood'—amounting even to identification—was doubtless realized by man from very early times; for constant experience taught him that loss of blood entailed weakness, while great loss resulted in death, i.e. the departure of life. This would have been noticed again and again in everyday life, whether in hunting, or in slaughtering (both for food and sacrifice), or in battle.* This belief was by no means confined to the Hebrews, but was universal in ancient times, just as it is now among primitive races.* The reiterated prohibition with regard to the eating of blood contained in the Hebrew Code was due, firstly, to the fact that God had made use of it as a means of atonement, and that therefore it ought not to be used for any other purpose; and, secondly, because it was believed to contain the soul or life. In the one case, the prohibition is due to the holy character of blood; † in the other, to its essential nature, ‡ it being the centre from which animal life in all its various forms emanated. Blood was therefore holy from the Divine point of view, because God had sanctified it to holy uses; and it was holy from man's point of view, both because it had been ordained as a means of atonement in the sight of God, and because human life, of which blood was the essence, was sacred to Him.

In the Gospels one or other of these conceptions underlies the use of the word 'blood.' Its use may be briefly summarized thus:

1. Blood in its material sense, e.g., the woman with the issue of blood (Mk 5<sup>25</sup>, Lk 8<sup>43</sup>). The power which went out from Christ staved the flow of the woman's blood; it is implied (Mk 5<sup>25</sup> ἀλλὰ μὴλλον εἰς τὸ χεῖρον ἐθέλωσα) that this outflow was the ebbing-out of her life. The ancient conception is, therefore, plainly present here.

2. Blood used in the sense of life (i.e. poured out in death). It is interesting to observe that in all the Gospel passages in which blood is used as synonymous with life, the reference is either to an OT occurrence, or else to Christ as fulfilling OT types. The passages are the following: Mt 23<sup>35</sup> 'We should not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets'; 23<sup>35</sup> 'That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed on the earth, from the blood of Abel the righteous unto the blood of Zachariah son of Barachiah, whom ye slew between the sanctuary and the altar, cf. Lk 11<sup>51</sup>; Mt 27<sup>4</sup> 'I have betrayed innocent blood'; 27<sup>4</sup> 'the price of blood'; 27<sup>4</sup> 'the field of blood'; 27<sup>4</sup> 'I am innocent of the blood of this righteous man'; 27<sup>8</sup> 'His blood be upon us.' In each of these passages the meaning of blood as implying life is sufficiently clear.

3. In Lk 13<sup>3</sup> occurs a reference to 'the Galileans whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices.' There is no reference to this event either in Josephus (although there is mention of a similar occurrence in Ant. xvii. ix. 3) or elsewhere; but the meaning appears to be that they were offering up their usual sacrifice in the ordinary course, when they were fallen upon and butchered by the Roman soldiery, probably as a punishment for some act of revolt [the restlessness of the Galileans was notorious, cf. Ac 5<sup>27</sup>].

4. A further use of the word is seen in Mt 16<sup>17</sup>, where the expression 'flesh and blood' occurs. In this passage the use of 'blood' is somewhat modified from what has been found hitherto; the phrase σὰρξ καὶ αἷμα denotes what is human, abstractly considered; 'the antithesis is between knowledge resulting from natural human development, or on the basis of natural birth, and knowledge proceeding from the revelation of the Father in heaven, or on the basis of regeneration' (Lange).* The expression therefore emphasizes the contrast between human and Divine knowledge (cf. Gal 1<sup>19</sup> 'immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood'; cf. also He 2<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>50</sup>, Eph 6<sup>12</sup>). The special meaning attaching to 'blood' here is that it belongs to human nature; and significant in this connexion is the passage Lk 24<sup>39</sup> 'spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye behold me having,' where 'flesh' is clearly intended to include blood; † the primary difference in bodily structure between a natural and a spiritual body being the absence of blood in the latter. If in the ordinary human body blood is conceived of as being the source of life, the body without blood receives its life in a manner utterly different,—it is the life which comes from Christ: 'I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly' (Jn 10<sup>10</sup>). Closely connected with this are the words in Jn 1<sup>13</sup> '... which were born, not of blood... but of God'; here, too, the contrast is between that which is born 'of blood,' i.e. according to a natural birth, and that which is born 'of God,' i.e. according to a spiritual birth.

§ The expression עַדְוָה וְדָם אֱלֹהִים (also in the order אֱלֹהִים וְדָם עַדְוָה) is frequent in Rabbinical writings (צ"ו ח"ט); the Jewish writers use this form of speech infinite times, and by it oppose men to God' (Lightfoot, Horae Heb. et Talm. [Gandell's ed.] ii. 234); see also Str. 14<sup>4</sup>, where 'flesh and blood' are compared to the leaves on a tree.

A very mysterious use of 'blood' is that contained in the words 'bloody sweat' (Lk 22<sup>44</sup>).§ 'It is probable that this strange disorder arises from a violent commotion of the nervous system, and forcing of the red particles into the cutaneous excretories.'|| 'The intensity of the struggle,' says Godet, 'becomes so great, that it issues in a sort of beginning of physical dissolution. The words, as it were drops, express more than a simple comparison between the density of the sweat and that of blood. The words denote that the sweat itself resembled blood. Phenomena of frequent occurrence demonstrate how immediately the blood, the seat of life, is under the empire of moral impressions. Does not a feeling of shame cause the blood to rise to the face? Cases are known in which the blood, violently agitated by grief, ends by penetrating through the vessels which enclose it, and, driven outwards, escapes with the sweat through the transpiratory glands (see Langen, pp. 212-214).'¶ See SWEAT.

6. One other passage must be referred to before coming to the spiritual use of 'blood,' namely, Jn 19<sup>34</sup> 'and straightway there came out blood and water.' On the phenomenon of the effusion of water together with the blood, see Godet's Gospel of St. John, iii. 274f. With regard to the flowing of the blood, there seems to be a striking significance in the fact; it was a visible instance of the fulfilment of Christ's own words: 'Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets; I came not to destroy, but to fulfil . . .'<sup>**</sup> (Mt 5<sup>17, 18</sup>); for

‡ The use of the plur. here is ἀλάτωρ (Vulg. ex sanguinibus) appears, according to Westcott, 'to emphasize the idea of the elements out of which in various measures the body is framed' (Com. on St. John, in loc.); cf. also Godet's Com. on St. John, vol. i. p. 357ff. (T. & T. Clark).

¶ Com. on Luke, ii. 306 (T. & T. Clark). There is certainly one other instance on record of a like mysterious flow of blood, that, namely, of Charles ix. of France. It is said of him that on his deathbed his bitterness of sorrow and qualms of conscience, on account of the massacre on St. Bartholomew's Eve, were so intense that in the anguish of his soul he literally sweated blood.

** Cf. the frequent occurrence of such phrases as 'that the Scripture might be fulfilled.'

it was of the essence of sacrifice under the Old Dispensation that blood should flow;* and that it should flow from a vital part, usually from the throat, though the spirit of the Law would obviously be fulfilled when the blood flowed from such a vital part as the region of the heart, the central part of man; † the sacrifice was consummated when the life, i.e. the blood, had flowed out.‡ Kalisch points out that, guided by similar views, the Teutons pierced the heart of the sacrificial victims, whether animals or men, because the heart is the fountain of the blood, and the blood of the heart was pre-eminently regarded as the blood of sacrifice.§ See also the following article.

7. The passages which speak of the blood of Christ (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>, Mk 14<sup>24</sup>, Lk 22<sup>20</sup>, Jn 6<sup>55-56</sup>), i.e. of blood in its spiritual meaning, can be here only briefly referred to (see ATONEMENT, LAST SUPPER). They must be taken in conjunction with such expressions elsewhere as 'the blood of Christ' (1 Co 10<sup>16</sup>, Eph 2<sup>13</sup>), 'the blood of the Lord' (1 Co 11<sup>27</sup>), 'the blood of his cross' (Col 1<sup>20</sup>), 'the blood of Jesus' (He 10<sup>19</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup>), 'the blood of Jesus Christ' (1 P 1<sup>2</sup>), 'the blood of the Lamb' (Rev 12<sup>11</sup>).

From the earliest times among the ancient Hebrews the various rites and ceremonies, indeed the whole sacrificial system, showed the yearning desire for a closer union with God; this union was to be effected only through life-containing and life-giving blood. The very existence of these sacrifices proved (and the offering up of their first-born sons only emphasized the fact) that men deemed the relationship between God and themselves to be unsatisfactory. Useless as these sacrifices were in themselves, they were at any rate (when not unauthorized) shadows of good things to come (He 10<sup>1-4</sup>); and they served their purpose of witnessing to profound truths which God intended to reveal more fully as soon as man's capacity for apprehension should have become sufficiently developed. The shedding of Christ's blood effected a new relationship between God and man; it sealed a New Covenant,|| and became the means of the salvation of many (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>, Mk 14<sup>24</sup>, cf. Lk 22<sup>20</sup>). But the ancient conception, the God-revealed truth only dimly apprehended, was right: the life was in the blood, inasmuch as the shedding of blood brought life—'I lay down my life, that I may take it again' (Jn 10<sup>17</sup>)—only it was a life which it was impossible to conceive of before the Author of it brought it to man. 'Having in His own blood the life of God and the life of man, Jesus Christ could make men sharers of the Divine by making them sharers of His own nature; and this was the truth of truths which He declared to those whom He instructed.'¶

LITERATURE.—There are many books which give information on this subject, but as regards the special relationship between 'blood' and Christ it is difficult to point to any particular work; many details are to be had, but they must be gathered from numerous sources; some of the more important of these are: Franz Dilitzsch, System der biblischen Psychologie, Leipzig, 1855; P. Cassel, Die Symbolik des Blutes, Berlin, 1882; C. Bähr, Symbolik des Moaischen Cultus, 1874; F. Godet, Biblical Symbolik, 1884.

* This was originally based on the conception of blood being the drink of gods (cf. Pa 60<sup>13</sup>); see Rob. Smith, op. cit. p. 233ff.; Curtiss, Primitive Sem. Rel. To-day, p. 223; 'The consummation of the sacrifice is in the outflow of blood.'

† Cf. the words of Philo, de Concep. c. x.: 'Some men prepare sacrifices which ought never to be offered, strangling the victim and stifling the essence of life, which they ought to let depart free and unrestrained' (quoted by Kalisch, Leviticus, i. 184).

‡ Under the symbolical sacrifices of the Old Covenant it was the blood which made atonement for the soul. It was not the death of the victim, nor yet its broken body; but it was the blood, the life, the soul, that was made the means of a soul's ransom, of its rescue, of its redemption' (Trumbull, The Blood Covenant, p. 280).

BLOOD AND WATER (Jn 19<sup>31-37</sup>).—When the soldier, whom tradition names Longinus,* to make sure that He was really dead, drove his spear into the side of Jesus on the cross (see CRUCIFIXION), a strange thing happened. On being withdrawn the spear was followed by a gush of blood and water. It was a singular phenomenon. The Fathers regarded it as a miracle,† but St. John does not venture on an opinion. He neither attempts to account for it nor pronounces it a miracle, but contents himself with solemnly asseverating that he had witnessed it, and could vouch for its actual occurrence. He felt the wonder of it to the last (cf. 1 Jn 5<sup>7-9</sup>).

Medical science has confirmed his testimony, and furnished an explanation which at once defines the phenomenon as a perfectly natural occurrence, and reveals somewhat of the awfulness of our Lord's Passion. During His dread and mysterious dereliction on the cross (see DERELICTION) His heart swelled until it burst, and the blood was effused into the distended sac of the pericardium, and afterwards separated, as is usual with extravasated blood, into these two parts, viz. (1) crassamentum or red clot, and (2) watery serum.† When the distended sac was pierced from beneath, it discharged 'his sanguineous contents in the form of red clots of blood and a stream of watery serum, exactly corresponding to the description given by the sacred narrative, "and forthwith came there out blood and water."‡ Jesus died literally of a broken heart—of 'agony of mind, producing rupture of the heart.'

It was a favourite idea with the Fathers that the Water and the Blood were symbols of the Sacraments. St. Augustine, following the v. l. θεοσε for θεοσε in v. 34, comments (in Joan Ev. Tract. cxx. § 2): 'Vigilanti verbo Evangelista usus est, ut non diceret, Latus ejus percussit, aut vulneravit, aut quid aliud; sed, aperuit; ut illis quodammodo videret ostium panderetur, unde Sacramenta Ecclesie manaverunt, sine quibus ad vitam que vera vita est, non intratur.' Cf. Chrysost. in Joan. lxxxiv: οὐκ ἀπλῶς οὐδὲ ὡς ἐτυχεν ἀδρια ἐξήλθον αὐ παραί, ἀλλ' ἐπειδὴ ἐξ ἀφορτῶν ἡ ἐκκλησία συνέστηκε. καὶ ἵσασιν αὐ μυσταγοργόμενοι, δι' ὕδατος μὲν ἀναγεννόμενοι δι' αἵματος δὲ καὶ σαρκὸς τρεφόμενοι. ἄρχην λαμβάνει τὰ μυστήρια, ἃ' ἔσαν προκίτη τῶ φρικτῷ ποτηρίῳ, ὡς ἀπ' αὐτῆς πίονον τῆς πλεονῆς οὐτω προκίτη.

ὄνομα] Boanerges, ὃ ἐστὶν υἱὸς θρονῆς).* The equation Boanerges = 'sons of thunder' presents two difficulties: (a) the Hebrew ra does not naturally give rise to the two vowels oa; (b) no known Hebrew or Aram. root rgz or rysh has the meaning 'thunder.' A third difficulty might be added, that the title Boanerges, whatever its meaning, does not accurately correspond to ὄνομα(ρα), 'name(s).† If the Evangelist be right in saying that the original title meant 'sons of thunder,' we must suppose that Boan or Boaz is due to inaccurate transliteration of ra, or to a conflation of two readings with a single vowel (see Dalm. Gram. 2 p. 144). But the difficulty as to rges=θρονῆ remains. Jerome (on Dn 1<sup>7</sup>) thought that Boanerges should be emended into Benergem=βηγ ra. In that case the s is a mistake on the part of the Evangelist or his copyists for m. Others prefer to think that the original title was ra ra = 'sons of wrath,' or ra ra = 'sons of tumult,' and that υἱὸς θρονῆς is an inaccurate translation on the part of the Evangelist. The Syriac Version (Sinaiticus) unfortunately gives us no assistance. It transliterates Bēnat Raγsh or Raγsh, and omits the explanation ὃ ἐστὶν υἱὸς θρονῆς (see Burkill, Evangelion Da-Mepharreshe, i. 181, ii. 280). It is possible, however, that the corruption lies deeper than this. Just as Dalmanutha (Mk 8<sup>10</sup>) is probably a corruption of an Aramaic proper name (see Burkill, ii. 249), so Boanerges may be a fusion of two names answering to the ὄνομα. In that case the Evangelist, misreading or mishearing his Aramaic original, has fused two names into one, and has tried to give a rough translation of the word thus formed. The first name might be ra (Banni), ra (Banna), or ra (Banna). Curiously enough, the Babylonian Talmud gives Benni as the name of one of the disciples of Jesus (Bab. Sanh. 43a). For the second name we offer no conjecture. See, further, JOHN, JAMES.

BOAT.—πλοῖον: AV 'ship,' RV 'boat.' πλοῖον: Mk 3<sup>9</sup> AV 'a small ship,' RV 'a little boat'; Jn 6<sup>22</sup> AV and RV 'boat,' RVm 'little boat'; v. 24 ἔβησαν εἰς τὰ πλοῖα AV 'took shipping,' RV 'got into the boats,' marg. 'little boats'; 2Pm τὸ πλοῖον AV 'in a little ship,' RV 'in the little boat.' Lk 5<sup>2</sup> Tisch, WH marg. πλοῖον: WH, TR πλοῖον. Jn 6<sup>23</sup> Tisch, TR, RV πλοῖον: WH πλοῖον.

The word 'ship' is rightly expelled from the Gospels by the Revisers. It corresponds to vais, which occurs nowhere in the Gospels, and in the NT only in Ac 27<sup>4</sup>. Being a small lake, the Sea of Galilee had no 'ships'; but it had numerous 'boats' mostly employed in fishing (termed πλοῖα in the Gospels, also [v. l.] κατάρα in Josephus). Some of these were bigish craft, and usually swung at anchor on the Lake (cf. Jos. Vit. 33), being attended by πλοῖα, 'punts' (cf. Jn 21<sup>4-9</sup>). In Ac 27<sup>40</sup>, τὸ πλοῖον the small-boat of St. Paul's ship is called ἡ κατάρα. To quell the revolt in Tiberias, Josephus mustered all the boats on the Lake, and they numbered as many as 230 (Jos. BJ II. xxi. 8). A boat which could accommodate Jesus and the Twelve must have been of considerable dimensions; and in the battle on the Lake, under Vespasian, the Romans fought on rafts and the pirates on boats. Though small and weak in comparison with the rafts, the boats must have been of considerable size (Jos. BJ III. x. 9).

Jesus had much to do with boats during His Galilean ministry, and one use that He made of them is peculiarly noteworthy. In two recorded instances He employed a boat as His pulpit (Lk 5<sup>1-3</sup>, Mt 13<sup>1-2</sup>=Mk 4<sup>1</sup>). Getting into it to escape the pressure of the multitude, He pushed out a little way from the land and addressed the people ranged along the sloping beach, as St. Chrysostom puts it, 'fishing and netting those on the land (ἀλιεύων καὶ σαγγρεύων τοὺς ἐν τῇ γῆ)'. Only two instances of His resorting to this device are recorded, but it seems to have been His practice. Early in His ministry, St. Mark says (3<sup>9</sup>), 'He spake to his disciples that a little boat should wait on him because of the crowd, lest they should throng him'; and it is interesting to observe how the Evangelist subsequently alludes to 'the boat' (Mk 6<sup>35</sup> 6<sup>36</sup>). Cf. Mt 5<sup>23</sup> τὸ πλοῖον TH, Tisch.; πλοῖον WH), meaning the boat which had been put at His disposal. DAVID SMITH.

BOAZ.—The husband of Ruth, named in the genealogies of our Lord (Mt 1<sup>5</sup>, Lk 3<sup>23</sup>).

BODY.—I. THE HUMAN BODY GENERALLY.—'Body' in the Gospels invariably represents σῶμα in the original. Always in Homer and frequently in Attic Greek σῶμα=a dead body; and in this sense the word is occasionally used in the Gospels (Mt 27<sup>52</sup> 58. 59 || Lk 17<sup>37</sup>). The usual meaning, however, here as in the rest of the NT and in ordinary Greek usage, is the living body, and in particular the body of a living man (Mt 6<sup>22</sup> 26<sup>17</sup>, Mk 5<sup>27</sup>). In the records of our Lord's life, teaching, and whole revelation, we find the dignity and claims of the body as an integral part of human nature constantly recognized. This meets us in the very fact of the Incarnation (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>), in the most solemn utterances of Jesus (Mt 25<sup>35</sup> 42), in His tender regard for the bodily needs and pains of those around Him—His feeding of the hungry and healing of the sick; but above all in the narratives of His Resurrection and Ascension, which show that the Incarnation was not a temporary expedient of His earthly mission, but a permanent enfolding of our human nature, body as well as soul, within the essential life of the Godhead.

The Gospels give no support to the philosophic tendency, so often reflected in certain types of religious teaching, to treat the body with disparagement. Jesus accords full rights to the corporeal side of our being. He was neither an ascetic nor a preacher of asceticism—'the Son of Man came eating and drinking' (Mt 11<sup>18</sup> 19). At the same time, we find in His teaching a clear recognition of a duality in human nature—a distinction drawn between body and soul, flesh and spirit (Mt 6<sup>23</sup> 28<sup>10</sup>). Moreover, He lays strong emphasis on the antithesis between the body as the lower part of a man, and the soul as the higher. Though the body is a true part of our humanity, its value is not to be compared for a moment with that of the spiritual part (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>). Those who follow Jesus must be prepared, if need be, to surrender their bodies to the sword and the cross (Mt 23<sup>34</sup>); but 'What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?' (Mt 16<sup>26</sup>).

In the teaching of Jesus the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, which had gradually taken root in the Jewish mind, is everywhere presupposed (as in His references to the Future Judgment), and at times is expressly proclaimed (Lk 14<sup>14</sup> 20<sup>38</sup>, Jn 5<sup>28</sup> 29). And by the grave of His friend Lazarus our Lord gave utterance to that profound saying, 'I am the resurrection and the life' (Jn 11<sup>25</sup>), which reveals the ultimate ground of Christian faith in the resurrection of the body, and at the same time invites us to find in the nature of the risen Christ Himself the type, as well as the pledge, of that new and higher corporeal life to which He is able to raise His people.

ii. THE BODY OF CHRIST.—(1) Christ's natural body.—As 'the man Christ Jesus,' our Lord was possessed of 'a true body' as well as of 'a reasonable soul.' When the time was come in the counsels of God for the redemption of mankind, the Second Person of the Holy Trinity took upon Him human flesh by the operation of the Holy Spirit in the womb of the Virgin Mary (Mt 1<sup>18</sup>, cf. Gal 4<sup>4</sup>). In due time, according to the laws of human life, He was born at Bethlehem (Lk 2<sup>6</sup> 7). The child thus born was seen in His infancy by the shepherds and the wise men, and, when He was eight days old, by Simeon and Anna (2<sup>22</sup> 24). From His conception and birth His body developed in the manner usual to human beings. 'The child grew,' we are told (Lk 2<sup>40</sup>); arrived at 'twelve years old'; and still 'increased in stature' (vv. 42. 52).

After He had arrived at man's estate, we find Him living under the conditions to which the bodies of men in ordinary life are subject. We learn that He suffered hunger (Mt 4<sup>2</sup>); that He was wearied with journeying (Jn 4<sup>6</sup>); that He experienced pain (Mt 27<sup>32</sup>); and that He underwent death (v. 54). In healing sickness He frequently used common bodily action, and His power of motion, with one miraculous exception (Mt 14<sup>28</sup> ||), was limited to that which men in general possess. After death, His body, nowise different from that of an ordinary man, was delivered by Pilate to Joseph of Arimathea, who wrapped it in a clean linen cloth and laid it in his own new tomb (Mt 27<sup>58</sup>), where it rested till the moment of the Resurrection. Down to that moment, then, the Lord's body had been a human body with the powers, qualities, and capacities of the body of an ordinary man.

(2) Christ's body after the Resurrection.—It was the same body as before His death. The grave was left empty, because the very body which Joseph of Arimathea laid there had risen and departed. Moreover, it had in most respects the same appearance. His disciples might doubt and hesitate at first (Lk 24<sup>16</sup> 37, Jn 20<sup>14</sup>), but they did not fail to recognize Him (Lk 24<sup>31</sup> 32, Jn 20<sup>16</sup> 21. 22 21<sup>17</sup> 18, Ac 1<sup>9</sup> 26). We find Him eating and drinking as a man (Lk 24<sup>42</sup>), making use of the natural process of breathing (Jn 20<sup>22</sup>), declaring to His disciples that He had flesh and bones (Lk 24<sup>39</sup>), showing them His hands and His feet (v. 40), and giving them the assurance that His body was the identical body which they had seen stretched upon the cross, by inviting the disciple who doubted, to put his finger into the print of the nails and thrust his hand into the wound in His side (Jn 20<sup>27</sup>).

On the other hand, our Lord's resurrection body was freed from previous material conditions and possessed of altogether new capacities. It seems to be implied that it could pass at will through material objects (Jn 20<sup>26</sup>); and it does not appear to have been subject as before to the laws of movement (Lk 24<sup>36</sup>), or visibility (v. 34), or gravitation (Mk 16<sup>7</sup>, Lk 24<sup>31</sup>). These new powers constituted the difference between His pre-resurrection and His glorified body. It was in His glorified body, thus differentiated, that He ascended into heaven; and in that same glorified body He is to be expected at His final coming (Ac 1<sup>11</sup> 14).

There is little ground for the idea of Olshansen (Gospels and Acts, iv. 259-260) and others, revived by Dr. Newman Smyth (Old Faiths in New Light, ch. viii.), that the transformation of Christ's body from the natural to the glorified condition was a process which went on gradually during the Forty Days, and was not completed till the Ascension. Rather, it must be said that on the very day of His Resurrection the spirituality of His risen body was as clearly shown as in the case of that much later manifestation by the Sea of Tiberias (cf. Lk 24<sup>31</sup> 32, Jn 21<sup>4</sup>). We are not to think of the body of Jesus during this period as in a transition state with regard to its substance—partly of earth and partly of heaven. It was with a spiritual body that He rose, that glorified body of which His Transfiguration had been both a prophecy and a foretaste; and if we see Him moving for a time along the borders of two worlds, that was because, for the sake of His disciples and the future Church, He made use of the natural in order to the revelation of the spiritual. It is in this way that we must explain His asking and receiving food (Lk 24<sup>41-5</sup>, Ac 10<sup>6</sup>). He cannot have depended upon this food for His bodily support. His purpose in taking it was to convince His disciples that He was still a living man, in body as well as in spirit,—that same Jesus who had so often in past days partaken with them of their simple meals.

In respect of His body the risen Jesus now belonged to the mysterious regions of the invisible world, and it was only when He chose to reveal Himself that His disciples were aware of His presence. It is to be noticed that St. John describes His appearances as 'manifestations': He 'manifested Himself,' 'was manifested,' to the disciples (Jn 21<sup>1-14</sup>). His resurrection body was a spiritual body, but it had the power of materializing itself to the natural senses, and Jesus made use of this power from time to time in order to convince His disciples, by the actual evidence of sight and sound and touch, that the victory of His whole human personality over death and the grave was real and complete. And when this work was accomplished, He parted from them for the last time, and went up to the right hand of the Father in a kind of royal state which not only proclaimed His own lordship over both worlds, but became a prophecy of the truth regarding the divinely appointed destiny of those whom He is not ashamed to call His brethren. In the body of Christ's glory both St. Paul and St. John find the type after which the believer's body of humiliation is to be fashioned at last (Ph 3<sup>21</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>). We are to be like our Lord in the possession of a human nature in which the corporeal has been so fully interpenetrated by the spiritual that the natural body has been transformed into a spiritual body (1 Co 15<sup>42-49</sup>).

There is no ground to suppose that our Lord's entrance upon the state of exaltation implies any further change in His bodily nature. Certainly no new quality could be developed which would be inconsistent with the essential characteristics of a body. One of these characteristics is the impossibility of being in two places at the same moment. As long as He was on earth His body could not be in heaven, though He was there by His Spirit; and as long as He is in heaven His body cannot be on earth, although He is present by His Spirit, according to His promise to be with His followers where they are gathered together in His name (Mt 18<sup>20</sup>, cf. 28<sup>20</sup>). St. Peter preached that the heavens must receive Him until the times of restoration of all things (Ac 3<sup>21</sup>); and Christ Himself taught the Apostles that it was expedient for them that in bodily form He should leave them, so that the Comforter might take His place in the midst of the Church (Jn 16<sup>7</sup>).

(3) Christ's mystical body.—In 1 Co 12<sup>27</sup> (cf. Ro 12<sup>5</sup>) St. Paul uses the figure of a body and its members to describe the relations of Christian people to Christ and to one another, and then in v. 27 he definitely applies the expression 'a body of Christ' (σώμα Χριστοῦ) to the Corinthian Church. With reference to the body politic the figure was a familiar one in both Greek and Latin literature, and the Apostle transfers it to the Church for the purpose of emphasizing his exhortations to Church unity and a sense of mutual dependence among the people of Christ. As yet, however, the figure is quite plastic, while the anarthrous σώμα suggests that it is the local Church which is immediately in view. Here, accordingly, we have in their first draft the Apostle's grand conceptions on the subject of the Lord's mystical body. When we come to Ephesians (1<sup>22-23</sup> 4<sup>12</sup>) and Colossians (1<sup>18-24</sup>) we find that his ideas have been elaborated, and that 'the body of Christ' (τὸ σώμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ) has become a fixed title of the Church not as local merely, but as universal, nor simply as empiric, but as an ideal magnitude. We notice this further distinction, that in the earlier Epistles Christ is conceived of as the whole body, of which individual Christians are the particular members; while in Ephesians and Colossians He becomes the head of the Church which is His body (Eph 5<sup>23-24</sup>, Col 2<sup>19</sup>)—the vital and organic centre of the whole. The idea of this striking figure is similar to that presented by our Lord Himself in the allegory of the Vine and the Branches (Jn 15<sup>1-8</sup>). The lesson of the figure, as of the allegory, is not only that in Christ all believers are bound together into the unity of the Church, but that the spiritual vitality, indeed the very existence, of individual Christians and Christian communities depends upon the closeness of their relations with Jesus Christ who is their head.

(4) Christ's symbolic body.—On the night in which He was betrayed, Jesus, in instituting the sacrament of the Supper, said of the bread which He took and broke and gave to His disciples, 'This is my body' (τοῦτό ἐστι τὸ σῶμά μου: Mt 26<sup>26</sup>, Mk 14<sup>22</sup>, Lk 22<sup>19</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>24</sup>). Similarly St. Paul, writing to the Corinthians, says of the bread which is broken at the Supper, 'Is it not the communion of the body of Christ?' (1 Co 10<sup>17</sup>); while in the same Epistle he describes the person who eats the sacramental bread unworthily as 'guilty of the body of the Lord' (11<sup>27</sup>), and says that a man eats and drinks judgment unto himself 'if he discern not the body' (11<sup>29</sup>). Opinions have differed greatly in the Church as to the full significance of this language, whether on the lips of Jesus or of St. Paul. But whatever its further meanings may be, there can be little doubt that primarily the broken bread of the Supper is a symbol of the crucified body of Christ. With this symbolic use of the word 'body' many have sought to identify the words of the Lord in the Fourth Gospel about 'eating the flesh' of the Son of Man (Jn 6<sup>53-58</sup>). But as the word σώμα denotes the body as an organism, while 'flesh' (σὰρξ) applies only to the substance of the body, and as σὰρξ is never employed elsewhere in the NT to describe the sacramental bread, it is unlikely either that Jesus would use σὰρξ with this intention, or that the author of the Gospel would have failed to use σώμα, the ordinary sacramental term, if it had been his intention to represent our Lord as furnishing in the Capernaum discourse a prophetic announcement of the institution of the Supper. BOOK.—The word 'book,' representing two Greek words, βιβλος and βιβλίον (with dim. βιβλαρίδιον, Rev 10<sup>2, 4</sup>), is of fairly frequent occurrence in the NT, although it is found only nine times in the Gospels. Very probably a book in the form familiar to us did not exist in NT times. The book of Scripture was a roll, as we may gather from such a text as Rev 5<sup>1</sup>, 'A book written within and on the back, sealed with seven seals.'

BORDER

The Scriptures used in the synagogues up to the fall of Jerusalem were probably leather rolls, or at least rolls of skins tanned in some way; but papyrus rolls were in very general use. Parchment was in use also, as we see from 2 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>, but probably also in the roll and not the codex form. The distinction between the books (τὰ βιβλία) and the parchments (τὰς μεμβράνας) in the passage just referred to was, in all probability, simply one relating to the material used and not to the form of the manuscript, although it is not absolutely certain at what date parchments began to be folded instead of rolled.

The word 'book' is not always used in a strictly technical sense. In Mt 1<sup>1</sup> 'The book of the generation of Jesus Christ' means simply the record of, or writing about, the genealogy of Jesus. There is no reason to think that St. Matthew meant it to be understood that the genealogy formed a little roll by itself. Again in such expressions as 'the book of life' (although that expression does not occur in the Gospels), it is evident that the writer is speaking figuratively. Our Lord said to His Apostles (Lk 10<sup>20</sup>), 'Rejoice because your names are written in heaven'; and in the OT (Ex 32<sup>32</sup>) there is express mention of a book which God had written: 'If not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written.' The connexion of the expression 'book of life' with the words of our Lord to His Apostles, and with the daring yet splendid utterance of Moses, is obvious enough. To say that names are in 'the book of life' and 'the Lamb's book of life,' is to say that those bearing these names are accepted and accounted as members of the heavenly kingdom here and hereafter.

The word 'book' is used in its technical sense of an actual roll or volume in Mk 12<sup>29</sup>, Lk 8<sup>47</sup>, 20<sup>45</sup>, and Jn 2<sup>20</sup>. It is noteworthy that in Mk 12<sup>29</sup> the writings of Moses are called not 'the books,' but simply 'the book.'

The books mentioned in Ac 19<sup>19</sup> as having been brought by their possessors and burned, were probably, many of them at least, simply amulets, spells, grammata Ephesia, little strips of parchment with words professedly of magical value written on them.

What is this 'border of the garment' that plays such a rôle? Clearly in our Lord's time the Jews had come to attach great importance to it. To them it was the chief of three 'sensible signs,' or material reminders, of their obligations under the Law, the other two being the PHYLACTERIES (ἐπιθήματα) and mezuzoth, oblong boxes fixed above the door-posts, on which Dt 6<sup>8-9</sup> and 11<sup>12-21</sup> were written, according to the directions there given. The Law first required (Dt 22<sup>12</sup>) that 'twisted cords' (Heb. gōdhillim, incorrectly rendered 'fringes' by AV and RV) be formed upon the four corners ('four borders,' RV) of the mantle or 'outer garment.' This thing termed gōdhillim acquired later the special name zizith,—it is so rendered by the Targum in Dt 22<sup>12</sup>. The same law is found in the Priestly Code in expanded form: 'And the Lord spake unto Moses saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes (zizith, κράσμενα) in the borders' (more correctly 'tassels in the corners,' RvM) 'of their garments throughout their generations, and that they put upon the fringe of each border (i.e. 'the tassel of each corner') a cord of blue' (Nu 15<sup>37, 38</sup>).

BOSOM

The 'twisted cords' of Dt 22<sup>12</sup> were clearly intended to be fastened to the four corners of the outer garment (usually called simlah). The Priestly Code, however, further called for a 'tassel' to be attached to each corner by a cord of blue. Now, it is to these 'tassels' that the Gr. translators give the name κράσμενα—the term exclusively used in the NT. The simlah was worn like the Gr. himation (the NT equivalent), the loose end being thrown over the left shoulder. The 'tassel' attached to this corner, then, could be reached with ease from behind, as in the case of the woman with the issue of blood (Mt 9<sup>20</sup>).

Some think that behind this law was an ancient Semitic custom with superstitious and magical associations, which, however, was impressed with a new significance by the Hebrew legislation. At any rate, we see here, as elsewhere, that in NT times a special virtue was still thought to be attached to the 'tassels on the four corners' (cf. Mt 14<sup>36</sup>, Mk 6<sup>5</sup> with Lk 4<sup>7</sup> and 1 K 1<sup>20</sup>).

In the Mosaic Law they were evidently intended to be, as to the more spiritually minded doubtless they were, simply reminders of the obligations resting upon Jehovah's people to walk in this law and to keep all His commandments (Nu 15<sup>38, 40</sup>). The ostentatious Pharisees, however, went beyond others in their use of these signs, by making them large and conspicuous.

Jewish hearers and readers would at once understand what Jesus meant by this charge against the scribes and Pharisees, 'who sit in Moses' seat.' Making their phylacteries unusually broad and enlarging the borders ('tassels') of their garments would both be understood as their way of calling every casual observer to witness that they were remarkably pious. It was this ostentatious display of an empty, outward piety which Jesus here and elsewhere denounces, and which has given such a sinister and forbidding significance to 'Pharisaism' the world over.

BORROWING.—See LOANS.

BOSOM occurs 5 times in EV of the Gospels (Lk 6<sup>28</sup> 16<sup>22, 23</sup>, Jn 1<sup>18</sup> 13<sup>29</sup>), representing in each case the Gr. κόλπος, the word which in LXX regularly corresponds to ḥem of the Heb. text and 'bosom' of the EV. κόλπος is found only once more in NT, viz., in Ac 27<sup>38</sup>, where it has the secondary sense of a bay or bight (a bosom-like hollow); cf. Eng. 'gulf,' which comes from this root.

In classical Greek, in the LXX, and in the NT κόλπος, like Lat. sinus (which Vulg. gives in all the above passages), is used in the two principal senses of (a) the human bosom, the front of the body between the arms; (b) the bosom of the garment, i.e. the hollow formed in front when the upper garment was bound round the waist with the girdle. In EV of the OT 'bosom' is to be understood, according to the context, in one or other of these two senses. E.g. in expressions like 'the wife of thy bosom' (Dt 13<sup>9</sup>), 'Naomi took the child and laid it in her bosom' (Ru 4<sup>16</sup>), the first sense is evidently the proper one. On the other hand, when we read of putting one's hand into one's bosom (Ex 4<sup>7</sup>), taking fire into the bosom (Pr 6<sup>27</sup>), receiving a gift in the bosom (21<sup>14</sup>), it is the bosom of the garment of which we are to think. See art. DRESS.

1. In Lk 6<sup>8</sup>, where our Lord says to willing givers, 'Good measure, pressed down, shaken together, running over . . . shall they give into your bosom,' it is clear that the word has the sense of (b). The overhanging front of the upper garment when confined by the girdle was used as a convenient receptacle, serving the purposes of the modern pocket. An adequate paraphrase would thus be, 'Your pockets shall be filled to overflowing.' In the remaining passages two distinct questions emerge. First, the more important one as to the general meaning in each case of the expression 'in the bosom' or 'on the bosom.' Next, in those cases in which the phrase is taken to refer to the position at table of one guest in relation to another, as to whether the 'bosom' is the bosom proper or the bosom of the garment.

2. To begin with the simplest passage, the general meaning of Jn 13<sup>23</sup>, in the light of the table customs of the period, is perfectly plain. In the time of Christ it was customary at a set feast to recline on a divan or couch, with the feet stretched out behind, the left arm supported on a cushion, and the right hand free for eating. Moreover, the usual plan was that the guests reclined not at right angles to the table, but obliquely, this being manifestly much the more convenient way of reaching the viands (cf. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. et Talm., ad loc.). By this arrangement a second guest to the right hand lay with his head towards the bosom of the first, and so on. But what precisely is meant by 'bosom' in this connexion? Whether is the word used in the sense of (a) or of (b) as described above? Probably in the latter, the meaning being that the head of the second reached 'to the sinus of the girdle' of the first (see Meyer, Comm. in loc.). It could not well have reached to the other's bosom in the strict sense of the word, for this would have interfered with his freedom and comfort in eating and drinking. This view is confirmed by the fact that when the Evangelist describes St. John as leaning back (ἀνεκλίσθη) on Jesus' breast to ask Him a question, a different word (επιθήσει) is employed (v. 2<sup>2</sup>, cf. 21<sup>20</sup> and see RV in both cases). See art. GUEST-CHAMBER.

3. The expression 'Abraham's bosom' (Lk 16<sup>22-23</sup>) has already been dealt with in its general eschatological signification (see art. ABRAHAM). A question remains, however, as to the precise form of the figure which the words are meant to suggest (note that the plur. in v. 2<sup>3</sup> has no separate connotation from the sing. in v. 2<sup>2</sup>). Cf. Homer, Il. ix. 570, and see Winer-Moulton, Gramm. of NT Gr. 219 f. Is Abraham to be thought of, fatherlike, as enfolding Lazarus in his arms (cf. 'Father Abraham,' vv. 24, 27, 30), or rather as receiving him into the place of the honoured guest, the place nearest to himself at a heavenly banquet? 'Into Abraham's bosom' (εἰς τὸν κόλπον 'A., v. 2<sup>3</sup>) might suggest the former, but 'in his bosom' (ἐν τοῦ κόλπου αὐτοῦ, v. 2<sup>3</sup>) may very well be used with reference to the idea of a feast, after the analogy of Jn 13<sup>23</sup> (κόλπος is used in the plural form both of the human bosom and of the folds of the upper garment. See Liddell and Scott and Grimm-Thayer, s.v.). And this seems to be confirmed by that other passage (Mt 8<sup>11</sup>, cf. Lk 13<sup>28-29</sup>) in which Jesus says, 'Many shall come from the east and the west, and shall sit down (RVm 'recline,' Gr. ἀνακλιθήσονται; cf. ἀνακλίθη in TR reading of Lk 7<sup>9</sup>, which AV renders 'sat down to meat') with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven.' Alike for the social outcast (Lazarus) and for the religious outcasts (the Gentiles), Jesus holds out as a joyful prospect the thought of sitting down with Abraham at a heavenly banquet-table. The conception of Paradise, moreover, under the figure of a feast, is specially appropriate, because of the contrast it presents to the earthly condition of Lazarus as a starving beggar (v. 2<sup>2</sup>), just as it is in keeping with the great reversal in the positions of the two men that Dives, who on earth had 'fared sumptuously every day' (v. 2<sup>6</sup>), should now lack even a drop of water to cool his burning tongue (v. 2<sup>8</sup>).

4. The only passage that remains is Jn 1<sup>13</sup>, where Jesus Christ is described as 'the only-begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father.' In this case the image of neighbours at a feast seems quite inappropriate, though some have suggested it; and it is in every way more suitable, in view of the whole purpose of the Prologue no less than the language of the immediate context, to take 'in the bosom of the Father' in that closer and more tender meaning in which in the OT the expression is used to describe, whether literally or figuratively, the relation of a wife to her husband (Dt 13<sup>9</sup>) or of a child to his father (Nu 11<sup>12</sup>) or mother (1 K 17<sup>19</sup>). This beautiful term of human affection is employed here to denote the intimate fellowship of perfect love which exists between God and His Son. Some difficulty is occasioned by the fact that the phrase in the original is εἰς τὸν κόλπον, literally, 'into the bosom.' Meyer insists on giving to εἰς its ordinary meaning of 'direction towards,' and so recognizes as the prominent element in the expression the idea of having arrived at. He admits that 'so far as the thing itself is concerned,' the εἰς τὸν κόλπον of v. 1<sup>13</sup> does not differ from the πρὸς τὸν θεόν of v. 1<sup>9</sup>, but maintains that in v. 1<sup>13</sup>, at all events, the Evangelist desires to express the fullest fellowship with God, not before the Incarnation, but after the Ascension into glory. In this case, however, the description of Jesus Christ as εἰς τὸν κόλπον of the Father would be inappropriate, for the Evangelist is in the act of explaining how it is that the Only-Begotten Son was made to 'declare' the Father while on earth (note the aorist ἐγγήσατο). It seems proper, therefore, to take εἰς as a timeless present, and to understand the author to mean that Jesus had declared God on earth because His inherent relation to the Father, before the Incarnation as after the Exaltation, was one of being 'in his bosom' (cf. 16<sup>23</sup> 'I came out from the Father, and am come into the world'; 17<sup>8</sup> 'the glory which I had with thee before the world was . . . I manifested [ἐφάνησα, aor.] thy name'). The εἰς in this case may either simply be used for ἐν, after the fashion of the constructio praeognans (cf. Mk 13<sup>35</sup>, Ac 7<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>20</sup>), or, as Godet and Westcott think (Comm. in loc.), may point to a relationship not of simple contiguity merely, but of perfect communion realized through active intercourse. The Father's bosom is not a place but a life. 'The Son is there, only because He plunges into it by His unceasing action; it is so with every state which consists in a moral relation' (Godet, ib.).

BOTTLE.—This is the AV rendering (RV 'wine-skins') of ἀράκι, which denotes the tanned skins of sheep and goats that are used in the East for holding water, oil, wine, and cheese (see art. 'Bottle' in Hastings' DB i. 311). In the Gospels the allusion to 'bottles' occurs in connexion with a question that had been addressed to Christ with regard to an observed difference between His disciples and those of John the Baptist and the Pharisees (Mt 9<sup>14-17</sup>, Mk 2<sup>18-22</sup>, Lk 5<sup>33-38</sup>). A certain outward conformity was expected in religious teaching and example, and the absence of fasting among His disciples seemed to create a perplexing and objectionable departure. The interview takes place immediately after the incident of Levi's feast, when Christ's eating with publicans and sinners was objected to as lowering the standard of the religious life.

The simile reminds us that the life of institutions as of individuals has a limit. It is sufficient for the wine-skin to have once held and matured and preserved its new wine. The attempt to repeat the act of filling and distension involves the loss of both the wine and the vessel which holds it. The most venerated form was once an innovation on what preceded it, and by the operation of the same law a fresh expansive force will again alter external conditions and create new conformities. Christ claims the entire devotion of His disciples, and while the fasting that was largely a commemoration of the past was suspended during His presence, it would receive in days to come a fresh impulse from His absence.

The important truth taught by the simile of the wine-skin and its contents is emphasized by the twofold fact that religious forces are the most expansive of all, and that their receptive forms often attain to a degree of rigidity which preserves the outward shape after the contents have been withdrawn. With regard to the principle of fasting, the affinity of mind and body that connects sorrow with sighing (Is 35<sup>10</sup>) abundantly authorizes the observance under naturally suitable circumstances, but fasting by statute has usually been found to be linked, both as cause and effect, with ecclesiastical segregation and asceticism.

BOY (the word).—In the AV this word does not occur in the Gospels, nor indeed in NT, and only three times in OT (Gn 25<sup>27</sup>, Jl 3<sup>3</sup>, Zec 8<sup>5</sup>). We usually have 'male child' for a very young boy, and 'lad' for an older one, where 'boy' would be used in modern English. And RV has retained the older use in most cases.

But there is in modern English an ambiguous use of 'boy'. It sometimes approximates to the sense of 'servant' (cf. 'doctor's boy'), and in some of our colonies is used of a native male servant irrespective of age. A 'boy' in this sense may be grey-headed. This force of the word made it suitable as a rendering of παῖς in certain cases. In Mt 8<sup>9-10</sup>=Lk 7<sup>2-3</sup>, the centurion's servant is sometimes described as a δοῦλος (RVm, 'bond-servant') and sometimes as a παῖς (RVn, 'boy'). RV text keeps the AV 'servant' throughout for both words. A comparison of Mt 8<sup>13</sup> with Lk 7<sup>10</sup> shows that the two words apply to the same person. It is in the centurion's own speech (Mt 8<sup>6</sup>=Lk 7<sup>7</sup>) that he refers to the slave who was 'precious unto him' (Lk 7<sup>7</sup> RVn) by the milder word. The narrative (except Mt 8<sup>13</sup>) uses δοῦλος, as the centurion himself does in Mt 8<sup>9</sup>, Lk 7<sup>8</sup>. The variation is either a natural simple touch, proving the veracity of the narrative, or it is an instance of the highest art. See art. SERVANT.

As in the above instance παῖς=δοῦλος, so in the narrative of the healing of the epileptic child (Mt 17<sup>14-18</sup>, Mk 9<sup>14-27</sup>, Lk 9<sup>37-43</sup>) we find in St. Matthew and St. Luke (not St. Mark) that παῖς can= υἱός. Here Mt 17<sup>18</sup>, Lk 9<sup>42</sup> RV have 'boy' in the text, for the AV 'child.' Similar is the use in Lk 8<sup>31-34</sup>, where ἡ παῖς is 'maiden' and 'maid' in EV.

Except where the context requires a different rendering, παῖς is usually translated 'servant' in both versions, and RV often points out occurrences of δοῦλος by putting 'or bond-servant' in the margin.

In Jn 4<sup>21</sup> both versions have 'son' (= παῖς) where RV had far better have put 'boy' as in the above instance, keeping 'son' strictly for υἱός.

BOYHOOD (Jewish).—So little is recorded on this subject in the Gospels, or in the NT generally, that we are dependent on other sources for our facts. These sources are chiefly the OT, the OT Apocrypha, Josephus, the Talmud, and modern Eastern life. The first of these authorities is too early, and the last two too late, to justify us in basing on them any very positive statements as to Jewish boyhood in the time of Christ. With this caution they are used in the present article. And it will be remembered (1) that the Jewish life of our period was the result of the previous life of the nation; (2) that Israel is a nation of great conservatism in matters of religion and the home, although receptive of new ideas; (3) that some of the Apocryphal books were late enough to be products of an age in which Pharisaism, Hellenism, and other Jewish views met each other, much as they did in the early part of the 1st cent. A.D.

i. THE HOME.—Boys, until their fifth year, were under the charge of the women, afterwards they passed under the father's control. We therefore treat the period of boyhood as commencing at the age of five. Although no doubt many mothers retained their influence after the boy's childhood, it is surely a mistake to quote Pr 31<sup>1</sup> in this connexion, as Phillott does (Smith's DB i. 305<sup>b</sup>).

The special influence implied here is surely that of the queen-mother over an adult reigning king, which, according to Eastern custom, exceeds that of a wife. For there may be many wives but only one mother of the sovereign. The queen-mother (gebirah) is mentioned 1 K 15<sup>13</sup>, 2 K 18<sup>18</sup>, Jer 13<sup>18</sup>, and the name of the king's mother is given with emphasis in the account of his accession (1 K 14<sup>21</sup> 15<sup>2</sup> etc.). So, in David's lifetime, Bathsheba shows him great outward respect (1 K 1<sup>16</sup>), but is seated at Solomon's right hand (1 K 2<sup>19</sup>) when the latter is king. Phillott also refers to Herod. i. 138; Strabo, xv. 733; Niebuhr, Descript. p. 24.

More to the point is St. Paul's reference (2 Ti 1<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>4-5</sup>) to the example and teaching of Lois and Eunice, which no doubt was only one instance out of many of good maternal influence. And the Mosaic law placed the mother on an equality with the father in her claim on the obedience and love of her son (Ex 21<sup>17</sup>, Lv 20<sup>9</sup> etc.). The house-mother of such a family as our Lord's was neither so ignorant, so secluded, nor so debased as the woman sometimes described by travellers in the East. Judaism was not in this respect the same as Mohammedanism. Even now we are told that the home of the Syrian Christian is superior to that of his Mohammedan neighbours. And even among the latter the seclusion of the harem belongs chiefly to the life of the rich. In working and middle-class homes the wife and mother takes her part, as in the West, in the training of the children, and in necessary outdoor business. The OT and the Gospels show this. For instance, 'women's apartments' are never referred to in the latter. And Christ apparently met the wife of Jairus, the wife of Chuza, Susanna, Martha and Mary, Peter's wife's mother, and others, without the obstructive conditions of zenana life. We lay stress on this, because we believe that views of one side of Eastern life are often applied too widely, and because from this freer, higher status of woman in Israel there followed her greater fitness for wifehood and motherhood. We believe that in Galilee, at least, an almost Western freedom of intercourse between the sexes must be considered in estimating the influences affecting Jewish boyhood.

The period of boyhood, as we understand it for the purpose of this article, was from the 5th to the 13th year. The legal 'coming of age' was at 13 for boys, but 12 or even earlier for girls. But Schürer (HJP II. ii. 51 f.) thinks that the definite age was fixed in post-Talmudic times, and that nothing but 'the signs of approaching puberty' settled in earlier times whether a child was bound or not bound to the observance of the Law. We shall consider the ceremonies of this 'coming of age' later on. One thing connected with this date was the power of giving evidence. Schürer quotes the Mishna (Nidda v. 6): 'When a child is twelve years and one day old, his oaths are tested; when he is thirteen years and a day, they are valid without further ceremony.' Here, for our period, we may compare the commentators on Jn 9th: 'He is of age, ask him; he shall speak for himself.'

ii. PLAY.—The few allusions in the Bible to children's games do not allude specially to those of boys. Zec 8th: 'The streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof,' is quite general, and is 500 years too early. The use of yedeh ('boy') and yaldah ('girl') even leaves a vagueness as to the ages of the children. But the prophet no doubt based his words on the customs and sights of his day, and thus a fairly early period of life is meant. It is not said that the sexes were playing together, they might be in different groups. Nature, even in England, soon leads to this, and the early ripening of the East must be remembered. Therefore, soon after the period of infantile games, comes that of sports practised by each sex alone, and in the case of boys 'manly' exercises soon follow, if practised at all. In many parts of the East the climate is often quite unsuited for the 'school-boy' games of Northern lands. The absence of these is noticed by the teachers of many Mission schools. But in this respect there must be great differences. That lassitude which is true of children in Bombay, for instance, cannot at all seasons apply to those of Nazareth, which is about 1500 feet above sea-level. A caution is necessary when such excellent books as Lane's Modern Egyptians, dealing chiefly with Cairo, or even works on Persia or India, are used not merely to illustrate the Bible, but to add to the descriptions in it.

There were, of course, in the 1st cent. A.D. athletic sports and physical exercises in some of the large towns of the Holy Land. But these were so connected with Hellenic immorality that they were offensive to every pious Jew. They were chiefly confined to the cities which had a large heathen population, and we cannot imagine a gymnasium at Nazareth or Hebron. At Jerusalem, during the high priesthood of Jason (B.C. 173), a gymnasium was set up, and 'the very priests forsook their service at the altar and took part in the games of the palaestra' (Schürer, I. i. 203; 2 Mac 4th-14). Tiberias, Jericho, Tarichea had each a hippodrome or a stadium (Schürer, II. i. 33). Had the exercises for which these buildings were erected commended themselves to the Jews, the older boys would soon have emulated their adult countrymen as far as possible, just as English boys are cricketers and footballers because Englishmen are so. But Judaism completely condemned the exercises in which Greeks and Romans delighted. By their history as well as by their surroundings and details these exercises were connected with heathenism and apostate Judaism (Jos. Ant. XV. viii. 1). No son of pious Jewish parents could copy even the innocent side of these exercises (Brough, 76, 77). See art. GAMES.

An older boy in districts like Upper Galilee or the hill country of Judaea would find much physical exertion called for by the contour of the country. Almost every journey implied hill-climbing. Moreover, there were (and are) in many parts of Palestine many minor field-sports practised, such as the manning of small birds, which would form a pastime for older lads. Skill in slinging (Jg 20th, 1 S 17th, 2 K 32nd, 1 Ch 12th, Job 41st (20), Pr 26th [AV, RVm], 1 Mac 6th) could be obtained only by early training and practice. The same remark applies to the archery so often mentioned in the OT. That both these accomplishments were maintained in NT times may be believed from the many references to bowmen and slingers in Josephus (BJ, passim). But specific references to these arts as boyish exercises are apparently wanting.

Young English children play at 'horses,' 'school,' 'work,' 'mothers,' etc., which we may call games of imitation. The Talmud alludes to these; and our Lord noticed the little children playing at marriages and funerals (Mt 11th, 17, Lk 7th). These would be played by young children of both sexes.

It is curious that the Apocryphal Gospels have a legend about our Lord modelling birds out of moist clay (Syr. Eophod of the Lord Jesus I, pseudo-Matthew 27, Thomas II, Arabic Gospel of the Infancy 86 etc., in B. H. Cowper's Apocryphal Gospels). Some of these accounts describe our Lord's playmates as also modelling objects. While we reject the miraculous statements that our Lord endured these figures with life, we may accept the narratives as based on actual childish games. It is indeed said that Judaism would have shrunk from any representation of animate beings (Schürer, II. i. p. 36), but there is no proof that all good Jews took a puritanical, Plinian view of the prohibitions of the Law; and even if the Judaeo-Christian Apocryphal Gospels are absolutely wrong in describing this modelling as a specimen of our Lord's play in childhood, they may be right in using it as an element in a picture of Palestinian infancy. Are the children of orthodox Jews now forbidden the use of dolls or wooden horses?

In PEFS, April 1899, p. 99, is an account, with illustrations, of three soft limestone slabs, resembling draught-boards, found in the excavations at Tell Zakariya. One is complete, measuring 23 cm. x 20 cm. (about 4½ in. x 4 in.) and 7 cm. thick. It is ruled (incised) so as to form 144 squares of irregular size. The other two are fragments only. They belong to the Greek period. Such draught-boards have also been found at Gezer and at Tell-es-Safi. Some have fewer squares, and clearly there were various arrangements of the squares (PEFS, Oct. 1900, p. 321; Oct. 1902, p. 390). A collection of small waterworn pebbles, each about the size of an ordinary ivory card counter and three times as thick, was found in the lower Jewish stratum at Gezer. These were either draught-men, or counters for calculation (PEFS, Oct. 1902, p. 390).

Two small draughtsmen of green enameled paste (possibly Egyptian), found at Gezer, are described PEFS, Oct. 1902, p. 218, and pl. II, figs. 26, 29). Others of pottery of local manufacture have also been discovered.

iii. SCHOOL.—The majority of Jewish boys were as unable to study in the beth ha-Midrash as the majority of our population are to procure a University training (Ac 4th, Jn 7th-8th, and, on the other hand, Ac 22nd etc.). In any case this higher education belonged to an age beyond boyhood. Elementary schools, however, existed at least wherever there was a synagogue. In them reading was certainly taught; and even if Scripture was the only text-book, the knowledge thus acquired would avail in other directions. Writing also was taught, probably as a help to the reading more than for its own sake (Jn 8th, compared with 7th show that it was an 'elementary subject'). Arithmetic, etc., is not mentioned in our authorities, but some acquaintance with it is, of course, a probable part of the course. It would be of more interest to know if Greek was ever taught in the synagogue schools of Palestine. It must have been so necessary in the many bilingual districts. It was the means of communication between the natives and the Roman authorities.

A training in a foreign or in a dead language is always a mental advantage. Even if Greek were not taught to most Jewish boys, Hebrew was; and the Hebrew of the OT which we know they studied was not the Hebrew (Aramaic) which they spoke in their homes (e.g. Mk 5th). If only the mother-tongue was used, then the Scriptures were read (or verbally taught) in a Targum.

According to the Jewish authorities, the elementary or synagogue school was called the bêth ha-Sopher, 'house of the book' (i. e. the Scriptures), to distinguish it from the bêth ha-Midrâsh or bêth ha-Talmud, theological colleges where the Rabbinical explanations and additions were taught. The teacher of the school was usually the hazzan or servant of the congregation (Lk 4<sup>20</sup>; Shabbath i. 3).

An elementary native Mohammedan school at the present day, where the instruction is reading and writing Arabic, and the study of the Koran, will give us an idea of the probable methods. The scholars sit cross-legged at their teacher's feet, he being slightly above them (Lk 2<sup>36</sup>, Ac 22<sup>3</sup>, cf. Mt 61). The letters are first taught by tracing with a stick in sand. All reading is aloud, and in a kind of rhythmical chant or drone. Even in after life the sacred Book is always read aloud, and so Philip (Ac 8<sup>30</sup>) heard the eunuch reading his roll of Isaiah. The discipline is of the sternest kind, corporal punishment being freely used. Does a foundation of fact, or at least  vraisemblance, lie beneath the legends of our Lord's treatment by His schoolmaster? (Gospel of pseudo-Matthew 31; Gospel of Thomas 14, 15, 16, (Latin) 12, 13, etc.). It is noticeable how the Lord and His Apostles silently ignore all such advice about the training of children as we find in Pr 13<sup>24</sup> 10n 23<sup>13</sup>, Sir 30<sup>12</sup>. We believe that Judaism, like some sections of Christendom, had read such OT passages too literally, or applied them too severely, and Eph 6<sup>4</sup> is much more in the spirit of the Gospel.

How far was elementary education universal and compulsory? The Jewish tradition asserts that it was both (cf. Jerus. Kethuboth viii. 11, quoted in Schürer, II, 49). Schürer concludes that schools were general in the time of Christ; and thinks that the tradition is by no means incredible that Joshua, the son of Gamaliel (1st cent.), enacted 'that teachers of boys should be appointed in every town, and that children of the age of six or seven should be brought to them.' At least it is possible that education was fairly universal in our Lord's day, within the limits indicated above. See, further, art. EDUCATION.

iv. RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION AND PRACTICE.—Although the school education was on a religious basis, it does not appear to have clashed with or superseded the religious teaching of the home. The responsibility remained with the parents. This was in accordance with the OT and especially the Pentateuch, which gives no commands for formal religious instruction (schools, tutors, etc.) as in later Judaism. But it is clearly laid down in the Law and OT generally that children are to be taught (cf. Gn 18<sup>27</sup> (J), Ps 44<sup>7</sup> 78<sup>5-6</sup>, Dt 4<sup>9</sup> 6<sup>7</sup> 11<sup>19</sup> 32<sup>7</sup>). The Wisdom books imply parental teaching only (Pr 1<sup>8</sup> 2<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>1</sup> 7<sup>1</sup> 10<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>20</sup> 22<sup>3</sup> 23<sup>22-23</sup> 29<sup>7</sup>, Sir 3<sup>7-8</sup> 30<sup>8</sup> etc., also To 4 and 14, passim). We notice in Ex 12<sup>26</sup>, 13<sup>8</sup> the direction that the people were to join the instruction of the children in the history and meaning of the Passover with the feast itself. In Ex 13<sup>14-16</sup> the presentation of the firstborn is made another opportunity for such instruction. It is the fathers who have the religious instruction of young Israel in their hands, for other rites, ceremonies, festivals would naturally be explained to the children in like manner. Not by catechisms, reading lessons, tasks learned, or dry instruction in a school, but by sharing in the ritual worship, with interest aroused for the coming explanations offered, which were based on the history, were the children taught.

Many occasions presented themselves for such teaching as arises from the child's own inquiries and interest. There were the suggestive little rolls of parchment hung up in the doorway (the mezuzoth) and the phylacteries (tephillin) worn on the forehead and wrist (Dt 6<sup>8</sup> 11<sup>18</sup> and Ex 13<sup>16-18</sup>, Dt 6<sup>8</sup> 11<sup>18-20</sup>). See art. PHYLACTERIES. Another opportunity for religious instruction without set lessons was given by the wearing of the fringes (tzitzith), Nu 15<sup>37-41</sup>. See art. BORDER. The feasts observed at home and in the synagogue, and the pilgrimages to Jerusalem also afforded opportunities for oral and interesting instruction on the part of the parents. Though Judaism is a ritualistic and ceremonial religion, teaching through the eye in a way well adapted to the capacities of children, the ritual and ceremonies are largely for the home. The master of the house, the boy's father, did and does much more than 'conduct family prayer.' Although the Passover was held at Jerusalem, the greater part of the service and all the sacred meal were celebrated in private houses and family circles. The outward forms of religion at least met the boy in his home more than they do with us. There were more opportunities for a pious parent to do the duty which we have seen was cast upon him by the Law and by the customs of Israel.

Moreover, the Biblical history occupied the place of national history, of ballad poetry, of folk-lore tales, and of all that, in ages before the invention of printing, took the place of our 'children's literature.'

In many cases, no doubt, perhaps in most, Haggadic embellishments were made to the OT narratives, some of which have perhaps crept into one or both of our present Biblical versions, that of Palestine and that of the Dispersion. Ruth as a scarcely altered love-tale; Judith and Jonah, allegorical fictions; Esther, especially in its Greek form, a greatly amplified history, are instances of books which we now have in written forms, but which were once the 'fireside stories' (to use a Western phrase) of many Jewish homes. Here, rather than in purposeful and foolishness of the rabbis, was the source of much that is strange and bizarre in Jewish literature.

Who would listen so attentively to the father or old grandfather telling his evening story when work was done as the young boys and girls in the outer part of the family circle? The story-telling taste of the East is a well-known fact (witness the Arabian Nights); true history and the truth of God were probably taught orally in a somewhat analogous manner.

Religious instruction was aided in two other ways. No one can doubt that the historical Psalms (78, 81, 105, 106, 114) as well as the alphabetical ones (9-10, 25, 34, 37, 111, 112, 119, 145) were well adapted for use by young people, even if they were not composed expressly for the purpose of assisting those who were to learn them by heart. The 'Hymn of the Fathers' (Sir 44-50) has apparently a similar object. It is far too long for liturgical use, of which besides there is no record.

And, lastly, the synagogue services, with the lessons from the Law (Ac 13<sup>15</sup>) and the Prophets (Lk 4<sup>17-20</sup>, Ac 13<sup>15</sup>), filled their place in the training of a Jewish boy. It is in the highest degree unlikely that every household, even every pious household, possessed rolls of all the OT books. There was not perhaps a definite 'Canon' in our modern sense. More families would possess the 'Law,' but expense would prevent even this being universal. The oral teaching at home, the reading in school, and the hearing in the synagogue,—all had a share in producing that knowledge of the Jewish Bible which, as we see in the Gospels, was possessed even by working men like the fishers of Bethsaida (Lk 9<sup>14</sup> etc.). But the oral teaching, however and wherever it had been given, is clearly referred to in Mt 5<sup>21, 27, 32, 33</sup> (heard not read) 17<sup>10</sup> (hearsay of Mal 4<sup>4-6</sup>). Our Lord constantly referred to OT incidents (Mt 6<sup>29</sup> 8<sup>4</sup> 12<sup>40, 41, 42</sup> etc.) as to facts well known by the multitudes. (Do all Mohammedan families possess a Koran? Yet they know their faith). But then He also referred to haggadot (Mt 8<sup>11</sup>) and to the OT Apocrypha (Lk 6<sup>7</sup>, cf. 1 Mac 2<sup>52-4</sup>) in much the same way. The contrasted phrase, 'Have ye never read?' (Mt 21<sup>16, 42</sup> 22<sup>31</sup> etc.), was said to the religious leaders, who would have more advantages and opportunities than the bulk of the population, and who were supposed to study the written Revelation.

Up to the age of 12 or 13 a Jewish boy was called katan ('little') or tinok (cf. both words used of school children in passages quoted by Schürer, II. ii. 49 ff.).

The second word is a form of pn' yonek, suckling (pn; to suck), which however is used of schoolboys in the Talmud; and this meaning has clearly been reached by a language-change similar to that by which infant has come in English law to mean, in spite of its etymology, a person who may be twenty years old.

At the age mentioned above, the Jewish boy became bound to fulfil the Law. He was therefore called a 'son of the Law' (bar-mizrah), or a 'son of the Precept,' and the ceremony in which he was recognized as such by the community was naturally regarded as important and interesting.*

Opinions differ as to how much of the Law and the Precepts a boy was bound to observe before this ceremony. Probably there was no uniformity. The practice for sons of Pharisees is naturally the one recorded for us, rather than the popular one. And probably also the exact period when the fullest obligations fell on the boy was not fixed at first, but was settled individually (as Schürer suggests) by the appearance of signs of approaching manhood. We must remember that Orientals attain physical maturity at an earlier age than we do.

Later on, when the age of 13 was fixed, the Rabbis found support for it, or rather for that of 12. At that age Moses was said to have left the house of Pharaoh's daughter (but cf. Ex 2:1 with Ac 7:2). The Jews attempt to date the beginning of prophecy (1 S 12) as followed by 28.25, implying an interval of some years before 24, at which time Samuel was old enough to open the doors of the house of the Lord. The age is also stated by Jos. Ant. v. x. 4). Solomon was (absurdly enough) said to have been 12 years old when he gave his judgment (1 K 3:27). The only instances which are not entirely founded on conjecture or tradition is that of Josiah's age when he carried out his reform, 2 Ch 34<sup>1</sup> (not in 2 K 22<sup>3</sup>). These instances all look like attempts to date the origin of the Rabbinical rule further back into OT times.

According to modern rule, the boy must be 13 years old and a day. He is then presented in the synagogue on a Sabbath, called 'the Sabbath of Phylacteries' (tephillin) because the boy is then invested with them, and wears them in prayer, and is bound to observe the feasts and fasts. In olden days the obligation to attend the feasts at Jerusalem perhaps became binding after this ceremony. Women and children were exempt by the Law ('all thy males,' De 16:9). But Schürer (n. ii. 51) quotes a decision of the school of Shammai as to the meaning of 'child' (tefina): 'Every one who cannot yet ride on his father's shoulders from Jerusalem to the temple mount'; while the school of Hillel said: 'Every one who cannot yet go up from Jerusalem to the temple mount led by his father's hand.' We think that Lk 24<sup>13</sup> neither affirms nor denies any previous visits of Christ to the temple, either annually or three times a year. The fact that His life had been in danger in Judaea (Mt 23:35-37) might lead Joseph and Mary to observe the rule less strictly than they otherwise would have done. Perhaps boys who lived at or near Jerusalem did more than the provincials. If Joseph went up alone annually he probably did as much as most of his Galilean neighbours. The Jews of the Dispersion certainly only went up annually (usually at Pentecost), if they went more than once or twice in a lifetime. St. Paul had omitted many years (Ac 24:17), although a strict observer himself of the Law.

In modern times the Jewish boy reads (or rather sings) the lesson, and gives the blessing for the first time at the bar-mizrah ceremony in the presence of his relatives and the congregation. It is to his parents a time of joy and honour, and as he intones the holy words, the prayers of his pious friends are offered. Was this reading by the boy a custom in the 1st century? If the ceremony existed at all, it probably was a part of it, and Lk 4:16<sup>17</sup> implies that the Carpenter had officiated many times before. The first occasion may well have been at the close of boyhood.

Nowadays also the presiding Rabbi usually gives an address garnished with personal allusions. Presents to the boy from his friends, and a feast at the parents' house follow the ceremony. Much in the whole service may well be ancient, and date from before the time of Christ; but the absolute silence of the NT, Philo, and Josephus on the subject prevents our being positive about it.

To those boys who lived far from the capital and temple the periodical visits must have been of great importance, apart from their religious purpose, and if their homes were in quiet villages,

* The expression bar-mizrah has been found in the Talmud, but does not seem to have become used generally for an adult till the Middle Ages (cf. Schürer, II. ii. 5, 52 note 28, and his authorities).

the crowds at the feasts would arouse their keenest interest. They would also see the luxury of the rich, the noisy bargaining of traders, and signs of that imperial power which, however it was hated, was the great fact of the time.

v. WORK.—Every well brought-up Jewish boy was taught an occupation. This may have arisen from the many warnings against idleness in the Wisdom books of the OT (Pr 6<sup>6-11</sup> 10<sup>4-28</sup> 12<sup>24</sup>). 'Abundance of idleness' (RV 'prosperous ease') is noted in Ezk 16<sup>20</sup> as a cause and concomitant of sin, and the Rabbis appear to have realized the truth about the usefulness of manual labour to much the same extent as did the founders and leaders of Western monasticism. Rabban Gamaliel III., son of R. Judah ha-Nasi, said: 'For exertion in both (the study of the Law and labour) keeps from sin. The study of the Law without employment in business must at last be interrupted, and brings transgression after it' (Aboth II. 2; Schürer, II. i. 318, § 25). Another said: 'He who teaches not his son a trade teaches him to be a thief.'

St. Paul's father was wealthy enough to give him a good Greek education at Tarsus (probably) and a Rabbinical one at Jerusalem. His wealth is also implied in Ph 3<sup>8</sup>, if that passage refers, as some commentators think, to St. Paul's being disinherited for his Christianity. His private means somehow disappeared, so that he had to depend either on the contributions of others or on his labour. But he had a trade to fall back upon (Ac 18<sup>3</sup> 1 Th 2<sup>9</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>8</sup>). And the warnings about idleness in the NT were addressed by him to Gentile Churches, rather than by him or other Apostles to Jewish converts (Eph 4<sup>28</sup> 2 Th 3<sup>10-12</sup>). Our Lord was not only the carpenter's son, but the carpenter (Mk 6<sup>3</sup>); and Justin Martyr speaks of ploughs and yokes having been made by Him (Trypho, 88). But His earthly condition was not wealthy; and this may have been the case with Aquila (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>), as it probably was with the fisher-Apostles of Galilee. See, further, art. TRADES, WORK.

BOYHOOD OF JESUS.—1. The Biblical data.—The preceding article expresses the present writer's ideas as to religious training, education, and recreation in the time of Christ. The Gospels tell us nothing except by inference. The complete absence of haggadâh, i.e. such religious fiction as we find in the Talmud, from our Lord's teaching, implies either want of training in it, or positive rejection of it. But Christ acquired such a knowledge of the Old Testament, and perhaps of some books outside the Palestinian canon, that the teachers in the temple 'were astonished at his understanding and answers' (Lk 20<sup>7</sup>). We do not doubt that Scribism and Rabbiniism had begun, and had a considerable following. But we doubt if it had made such progress that a good Israelite in the provinces, living in private life, was bound to live and to order his household according to the rules laid down and enforced by the leaders of the nation in the next and following centuries after the great upheaval of the Jewish war with Rome. Then, by political necessity, the 'traditions' of a sect became the life of a nation. Perhaps, also, Christianity took out of Judaism those pious souls who were 'zealous of the law,' but not necessarily so of the 'traditions,' and there were left only those leaders and followers whose sayings supply us with the picture of 2nd century Judaism (cf. Schürer, HJP II. i. § 25, 'Scribism'—especially pp. 365-379). Yet it must be admitted, in favour of a contrary view, that Peter at least was guided by some rules which went beyond those of the OT, and which came from the scribes, Pharisees, and Rabbis (Ac 10<sup>28</sup>; Gal 2<sup>12</sup>—eating with non-Jews). But if any pious persons and households were as yet free from the Rabbinical 'yoke of bondage' (Gal 5<sup>1</sup>), surely that freedom was to be found in the household of Nazareth. A protest is needed, because some writers illustrate (?) Christ's early life entirely by Rabbinical rules. The many illustrations from Jewish books which are brought forward to prove that all Jewish boys learnt a trade are hardly needed to prove that Christ did so. Apart from Mk 6<sup>8</sup> (the only passage in which He is called ὁ τέκτων, and not merely ὁ τοῦ τέκτωνος υἱός), common sense would teach us that He who deigned to live in a carpenter's household, under real human conditions, in His youth, would help Joseph, and learn the art he practised. This is implied in His subjection to Joseph (Lk 2<sup>51</sup>). Perhaps the parable of the Mote (chip or splinter) and Beam (Mt 7<sup>3-4</sup>) derives its outward form from the work of His youth (cf. Justin Martyr, c. Tryphon, 88).

During the stay at Nazareth, where Joseph and Mary settled after their return from Egypt (Mt 2<sup>23</sup>), and the Babe (τὸ βρέφος, Lk 2<sup>12</sup>) passed into the stage of young boyhood. He grew in bodily height (ἡλικίᾳ, Lk 2<sup>52</sup>) and in bodily strength (ἐκπαλαιώθη, Lk 2<sup>52</sup>). The omission of πνεύματι in this verse by NEDL Vulg. and most crit. edd. takes away any ground for discussing its meaning. The next words πληροῦμενον σοφίας (or σοφίᾳ) imply a gradual, progressive filling.* What does 'wisdom' mean? Just as any manifestation of 'supernatural' power was out of place in this stage of our Lord's life, so would have been any such manifestation of knowledge, of adult acquirements, of power to instruct others, or of any other form of 'wisdom' which was clearly unsuitable to His age. He was the perfect child, with the perfection suited for each successive stage of childhood. And others recognized and valued this, no doubt (cf. 'in favour . . . with men,' Lk 2<sup>52</sup>). But nothing occurred in His childhood (or later, up to the time of His beginning His ministry) to prevent His neighbours being astonished when His work began, and wondering at His words and works, which clearly were new to them and unexpected by them (Mk 1<sup>27</sup> 2<sup>12</sup> 6<sup>2-3</sup> etc.).

Had it been found that He knew all human knowledge (e.g. reading, writing, arithmetic) without any instruction, there would have been a contradiction to the above facts. The σοφία then was (as we should expect in this Hebraistic passage) the opposite to 'folly' in the OT sense. As each fresh experience of life, each external difficulty (perhaps temptation) from His environment came on, pari passu, with His growth, there was heavenly wisdom to meet it. Tact, gentleness, veracity, the 'soft answer,' were the sort of things which distinguished Him from other lads, and not miraculous knowledge, or miraculous power such as is described in the Apocryphal Gospels.

'And the grace of God was upon him.' God's favour was clearly upon Him, as had been foretold in Is 11<sup>2-3</sup>. Men noticed (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>) that He was full of grace and truth. But we must remember that it was a gift to His human nature, and therefore words are used which are used of His brethren (e.g. Ac 6<sup>8</sup> Στέφανος δὲ πλήρης χάριτος). At the end of the next section St. Luke (2<sup>52</sup>) tells how He progressed in favour (χάρτις) also with men.

* The reading is doubtful. Treg. and WH prefer εὐφροσύνη, and Lachmann gave it in his margin, supported by NBL pl; and this, as the more unusual construction, may be right.

'And his parents went every year to Jerusalem at the feast of the Passover' (Lk 2<sup>41</sup>). From our Lord's own presence at other feasts, both of Divine and human appointment, and from the large crowds at them, we are led to reject the idea that pious Jews at this time went to Jerusalem only for the Passover. No doubt the greatest attendance was at that feast, and those who could attend only one probably chose it. Jews resident outside the Holy Land seem, probably on account of the more favourable season for travelling, to have preferred Pentecost (Ac 2<sup>1-11</sup> 18<sup>21</sup> 20<sup>16</sup> 21<sup>17</sup> 24<sup>13</sup>, I Co 16<sup>8</sup>). We think it probable, therefore, that the emphatic words of the sentence are of ἡμεῖς, Joseph may have gone at other seasons; at this season Mary usually (ἑπορεύομαι, imperfect of 'habit') accompanied him. Women were not bound to attend any feast (Dt 16<sup>10</sup> 'all thy males'), Jn 7<sup>53-56</sup> show that the 'brethren of the Lord' attended the feast of Tabernacles, which may be an indication of what Joseph's custom was. But if women went to any one feast, it would be, if possible, to the Passover, partly because it was the most esteemed, partly because the Supper (both sacrificial and social) was an essential element in it, and partly because of the examples of Peninnah and Hannah (1 S 1<sup>2, 7, 21</sup>).

In Lk 2<sup>42</sup> we are told of Christ going with them, being twelve years old. Does this imply that He had never been with them before? We doubt it. The mention of His age may be made only in order to mark at what period of His life the incident which follows occurred. The commentators, etc., lay great stress on His having become a 'son of the Law' or a 'son of the Precept,' and represent this Passover visit to Jerusalem as a sort of 'First Communion' after a sort of 'Confirmation.' The whole of the legislation about the bar-mizvah dates after the destruction of the Jewish polity in A.D. 70 (cf. Schürer, HJP II. ii. 51 f.). There may have been earlier traces of it in Pharisaic Judean circles. Besides, when a definite age for 'full membership' of the Jewish community was fixed, it was at thirteen, and not at twelve years of age. The current views would never have been brought forward, but for the assumption by the elder Lightfoot and others that in this Talmudic rule we find the explanation of the mention of our Lord's age.

Moreover, are there any Biblical grounds for supposing that a child of five, or ten, or any other age, might not be present at the Passover, and eat of the Paschal lamb? Ex 12<sup>3-4</sup> rather implies the contrary, for if all children under thirteen were excluded, few households would be large enough to consume a yearling lamb. If the custom of the present Samaritans is any guide, it is stated that even little girls eat of the lamb (cf. J. E. H. Thomson in PEFSt, 1902, p. 91).

But if it was our Lord's first Passover (which St. Luke does not say), we can find another reason than the age He had reached for the previous omission. Herod the Great had tried to kill the Child. Archelaus was considered by Joseph to be as dangerous, and therefore Jesus was kept out of his dominions. Now Archelaus was in exile; in 759 A.U.C. a Roman governor had been appointed over Judaea, and Roman law and justice, however defective at times, at least ensured safety for the Boy who had been sought for ten or eleven years before as an infant. Of course, it is possible that the later Jewish rule prevailed in Christ's day, but it does not appear to us to be proved, either from St. Luke's words, or from any contemporary or earlier source.

What did our Lord do at Jerusalem? The Biblical accounts of the Passover ritual are mainly confined to the first or Egyptian Passover. This differed naturally from later ones in some respects, and in others a difference had been made by liturgical regulations. For instance, the eating of the lamb in a recumbent instead of a standing posture was a change (Ex 12<sup>10</sup>, 1 S 1<sup>1</sup> 'rose up', Lk 22<sup>14-15</sup> etc.). So were the psalms, the prayers, the blessings, the four cups of wine, and other well-known customs. One of the best popular accounts of the Jewish ritual is in Bickell's Messe und Pascha, of which an English version by Dr. Skene has appeared. He rightly states that our oldest source is as late as the end of the 2nd cent. A.D., with large additions from the 11th to the 18th centuries (p. 112 f. Eng. tr.). Bickell also points out that the Paschal Lamb was an actual offering. It was slain in the Temple, its blood was sprinkled by the priest on the altar, its flesh was consumed as a sacrificial meal. Therefore, after the destruction of Jerusalem, when the Temple service . . . came to an end, it could no longer be eaten.

The same thing is true of the Chagiga, the meat of a slain thank-offering, which was wont to be previously brought with the Passover Supper. And we must remember that the ritual was probably not written down while it was a 'living rite.'* The earliest written sources are based on an oral tradition of what had been done a century before.

We may reverently conjecture our Lord's meditations as He saw the lamb sacrificed, and sat down to the Feast. The death of the lamb was a figure of His own death. The feast shadowed forth His feeding His people. Did He as yet know of His destiny? Perhaps it was beginning to unfold itself to His human consciousness (1) by His growing knowledge of His nation's religion, history, and sacred books; (2) by His mother's telling Him some of the incidents of His birth and infancy; (3) by the inner unveiling of His Divine nature to His human nature. We can only conjecture. But His answer to Joseph and Mary (Lk 2<sup>49</sup>) implies some self-knowledge, and perhaps a step in the acquirement of that self-knowledge and consciousness.

On another point we are on surer ground. At the Paschal feast it was customary for the youngest present to ask, 'Why is this night different from all other nights?' adding a mention of some of the ritual acts. 'What mean ye by this service?' (Ex 12<sup>26</sup> 13<sup>7-8</sup>, Dt 6<sup>2</sup>). And the head of the household or company replied by a recapitulation of the history of the Exodus, which in later times was called the Eastern Haggada. No doubt our Lord followed this custom, and no doubt also Joseph gave the explanation, either in the traditional words as handed down to the modern Jews, or in a freer, perhaps a fuller manner (cf. Ex 12<sup>27</sup> 13<sup>8</sup>, Dt 6<sup>21-22</sup> 26<sup>5-8</sup>; cf. Bickell, Eng. tr. pp. 118-120). Other details of the Passover ritual in the time of Christ, such as the sop, the cups of wine, and the singing of the Great (or third or final) Hallel, are vouched for by the accounts of the Last Supper given by the Evangelists and by St. Paul.† See art. PASSOVER.

* Compare the usual view of the earliest liturgies. We will not therefore dwell on the Jewish accounts of the ecclesiastical amplifications of the Scriptural order, and still less on modern Jewish use. But the present Samaritan customs (mode of dressing the lamb, the spit in form of a cross, the mode of roasting, etc.) are very probably similar to the Jewish rites before the destruction of the Temple. Cf. J. E. H. Thomson in PEFS, 1905, Jan. pp. 85-92, and Expos. Times, xi. [1900] 375 (very interesting), and other accounts by Dean Stanley, Mills, Petermann, Vartan, in Baedeker's Palestine and Syria, etc.

† Many writers who mention the Great Hallel ignore the various accounts as to the Psalms which composed it; cf.

'When they had fulfilled the days' (τελειώσαντες τὰς ἡμέρας). Our first impression is undoubtedly that the whole seven days of the Feast (Ex 23<sup>16</sup> etc.) are meant. We should expect pious Jews, like Joseph and Mary, to remain the whole time, not because it was a precept, but out of devotion. 'It was more laudable to remain the whole seven days, especially on account of the last day, which was a Feast Day' (Lightfoot; cf. Ex 12<sup>10</sup>). Edersheim (Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, I. 247) argues that Joseph and Mary set out for home before the close of the Feast, because the Talmud says that 'during Feasts' (not after them) 'the members of the Temple Sanhedrin came out on to the terrace and taught the people, contrary to the usual custom of sitting as a court of appeal,' and he thinks that Christ was there. In dealing with this suggestion we have to notice the expression τελειώσαντες τὰς ἡμέρας instead of the ὡς (ὅτε) ἐπλήσθησαν αἱ ἡμέραι of Lk 1<sup>22</sup> 2<sup>22</sup>, and ἐπλήσθη ὁ χρόνος of Lk 1<sup>27</sup>. The two words are sometimes synonymous in effect, but the distinction between them has been defined as follows: 'τελειώσ is to complete so that nothing remains to be done, but the thing or work is τελειώσ; it implies an end or object (τέλος) to be looked forward to and fully attained. πληροῦν looks at the quantity to be done, not at the end to be reached, and so is to fill a thing full, so that it lacks nothing.' St. Luke's words are therefore perhaps compatible with Joseph and Mary having left on the third day, the so-called half-holiday, when it was lawful to return home, but we prefer (in spite of Edersheim's Talmudical argument) to think that they 'stayed to the end' of the Feast. It might be said, however, by those who believe in the earlier return, that our Lord's staying behind was a tacit rebuke, especially if ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρὸς μου (Lk 2<sup>49</sup>) be taken in a local sense. St. Luke's use of the simple μένειν in the Gospel and Acts should be noted: the compound occurs only here and in Ac 17<sup>14</sup> in his writings; and in the latter case it is also used in contrast to Paul's departure. St. Luke, however, does not say that Jesus remained for any such reason, nor that Joseph and Mary lost sight of Him through any failure of duty. Popular books add much to the narrative.

All the pilgrims used to go to the Temple on the day of their departure, by a rule possibly based on 1 S 1<sup>10</sup>. There would be a great crowd, and the temporary separation of a family in the colonnades and on the steps would be (as in great public gatherings now) a natural occurrence, causing little alarm. Possibly Joseph and Mary joined their fellow-travellers from Galilee, in the belief that the Child, who would know the time and point of departure, was among the younger pilgrims. The little fear they felt on the first day (Lk 2<sup>44</sup>) rather supports the view mentioned above, that it was not Jesus' first Passover.

Our Lord's 'parents' (γονεῖς, Lk 2<sup>48</sup>)—'Joseph and his mother' is a correction in the interests of orthodox dogma, being ignorant of His having stayed behind, went therefore a day's journey towards home. As we do not know the route they travelled by, it is impossible to say that they went as far as Beeroth (Parrar, Life of Christ, and others). Jericho is quite as probable a resting-place.

The search among the kinsfolk and acquaintances being in vain, they returned to Jerusalem, and found Him 'after three days' (probably from Bickell, pp. 126, 127. They are not justified in saying which Psalm or Psalms our Lord used. Ps. 130 has the general support. The Babylonian Gemara mentions Ps 23. The 114th Psalm, which Christian tradition (cf. the name of its tune, 'Freginus') connects with the Passover, cannot have been the one mentioned (Mt 26<sup>30</sup>), as its use occurred before the actual supper (Bickell, p. 130). See art. HALLEL.

the time of separation). We need not inquire whether this expression means 'on the third day' (μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας, cf. Mk 8<sup>31</sup> μετὰ τρεῖς ἡμέρας).* The search on the road back to and in Jerusalem was a thorough one (ἀναζητοῦντες). There must have been many persons who could be inquired of with safety, persons in sympathy with the pious hopes of Simeon and Anna (Lk 2<sup>36-39</sup>), though these had probably passed away. It is St. Luke who tells us (2<sup>39</sup>) that there was a group of pious persons, who looked for the redemption of Jerusalem.† As this refers to a period only twelve years previous, Joseph and Mary could easily find some of these residents of Jerusalem, even if the connexion had not been kept up in the yearly Passover visits (Lk 2<sup>41</sup>). We think that the reason for Joseph and Mary spending at least a day in Jerusalem before going up to the Temple, was that they and our Lord were well known to this group of persons, and that they thought of Him as possibly among friends at Jerusalem, just as they had thought it possible on the first day of the separation that He was among the pilgrims.

Christ in the Temple.—'And it came to pass, after three days they found him in the temple, sitting in the midst of the doctors (RVm 'or teachers'), both hearing them, and asking them questions' (Lk 2<sup>46</sup>). By being present at the meeting of the Rabbis, Christ was obeying the counsel of Ben Sira (Sir 6<sup>34-35</sup>), which was possibly a commonplace piece of instruction in pious Israelite families.

'Stand thou in the multitude of the elders;
And whoso is wise, cleave thou unto him,
Be willing to listen to every godly discourse;
And let not the provverbs of understanding escape thee.
If thou seeest a man of understanding, get thee betimes unto him.
And let thy foot wear out the steps of his doors.'

A discussion has been raised as to the meaning of 'in the midst' (ἐν μέσῳ). It is usually thought that Christ sat, as scholars did, on the floor, with the Rabbis on a raised bench or divan, arranged perhaps in a semicircle. ἐν τῷ μέσῳ occurs in Ac 4<sup>1</sup>, where it cannot mean more than 'present in a central position where others could see and hear', yet apart from the members of the court. Kuinoel watered down the expression here to 'in the same room with the teachers.' It has, however, been suggested that the Rabbis, being struck by the searching power of the questions put by Christ, and the depth of knowledge of the Law which they displayed, invited Him to take a seat among themselves, as a mark of admiration, as well as for more convenience in the conversation. If this was so, their action would be somewhat similar to that in a British court of justice where a distinguished visitor, or even witness, is sometimes complimented by an invitation to 'take a seat on the bench.' It is said that members of the Sanhedrin did sometimes, on extraordinary occasions, admit an inquirer to the same seat as themselves. It would be a probable thing to do, where the youth of the person made him, as in this case, liable to partial concealment among older and taller bystanders.

There is no ground for supposing that Christ disputed with the Rabbis. It is clear that He in no wise offended their prejudices on this occasion. All that He said, although remarkable for His age,

* The mystical school of interpreters have pointed out several parallels to this period: (a) Bengel says: 'For the same number of days, when He lay in the grave, He was considered as lost by His disciples (Lk 24<sup>45</sup>).'

(b) Another writer says beautifully: 'Seeing Mary sigh for three days for her Divine Son, I see again humanity during the 3000 years of paganism, wandering in search of God.'

† So RV with MB, etc., but cf. AV and AVm. The Vulgate has the more easy redemptionem Ierusalē; Amalstinus: Iherusalem, and so Peshitta.

was suitable to it. The mode of higher religious teaching among the Jews seems to have been neither didactic nor catechetical, but by mutual interrogation between the teacher and the scholar. Hence the freedom used by the disciples and others in questioning their Teacher. Christ answered some questions and put others, no doubt with all marks of respect to those who 'sat in Moses' seat' (Mt 23<sup>2</sup>).

What led to Christ's desire to interview the Rabbis at all, and what was the subject of His questions? We can understand His intense interest in the recently celebrated Feast, its history and its meaning. Or, building on His previous knowledge of the Law and the Prophets, and on the current Messianic hopes, He might desire to learn from the Rabbis about the Messiah and the Messianic kingdom. Questions such as those discussed in Mt 24<sup>6</sup>, Mk 9<sup>11</sup>, Jn 7<sup>22</sup> would be raised and would interest Him. Lk 20<sup>27, 28-33</sup>, Mk 10<sup>2</sup> give us other authentic instances of the points discussed by the Jewish teachers of that age. It has, moreover, been suggested that on the journey up to Jerusalem, Mary for the first time told Him the story of His birth, of the messages of the angels, of the Magi, of Simeon, of Anna, of the flight into Egypt, and of the dreams of Joseph. It would be an overpowering revelation, for which, however, as an exceptional, though true child, He would be ready.

We are in the realm of pure conjecture, but certainly it might be God's way of revealing to the Divine Child a part of the truth about that Child's nature and mission. That to Him, as to the Church, to the world, and to each of us, the truth should come 'by divers portions and in divers manners' (He 1<sup>1</sup>) is a conceivable, and perhaps the most probable theory. And such a revelation, falling on an unusually gifted soul (Lk 2<sup>40</sup>), on a soul infinitely more receptive, because of its sinlessness (Wis 7<sup>22, 23</sup> etc.), than any other soul could be, would quicken into energy His whole life. If this were so, we have an adequate exposition of our Lord's desires, an adequate explanation of His action.

All that heard him were amazed (AV astonished) at his understanding and his answers' (Lk 2<sup>47</sup>). As, later on, 'never man so spake' (Jn 7<sup>46</sup>), so now, never child so spake. Yet as in the later case there was nothing contrary to true manhood, so now we ought not to think of anything contrary to true boyhood. It is worth noting that while AV has 'astonished' for the feeling of the bystanders (2<sup>47</sup> ἐξίσταστο) and 'amazed' for that of Joseph and Mary (2<sup>48</sup> ἐξεπλάγησαν), RV simply reverses the terms. The former word is often rendered 'beside himself,' 'beside themselves,' but it is difficult to express in English the difference between the two verbs.* See art. AMAZEMENT, ASTONISHMENT.

In spite of the assembly of 'grave and reverend signiors,' Mary's feelings were at once vented in audible address (εἶπε) to her Son: 'Child! why hast thou thus dealt with us? Behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing!' Her trouble overpowered her amazement. No doubt they were proud of Him in their hearts, but Mary thought it necessary mildly to chide Him for having caused them so much anxiety. We say 'chide' as the nearest expression of our thought, but few parents in the East or anywhere else would speak of what they deemed to be a child's error so courteously and with such an absence of 'temper.' We notice that it was Mary who spoke, and this may possibly be urged as a point in favour of the orthodox view of the 'Virgin Birth.' If Joseph had been the natural father of Christ, he would have spoken to a son of that age, at least in addition to the mother. His silence seems to us to balance such expressions as 'thy father and I,' or 'his parents.'* Mary joined Joseph with herself not only in her account of the continuous careful seeking (ἐπι-τοῦσα), but also in her sorrow.†

We now come to our Lord's reply, which is a veritable crux interpretum. There is no variant in the Greek (Μὴ ἐπιτρέτε μοι; οὐκ ἔβρατε ἐν ἐμοὶ τοῖς πατέρος μου βέβαιον με.). Nor is there any doubt that the words were a reminder (with a slight touch of rebuke) that Joseph was not His father (cf. δὲ πατὴρ σου κἀγώ, 29<sup>a</sup>), and that in any case the claims of His Divine Father were paramount. The principal interpretations of ἐν τοῖς τοῖς πατέρος μου are: (a) 'in my Father's house'; (b) 'about my Father's business'; (c) 'among my Father's servants and friends'; (d) combinations of (a) or (b) implying an intended vagueness. The Vulg. is in his quae patris mei sunt; the Pesh. supports (a) 'in my Father's house,' having ܘܥܒܕܐ [But does not both support (c) as much?; cf. I S 2<sup>90</sup> etc., i.e. by Semitic idiom 'house' (as in English) may mean family, connections].

In favour of (a) is the circumstance that τὰ ἑνοῖα, which strictly means 'that which is a person's property,' came to be used specially of his house, the word 'house' being omitted. Field and Hamprey compare the colloquialism 'I am going to my father's.' In profane Greek of Herod. i. 111, ἐν Ἀργαῶν; Philostratus, Vita Apollon. ii. 28, ἐν τοῦ βασιλέως; Lucian, Philop. ἐν Ἰλαυκίῳ; and many other cases where ἐκεῖ or rather ἐκεῖθεν is to be understood. L. Bos, who collected many of these instances in his work on Greek Ellipses, held strongly that πατέρα μου ('business') was not the word to be supplied here. He gave (p. 193) the same explanation of Jn 1<sup>11</sup> (16<sup>93</sup> 19<sup>91</sup>) and Ac 21<sup>6</sup>, but in these we find τὰ ἑνοῖα. In the LXX, cf. Est 7<sup>9</sup> καὶ ἄφθορα ἐν τοῖς Ἀγαῖς ἔθλοι, κ.τ.λ. (Gn 41<sup>12</sup>) where πάτρων τῶν τοῦ πατέρος μου represents the MT 'all my father's house,' and Job 18<sup>19</sup>. On the other hand, the supporters of (a) say that no example has been produced in Biblical or profane Greek for 'to be about a person's business' as a rendering of ἐνα ἐν τοῖς ἑνοῖα, though it is admitted that ἐν τοῖς ἑνοῖα (I Ti 4<sup>3</sup>) approaches it closely. Origen, Epiphanius, Theodoret, Theophylact, and Euthymius show a chain of commentators, explaining a passage in their own language, who take it in the sense of 'house.' Sir 42<sup>20</sup> ἐν τοῖς πατρικαῖς αἰτίαις (Vulg. in paternis suis) also seems to support it.

Against this, and in favour of (b), it has been said that Christ did not mean to say 'I could not return, I was in the Temple of God,' but 'My Father's business is the most important thing for Me.' It is also said that 'the necessity of our

* Where did Alford find ground for saying, 'Up to this time Joseph had been so called ("father") by the holy Child Himself, but from this time never?' It may be so, but it is not recorded. † Ἐβρατε occurs four times in Luke (here, 10<sup>34</sup>, 20, Ac 20<sup>9</sup>) and nowhere else in NT. 'Sorrowing' (AV and RV) does not seem strong enough. 'With intense anguish' is rather the meaning. Farrar (St. Luke) suggests 'with aching hearts.' In Lk 16<sup>24</sup> AV has 'to be tormented,' but EV 'to be in anguish,' of the sufferings of the rich man in Hades. In Ac 20<sup>32</sup> it expresses the grief of the Ephesian elders at parting with St. Paul. The word used in the Peshitta here, is used for σπασμοί in Ro 2<sup>9</sup>. As ἑβρατε is frequent in Galen, Aretaeus, and Hippocrates, it may be one of St. Luke's medical words. We are reminded by it of that later poignant sorrow, commemorated in the 'Shabat Mater.' She felt already the 'sharp and piercing sword.'

Lord's being in His Father's house could hardly be intended by Him as absolutely regulating all His movements, and determining where He should be found, seeing that He had scarcely uttered the words in question before He withdrew with Joseph and Mary from that house, and spent the next eighteen years substantially away from it. On the other hand, the claim to be engaged in His Father's concerns had doubtless both frequently been alleged explicitly in respect of the occupation of His previous home life, and continued to be so during the subsequent periods of His eighteen years' subjection to the parental rule; His acknowledgment of that claim being in nowise intermitted by His withdrawal with His parents from His Father's house. Intimations of a more general kind seem 'easily capable of being read between the lines of the inspired narrative, which increase the probability that the AV, rather than the RV, expresses the meaning of the Evangelist' (Dr. K. E. Wallis). It should also be noted that the expression 'my Father's house' occurs in Jn 2<sup>16</sup> in plain terms.

In favour of (c) we may quote the words of Jul. Döderlein (Neues Jahrbuch für deutsche Theologie, 1892, l. 204); "In My Father's house" is not correct; Christ soon leaves the Temple. "Business" is little better. . . . Joseph and Mary could hardly have been expected to understand that their child had special work to do for God's kingdom' (i.e. at that age). . . . 'Had they sought Him among the good, they would not have needed to seek long. Instead of this, they sought Him ἐν τοῖς ἐνγυρίαις καὶ τοῖς γυροῖς, who afterwards tried to cast Him down from the hill (4<sup>28, 29</sup>), and therefore even then would converse little about God's word: on the other hand, He was to be found ἐν τοῖς τοῖς πατέρος μου, who held the office of the Word (Mt 23), and as such gladly listened to His eager questions. . . . the masculine, so to speak, has the first claim on the τοῖς, which is formed from οἱ, not from τὰ. There is no mention of things in the context. . . . In Ro 12<sup>16</sup> Luther, AV and RVm give the masculine, "them of low estate." I Co 12<sup>15</sup>, Col 3<sup>11</sup> πάντα ἐν πάντων = "all things in all men," not "all things in all things." In Lk 24<sup>4</sup> no one would render ἐν τοῖς γυροῖς, "in the known places." Again the με at the end of the phrase seems to be antithetical and emphatic. "Among those of My Father must I not be?" . . . Not in what place, but in what company He must be, the anxious ones are able to learn once for all. . . . "where men speak of God, I shall surely be found" (cf. a review in The Thinker, 1893, iii. 171 ff.). We think this explanation deserves more consideration than it has received.

The syncretic combination of (a) and (b), as, e.g., by Alford and others, does not commend itself to the present writer. Finally, we should not forget that this conversation is one of the most likely ones in the Gospels to have been held in Aramaic and not in Greek. It will therefore be wise not to lay too much stress on the analogies quoted above on various sides of the question. Even the Greek of these two chapters, as we have it, is noted as Semitic in style, not in St. Luke's classical manner (except, of course, 1<sup>1-3</sup>). The Pesh., as we noticed above, supports (a). The Sinaitic palimpsest has 'Wist ye not that I must be with my Father?' (Expos. Times, xii. [1901] p. 206).
Joseph and Mary 'understood not the saying which he spake unto them' (Lk 2<sup>50</sup>). Therefore He had not learned this from them, nor from other teachers, nor had He previously spoken much, if at all, of the Father. Their difficulty, of course, was not the literal question of grammar which troubles us. It was that they did not so realize the spiritual force of His saying (ὁ σιωπᾶν τὸ ῥῆμα).

* Besides the works quoted above, the reader should consult Field's Origen Novissimus, Pars Tertia; Expository Times, x. 484; Farrar, St. Luke in Cambridge Bible for Schools, 388, 389 (in which he abandons the view taken in Life of Christ, l. 73); and most reviews and criticisms on the Revised NT generally.

Although Joseph and Mary understood neither His words, nor His actions, nor Himself, and although His words and actions show that He now knew more than He had done of His Father, of Himself and of His mission, yet He went down with them, and came to Nazareth and was subject unto them. As W. R. Nicoll says: 'He went their messages, did their work, humbled Himself, as if this episode at Jerusalem had never been' (The Incarnate Saviour, p. 41). The twelve years of hidden life were followed by another eighteen years of retirement. Even Nathanael, living at Cana, a few miles off, had not heard of Him (Jn 1:46). We may be sure that He who would 'fulfil all righteousness' (Mt 3:2) did not omit the yearly attendance at the Passover, and other feasts. He had at least to lead the life of example to His family and to His fellow-townsmen. Although we do not think that He or His were bound by all the rules of Pharisaic or later Rabbinic Judaism, we may be sure that He did what was usual among pious Jews, partly because He would obey those who sat 'in Moses' seat' (Mt 23:2), and partly because, like His future Apostle (Ro 14:2, 1 Co 8:9 etc.), He would put no stumbling-block in anyone's way (Mt 18:6).

We know that after Christ's ministry began, He spent much time in prayer, usually secret and for secrecy's sake, on the mountain (Mt 14:23, Mk 1:35, Lk 3:21, 5:16, 9:18, 22:29, 11:1). We cannot believe that this communion with His Father began with His ministry. Yet it seems unlikely that Christ in His early childhood would have followed this custom.

May we date it from His return to Nazareth in His twelfth year? Then His claim for liberty to be ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρὸς (ἀποτοῦ) would not seem to be a claim which either lay dormant for eighteen years ('my Father's business') or which was at once relinquished (by His return) and only taken up at intervals ('my Father's house'), in which case no claim for liberty was needed. Moreover, 'His Father's business' for the next eighteen years was, as the event proved, preparation. And this is just what Christ did, and the secret prayer and meditation were part of it. If this custom began, or at least took a larger part in His life then, we can reconcile His words in the Temple with His life in the following years. And if 'house' instead of 'business' be the word to be supplied, we can also believe that He knew that the whole Universe is the Father's house (Jn 1:2), and not only the Temple 'made with hands.'

It must also be noted that His growth 'in wisdom' implies not only learning by prayer and meditation, and learning from the written word, but also learning from observation of human life. We learn by these three sources, and He was made like unto His brethren. But for this last source of learning, time and the attainment of greater age are required. Did He know when His active work was to begin? Moses sinned by beginning too soon, but ignorance, and the thought that the right time might be sooner than it was, would be no sin. Yet He who 'was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (He 4:15), might conceivably be tempted as Moses was. We tread here on difficult ground, and our ignorance, our desire not to err from the Faith, and our reverence for our Lord, bid us say no more. Meanwhile He did His duty in retirement, passing from boyhood into manhood, and waiting for the call which came later. Was the non-appearance of the forerunner (Mal 3) the sign that the time had not come, and His appearance the sign that the time was fulfilled (Mk 1:3)?

And his mother kept all these sayings in her heart' (δισθησεν occurs in NT only here and Ac 15:28; cf. Gn 37:1 of Jacob concerning Joseph. ὁ δὲ πατὴρ αὐτοῦ διετήρησεν τὸ ῥῆμα, where E has the same tense as here διετήρησεν, perhaps by assimilation). But Jacob lost hope (Gn 37:36), while Mary kept these sayings in her heart. It was a close, persistent, faithful keeping, but a keeping in silence, even when it might have changed the attitude of His kinsmen towards Him, or indeed have saved His life. She spoke, no doubt, when the right time came. Stress is laid on her faithfulness and meditation also in Lk 2:25. We may ask whether τὰ ῥήματα included other sayings than the ῥῆμα of Lk 2:20. The παρά of some MSS in the place of the τὰρᾶ of others leads us to think either of other sayings of Christ, or of the remarks of the Rabbis and others about Him (as in Lk 2:28). And though He 'was subject unto them,' the goodness of Joseph and Mary, His own wisdom and advancing years, and now the deepened thoughts Mary had about Him, would surely prevent their making His subjection an obstacle or a hindrance to His development.

Again we read of His progress (Lk 2:22), though this refers to a time beyond the Boyhood. The statement about wisdom is a continuation of that in 2:40. The next word ἡλικία is ambiguous. If we take the meaning 'stature' (AV and RV text), it applies only to a part of the time between twelve years of age and thirty. But the margin of AV and RV 'age' would seem to be preferable. Though increase in age is as inevitable as increase in stature, yet St. Luke, having spoken of Christ's twelfth year, goes on to speak of His thirtieth, and characterizes by his transitional passage the whole of those eighteen years as a period of development. He cannot mean our thoughts to stop at the period when adult height was reached. The advance in ἡλικία must grammatically have the same duration as the advance in wisdom, and in favour with God and man.*

2. Dogmatic conclusions.—The doctrines of the Incarnation, of the Union of the two Natures in one Person, and of the Kenosis are beyond the limits of this article, though it is impossible to avoid bearing them in mind in dealing with our subject. But an exegetical study of Lk 2:40-52 shows a genuine human development of Christ in His boyhood. Body, soul and spirit made regular progress. With other children it is often the irregularity which troubles their older friends. Childishness (in the bad sense), where we expect some measure of intelligence; stupidity, which is sometimes the result of imperfect mental growth, and sometimes the result of the childish sins of laziness and self-will, are the common faults of children. Later on, the desire not to be subject to parental, or other restraint, and the premature longing for freedom (not necessarily for evil) are marks of sinful imperfection which we all recognize. Christ was free from them. When He was a child He lived, spoke, and no doubt thought as a child, but as a sinless one. The awakening of the human consciousness was gradual. As Oosterzee (on Lk 2) says: 'His recognition of Himself [we add 'and of His mission'] formed part of His filling with wisdom. His public ministry did not begin with a sudden impulse, but was prepared for * Mere comparisons with other passages, even in this Gospel, cannot outweigh the above considerations. In 1:28 no doubt the stature of Zacharias is referred to; 1:29 and Mt 6:27 are doubtful. In Eph 4:13 'stature' is probably right. Jn 9:21, 22 and certainly He 11:11 mean 'age'. In the LXX, Eccl 1:23, 2 Mac 4:6, Job 29:18 seem to bear the same meaning. But Symmachus in Cs 7:7 must have meant 'stature'.

by His whole life. It was the forgetting or overlooking this which led some early heretics to date the Incarnation from the Baptism. But we see that at the age when childhood passes into youth, Christ was already aware (in part perhaps) of His mission. 'The consciousness of His Divine Nature and power grew, and ripened, and strengthened, until the time of His showing unto Israel.'

Those who in times of controversy have most firmly held the Divinity of Christ have sometimes found a difficulty in admitting the ideas of growth and development in our Lord. This was specially so in the time before the careful statements of the Great Councils and the Fathers of that period. So Epiphanius (Hær. ii. 20) states that 'some Catholics were inclined to admit the miracles of the Infancy (as in the Apoc. Gospels) as affording an argument against the Cerinthians, and a proof that it was not at His Baptism that Christ was first united to the man Jesus.' Jeremy Taylor (Life of Christ, pt. i. § 7) has a passage which is worth quoting: 'They that love to serve God in hard questions use to dispute whether Christ did truly, or in appearance only, increase in wisdom. For, being personally united to the Word, and being the Eternal Wisdom of the Father, it seemed to them that a plenitude of Wisdom was as natural to the whole Person as to the Divine Nature. But others, fixing their belief upon the words of the story, which equally affirm Christ as properly to have "increased in favour with God as with man, in favour as in stature," they apprehend no inconvenience in affirming it to belong to the verity of human nature, to have degrees of understanding as well as of other perfections; and although the humanity of Christ made up the same Person with the Divinity, yet they think the Divinity still to be free, even in those communications which were imparted to the inferior Nature, and the Godhead might as well suspend the emanation of all the treasures of wisdom upon the humanity for a term, as He did the bestial vision, which certainly was not imparted in the interval of His sad and dolorous passion.* See art. CHILDHOOD.

GEORGE FARMER.
BRASS.—Wherever we find the word 'brass' in the EV, we may be reasonably certain that copper or bronze is intended. Copper was universally used by the ancients, on account of its extreme ductility. In Bible lands it was mined in the region of Lebanon, in Edom, in the Sinaitic peninsula, where the great Egyptian mines were located, and in the isle of Cyprus. Brass is a fictitious metal, an alloy of copper and zinc; bronze is a mixture of copper and tin. But while in ancient vessels a combination of tin with copper is frequently found, analysis hardly ever reveals the presence of zinc.

* The reference in the last sentence is, of course, to Mt 27th, Mk 15th.

1. The word χαλκία in Mk 7th (found here only in the NT), AV and RV 'brass vessels,' may be tr. 'copper vessels,' and is actually so rendered in the German and Dutch versions.

2. The noun χαλκός, tr. 'brass,' is used by Christ in Mt 10th 'Get you no gold nor silver nor brass in your purses,' by metonymy for copper coin. χαλκός occurs also in Mk 6th 12th, where it is tr. 'money,' marg. 'brass.'

3. The word χαλκοβρασεύς, white copper, tr. 'fine brass' (RV 'burnished brass') in Rev 1st 21st (cf. Dn 10th), is descriptively applied to the feet of Christ as He appeared in the vision of St. John in Patmos. There is quite a diversity of opinion as to its correct meaning. Some have supposed it to be that rare metal, more precious than gold, Orichalcum, whilst others have thought of frankincense and even of amber. In this connexion it evidently refers to the strength and stable majesty of the glorified Christ, in the same way as the Heb. nehsheth is used in the OT (Ps 107th, Mic 4th, Zec 6th).

BREAD.—In Syria and Palestine there are certain shrines and groves that have been preserved undisturbed through times of political change, and are to-day venerated by all the religions of the country. Such also has been the unchanged history of bread in Bible lands. It is to-day practically what it has always been with regard to (1) the materials of which it is made, (2) the way in which it is prepared, (3) its importance and use as an article of food, and (4) the symbolism and sanctity suggested by its value.

1. Materials.—Bread is usually made of wheat flour, the wheat of the Syrian plains being remarkable for its nutritious quality. An inferior and cheaper kind of bread is also made from barley flour, and less frequently the meal of Indian corn is used.

2. Modes of preparation.—The most primitive way is that of making a hollow in the ground, burning twigs, thorn-bushes, thistles and dry grass upon it, and then laying the flat cakes of dough upon the hot ashes. These loaves are about seven inches in diameter and from half an inch to an inch in thickness. The upper surface is frequently studded with seeds of Indian corn, and they are generally turned in the process of baking (Hos 7th). They are 'cakes upon the hearth' (Gn 18th), 'baked upon the coals' (1 K 17th 13). Such probably were the barley loaves brought to Christ at the feeding of the five thousand (Jn 6th 13). Out of this custom, prevailing among the pastoral tribes and the poorest of the peasantry, were developed several improved methods made possible by more civilized conditions of life. (a) Large smooth pebbles were laid over the hollow in the ground, and when the fire had been kept up for a sufficient time, the ashes were removed and the loaves were laid upon the hot stones.—(b) Thinner cakes of both leavened and unleavened bread were made upon a flat pan or convex griddle. These are now made especially at times of religious festival, and are coated on the upper surface with olive oil and sprinkled with aromatic seeds. They recall the 'oiled bread' of Lv 8th, and the 'wafer anointed with oil' of Ex 29th and Lv 24th.—(c) The cavity for the fire is deepened, and a cylindrical hole about the size of half a flour barrel is made of stone and lime with a facing of plaster.

BREAD

The pebbles are still left at the bottom for the better preservation of the heat, and the same fuel is applied till the oven has been sufficiently heated. The dough is then rolled out into broad thin cakes, and each disc, after being still further distended by being passed with a quick rotatory motion between the hands of the female baker, is laid on a convex cushion or pad, and is thus transferred evenly to the hot wall of the cavity. In a moment it is fired, and as it begins to peel off it is lifted and laid above the others at her side.—(d) The most developed form is that of the public oven in the village or town. Here features of the more primitive types still survive, but the cavity now becomes a low vaulted recess about twelve feet in length, and the pebbles are changed into a pavement of smoothed and squared stones. On it wood and lighter fuel of thorns are burnt, and the glowing ashes are finally brushed to each side of the vault. When the oven has been thus prepared the discs of dough are laid in rows upon long thin boards like canoe paddles, and are inserted by these into the oven, and by a quick jerk of the arm slipped off and placed upon the hot pavement to be fired. These loaves, when fired, are about an inch in thickness and about eight inches in diameter, and when newly baked are soft and flexible.

3. Use and importance of bread.—In the West bread is eaten more or less along with the other articles of food that chiefly constitute the meal; but in the East those other articles are rather eaten along with bread, and are regarded as merely accessory to it. When the farmer, carpenter, blacksmith or mason leaves the house for the day's labour, or the messenger or muleteer sets out on his journey, he wraps his other articles of food in the thin loaves of home-made bread. In the case of loaves fired in the public oven, these, owing to the glutinous adhesiveness and elasticity of the dough, and the sudden formation within them of vapour on the hot pavement, puff out into air-tight balls. They can then be opened a little at one side, and the loaf thus forms a natural pouch enclosing the meat, cheese, raisins or olives to be eaten with it by the labourer. As the loaf thus literally includes everything, so bread represents generally the food of man. A great exclusion was expressed in 'Man shall not live by bread alone' (Lk 4<sup>4</sup>). In the miraculous feeding of the multitude (Mt 14<sup>13-21</sup>) it was enough to provide them with bread. It was three loaves of bread that the man asked from his neighbour to put before his guest (Lk 11<sup>3</sup>). Two would have been sufficient for his actual needs; but even in such an emergency a third loaf was required to represent that superabundant something which as a touch of grace, often passing into tyrannical imposition, so deeply affects Oriental social life.

In the act of eating, Oriental bread is broken or torn apart by the hand. This is easily done with the bread of the public oven, as it can be separated into two thin layers. The thin home-made bread is named both in Hebrew and Arabic from its thinness, and is translated 'wafer' in Ex 23<sup>23</sup>, Lv 8<sup>26</sup>, Nu 6<sup>2</sup>, 1 Ch 23<sup>29</sup> (RV). Such bread is called פַּרְת (pārt); Arab. marbāk, from usarak, 'foliage,' 'paper'. At a meal a small piece of such bread is torn off, and with the ease and skill of long habit is folded over at the end held in the hand. It thus makes a spoon, which is eaten along with whatever is lifted by it out of the common dish. This is the dipping in the dish (Mt 26<sup>26</sup>), and is accomplished without allowing the contents of the dish to be touched by the fingers or by anything that has previously been in contact with the lips of those who sit at meat.

4. Symbolism and sanctity of bread.—In a land where communication with other sources of supply

BREATHING

was difficult, everything depended upon the local wheat and barley harvest. As this in turn depended upon the rain in its season, which was beyond the control of the sower, a special sanctity attached itself to what was peculiarly a gift of God, and a reminder of His continual and often undeserved care (Mt 5<sup>4</sup>). To the disciples of Jesus, 'Give us this day our daily bread' would seem a very natural petition. An Oriental seeing a scrap of bread on the road will usually lift it up and throw it to a street dog, or place it in a crevice of the wall or on a tree branch where the birds may find it. It should not be trodden under foot in the common dust. Thus the most familiar article of food, so constantly in the hands of all, both rich and poor, and used alike by the evil and the good, had in it an element of mystery and nobility as having been touched by the unseen Giver of all good. How deeply this feeling of reverence possessed the mind of the Lord Jesus is evidenced by the fact that He was recognized in the breaking of bread (Lk 24<sup>30</sup>).

In the social customs of the East, the giving and receiving of bread has always been the principal factor in establishing a bond of peace between the host and the guest at his table. It was a gravely unnatural offence to violate that law of hospitality. Of this offence Judas Iscariot was guilty at the Last Supper.

In traveling through Palestine and partaking of the hospitality of the peasantry, one may notice in the bread the indentations of the pebbles, and small patches of grey ash, with here and there an inlaid attachment of singed grass or charred thorn, the result of the simple baking process. It is bread, however, the best that the poor can give, and it is given with gladness and the dignity of a high duty towards the guest. When Christ sent forth His disciples to tell of His approach, He charged them to take no bread with them (Mk 6<sup>8</sup>). It would have been a serious discourtesy to have set aside as unfit for their use that which was offered to them willingly by their own people, and would have hindered the reception of the good tidings of the Kingdom.

To the crowd that selfishly followed Christ the giving of bread as by Moses was the sordid summary of Messianic hope (Jn 6<sup>26</sup>). God's gift of natural food to His people enters into the praises of the Magnificat (Lk 1<sup>20</sup>). When Christ called Himself 'the bread of life' (Jn 6<sup>35</sup>), He could confidently appeal to all the endeared and sacred associations connected in the East with the meaning and use of bread. In the initiation of the Passover, and in its commemoration afterwards, bread was regarded by the Israelites as the most general and effective symbol of their life in Egypt. In the initiation of the new covenant also the same humble article of food was adopted at the Lord's Supper, to be, with wine, the token of fellowship between Himself and His Church, and the symbol among His disciples of the Communion of Saints. The use of a symbol so familiar and accessible to all, and so representative of common life, seems to suggest that to the mind of Christ some realized and visible communion among the members of His Church was possible and to be expected.

BREATHING.—On the evening of the Resurrection, the Lord appeared to the disciples, gave them the commission 'As my Father, etc.', and when he had said this, he breathed on them (εμφύσησε), and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost (ἀδελφεὶ Πνεύμα Ἁγίου). Whose soever sins . . . retained,' Jn 20<sup>23</sup>. The word ἐμψύχω is that employed by LXX to translate נָשָׂא in Gn 2<sup>7</sup>, Ezk 37<sup>9</sup>. As Westcott observes, 'the same image which was used to describe the communication of the natural life [at the Creation] is here used to express the communication of the new, spiritual life of recreated humanity.' The figure of human life depending on the breath of God is frequent in the Bible; besides above passages, see Job 12<sup>10</sup> 33<sup>4</sup>, Ps 33<sup>6</sup>, Is 42<sup>7</sup>, Dn 5<sup>5</sup>, Ac 17<sup>25</sup>. In the following the breath of God is synonymous with the manifestation of His power: 2 S 22<sup>16</sup> Job 37<sup>10</sup> 41<sup>13</sup>, Is 11<sup>4</sup>. Both ideas seem to underlie our Lord's action. The Church was now receiving its commission, and the efficacy and reality of the commission must depend upon the indwelling in the Church of the same Spirit as was in Christ Himself. 'Alike the mission of the Church and its authority to forgive or retain sins are connected with a personal qualification, "Take ye the Holy Ghost" (Edersheim, ii. 644). The work was not new, but was that already received from the Father by the Son and now handed on to that Church which was to be Christ's body on earth. He had compared the action of the Spirit to breath (Jn 3<sup>8</sup>). By breathing on them He signified that the Holy Ghost was the Spirit not of the Father alone but likewise His own' (Aug. St. John, tr. 121).

Considerable difference of opinion exists as to whether the act of breathing, with the authority to retain or forgive sin, was bestowed upon the Apostles only or on others besides. Those who limit it to the Apostles urge that 'disciples' is always in the later chapters of St. John used to signify Apostles; and that, even if others were present, the analogy of Mt 23<sup>9</sup> and Mk 13<sup>10-18</sup> implies that the breathing and commission were limited to the Apostles. They would then see in the act a formal ministerial ordination.* On the other hand, Westcott and many others, comparing Lk 24<sup>48</sup>, see no reason whatever for limiting the act and commission to Apostles. Even of the Eleven we know that Thomas at least was absent (Jn 20<sup>24</sup>). The commission was one given to the Christian society as a body: in it in its corporate capacity would dwell the Holy Ghost, and the authority of retaining or forgiving sins.

BRETHREN OF THE LORD.—The only three theories about 'the brethren of the Lord' which are worthy of serious consideration are those which are called by Lightfoot (1) the Hieronymian (from its advocacy by Jerome [Hieronymus]), (2) the Epiphonian (from its advocacy by Epiphanius), and (3) the Helvidian (from its advocacy by Jerome's opponent, Helvidius).

According to the Hieronymian view, the 'brethren' of Jesus were His first cousins, being sons of the Virgin's sister, Mary the wife of Clopas. According to the Epiphonian view, they were sons of Joseph by a former wife. According to the Helvidian view, they were sons of Joseph and Mary born after Jesus. All these views claim to be Scriptural, and the Epiphonian claims in addition to be in accordance with the most ancient tradition.

1. POINTS THAT ARE CERTAIN.—In discussing a question of such intricacy as the present, it is well to begin by distinguishing what is reasonably certain from what is uncertain. A careful comparison of the relevant Scripture passages renders it certain—

* Stanley (Christ. Inst. p. 192) states that 'in the Abyssinian and Alexandrian Church ordination was, and still is, by breathing.'

(1) That the brethren of the Lord, whatever their true relationship to Him was, lived under the same roof with Jesus and His mother, and were regarded as members of the Virgin's family. The common household is implied in Jn 7<sup>3</sup>, and more distinctly still in 2<sup>1</sup>, where we read that 'he went down to Capernaum, he, and his mother, and his brethren, and his disciples: and there they abode not many days.' That the brethren were members of the same family as Jesus, and stood in some definite filial relation to Joseph and Mary, is distinctly stated in Mt 13<sup>55</sup> ||, 'Is not this the carpenter's son? is not his mother called Mary? and his brethren, James, and Joseph,\* and Simon, and Judas? And his sisters, are they not all  $\dagger$  with us?' (cf. also Mt 12<sup>46</sup> 'Behold thy mother and thy brethren stand without, seeking to speak to thee'). In harmony with this the Gospels represent the brethren of Jesus as habitually going about in company with the Virgin (Mt 12<sup>46</sup> ||).

(2) That the brethren of Jesus were jealous of Him, and up to the time of the Resurrection disbelieved His claims. Thus the Gospels represent Jesus as lamenting the unbelief and want of sympathy of His near relatives: 'A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country, and among his own kin, and in his own house' (Mk 6<sup>4</sup>); and again, 'My time is not yet come, but your time is always ready. The world cannot hate you, but me it hateth' (Jn 7<sup>7</sup>). There are, moreover, the still more definite statements, 'For even his brethren did not believe on him' (Jn 7<sup>9</sup>); and, 'his friends (οἱ παρ' αὐτοῦ) went out to lay hold on him, for they said, He is beside himself' (Mk 3<sup>21</sup>).

Some attempts have been made to attenuate the force of these passages. Cornelius a Lapide, for instance, commenting on Jn 7<sup>5</sup>, says: 'Licet enim viderent eum tot signa et miracula facere, illaque vera esse non dubitarent, tamen dubitabant an ipse esset Messias et Dei Filius: licet enim hoc verum esse optarent, et ex parte ob tot ejus miracula crederent—tamen alia ex parte videntes ejus paupertatem et neglectum, dubitabant. Ut ergo certi hac de re fierent, hortantur Christum ire secum in Jerusalem, etc.' But St. John asserts disbelief (οὐκ ἰσχυροῦς), not doubt, and implies jealousy and hostility. Other critics have maintained that some only of the brethren disbelieved. But St. John's language at the very least asserts that the majority (that is, three out of the four brethren) disbelieved, and almost certainly implies the disbelief of all.

From this there follows the necessary inference—

(3) That none of the brethren were numbered among the Twelve Apostles. This conclusion is confirmed by the manner in which they are distinguished from the Twelve in Ac 1<sup>14</sup>, '[The eleven] all with one accord continued steadfastly in prayer with the women, and Mary the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren.' With this may be compared 1 Co 9<sup>6</sup> 'Have we no right to lead about a wife that is a believer, even as the rest of the apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas?', which, though less decisive than Ac 1<sup>14</sup>, because Cephas is first classed among the Twelve and then separately, points in the same direction. It is no sufficient reply to this to say that in Gal 1<sup>19</sup> James is called an Apostle ('But other of the apostles saw I none, save [εἰ μὴ] James the Lord's brother'). Granting that this is the case, though it has been denied (e.g. by Grotius, Winer, Eisek; cf. RVm), it may be fairly maintained that St. James is called an Apostle in that wider sense in which the term is applied to St. Paul himself, to St. Barnabas (Ac 14<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>6</sup>), to Andronicus and Junias (Ro 16<sup>7</sup>), and perhaps also to Silvanus

* In Mt. the correct reading seems to be James (so WH and RV, with EC, etc.). In Mk 3<sup>21</sup> λατρεῖς (BDL, etc.) is certainly right.

† Epiphanius says that there were only two sisters, Mary and Salome, but the versu shows that there were three at least. The present passage seems to indicate that they were married, and resided at Nazareth.

BRETHREN OF THE LORD

(1 Th 2<sup>d</sup>, cf. 1st). That James the Lord's brother was one of the Twelve is implied already in the Gospel according to the Hebrews (c. A.D. 100),* but the evidence of this dubious source cannot outweigh the strong negative presumption afforded by the canonical writings.†

ii. THE HIERONYMIAN VIEW.—With these three points established, we proceed to consider the Hieronymian view that the brethren of Jesus were really His first cousins. Jerome's theory, as stated by himself in his acrimonious but able treatise adversus Helvidium, involves the following positions:—

(a) That James the Lord's brother was an Apostle, being identical with James the Less, the son of Alphaeus.

(b) That the mother of James and of the other 'brethren' was 'Mary of Clopas' (Jn 19th).

(c) That this Mary was the Virgin's sister.

As developed by subsequent writers, the Hieronymian theory affirms in addition—

(d) That Simon the Zealot and Judas 'not Iscariot' were also brethren of the Lord.

(e) That Clopas is identical with Alphaeus, and that consequently 'Mary of Clopas' is not to be regarded as the daughter of Clopas, but as his wife.‡

As these two additional points are maintained by all modern followers of Jerome, we shall regard them as integral parts of the Hieronymian theory. Jerome's theory has already been virtually disproved by the proof (i, 2, 3) that the Lord's brethren were not Apostles, but his great ingenuity and wide acceptance§ render full discussion of it necessary.

A. Arguments for the Hieronymian view.—

(1) James the Lord's brother must have been of the Twelve, because he is called an Apostle, Gal 1st. (For a reply to this see i, 2, 3).

(2) James the Lord's brother must have been of the Twelve, because he exercised great authority among, and even over Apostles. Thus at the Council of Jerusalem he presided and pronounced the decision, although St. Peter himself was present (Ac 15th). St. Paul names him before St. Peter as one of the chief pillars of the Church (Gal 2<sup>d</sup>). The Galatian heretics appealed to his authority as superior to that of St. Paul (Gal 2<sup>d</sup>), and his importance is further shewn by such passages as Ac 12th 21st.

Reply.—St. James' prominent position is admitted, but it can be accounted for without supposing him to have been of the Twelve. For—

(a) His close relationship to Jesus (whatever the relationship was) would have sufficed of itself to gain him great consideration among the first Christians. He probably owed in part at least to this his election to the see of Jerusalem. Relationship to Jesus was clearly the main motive in the appointment of his successor, Symeon the son of Clopas,|| who was a cousin of Jesus (Eusebius,

* This Gospel represents him as present at the Last Supper, and therefore clearly as one of the Twelve.

† It is perhaps worth adding that St. James in his Epistle does not claim to be of the Twelve, and that his brother St. Jude seems even to exclude himself from the number of the Apostles (Jude 17).

‡ Jerome himself says: 'Marian Clophas Joannes Evangelista cognominat, sive a patre, sive a gentilitate familie, aut quoniamque alia causa ei nomen imponens' (xiii).

§ Jerome's treatise converted Augustine, who originally held the Epiphianian view, and the united influence of these two great doctors caused the Hieronymian view to prevail exclusively in the West. It is this view which is implied in the Liturgy, which, both in its Roman and in its Anglican form, regards James the Less, Simon Zelotes, and Judas not Iscariot as brethren of Jesus.

|| This Clopas was Joseph's brother, and is perhaps identical with the Clopas of Jn 19th. If so, and if (as is supposed by many) 'Mary of Clopas' was the wife of Clopas, and the sister of the Virgin, two brothers (Joseph and Clopas) must have married two sisters (the Virgin Mary and Mary of Clopas). For reasons to be presently given, we regard this combination as improbable.

BRETHREN OF THE LORD 233

HE iii. 11). Hegesippus speaks of the relations of Jesus as 'ruling the churches' as such. Even as late as the reign of Domitian they were sufficiently important to incur the jealousy of the tyrant (l.c. iii. 20).

(b) James the Lord's brother possessed personal qualities which fully account for his elevation. Even the Jews, according to Hegesippus, revered him for his piety, his unceasing prayers, his life-long Nazirite vow, and above all for his justice (l.c. ii. 23). Josephus mentions the indignation which his execution excited among the Jews (Ant. xx. ix. 1), and in a passage not now extant ascribes the sufferings endured by the Jews during the siege of Jerusalem to Divine vengeance for his murder (Origen, c. Celsum, i. 47).

(3) James the Lord's brother must have been of the Twelve, because there were only two prominent Jameses in the Church, as the expression 'James the Less' (Mk 15th) indicates. He was therefore either James the Great, son of Zebedee, or James the Less, son of Alphaeus. But he was not the former, who was martyred as early as A.D. 44 (Ac 12th). Therefore he was the latter, the son of Alphaeus.

Reply.—Jerome and his followers have been misled by the Latin translation Jacobus minor, 'James the Less.' The Greek is Ἰακώβος ὁ μικρότερος, 'James the Little,' the allusion being to his short stature.

(4) The names of James, Simon, and Jude occur together, and in the same division, in all the Apostolic lists. This suggests—(a) that they were brothers, and (b) that they are identical with our Lord's brethren of the same name (see Mt 10th, Mk 3rd, Lk 6th, Ac 1st).

Reply.—It has already been conclusively proved that our Lord's brethren were not Apostles (see i, 2, 3); but, waiving this point, we answer: (1) The occurrence of the three names together in the list of Apostles is no proof of fraternal relationship.

(2) There is definite proof that the three were not brothers. For had they been so, it would naturally have been mentioned in some at least of the Gospels, as it is in the cases of the brothers Peter and Andrew, James and John. Moreover, the father of James is Alphaeus, but the father of Jude is a certain James, of whom nothing definite is known. It is true that some propose to translate Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου (Lk 6th, Ac 1st) 'Jude the brother of James,' but so unusual, and probably unexampled, a meaning would require at least to be indicated by the context. We conclude, therefore, that James was certainly not the brother of Jude, and there is no evidence that he was the brother of Simon. If he was the brother of any Apostle, it was of Matthew (Levi), whose father was also called Alphaeus (Mk 2<sup>d</sup>). But even this, in the absence of any evidence of the identity of the two Alphaeuses, must be pronounced doubtful.

Equally evident is it that these three Apostles were not brethren of Jesus. The coincidence of three such common names as James, Simon, and Jude in the list of brethren and in the list of Apostles proves nothing. So common are the names that they are duplicated in the Apostolic list itself. If it could be shown that James, Simon, and Jude, Apostles, were also brothers, the coincidence would be worth considering; but since they were not, the coincidence is without significance. The very way in which these three Apostles are designated shows that they were not brethren of Jesus. It was necessary to distinguish them from three other Apostles of the same name, and yet they are not once called, for distinction, 'the Lord's brethren.' James is called 'of Alphaeus,' perhaps also 'the Little'; Simon is called 'the Cananean,' and 'the Zealot'; Jude receives no less than four distinguishing titles, 'not Iscariot,'

'of James,' 'Thaddæus,' and 'Lebbæus' (Mt 10<sup>2</sup>, Western Text).<sup>1</sup> How strange, if he really was the Lord's brother, that he is not once so described!

(5) The last argument consists of three distinct steps. (a) James, the son of Alphaeus, the Apostle, is identical with 'James the Little' of Mk 15<sup>40</sup> = Mt 27<sup>16</sup>. But this James the Little had a brother James, clearly a well-known character, and therefore (since no other James is mentioned in the Gospels) the same as James the brother of Jesus (Mk 6<sup>3</sup>; and Mt 13<sup>13</sup>, where the authorities are divided between the forms James and Joseph). (b) The mother of this James is called by the Synoptists Mary, and she is further described in Jn 19<sup>25</sup> as 'Mary of Clopas' (Μαρία ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ). This might mean 'Mary daughter of Clopas,' but since Clopas and Alphaeus are the same word, both being transliterations of the Aramaic ܩܠܦܐ (qalpa), the correct translation is 'Mary the wife of Clopas.'

(c) This Mary, wife of Clopas, is said by St. John to have been the Virgin's sister. Accordingly James and Joseph (and consequently also Simon and Jude), the Lord's 'brethren,' were really His first cousins on His mother's side.

Reply.—This argument is ingenious rather than strong. For (a) the identification of James the Little (Mk 15<sup>40</sup>) with the son of Alphaeus, though generally accepted and not improbable, is only a guess. Indeed it may be argued that since St. Mark in his Gospel gives no hint that the son of Alphaeus was called 'the Little,' he must mean by 'James the Little' another person. But conceding the identity (which, however, whether true or not, is too precarious to bear the weight of an important argument), we still cannot concede the identity of James, the brother of this James, with James the brother of Jesus. The identity of James of Alphaeus with James the Little may be conceded, because, though it is weakly attested, nothing of weight can be urged against it. But if this James, the brother of James, was also the brother of Jesus, then three of our Lord's brethren were Apostles, a conclusion which is negated by an overwhelming weight of evidence (see I, 2, 3). In such a case the mere coincidence of a name (and James or Joseph is, as Lightfoot shows, a particularly common name) is of no weight at all. (b) Jerome's assumption that 'Mary the mother of James and Joseph' (Mt., Mk.) is identical with 'Mary of Clopas' is probably, though not certainly, correct. But there is no ground for supposing, as Jerome's supporters do, that this Mary was the wife of Clopas. There being no indication in the context to the contrary, the natural translation of Μαρία ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ is 'Mary the daughter of Clopas.'<sup>2</sup> It is maintained, indeed, that since she was the mother of James the Little (who was an Apostle), her husband must have been Alphaeus, i.e. Clopas. But it is doubtful if James the Little really was an Apostle, and it is still more doubtful if Alphaeus is the same person as Clopas. Κλωπᾶ, or, as it should probably be accented, Κλώπας, is a purely Greek name, being contracted from Κλεόπατρος (cf. Ἀντίπας from Ἀντίπατρος). Ἀλφαῖος (Ἀλφαῖος, WH), on the other hand, is the Aramaic ܩܠܦܐ (qalpa), the initial natural being, as is frequently the case, omitted. The names are therefore linguistically distinct. It is true that if there were strong independent reasons for identifying Alphaeus and Clopas, the linguistic difficulties might possibly be surmounted, but there are no such reasons, or at least none are alleged.

Against the identification of Κλωπᾶ and Alphaeus it may be urged: (1) That inasmuch as initial sh'va is almost invariably represented by a full vowel in Greek (ܩܠܦܐ = Κλωπᾶ; ܩܠܦܐ = Κλωπᾶ; etc.), there is a presumption against a word like Clopas, which begins with two consonants, representing a Semitic name. (2) Although n is occasionally transliterated in the middle or at the end of a word, this never, or hardly ever, happens at the beginning. (3) ܩܠܦܐ (qalpa) is transliterated quite regularly Κλωπᾶ in 1 Mac 11<sup>10</sup>. (4) The n of Κλωπᾶ cannot be derived from ܩܠܦܐ. The nearest Semitic equivalent of Κλωπᾶ would be some such form as qalpa. (5) The Semitic versions uniformly regard Ἀλφαῖος as a Semitic word, but Κλωπᾶ as Greek, transliterating the n by p.

(c) There is more plausibility about Jerome's contention that Mary of Clopas is described in Jn 19<sup>25</sup> as the Virgin's sister. The words are ἰστῆκεσαν δὲ παρὰ τῷ σταυρῷ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἡ μητὴρ αὐτοῦ καὶ ἡ ἀδελφὴ τῆς μητρός αὐτοῦ, Μαρία ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ, καὶ Μαρία ἡ Μαγδαληνῆ. It must be candidly admitted that the prima facie impression which this passage makes upon the mind is that only three women are mentioned, and that the Virgin's sister is Mary of Clopas. There are, however, important considerations on the other side. (1) When persons or things are enumerated in pairs (cf. the list of Apostles, Mt 10<sup>2</sup>), the copula is not inserted between the pairs. If, therefore, St. John in this passage designs to speak of two pairs of women, καὶ is correctly omitted before Μαρία ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ. (2) The Synoptic parallels show that Salome, the mother of James and John, was present at the Crucifixion, and since it is unlikely that St. John would omit to mention the presence of his own mother, ἡ ἀδελφὴ τῆς μητρός αὐτοῦ is probably not Mary of Clopas, but Salome. The suppression of her name is quite in the style of the Evangelist, who is very reticent in personal matters, and never even names himself. (3) If Mary of Clopas was sister to the Virgin, then two sisters had the same name, a circumstance most improbable, unless they were only step-sisters. The point is undoubtedly a difficult one, and different opinions will continue to be held about it, but fortunately its decision does not affect the main point of our inquiry, because, whether Mary of Clopas was the Virgin's sister or not, there is no reason for supposing that she was the mother of the brethren of Jesus.

B. Objections to the Hieronymian view.—The Hieronymian view is to be rejected, partly because the arguments in its favour, though ingenious, are inconclusive and often far-fetched; partly because no trace of it is to be found before the time of Jerome, who apparently invented it; * partly because it is obviously an attempt of an ardent champion of celibacy to maintain the perpetual virginity not only of Mary, but of Joseph; † partly because it involves an unnatural use of the term 'brethren'; ‡ but chiefly because it is incon-* Papias of Hierapolis (A.D. 120) used to be quoted on Jerome's side, but Lightfoot has shown that the Papias in question lived in the 11th century. Hegesippus (A.D. 160) and Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 200) have been wrongly claimed on the same side. In reality they support the Epiphonian view.

† Jerome indeed admits this: 'Tu dicit (he is addressing Helvidius) Mariam virginem non permansisse: ego mihi plus vendico, etiam ipsum Joseph virginem fuisse per Mariam, ut ex virginali conjugio virgo filius nasceretur' (adv. Helv. xix.).

‡ It is true, as Jerome warmly urges (adv. Helvidium, xiv., xv.), that the OT usage of 'brother' is somewhat wide. In 1 Ch 23<sup>1</sup>–22 first cousins are called brethren (אֲבוֹתָיִם = ἀδελφοί, LXX); in Lv 104 first cousins once removed (אֲבוֹתָיִם = ἀδελφοί δευτέρου, LXX). So also in Gn 14<sup>16</sup> Abraham's nephew is called his brother (אָח); and in Gn 29<sup>10</sup> Jacob is called Laban's brother. It cannot therefore be pronounced impossible that our Lord's cousins might occasionally be alluded to as His brethren, especially if it be true, as is generally alleged, that there is no word in Aramaic for cousin. At the same time it should be remembered that all Jerome's examples of an extended use of 'brother' are taken from the OT; that the usage of ἀδελφός is much less elastic than that of ἄξ; that no instances of ἀδελφός = ἀνεψιός are cited from profane writers; and that even the OT does not sanction the habituat use of ἄξ to describe any other relationship than that of brother. The term ἀνεψιός is not avoided in the NT (see Col 4<sup>10</sup>), and Hegesippus sistent with the three certainties, which, as we have shown, a true theory must necessarily presuppose, namely, the common household, the unbelief of the brethren, and their non-inclusion among the Twelve. Jerome's theory is inconsistent not only with the last two of these certainties, but even with the first, for though his supporters allege that the two sisters were both widows and kept house together, this does not explain the fact that the brethren of Jesus are regarded in Scripture as belonging to the Virgin's family, and are continually represented as being in her company, and never in the company of their alleged mother, Mary of Clopas.

iii. THE HELVIDIAN AND EPIPHANIAN VIEWS.—The rejection of the Hieronymian view leaves the choice open between the Helvidian and the Epiphanian views, both of which have the immense advantage over the Hieronymian of not being inconsistent with the three certainties laid down in 1, 1, 2, 3.

Arguments for the Helvidian view.—(1) The Helvidian view, which maintains that the brethren of Jesus were sons of Joseph and Mary, gives a fuller and more natural meaning to the term ἀδελφοί than the Epiphanian, which denies that they were blood-relations of Jesus at all.

Reply.—The advantage of the Helvidian view in this respect is but slight. Joseph was not a blood-relation of Jesus, and yet he is called, not only by friends and acquaintances (Mt 13<sup>56</sup>=Mk 6<sup>3</sup>, cf. also Jn 1<sup>6</sup> 6<sup>2</sup>), but also by the Virgin herself (Lk 2<sup>8</sup>), and by an Evangelist who lays great stress upon the supernatural birth (Lk 2<sup>21</sup>), the father of Jesus. Since, therefore, even in the Holy Family Joseph was called the father of Jesus, it is certain that if he had had sons, they would have been called the brethren of Jesus.

(2) In Lk 2<sup>7</sup> Jesus is called Mary's first-born son (πρωτότοκος). This implies that she had other children.

Reply.—πρωτότοκος among the Jews was a technical term, meaning that which openeth the womb (Ex 34<sup>20</sup>), and does not imply the birth of other offspring. Indeed, the redemption-price of a first-born son, required by the Mosaic law, was due at the end of a month (Nu 8<sup>18</sup>), before it could be known whether there was any likelihood of further offspring. Dr. Mayor objects that in a purely historical passage, like Lk 2<sup>7</sup>, this technical meaning is not to be thought of; but the subsequent statement that they brought him up to Jerusalem to present him to the Lord, as it is written in the law of the Lord, Every male that openeth the womb shall be called holy to the Lord (Lk 2<sup>22-23</sup>), renders it certain that it was precisely this which was in the Evangelist's mind when he called Jesus πρωτότοκος (so already Jerome, l.c. x.).

(3) Mt 1<sup>18</sup>, 'before they came together' (πρὶν ἢ συνελθεῖν), implies that the connubial relations of Joseph and Mary were of the ordinary kind.

Reply.—συνελθεῖν need not mean more than living together in the same house.

(4) Mt 1<sup>2</sup>, 'and knew her not till she had brought forth a son' (καὶ οὐκ ἐγίνωκεν αὐτήν ἕως ὅτι ἔτεκε υἱόν), † implies that he knew her afterwards, especially as the Evangelist mentions brothers and sisters (A.D. 100), in discussing the subject of our Lord's human relationships, keeps the two terms distinct, calling Symeon, the second bishop of Jerusalem, and our Lord's cousin, ἀνεψίος; but James, the first bishop of Jerusalem, always ἀδελφός. Clearly, therefore, Hegesippus did not regard ἀδελφός τοῦ Κυρίου as equivalent to ἀνεψίος, and he is our oldest and best authority.

* In every passage of Scripture where the brethren are mentioned, except Jn 7<sup>2</sup>, it is expressly said that they were in the Virgin's company.

† The whole of these arguments were advanced by Helvidius himself, and the substance of most of the replies is to be found in Jerome.

‡ The πρωτότοκος of the TR here is certainly an interpolation from Lk 2<sup>7</sup>.

of Jesus, without any warning that they were not Mary's children.

Reply.—This is an argument of real weight, and is not adequately answered by Jerome, Cornelius a Lapide, Pearson, etc., who allege such passages as Mt 23<sup>29</sup> 'Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world,' and 2 S 6<sup>23</sup> 'Michal the daughter of Saul had no child until the day of her death,' as a proof that 'until' does not fix a limit or suggest a subsequent change. It is quite true that in such passages as those quoted, where the circumstances of the case preclude the idea of change, 'until' does not imply change. But 'until' does imply change when it introduces a state of things in which change is naturally to be expected. Thus, as Dr. Mayor justly remarks, if 2 S 6<sup>23</sup> be made to read 'Michal the daughter of Saul had no child, until she left David and became the wife of Phaltiel,' then 'until' does imply that she had a child afterwards, because child-bearing is a natural and usual sequel of marriage. So in the present case it may be fairly argued that inasmuch as connubial intercourse is the natural accompaniment of marriage, the Evangelist in asserting that it did not take place until a certain date, affirms that it took place afterwards. Still the argument, as applied to this particular case, is not convincing. The Evangelist is not (even by implication) comparing together the connubial relations of Joseph and Mary before and after the birth of Jesus (as, in the case supposed by Dr. Mayor, Michal's connubial relations with David and Phaltiel are compared), but simply affirming in the strongest possible way that Joseph had no share in the procreation of Jesus. Bengel's comment is therefore, upon the whole, justified—'donec' Non sequitur, ergo post. The subsequent mention of the brethren of Jesus (Mt 13<sup>56</sup>) does not affect the question, because it was well known, when the Evangelist wrote, who the brethren were, and there was no need to guard against misconception.

(5) The fact that the brethren not only lived in the same house with the Virgin, but continually accompanied her wherever she went, is an indication that they were her children as well as Joseph's.

Reply.—The tie which unites a step-mother and her step-sons is often extremely close, and considering that Joseph was almost certainly dead before our Lord's ministry began, and that Jesus was fully occupied with public affairs, it cannot be regarded as surprising that her step-sons (if such they were) constituted themselves her guardians and protectors.

B. Arguments for the Epiphanian view.—We shall now state the arguments for the theory of Epiphanius, and subject them to criticism from the Helvidian point of view.

(1) The Perpetual Virginity of Mary is implied in the narrative of the Annunciation (Lk 1<sup>26-38</sup>). The angel Gabriel appeared to Mary, and after saluting her as 'highly-favoured' announced the manner of Christ's birth as follows: 'Behold, thou shalt conceive in the womb, and shalt bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus.' The reply of Mary was, 'How shall this be, seeing that I know not a man?' (Πῶς ἔσται τοῦτο, εἰς ἃνδρα ὃν γινώσκω;). It is plain from this reply (1) that she understood the angel to mean that the child would be born in the natural way; and (2) that there was some obstacle which prevented her from having a child in the natural way ('I know not a man,' 'ἄνδρα ὃν γινώσκω'). These words cannot mean, 'I do not yet know a man.' That would have been no obstacle to the fulfilment of the promise. The angel's words related to the future (v. 31), and inasmuch as Mary was already betrothed (v. 37), and might shortly expect to be taken into her husband's house, there was every prospect, so far as Mary's status went, that the angel's words would shortly be fulfilled. The only meaning, therefore, which in such a context Mary's words can bear, is that she had devoted herself (with her betrothed's consent) to a life of virginity, and that she expected to preserve, even in marriage, her virginal integrity (so nearly all the older expositors, including Ambrose, Augustine, Gregory of Nyssa, Theophylact, Bernard, Bede, Anselm, Aquinas, Cornelius a Lapide, Maldonatus, Grotius; and in more recent times Bisping, Schegg, Schanz).

Reply.—Such a vow or resolution is improbable in Mary's case, because the Jews regarded virginity as less honourable than marriage, and childlessness as a calamity. Moreover, it is improbable that, if she had formed such a resolution, Joseph would have consented to be betrothed to her.

These objections are undeniably weighty, but they do not fully meet the strong exegetical argument for the traditional view. Moreover, it must be remembered (1) that the case in question is a unique and peculiar one, and that it is doubtful how far the canons of ordinary probability ought to be applied to it; (2) that esteem for virginity among contemporary Jews is vouched for (though only to a limited extent) by the writings of Philo, and the existence of the sect of the Essenes; (3) that a high esteem for virginity characterized the Christian movement from the first (Ac 21<sup>9</sup>, 1 Co 7), and formed part of the teaching of Christ (Mt 19<sup>12</sup>); and consequently it is not incredible that Joseph and Mary, by whom Jesus was brought up, shared the sentiment, and communicated it to Him.

(2) Virginity is regarded, not only by Christians, but by nearly all men, as, ideally at any rate, superior to marriage. It is therefore probable that the most privileged and holiest of women remained ever a virgin, as has been believed by most Christians from the first.†

Reply.—This argument has weight, but is not conclusive. For (1) though ideally virginity is superior to marriage, being the condition of the holy angels and of the saints in heaven (Mt 22<sup>30</sup>), yet practically marriage is in most cases to be preferred to celibacy, as a more useful means of serving God. And since the estate of marriage is altogether holy, and is a religious mystery or sacrament, symbolizing the union between Christ and His Church (Eph 5<sup>2</sup>), it is consistent with the highest reverence towards our Lord's mother to believe that after the birth of Jesus she bore children to her husband.*

* This important passage is not alluded to by Mayor and Lightfoot, and is very inadequately dealt with by most recent commentators. B. Weiss (Com. in loc.) says that it is 'a bewildered question how she, the unstained maiden, can possibly come into this position.' Considering that she was already betrothed, no such bewilderment was possible. If the angel had said that she would have a son before marriage, such bewilderment would have been natural enough, for the concubitus of betrothed persons, though not exactly forbidden, was not approved. But the angel had not hinted at this. Dr. Plummer reproduces Weiss. Grotius simply says: 'Her question is the legitimate expression of the astonishment of a pure conscience.' Schmiedel (Eneye. Bibl. iii. 2866) regards the words as an interpolation. Only Schanz (Com. in loc.) gives anything like an adequate discussion of the passage. Of the older expositors Cornelius a Lapide and Maldonatus are full, but uncritical.

† The early Christians, however, while believing the Perpetual Virginity as a fact, did not regard it as an article of faith. As late as c. A.D. 570, St. Basil could write: 'The words, He knew her not till she brought forth her first-born son, do indeed afford a certain ground for thinking that Mary, after acting in all sanctity as the instrument of the Lord's birth, which was brought about by the Holy Ghost, did not refuse to her husband the customary privileges of marriage. But as for ourselves, even though this view does no violence to rational piety (ὁ καὶ μὴδὲν ἐν τῆς ἀειπαρίας παραλογιστικῶς λέγει), for her virginity was necessary until she had fulfilled her function in connection with the economy, whereas what happened afterwards concerns us little as not being connected with the mystery, yet since lovers of Christ cannot bear to hear that the Mother of God ever ceased to be a virgin, we regard the testimonies (to her perpetual virginity) which we have produced as sufficient' (Hom. in Sanct. Christ. Gen. ii.).

(3) Reverence for Mary as 'Mother of God' would have prevented Joseph from cohabiting with her as her husband.

Reply.—If we could be sure that Joseph and Mary regarded the infant Jesus as God, this argument would have great weight; but it is just this point which is doubtful. The angel described the infant as the Messiah, and the Son of God, but neither of these terms involved necessarily to Jewish ears the idea of Divinity. The term Son of God is used in the OT even of the Davidic king.

(4) The brethren of Jesus behave to Him as if they were elder brothers. Thus they are jealous of His popularity (Mk 6<sup>7</sup>), criticize and advise Him in no friendly spirit (Jn 7<sup>10</sup>), attempt to control His actions, and even to place Him under restraints (Mk 3<sup>29</sup>, cf. Mk 3<sup>31</sup>). But if they were older than Jesus, they were not Mary's children.

Reply.—It cannot be denied that their actions seem like those of elder brethren, but it is possible that they were only slightly younger than Jesus, and if so their conduct is perhaps intelligible.

(5) Jesus upon the Cross commended His mother not to His 'brethren,' but to St. John (Jn 19<sup>26, 27</sup>). He would have been very unlikely to do this, if His 'brethren' had really been the Virgin's sons.

Reply.—(a) The cause of this arrangement may have been the great poverty of the brethren of Jesus, and the comparative affluence of St. John, who, after all, was a near relation of Jesus (a first cousin). This is, of course, possible; but there is nothing to indicate that the brethren of Jesus were specially poor. They were living with St. Mary, and their united earnings would, under ordinary circumstances, have sufficed to maintain a single household in comfort. (b) Some allege as a cause the unbelief of the brethren. But this is unlikely, because Jesus must have known that within a few days their unbelief would pass into faith.

(6) The most ancient ecclesiastical tradition, especially that of Palestine, favours the Epiphonian view. The testimony of Hegesippus, a native of Palestine, and a man of learning, who wrote about A.D. 160, is definitely against the Hieronymian, and (as is almost certain) in favour of the Epiphonian view. His works are lost, but in the fragments which remain, he consistently speaks of the first Bishop of Jerusalem (James) as the Lord's brother; but of the second (Symeon) as His cousin (ἀνεψιός, which he more exactly defines as ὁ ἐκ θεῶν τοῦ Κυρίου, the θεῖος being Κλωπᾶς, the brother of Joseph).† Clearly, therefore, Hegesippus did not regard the brethren of Jesus as His cousins. That he did not regard them as sons of Mary, is shown by his description of Jude, the Lord's brother, as τοῦ κατὰ σάρκα λεγομένου αὐτοῦ ἀδελφοῦ, and by the fact that Eusebius and Epiphanius, who draw their information mainly from him, regard the brethren as children of Joseph by a former wife.‡ This view is taken by Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Hilary of Poitiers, Ambrose, Ambrosiaster, Gregory of Nyssa; in fact, so far as we know, by all the Fathers before Jerome, with the exception of Tertullian, who probably, though his statements are not explicit, held the view of * Quite unjust, therefore, is the customary Hieronymian abuse of Helvidius as 'spurious heresiarcha,' and the characterization of his theory as 'blasphemous.' Those who use such language virtually deny the sanctity of marriage. Helvidius' theory is perfectly reverent. Whether it is true or not is another question.

† It is possible, but not capable of proof, that this Clopas, the brother of Joseph, and the father of Symeon (not Symon the Lord's brother), is identical with the Κλωπᾶς of Jn 19<sup>25</sup>, or the Κλωπᾶς of Lk 24<sup>18</sup>. Κλωπᾶς (Κλωπᾶς) and Κλωπᾶς are etymologically the same word, both being contractions of Κλωπᾶρεος.

‡ The statements of Hegesippus about our Lord's brethren are noted by Eusebius, HE II. 23, iii. 20, iii. 22, iv. 22.

Helvidius. Since Jerome the Western Church has adopted the Hieronymian theory, but the Eastern Church still maintains that of Epiphanius. The traditional evidence, therefore, is almost entirely on the side of the Epiphanius view.

Reply.—It is possible that the Apocryphal Gospels, especially the Gospel of Peter and the Protevangelium of James, and not any authentic tradition, are the source of the Epiphanius theory. This is Jerome's view, who taunts Epiphanius with following 'deliramenta apocryphorum.' This, however, is not likely. The statements of the best informed Fathers seem based on Hegesippus, who made an independent investigation, under specially favourable conditions. The Apocryphal Gospels probably adopted, rather than originated, the current view.

C. The main objection to the Epiphanius view.—There is one objection to the Epiphanius view so important that it deserves special notice. It is well known that a high—an even extravagant—estimate of virginity prevailed extensively in the early Church; and therefore there is some reason to suspect that, just as, at the close of the 4th cent., zeal for the virginity of Joseph produced the Hieronymian theory, so, three centuries earlier, zeal for the virginity of Mary produced the Epiphanius view. That this may have been so, no cautious critic will deny; but it does not, upon the evidence, appear to be probable. For (1) if Mary bore to Joseph, as the Helvidian theory assumes, seven children, of whom one was Bishop of Jerusalem, and three others prominent members of the Church, the non-virginity of Mary after the birth of Jesus must have been so notorious a fact in the Apostolic Church, that the (practically) unanimous tradition of her perpetual virginity could never have arisen. (2) The tradition of the Perpetual Virginity was already prevalent early in the 2nd cent., that is, long before ascetic views were dominant or even aggressive in the Church. It prevailed, moreover, in Palestine, where, there is reason to believe, ascetic views had less influence than elsewhere. For these reasons we are inclined to think that the Epiphanius tradition has a real historical basis.

iv. PROBABLE CONCLUSIONS.—The scantiness and ambiguity of the only really trustworthy evidence, the Scriptural, obliges us to be content with merely probable conclusions. The only conclusion that seems to be certain is that Jerome's theory is false. The claims of the two other theories are nearly evenly balanced; nevertheless, it appears to us, after weighing the opposing arguments to the best of our power, that there is a slight but perceptible preponderance of Scriptural, and a much more decided preponderance of historical, evidence in favour of the Epiphanius theory.

BRIDE, BRIDE-CHAMBER, BRIDEGROOM, BRIDEGROOM'S FRIEND.—See MARRIAGE.

BRIMSTONE (burning stone or sulphur [śeliv], commonly derived from θεός, 'divine,' either because sulphur was used for religious purification, or because lightning—the bolt of the gods—emits a sulphurous odour; others connect it with θύω, 'agitate,' cf. fumus, 'smoke').—Its use in Scripture in the imagery of Divine judgment is founded on the story of the destruction of Sodom and the cities of the Plain (Gn 19<sup>24-26</sup>), a catastrophe to which the Gospels frequently refer (Lk 17<sup>34</sup> 10<sup>12</sup>, Mk 6<sup>11</sup>, Mt 10<sup>15</sup> 11<sup>23, 24</sup>). The story of this tragedy of Divine judgment casts its lurid light all down Scripture history, and has coloured Christian belief in its presentation of the Divine wrath. The imagery of 'fire and brimstone' appears in the prophets and the Psalms as an impressive metaphor of heaven's most pitiless judgment, while the story itself is often recalled both in the OT and in the NT. In the Book of Revelation it is a notable feature in the description of the Apocalyptic riders (9<sup>17-18</sup>), that their breastplates are of fire and brimstone, and from the mouths of their horses proceed the same dread emblems of wrath; while no more impressive figure can be found to describe the final doom of the wicked in the end of the ages than that they shall be cast into the 'lake of fire and brimstone,' there to be 'tormented day and night for ever and ever' (Rev 19<sup>20</sup> 20<sup>10</sup> 21<sup>8</sup>).

BROOK (Jn 18<sup>1</sup>; RVm 'ravine,' Gr. winter torrent, 'χελυαρος') is the usual LXX equivalent of בָּר, and seems to correspond in meaning with the Arab. wady = 'valley,' but, more particularly, the watercourse in the bottom of the valley. The winter rains, rushing down from the mountain range, have hollowed out great channels westward, towards the Mediterranean. Much deeper are the gullies eastward, where the descent is steeper, towards the Jordan. Most of these are quite dry during the greater part of the year. Although some are called 'rivers,' e.g. Nahr el-Aujeh, in the Plain of Sharon, and the Kishon, while others, such as el-Amud, which crosses the Plain of Gennesaret, and el-Yarmuk, which comes down from the eastern uplands, draw abundant supplies from perennial springs, yet 'brook' more accurately describes them.

The Kidron contains water only after heavy rains. It is the one 'brook' mentioned in the Gospels. Over it Jesus passed from the upper room to Gethsemane on the night of His betrayal.

The name בָּר, from בָּר is usually referred to the dark colour of the stream or ravine. The various forms of the name in Gr. are οὐδὲν, οὐδὲν, and οὐδὲν. WH in 'Notes on Select Readings,' after reviewing the evidence, concludes in favour of οὐδὲν. It probably preserves the true etymology of בָּר, which seems to be an archaic (? Canaanite) plural of בָּר 'the Dark (trees)'; for, though no name from this root is applied to any tree in Bib. Heb., some tree resembling a cedar was called by a similar name in at least the later language (see exx. in Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. 1976); and the Gr. οὐδὲν is probably of Phoenician origin. They suggest that isolated patches of cedar forests may have survived from prehistoric times. Lightfoot quotes (Chorag. Cent. 40) a Talmudic reference to two gigantic cedars standing on the Mt. of Olives even in the latest days of the Temple (Jerus. Tannith, fol. 69. 1), which may be taken as supporting this view.

The valley begins in the wide hollow between the city and Mt. Scopus on the north. Turning southward, and passing under the eastern battlements, by a deep ravine it cuts off Jerusalem from Olivet. It is joined by the Valley of Hinnom, and thence, as Wady en-Nâr, 'Valley of Fire,' it winds down an ever deepening gorge, through the Wilderness of Judea, to the edge of the Dead Sea. The name Wady er-Râhîb, 'Valley of the Monks,' attaching to part of it, comes from the convent of Mar Saba, built on the right-hand face of the gorge, a sort of reformatory for refractory monks, in the midst of the wilderness.

The modern name of the brook Kidron is Wady Sitti Maryam, 'Valley of the Lady Mary.' As early as Eusebius and Jerome it was known as the Valley of Jehoshaphat, Jl 3<sup>3</sup> [Heb. 4<sup>7</sup>]. According to a tradition, common to Jews, Moslems, and Christians, this is to be the scene of the final Judgment. As against the Temple, which overlooked it, the valley ranked as an unclean district, and it seems to have afforded burying-ground for people of the humbler orders (2 K 23<sup>6</sup>). To this day the Jews greatly covet a grave in the Kidron valley.

W. EWING.
BROTHERHOOD.—The word (ἀδελφότης) does not occur at all in the Gospels, and is found only twice in the NT (1 P 2<sup>17</sup> and 5<sup>9</sup>). The idea, however, is common and of very great importance.

1. The natural brotherhood of man is assumed rather than asserted. It probably underlies Christ's argument about the Sabbath (Mk 2<sup>27</sup> and parallels), and also such language as is found in Lk 15<sup>21-22</sup> and 16<sup>32</sup>. This is the more likely in view of such OT passages as Gn 1<sup>26-28</sup> 9<sup>6-7</sup>, Job 31<sup>12-15</sup>, and Mal 2<sup>10</sup> (which regard it as a corollary of our creation by the one God and Father), and Lv 19<sup>33-34</sup> (which not only commands love of neighbour, but also explicitly enjoins like love for the stranger). Hillel and other Rabbis gave this law the broadest interpretation, and Philo declares that man must love the whole world as well as God (see Kohler, Jewish Encey. art. 'Brotherly Love,' and Montefiore in the JQR, April 1895). This, however, does not represent the dominant feeling among the Jews in our Lord's time. They narrowed the term 'neighbour,' as His language in Mt 5<sup>4</sup> plainly implies. It was the scribe's suggestion of this narrow view that drew from Jesus the parable of the Good Samaritan, in which the term 'neighbour' is made the equivalent of brother-man (Lk 10<sup>29</sup>).

Into this brotherhood Christ entered when He 'became flesh.' That at least is implied in the title 'Son of Man' which He so frequently applies to Himself. He was 'the seed of the woman.' The Son of Mary, of David, of Abraham, was also Son of Adam (Lk 3<sup>38</sup>) and one of the race.

Yet of natural brotherhood the NT has surprisingly little to say. Very little importance is attached to it. No hopes are built on it. The reason, doubtless, is that it had been destroyed by sin—a melancholy fact visible in the threshold tragedy of Cain and Abel. Such is St. Paul's summary of OT teaching (Ro 3<sup>12</sup>). So Jesus found it when He was in the world. Men were dead to brotherhood as to all else that was wholly good (Jn 6<sup>39</sup>, cf. Eph 2<sup>1</sup>). For thirty years He moved among men with a true Brother's heart, but met no equal response, even among those peculiarly His own (Jn 1<sup>10, 11</sup>). 'Of the peoples there was no man with him' (Is 63<sup>9</sup>). He was sorrowfully alone (Is 53<sup>8</sup>), standing among sinful men like one unharmed temple amid a city's ruins.

2. The new brotherhood.—Under these circumstances nothing short of a new beginning would serve. Anything less radical must fail. A new creation is necessary (Gal 6<sup>15</sup>). This Jesus states explicitly. Men must be born again (Jn 3<sup>3</sup>; cf. Eph 2<sup>5</sup>). They must be redeemed from sin and given a new life. This was His appointed mission (Mt 1<sup>2</sup>, Jn 10<sup>10</sup>). To that work He formally dedicated Himself in His baptism, which also symbolized the means by which the redemption should be effected, namely, His own death (with Mt 3<sup>17</sup>, cf. Mt 20<sup>28</sup> 26<sup>28</sup> and Ro 3<sup>24-25</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>, Eph 1<sup>7</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>18-19</sup>, Rev 1<sup>5</sup>). Tempted to swerve from it, He held to that stern, slow path. Meantime He begins to gather about Him a band of brothers on the new basis. They are such as believe or receive Him. In faith they follow Him and forsake all else (Mk 1<sup>18-20</sup> 10<sup>28</sup>, Lk 14<sup>26</sup>). That it is no mere external following is manifest. A vital union is established between them and Him, the significance of which is indicated by the figure of the vine and the branches (Jn 15<sup>1-8</sup>). The new birth is effected (Jn 1<sup>12-13</sup>), the new life received (Jn 6<sup>37</sup> 10<sup>27-29</sup>), and their sins graciously forgiven (Mk 2<sup>1-11</sup>, Lk 7<sup>37-48</sup>, cf. Col 1<sup>14</sup>). Thus they become partakers of the Divine nature (2 P 1<sup>4</sup>), children or sons of God (τέκνα, υἱοί, 1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup>, Ro 8<sup>14, 16, 21</sup>, Gal 3<sup>26</sup> 4<sup>7</sup>), endowed with a deathless life (Gal 3<sup>26</sup>, Jn 10<sup>28</sup>), and Christ becomes the firstborn among many brethren (Ro 8<sup>29</sup>). Elsewhere the change is called a new creation (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>, Gal 6<sup>15</sup>, Eph 2<sup>10</sup>), of which Christ is the beginning (Rev 3<sup>14</sup>, Col 1<sup>15</sup>).

It is this profound experience which underlies and accounts for the remarkable statements of Jn 1<sup>12-13</sup>. St. Peter's new name is a sign of it (v. 42); the 'Israelite indeed in whom is no guile' is a condensed description of the new man (v. 47; cf. Ps 32<sup>2</sup>, the first half of which is the germ of Ro 3<sup>21-22</sup>, and the second of Ro 6<sup>1-8</sup>). These men are nearer to Jesus now than any other persons. Hence the appropriateness of the strong language of this early record in the most spiritual of the four Gospels. St. John had learned meantime the potency of the faith that began so simply, and in the light of that recalls those wonderful early utterances and the steady progress of their faith from strength to strength.

Equally appropriate is the Cana incident which immediately follows (Jn 2<sup>1-11</sup>). There Jesus breaks with the old order in the words, 'Woman, what have I to do with thee?' Addressed as they were to her who represented it in its fondest tie, they show the break to be of the most absolute sort. That is the negative side, the turning from the old; the positive, the turning to the new, is indicated by the place assigned to the disciples in the record. They are identified with Him as others are not, and especially in a growing faith, to which others—even His mother and His brethren—are as yet strangers. What was there taught in the veiled language of sign is taught plainly and explicitly in Mt. 12<sup>46-50</sup> and Mk 3<sup>31-35</sup>. How far Mary and His brothers were from understanding Him, how wide the gulf was that separated Him from them, is shown by the fact recorded in Mk 3<sup>32</sup> that they regarded Him as out of His mind. The disciples, on the other hand, are seated about Him drinking in His sayings. Then He declares to be His mother and His brethren (Mt 12<sup>46</sup>). And looking upon the multitude also sitting around and listening to His words, He generalizes the teaching and declares that 'Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother' (Mk 3<sup>34-35</sup>). Such constitute the new brotherhood.

(1) So the first characteristic of the new brethren is that they do the will of God. They are in right relation to Him. When men are not so, they cannot be rightly related to one another. To be bound together by the tie of brotherhood, they must first be bound by the filial tie to God, their Heavenly Father. Loving obedience is the test and evidence of that (1 Jn 5<sup>3</sup>, Jn 14<sup>15-21</sup>).

It is worth noting that this is the first great law of the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 6, and summarized in v. 33). Really the brotherhood and the Kingdom (in one sense of the term) are different aspects of the same thing. As to membership the two are coextensive. God is at once Father and King; the brethren are both subjects and children, 'fellow-citizens with the saints and of the household of God' (Eph 2<sup>19</sup>). Both ideas run through the Sermon on the Mount, which is Christ's proclamation of the nature and principles of the Kingdom.

Doubtless the new brotherhood and the Church may be similarly equated. Their membership too should coincide. This is indicated not only by Christ's solemn recall of Peter's new name, and His assertion that His church should be built of such confessors as he (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>), but also by the uniform practice in the Acts and Epistles of referring to the members of the churches as 'brethren.'

(2) The second characteristic is that they love one another. Loving God as their Father they instinctively love also His other children, their brothers (1 Th 4<sup>9</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>20</sup> and 5<sup>1</sup>). This is Christ's new commandment and the badge of discipleship (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>). Though an old command, it has been made new in experience by Christ's death for them.

And they in turn make it new afresh when they lay down their life for one another (1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup>, 27-31). The love that makes the greatest sacrifice will make the lesser. In the OT the law of Israel's brotherhood enjoined kindness, and definitely forbade such sins as contempt, extortion, oppression, etc. (Dt 22<sup>1-4</sup>, 23<sup>7</sup>, 19<sup>6</sup>, 24<sup>7</sup>, 14<sup>25</sup>, and elsewhere). So in the NT special mention is made of charity (1 Jn 3<sup>7</sup>, Ja 2<sup>12-16</sup>); hospitality (He 13<sup>1</sup>, Ro 12<sup>13</sup>); forgiveness (Col 3<sup>13</sup>); truthfulness (Eph 4<sup>25</sup>); mutual admonition (2 Th 3<sup>10</sup>); a humility that prefers others and renders even lowly service (Mt 18<sup>21-28</sup>, Jn 13<sup>2-7</sup>, Ro 12<sup>9</sup>, Ph 2<sup>3-11</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>2-4</sup>); practical sympathy with the persecuted (He 12<sup>2</sup>), etc. Brotherly love insists on the essential equality of those who are of the same family. Natural affection exists among them (Ro 12<sup>10</sup> φιλότητος). There can be no caste among them (Col 3<sup>11</sup>); all selfish ambition and striving after pre-eminence must be eschewed, and the way of service chosen (Mt 20<sup>26-28</sup>). Differences of gifts are recognized. But those who are one in Christ must regard them not as signs of inferiority and superiority, or grounds of pride and servility, but as means of mutual helpfulness, and as all necessary to the general well-being. Different gifts are different functions for the common good. For Christ and His brethren form a body, and each member is necessary to the perfect well-being of the rest. This is developed in Ro 12, 1 Co 12, and Eph 4.

The love the brethren bear each other is special. It is distinguished from that they feel toward those that are without (1 P 2<sup>17</sup> and 2 P 1<sup>7</sup>). It is closer, more affectionate, complacent, satisfying. But they must love others—even their bitter enemies. So do they become like their Father in heaven (Mt 5<sup>43-48</sup>; cf. St. Paul in Ro 9<sup>13</sup>).

Christ calls them His brethren, and is not ashamed to do so (He 2<sup>11</sup>). Still His position in the brotherhood is unique. He is one of them, yet He transcends them. He is Master and Lord (Jn 13<sup>12-15</sup>) as they are not, and should seek to be (Mt 23<sup>8-10</sup>). For He is Son of God in a unique sense (μωυονετης, Jn 3<sup>18</sup> and 1<sup>18</sup>, in which the reading θεός is probably correct and explains the uniqueness). That truth He ever guards in the expressions He employs. Examples are seen in Mt 11<sup>27</sup> and frequently in the Fourth Gospel; in Mt 6<sup>9</sup>, where the emphatic 'ye' and the character of the prayer exclude Him from the 'our,' and in Jn 20<sup>17</sup>, where distinction, not identity, of relation is intended.

When the law of brotherhood is lived out in sincerity and truth, in justice and righteousness, in courage and faith, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding, the solution of social problems will be hastened. These problems are not new. But they are seen to-day as never before. Conditions that once were accepted are accepted no longer as just or right or tolerable. And it is precisely because Christ's ideas of brotherhood have grown clearer to men's minds that they feel the inequalities and injustices of the present order. That is the cause of the present discontent. Christ foresaw that such conflicts would be occasioned by His gospel (Mt 10<sup>34-36</sup>). And nothing but the gospel that has caused the conflict can bring the proper issue. The cause must be the cure. Loyalty to the way of the Cross is the way of salvation. The age waits for Christians to embark in the honest, whole-hearted application of the great principle of brotherly love. It will not do to say with Wernle that Christ's demands are impractical for any society. They are impractical for any society that lacks the martyr spirit. They are not impractical for the society that is charged with it. Christ's way was the way of the Cross. That is the only way that leads to victory. Only in the spirit of Jesus can the world's need be met, and its problems finally solved. For that the new brotherhood has been created. Only the fresh vision of the Father's love, the surrender to the Saviour's Cross, and the appropriation of the Spirit's power will inspire, fit, and equip it for the holy task to which God summons.

BUFFETING.—In Mt 26<sup>67</sup> and Mk 14<sup>65</sup> this word (Gr. κολαφίζω) is used to describe the ill treatment received by Christ in the house of the high priest after His condemnation was pronounced. The crowd present seems to have participated in inflicting this personal indignity. St. Mark, with his usual attention to details, notices that the officers received Him with blows of their hands. κολαφίζω carries the significance of a blow with the clenched fist (κόλαφος, 'a fist'). It vividly represents the brutal manual violence to which our Lord was subjected. The word also came to imply a meaning of general ill-usage or persecution, and, as such, occurs in 1 Co 4<sup>1</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>7</sup> ('a thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan to buffet me'), 1 P 2<sup>20</sup>; cf.—

Hath ta'en with equal thanks.'

BUILDING (οικοδομή, 3 times; οικοδομείν, 23 times in the Gospels).—1. Literat.—The lifetime of Jesus nearly coincides with the period which was undoubtedly the golden age of building in Palestine. The Herods, with their Napoleonic passion for architecture, eclipsed in this respect even the fame of Solomon, and left their mark in all parts of the country in the shape of palaces, fortresses, theatres, and a variety of splendid structures, some serving a useful purpose (as the great harbour at Caesarea), but many arising merely out of a love of pomp and display. Herod the Great had begun his extensive work of rebuilding the Temple at Jerusalem nineteen years before the Christian era, and the work was still in progress at the time of Christ's final visit to the city (Mt 24<sup>1-2</sup>, Mk 13<sup>1-2</sup>, Lk 21<sup>5-6</sup>). Herod Antipas began the foundations of his ambitious new city of Tiberias shortly before Jesus emerged from the obscurity of Nazareth; and Pilate was engaged, during the public ministry of Jesus, in constructing an elaborate aqueduct for Jerusalem. It is certain that, wherever Jesus went, He would hear the sound of hammer and chisel; He would observe the frequent construction of a class of building hitherto little favoured in His country, such as hippodromes, baths and gymnasia (Jos. Ant. xv. viii. 1); and would notice the adoption of a style of architecture foreign to Jewish tradition.

It was not only Herodian princes, Roman magistrates, and well-to-do proselytes (see Lk 7<sup>3</sup>) who lavished large sums on buildings. Wealthy Jews seem to have spent fortunes in erecting luxurious mansions in the Greco-Roman style. Jesus mentions this eagerness for building as one of the passions which preoccupied His generation, and led Him to compare it with the materialist and pleasure-seeking age in which Lot lived (Lk 17<sup>28</sup>). He gives a vivid description of a prosperous farmer designing ampler store-houses on his estate (Lk 12<sup>29</sup>). In another passage He probably alludes to some actual instance of the building-mania overreaching itself, when He describes the tower left half finished for lack of funds (Lk 14<sup>28</sup>). In His denunciation of the Pharisees who 'build the sepulchres of the prophets, and garnish the tombs (sepulchra) of the righteous' (Mt 23<sup>29</sup>), He refers perhaps to the growing practice, unknown in the pre-Grecian period, begun, it seems, in Maccabean times, and now become a dilettante cult, of erecting monumental tombs 'reared aloft to the sight' (1 Mac 13<sup>7</sup>), as distinguished from the simple rock-hewn tombs of former days.* See TOMBS.

O. Holtzmann (Life of Jesus, p. 100 f.) suggests a special reason for the frequent references which Jesus makes to building operations. He calls attention to the fact that the handicraft in which He had been brought up was one of the building trades. It is usual, indeed, to describe Him as 'the carpenter' (Mk 6<sup>3</sup>) and the passage is often cited in which Justin Martyr (Trypho, 83) represents Him as 'making ploughs and yokes.' But Justin Martyr is quoting nothing more than a popular tradition, and there is no reason for limiting the term τίκτω to a worker in wood. There was hardly the division of labour at Nazareth that exists among our own mechanics. The epithet τίκτω has probably not less significance than the term 'carpenter' as used in Hamlet, v. 1. 46.—What is he that builds stronger than either the mason, the shipwright, or the carpenter? where it indicates one who has to do with the construction of buildings. We may say that there is good reason to conclude that Jesus was Himself a builder, and that He understood at least the art of ordinary house-construction, though it can hardly be admitted that the passages which Holtzmann quotes in support of this are sufficient to prove his point. By a similar method it is easy to prove that Shakespeare was a lawyer or a doctor, a Romanist or a Puritan.

On the other hand, it is not to be inferred, from the somewhat disparaging terms in which Jesus appears to have alluded to the building operations of His time, that He was insensible to the beauties of architecture, or that there was an iconoclastic strain in His nature. It would be easy to marshal passages from the Gospels with the object of showing that He was indifferent to, and even evinced contempt for, sacred places and edifices. But such a conclusion would be contrary to all that we know of His many-sided sympathy and genial tolerance. Rather was the case this—that, like St. Paul amid the temples of Athens, or like St. Francis of Assisi, careless of cathedrals in an age of cathedral-builders, He found His contemporaries so smitten with the love of outward magnificence, so absorbed in the thought of the material edifice, that He bent His whole effort to the task of emphasizing the inward and spiritual structure. It is therefore in this direction that all the great sayings of Christ about building look. On each occasion when He is led to speak of a temple, whether at Jerusalem or in Samaria, He takes the opportunity of insisting that the only true Temple is one not made with hands.

It may be suggested that some of His sayings of this kind are lost, but that the reminiscence or influence of them is to be traced in the remarkably frequent use by the NT writers of the term 'building' in a spiritual sense, whether applied to the individual believer or to the company of the faithful (see, e.g., Ac 20<sup>32</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>9</sup>, Col 2<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>5</sup> etc.). And just as Jesus said, 'Ye are a city set on a hill,' He may well have said, 'Ye are the temple of God.'

2. Figurative.—The actual passages in which Jesus spiritualizes the term 'building' may be grouped under three heads.

(1) In two remarkable passages Christ speaks of Himself as a Builder. (a) The first of these (Mt 26<sup>64</sup>, Mk 14<sup>28</sup>, Jn 2<sup>19</sup>), while it is certainly a genuine saying of Christ's, has come down to us in a form which leaves us doubtful as to the exact connection in which it was first uttered. The general sense, however, is clear enough. The buildings of the * Farrer (Wanderungen, p. 77) and Fergusson (The Temples of the Jews, p. 142 f.) think that the Tomb of Zacharias in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, 'a lovely little temple, with . . . pillars of the Ionic order,' belongs to the first years of the 1st cent. of our era.

Temple might be razed to the ground, but Christ, by His presence among His people, would perpetuate the true sanctuary (cf. Mt 18<sup>20</sup>, Jn 4<sup>21</sup>). Had the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews this saying in his mind when he referred to Christ (He 3<sup>3</sup>) as the 'builder of the house'? (b) The second passage is that in which Christ contemplates Himself as the Builder of His Church (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>). That with which He is concerned is not the material edifice reared on the rocky summit of Mount Moriah, but the spiritual building—the body of believers—founded on a common faith in Himself.

(2) In one passage, cited from the OT, Jesus varies the metaphor. In the 'germ-parable' of the Rejected Stone (Mt 21<sup>42</sup>, Mk 12<sup>10</sup>, Lk 20<sup>7</sup>) He is no longer the Builder, but the Foundation. In the original passage (Ps 118<sup>22</sup>) the Rejected Stone is Israel, but Christ appropriates the image to Himself, and once more draws attention to the fact that the work of God proceeds on lines not to be anticipated by a type of mind which is governed by worldly considerations.

(3) In two minor parables Jesus uses the art of building to illustrate the principles which must animate His followers. (a) In Mt 7<sup>24</sup>, Lk 6<sup>48</sup> He shows that, as the stability of a house depends on the nature of its foundation, so stability of character can be attained only when a man uniformly makes the word of truth which he has received the basis of his behaviour. Doing is the condition of progress. Christian attainment is broad-based upon obedience (cf. Jn 7<sup>17</sup>). (b) In Lk 14<sup>28</sup> He checks a shallow enthusiasm, apt quickly to evaporate, by reminding impulsive disciples that for great works great pains are required. The parable is the Gospel equivalent of our saying, 'Rome was not built in a day,' with special reference, however, to the necessity of the individual giving himself up, in absolute devotion, to his task (cf. Shakespeare, 2 Henry IV, i. iii. 41).

The foregoing passages exhaust the sayings, as reported in the Evangelic tradition, in which our Lord employed the image of building. But, we may ask, whence did St. Paul derive his favourite expression, applied both to the Church and to the individual, of edifying? (see Ro 15<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>9</sup>, Eph 4<sup>12</sup> etc.). It does not appear that οικοδομῶν was ever used by classical writers in this sense. Fritzsche (Ep. ad Rom. iii. p. 205) thinks that St. Paul derived it from the OT usage, בָּנֵה being sometimes used, with the accusative of the person, in the signification of blessing (see Ps 28<sup>6</sup>, Jer 24<sup>9</sup>). But it is not at least as likely that St. Paul derived the metaphorical use from the custom of Christ, who so often and with such emphasis applied building terms to the spiritual condition alike of the individual and of the company of believers? If Christ did not Himself use the expression 'edify,' all His teaching pointed that way.

BURDEN.—Both in Christ's discourse against the Pharisees (Mt 23<sup>4</sup>, Lk 11<sup>46</sup>) and in His saying, 'Come unto me,' etc. (Mt 11<sup>28-30</sup>), the 'burden' (φορτίον) is that of the legal and Pharisaic ordinances of such a minute and exacting kind that they became intolerable and crushed out real heart-religion. 'My burden,' Christ says, 'is light' in comparison with these; for I put men under the law of love, which is a law of liberty. With loving, gracious hearts, My disciples become a law unto themselves. The new law is written on the fleshy tables of the heart. St. Peter, in Ac 15<sup>10</sup>, speaks of the traditional legal observances as a yoke which 'neither ye nor your fathers were able to bear,' while faith in Christ can purify the heart and make strict rules for outward conduct unnecessary. In Mt 11<sup>30</sup> Jesus gives utterance to the germ at least of the Pauline idea of a new spirit of life in Christ Jesus, setting free from condemnation. While, in the first instance, Christ meant by 'burden' the Pharisaic ordinances, the truth would become ever deeper to His disciples, till they understood the full contrast between the fulfilment of legal precepts through painful effort, and the joyous service of a living God and Father, growing into pervading holiness of character.

The 'burden (βάρος)' of the day and the heat,' in the parable of the Labourers (Mt 20<sup>12</sup>) is a description of toil which strains and wearies. In the interpretation of the parable, if any stress were laid on this detail, it might be the long and conscientious fulfilment of duty in the Christian life, which, though it must receive recognition in the end, gives no claim on God as one who rewards of debt, nor allows the worker to glory over another who has been less richly furnished with opportunity.

BURIAL.—In contrast to the Greek and the later Roman custom of cremation, the rites of burial were observed amongst the Jews with great reverence, and an account of their ordinary practice will help to illustrate several passages in the NT. Immediately after death the body was washed and wrapped in linen cloths, and the folds of which spices and ointments were laid (Jn 19<sup>38-40</sup>). The face was bound about with a napkin, and the hands and feet with grave-bands (Jn 11<sup>44</sup> 20<sup>7</sup>). Meanwhile the house had been given over to the hired mourners (Mt 9<sup>23</sup> ||; cf. 2 Ch. 35<sup>25</sup>, Jer 9<sup>17</sup>), who lamented for the dead in some strain as was preserved in Jer 22<sup>5</sup>, and skilfully improvised verses in praise of his virtues. The actual interment took place as quickly as possible, mainly on sanitary grounds; very frequently, indeed, on the same day as the death (Ac 5<sup>6-10</sup> 8<sup>7</sup>), though it might be delayed for special reasons (Ac 9<sup>37</sup>). In its passage to the grave the body was generally laid on a bier or open bed of wicker work (Lk 7<sup>14</sup>; cf. 2 S 3<sup>1</sup>, 2 K 13<sup>21</sup>)—hence at Jesus' command the widow of Nain's son was able to sit up at once (Lk 7<sup>15</sup>). The bier was, as a rule, borne to the tomb by the immediate friends of the deceased, though we have also traces of a company of public 'buriers' (Ac 5<sup>6-10</sup>; cf. Ezk 39<sup>12-16</sup>). In front of the bier came the women, and in Judea the hired mourners, and immediately after it the relatives and friends, and 'much people of the city.' Attendance at funerals was, indeed, regarded as a pious act, and was consequently not always wholly disinterested. Among modern Orientals it is called 'attending the merit,' an act that will secure a reward from God (G. M. Mackie, Bible Manners and Customs, p. 127).

The place of burial in NT times was always outside the city (Lk 7<sup>12</sup>, Jn 11<sup>39</sup>, Mt 27<sup>52-53</sup>), and frequently consisted of a natural cave, or an opening made in imitation of one. These rock-sepulchres were often of considerable size, and sometimes permitted of the interment of as many as thirteen bodies. Eight, however, was the usual number, three on each side of the entrance and two opposite. The doorway to the tomb was an aperture about 2 ft. broad and 4 ft. high, and was closed either by a door, or by a great stone—the golel—that was rolled against it (Mt 27<sup>56</sup>, Mk 15<sup>46</sup>, Jn 11<sup>38, 39</sup>). It is sometimes thought that it was in some such rock-tomb that the demoniac of Gadara had taken up his abode; but more probably it was in one of the tombs 'built above ground,' which were 'much more common in Galilee than has been supposed' (Wilson, Recovery of Jerusalem, p. 369, op. Swete, St. Mark, p. 88).

As a rule, sepulchres were whitened once a year, after the rains and before the Passover, that passers-by might be warned of their presence, and thus escape defilement (Mt 23<sup>7</sup>; cf. Nu 19<sup>16</sup>). And though it was not customary to erect anything in the nature of our gravestones, in NT times it was regarded as a religious duty to restore or rebuild the tombs of the prophets (Mt 23<sup>29</sup>). In addition to family sepulchres of which we hear in the earliest Hebrew records (Gn 23<sup>20</sup>, Jg 8<sup>32</sup>, 2 S 2<sup>25</sup>), and such private tombs as the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea (Mt 27<sup>57</sup>), special provision was made for the interment of strangers (Mt 27<sup>7-9</sup>; cf. Jer 26<sup>23</sup>, 2 Mac 9<sup>4</sup>). See art. TOMB.

It will have been observed how many of the foregoing particulars are illustrated in the Gospel narrative of the burial of Jesus; but it may be well to summarize briefly what then took place. No sooner had it been placed beyond doubt that Jesus was really dead, than Joseph of Arimathea obtained permission to take possession of His body (Mt 27<sup>57-58</sup>; cf. the merciful provision of the Jewish law, Dt 21<sup>22</sup>). Haste was required, as the Jews' Preparation was close at hand, and the body, after being, perhaps, bathed (so Gospel of Peter, 6), was at once wrapped 'in a clean linen cloth' (Mt 27<sup>59</sup>), the roll of nymh and aloes, of which Nicodemus had brought about a hundred pound weight (Jn 19<sup>39</sup>), being apparently crumbled between the folds of the linen (σάββα). It was then borne to the 'new tomb wherein was never man yet laid,' and reverently laid on the rocky ledge prepared for the purpose, while the whole was secured by a 'great stone' placed across the entrance, which was afterwards at the desire of the Jews sealed and guarded (Mt 27<sup>62-65</sup>; cf. Gospel of Peter, 8). There the body remained undisturbed over the Jewish Sabbath; but when on the morning of the first day of the week the women visited the tomb, bringing with them an additional supply of 'spices and ointments' to complete the anointing which want of time had previously prevented, it was only to find the tomb empty, and to receive the first assurance of their Lord's resurrection (Lk 24<sup>1-6</sup>). In connexion with this visit, Edersheim has drawn attention to the interesting fact that the Law expressly allowed the opening of the grave on the third day to look after the dead (Bible Educator, iv. p. 332). In entire harmony, too, with what has already been said of the general structure of Jewish tombs, is the account which St. John has preserved for us of his own and St. Peter's visit to the tomb of Jesus (Jn 20<sup>1-7</sup>). He himself, when he reached the doorway, was at first content with stooping down (κατακύβητος) and looking in, and thus got only a general view (θεωρεῖς) of the linen cloths lying in their place. But St. Peter on his arrival entered into the tomb, and beheld—the word used (θεωρεῖ) points to a careful searching gaze, the eye passing from point to point—not only the linen cloths, but the napkin that was about Christ's head 'rolled up in a place by itself.' These particulars have sometimes been used as evidence of the care and order with which the Risen Lord folded up and deposited in two separate places His grave-clothes before He left the tomb. But it has recently been shown with great cogency that what probably is meant is that the grave-clothes were found undisturbed on the very spot where Jesus had lain, the linen cloths on the lower ledge which had upheld the body, the napkin 'by itself' on the slightly raised part of the ledge which formed a kind of pillow for the head. The empty grave-clothes, out of which the Risen Lord had passed, became thus a sign not only that no violence had been offered to His body by human hands, but also a parable of the true meaning of His Resurrection: 'all that was of Jesus of Nazareth has suffered its change and is gone. We—grave-clothes, and spices, and napkin—belong to the earth and remain' (H. Latham, The Risen Master, p. 11: see the whole interesting discussion in chapters i-iii.).

Apart from these more special considerations, it is sufficient to notice that the very particularity of the description of the burial of Jesus is in itself of importance as emphasizing His true humanity and the reality of His death. From nothing in our lot, even the sad accompaniments of the grave, did He shrink. On the other hand, the empty grave on the morning of the third day has always been regarded as one of the most convincing proofs that 'the Lord is risen indeed.' Had it not been so, then His body must have been stolen either by friends or by foes. But if by the latter, why in the days that followed did they not produce it, and so silence the disciples' claims? If by the former, then we have no escape from the conclusion that the Church of Christ was founded 'not so much upon delusion as upon fraud—upon fraud springing from motives perfectly inexplicable, and leading to results totally different from any that could have been either intended or looked for' (W. Milligan, The Resurrection of our Lord, p. 73).

GEORGE MILLIGAN.

BURNT-OFFERING is a word of rare occurrence in NT (Mk 12<sup>28</sup>, He 10<sup>6-8</sup>). This is probably due to the fact that the more generic word for sacrifice (θυσία) is commonly used, since the distinctions of the Old Covenant, which was vanishing away, did not require to be perpetuated in the NT Canon. It is probable, however, from the train of thought, that in some instances the sacrifice which was prominently before the mind of the writer was the burnt-offering (Ro 12<sup>1</sup>). And though not named, it is latent in certain passages (see below). It is known in the OT as קָרַבן qāribān: more rarely and partly in poetical passages as the קָרַבן qāribān; in Ps 51<sup>19</sup> both terms are used. The most common LXX rendering is θυσία, and in this form it appears in the NT. The qāribān is connected with a root meaning 'to ascend,' the idea being, probably, that the essence of the sacrifice ascended to heaven in the smoke; qāribān, with a root meaning 'to be complete,' an idea reproduced in the LXX translation. Details of the rite may be found in Lv 1, 6<sup>9-13</sup> 8<sup>19-21</sup>. Unlike most sacrifices, it was to be wholly burnt (Lv 1<sup>9</sup>), the skin only falling to the priest as his perquisite.

The burnt-offering was the principal sacrifice of the Mosaic dispensation, and continued as such till the destruction of the Temple by Titus. It was offered, the victim being a male yearling sheep, every morning and evening (Ex 29<sup>38-39</sup>); hence its Mishmic name qāribān, the perpetual offering. In addition, on Sabbaths, new moons, the first day of the seventh month, the three great feasts, and the Day of Atonement, other victims were offered (Nu 28 f.). Burnt-offering was associated with other sacrifices (Lv 9<sup>3</sup> + 15<sup>10</sup>), could be offered for individuals, even Gentiles, and even for the Roman emperor (Jos. Wars, II. xvii. 2). The altar stood in the court of the priests in front of (eastward of) the Temple building. The offering was made publicly, in the presence not merely of the large group of ministering priests, but also of 'the men of station,' representatives of what may be called the Jewish laity.

Although the word is nowhere recorded as being spoken by Christ, and only once as spoken to Him, it must be remembered that His connexion with burnt-offering was, of necessity, more intimate than the mere occurrence of the word suggests. As a Jew, acquainted with the OT, He could not have been unacquainted with the Pentateuchal legislation on this point; nor is it conceivable that as a visitor to the Temple He failed to be a witness of this rite. The altar on which burnt-offering was offered, from its great size, its frequent use, and its standing visibly in the court of the priests, was emphatically 'the altar,' and it was before this that He directed the offending brother to leave his gift (Mt 5<sup>23</sup>). At the Presentation in the Temple (Lk 2<sup>24</sup>, cf. Lv 12<sup>9</sup>) the second of the turtle doves was intended for a burnt-offering (the other bird forming the usual sin-offering at such a time); it was the offering of the poor, and the ritual is described in Lv 12<sup>14</sup>. The Temple tax to which He contributed was in part used for the provision of burnt-offerings (Mt 17<sup>24</sup>).

The two occasions on which, in NT, the burnt-offering is referred to, emphasize the imperfect and transitory character of the OT sacrificial system, and the spiritual, perfect, and abiding character of that which superseded it. In Mk 12<sup>38</sup> the scribe inferred from our Lord's teaching as to the first commandment, that to love God with all the heart and one's neighbour as oneself was 'much more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices,' and was for this commended as 'not far from the kingdom of God.' In He 10<sup>6-8</sup>, where only besides the word occurs, while the writer dwells on many points of the Temple, its furniture, and its service, he fails to apply the burnt-offering very closely to the redeeming work of Christ. But he quotes Ps 40<sup>6</sup> as declaring that the Divine pleasure lies not in 'victim and Minnah' (Delitzsch, in loc.), and infers the superiority of Christ's obedience to any expiatory sacrifice (sin-offering) or dedicatory sacrifice (burnt-offering) presented by means of an animal victim. His obedience is the burnt-offering that has enduring value and needs no repetition.

The derivation of βάρος is not known, and all attempts to identify it have failed. There is no justification for the suggestion of Gesenius (Lexicon, s.v.) that it is connected with the senecio plant, nor for Stanley's assumption (Hist. of the Jewish Church (ed. 1883), I, 97) that it was the wild acacia. The fact that in the LXX it is translated by βάρος shows that it was believed to be a thorn bush. βάρος is specially used of the bramble (Rubus), but according to Post (Hastings' DB, s.v. 'Bush'), Rubus has not been found wild in Sinai, which is south of its range, and climatically unsuited to it.

βῆρος occurs once again in the Gospels: Lk 6<sup>44</sup>; AV and RV 'bramble bush' [Matthew's parallel (7<sup>19</sup>) has 'thorns']. It was thought necessary to alter the translation; the word which in the other passage had such lofty associations is here used by Christ almost with contempt. Moreover, a vine might well enough be described as a 'bush' in the abstract; it does not grow high, and has no strength of wood (Ezk 15). 'Bramble' in older English means 'thorn bush,' not necessarily 'blackberry bush.' Yet the translation seems apt enough, even according to modern usage. Liddell and Scott give βῆρος as = 'blackberry bush' or 'wild raspberry,' but the adjective βάρβητος = 'thorned.'
