One of the most interesting singularities in Lk. is his reference to the Spirit in 10<sup>21</sup> || Mt 11<sup>25</sup>. In that hour Jesus rejoiced in the Holy Spirit, and said, I thank thee, O Father; etc. Both Evangelists, in giving the one passage in the Synoptic tradition which has the Johannine ring, are conscious of its peculiar elevation of thought and feeling, but only Lk. interprets it in this way. The authority on which he depended must have preserved for him the remembrance of a joyful excitement thrilling Jesus as He spoke. The context, too, favours this. The Seventy return to Jesus (10<sup>17</sup>) exulting that even the demons are subject to them in His name. In a sudden flash Jesus reveals to them what He had seen in their absence, and through their little successes: ἐθεώρωσαν τὸν Σατανᾶν ὡς περπατῆν ἐν τοῦ ὀφθαλμοῦ πειρασμοῦ (v. 18). It is in the consciousness of this final victory, and of His power to make even His feeble followers more than conquerors, that, after warning them not to trust in what they can do for God, but rather in God's faithful love to them, He breaks into what

Lk. evidently regarded as His rapturous utterance. It is not with resignation, but with Divine exultant gladness, that Jesus accepts the Father's will as revealed in the results of His work. The Spirit is not connected with revelation either here or anywhere else in the life of Jesus, but only with the overpowering, joyful emotion of the hour. And the connexion of the Spirit and of joy is one of the most striking characteristics of the NT all through (see Lk 1<sup>44</sup>, Ro 14<sup>17</sup>, Gal 5<sup>22</sup>, Ac 13<sup>2</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>5</sup>). No authority can be claimed for the v.l. in Lk 11<sup>2</sup>, according to which, instead of 'Thy kingdom come,' or 'Hallowed be thy name,' we should read, 'Thy Holy Spirit come upon us and cleanse us.' Yet it is in keeping with St. Luke's interest in the Spirit that this reading is found here and not in Mt.'s version of the prayer (see Plummer's St. Luke, p. 295 n.). It is another proof of this interest that in Lk 11<sup>13</sup> πνεῦμα ἁγίου replaces the 'good things' of Mt 7<sup>11</sup>: for St. Luke, all 'good things' which Christians could ask from the Father were summed up in the Spirit. This is a clear case of later experience interpreting the words of Jesus and giving the sense of them in its own terms. Perhaps if another than Jesus had been in question, we might have read that the passionate words of 12<sup>26</sup> broke from His lips when He was 'filled with holy spirit'; but to the Evangelist Jesus is always 'full of the Holy Spirit,' and no such points stand in relief in His career. Oddly enough, Lk. omits any mention of the Spirit in connexion with Pa 110 (20<sup>41</sup>), though both Mt. and Mk. seem to emphasize it, and in 21<sup>15</sup> he replaces the express promise of the Spirit, which he has already used in 12<sup>2</sup>, by a more general promise of an irresistible power of speech such as he ascribes in Ac 6<sup>10</sup> to a man full of the Holy Spirit. There is no reference to the Holy Spirit in 23<sup>4</sup>. The last light the Evangelist throws on it is in 24<sup>49</sup>, where the Risen Saviour describes it as 'the promise of my Father,' and as 'power from on high.' The last word, therefore, brings us back to the first. The fundamental idea to be associated with the Spirit is that of Divine power: how the Divine power is to be further characterized, what it is ethically, and to what issues or in what temper it works, we can see only in the life of Jesus. He is the key to the interpretation of a term which of itself is indefinite indeed.

8. From the life of Jesus, as covered by the Apostolic testimony (Ac 1<sup>21</sup>), we now turn to the chapters of Mt. and Lk. which tell the story of His birth. If Mk. is the earliest form of the Evangelic tradition, it is natural to say (whatever the Evangelist's own Christology may be) that the Divine sonship of Jesus was originally connected with His baptism. It was there He received the Holy Spirit and heard the heavenly voice which said, 'Thou art my Son.' It would be all the more natural for Christians to say this who read in their Gospel of Luke (3<sup>22</sup>), with Codex Bezae, 'Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee.' But as soon as reflexion woke, it would be apparent that Jesus could not suddenly, at the age of thirty or thereabouts, begin to be what He had in no sense been, or been destined and prepared for before. This is the conviction which—not to speak of historical evidence—sustains the stories of the birth of Christ. He must always have been what Christians eventually knew Him in their own experience to be: He must always have been Son of God. If it is the Spirit which makes Him Son, then behind the baptism with the Spirit must lie a birth in which the Spirit is equally important: not only the equipment of this personality, but its origination, must be traced directly to God. And it is the origination of the personality of Jesus with which both Mt. and Lk. are concerned. Neither of them betrays any idea that the Son of God pre-existed, and that they are only narrating the mode in which He came from another order of being into this; and, difficult as it may be to understand how a companion and friend of St. Paul could ignore such an idea, we must abide by the facts as they are before us. No act of man, but only the power of God, lies behind and explains the existence of Jesus Christ in the world. In Mt. the story is told simply and briefly: Mary was found with child ἐκ πνεύματος ἁγίου (1<sup>18, 20</sup>). It is this which makes the Child to be Immanuel, 'God with us.' In Luke, though the setting is much more elaborate, the place and significance of the Spirit in the story are the same. The angel of the Annunciation says to Mary (1<sup>35</sup>): πνεῦμα ἁγίου ἐπέσπευται ἐπὶ σέ, καὶ δύναμις ὑψίστου ἐπισκιάσει σοί· διὸ καὶ τὸ γεννώμενον ἄγιον κληθήσεται, υἱὸς θεοῦ. It is in virtue of this mode of origination that the future child is ἄγιον, Son of God. It is important to notice here the parallelism of πνεῦμα ἁγίου and δύναμις ὑψίστου. The two expressions are precisely equivalent. In the life and work of Jesus, the Divine power can reveal itself ethically (as the Gospel story shows in detail), but in the origination of His personality there is no room for anything to appear but bare power. The action of the Spirit is to be conceived not as sexual but as creative. This marks the truth as well as the purity of the NT. In the OT, where the gender of רוח can be determined, the feminine instances are to the masculine as more than two to one; but in the NT this is irrelevant. πνεῦμα is of no gender. Few will be persuaded by O. Holtzmann (Leben Jesu and Was Jesus Ekstatiker? p. 41) that the Gospel according to the Hebrews, in which Jesus is introduced as speaking of the Holy Spirit as His mother, represents anything more primitive or original on that account. To call the Spirit either 'mother' or 'father' is equally inept and un-Christian: the Spirit is the power of the Highest, to which the presence of the Son of God in the world is due. In other words, the Divine Sonship of Jesus does not date from His baptism, as that of Christians; it is not with Him as with us an affair of re-birth, but of birth simply; it is native and original, with roots as deep as His being; He is not only υἱὸς θεοῦ, but μορφογενής.

9. But it is not only the birth of Jesus which in Lk 1 and 2 is connected with the Spirit: all the events of this period are transacted, so to speak, in an atmosphere agitated by the Spirit. The representation is conditioned partly by OT conceptions of the Spirit, and partly, no doubt, by primitive Christian experiences of it. Thus in 1<sup>18</sup> the angel says of John: πνεύματος ἁγίου πληροῦσθετα ἐπὶ ἐκ κοιλίας μητρὸς αὐτοῦ, words in which we can think only of a Divine energy or intensity of life which was to characterize the child from the first. Possibly the juxtaposition of this with the prohibition of wine and strong drink (cf. Ac 2<sup>3</sup>, Eph 5<sup>18</sup>) suggests the excitement or stimulation of the nature by God as opposed to any natural intoxicant. Yet the work which John is to do in consequence ('many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God,' 1<sup>16</sup>), shows that the Divine power is conceived as working to ethical issues, and therefore as itself ethical. In the OT 'the spirit' is never used as a cause except of those things which have to do with the affairs of the people of Israel' (Wood, op. cit. p. 9); and this is the point of view maintained throughout these chapters in Luke. The Spirit is connected with the Messianic age (this is universally the case in the NT), and with the preparations for the coming of the Messiah. In John, who comes 'in the spirit and power of Elijah' (1<sup>7</sup>), it is a prophetic spirit, yet rather in the OT than in the NT sense: indeed, it is the outstanding feature in the consciousness of John that he neither has nor can impart holy spirit. When it is said that Elisabeth 'was filled with holy spirit, and lifted up her voice with a loud cry' (1<sup>42</sup>), we must think of a sudden and overpowering access of feeling referred to God as its source. The same remark applies to Zacharias (1<sup>67</sup>) as he utters the Benedictus: in both cases the emotion is one of joy (see above, § 7). More significant are the references to the Spirit in connexion with Simeon (2<sup>25</sup>). He was a just and devout man, cherishing the Messianic hope, and it was probably conditioned by this character that πνεῦμα ἦν ἔχων ἐπ' αὐτόν. Yet this can hardly mean that he had an abiding possession of the Spirit. No such possession of the Spirit is contemplated anywhere in these chapters, and Simeon is presented to us only in relation to this one scene from the infancy of Jesus. All through his action here he is a Divinely impelled, Divinely illuminated man. This is what is meant by the words quoted. It is 'in the Spirit'—that is, under a Divine impulse—that he comes into the temple; it has been revealed to him 'by the Holy Spirit'—that is, he has had a Divine assurance granted him—that he will see the Christ before he dies. How this impulse or this revelation was imparted to Simeon the Evangelist does not tell, and it is vain to ask. But we need not say that it was not mediated at all, but blankly supernatural. The words in 2<sup>26</sup> could not have been spoken by a young man; here 'old experience doth attain to something of prophetic strain.' Perhaps we may say as much of the ancient prophetess Anna (v. 26<sup>6</sup>). προφήτις implies the Spirit, yet apart from this one occasion, at the presentation of the Child Jesus in the temple, when she gave thanks to God—no doubt in such an outburst of inspired feeling as is seen in the Nunc dimittis—we have no means of knowing how the Spirit expressed itself through her. For this sudden and eager outburst of thanksgiving (so much is implied in αὐτῇ τῇ ὥρᾳ ἐπιστάσα ἀθρομοδογέτω τῷ θεῷ) we may perhaps compare St. Luke's account of the first Spirit-given utterances at Pentecost: 'We do hear them speak in our tongues the mighty works of God' (Ac 2<sup>14</sup>).

10. In the Synoptic Gospels, what is said of the Spirit no doubt bears the impress, here and there, of experiences which were familiar to the writers under that name, but these experiences do not come independently into view. It is otherwise when we pass beyond the Synoptics. Writers like St. Luke in Acts, and St. Paul in many of his Epistles, deal directly and formally with this subject. In the Gospel of John there is reached even a stage of conscious reflexion upon it which may almost be called a doctrine of the Spirit. And everywhere in the NT there are casual lights thrown upon it in which we can see its place in Christian thought and life. It is not intended here to follow out these in detail, but to indicate in outline the main features of the post-Pentecostal experience and conception of the Spirit, keeping especially in view their relation to Christ and the Gospels.

11. Although there might be reasons for beginning with St. Paul, it is more convenient to follow up Lk.'s Gospel by Acts. The first reference of this book to the Spirit is one of the most singular: Jesus is spoken of as having 'given commandment through the Holy Spirit unto the apostles whom he had chosen' (1<sup>2</sup>). Though Jesus in the Gospel speaks and acts from beginning to end as one anointed with Holy Spirit and power, there is no parallel to this expression. It seems to suggest that with the Resurrection the dispensation of the Holy Spirit began, and that the disciples were conscious, as they listened to the new and final charge of their Lord, that they were in contact, as they had never been before, with the powers of the world to come (He 6<sup>b</sup>), the Divine inspiration of the Messianic age. This power with which the Risen Saviour is invested He bids the disciples themselves expect within a few days (1<sup>b</sup>). It is the promise of the Father: 'Ye shall receive power when the Holy Spirit is come upon you, and ye shall be my witnesses' (1<sup>b</sup>). This promise was made good at Pentecost, when 'all were filled with the Holy Spirit, and began to speak with other tongues as the Spirit gave them utterance' (2<sup>b</sup>). The representation of the tongues in Ac 2 as foreign languages has to be controlled by St. Paul's description in 1 Co 14. The miracle of Pentecost is not that the disciples spoke in foreign languages, which, in spite of the narrator, is meaningless and incredible, but that they spoke at all, that they spoke with tongues of fire, and that their speech was a testimony to Jesus, delivered with overwhelming Divine power. The whole Pentecostal phenomenon, including the emotional disturbance which suggested drunkenness (2<sup>b</sup>), and expressed itself in joyful if inarticulate thanksgivings (2<sup>b</sup>, cf. 1 Co 14<sup>b</sup>), has the character of a testimony to Jesus. The central thought of the whole is that of 2<sup>b</sup> 'Having received from the Father the promise of the Holy Spirit, he hath poured forth this which ye both see and hear.' Pentecost, or the gift and possession of the Spirit, is the proof to the world of the exaltation of Jesus. It is His Divine power which is behind this incalculable elevation and reinforcement of the natural life. This is the NT point of view throughout. There is such a thing as a spirit which is not of God, but the Spirit which Christians have and of which they speak is never anything else than the Spirit of Jesus. It is never an undefined impulse or stimulus—a vague excitement originating anyhow and tending anywhere: it is always referred specifically to Jesus, and it is fundamentally a token that He is there in power (5<sup>b</sup>). That there is an abnormal or pathological side to speaking with tongues need not be questioned; the equilibrium of a weak and sinful nature may easily be disturbed by the sudden irruption into it of such incalculable realities as the resurrection of Jesus, the redeeming love and the coming judgment of God; but any degree of disturbance is better than indifference and insensibility. The only question is how the disturbance is to settle—whether men are to rise out of it into the balance of a renewed nature at a higher level, or to sink out of it into the old torpor again. The disturbance itself is the work of God through His Spirit—the Spirit of the Risen Saviour—whatever the issue be. For other references in Acts to speaking with tongues as the most conspicuous sign of having the Spirit, see 10<sup>b</sup> 19<sup>b</sup>: probably this is what is meant when we read of the Spirit falling on (ἐπιπέσει) people as in 8<sup>b</sup>.

More important than speaking with tongues, even in Acts, is prophecy. St. Peter's sermon in Ac 2 is a specimen of Christian prophecy; the Spirit enables him to read the OT (Joel and the Psalms) in a Christian sense, and to find in it Jesus and the Messianic age. It is similarly inspired men—by the πνεύματος of the Holy Spirit' (6<sup>b</sup>)—under whose ministry the Church is multiplied. Five such men are mentioned by name as working in the Church at Antioch (13<sup>b</sup>). The seven at Jerusalem (6<sup>b</sup>) are chosen as men full of the Spirit and faith. The daughters of Philip, who prophesied, were women who shared in this gift (21<sup>b</sup>). Sometimes the prophecy had the character of prediction: e.g. Agabus (11<sup>b</sup>) signified 'through the Spirit' an impending famine, just as at a later date (21<sup>b</sup>) he foretold what awaited Paul at Jerusalem: 'thus saith the Holy Spirit.' It is no doubt the utterances of such 'inspired' men that are in view when St. Paul himself says (20<sup>b</sup>): 'The Holy Spirit testifieth unto me in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me' (cf. 21<sup>b</sup>). It is important to note that St. Paul did not find it necessary to obey when Christian men said to him 'through the Spirit that he should not set foot in Jerusalem.' In some way he could urge the Spirit within him against this spirit without: 'I go bound in the spirit to Jerusalem' (20<sup>b</sup>, cf. 19<sup>b</sup>). He felt a Christian obligation to go at all hazards, and went against all omens. Akin to these warnings is the general guidance of the Church and the Apostles by the Spirit, especially at important crises. For example, in chs. 8 and 10, where it is important to represent that the extension of the Church beyond the Jews was Divinely authorized, the whole story is told at the supernatural level, and the Spirit appears at every turn: 'the Spirit said to Philip' (8<sup>b</sup>, cf. 8<sup>b</sup>); 'the Spirit of the Lord snatched Philip away' (8<sup>b</sup>); 'while Peter was pondering the vision, the Spirit said, Behold two men seek thee . . . I have sent them' (10<sup>b</sup>); 'the Spirit bade me go with them, nothing doubting' (11<sup>b</sup>). How the Spirit made such communications we need not inquire: but it is important to notice that they are not about indifferent things. There is nothing of the pagan oracle which deals with any question proposed to it: the Spirit gives direction only in the concerns of the Kingdom of the Messiah. For other striking illustrations connected with this guidance of the Church in the preaching of the gospel see 13<sup>b</sup> (where, no doubt, the Spirit spoke through an inspired man), 13<sup>b</sup> 15<sup>b</sup> 16<sup>b</sup> 7, 10. The last verse probably shows that too hard and fast a line is not to be drawn between the voice of the Spirit and inferences drawn from facts by Christian intelligence.

One point of interest in Acts is the relation of the Spirit to baptism. The gift of the Spirit is itself represented beforehand as a baptism (1<sup>b</sup> 'ye shall be baptized with holy spirit not many days hence'). After Pentecost, instead of displacing and annulling water-baptism, as we might have anticipated, the baptism with the Spirit is regarded as normally coincident with the other: 'Repent and be baptized . . . and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit' (2<sup>b</sup>, cf. 9<sup>b</sup>). When people believed and were baptized, and the Holy Spirit did not fall on any of them, it was abnormal and disconcerting,—at least on St. Luke's theory (8<sup>b</sup>),—and steps were taken to remedy it. It must be remembered that the only baptism spoken of in Acts is that of adult penitent believers, and that for such persons the public confession of their faith, in a ritual act, was naturally the occasion of profoundly moving experiences—experiences which, as rising into higher ranges of thought and feeling than usual, were ascribed by the early Church to the Spirit. To find in Ac 8<sup>b</sup> 12 or 19<sup>b</sup> an analogue of 'confirmation,' a sacrament supplementary to baptism, and capable of being conferred only by an Apostle or by a bishop as his successor, is an anachronism. The gifts of the Holy Spirit bestowed on these two occasions when Apostles prayed and laid their hands on the baptized, were what may be called spiritual gifts falling within the sphere of the senses: 'they spoke with tongues and prophesied' (19<sup>b</sup>). In confirmation, this is neither asked nor wanted, but this and nothing else is what is desiderated by St. Luke. The emotional stimulation, which liberates the hidden powers of human nature, is itself the gift of the Holy Spirit in virtue of which people become glossolalists or prophets. But though, for the reason already stated, the gift of the Spirit is the normal accompaniment of baptism, the order of the two things may be reversed. Cornelius and his household are baptized, not in order to receive, but because they have received, the Spirit (10<sup>4-6</sup>). And more important than any single observation is the fact that in Acts, as elsewhere in the NT, the reception of the Spirit is the whole of Christianity. 'They received the Holy Spirit even as we did' (10<sup>47</sup> 11<sup>13</sup> 15<sup>26</sup>). All that makes a man a Christian is in this, and where this is there can be no distinction of Jew or Gentile more. The Church is one in the unity of the Spirit.

12. In St. Paul's Epistles the Holy Spirit is mentioned nearly 120 times, and may be said to have a prominence and importance which it has nowhere else in the NT. It is impossible to discuss it in detail here. On the one hand, we have representations of the Spirit, and of the effects produced by its reception, entirely similar to those in Acts: St. Paul's whole ministry, in word and deed, has been accomplished in the power of the Holy Spirit (Ro 15<sup>19</sup>); those who receive his gospel receive the Spirit; the chief χαρίσματα, or spiritual gifts, are speaking with tongues and prophesying (1 Th 5<sup>19-22</sup>, 1 Co 12-14). Though St. Paul was distinguished himself, above everyone at Corinth, by his experiences of the glossolalic ecstasy, and thanked God for it (1 Co 14<sup>18</sup>), and though he discouraged the sober-minded Thessalonians who would have hastily repressed it (this is what is meant by 'Quench not the Spirit' in 1 Th 5<sup>19</sup>), he was not insensible to its dangers. There was something morbid in it; it might be tainted with vanity and self-indulgence; there was nothing in it to edify the Church. Good Christians might even be conceited as thanking God that they did not speak with tongues. Even the higher gift of prophecy needs criticism and control. The man who comes to the church with a 'teaching' or a 'revelation' may come in the Spirit,—he may be an inspired man,—but he is not irresponsible, nor is he exempt from the criticism and control of the Church. 'Prophets' spirits are subject to prophets' (1 Co 14<sup>32</sup>): the Divine impulse under which the prophet in each case speaks is not an uncontrollable force which must have its way irrespective of order or decorum. Neither does it guarantee infallibility: the human individuality counts for something in every utterance, and when two or three 'prophets' have spoken the others are to judge (1 Co 14<sup>29</sup>). The Christian common sense of the community, so to speak, is felt to be more inspired than the most ardent utterance of any individual. St. Paul even mentions among χαρίσματα one which he calls διακρίσις πνευμάτων—the faculty of deciding on each occasion what is the true character of the impulse under which a man speaks, and in particular whether it is of God or not. The conception of a spiritual gift of this kind—an instinctive sense for what is or is not in keeping with the gospel—is peculiar. It brings us within sight of what is characteristically Pauline in the conception of the Spirit, namely, a possession of the Spirit which is beyond all particular 'gifts' or 'operations' of a spiritual kind, which is, in short, identical with Christian life. To quote from Mr. Wood (op. cit. 268): 'Paul grasped the idea of the unity of the religious life, and spoke of the spirit not merely as God acting in an occasional extraordinary and emotional experience, but as being the Divine source and basis of all the Christian life. For him the Holy Spirit is the cause not only of religious experiences, but of religious experience. The test of the Spirit of God in a man is no longer subjective emotion, but the objective value of his life for the progress of the will of God as working itself out in the Church.' In comparison with the Spirit in this large sense, the particular manifestations or gifts of the Spirit which are discussed at length in Ro 12, 1 Co 12-14, Eph 4, have a subordinate though a vital importance. The main point is that for St. Paul Christian life and life in the Spirit are one thing. All Christian graces are the fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5<sup>22</sup>). The Christian God is He who supplies the Spirit (3<sup>2</sup>). To become a Christian is to receive the Spirit (3<sup>2</sup>). To live as a Christian is to walk in or by the Spirit (5<sup>18</sup>). The Spirit and faith are correlative terms, and each of them covers, from a different point of view, all that is meant by Christianity. Regarded from the side of God and His grace and power in initiating and maintaining it, Christianity is the Spirit; regarded from the side of man and his action and responsibility in relation to God it is faith. The two are coextensive, and all Christianity is in each. This is vividly expressed in one of those sentences in which St. Paul concentrates his whole mind on the greatest things: ἡμεῖς γὰρ πνεύματι ἐκ πίστεως ἐκρίθα δικαιοσύνης ἀρεσκόμεθα (3<sup>2</sup>). Here is everything that enters into Christianity and determines it to be what it is. Like the old religion, it has in δικαιοσύνη its hope or goal; but in its attitude to this, nothing is determined by law, in any sense of that word; there are only two powers of which St. Paul is conscious as counting for anything in his soul—the one is Divine (the Spirit), the other is human (faith); and though these are distinguishable, they cannot be known apart. Cf. 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup> ἐν ἀγαπῇ πνεύματος καὶ πίστει ἀληθείας, where 'in consecration wrought by God's Spirit, and belief of the truth,' is to be interpreted in the same way.

Without going into details, it is pertinent to point out the connexions between this Pauline conception of the Spirit and what we find in the life of Jesus. (a) To begin with, the Spirit is for St. Paul specifically Christian. It is not the power or the life of God simpliciter, but the power or the life of God as God has been manifested in Christ, and especially in His resurrection and exaltation. He calls it expressly the Spirit of Christ (Ro 8<sup>9</sup>); it is an epistle of Christ that is written on men's hearts by the Spirit of the living God (2 Co 3<sup>3</sup>); he even goes so far as to say, the Lord is the Spirit (3<sup>2</sup>), and he who is joined to the Lord is one spirit (1 Co 6<sup>17</sup>). The presence of the Spirit is, it may be said, the spiritual presence of the Lord; it is not an indefinite power of God, but the last Adam who has become life-giving spirit (15<sup>45</sup>). When a criterion of 'spiritual' utterances is sought, it is found in Jesus (12<sup>1</sup>): to say Jesus is anathema proves that it is not God's Spirit in which one speaks; but only in the Holy Spirit can one say 'Jesus is Lord.' To confess the exaltation, not of an unknown person, but of Jesus, and to live in the acknowledgment of Jesus at the right hand of the Father, is to be a genuine Christian. Passages like these prove that if there was any danger in the Pauline churches of an ecstatic enthusiasm doing less than justice to the historical character of Christianity, it was a danger to which St. Paul was alive from the first, and which he did his best to obviate. That St. Paul and the members of his churches had such an acquaintance with the historical tradition of Jesus as gave definite meaning to His name, the writer has no doubt. (b) A further point in St. Paul's conception of the Spirit, which connects it essentially with Jesus, is seen in this: it is a spirit of adoption or sonship, breaking out in the loud and joyful cry, 'Abba, Father.' All who are led by it are sons of God. Because they are sons, God has sent forth the Spirit of His Son into their hearts (Ro 8<sup>14</sup>, Gal 4<sup>6</sup>). It is not a spirit of δουλεία or δουλεία (2 Ti 1<sup>7</sup>), but of trust and joy. (c) Especially as a spirit of sonship is it a spirit of freedom: ὁ δὲ κτῖνος ἐν πνεύματι, οὐ ἐν τοῦ πνεύματος κυρίου, ἐλευθερία (2 Co 3<sup>17</sup>). Ἐλεύθερον, δουθερία, and δουθεριῶν are great Pauline words in this connexion. What they suggest is the emancipation of the Christian life from everything statutory, whatever its origin. The Christian is not under law, but under grace; no statute contributes in the least degree to make him what he is, or to give him the experiences which he has; it is as he stands in the presence of the crucified and risen Christ, and abandons himself in faith to the Divine love there revealed, that the Divine power descends into his heart which annuls all the statutes and conventions he has ever known, and is itself everything to him henceforth. It is under the inspiration of this power, and of this power alone, that he now lives and acts; not conformity to any external standard, however high, but moral originality like that of Jesus, because inspired by the consciousness of Jesus and of all he owes to Him, is what is required of him at every step. That such a conception is not without moral perils, and that it is capable of being abused, St. Paul was well aware (Gal 5<sup>13</sup>, Ro 6<sup>14</sup>); but it is in one respect the fundamental truth of his gospel, and he would never compromise upon it. That it has its basis in the teaching of Jesus—his supreme illustration in the whole life of Jesus—we may see from the Sermon on the Mount, or from Mt 17<sup>24-27</sup>, Jn 8<sup>31-36</sup>.—(d) Again, the Pauline idea of the earnest of the Spirit (ἀρραβών 2 Co 1<sup>22</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>, Eph 1<sup>14</sup>), or of the first-fruits of the Spirit (ἀπαρχή, Ro 8<sup>27</sup>), according to which the Spirit is a guarantee of eternal life, is continuous with the teaching of Jesus. The Spirit is such a guarantee because it is a quickening spirit, 'the Spirit of him that raised Jesus from the dead' (8<sup>11</sup>); it brings to men the life of God, the same life that was manifested in Jesus, and that made it impossible that He should be holden of death (Ac 2<sup>24</sup>). The argument, or rather the assumption of the Apostle, in all these passages is the same as that of Jesus in His answer to the Sadducees. When God has pledged His friendship to men as He did to the patriarchs in ancient days, or as He does to Christians now in making them, through the Spirit, partakers of His own life, He has entered into a relation to them to which death can make no difference. His love outwardly, His Spirit inwardly, both mean immortality. They both say of God's flock: 'They shall never perish; none can pluck them out of the Father's hand' (Jn 10<sup>29</sup>). The only difference is that when immortality is deduced from the possession of the Spirit (that is, the life of God), it is referred, so to speak, to a natural or supernatural law, and we see it as part of a constitution of things; whereas when it is deduced from the friendship of God, we see it purely as a gift of His grace.—(e) Formally, there is one great contrast which brings out the meaning of spirit in St. Paul, but which cannot be directly connected with Jesus, the contrast of spirit and flesh. This pervades the Apostle's writings, and is conspicuous in such passages as Ro 8, Gal 5. The flesh represents for him sin in its virulent and constitutional character; the Spirit is the Divine power given to the believer in Jesus, which enables him to do what the Law could not do—to vanquish or put to death the flesh. Yet when St. Paul learned the lesson that only the Spirit could overcome the flesh, he merely learned what Jesus taught the rich ruler—'There is none good but one, that is God' (Mk 10<sup>18</sup>)—with its necessary inference, that for any goodness we can ever attain we must be absolutely dependent on God. St. Paul's gospel means not only that we must be so dependent, but that by God's mercy such dependence is made possible for us: God puts His Holy Spirit in those who believe in Jesus, with their sanctification expressly in view (1 Th 4<sup>7</sup>). There is, of course, a reference here to the OT conception of the Spirit in Ezk 36<sup>27</sup> 37<sup>14</sup>.

The passages in which the Spirit is regarded by St. Paul as a source of knowledge or revelation are among the most difficult in his writings, and have nothing analogous to them in the Synoptic words of Jesus. Besides 1 Co 12<sup>8</sup> (where the 'word of wisdom' and the 'word of knowledge' are mediated through the Spirit) and 14<sup>6</sup> (where it explains διδασκαλία, ἐπιστήμη, etc.), there are the longer passages in 1 Co 2 and Eph 1<sup>17</sup>. In both these passages a wisdom is spoken of which is imparted by the Spirit to believers (though σύν in 1 Co 2<sup>10</sup> may refer only to the Apostles or other inspired teachers). The Spirit can impart this wisdom because it searches all things, even the depths of God. The contents of the wisdom in question are in both cases, apparently, eschatological. It is wisdom which God has foreordained 'for our glory' (not in honour of us, but with that glory in view which we are to share with the Lord of glory), 1 Co 2<sup>7</sup>. It speaks of the things 'which eye has not seen nor ear heard . . . all that God has prepared for those who love him' (2<sup>9</sup>), or, in the words of Eph 1<sup>8</sup>, of 'the hope of the inheritance of the saints'. Only the man who has the Spirit himself, who has had the eyes of his heart illumined, can receive, teach, or appreciate this wisdom. If we should say that we have a notable specimen of it in 1 Co 15, then the Christian character is thoroughly safeguarded: it speaks not merely of the things that are freely given to us by God (2<sup>9</sup>), but of the things that are freely given to us by God in Christ. It is in Him that all shall be made alive, and put on the body of glory (1 Co 15<sup>22</sup>, Ph 3<sup>21</sup>). It is Christ in us who is the hope of the glory contemplated for us in God's wisdom (Col 1<sup>27</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>7</sup>). The power with which God wrought in Christ when He raised Him from the dead and set Him at His right hand in the heavenly places (Eph 1<sup>20</sup>), is the same as 'the power which worketh in us' through the Spirit (2<sup>13</sup>), and it works in us to the same glorious issue. It is perhaps impossible for us to appreciate as revelation all the forms in which St. Paul's thought and imagination clothed themselves as he laid hold of the hope of glory and immortality in Christ; but, judging from the combination of these passages, this seems to have been the substance of his Spirit-taught wisdom. On its agreement in substance with the mind of Christ see under (d) above. The truth of passages like 1 Co 2<sup>14-16</sup> is generalized in such Johannine words of Jesus as 'My sheep hear my voice . . . you do not believe because you are not of my sheep . . . every one that is of the truth heareth my voice' (Jn 10<sup>27</sup>; 36 18<sup>27</sup>). This again unites with Jesus the Pauline conception of the Spirit.

13. The NT books which were written under Pauline influence scarcely call for independent consideration. Hebrews has one reference (2<sup>4</sup>) and perhaps a second (6<sup>5</sup>) to the 'gifts' of the Spirit, the first alluding to them as God's testimony to Christ; elsewhere it refers to the Spirit only as the speaker in the OT (3<sup>7</sup> 9<sup>10</sup>). In 1 P 1<sup>2</sup> the striking expression ἐργασίᾳ πνεύματος, standing as it does between the 'foreknowledge of God the Father' and 'obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ,' is, no doubt, to be rendered, as in 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>, 'in a consecration wrought by the Spirit'; it is in this that God's eternal purpose of redemption is realized. Probably in both places (1 P 1<sup>2</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>) there is an allusion to baptism. In 1 Pt 1<sup>11</sup> the idea that the Spirit in the OT (7) prophets was Christ's Spirit must be connected with the belief in the pre-existence of Christ; in 1<sup>12</sup> the Holy Spirit sent from heaven is the power which attends the Christian evangelist and makes his words effective. This idea, of course, pervades the NT, and goes back to such words of Jesus as Mk 13<sup>14</sup>, Lk 24<sup>49</sup>. 'The Spirit of glory and of God' in 1 P 4<sup>14</sup> recalls St. Paul's conception of the Spirit as the earnest of immortality; it is the spirit of the glory to be revealed because it opens men's eyes to the reality of it (1 Co 2, Eph 1<sup>17</sup>), and ensures their entrance into it (2 Co 5<sup>5</sup>). In 2 Th 1<sup>14</sup> it is the indwelling Holy Spirit which enables one to guard the Christian deposit—a Christian inference from 1 Co 2<sup>12</sup>, Jn 18<sup>26</sup>. In Tit 3<sup>5</sup> the thought of 1 P 1<sup>2</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>, is more articulately expressed: side by side with 'the laver of regeneration' we have 'renewal wrought by the Holy Spirit'. There is nothing more here than a fulfilment of the Baptist's words.—'He shall baptize you with holy spirit' (Mk 1<sup>8</sup>).

14. The Johannine books cover all the literary forms known to the NT,—Gospel, Epistle, Apocalypse,—and the Spirit is prominent in all. To understand them it is necessary to remember that all the experience of the Pauline churches lies behind them, and that the circumstances in which they originated have exercised a decided influence on their presentation of the facts and ideas with which they deal.

(a) To begin with the Apocalypse, the writer speaks four times of being, or being carried off, ἐν πνεύματι (1<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>2</sup> 17<sup>2</sup> 21<sup>10</sup>), an expression which, whether it is literary artifice or a description of remembered experience, suggests the condition of prophetic ecstasy in which he saw his visions. If St. Paul had spoken of the Spirit in that connexion, we should have referred for interpretation to 2 Co 12<sup>12</sup>. The seven spirits before God's throne, whatever their connexion in the history of religion with the seven Amshaspands of Persia, are not numerically seven. In the Apocalypse they are treated as a unity; they are the Spirit of God in the completeness of its powers (1<sup>4</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>5</sup>); and when Christ is spoken of as having the seven spirits of God, the meaning is the same as when we read in the Gospel (3<sup>24</sup>) that God does not give the Spirit by measure to Him. This close connexion of Jesus with the Spirit (He first receives and then bestows it) is strikingly brought out in the Epistles to the Seven Churches. In all of them it is the Risen Christ who speaks; but at the end of each we read: 'He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the Churches' (2<sup>7-11</sup> 17<sup>2</sup> 29<sup>18</sup> 22<sup>17</sup>). In St. Paul's phrase, here too 'the Lord is the Spirit.' It is no other than Christ who speaks through the inspired prophet. And although ἐν πνεύματι probably means 'in an ecstasy,' it must be noted that there is nothing inarticulate or unbalanced about these searching letters. They are terrible in their calm as in their passion. Cf. the utterance of the Spirit in 14<sup>17</sup>. In 11<sup>10</sup> and 13<sup>2</sup> we are really on OT ground, and the Spirit is not specifically Christian, but, as in OT passim, the principle of life. But the most striking utterance on the Spirit is 19<sup>10</sup> ἡ γὰρ μαρτυρία Ἰησοῦ ἐστὶν τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς προφητείας. This means that the Spirit, which, as we have already seen, is possessed by Jesus and bestowed by Him, has also Him as its object. In all the prophets—in all inspired men—what it does is to bear a testimony to Him. All the prophets, who are prophets simply through having the Spirit, are witnesses to Jesus. This agrees not only with the Gospel (15<sup>26</sup> 16<sup>14</sup>), but with such other words of Jesus as Ac 1<sup>8</sup>.

(b) Proceeding to the Gospel of John, we find, as in the Synoptics, that the Spirit is first mentioned in connexion with the baptism of Jesus. 'I have seen,' says the Baptist, 'the Spirit descending as a dove out of heaven, and it abode upon him. And I did not know him, but he who sent me to baptize in water, the same said unto me, On whomsoever thou seest the Spirit descending and abiding on him, the same is he who baptizeth in holy spirit. And I have seen and borne witness that this is the Son of God' (1<sup>32-34</sup>). What strikes us here is the assumption that every reader will know what is meant by 'the Spirit' or by 'holy spirit.' The Gospel is meant for Christians to whom the Spirit is an experience, an experience which they owe to Jesus (for it is He who baptizes with holy spirit); an experience, however, which Jesus in His turn had had (He had been baptized with holy spirit).

It is often said that this idea of the descent of the Spirit on Jesus is only a piece of the Christian tradition, too firmly established for the Evangelist to be able to discard it, but really inconsistent with the conception of Christ in the Prologue. The Word incarnate (it is argued) cannot need to be baptized with the Holy Spirit. To say so is to assume that we know what is meant by the 'Word incarnate' without looking at the story of Jesus. The assumption cannot be justified. A great spiritual experience, according to all the Gospels, is connected with the baptism of Jesus; according to all the Gospels also, it is the experience of receiving the Holy Spirit. If the Evangelist sets this down without embarrassment side by side with his prologue, the presumption is that he felt no inconsistency between them, and that there is none. His idea may rather be that it is the measureless gift of the Spirit in virtue of which Jesus is the Word incarnate. If He had not had this experience at His baptism, and all that flowed from it, He would not have been (or been recognizable as) the Son of God (Jn 1<sup>18</sup>), as God manifest in the flesh, Immanuel.

Possibly part of the Evangelist's interest in the baptism of Jesus lay in this, that in it the symbol and the thing signified coincided. Ordinarily, in the Baptist's preaching, water and the Spirit are contrasted: here the one accompanies the other. This is the type of the Christian baptism with which the author and his readers are familiar. In it water and the Spirit normally coincide. This may seem a not very real idea to us; but we have to consider that even within the first century Christianity was assuming some of the features of a sacramental system, that much in the mental sympathies of the early centuries found this congenial, and that it might seem not unimportant to find at the very beginning of its history its fundamental rite undergone by the Founder, and proved to be not only a form, but a power.

The turning of the water into wine is no doubt a symbol of the whole work of Jesus,—the raising of religion to a higher power, or, more specifically, the elevation of water-baptism into baptism with holy spirit. The Spirit, however, is not mentioned in this connexion, and we get into closer quarters with the subject in ch. 3. There the decisive word is v. 5 'Except a man be born ἐξ ὕδατος καὶ πνεύματος, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.' It is not the mind of Jesus with which we are immediately dealing, but the mind of Jesus as interpreted in the mind of the Evangelist and in the circumstances of his time. Granting this, it seems to the present writer quite impossible to question either a reference to Baptism here or one to the Supper in ch. 6. Nor is the meaning of the reference doubtful. As in the baptism of Jesus, so in Christian baptism, water and spirit are not thought of as in contrast, but as in conjunction. No question is raised as to the conditions under which baptism was administered—conditions of penitence and of faith in Christ on the part of the baptized. These are assumed as familiar to everyone. But under these conditions the new birth is connected unequivocally with the Spirit and with the rite in the administration of which the Spirit is normally present. One of the great words and ideas of the Gospel is 'life.' Sometimes it is spoken of simply as the gift of God. The Father has given to the Son to have life in Himself, and the Son gives life to whom He will (5<sup>26-28</sup>). Here, however, the life is conceived on the analogy of natural life, and the entrance into it is by a birth which depends on the act of God through His Spirit. The life with which we are here concerned is nothing less than the eternal life of God Himself (1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup>), and only God can beget it in the soul. To be born of God and born of the Spirit are the same thing (1 Jn 2<sup>22</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>). When Jesus says, 'That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit' (Jn 3<sup>6</sup>), He means that it is not anything we owe to our fathers and mothers, but only something we owe to God, which quickens the life of God in us. Put with this generality, it might seem as though the Spirit here had no connexion, or no particular connexion, with Christ; it is almost as though we were at the OT stage, at which the Spirit is merely a synonym for God acting. But to say this is to forget the connexion here asserted of the Spirit and the Christian sacrament of baptism. It is through baptism in the name of Jesus that the Spirit is received; and just as the πνεῦμα ἁγιασμοῦ of St. Paul is the Spirit of the Risen Saviour, so here, in the sense of the Evangelist, it is the same Spirit, acting in and through the ordinance of the Risen Saviour, that is the source of all Divine life. As the conversation goes on, too, while the water, as merely symbolical, drops out (it only appears in v. 9), and the Spirit remains by itself (v. 9), attention is directed to the Son of Man, lifted up as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, that whosoever believes may in Him have eternal life. Here we have the ideas introduced which define the Spirit—the experiences through which the experience of the Spirit comes to us with life-giving power. The new birth is mysterious, indeed, in all its aspects; it is like the wind which blows where it will. We cannot tell how it originates or in what it will end. But it is not blankly mysterious, and there is nothing magical in its connexion with the sacrament. It comes into experience along with other things which form part of the same system of reality with it,—the sin-bearing death of Christ, the proclamation of that death, and believing surrender to it. All this is concentrated and symbolized in baptism; and it is because of this that baptism and being born of the Spirit are represented as coincident. Baptism is a kind of focal point in which all the quickening powers of God in Christ crucified tell upon the soul under the conditions of penitence and faith which make it effective. The life that comes to us in this experience is the life of the Spirit, the Divine life; but quite definitely also it is a life which we owe to the death of Christ. (To apply this conception of baptismal regeneration to the case of infants is to desert the ground of experience, on which the Apostle speaks throughout, for what is to us an unconditioned voû: 'As no man NT gives us no assistance whatever).

At the close of ch. 3 we revert, apparently in words of the Baptist, really in words of the Evangelist, to the idea of the Spirit as bestowed on Jesus by God. He whom God sent speaks the words of God; He does this, and can do it, because God gives not the Spirit by measure to Him (3<sup>20</sup>). Here the idea is like that in 1 Co 2<sup>12</sup>: 'As no man knows the things of a man save the spirit of a man which is in him, even so the things of God no man knows, but the Spirit of God.' It is in virtue of having this Spirit, not partially but completely, that Jesus speaks the words of God; in distinction from those who had only partial and transient illumination. He has received the Spirit in His fullness and is the Word incarnate. To have the Spirit in this sense and measure, to be the Word made flesh, and to have all things put into His hand by the Father (3<sup>24</sup>, 5<sup>20</sup>), are one and the same thing.

The absence of any allusion to the Spirit in ch. 4 (where Jesus offers the 'living water') and in ch. 5 (where we are told that the Son gives life to whom He will: with σοφία, v. 21, cf. St. Paul's σοφία σοφιστῶν, 1 Co 15<sup>10</sup>, and Jn 6<sup>63</sup>) is very remarkable; but it has an exact parallel in the complete absence of the Spirit from Ro 6. When we come to ch. 6 it is different. The reference here to the Supper is as unmistakable as that to Baptism in ch. 3. The discourse starts from the bread of life, but the general idea of feeding on Christ or living on Him by faith, is specified as it proceeds, in agreement with the ritual of the Supper, into eating His flesh and drinking His blood. In the most intense and vehement expressions of this kind, indeed, there is never anything more than in v. 27 ('He that believeth hath eternal life') or in v. 27 ('He that eateth me shall live by me'). It is not only conceivable, but highly probable, especially in view of a passage like 1 Co 10, that when this chapter was written materialistic and superstitious ideas about the sacrament of the Supper were already current in the Church, and that the Evangelist has the express design of correcting them. He has no hesitation in using the boldest liturgical language: he speaks of eating the flesh and drinking the blood of the Son of Man in a tone which seems almost intended to challenge, if not to defy, intelligence; he recognizes by doing so that only language of poetic intensity like this, to which it is absurd to say that a symbol is only a symbol, is appropriate in worship; yet just as in ch. 3 water is mentioned only once, and the Spirit afterwards spoken of independently, so here any risk of religious materialism is swept away in the words, 'It is the spirit which gives life . . . the words that I have spoken to you are spirit and are life' (v. 26). There is no depreciation of the sacrament here any more than in ch. 3, and no exaltation of the words of Jesus as opposed to it; but there is a safeguard against the superstitious abuse of it. It is nothing material, no res sacramenti, on which the believer depends for eternal life. No doubt Christ, the Christ who speaks of His flesh as true food and His blood as true drink (v. 26), is, in all the truth of His humanity and His Passion, the meat and drink of the soul, and the believer realizes this in the sacrament; but it is not through the material elements that Christ sustains spiritual life; if His words are read in this sense, their character is misconceived; they are taken out of the region of spirit and life to which they belong, and in which alone Christ vivifies men.

One of the most characteristic passages on the Spirit is 7<sup>27</sup>. On the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles, Jesus stands in the Temple and cries, 'If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink.' The words are on a level with those in ch. 4, in which He promises the living water to the woman at the well. But here Jesus goes further. 'He that believeth in me,' He adds, 'as said the Scripture, Out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.' Without discussing the reference to 'Scripture,' what does this mean? The Evangelist himself interprets the words: 'This he said of the Spirit which those who believed on him were to receive, for as yet there was no Spirit (οὐκ ἦν πνεῦμα), for Jesus was not yet glorified.' This is clearly written from the standpoint of experience and fulfilment. After Jesus was glorified through death and resurrection, those who believed had experience of His power such as they had never had before. They had owed Him much while they were with Him on earth; He had in a sense satisfied their own spiritual needs (6<sup>27</sup>); He had given them the bread of life to eat and the living water to drink. But now He did more. He came to them in a power which enabled them to be witnesses to Him; others obtained the Spirit through them; the living water which He had given them overflowed from them as from an inexhaustible spring. Whether this is what Jesus meant or not, it is true; it answers to the facts of the case as the whole of the NT reveals them. Pentecost was inconceivable to the Evangelist except as the sequel to the Passion and Exaltation of Jesus; the possession of the Spirit which is the characteristic of the new era is determined in point of fact by these antecedents. We have seen the same connexion of ideas already in the chapters on the sacraments: the Passion of Christ is as unmistakably present in 3<sup>15</sup> and 6<sup>52-53</sup> as in 7<sup>26</sup>. It seems very gratuitous, then, to argue with Wendt that the Evangelist has mistaken Jesus, and that our Lord means no more here than in ch. 4.

The Johannine conception of the Spirit comes out most fully in chs. 14-16. The Spirit may be said to be the main subject in the discourses in which Jesus prepares the disciples for His departure. All the difficulties connected with the words of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel have to be allowed for here; to draw the line between what was literally said by Jesus at the moment and what is due to the commentary of experience interpreting His remembered words, might have seemed to the Evangelist himself not only unreal but unspiritual. The following points may be noted.

(1) The first hint of the future suggests the surpassing greatness of the experiences which the Spirit was to bring. "He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go to the Father. And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son" (14:12<sup>a</sup>). The Spirit is not yet named, but we can see that it is in the writer's mind. The overwhelming experiences of the Apostolic age, the great movement then inaugurated, the new sense of the power of prayer as it takes hold of the name of Jesus, cast beforehand the shadow of their coming in these amazing words. This is a promise of the Spirit, though the name is not mentioned; and indeed nothing short of their fulfilment in the Apostolic age could have enabled the writer to recall such words, or to believe them, or to have any idea of what they might mean.

(2) Immediately after, the language becomes more precise, and the Spirit is expressly mentioned 14:16<sup>b</sup>. "If you love me, you will keep my commandments. And I will ask the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may be with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth; which the world cannot receive, because it does not see or know it (αὐτό). You know it; for it dwells with you, and shall be in you. I will not leave you desolate: I come unto you." What strikes us first here is the new name given to the Spirit, ἀλλος παράκλητος. It is indeed only the name which is new: in idea it answers closely to the only promise of the Spirit which we find in the Synoptic Gospels. These older writers (apart from Lk 11:13, which is no real exception) only speak of the Spirit as a future possession of the disciples in Mk 13:11, Lk 12:12, Mt 10:20. The situation contemplated is that in which the disciples are brought before judges and kings to bear testimony to their Master. That is the hour in which they need an advocatus, a counsel, a παράκλητος; and Jesus promises that they will have one in the Spirit. The expression 'another advocate' implies that the disciples have already had experience of one, namely, of Jesus Himself. As long as He was with them their strength was reinforced from Him; and when He goes, then, in response to His intercession, His place is taken by the Spirit. There is another power with them now which does for them what Jesus did before. Yet is it really another? In 1 Jn 2:1 it is Jesus who is the παράκλητος, even after Pentecost; and even here (Jn 14:18) He says, 'I come unto you.' The presence of the Spirit is Jesus' own presence in spirit; we are reminded again of 2 Co 3:3 and of Mt 28:20. In the spirit Jesus will be with His own for ever, will dwell by them and be in them. What is meant at this point by calling the Spirit the Spirit of truth (Jn 14:17) is not quite clear, but some contrast is implied between it and the world (cf. 1 Co 2:14). The world, as Plato might have said, is the great sophist; it is a realm of deceptions and illusions, by which the mind of the disciple, were he left to himself, might easily be put at fault; but in the Spirit the disciple has a safeguard against its subtleties and sophistications; he is kept in the truth which sanctifies because it is one with God, truth as truth is in Jesus (17:17, Eph 4:21). There is no definition here of the relation of the Spirit to Jesus or to the Father, though it might be said that the Spirit is the alter ego of Jesus. Only, it is the Son who asks the Father and the Father who gives the Spirit; the three are one as they confront the disciples, co-operating for their salvation. In this Gospel, as everywhere in the NT, the Spirit belongs to the same region as the Father and the Son; it is included in what a Christian means when he speaks of 'God.' This is the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity; no man means all that a Christian means by 'God' unless he puts into 'God' all that is meant by the separate terms 'Father,' 'Son,' and 'Spirit.' This is a proposition which is securely based on experience, and which is implied in NT experience from the day of Pentecost onward (see Ac 2:33, 1 Co 12:4-6, Eph 2:14, Jn 14:26). More particularly, too, it may be said that the Spirit in the Fourth Gospel belongs to the Kingdom of God and to the religion of revelation; to the world it is unknown. And within the Messianic realm the full experience of it is ethically conditioned: 'If ye love me, ye will keep my commandments, and I will ask the Father,' etc.

(3) The next reference to the Spirit (14:26) is still more definite. 'The Paraclete, the Holy Spirit, which the Father shall send in my name, he (ἐκεῖνος) shall teach you all things, and shall bring to your remembrance all things that I said unto you.' Both the masculine pronoun (ἐκεῖνος) and the function ('he shall teach') represent the Spirit as personal, with a definiteness hitherto unnoticed. Not that suggestions of this are wanting elsewhere (cf. esp. 1 Co 12:13), and, of course, it must be in the last resort meaningless to speak of the spirit of a personal God as itself impersonal; but very often the meaning is covered by the idea of an impulse communicated by God, whereas here the personalizing is much more definite and conscious. The function of teaching or revealing, which, as we have seen above, has but a small space and a mainly eschatological reference in St. Paul, is far more prominent in St. John, and far more decisively defined by relation to the historical Saviour. The Spirit does not teach independently, but brings to remembrance all things that Jesus said to the Twelve. Ἐπισημαίει is a word on which it is worth while to dwell. The Evangelist gives us two illustrations of things which the disciples remembered after the Spirit came, and which received a new meaning as they rose in the spiritual light. When He rose from the dead, they remembered the word that He spoke about destroying the temple and rebuilding it in three days; it had slept in their memories, an inert, meaningless, and therefore forgotten thing; now it leapt into meaning, and they had a vivid recollection of it (22:1). Cf. 12:1 of the circumstances of the Triumphal Entry. We cannot think of these two illustrations without asking, What is involved in the spiritually quickened action of memory in such cases? Something is recalled, but it is not only recalled, it is for the first time understood; it is remembered because a key to it has been found; it is not only the dream, so to speak, which is recalled, but the dream and its interpretation together. Where events have deeply interested and impressed men, as the words and works of Jesus did the disciples, and especially where they have initiated great spiritual movements in which their significance has become apparent, memory cannot be insulated so as to perceive them in a purely neutral or 'objective' fashion. They are remembered in the heart as well as in the brain; they are remembered with an ardour which contemplates, explores, makes discoveries, worships; and when they are reproduced in the Spirit, it is not the unintelligent and misleading truth of an amateur photograph with which we are confronted, but something like the work of a great painter, something which is truer in a manner than the most literal recollection would be. It is not open to question that the Fourth Gospel is, in this sense, a 'spiritual' Gospel; it is the decisive proof that the words of Jesus in 14<sup>26</sup> have been fulfilled. On the relation of Father, Son, and Spirit, this passage only confirms what has been said above under (2).

(4) In 15<sup>26</sup> many have sought for more than it contains. Here it is the Son who sends the Spirit from the Father, and the Spirit is described as that which proceeds from the Father. To pretend that we can distinguish between the 'procession' of the Spirit from the Father and the 'generation' of the Son by the Father, is only to invite Gibbon's sneer about 'the science, or rather the language of metaphysics.' The really important point here is that which has already emerged in Rev 19<sup>10</sup> (see above): ἐκεῖνος μαρτυροῦντες περὶ ἐμοῦ. Christ is the Spirit's subject. The Spirit is the Spirit of truth because it bears witness to Him who can say, 'I am the truth' (14<sup>6</sup>). The truth with which it deals is that which is incarnate in Christ, the very same truth to which the Apostles also are to bear witness, because they have been with Him from the beginning (15<sup>27</sup>).

(5) The climax of our Lord's teaching in this line is reached in 16<sup>26</sup>. Here Jesus announces the paradoxical truth that it is expedient for the disciples that He should leave them, because the coming of the Paraclete is expedient. There are natural analogies to this: often there is a truer appreciation, even of a person who has been intimately known and loved, after death than before, a more adequate possession in memory than there was in actual intercourse. But more is meant here than that the disciples will get a better view of Jesus at a distance. It is Jesus Himself who is to send them the Paraclete, and He can do it, as He has already said (7<sup>26</sup>), only on the ground of His death and exaltation. When He does do it, they have not lost Him, they really possess Him in the power in which He lives and reigns. The functions of the Spirit are here twofold, according as they have for their object (a) the world (vv. 8-11), (β) the Apostles themselves (vv. 12-15). As for (a), it is the Spirit's function to convict the world, to reach its conscience with demonstration, in regard to certain subjects. This conviction is not wrought in an immediate supernatural way, but through the ministry of the Apostles; it is to them the Spirit comes, and through their preaching the world is convicted. It is convicted of sin, because men do not believe in Christ. This is perhaps the most general statement on sin in Scripture: it consists at bottom in refusing to believe in Christ. If men did believe in Him, sin in all its kinds would disappear. Conviction of it cannot be produced by denunciation, or satire, or clever exposures, or by what is miscalled knowledge of human nature; it can be produced only by witnessing to Christ in the power of the Spirit. The Spirit also produces in the world a conviction of conscience with regard to righteousness. This is connected with the exaltation of Jesus: 'I go to the Father and ye see me no longer.' When this exaltation is brought home to men's minds with the power of the Spirit (Ac 4<sup>33</sup>), they realize that there is such a thing as righteousness, and that the supreme power in the world is on its side. In a sense it might be said that it was easier to believe in righteousness when men saw it present in the world, incarnate in Jesus Christ the Righteous; but it is a more solemn sense of its reality and supremacy that rises in the heart when, through the power of the Spirit, we realize that that righteous One is seated at the right hand of the Father. The third point in regard to which the Spirit convicts the world is judgment. This may be said to combine the other two. Sin and righteousness are at issue with each other, and the Apostolic ministry, in the power of the Spirit, convinces men that in Christ a final judgment has been pronounced upon the issue. The protagonists in the great cause—Christ and the Prince of this world—have confronted each other decisively, and the Prince of this world has been judged (16<sup>21</sup>, cf. 12<sup>31</sup>). A mind unenlightened or unconvinced by the Spirit might easily hold the opposite, and, looking to the life and death of Jesus, infer the impotence of the good, its condemnation, as futile and ineffective, by the nature of things; but even in the Cross of Jesus what the Spirit-taught man sees is the condemnation of evil, the sentence which God has passed and will finally execute on the Prince of this world, the verdict of the supreme tribunal on behalf of the good. Sin, righteousness, and judgment are abstract ideas, and come home to men in their reality only when in the power of the Spirit they are interpreted in their connexion with Christ. In these verses (16<sup>23-25</sup>) the main idea involved in the Spirit is that of power: it is what is required to make the Apostles' message effective (cf. Ac 4<sup>33</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>4</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>21</sup>). But when we pass to (β) vv. 12-15, the main idea is that of illumination. The Spirit is conceived as giving the disciples that comprehension of Christ which, according to St. Paul also (see 2 Co 3), is necessary to make a man a fit minister of the new covenant, not of letter but of spirit. Both kinds of sufficiency—that of power and that of illumination—are of God, and specifically of the Spirit. If vv. 8-11 state the dependence of the Evangelist on the Spirit, vv. 12-15 state the dependence of the theologian on the Spirit. The idea underlying the latter passage is that of v. 12: Jesus is greater than His words. When the time comes for Him to leave His disciples, many things remain unuttered. Many things are involved in His presence in the world, and especially in His impending Passion, which He understands, but they do not and cannot: are these things to be lost for ever? Is the significance of Jesus to be so far thrown away? This is not what Jesus contemplates. On the contrary, the Spirit which He promises as the Spirit of truth will have this as His very task, to initiate them into the whole meaning of Jesus. He will lead them, not into all truth, but into all the truth—that is, the truth which is embodied in Him in all its dimensions. The new point which is emphasized here about the Spirit is that He shall not speak of Himself (ἀπ' ἑαυτοῦ, i.e. of His own motion, self-prompted or independently). Many scholars, in reading what is told of spiritual gifts in Acts or the Pauline Epistles, have felt that the early Church ran a real risk. Who could tell whether the Spirit, under the impulse of which men uttered themselves, did not sometimes speak of itself, and say things which may have been in a vague sense πνευματικά, but were not in any true sense Christian? We have seen already how St. Paul met this danger. Partly (as in 1 Th 5<sup>19-22</sup>, 1 Co 14) he provides for the control of 'spiritual' utterances by the gift of discernment or by the common sense of the Christian society. Partly (as in 1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>) he lays down a dogmatic criterion of what is genuinely Christian. This latter course is followed also in 1 Jn. (4<sup>5</sup>): the spirit which is really of God is that which confesses Jesus Christ as come in flesh, in contrast with a more 'spiritual' kind of spirit which did not allow the heavenly Christ to ally Himself permanently, and especially by birth and death, to our humanity. But what we have here in the Gospel is really more searching, and goes to the root of the matter. The Spirit, personally as it is here conceived, is not a pure spontaneity; it is always historically prompted and historically controlled. What vindicates any utterance as spiritual is that it is a testimony to the historical Saviour. What the Spirit hears—all that He hears—He shall speak. It is not easy to say how the Spirit is conceived as hearing, but the main point is clear: hearing precedes speaking, and limits and controls it. In particular, it is said of the Spirit, 'He shall announce to you the things that are coming.' Westcott, interpreting τὰ ἐρχόμενα on the analogy of the Messianic ὁ ἐρχόμενος, and thinking of the needs of the Apostles at the stage of transition between the old and the new era, finds the main reference in this to be to the constitution of the Christian Church: the Spirit will enable the Apostles to understand (by anticipating?) the new age on which they are about to enter. Godet is inclined to render the words in a more prophetic sense, and regards them as having their fulfilment in the Apocalypse. This is too precise: perhaps if we said 'in apocalypses' (such as are suggested by 1 Co 2<sup>9</sup>, 14<sup>6, 26</sup>, Eph 1<sup>12</sup>) it would be nearer the mark. It is a special function of the Spirit to animate hope by unveiling the future (H. Holtzmann, Handcom. ad loc.). But whatever the special reference in τὰ ἐρχόμενα may be, the work of the Spirit on this side is summed up in the words ἐκείνη τὴν ἡμέραν. In every sense of the terms the Spirit's work is to testify to Christ—to what He is, to His words, to what He has done and suffered, to what He is to achieve. In this His function, if not His being, as the Spirit of truth is exhausted. And to say that He uses only what is Christ's is not to narrow the range or the means of His action; for, as the Speaker goes on to say, 'All that the Father hath is mine.' All that belongs to the truth of God's Fatherhood is revealed in the Son, and all that is revealed in the Son is interpreted and vivified by the Spirit. The most striking feature of this passage is, after all, that with which it opens: 'I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now,' with the implicit promise that they should hear the Spirit say them when they were able to bear it. The Apostolic reading of the truth, as truth is in Jesus, is perfectly conscious that it goes beyond the σπῆλαινα ῥεῖρα which Jesus spoke on earth; but the Apostles would have felt it strangely unreal if they had been asked to cut down their testimony to Jesus to what Jesus Himself had expressly put into words. There were many things which circumstances made it impossible for Him to put into words—many things which it was rather for them to say about Him than for Him to say about Himself; but when they said these things, under the guiding and quickening impulse of His Spirit, they had no doubt that they were declaring the truth of Christ. It was a proof of 'Christ speaking in them,' as St. Paul puts it (2 Co 13<sup>3</sup>). Once they had listened to His voice on earth, now they heard Him in their hearts interpret all He had been, and between the voices they made no distinction. A great part of the peculiarity of the Fourth Gospel is covered if we say that the word of the Risen Saviour, speaking by His Spirit in the heart of the Apostle, is presented as though it had been actually spoken on earth. And, little as this may agree with our ideas of a purely historical narrative, it is a precarious operation to set aside such a testimony, based on Christian experience and contemplated by Christ, as though it could be merely irrelevant to the Christian religion.

(c) The Spirit in the First Epistle of John does not call for separate treatment. One important passage has been already mentioned (4<sup>2</sup>): another (5<sup>6</sup>) in which the Spirit and the sacraments are again mentioned in conjunction is to be interpreted on the analogy of ch. 3 and ch. 6 in the Gospel (see the present writer's Death of Christ, p. 277 ff.).

The NT hardly invites to any discussion of the metaphysics of the Spirit. Of course, it is the Spirit of God, and Divine. It is part of the one Divine causality which—as Father, Son, and Spirit—confronts the sinful world, and works in unison for its redemption. It belongs unmistakably to the sphere of the Divine, not of the human. Yet there is something in man which is akin to it, and it is through it that God dwells in man, and makes him partaker of the Divine nature. As the Spirit of God, it cannot be truly thought of as impersonal, and yet it is far more frequently spoken of in a way which is satisfied by the conception of a Divine impulsion or stimulation of human thought, feeling, or oration, than as a distinct personality. This is so even in writers who, like St. Paul (1 Co 12<sup>11</sup>) and St. John (16<sup>14</sup>), distinctly have the latter mode of representing the Spirit. Certainly the Spirit is not so unmistakably thought of as a person as is the Father or the Son. We never, for example, find the Spirit in the salutations of the Epistles: 'Grace to you and peace from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ' is never supplemented by 'and from the Holy Spirit.' Neither do we ever find the Spirit united with the Father and the Son in prayer, as, e.g., in 1 Th 3<sup>11</sup> 'Now our God and Father himself and our Lord Jesus Christ direct our way to you.' Even in the Apostolic benediction (2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>) it may fairly be questioned whether the Spirit is conceived as personally as the Lord Jesus Christ and God. As for attempts to distinguish within the Trinity the relation of the Spirit to the Father from that of the Son to the Father as 'procession' from 'generation,' the present writer can only repeat that they have no reality which he can apprehend. But the NT and Christian experience are at one in teaching that the Christian conception of God includes all that is meant by Father, Son, and Spirit; and as the omission of what is meant by any of these terms leaves the Christian conception unsatisfied, it may fairly be said that the doctrine of the Trinity is the fundamental doctrine of our faith. The Father, the Son, and the Spirit in their unity constitute the God whom we know as the God of our salvation.

HOLY THING (τὸ ἅγιον).—1. Lk 1<sup>35</sup> AV 'Therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God.' RV prefers to render, 'Wherefore also that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God.' On the expression τὸ γεννώμενον cf. Mt 1<sup>20</sup> τὸ . . . γεννηθῆναι, and for the use of ἅγιος applied to our Lord, see art. HOLY ONE, HOLINESS.

2. Mt 7<sup>9</sup> τὸ ἅγιον τὸ ἐξου τῶν κωλι.—τὸ ἅγιον is usually taken to refer here to sacrificial meat or the provision of the priests. So Lange, Alford, and most Comm.; but Meyer objects to this as requiring to be more precisely designated, and urges that Christ has in view 'the holy' in general, and that what is meant by this is the holy, because Divine, evangelic truth by which men are converted. The fundamental idea of ἅγιος is consecration: τὸ ἅγιον, that which is consecrated or set apart to the service of God; its general opposite would be βέβηλος, 'profane.' (See Westcott on He 7<sup>26</sup> and literature of HOLY ONE generally).

In Christian writings we find τὰ ἅγια used for the gifts as offered in the offertory or prothesis, i.e. the act of setting forth the oblation, and also for the consecrated gifts; thus in the Liturgy of the Nestorians we find the direction: 'And when the people have received the holy thing, the priest,' etc. (See Brightman, Liturgies Eastern and Western, pp. 122, 301, 379, 388). J. B. BRISTOW.

HOME.—

1. The expressions bearing the sense of 'home' are: (1) oikos (Mt 8<sup>1</sup>; also Jn 14<sup>2</sup>, where we may prefer 'home' to 'house,' the rendering of the EV); (2) oikos (Mk 5<sup>10</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup>, 26<sup>10</sup>, 15<sup>10</sup>; also Jn 7<sup>28</sup> EV; in the section concerning the adulteress); (3) oikos (Jn 19<sup>17</sup>, cf. also 11<sup>1</sup> and 16<sup>22</sup>). As for (1) and (2), where we have the ordinary term 'house' employed, it is to be noted that a house naturally becomes a 'home' under the associations of family life and affection; cf. the corresponding use of μα. (3), as a use of oikos, illustrates a tendency to abbreviation and attenuation of phrasing in such connexions as this. oikos, with the force of the possessive pronoun (= oikos, leuros), appears in NT as in the LXX, the OT, Apocrypha, and in such writers as Philo and Josephus (Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr., p. 123 f.). Cf. in this particular use, our expression 'at his father's,' and the attenuated Fr. phrase chez lui. The Vulg. in Jn 19<sup>17</sup> has the strict parallel in sua.

2. The Gospels afford us a few glimpses of domestic interiors, forming a part of the simple background of the life of Jesus. We see the common domestic shadows of sickness and death beclouding the home of Simon Peter (Mk 1<sup>30</sup>), of Jairus (Mk 5<sup>23</sup>), of the Roman officer (Mt 8<sup>9</sup>), of Lazarus and his sisters (Jn 11), and of others. Homely joys are illustrated in the marriage at Cana (Jn 2), in the sojourn of Jesus as a guest in the home at Bethany (Lk 10<sup>38</sup>, Jn 12<sup>1-2</sup>). Hospitality and entertaining are again exemplified in the case of Levi (Lk 5<sup>28</sup>) and of Simon the Pharisee (Lk 7<sup>36</sup>). The ever-fresh interest attendant on the birth of a child as a notable incident in home life finds illustration in the story of the birth of John the Baptist (Lk 1<sup>27-28</sup>). We have sight, too, of the sumptuous domestic establishments of the luxurious rich (Lk 16<sup>19-20</sup>), in contrast with the simple abodes of the mass of the people and the condition of the homeless poor.

No people ever prized the sanctities and blessings of the home more than the Jews. Their wonderful legislation bearing on domestic affairs, the sentiments that find expression in Pss 127, 128, and in the panegyric of the Good Wife (Pr 31<sup>10-31</sup>), the importance attaching to the family as the unit of national life, all bear witness to this. The whole system of feasts and fasts, joyous and solemn, including the weekly Sabbaths and the yearly commemorations and seasons,—a system imparting so much colour and interest to the life of the people—also strongly tended to deepen the domestic sentiment, the home being to so large an extent the theatre for the prescribed rites and observances.

The general conditions of Jewish home life in our Lord's day offered marked points of contrast with what largely obtains among Western peoples. The greatest simplicity in the matter of meals and clothing, and the fewness of other wants, contributed to an easier condition of life in general. Grinding poverty was by no means common. Every man had a trade, and every father had to teach his son a trade; but a man was not obliged to toil long hours for a bare living. There was considerable leisure, and the Palestinian Jew had much time for contemplation, like the Arab of today. The man was often abroad in public places, frequenting discussions in the Temple and elsewhere, and mingling with his fellows. He was also charged with certain religious duties and observances from which women were exempt. The place of the woman, on the other hand, was pre-eminently in the home. (Note that one of the things desiderated for women in Tit 2<sup>3</sup> is that they should be οικουγενες). In this respect the Jews shared the sentiment of other Oriental peoples; but the lot of the Jewish woman was much superior to that of non-Jewish women in the East, and her position in the home was better than that of the Roman matron of that period. A serious menace to the home, however, existed in the conditions obtaining as regards divorce. We know how Jesus dealt with this great abuse of easy divorce (Mk 10<sup>2-12</sup> = Mt 19<sup>2-9</sup>). Some of the Jewish Rabbis also (as Shammai) set themselves against the laxity that had grown up. On the whole, it is probable that general practice was much better than current precepts. A Talmudic saying is significant.—The altar itself weeps over the man who puts away his wife' (Gittin 106, Sanhed. 22a).

The home as a factor in education was of the greatest importance. In our Lord's time there was probably in addition only a school at the synagogue, taught by the hazzan. A religious atmosphere surrounded the Jewish child from the first, and the mother was the earliest teacher. As soon as the child could speak, his mother taught him a verse of the Torah (on the unity of God; and on the election of Israel). See art. CHILDHOOD.

3. All interest in this subject, so far as the Gospels are concerned, is focussed in the home at Nazareth, where Jesus spent nearly the whole of His life. Actual information as to the life in that home is of the scantiest; but there can be no question that the best traditions of the Jewish home at its best were all exemplified there. There could never have been a better mother-teacher than Mary. The round of religious observances and duties would not fall of scrupulous performance. The conditions of the home itself were no doubt of the simplest and lowliest kind; but an abundance of human affection was an ample compensation. There was nothing to cripple or blight in any way the wonderful young life that was there unfolding. There is room also for interesting reflexion as to the history and experience of that family circle at Nazareth during all the years that Jesus was a member of it. The great crises of all domestic life—births, marriages, deaths—must surely, some or all of them, have marked the history of the home of Jesus during those years. As we think of Joseph, who, as it is commonly agreed, appears to have died at an early period, and of our Lord's 'brothers' and 'sisters' (Mk 3<sup>21</sup> 6<sup>3</sup>), there is every reason to conclude that within the circle of the home Jesus had the experience of human bereavement and sorrow, and also of rejoicing, as His very own.

4. From the day of His leaving Nazareth for the Jordan, Jesus ceased to have any settled home. 'The Son of Man,' He once said, 'hath not where to lay his head' (Mt 8<sup>20</sup> || Lk 9<sup>58</sup>). It is true that this saying is not to be taken too literally (see Bruce, With Open Face, ch. ix.), for Jesus would be welcome in the houses of many friends, as He was notably in the home at Bethany. Still, during His public ministry He surrendered all the quiet joys of the old home life at Nazareth, and often in the course of His constant journeys must have had to endure the hardships and privations of a wanderer. When He called His first disciples to follow Him (Mt 4<sup>18-22</sup> || Mk 1<sup>16-20</sup>, Lk 5<sup>27-28</sup>), He was summoning them to a life of homelessness resembling His own. He made readiness to leave home, with all its possessions and endearments, a test of fitness to be His true disciple (Lk 9<sup>57-62</sup> || Mt 8<sup>19-22</sup>, cf. Mt 19<sup>21</sup>). And though He sent one home who wished to follow Him (Mk 5<sup>19</sup> || Lk 8<sup>39</sup>), He taught that, in principle at least, His disciples should be willing to forsake not only house and lands, but parents and brethren and sisters, and even wife and children, for the Kingdom of God's sake (Lk 18<sup>28-30</sup> || Mt 19<sup>29</sup>, Mk 10<sup>29-31</sup>). J. S. CLEMENS.

HONESTY (the subst. does not occur in the Gospels; the adj. 'honest' is found in both AV and RV of Lk 8<sup>18</sup> as a rendering of καλός=Lat. honestus, 'noble,' 'excellent.' See Hastings' DB s.vv.).—This virtue does not take the prominent place in the teaching of Jesus Christ that it assumes in most systems of ethics. Our Lord never discusses or enjoins it. The reasons for His seeming neglect of the subject may be (1) that there was no dispute about it in His day, the Sixth commandment being taken for granted as universally binding, (2) that He went beneath the precept to the principles underlying it when (a) He discouraged covetousness (Mk 7<sup>22</sup>, Lk 12<sup>22</sup>), and (b) He bade His disciples do to others as they would that others should do to them (Mt 7<sup>12</sup>=Lk 6<sup>31</sup>), and (3) that He treated considerations of property as of secondary importance, so that when it was a question of suffering from dishonesty—not committing it, He advised submission (Mt 5<sup>39</sup>); and when the question of the division of an inheritance was submitted to Him, He dismissed it as not within His province, and that with a tone of contempt, as though such a matter had not the importance people usually attached to it (Lk 12<sup>58</sup>). In life we see that dishonesty generally indicates a radical rottenness of character. It cannot be dealt with on prudential lines such as are indicated by the proverb, 'Honesty is the best policy.' By creating the Christian character, Jesus cuts out the roots of dishonesty in deceit, treachery, and greed; and implants those principles of truth and honour of which honesty is one of the natural fruits. The word rendered 'honest' in Lk 8<sup>18</sup> (καλός) really means 'fair,' 'sound,' 'excellent.' In the Synoptics, when Jesus speaks of a thief (κλέπτης), it is not to denounce his wickedness, but in one place (Mt 6<sup>19-20</sup>, cf. Lk 12<sup>28</sup>) to warn His disciples against making treasures of earthly things which thieves may steal or moths corrupt; and in another place (Mt 24<sup>43</sup>, cf. Lk 12<sup>28</sup>) to compare the suddenness and unexpectedness of His advent with the way in which a thief breaks into a house at night. In Jn 10<sup>8</sup>, the false leaders of the people are compared to 'thieves and robbers' who ravage the flock, in contrast to the Good Shepherd who tends it. In the parable of the Good Samaritan the subject of neighbourly kindness had fallen among robbers (Lk 10<sup>30</sup>), whose excessive cruelty is described; but the point of the parable is not in their conduct, which is referred to only in order to show the depth of misery in which their victim was found. Jesus also refers to robbers, i.e. brigands (λαῖται), when He denounces the Jews for making God's house 'a den of robbers' (Mk 11<sup>17</sup>; RV; cf. Mt 21<sup>13</sup>, Lk 19<sup>47</sup>), quoting Jer 7<sup>11</sup>. Here it is not common dishonesty that rouses our Lord's anger so much as the desecration of the house of God.

When the Jewish authorities came with an armed troop to take Jesus, He expostulated with them, asking if they had come out against a robber (λαῖται, Mk 14<sup>6</sup>; cf. Mt 26<sup>55</sup>, Lk 22<sup>67</sup>). In none of these cases does Jesus lay any stress on the question of dishonesty, the occasion not bringing it into discussion. His merciful words to one of the malefactors crucified with Him (Lk 23<sup>42</sup>) cannot be taken as throwing light on His views of dishonesty and its pardonableness, because the man was probably a brigand insurgent and a follower of Barabbas, not a mere thief. Still it does indicate that gross sins, among which stealing may be included, can be forgiven in those who turn to Christ. The one strong condemnation of theft in the Gospels is St. John's scornful description of Judas as 'a thief'

In the parable of the Unjust Steward it might appear that Jesus was commending an act of dishonesty. This man having wasted his master's goods and being called to account, foresees that he will lose his situation. Accordingly, in order to have some homes to go to for a refuge, he buys the friendship of his master's debtors by reducing the amount of their debts (Lk 16<sup>1-9</sup>). On the surface, at all events, this appears to be a fraudulent action; and yet the steward is commended for it, and held up to the disciples as an example for them to follow. It is to be observed, however, that the commendation comes from the rich man, not from Christ. The master in the parable commends his steward. Wellhausen—in opposition to Jülicher—scribes v. 8 to Jesus, citing as parallel Lk 13<sup>2</sup>. According to this view, εὐλογεῖ here means 'the Lord'—i.e. Christ, not 'his Lord,' as in AV and RV. But against that rendering is the fact that the rich man is called the steward's 'lord' throughout the parable. The natural conclusion is that the 'lord' referred to in v. 8 is the 'lord' previously mentioned in v. 2. Thus, as Dr. Plummer remarks, the argument, like that implied by the parable of the Unjust Judge, is a fortiori. Even a worthless, dishonest steward is commended by his master, at least for shrewdness; much more, then, should a true servant of Christ act wisely. Of course, it is only the prudence, not the dishonesty, that is commended. This parable is an extreme instance for the rule that in any parable the main lessons only should be sought, and not its details allegorized. Possibly we should accept the suggestion that the estate was farmed to the steward, who rack-rented the tenants and dishonestly appropriated the excess, so that his hasty reduction of their debts was only bringing them down to the right amount, that which the owner had been receiving; but of this there is no evidence. Mr. Latham put forward the view that the steward had been too scrupulous in studying the interests of his employers, to the neglect of the rights of the tenants, whom he ground down cruelly; and he took the parable as a warning against unwise zeal for God at the cost of unkindness to men on whom in the name of God too heavy requirements are laid (Pastor Pastorum, pp. 386-398). W. F. ADKNEY.

HONEY.—Honey is mentioned very frequently in the OT; twenty times in the proverbial expression 'a land flowing with milk and honey' (Ex 3<sup>8-17</sup>, 13<sup>33</sup>, Lv 20<sup>24</sup>, Nu 13<sup>37</sup>, 14<sup>8</sup>, 16<sup>13</sup>, Dt 6<sup>3</sup>, 11<sup>9</sup>, 26<sup>10</sup>, 15<sup>27</sup>, 27<sup>31</sup>, Jos 5<sup>6</sup>, Jer 11<sup>5</sup>, 32<sup>22</sup>, Ezk 20<sup>6-10</sup>); or in other connexions, either literally, as a product of the soil and as food (Gn 43<sup>11</sup>, Dt 8<sup>8</sup>, 32<sup>13</sup>, Jg 14<sup>6-12</sup>, 1 S 14<sup>22</sup>, 2 S 4<sup>2</sup>, 5<sup>17</sup>, 1 K 14<sup>3</sup>, 2 K 18<sup>28</sup>, 2 Ch 31<sup>5</sup>, Job 20<sup>17</sup>, Ps 81<sup>16</sup>, Is 7<sup>15-22</sup>, Jer 41<sup>8</sup>, Ezk 16<sup>13-19</sup>, Sir 11<sup>3</sup>, 39<sup>27</sup>); or figuratively, as a term of comparison for sweetness (Ex 16<sup>31</sup>, Ps 119<sup>103</sup>, Pr 5<sup>16</sup>, 16<sup>24</sup>, 24<sup>10</sup>, 25<sup>16</sup>, 27, Ca 4<sup>11</sup>, 5<sup>1</sup>, Ezk 3<sup>3</sup>, Sir 24<sup>29-49</sup>). On the other hand, it is very rarely named in the NT, and especially in the Gospels. There is no direct evidence that the Jews were acquainted with any other honey than that of wild bees. Yet the fact that in 2 Ch 31<sup>5</sup> honey is included among the products of which the first-fruits were to be offered, would appear to represent it as an object of culture, and the mention of 'wild honey' as part of the food of John the Baptist (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>6</sup> [Syr. Sin., perhaps under the influence of Dt 32<sup>13</sup> and Ps 81<sup>16</sup>, has 'honey of the mountains']) appears to point by way of contrast to the existence of honey derived from domesticated bees. As to artificial honey, made from boiled fruits (dates, raisins, figs), and to which the Arabs give the name of albs (the phonetic equivalent of Heb. עֲבֵץ 'honey' [of bees]), it is not impossible that it was known to the Israelites and the Jews; but we have no decisive Biblical proof of this (cf. Jos. BJ iv. viii. 3; Urquhart, The Lebanon, 1860, i. p. 303; Berggren, Guide Français-Arabe, col. 266, Nr. 94 and 95).

The two parallel passages cited above, relating to the food of John the Baptist, are the only ones in the Gospels in which the word μέλι, 'honey,' is found. Wild honey (μέλι ἄγρον) is named along with locusts as forming the very simple and frugal sustenance of an ascetic, a Nazirite, such as John was.* Further, in another Gospel passage (Lk

* One might be tempted, however, following a hint of Dioscorus Siculus (ix. 94), to see in the 'wild honey' the designation of a vegetable and nutritive substance, such as the resin of the tamarisks or some other sweet and savoury exudation

HONOUR

24th) there is mention, at least in the TR and AV, of a piece 'of a honeycomb' (ἀπὸ μελισσίου κηπίου) as having been offered along with 'a piece of broiled fish' to Jesus after His resurrection. But a number of the most ancient MSS of the NT (SABDLI) do not contain the former phrase, and the disposition of modern commentators, almost without exception, is to consider it as an addition. 'A singular interpolation, evidently from an extraneous source, written or oral,' say Westcott and Hort. The RV omits it. But this method of solving the problem cannot be regarded as satisfactory and final. In fact, if it is very hard to imagine, to use the language of Dean Burgon, 'that such a clause as that established itself universally in the sacred text, if it be spurious,' it is much less difficult to explain 'how such a clause became omitted from any manuscript, if it be genuine.' One can discover no possible motive for the surreptitious introduction of these words into the text. On the other hand, if they are regarded as an integral part of the primitive and authentic text, it is not impossible to disentangle the reason of their suppression in some MSS. With a view to this we must place the narrative of Lk 24th alongside of Jn 21st and compare these two descriptions of a meal, and note that in many of the writings of the Fathers, and probably in various attempts to establish 'harmonies of the Four Gospels' (but not in the Diatessaron of Tatian), these two scenes are in fact identified (although they differ in all their essential features). Now, perhaps, we may be able to explain how the honeycomb came to disappear. The influence of Lv 24th, which forbids the use of honey (probably because easily subject to fermentation) in any kind of sacrifice; that of the allegorical interpretation of Ca 5th (especially in the LXX version) applied to Christ; an ascetic tendency to procure sweet foods; the possible intervention of the Valentinians with their Veritatis Evangelium; and, finally, the proneness to polemize against the Gnostics, who made large use of honey in their solemn 'mysteries' (cf. Carl Schmidt, Gnostische Schriften in koptischer Sprache, Leipzig, 1892, pp. 203, 508), and who may have appealed for support to this text;—such are the motives which, either singly or all combined, may have brought about the removal of the disputed words. The present writer is strongly inclined, in common with the three authors cited below in the Literature, to retain them as authentic.

HONOUR.—The codes of technical 'honour' are largely opposed to the teaching of Christ (Mt 5, Lk 6th). Therefore such conceptions of 'honour' must be regarded as briars choking the word (Mk 4th); for whatever justification codes of 'honour' may claim (as from Mt 7th), they are impatient of the spirit of meekness inculcated by Christ in precept (Mt 5th) and in example (Mt 27). So the Sons of Thunder would have vindicated summarily the honour of their Master (Lk 9th). More generally, in the quest of honour, it is honour from God and not from men that is to be sought by the Christian—the glory of God rather than of men (Jn 12th). Worldly honour may be a source of severest temptation (Lk 4th), for the disciple is not greater than his Master whose sinlessness was thus brought from a tree. To collect nourishment of this kind in the thickets along the Jordan would have been an easier task for the Baptist, and would have required less time, than to hunt for the honey of bees (cf. Berggren, op. cit. col. 564).

to view (Mt 10th). Honour from God the Christian disciple will have: 'If any man will serve me, him will my Father honour' (Jn 12th). And to be invited to the marriage-supper of the King's Son is a greater honour than any this world affords (Mt 22nd). But this honour and blessing from God contrasts with the dishonour and scorn that the world is ready to shower upon followers of One who was despised and rejected. The wicked husbandmen did not honour the son of the lord of the vineyard (Mk 12th); they killed him and put him to shame (Mk 15). The Christian therefore must not be found

'Seeking an honour which they gave not Thee.'

Nay, even the most sacred honour is not the right goal for the follower of Christ, as James and John were taught (Mk 10th). Service, not honour, is the true aim for the life of self-sacrifice,—not to be honoured of all, but to be servant of all (Mk 10th). Honour is included in the all-things left to follow Christ (Mt 19th), and it is worth while to abandon all worldly things in exchange for the true life (Mt 16th). Still further, the tradition of men must give place to the commandment of God (Mk 7th). Divine honour in due season (Mt 19th).

HOPE.—In considering the relation of hope to Christ and the Gospels, we are at once met with the fact that in the Gospels the word ἐλπίς does not occur at all, and ἐλπίσθε only five times, viz. once in Mt (12th), where the Evangelist quotes the LXX, three times in Lk (6th, 23rd, 24th), and once in Jn (5th); and in none of these instances does it refer to the theological virtue.

This absence of the word is the more remarkable, when we remember not only that Judaism, the religion in which our Lord and His disciples were reared, was essentially a religion of hope, but also that the result of the teaching of Jesus was vastly to enlarge and deepen that hope, by imparting to it the riches of the Christian faith. Great as was the religious hope inspired by the older dispensation, it was small when compared with that 'better hope' (He 7th) which rested on the unchangeably kingly Priesthood of Christ.

The disciples doubtless were too fully absorbed in the present to have felt deeply expectations for the future. They were held captive by the greatness of His personality and the depth of His love, and ultimately came to realize that they had in Him the Hope of Israel itself. And if Simeon, having received the Messiah into his arms, felt his greatest hopes realized, then the disciples, having found the Christ, must have been so absorbed by Him as to have had little room and little need for longings regarding the future.

But why did Jesus, who taught the necessity of faith (Mk 11th, Jn 3rd) and the pre-eminence of love (Mt 22nd), remain silent as regards hope. It was due to the fact that in training His followers, the first necessity was to concentrate their attention on Himself as their present possession. Had He taught them fully of the fruition that awaited them at the end of the age, and had He thus made hope a distinctly prominent portion of His teaching, He would have dissipated their attention and diverted it from that which they most required to learn. St. Paul could teach, 'Christ our hope' (1 Ti 1st). Jesus had to lay the foundation by teaching, 'Come unto me' (Mt 11th).

But if He did not give direct teaching on the point, He nevertheless laid deeply the basis upon which the Church's doctrine of hope was to be built; for He pointed the disciples, in His promises, to the blessings which they ultimately would enjoy. The promises of His resurrection, of His perpetual spiritual presence, and of His final return in glory, were sure foundations upon which the Church could build her doctrine, and on this basis the developed teaching of the Epistles rests. And if the death of Jesus rudely shattered the Messianic hope of the disciples, His resurrection, followed by the illumination of the Holy Spirit, restored it to them in a purified and spiritual form.

As we study in the Epistles the doctrine of hope, which was thus awakened and became an integral part of Christian life, we find it vitally connected by the Church with her faith in Christ risen and glorified. (1) His resurrection is regarded as the ground of the Christian's hope: by it Christians are begotten 'unto a living hope,' and through it their hope in God is established (1 P 1st 21). (2) All Christian hopes are realized in Him. Various objects worthy of hope are mentioned, such as salvation (1 Th 5th), eternal life (Tit 1st 37), the glory of God (Ro 5th, Col 1st), the resurrection of the dead (Ac 24th 29); but all these different blessings are summed up in Jesus Christ. When they hope for Him, they hope for them all; for in Him all the scattered yearnings of the human heart are united and find their fulfilment. Thus it is that St. Paul calls Him 'our hope' (1 Ti 1st). (3) The Church therefore fixes her gaze on the heavens; for her Hope is there. She is ever 'looking for the blessed hope and appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ' (Tit 2nd), for then she shall be like Him, for she shall see Him as He is: 'and every one that hath this hope set on him purifieth himself' (1 Jn 3rd). Even inanimate nature groans for its coming redemption at the Parousia, having been subjected to vanity 'in hope' (Ro 8th). (4) But while the full realization of Christian hope will not be reached until the return of Christ, yet even now the Church has a foretaste of the bliss that ultimately will be hers. For Christ now dwells in the Church and in the hearts of her members, and thus grants an earnest of final fulfilment. Christ in the Church and in the individual is 'the hope of glory' (Col 1st), and therefore to be without Christ is to be without hope (Eph 2nd).

HOPEFULNESS (CHRIST'S).—Knowing that all our possessions of grace come from Christ, in whom we believe all fulness dwells, and believing that He alone among the sons of men possessed perfect knowledge, we might be led to doubt whether we could justly attribute hope to Him. As regards His perfect knowledge, we must remember that uncertainty is no essential element in hope. Human hope may be proverbially disappointing, but that is due to the uncertainty of temporal things, and not to the nature of hope itself. Indeed, the glory of the Christian hope consists in the moral certainty of its grounds. It is a 'better hope' in part as being 'sure and steadfast' (He 7th 19). The fact, then, that our Lord's faith rendered future objects of desire almost a present possession in no way prevented Him from experiencing this grace.* As regards His possessing 'all fulness' as the God-man, and so being thought incapable of feeling hopefulness, it may be said that we clearly start our thoughts on a wrong line if we commence an investigation of this kind with our own a priori views of what the incarnate Son of God must have felt or not felt. We can in ourselves be no adequate judges of the limitations which Deity might set upon itself when taking our flesh. Our duty is to study the NT, and especially the Gospels, with the view of discovering what is there revealed as to the true nature of this act of Divine condescension. And such a study teaches us that in our Lord's Person we have not only a revelation of the Father, but also a revelation of humanity at its highest. He loved to call Himself 'Son of Man,' because He thereby taught us to see in Him the ideal Man, and therefore we must expect to see in Him every truly human emotion (and hope is one of them) purified and perfected.

* Westcott (Life, vol. 1, p. 41) writes in his diary: 'The fact of our Lord never mentioning His own faith or hope is a proof of His Divinity.' This, however, can hardly be looked upon as a careful statement, but rather as a passing thought, and it was noted down early in his life (est. 21).

No teacher of mankind ever so frequently pointed to Himself in His teaching as Jesus did, and yet it is remarkable that He rarely revealed His own personal emotions. When He disclosed Himself it was as the source of all grace, so that men might be saved and nourished by His life. He was so absolutely selfless that He rarely sought sympathy by speaking of His heart's desires. It is not He but the Evangelists who tell us that He was weary, wept, exulted, marvelled. Thus it happens that He never definitely mentions His own hope. Indeed, strangely enough, the word ἐλπίς does not occur in the Gospels (see art. HOPE). But as hope is a necessary element of Christian character, being one of the 'abiding' graces (1 Co 13th), Christ, if He be true man, must have experienced it. It is not said that He had faith, but must we not believe that His whole human career was sustained from the first consciousness of childhood to Calvary by faith, perfect in its range and steadfastness? The long nights of prayer surely tell us not only of a general attitude of dependence, but also of a definite trustful belief in the love and presence of His Father, which found its expression in petition. What habitual strength of faith is shown in such words as 'Thinkest thou that I cannot beseech my Father, and he shall even now send me more than twelve legions of angels?' (Mt. 26th).

No doubt His faith and hope are so raised above ours by their perfection, that they may no longer seem to be what to us are faith and hope. But He raised all human attributes to their perfection; not thereby altering their essential character, but rather exhibiting them as they ought to be in ourselves. And if He felt no hope, never rejoiced in coming good, never was upborne when wearing the cross by anticipation of the crown, but lived His life in the cold calm of duty, then the Stoic is the ideal of our race.

Not a few evidences, more or less indirect, of Christ's hopefulness are found in the Gospels. In one case its object was of a temporal nature, namely, when being 'hungry' He approached the fig tree, 'if haply he might find anything thereon.' (Mk 11th 12.)

Little reverence would be shown by interpreting this incident as feigned for the purpose of teaching a moral lesson. 'If He only pretended not to know that the tree was barren, we should expect the hunger also to have been pretended' (Mason, Conditions of our Lord's Life, p. 152). Rather have we an example of hope in the mind of Jesus for a desired good, which circumstances disappointed, and which He turned to a moral purpose.

Evidence of His being cheered during His ministry by hope of the results of His spiritual labours may probably be seen in His words to the disciples when the Samaritan woman had left (Jn 4th 38). He had gained one soul, and with prophetic vision saw the land filled with ripened souls ready for the spiritual reaper. His followers, too, would receive wages in the joy of souls won, and ultimately they, with the earlier workers of God who had sown the seed, would rejoice together.

So full was His soul with joy of hope already realized, and with the prospect of still greater harvesting, that He was raised above the sense of hunger. The whole passage seems full of the deepest emotion of our Lord; and if so, hope was its strongest element. A similar anticipation of coming joy in the salvation of those He came to save may be felt in the words, 'Rejoice with me; for I have found my sheep which was lost' (Lk 15<sup>9</sup>). Further, may we not see that hope realized was the cause of the strong movement of His soul, when He exulted (ἠγαλλιάσατο, Lk 10<sup>21</sup>) in Satan's fall from heaven? It was a rejoicing of His innermost soul, because already He saw potentially accomplished the object of His mission. Similarly must we account for the deep feeling displayed by Him when visited by the inquiring Greeks (Jn 12<sup>20-28</sup>). Here again is hope anticipative. He sees the uttermost parts of the world potentially present in the persons of these Gentiles, and He declares that 'the hour is come that the Son of Man should be glorified' (v. 28), and yet, foreknowing the terrible fate that awaited Him before the achievement of His desire, He alternated between the joy of hope and the sorrow of human dread, and prayed to be saved from that hour (v. 27).

In His teaching to His disciples there is the oft-repeated lesson of His return to His Father (Jn 7<sup>8</sup>, 8<sup>14</sup>, 16<sup>28</sup>). Doubtless His chief object was to explain His heavenly origin and to prepare them for His departure, but not a little pathos and increased depth may be recognized in such words if we see in them also a longing hope for the time when the bitter trials of His voluntary humiliation would cease. Thus in His High-Priestly prayer, now that He has finished His work, He pleads for the renewal of the glory which He had with His Father before the world was (17<sup>2-5</sup>). And thinking of the loved ones to whom His parting would be so bitter a trial, He prays for the realization of the hope that they might ultimately be granted the beatific vision, beholding Him in His glory (v. 24); then would He drink with them the fruit of the vine new in His Father's kingdom (Mt 26<sup>29</sup>).

Perhaps the most clearly expressed example of hope on the part of our Lord, an example which unequivocally shows His feeling of the emotion, is to be found in the words with which He commenced the Paschal meal. 'With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer' (Lk 22<sup>15</sup>). Here we have a distinct statement, that He held ardently an expectation of a future good before its realization.

We further find that His ministry was exercised in a spirit of intense optimism as regards both the community and the individual. This is the more remarkable when we recall that He more than any other saw the reality of human corruption. The hidden disease of society, with its outward religiousness and inward godlessness, led Him to predict the overthrow of the ecclesiastical and national life, like Jeremiah of old. But, unlike that prophet, He, notwithstanding His clear view of coming judgment, looked to the future with a splendid hopefulness. His kingdom would yet fill the world (Mt 13); His gospel would be universally preached (Mk 13<sup>35</sup>); and ultimately all men would be drawn unto Him (Jn 12<sup>32</sup>).

The same optimism is to be seen in His dealings with individual sinners. In the most corrupt He saw germs of good; and thus could win sinful women from their grasping worldliness (Mk 2<sup>14</sup>, Lk 19<sup>9</sup>); and He could discover sufficient moral worth in a dying thief and murderer to be able to promise him rest in Paradise (Lk 23<sup>43</sup>). The hopefulness of Christ in His message to mankind is fully embodied in His saying, 'Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world' (Jn 16<sup>33</sup>). Thus we see that our Lord was in hope, as in all else save sin, 'like as we are' (He 4<sup>15</sup>). And if we in our trials are upheld by the hope of future bliss, He also was upheld to endure the cross and despise the shame by 'the joy that was set before him' (12<sup>7</sup>).

CHARLES T. P. GRIERSON.
HORN.—The expression 'a horn of salvation' in the song of Zacharias (Lk 1<sup>69</sup>) is undoubtedly a reference to the promised Messiah. A similar combination of words is found in Ps 132, but the conception is more probably due to 132<sup>7</sup>, 1 S 2<sup>9</sup>.

1. In the OT the word 'horn' is figuratively used in poetical and allegorical language: (a) for abstract notions of strength (Nu 23<sup>24</sup>, Ps 89<sup>17-24</sup>), and hence of dignity (112<sup>9</sup>) or pride (75<sup>4b</sup>); also, (b) in a concrete sense, to represent kings and empires (Dn 7<sup>24</sup> 8<sup>30f</sup>, Zec 1<sup>18f</sup>). The rendering 'a mighty salvation,' Lk 1<sup>69</sup> (Pr. Bk.), paraphrases the sense but obliterates the associations. Hor. Od. iii. 21. 18 is quoted as an instance of the metaphor in ordinary literature, in which it is rare.

2. Inasmuch as the horn in animals is a weapon of attack rather than of defence, some have regarded it as a symbol of aggressive strength (see Delitzsch, Perowne, etc., on Ps 18<sup>3</sup>): possibly combative strength, in which both ideas are included, would be a better definition. There are two classes of symbols expressive of such strength: (a) natural weapons (e.g. horn, right hand, arm, etc.), and (b) artificial weapons (arrows, axe, shield, etc.). When any distinction is to be made, the former class tends to represent that strength which is personal, inherent, immediate; the latter, to represent that strength in which second causes, instruments, agents appear (Is 10<sup>13</sup>). F. S. RANKEN.

HOSANNA (ἠνεψῆ, Gr. ὑσαννά).—One of the Hebrew words which (like Amen, Hallelujah, Sabbath, Sabaoth) have passed, transliterated and not translated, from the vocabulary of the Jewish to that of the Christian Church. In the NT it occurs only in three Gospels: in them it is found six times (Mt 21<sup>9</sup> 14c 18, Mk 11<sup>9-10</sup>, Jn 12<sup>13</sup>), but only in the history of our Lord's triumphant entry to Jerusalem on Palm Sunday, and only as a vocal cry uttered, either by the palm-bearing multitude who met Him, or by the children who hailed Him thereafter in the Temple (Mt 21<sup>15</sup>). Among the Jews, however, the word came to designate not alone the cry, but also the branches of palms, myrtle, or willow which on their joyous feast of Tabernacles, and especially on its seventh day, the people were accustomed—for the Law did not enjoin this ceremony—to carry in procession with the priests to the fountain of Shiloah and thence again to the Temple, where these 'hosannas' were piled up and beaten against the altar. It is only with 'Hosanna' as a cry that we are here concerned; but we cannot forget that when, in honour of our Lord, the multitude raised the cry, they 'took branches of palm trees' (Jn 12<sup>13</sup>) as well; and therefore, besides expounding the meaning of the cry, we must consider how a ceremony customary at the feast of Tabernacles came to be adopted, popularly, on an occasion when the worshippers were assembling at Jerusalem to celebrate a feast of a widely different character, that of the Passover.

Philologically, the word Hosanna is explained as a derivation from or contraction of Ps 118<sup>25</sup> (Heb.); anna šāluach šōšēlānā-nā ('I beseech thee, O Lord, save now'). This Psalm was sung, and this verse of it used as a refrain by the people, at the feast of Tabernacles; and the refrain was abbreviated, through constant popular repetition, into Hōshānā, just as the old Canaanitish cry Ho! Ho! (= 'Ho Adonis') was turned into a common interjection, Hedda!

The vocal 'Hosanna' was used by the Jews at the feast of Tabernacles when the branches also were employed; and on this account it has been asserted by Mr. Lewis N. Dembitz (in the Jewish Encyc. vol. vi. p. 275, s. c. 'Hoshana Rabbah') that 'the Gospels by a mistake place the custom in the season shortly before the Passover, instead of in the feast of Booths.' To this it may be answered, (1) that, according to another writer in the same Encyclopedia, Rabbi Kaufmann Kohler (vol. vi. p. 272), Hosanna 'became a popular cry used in solemn processions whereof was connected the carrying of palm branches as described in 1 Mac 13<sup>21</sup> and 2 Mac 10<sup>7</sup>.' But (2) the procession in 1 Mac 13<sup>21</sup> was not at the feast of Tabernacles, which was kept on the 15th day of the 7th month (Lv 23<sup>39</sup>), but at a wholly different season, 'on the three and twentieth day of the second month'; while the celebration in 2 Mac 10<sup>7</sup>, though 'the procession was after the manner of the feast of Tabernacles' (v. 9), was somewhat later in the year. Thus there was historical and unimpaired (for the Jews did not hold the Books of Maccabees to be inspired) precedent for the employment both of the palm-bearing and the shout on other suitable occasions besides the feast of Tabernacles. And (3) was not the occasion of Christ's entry into Jerusalem one that must have seemed eminently suitable alike to His disciples who began it (Lk 19<sup>37</sup>) and to the candid (Mt 21<sup>9</sup>) and grateful (Jn 12<sup>17</sup>) Israelites who joined them in the celebration of it? The Jews, we know, were accustomed to associate with the feast of Tabernacles the highest of those blessings which Messiah was to bring. It was as Messiah that Jesus now presented Himself. He had chosen to ride that day upon the ass's colt, in accordance with Zechariah's prophecy (Zec 9). Just on purpose to make an offer of Himself to Jerusalem as her promised King (Mt 21<sup>4</sup>, Jn 12<sup>13</sup>). What, accordingly, would the people look for at His hands? What would they ask from Him? Salvation; but salvation not on its negative side alone, of deliverance, but on its positive side as well, of fruition. If the approaching feast of the Passover would remind them of the former, how their Egyptian oppressor had been smitten (Ex 12<sup>29</sup>), it was the feast of Tabernacles which pre-eminently supplied illustrations of the latter: its branches and its booths were redolent of that first night of freedom which their fathers had enjoyed under the cool bosoms of Succoth (Ex 12<sup>13</sup>), so refreshing after the dust and heat of the brickfield and the furnace. On both sides—the negative and the positive, the smiting and the booths—were in one chapter (Ex 12: 2) the remembrance of the one without the other. The form, therefore, which the celebration of our Lord's entry into Jerusalem is described by the Four Evangelists as assuming, is not such as to require us to suppose that they made a mistake in placing it at the season of the Passover. On the contrary, it was neither unprecedented nor unnatural; and the fact that it was not a legally prescribed but only a popular ceremony, left them quite free to use it when they thought fit. It is not as if the Evangelists had transferred the unleavened bread of the Passover to the Feast of Tabernacles.

Hosanna is rendered in both AV and RV (cf. Ps 118<sup>25</sup>, whence it is taken) 'Save now.' The now is not here an adverb of time, but an interjection of entreaty, as in 'Come now': the word means 'Oh! save' (Jewish Encyc.), or 'Save, we beseech Thee.' As given (1) absolutely, as in Mk 11<sup>9</sup> and Jn 12<sup>13</sup>, the natural meaning of this would be an address to Christ, as Messiah, asking Him to bestow the salvation expected of Him; or, as our English hymn expresses it, 'Bring near Thy great salvation.' We can understand how, in this sense, 'Hosanna' should be followed by salutations or acclamations, 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the LORD' (Ps 118<sup>26</sup>, Mt 21<sup>9</sup>, Mk 11<sup>9</sup>), 'Blessed is the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord' (Mk 11<sup>10</sup>), or 'Blessed is the King of Israel that cometh in the name of the Lord' (Jn 12<sup>13</sup>). All the different forms may have been used, for there was a multitude of speakers. The sequence of the thoughts is natural: for if Jesus be once conceived of as able to save (either by His own power or by that of Him that sent Him), the next thing, obviously, for His people to do, after asking Him to exert His power in their behalf, is to rejoice that He has come, and to bless Him for coming.

But (2) it is not only in this absolute construction that the Evangelists use the word Hosanna. St. Matthew employs it with a dative, 'Hosanna to the Son of David' (Mt 21<sup>9</sup>); and both St. Matthew and St. Mark give us 'Hosanna in the highest.' Both these variations have been censured by Dr. Kaufmann Kohler (Jewish Encyc. Lc. supra) as 'corruptions of the original version': the addition 'in the highest,' he declares to be 'words which no longer give any sense.' But in a connexion which seems to justify St. Matthew, the dative is used alike in the OT (Ps 3<sup>8</sup> 'Salvation belongeth unto the Lord') and in the NT in a passage based upon that Psalm (Rev 7<sup>10</sup> 'Salvation unto our God; and unto the Lamb'); while there is surely nothing 'senseless' in the thought that the salvation which God gives, or sends, to men should fill the highest heaven with rejoicings in His praise. We have the idea in the OT (e.g. Ps. 8) and in the NT (Lk 24, Eph 3<sup>9</sup>). To some Christian commentators, however, and those of no mean weight,—e.g. Cornelius à Lapide and Dean Alford,—St. Matthew's use of Hosanna with the dative has seemed to render requisite a different interpretation of the word. Hosanna was, says Alford (on Mt 21<sup>9</sup>), 'originally a formula of supplication, but [became] conventionally [one] of gratulation, so that it is followed by a dative, and by "in the highest,"—meaning "may it also be ratified in heaven,"—and he cites 1 K 1<sup>8</sup>, where Beniah answers David, saying, "Amen: the Lord, the God of my lord the king, say so too." Cornelius à Lapide takes 'Hosanna to the Son of David' as a prayer for Christ, offered by the people 'asking all prosperous things for Him from God.' Now, this would, in itself, be admissible enough. Of Messiah, even when thought of as Divine and reigning, the Scripture says, 'prayer also shall be made for him continually' (Ps 72<sup>19</sup>). But it seems unnatural to postulate so violent an alteration in the meaning of the word—from 'supplication' to 'gratulation,' when, taken in its original meaning, it yields a sufficient sense: 'Save now, for it is to thee, O Son of David, that the power to save us has been given.' It was not unnatural that the people should speak in this sense: as Jews they knew already that 'salvation belongeth unto God' (Ps 3<sup>9</sup>). This view derives considerable confirmation from the parallel passage in the Apocalypse, where the whole scene in ch. 7<sup>14</sup>, and even the very words—'the multitude before the throne and before the Lamb . . . with palms in their hands' (Rev 7<sup>9</sup>, cf. Jn 12<sup>13</sup>), who cry with a loud voice (cf. Lk 19<sup>37</sup>), saying, 'Salvation to our God . . . and to the Lamb'—seems to be based on what happened at Jerusalem on that first Palm Sunday; as if the Seer were beholding the salvation come which that day was asked, and recognized that the palm-bearers of the earthly Jerusalem were precursors of the hosts of the redeemed. St. John, it will be remembered, has, in his Gospel (12<sup>10</sup>), the remark, 'These things understood not his disciples at the first, but after he was risen they remembered,' etc. If, as seems clear, the vision is expressed in figures drawn from that event, then the acclaim in heaven must be held to settle the meaning of those Hosannas upon earth: the dative of the Apocalypse is the dative of the Gospel: it is the dative not of a prayer for Jesus, but of an ascription of salvation to Him as His Mediator and Bestower.

It remains only to be added that the Third Evangelist, while recording the same Triumphal Entry, and mentioning the acclamations of the people, omits alike the palm-branches and the word 'Hosanna.' The explanation, no doubt, of both omissions lies in the fact that St. Luke wrote especially for Gentiles; his readers would not have understood the Hosanna, and would have misunderstood the palms. To Greeks the palm-branch would have been, inevitably, the palm of pride and victory: not, as to the Hebrew mind, an emblem of peaceful rest, and freedom, and household joy. 'Hosanna' would have meant nothing at all. Therefore the Evangelist to the Greeks paraphrases the word, and paraphrases with it St. Matthew's and St. Mark's addition to it, 'in the highest'; rendering the whole by 'Peace in heaven, and glory in the highest' (Lk 19<sup>38</sup>). And, as St.

Matthew had the dative of ascription, 'Hosanna to the Son of David'—as looking for salvation to Him who had come to Jerusalem in this capacity; so St. Luke, in his paraphrase of the Hosanna, employs what we may call a dative clause: his 'Peace in heaven, and glory in the highest,' are introduced so as to show us these as the result of Christ's coming as King in the name of the Lord: it is for these ends that He has come; and on this account the people call Him blessed. It was for these ends that He was born: wherefore the angels sang the same strain over Him at His Nativity (Lk 2<sup>14</sup>); it is for these ends now that He paces forward to His cross; and therefore men, though as yet they understand it not (Jn 12<sup>28</sup>), are moved, by a Power they know not, to bear Him record.

HOSPITALITY.—This marked Oriental virtue prevailed in Palestine in Christ's day. Our Lord assumes its exercise, rather than directly enjoins it. His Apostles, later, however, prescribed hospitality as a reflexion of the Christ spirit (Ro 12<sup>13</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>2</sup>, Tit 1<sup>8</sup>, He 13<sup>2</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>9</sup>), even towards an enemy (Ro 12<sup>20</sup>). Because of the widespread prevalence of hospitality, inns (wh. see) were comparatively few; and even in khanes or places of lodgment for strangers there were unfurnished rooms which were at the disposal of travellers, without cost. The innkeeper or host usually received remuneration for such extra service as the stranger might require, as in a case like that of the wounded man cared for at the Samaritan's expense (Lk 10<sup>36</sup>). Since Jesus Himself 'had not where to lay his head' (Mt 23<sup>2</sup>), He depended much upon the hospitality of the friendly disposed, as of Andrew and Peter at Capernaum (Mt 8<sup>14</sup>), and of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus at Bethany (Jn 11<sup>1-2</sup>); and frequently accepted the hospitality of householders (Mt 26<sup>8</sup>, Lk 5<sup>29</sup> 7<sup>36-38</sup>, 19<sup>6</sup>). On occasions of the great feasts at Jerusalem, guest-chambers were freely put at the disposal of visiting worshippers (Mk 14<sup>14</sup>). When the Master sent out the Seventy, they were to take no purse, but to rely upon the hospitality of the people of the towns into which they might go (Lk 10<sup>4-5</sup>); a blessing being left with the hospitable (v. 5), while a woe is pronounced upon the inhospitable city (vv. 10-12). Christ said of His messengers that those who received them were in truth receiving Him (Jn 13<sup>29</sup>). So incensed were two of His disciples at being refused entertainment in a Samaritan village, that they would have called down fire from heaven to destroy the people. But this spirit Jesus rebuked (Lk 9<sup>54-56</sup>). The spirit of hospitality was manifested in giving not only lodging and food, but also water for the feet (Lk 7<sup>4</sup>, cf. Jn 13<sup>5</sup>); a servant usually unloosing and taking charge of the sandals (Lk 3<sup>6</sup>). Sometimes a kiss characterized the hospitable reception (Lk 7<sup>45</sup>).

The emphasis that Jesus laid upon the virtue of hospitality may be discovered in His description of the Last Judgment, in which the righteous are commended because 'I was a stranger and ye took me in' (Mt 25<sup>35</sup>). See also art. INN.

HOST.—See (1) ANGELS; (2) HOSPITALITY, INN, INVITATION.

'He was healed in the selfsame hour' (Mt 8<sup>23</sup>, cf. 9<sup>22</sup> 15<sup>28</sup> 17<sup>18</sup>, Jn 4<sup>53</sup>). More definitely the word is used as a division of the day (Mt 20<sup>3</sup> 5. 6. 12 27<sup>45</sup>, cf. Mk 15<sup>32</sup>, Lk 23<sup>44</sup>, Jn 19<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>22</sup> 19<sup>14</sup>). The usual system of reckoning time was from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., and again from 6 p.m. to 6 a.m. 'In the 1st cent. of our era the day was divided, in popular language, into twelve equal parts or hours, which varied in length according to the season. . . . The expression, "the first hour," indicated the time when the shadow on the dial reached the mark which showed that  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the day had elapsed' (Ramsay, Expositor, March 1893, p. 216 f.). The question has been raised, because of the apparent divergence between Jn 19<sup>14</sup> and Mk 15<sup>32</sup>, whether St. John adopted another method of reckoning in the Fourth Gospel, viz. from midnight to midday, and from midday to midnight. Prof. Ramsay maintains that, though the Roman civil day was reckoned in this way, it was not divided into hours; and that the note of time when the martyrdom of Polycarp took place, ὥρα ὀρθία, does not prove its use in Minor (l.c.). But the internal evidence of the Fourth Gospel points strongly to this mode of reckoning on the part of St. John. The tenth hour (Jn 19<sup>14</sup>) is more probably 10 a.m. than 4 p.m., if the two disciples lodged with Jesus 'that day.' It harmonizes with the custom of Eastern women of drawing water in the evening, and accounts for the weariness of Jesus, but as 6 p.m. And although we cannot look for precision in point of time in Oriental writers, the divergence between the Synoptists and St. John as to the hour of Christ's condemnation and crucifixion is too wide to be intelligible on any other hypothesis than that they used different systems of reckoning. But if the 'sixth hour' of Jn 19<sup>14</sup> means 6 a.m., there is no divergence (see Westcott, St. John, p. 282; Smith, The Days of His Flesh, pp. 628-629; and for the opposite view, Dods, Expos. Gr. Test. i. 698, 855, 856). See, further, art. DAY, TIME.

2. But Jesus, living 'in feelings, not in figures on a dial,' and 'counting time by heart-throbs,' gave the word an intense significance. To Him days and hours were moral magnitudes. The appointed span was not small, but spacious ('Are there not twelve hours in the day?' Jn 11<sup>9</sup>), to be employed in strenuous and loving obedience to the Divine will (cf. Jn 9<sup>4</sup>). Until the sunset, He knew He had no reason to fear the hostility of men. Life would be as long as duty, and in the path of God's service there are no tragic foreshortenings (Jn 11<sup>8-9</sup>). But the twelfth hour of the day was that to which He so pathetically refers as 'Mine hour.' At the marriage feast in Cana, when appealed to by His mother with a suggestion for His help, He replied, 'Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come' (Jn 2<sup>4</sup>). This may simply mean that the time for giving such relief was not opportune, or that the opportunity for miracle-working, or the moment for self-manifestation, had not arrived. But the whole utterance produces the impression that the appeal had aroused strong feelings, and created a critical situation for Him.

He was standing on the threshold of His ministry, conscious of His miraculous power, and He was questioning whether that were the hour to put it forth. . . . The supplying of wine to a company of peasants seemed so trivial, so unworthy of the Messiah, so insufficient for the inauguration of the kingdom of heaven' (Smith, The Days of His Flesh, p. 55).

But is there not even here a reference to what He calls peculiarly His hour—the hour when the Son of Man should be glorified' (Jn 12<sup>23</sup>, cf. 17<sup>1</sup>); the hour when He should be betrayed into the hands of sinners (Mt 26<sup>45</sup>); the hour when the Father's will gave Him over to the power of darkness (Lk 22<sup>29</sup>)? If Jesus went down to the Jordan in order to participate in the Baptism of Repentance, conscious that His vocation as Messiah was to be that of the Suffering Servant, and to take upon Himself the sins of His brethren, then the thought of His hour as the hour of His sacrifice could never be absent from His mind. And the simple suggestion of His mother, involving, as it did, for Him the first exercise of a power which came to Him as Messiah, raised suddenly and vividly before Him the issue of suffering, and called forth the intense feeling in the words, "Mine hour is not yet come."

A similar tumult of emotion was produced towards the end of His ministry, by the request of the Greeks to see Him (Jn 12<sup>20</sup>). The reply of Jesus, "The hour is come, that the Son of man should be glorified. . . . Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone," is relevant to a prospect of possible exemption from the cross which the request raised in Him, rather than to the request itself. Once more an apparently innocent intrusion upon His thoughts had brought before Him the vision of His hour. He saw that the glory would be won at a great cost, and the prospect of it brought distress of soul, and wrung from Him the cry, "Father, what shall I say? Save me from this hour." But immediately He saw through the pain the holy purpose of God realizing itself, and recovered His poise of soul and unflinching devotion. "But for this cause, came I unto this hour. Father, glorify thy name."

It was by this simple word, therefore, that He expressed the conviction that His death was the climax of His life, and that the time of its accomplishment was with God. He would not forestall it by any premature manifestation of Himself to the world (Jn 7<sup>7</sup>); and until His hour came, His enemies were powerless against Him (v. 30<sup>8</sup>). But when it came, He was not reluctant to recognize it. Though it was a dark hour, the hour of men with sinister purpose and in league with Satan (Lk 22<sup>26</sup>), He knew it as the hour when He should depart out of this world unto the Father (Jn 13<sup>1</sup>), the hour when God should glorify His Son (17<sup>1</sup>).

With the approach of that hour which marked the climax and close of His earthly ministry, a wider horizon opens. A new day of God dawns, and in it also there is a critical hour—the hour when the Son of Man cometh (Mt 23<sup>39</sup>). Even to Him the precise point of time was not disclosed (Mt 24<sup>36</sup>). Of one thing He was sure, and gave repeated warning,—it would come upon men with startling suddenness: "and in an hour when ye think not" (Mt 24<sup>48</sup>; cf. Lk 12<sup>40</sup>); and He enforces therewith His command to "watch," "be ready," so that, though it come suddenly, it may be a glad surprise.

JOSEPH MUIR.

HOUSE (oikia, oikos).—The word 'house' is used in the Gospels, in accordance with ancient Hebrew usage, in a twofold sense, as referring either to the dwelling, or to the family living in it. Thus we have (1) 'the house of Israel' (Mt 10<sup>6</sup>), 'the house of David' (Lk 12<sup>7</sup>), etc.; (2) 'built his house upon a rock' (Mt 7<sup>24</sup>), 'the house of the ruler' (Mk 5<sup>28</sup>), etc.

The 'house,' as a building, plays no such part in Oriental as in Western life and civilization. Climatic conditions in the East permit people to live much in the open. Accordingly we find artisans and merchants plying their trades in the street, or in open shops looking out on the street. Then the domestic life of the Oriental requires little beyond a sheltered place for sleeping and a quiet place for eating. The ordinary house of the ancient Hebrew, we may be sure, was much like that found in Palestine to-day—it could hardly be cruder, or more primitive. As to Hebrew architure, of either OT or NT times, the Bible has little to say. Architecture proper can hardly be said to have arisen among the Hebrews before the time of the kings, say, about B.C. 1000. Then, it would seem, it differed little from that of the Phoenicians, Assyrians, and Egyptians. The style of the house would naturally be determined largely by the location, the materials at hand, and the purpose to be served. Palestine, as known to history, has had few great forests, and little timber of any kind suited for building. (Solomon had to import materials for palace and temple, 1 K 5<sup>20</sup>). Houses built in the plains were usually constructed of mud, clay, or sun-dried bricks (cf. Job 4<sup>19</sup>). 'Houses of clay,' or those built of sun-dried bricks, could be easily broken into—a fact that gives point to our Lord's allusion in the Sermon on the Mount, when He would dissuade from laying up treasures 'where thieves break through and steal' (Mt 6<sup>19</sup>), where it is literally 'dig through' (RVm). Great care needed to be taken with the foundations. In a limestone country like Palestine, if one dig deep enough, he finds almost anywhere a stratum of solid rock. It is still true that the wise man builds his house upon the rock (Mt 7<sup>24</sup>). It is common there now to dig down to the rock and lay the foundation of even the 'house of clay' upon it. Mt 7<sup>28</sup> 'It was founded,' might well be rendered, 'It was foundationed upon the rock,' if we had such a word in English. St. Luke (9<sup>6</sup>) says, 'dug, and went deep, and laid a foundation upon the rock.'

In the mountainous regions limestone rock was the building material chiefly used, as it was abundant, easily quarried, and readily worked. The house of stone was, probably, modelled after, or developed from, the cave. The nature of the country invited to this. First the natural cave would be used, and, as there was demand, artificially enlarged. Then, occasionally, in some inviting place, a cave would be hewn out of the rock, de novo. Finally, a wall would be built in front for protection, or privacy, and so the cave would be converted into a sheltered dwelling. Henceforth it would serve as a model for detached stone houses. As a matter of fact, in the ancient village of Siloam are found all these kinds of houses, and they illustrate this process of development. (See Jewish Encyc. art. 'House'). Bricks were sometimes used even in the mountain regions, though counted inferior to hewn stone (2 S 12<sup>31</sup>). Many stone houses were unpretentious and rude, being built of rough, unhewn stones; but some, then as now, were built of hewn stones, with vaulted stone roofs, e.g. the palaces of the rich, or of the ruling class (cf. 'the house of the ruler,' Mk 5<sup>28</sup>, 'the high priest's house,' Lk 22<sup>24</sup>). Sometimes space for walking was left around the dome, but often all the space between the dome and the battlement (Dt 22<sup>9</sup>) would be filled in, so as to give the much-desired flat roof—the favourite resort of the Oriental in the cool of the evening (2 S 11<sup>2</sup>), and an inviting sleeping-place in summer (1 S 9<sup>22</sup>). Such a house will often have a hut of branches, or of vine-covered trellis-work, on the roof (cf. 2 S 16<sup>20</sup>, Neh 8<sup>16</sup>), and sometimes a more substantial room, where guests of honour are lodged (1 K 17<sup>18</sup>, 2 K 4<sup>10</sup>). For 'summer parlour,' cf. Jg 3<sup>20</sup>, RVm has rightly 'upper chamber of cooling.' (See Mk 14<sup>15</sup>, and cf. 'upper room' elsewhere). From the roof one could easily see what was going on in the street, or on a neighbouring housetop (cf. 1 S 9<sup>22</sup>); indeed, could even step from roof to roof, and thus walk the whole length of a street, as the present writer once did in Damascus (cf. Mk 13<sup>15</sup>; Jos. Ant. xiii. 140 [ed. Niese]).

The humbler house of the plain was very simple, having usually only one apartment, which sometimes sheltered both man and beast. The walls were sometimes smeared with clay (Lv 14<sup>41</sup>), sometimes plastered (Ezk 13<sup>20</sup>, Dt 27<sup>4</sup>). The roof was made, no doubt, as that of the common Arab house is made to-day, by laying rough beams about three feet apart, then laying reeds or brush-wood close and thick across, covering it with something like the thickly matted thorn-bush called bellan, and then spreading over the whole, first a coat of thick mortar, and then one of marl or earth, and rolling it. Such roofs would require frequent repairing and rolling to keep out the rain, and, if neglected, would get so soaked with the tropical rains that they would cave in. In this way whole villages have had to be abandoned, and their houses left desolate. It was probably one of the simplest of such roofs that was 'broken up' (Mk 2<sup>4</sup>) when the paralytic was let down from the housetop at Capernaum into the presence of Jesus to be healed. The whole affair would seem to have been the extemporaneous device of plain peasants, accustomed to open their roofs and let down grain, straw, and other articles, as they still do in that country (Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 6ff.). The furniture of such a house would be very simple,—a few mats, or pallets, spread on the ground floor for sleeping on at night, then rolled up and put aside in the day; latterly a 'divan' set against the wall on one side, a small table, a few rude chairs, a niche in the wall for the primitive little lamp, unless it was of a sort to hang from a rafter, and a few large jugs for grain, water, wine, or oil.

The palace of the rich would differ from such a house, of course, in having more rooms, and richer and more varied furniture. The numerous rooms, often preferably arranged in a suite on the ground floor around one or more open courts, were often built in storeys. Fine woods, olive, cedar, etc., were used for the doors and windows, and the floors were sometimes made of wood, but often of cement or stone, or even of rich mosaics; while the walls in rare instances were inlaid with ivory and beaten gold (cf. Am 5<sup>1</sup>, I K 22<sup>29</sup> 63<sup>29</sup>).

The Græco-Roman architecture of the Hellenistic period did not exert any very marked or lasting influence upon the architecture of Palestine, partly because of the Jewish antipathy to the Hellenizing tendency, and partly because it was confined to the larger buildings, such as palaces, baths, theatres, temples, etc. See, further, Hastings' DB, art. 'House.'

HOUSEHOLD.—In Mt 24<sup>40</sup> (oikereia), Lk 12<sup>42</sup> (oikereia)=servants, i.e. the dependants on an estate to whom the steward was bound in our Lord's parable to serve out rations at intervals of a day, a week, or a month. It was their dependent and helpless condition which was the test of the steward's faithfulness to his trust. The same English word translates oikakoi in Mt 10<sup>28</sup> 29, i.e. the inmates of a house, subordinate indeed to the master, but attached to him by ties of relationship or marriage. In v. 28 there is a contrast and comparison between the oikakoi (Christ's disciples) and the oikodespotēs (the Lord Himself), and Christ warns the Twelve that if He has been called Beelzebub (or Beelzebub) by His enemies (cf. Mt 9<sup>34</sup> 12<sup>24</sup>, Jn 8<sup>48</sup>), those who belong to His household cannot expect to be free from this 'reproach of Christ.' In v. 28 the contrast is between some members of a household and the rest. Here He warns them of the inevitable opposition that will arise when some in a house love Christ supremely, while others are hostile or indifferent to Him. The words of ancient prophecy (Mic 7<sup>9</sup>) then receive a fulfilment. The very closeness of association emphasizes the antagonism, and 'a man's foes shall be they of his own household.'

HOUSEHOLDER.—This term as well as 'goodman of the house,' 'master of the house,' are different translations of the same Greek word οικετήρ. It is rendered 'householder' in the parables of the Tares and the Wheat (Mt 13<sup>27</sup>), of the Owner bringing forth his treasures new and old (Mt 13<sup>25</sup>), of the Labourers in the Vineyard (Mt 20<sup>1</sup>), of the Vineyard let out to husbandmen (21<sup>33</sup>), with special application to Christ as Head of the Church. The phrase 'goodman of the house' is applied (Mk 14<sup>14</sup>, Lk 22<sup>15</sup>) to the owner of the house in which the Last Supper was to be prepared. The translation 'master of the house' is found in Lk 13<sup>29</sup> RV (AV 'goodman'), Mt 24<sup>43</sup>, of the owner or overseer whose duty it is to protect his property against the thief in the night. It occurs also in the parable of the Great Supper, Lk 14<sup>21</sup> (corresponding to the king of Mt 22<sup>7</sup>), also as denoting the head of the house whose persecution involves that of his subordinates, Mt 10<sup>29</sup> (see HOUSEHOLD); and once more in the parable of the Unfaithful, against whom the door was shut, Lk 13<sup>29</sup> (cf. parable of the Ten Virgins, Mt 25).

HUMANITY OF CHRIST.—The simplest fact about Jesus Christ, as we see Him pictured in the Gospels, is that He was a man. Whatever there was peculiar about His person, it did not destroy the reality of His humanity or take Him out of the genus 'man.' But this simple fact, seen in all its relations, admits of varied consideration, and indeed demands it.

1. His human body.—Jesus had a body, visible to the eye, giving the natural impression, as other bodies do, of reality. It came into life by the natural channel of birth (Mt 1<sup>20</sup> 2), Lk 2<sup>7</sup>); it grew as others do (Lk 2<sup>29</sup>), but this simple fact, seen in all its relations, admits of varied consideration, and indeed demands it. 1. His human body.—Jesus had a body, visible to the eye, giving the natural impression, as other bodies do, of reality. points tempted like as we are,<sup>415</sup> sustains the inference which must necessarily follow from the possession of a human nature, that there were such appeals to the humanity of Jesus. See TEMPTATION.

2. His human soul.—Had Jesus a true human soul? The answer to such a question is to be obtained only by observing the phenomena of His recorded life, and drawing the necessary inferences from what we see. The statement of fact is, fortunately, very clear and copious. The moment we study the account of His independent life we find the evidences accumulating that in its inward, as well as its outward, processes it is a truly human life. In the temple we find the exercise of a desire—curiosity—and the acknowledgment of mental processes both like those of other men and commanding their respect (His 'understanding,' Lk 22<sup>6-7</sup>). In His home in Nazareth He followed a life of obedience (Lk 22<sup>1</sup> 'subject'). As He grew in stature, so He did in 'wisdom' (Lk 22<sup>22</sup> σοφία, 'varied knowledge of things human and Divine,' Grimm-Thayer). At His temptation He showed an intellectual knowledge of the Scriptures (Mt 4<sup>7-9</sup>). His discourses moved along according to the laws of human address, idea suggesting idea according to the laws of natural association. The lower ranges of reasoning are pursued by Him as by others, and once He even expresses His thought syllogistically (Jn 8<sup>27</sup>). But the higher ranges of reason, the intuitive knowledge of the meaning of great truths, were peculiarly His, as is seen in the wider interpretation of the OT (Mt 5<sup>17-21-48</sup>), and in the lofty ethical standard which He sets up, itself another instance of the larger interpretation of the OT, forming the still unsurpassed ideal of human conduct, more and more insisted upon in the social struggles for progress in our own time, the binding force and universal validity of the law of love (Mt 22<sup>37-40</sup>). To this standard He held Himself (Jn 10<sup>80</sup> 17<sup>21</sup>, Mt 15<sup>22</sup> 20<sup>24</sup>). Thus He manifested at every essential point the possession of an intellect characterized by the same faculties and working by the same laws as our own. The same was no less true of the sensibilities, even those which we are inclined to view as trivial, the undue indulgence of which we stigmatize as weakness. Traces may be found of the operation of every one of the distinct emotions. Thus, for example, He had a love for esteem, manifested in His notice of the omission of certain acts of courtesy in Lk 7<sup>44-46</sup>; He displayed the natural affections, such as love of friends (Jn 15<sup>13</sup>), of family (Jn 19<sup>26</sup>), of country (Mt 23<sup>37-39</sup>); He exercised complacent love (Mk 14<sup>3</sup>), moral indignation (Lk 11<sup>28</sup>, Jn 8<sup>34</sup>); His spiritual background was that of joy and peace (Jn 14<sup>27</sup>, Lk 10<sup>21</sup>). The will was moved by appropriate considerations as ours is (Jn 7<sup>1-10</sup>), and displays the same sort of activities, being sustained by the operation of the same forces as in ordinary men. Thus the struggle in time of temptation is to maintain His spiritual ideals (Mt 4<sup>1-11</sup>, Jn 12<sup>27</sup>), and Jesus concentrates His attention, as men who will be victorious in time of temptation must, upon the proper object of human attention, upon the great purpose for which He has come into the world (Jn 18<sup>27</sup> and 19<sup>11</sup>). The virtues which may be particularly called the virtues of the will are exemplified, such as persistence, shown in His repeated healing upon the Sabbath (Jn 5<sup>16</sup>, Mk 3<sup>2-3</sup>), in His teaching sustained amid the constant evidence that the Jews were inclined decisively to reject Him (cf. the discourses in Jn 5 and foll. chapters). Even the more mysterious operations of the sub-conscious, or better of the supra-conscious, self are to be noted in Him, not merely in the displays of genius which He, as no other man, possessed, but in the manifestations of a power the operations of which first brought it to His empirical consciousness (Mk 5<sup>20</sup> RV). In fact, the better psychologist a man is, the more clearly he can see, in the simple narratives of the Gospels, the operations of every fundamental faculty and law of the human soul.

3. The necessity of Christ's humanity.—To one who sees no Divinity in Christ, the question of the necessity of His humanity is meaningless, not to say impertinent. Of course, He must be human, says such a one, since this is the only path to leadership. God has committed His work for men in the world to men. Apart from those mysterious communications of revelation which selected teachers of men have had, the only possible teacher of men is a man who can approach them with messages which they can understand, in words appropriate to their nature. However true these general principles are, the standpoint here assumed is not that of the Gospels. To them, Christ 'came' to the earth (see DIVINITY OF CHRIST); and the question arises why this is so, why He took upon Himself humanity and 'became flesh' (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>). Did this question arise in the minds of the Apostles? and is there trace of speculation, or of interest as to it, in the Gospels? There are indisputable traces of both in the Epistles, especially in that to the Hebrews. It is represented in this Epistle that the object of Christ's coming in the flesh was particularly to offer His body a sacrifice (10<sup>10-10</sup>, cf. 2<sup>17-18</sup>); but not merely this, for the possession of humanity itself affords Him a spiritual qualification for His priestly work, in that He shares the lot of men, and learns thereby how to sympathize with them in their temptations and their failures (2<sup>17-18</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>, 12 5<sup>2</sup>). There is also the suggestion of an idea which is brought out more clearly in the Fourth Gospel,—the same as that suggested above,—that the humanity was the necessary medium of the revelation of God, since it is through Jesus that God 'speaks' (Jn 1<sup>13</sup>). This form of presentation covers the point why the humanity was a necessity when once God had determined to enter upon the stage of human history as Redeemer. But St. John pushes the matter a little farther back. He begins with the eternal 'Word,' which was in the beginning with God and was God, and sets forth His appearing in the world under the figure of light shining into darkness (1<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>9</sup> 8<sup>12</sup>), and needed because of the darkness. The ground of the Incarnation is found in this need, in the existence of sin, and the necessity of salvation through faith (3<sup>16</sup>). It is to produce 'children of God' (1<sup>12</sup>) that Christ comes. The coming is the manifestation of the glory of God (1<sup>14</sup>), but that glory is the moral glory of 'grace and truth.' The culmination of the whole work of redemption is, however, the cross (3<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>17-18</sup> 15<sup>33</sup>, cf. He 10<sup>10-10</sup>), and it is the human body and soul of Christ that suffered there (19<sup>28</sup>). This is the central idea of the Fourth Gospel; but other elements are not lacking, as the necessity of the humanity to the work of instruction, which was a main element of Jesus' work (3<sup>11-12</sup>, 19<sup>21-22</sup>), and which culminated in the revelation of the Father, which needed humanity as the medium of communication to human beings (14<sup>49</sup> 12<sup>45</sup> 16<sup>25</sup>). Union with the Father was also essential to Christ's work (14<sup>20</sup> etc.), because this consisted in the manifestation of God's name (17<sup>6</sup>). The necessary spiritual sustenance, finally, was gained through the body and blood of Christ (6<sup>55</sup>, 58, 51), that is, through what His humanity alone was capable of doing for man.

4. Unique elements of this humanity.—The humanity of Christ, in order to satisfy the conditions now before us, must be a reality. No 'phantom,' or merely phenomenal body, could perform the offices required in these Scripture passages of the humanity. But other elements also appear which give a new aspect to the human nature. Among these need not be reckoned the origin of the body of Jesus by miraculous conception, as related in the First and Third Gospels; for however the process of development from the first cell might be initiated, the resulting development must be in any case that of a human body. Side by side with evident human limitations, such as ignorance (as of the day and hour of His own return to the earth, Mt 24<sup>36</sup>), there exist phenomena of a like nature altogether transcending humanity, such as the knowledge by which He not only 'knew what was in man' (Jn 2<sup>25</sup>), read the thoughts of men often as an open book (Mt 9<sup>12</sup>, Lk 6<sup>9</sup>), but, above all, knew perfectly the will of the Father and the mysteries of Divine truth. He walked laboriously from Judea to Galilee (Jn 4<sup>1</sup>), but He could suddenly appear upon the surface of the sea in the storm, walking upon the water (Mt 14<sup>29</sup>). These and other such considerations (see DIVINITY OF CHRIST) raise the question how these things could consist in Him, that is, the question of the nature of the Person of Christ, a question belonging to dogmatics, and thus lying outside of the scope of this article. But—this is the main point—whatever more than humanity there was in Christ, the evidence already cited is decisive as to the reality of His humanity.

5. The unity of Jesus' consciousness.—Christ was, then, a man. Does this word comprehensively express the Gospel teaching as to His person? He had as men as we have. He had a consciousness which expressed itself by the pronoun 'I.' Was this a human consciousness, so that when asked as to Himself Jesus would have replied: 'I am a man'? There are two elements in the answer to this question. (a) Jesus' consciousness was a unity. He passes easily from the consideration of earthly to heavenly things, from walking upon the water to sitting quietly in the boat, as if both of these things belonged to Him equally. The impression made upon the unsophisticated reader of the Gospels is that of a single consciousness. In fact, in order to be explicable at all, the Gospels must convey such an impression. But pivotal passages, even those which have seemed to give a basis for the idea that He spoke now 'as God' and now 'as man,' do not justify such an inference when carefully considered. He did not mean in Mt 4<sup>10</sup> 'Thou (Satan) shalt worship the Lord thy God (me),' and not I thee. He meant that the law of worship for any one, and for Him as bound to fulfil all righteousness (Mt 3<sup>3</sup>), was the worship of the Lord only. In Mt 8<sup>23-27</sup> and parallels He was not in one capacity asleep in the boat and in another watching over the disciples in that storm, but He was totally asleep as He appeared. He did not chide them for lack of faith in such a waking providence of His own, of which they had no knowledge, but for their lack of faith in God (cf. Mk 4<sup>40</sup>), whose messenger Christ was, and who would care for both Him and them. In Mk 5<sup>30</sup> and parallels it is not Jesus in one personality healing the woman and in another inquiring what had happened, that is brought before us; but God the Father made use of Him to answer the petition, unknown to Him but known to God, and He became conscious in this use of Himself that He was so used ('having come to perceive that the power which [often, on other occasions] went forth from him had [on this occasion] gone forth,' cf. RV).

(b) The centre of this personality, the Ego of this undivided consciousness, is God. Whenever He speaks of His coming into the world, it is always God that speaks, not less in Mt 10<sup>45</sup> and parallels than in Jn 3<sup>32</sup> 10<sup>18</sup>. This fact stands side by side with such facts as the confession of ignorance. They are never allowed to get far apart. When we have the passage Mt 24<sup>36</sup> confessing ignorance, it is preceded by the glorious description of the return of the Son of Man in Divine majesty (v. 30), and followed by the Judgment scene of 25<sup>31-46</sup>. There is no trace of a sense of transition or of shock in passing from one form of consciousness to the other, because there is no such shock, no transition (see KINROSS). The solution of this problem, of the unity of the consciousness in the midst of such apparent contradictions in the contents of consciousness, is, again, a problem of dogmatics.

6. The significance of the humanity of Christ for religion.—The interest of dogmatics in the humanity of Christ lies in the doctrine of a true Incarnation, which is the foundation of the doctrines of Atonement and Forgiveness. The interest of religion in Christ's humanity is the interest of believers in the forgiveness of sins, who need to feel the identification of their Redeemer with themselves. It is not without profound significance that it is said that judgment is committed to the Son of Man (Jn 5<sup>27</sup>). Whatever else of deepest truth there may be in it, there is this, that the sinner needs to feel the identification of his Judge with himself by the possession of a common human nature. When the Judge knows both the persistency and depth of sin on the one hand, and the weakness and temptations of man on the other, then only will the sinner be assured that the proffered forgiveness is for him. It is, again, the interest of believers in God, who get higher ideas of God's goodness from the greatness of the condescension involved in His 'becoming flesh.' It is, further, the interest of believers in Jesus, who, when they understand that Jesus is identified with us by the possession of our common humanity, feel a new confidence; are stimulated to more frequent prayer; become conscious that He truly draws near to them; regard their varied lot in life, which He has shared, as sanctified thereby; bear with greater equanimity their sorrows, which He also bore; find in Him their pattern of life (see OBEDIENCE, § ii.); and thus see in Him not an abstraction, but a real, objective, and personal Redeemer and object of faith, a Captain, and the Head of the Church. See, further, INCARNATION, SON OF MAN.

FRANK HUGH FOSTER.

HUMILIATION OF CHRIST.—1. Incarnation.—Jesus Christ is a problem. And yet He is not so much a problem as man would be without Him. Indeed He is, in a true sense, the solution of the problem of man. Nevertheless, to the intellect, demanding that everything in the heavens above and on the earth beneath be reduced to 'the measure of man's mind,' He remains a problem. The expressions of His consciousness of pre-existence constitute one of the chief elements of that problem. But, taken in connexion with two facts of His history, even this aspect of His person is not so dense a problem as when it is considered by itself. These two facts are (1) the expressions of His self-consciousness, direct and incidental, as to His relation to God on the one hand, and to total humanity on the other; and (2) His effects in the world and on the world. Even the pre-existence of Jesus Christ, when taken in connexion with these two outstanding facts, is, on the whole, a less problem and a smaller difficulty than the world of humanity would be without Him.

Furthermore, it would be more difficult to believe that a being who had the consciousness that Jesus had, who has done for humanity what Jesus has done, and who is to humanity what Jesus is, should have had the absolute beginning of His existence at a late point in time, than to believe that He came out of eternity and is of the eternal order. In other words, assuming and accepting the pre-existence of Jesus Christ, mystery though it be, it is easier to understand His unique earthly history, His character, His consciousness, His revelations, His work, His actual effects on the world and on men, both in the past and at the present, than it would be without that assumption. At all events, He has in several instances expressed the consciousness of having existed in a previous state before His advent into this world (Jn 3<sup>10</sup>, 8<sup>58</sup>, 10<sup>36</sup>, 17<sup>5-9</sup>). This pre-existent state was one of intimate association and intercommunion with God and participation in the glory of the Eternal Father. It is also one of the underlying presuppositions in St. Paul's Epistles (1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>7</sup>, Ph 2<sup>6-8</sup>, Col 1<sup>16-17</sup>). It is found also in an original setting in Hebrews (1<sup>2-3</sup>).

Now, whatever may be the meaning of these great passages, whatever the pre-incarnate riches and glory of Christ, He voluntarily submitted to the surrender of the resources of a Divine state for the lowliness of a human lot and the extreme of human poverty, and to the relinquishment of His equal participation in the Divine glory in exchange for the nethermost depth of human humiliation. Exactly what was involved in His self-humiliation from the Divine to the human is treated specifically under the articles on PRE-EXISTENCE, KENOSIS, and INCARNATION. Confining our attention, then, in this article to His earthly history, we find that His whole life, His entire sojourn on earth, was a humiliation. His incarnation was but the first stage in His humiliation, which continued by a deepening descent to the very end of His earthly life. His whole career in this world was a protracted humiliation or succession of humiliations between the humiliation of His incarnation and the humiliation of His crucifixion. It is worthy of note that the words of St. Paul, 'he humbled himself' (in Ph 2<sup>7</sup>), refer to experiences of His earthly life and not to the process of His incarnation.

2. His earthly life to the assumption of the Messianic mission.—The circumstances of His birth were most painful. It occurred, not in the sheltered privacy, and amid the comforts, of home, but while His mother was on a humiliating and painful pilgrimage, and among the feeding beasts, surrounded by the filth of a stable, and possibly under the observation of strange and uncouth men. But the child Jesus was not a year old before He became the object of jealousy and persecution, and had to be taken on a long and painful journey into a foreign land to save His life—a baby fugitive on the face of the earth. Showing at the age of twelve a wisdom which astonished the wisest men of the nation, and which would have secured for Him recognition, position, power, and renown, He yet willingly returned to the obscure and humble home at Nazareth; and there for the space of nearly twenty years He submitted Himself, day after day, to the control of two plain peasant people, and to the occupation and drudgery of common manual labour.

3. Humiliations of the Messianic ministry.—He knew from the beginning what the Messianic mission meant and how it would end. It was not to Him an honour to be enjoyed; it was a burden to be borne. It cost Him a struggle to submit and adjust Himself to that which He knew was so fraught with difficulty, persecution, humiliation, loneliness, suspense, and suffering, ending with the final agonies and the death of abandonment and shame. This is the reason why He needed—and received—the expression of His Father's approval at the moment of His self-dedication to the work of Messiah (Mk 1<sup>11</sup>, Lk 3<sup>22</sup>). This was the meaning of His temptation in the wilderness. This was why at the sharp turning-point in His ministry, when He looked out on the dark and lonely way of obedience unto death and deliberately chose to walk in it alone, He needed again—and again received—the assurance of His Father's recognition, approval, and sympathy (Mk 9<sup>7</sup>, Lk 9<sup>35</sup>).* It was the burden of the Messianic task that made Him, beyond all men, a man of sorrows. More than once we are told that He wept; but never that He laughed. Almost from the beginning of His ministry He was looked on with jealousy and suspicion by the powerful leaders of the people, from whom He had a right to expect encouragement and support. They kept a watch on Him, they found fault with Him, they misconstrued His actions, they perverted His sayings, they dogged His steps, they nagged Him at every turn, they accused Him of being a law-breaker, a blasphemer, an impostor, a fanatic, a demonic, an emissary of the powers of darkness (Lk 11<sup>20</sup>). They laid plots to catch Him and to kill Him; and they never ceased until they succeeded. Not only so, but little by little He lost His early popularity and was abandoned by the people. He came to those whom He had the right to claim as His own; they refused to receive Him, turned against Him. His personal ministry was comparatively a failure, and He practically an outcast. He did not even have a refuge among the friends of His youth, the people of His old home at Nazareth. They also turned against Him, rejected His claims, drove Him out of their village, made a desperate attempt to kill Him (Mk 6<sup>2</sup>, Lk 4<sup>28</sup>). The members of His own family failed to understand Him, refused to accept Him, were alienated from Him (Jn 7<sup>5</sup>). Probably they thought Him either a fanatic or a fraud. Probably on account of His strangeness and growing unpopularity they were ashamed of Him. He was subjected to the humiliation and pain of constant misunderstanding and sometimes even criticism on the part of His own disciples. He was rebuked (Mt 16<sup>27</sup>) and denied (26<sup>69-70</sup>) by one of them, sold and delivered into the hands of His enemies and murderers for a few pounds by another (26<sup>14-15</sup>), deserted by all (Mt 26<sup>56</sup>, Mk 14<sup>50</sup>). Added to these things, He suffered the humiliations of a painful poverty. Rejected at home, ejected from home, He had no place of His very own where He could feel that He might retire when weary or lonely or heart-sore, and enjoy rest without the fear of intrusion or molestation. He was dependent on charity, He was supported by charity (Lk 8<sup>3</sup>). He had to borrow a room for His last meal with His disciples (22<sup>13</sup>). He had to borrow an ass to ride into Jerusalem on the day of His triumphal entry (19<sup>33-34</sup>). Another man's stable was borrowed for Him to be born in (2<sup>7</sup>); another man's grave for Him to be buried in (Mt 27<sup>58, 60</sup>).

4. Trials and crucifixion.—His implacable enemies brought Him at last to bay. Deep in that memorable night when He was in the depths of the impenetrable gloom of Gethsemane, the sacred privacy of His last hours and His last prayer was invaded by a howling mob of underlings, hangers-on, and soldiers of the temple guard, guided by one of His own disciples (Mt 26<sup>67</sup>, Lk 22<sup>6</sup>). They took Jesus, and when they had bound

HUMILIATION OF CHRIST

Him with ropes (Jn 18<sup>24</sup>), they led Him by the halter, as if He were a desperado, to the house of the high priest. He had a keen sense of this humiliation, and protested against it (Mk 14<sup>48</sup>). Nevertheless, conscious though He was of His innocence of any evil deed or design, of His absolute purity, yes, even of His Divine dignity and mission, He submitted to the humiliation of being put on trial before the corrupt and conscienceless occupant of the high-priestly office and the white-washed hypocrites who, for the most part, constituted the governing body of the nation. After the solemn mockery was enacted and they had condemned Him to death (14<sup>64</sup>), they heaped on Him the most humiliating insults their malicious ingenuity could devise. They spat in His face (ἐπέπρωσαν εἰς τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ, Mt 26<sup>67</sup>); they threw a cloth over Him and then beat Him on the head, mockingly demanding that He should tell them who it was that struck each blow (26<sup>67-68</sup>). When it was morning, they bound Him again with ropes, and led Him thus to the Praetorium to secure sentence of death from the Roman Procurator (Mk 15<sup>1</sup>, Mt 27<sup>1</sup>). Pilate, though convinced of His innocence, did not care to involve himself in the trouble and annoyance of taking His part, and he was glad to shirk his duty and get rid of the embarrassment by turning Him over to Herod Antipas, who was at that time in Jerusalem (Lk 23<sup>7</sup>). The poor prisoner, who no longer was found to befriend or defend, was dragged through the streets to another tribunal in the hope of finding some one who had the courage as well as the power to rid the earth of Him, and He had to suffer the humiliation of appearing as a culprit before this abandoned wretch. Herod was delighted to come face to face with Jesus, and at last he was to have the long-coveted opportunity of having Him show off with a few miracles in his presence. But, though he plied Him with all sorts of requests and importunities, Jesus answered him not a single word. But Herod was not to be balked. If he could not induce Jesus to entertain him in one way, he could at least force Him to furnish entertainment for him in another way. And this Herod, this creature of low cunning, this unwashed hog of a sensualist, this seducer of his own brother's wife, this cowardly murderer of the other of the two great prophets of the day, gratified his brutal instincts by joining his soldiers in putting Jesus to scorn. They dressed Him up in a gorgeous and glaring red mantle of mock royalty, and sent Him thus through the streets back to the Praetorium of Pilate (23<sup>7-11</sup>). Pilate, overcome by the persistence of the Jewish leaders and by his own selfish and cowardly fears, decided at last to deliver Jesus up to the tender mercies of the human bloodhounds who could be appeased by nothing but His death. But before doing so, he made his soldiers strip Him and inflict on Him the terrible Roman flagellation (Mk 15<sup>15</sup>, Mt 27<sup>26</sup>), a punishment so severe that the victim often died under it. This bitter torture and bitter humiliation Jesus endured in submission and silence. While the preparation is being made for the crucifixion, He is left in the hands of the soldiers, the whole cohort is invited in to enjoy the sport, and now for the third time He is made the amusement of a band of ruffians, for it is now their turn to have a little entertainment with the Nazarene fanatic. They torment Him as a cat teases and tortures a wounded bird before devouring it. They put on Him a scarlet military robe, and having twisted branches of thorn bushes into a sort of crown, they place it on His patient brow, put a mock sceptre in His unresisting hand, and then go down on their knees before Him, shouting, "Long live the king of the Jews!"

HUMILITY

They too indulged in the sport of spitting on Him, and, yielding to the wild beast instinct which their opportunity had aroused in them, they kept beating Him over the head (ἐτυπτον εἰς τὴν κεφαλὴν αὐτοῦ, Mt 27<sup>30</sup>; ἐτυπτον αὐτοῦ τὴν κεφαλὴν καλὰμῳ, Mk 15<sup>19</sup>). While He was dressed up as a mock king, His face stained with blood and marred with spittle, Pilate, moved with pity, led Him out to the view of the clamorous mob, hoping that the spectacle of so abject an object might move them to pity (Jn 19<sup>4-5</sup>). But it seemed the more to inflame their rage (v. 6). His crucifixion was then finally decided on. And now a new humiliation was inflicted on Him. He leaves the Praetorium, and is led or driven along the crowded streets through the avenue of onlookers, bearing on His back the heavy wooden beam that was to be the instrument of His execution (v. 17). It was the symbol of His degradation and the advertisement of His disgrace.

It may be well for us to stop and try to imagine what was passing in the mind of Jesus while all these horrors were heaped upon Him. We know He was accustomed during the course of His ministry, to dwell, both in thought and in speech, on the horrors that He knew awaited Him (Mt 16<sup>28</sup> ὅτι δεῖ αὐτὸν . . . πολλὰ παθεῖν). If He so dreaded it from afar, how keen must have been the anguish of passing through it!

But these things were slight in comparison with what yet awaited Him; for this great humiliation was yet to come. He was to be subjected to the accursed and infamous death of crucifixion. When soldiers are to be put to death for desertion or treason, they are shot. The lowest of criminals, those upon whom we wish to heap disgrace in inflicting death, we hang on the gallows. What the gallows is to-day, the cross was in the days of Jesus. It was the method of execution that secured publicity, while it insured the utmost prolongation of the victim's misery. When the procession had reached the place, the cross was laid upon the ground, Jesus was denuded of all His clothing, He was stretched out upon the cross, long iron nails were driven through His hands and feet, the cross bearing His naked body was lifted up and dropped into its socket, and there, looking out on the sea of angry faces and suffering the infamous fate of the most abandoned criminal, hung Jesus, who, though He had the consciousness of having come from God and of being the sinless Son of God, yet willingly endured this humiliation that He might become the Redeemer of men. Wherefore all the ages and the highest of all the races of men have united with God in giving Him the name that is above every name, and with one accord agree in crowning Him Lord of all.

The descending scale of His humiliation, from the estate of conscious equality with God past all grades and levels down to the humiliation of the cross, has been grasped and, with a few master strokes, graphically portrayed by St. Paul in the great passage of Ph 2<sup>6-7</sup>: the humiliation of the Divine to the level of the human, the humiliation of the human to the level of the servant, to the level of the outcast and condemned criminal, and, lastly, to the degradation of a punishment the most humiliating, the most shameful, the most bitter, the most revolting, the most horrible then or ever known among men.

HUMILITY.—This virtue or grace distinguished the leaders of OT history like Abraham and Moses (Gn 18<sup>7</sup>, Nu 12<sup>3</sup>), and was inculcated by the prophets as a chief duty (Mic 6<sup>8</sup>). It belongs even to the earlier revelation of God's character ('that humbleth himself,' Ps 113<sup>3</sup>), and is the key to man's communion with Him (Is 57<sup>15</sup>). In Judaism and the Rabbinical literature we meet with a variety of examples and maxims enforcing the truth that 'God is the highest type of humility.' These anticipations prepare us for the new and enlarged conception of humility which fills the NT, and was embodied in the teaching, example, and character of Jesus Christ. The moral quality of our Saviour's personality lies here (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>), and on this foundation of astonishing humility, exemplified on the cross, St. Paul bases his great ethical appeal (Ph 2<sup>6-7</sup>). It may be claimed that the gospel alone has popularized humility, but the temper of Christ's disciples in every age proves that it is an excellence of rare and difficult attainment.

i. USE AND MEANING OF THE WORD.—The noun (ταπεινοφροσύνη, Heb. ḥumilut, Vulg. humilitas, Germ. Demut) does not occur till it is employed commonly in the NT (Lightfoot on Ph 2<sup>7</sup>); it is 'a birth of the gospel' (Trench, Syn. of the NT, § 42). In contrast to the low and servile sense attaching to it in classical writings, humility in the LXX, Apoc., and NT becomes the designation 'of the noblest and most necessary of all virtues' (Cremer's Lex.). It rests on a lowly and unpretending view of one's self, and is opposed to the workings of the ambitious spirit (μεγαλοφροσύνη, ἐπιφροσύνη). The term refers mainly to inward character, and sometimes to outward condition. Of humility as the animating principle of Christian character, Jesus Himself was the great example, being 'lowly in heart' (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>), not merely in appearance like the professional religious leaders of the time. Pharisaism is the deadly enemy of humility or the religion of healthy-mindedness. The moral temper that inspired Christ's life and service is echoed by St. Paul, when he singles out the motive that prompted his labours ('serving the Lord with all lowliness of mind,' Ac 20<sup>9</sup>). Elsewhere humility is enjoined, along with kindred graces, as the means of averting unholy disputes and of promoting co-operation in the Church and among the members of the Christian society (Mt 18<sup>23</sup>, Eph 4<sup>2</sup>, Ph 2<sup>3</sup>, Col 3<sup>2</sup>). An exceptional use of the term occurs in Col 2<sup>18-23</sup>, where the Apostle guards his readers against the counterfeit of this virtue ('a voluntary humility'). In some instances the humble are viewed in the light of their earthly condition, which God may wonderfully raise and alter (Lk 13<sup>12</sup>), and which, notwithstanding its indignities and trials, should be borne submissively and cheerfully (Ja 1<sup>2</sup>). This class of sufferers corresponds to the afflicted and meek of the OT (22, 42), and would be numerous among the peasantry or fellahin of an oppressed and lawless country (Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, s.v.). The 'poor in spirit' spoken of in the first of the Beatitudes (Mt 5<sup>3</sup>, cf. Lk 6<sup>20</sup>) are probably best understood as placed in such circumstances. In agreement with this, Ritschl (op. cit. infra) defines ταπεινοφροσύνη as 'that temper inclining to the service of God which accepts resignedly an oppressed and wretched condition.' The term, therefore, as one of deep import, is freshly coined in the NT.

ii. CONTRAST BETWEEN GREEK AND CHRISTIAN ETHICS.—The rise of this grace creates an epoch. Humility is a vice with heathen moralists, but a virtue with Christian apostles (Lightfoot on Col 2<sup>18</sup>). In particular, it marks the opposition to the Greek idea of 'high-mindedness' (art. 'Ethics,' by H. Sidgwick in Ency. Brit.), and the advance in ethical sentiment and the standard of judgment due to Christianity. A presentiment of the Christian virtue may be met with in Greek writers (see examples in Neander's Church History, vol. i. p. 26 [Eng. tr.], and in Trench, NT Syn.), but their use of ταπεινός in any noble sense is rare. The Greeks undoubtedly had their distinguishing qualities, but this was not one of them.

Cf. interesting note of conversation in Morley's Life of Gladstone, iii. p. 406. 'Mr. G.—I admit there is no Greek word of good credit for the virtue of humility. J. M.—ταπεινός! But that has an association of meanness. Mr. G.—Yes; a shabby sort of humility. Humility as a sovereign grace is the creation of Christianity.'

Greek Ethics, as expressed and systematized by Aristotle, the ancient master of moral analysis and definition, fostered pride, the genius of later Stoicism, and regarded the humble as contemptible, mean-spirited, and without force or aspiration. Aristotle's picture of the 'great-souled' man and his exaggerated sense of self-importance have a certain air of loftiness (μεγαλοψυχία), but fall below the standard which obliges the Christian to recognize his duty to others, and to treat with consideration those who are intellectually and socially inferior. The conception of humility, therefore, as it controls the Christian, lies outside the system of Aristotle (see Nic. Eth., bk. iv. ch. 3 [Sir A. Grant's ed. vol. ii. pp. 72-78]). This difference between Greek and Christian ideas of greatness and humility is fundamental, and the change was brought about by Christ's revelation of the character of God. Of Aristotle's great-souled man it is said—'his movements are slow, his voice is deep, and his diction stately' (Grant, vol. ii. p. 77, note). This measured effluence of pride reappears in Christ's portraiture of the Pharisee in the temple; but the Publican, the opposite and acceptable type, shows how influential, in Christian experience, is the thought of God, and how closely connected are humility, prayer, and confession of sin. In accordance with Augustine's well-known saying (quoted by Calvin, Institutio, bk. ii. ch. 2), humility comes first, second, third, and always, among the precepts of the Christian religion, and it marks the cleavage between Greek and Christian ideals. The magnificent figure drawn by the Greek philosopher disappears, and, instead, Christ presents the image of the little child (Mt 18<sup>3</sup>).

iii. OUR LORD'S EXAMPLE AND TEACHING.—1. The great saying which goes to the root of the matter—'I am meek and lowly in heart' (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>), has been variously interpreted (see art. by Herrmann, mentioned below), and even called in question as authentic. Martineau asks—'What meek and lowly soul was ever known to set itself forth as such and commend its own humility as the model for others?' and adds, 'did a Saviour bear such testimony of himself, his testimony would not be true' (Seat of Authority in Religion, p. 583). But the mode of speaking Christ adopted and the claim He put forward would not really seem incongruous in a 'Teacher of Israel' (Bruce, Expos. Gr. Test., note ad loc.); and, besides, the objection reads a false tone into the original utterance, and ignores the special nature of Christ's consciousness. Our Lord was more than a 'meek and lowly soul,' and had reason for presenting Himself as a model and a winning type to humanity. His humility clothed and concealed His essential dignity, and in speaking as He did He was conscious of the same time of standing in a unique relation to God (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, cf. Jn 13<sup>3</sup>). Indeed, the union on Christ's part of 'unbounded personal pretensions' with an unconscious humility that regarded His importance to the world as 'an objective fact with which his own opinion of himself had nothing to do' (Eccle Homo, ch. 15) is undeniable, and reminds us that majesty and meekness were the two poles of His mysterious yet harmonious character. Christ's humility, however, does not rest on a phrase, but was carried out in the lowly setting of His earthly life. His cradle in the manger at Bethlehem and His subjection in the home at Nazareth, His quiet entrance, at the hands of the Baptist, on public life, His restraint in the use of His supernatural powers, and His dislike of consequent honour and fame, His frequent periods of retirement, His choice of followers and friends, His sympathies with little children and humble suppliants (Mk 10<sup>13-16</sup> and 7<sup>34-35</sup>), His appreciation of the smallest offering and the simplest service (Lk 21<sup>1-4</sup>, Mt 10<sup>42</sup>), and, finally, His submission to the experiences concentrated in the week of His Passion and Crucifixion, all attest the consistency of His character as One who was 'meek and lowly in heart,' and who, at every step of His career, plainly and profoundly 'humbled himself' (Ph 2<sup>8</sup>).

2. Passing from Christ's example, the main lines of His teaching are two—

(1) Humility in relation to God, or the Law of Grace.—We are introduced here to the most powerful among the motives to humility, and to a relation deeper than any that influences us in the society of our fellow-men. In Wendt's language.—Humility is the conscious lowliness we feel before God in view of His superabundant love and holy majesty, and in contrast to our own unworthiness, guilt, and entire dependence on His grace' (The Teaching of Jesus, vol. i, p. 341, note [Eng. tr.]). We cannot therefore exaggerate our worth or assert our claims before God: the part we play is that of 'unprofitable servants' who, after all their performances, should be filled neither with the sense of merit nor the spirit of boasting (Lk 17<sup>10</sup>). In the parable, which is a gem of teaching on this point, Jesus enforces on us the duty of humility towards God, the need of genuine self-abasement and confession of sin, as we see and feel our unworthiness in the Divine presence (Lk 18<sup>9-14</sup>). He represents God as turning away from the shallow and sounding words of the Pharisee, but giving His mercy freely to the penitent publican who could not look up. For, as a fine Jewish saying puts it, 'While God despises what is broken among the animals, He loves in man a broken heart.' This is a fundamental law of the Kingdom of heaven and the indispensable condition of grace: 'for every one that exalteth himself shall be humbled, but he that humbleth himself shall be exalted' (cf. Pr 3<sup>34</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>6</sup>).

Prof. Dowden, in writing of Milton's view of the intercourse between God and the soul, remarks:—There are two humilities—that which bows and that which soars, the humility of a servant who looks down, the humility of a son who gazes up. Milton's humility invigorates itself in the effort to ascend. He would not prostrate himself in the presence of material symbols, but would enter as a glad child into the courts of heaven' (Puritan and Anglican, p. 167). This is the humility that Christ welcomes, and that makes religion not stiff and heavy with ceremonial, but simple, reverent, glad, and pleasing to God. On no other terms is grace given or fellowship with God possible. 'Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall in nowise enter therein' (Lk 18<sup>17</sup>).

(2) Humility in relation to men, or the Law of Service.—While it is true that humility 'is not primarily concerned with our relation to other men, but with our relation to God, and springs from an intellectually true view of that relation' (Illingworth, Christian Character, 1905, p. 27), yet its importance in regulating men's ordinary conduct and intercourse did not escape Christ's notice. His striking lessons on this subject were called for at the time, and are far from being exhausted, for it is still true that 'the really humble man is as great in the moral world as he is rare' (Bruce, Expos. Gr. Test. on Mt 18<sup>4</sup>).

(a) The child, the unconscious type of humility (Mt 18<sup>4</sup>, Mk 9<sup>33-37</sup>).—This was Christ's object-lesson on the question that caused frequent heart-burning among the disciples, 'Who then is greatest?' etc. Their assimilation of their Master's mind proceeded slowly. As He went on absorbed in the thought of His approaching cross, His followers walked behind and stirred each other's worst passions by raising questions of place and precedence. At their next interview the Master of men set a child in the midst of His disciples, and shamed them out of their unworthy temper. 'This is our Lord's rebuke of pride, rivalry, and ambition in their thousand forms, His reversal of our ordinary and selfish ideas of greatness, and His warning against the world's spirit of exclusiveness, intolerance, and class distinctions. The truly great is he who considers the claims of others and is slow to give offence (Mt 18<sup>6</sup>), and who on all occasions appears simple, teachable, unpretending, indifferent to questions of rank and superiority, and willing to humble himself 'as this little child.' It is only the childlike heart that is capable of knowing God (Mt 11<sup>25</sup>), and of finding the way into His kingdom. This image has stamped itself on the mind of Christendom, and this pattern of greatness is still fresh. Human character is once for all taught to mould itself after this original and lovely type. Christ first saw the hatefulness and unworkableness of a world without a child!

(b) The servant, the practical example of humility (Mt 23<sup>23-28</sup>, Mk 10<sup>34-45</sup>, Lk 22<sup>26-27</sup>, Jn 13<sup>14-17</sup>).—This ideal of service was presented on principal occasions: the one when the sons of Zebedee came forward with their request for the leading places in the Kingdom; and the other when the same love of dignity, and the jealous exclusion of each other's claims, gave rise to the strife that marred the Last Supper. In rebuking this spirit, Christ had in view not merely the mistaken tendencies of His disciples, who were already fired by the promise of individual 'thrones' (Lk 22<sup>29</sup>) dear to the Israelitish imagination, but also the popular and prevailing standards of the time. The rulers of the Gentiles aimed at supremacy, and, in the exercise of a harsh authority, delighted to 'lord it over them'; and equally the scribes and Pharisees, in their fondness for places and titles of honour, coveted influence and recognition as the 'great ones' of Jewish society. Christ required a new standard and line of conduct from His followers. 'Not so shall it be among you.' Henceforth, greatness lies in conformity to a higher than the heathen or Jewish type: 'but whosoever would become great among you shall be your minister; etc. The principle of this law is not impersonal, but personal; the seat of authority in the Christian religion and in Christian morals is Christ: 'even as the Son of Man came,' etc. (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>). Finally, in one concrete act, Christ gave an illustration of the great principle He enunciated, when, at the Passover meal, He rose and 'took a towel and girded himself,' and washed the disciples' feet. This astonishing incident left an ineffaceable impression (1 P 5<sup>6</sup>), and warranted the literal saying: 'I am in the midst of you as he that serveth' (Lk 22<sup>27</sup>). Such an ideal and example of service have slowly effected a revolution in the moral sentiment and practice of mankind. We may add, if Christ's setting forth of the child was evidence of His originality as a teacher, the substitution of the servant for the ruler was a no less striking proof of the uniqueness of His insight and methods.

*It is one of the achievements of Jesus that He introduced into the world a new ideal of greatness, such an ideal as men had never dreamed of' (D. Smith, The Days of His Flesh, 1905, p. 442. Cf. Hermann in art. below: 'Im NT ist ohne Zweifel der Eindruck wiedergegeben dass Jesus in dieser Beziehung seinen Jüngern etwas völlig Neues gegeben hat').

Some ideals are too airy and remote to come into touch with actual experience and practice, but Christ's Law of Service is capable of daily realization, and is within the reach of every one. It is open to all to do some simple deed of kindness, helpfulness, and self-denial, and no action inspired by Christ-like love and humility will pass unnoticed or unrewarded by the gracious Master and great Servant of all (Mt 25<sup>37</sup>).

IV. CHARACTERISTICS AND RELATIONSHIPS.—A few further points of general and practical interest are suggested by this subject, and may be briefly touched on.

1. Humility and character.—In ordinary experience, humility is related to sin and penitence, and marks the feeling of unworthiness in the light of the illimitable moral ideal. In presence of the holy revelation of the Son of God, conscience becomes sensitive, and the sense of guilt, as in the case of Peter (Lk 5<sup>7</sup>), weighs men down. 'This, however, is not one of the essential conditions of humility, for we know that humility was also an element in Christ's character' (Ritschl). The greatness of the Baptist was rooted in his humility and utter freedom from jealousy (Jn 3<sup>27-29</sup>), and this grace has been the soil and safety of saints ever since. Keble treated others with a 'humbling humility' (Lusk's Life, p. 233). Cf. MacEwen's Life of Cairns, p. 600: 'The first personal impression that he made on all who met him was one of wonder at his humility'. The child, to which Christ pointed, represents humility as part of the essence and permanence of Christian character, and remains 'an immortal type, preserving the wonder and bloom of the moral world.'

2. Humility and kindred virtues.—No Christian grace is isolated or thrives alone. Humility is 'part of a great moral whole. Instead of proseribing, it promotes the growth of virtues unlike yet not unfriendly to itself' (Liddon on 'Humility and Action' in University Sermons). Thus it is closely connected with Truth, for humility or confession that does not rest on the recognition of facts is insincere and worthless. It is inspired by Love; ministering love appears always in the guise of humility. Meekness rests on humility as its foundation (Trench), and Patience expresses along with humility the practical virtue of the Christian religion, especially called for and tested in the world (Ritschl).

3. Humility and self-consciousness.—It has been the tendency of certain schools of theology and piety to make humility the result of self-contemplation, arrived at by the soul's reaction upon itself. This gives rise to artificial and extreme methods of discipline, and misses the healthy objectivity of the life that forgets self in the consideration and service of others (see Herrmann's art. for vigorous criticism of this tendency and ideal of asceticism, derived from Augustine and Bernard. Cf. Harnack's History of Dogma (Eng. tr.), vi. p. 10, note). Humility is 'the eye which sees everything except itself' (quoted in Ritschl). Work and the school of life are the best discipline of humility, as of the other virtues.

'We are to respect our responsibilities,' wrote Mr. Gladstone, 'not ourselves. We are to respect the duties of which we are capable, but not our capabilities simply considered. There is to be no complacent self-contemplation, beaming upon self. When self is viewed, it must always be in the most intimate connexion with its purposes' (Morley's Life, i. 214).

On the other hand, the externalizing of humility and the danger of parading it in rules and ceremonies that lead to self-humiliation must equally be avoided. Christ and His Apostles discountenanced all needless self-consciousness and show of virtue (Mt 6<sup>26</sup>, Col 2<sup>23</sup>). Cf. Ritschl: 'Even in ascetic forms of worship there is no particular form of expression necessary to humility'.

4. Humility and individuality.—This virtue is not to be cultivated to the neglect of manliness or at the expense of loyalty to religious and moral principle (Mt 10<sup>23</sup>). Christ honours the spirit of energy and enterprise in us, and blames the hiding of our talents and the misuse of our opportunities through diffidence or cowardice (Mt 25<sup>14ff</sup>). The manly and energetic character of the centurion, as shown in his faith, was doubtless as pleasing to Jesus as the soldier's reverence and humbleness of address (Lk 7<sup>9</sup>). Humility or the fear of God should banish all unworthy fear. Christ's unflinching exposure of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 23) calls us to be courageous in adherence to truth and righteousness, and in view of evil and opposition, however powerful. It was a wholesome saying of the Rabbis: 'The disciple of the wise should have sufficient pride to stand in defence of the Law he represents.' Self-assertion has therefore its legitimate sphere, and the 'salt' of individuality in religion and in society should in nowise be lost. There is the danger, however, of exaggerating our own view and importance; 'it always needs much grace to see what other people are, and to keep a sense of moral proportion' (Denney, Expos. Gr. Text. on Ro 12<sup>3</sup>). In the adaptation of the Christian Church to society, and to reconcile conflicting interests, it requires humility 'to adjust men in due order for the purposes of life' (T. B. Strong's Christian Ethics, Hampton Lect. 1895, p. 127).

5. Humility and science.—Christ's interview with Nicodemus teaches that the assumption of knowledge ('we know,' Jn 3<sup>2</sup>) may cover only ignorance and confusion. The 'wise and understanding' (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>) receive no new light; self-satisfied pride and prejudice are the foes of spiritual enlightenment and intellectual advance. The true student and investigator of nature must still feel, like Newton, that, notwithstanding his progress and attainments, the great ocean of truth lies undiscovered before him. Docility, not dogmatism, is the mark of the inquirer, and the means of intellectual development. In this important and ever-changing region of science, R. H. Hutton has well observed that humility 'means the docility of learners towards a teacher infinitely above them,' and that it requires wisdom to see the true relations between different kinds of knowledge, and to keep physical knowledge from being turned to a false and dangerous use in the sphere of moral truth. Here also the master of truth and knowledge must take the place of a servant, and illustrate his greatness by his humility.—and science is humble only when it uses its knowledge and its ignorance alike to help other men and not to lord it over them' (Essay on 'The Humility of Science' in Aspects of Religious and Scientific Thought, 1901). So manifold is the function of this indispensable and crowning grace.

HUMOUR.—Humour in its highest form is the sign of a mind at peace in itself, for which the contrasts and contradictions of life have ceased to jar, though they have not ceased to be; which accepts them as necessary and not without meaning and value, indeed as giving an added charm to life, because it looks at them from a point above them. In other words, humour is the faculty which lets a man see what Plato calls 'the whole tragedy and comedy of life' (Philebus, 50 B)—the one in the other, comedy in tragedy, tragedy in comedy.

The Gospels make it plain that the environment of Jesus was quite a normal one. He had lived among men, worked, played, and talked with men from infancy to manhood, and was familiar with the language of men and with their habits of mind. Hence it may be noticed that in speaking to men He uses the language of reality and experience. His words are stamped as His own by their delicate ease, which implies sensibility to every real aspect of the matter in hand, a sense of mastery and peace. There lay a broad contrast between the common sense His hearers had gathered from experience and the moral ideals which He propounded, and it is quite clear that this contrast did not escape Him, nor can He have failed to see that, judged by the ordinary common sense of men, His sayings were absurd. With this consciousness of the superficial absurdity and the underlying value of what He said, He bade men when smitten on the one cheek 'turn the other' (Mt 5<sup>39</sup>), go 'two miles' with the man who exacted one (v. 41), yield the cloak to him who took the coat (v. 40),—in fact, His followers were asked to be 'lambs,' missionaries 'among wolves' (Mt 10<sup>16</sup>, Lk 10<sup>3</sup>), and to 'leap for joy' when they were ill treated (Lk 6<sup>23</sup>).

In all these sayings there is obvious contradiction between the sense value and the thought beneath. Again, there is abundant evidence of the use of the grotesque by Jesus—a use natural to homely and friendly talk. Would a father, for example, offer a hungry child a stone instead of bread, a snake instead of a fish, a scorpion instead of an egg (Mt 7<sup>9-10</sup>, Lk 11<sup>11-12</sup>)? The Pharisee, He says, is like a man who cleans the outside of his cup and forgets that he drinks from the inside (Mt 23<sup>23</sup>). Do men, He asks, 'gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?' (Mt 7<sup>16</sup>). He urges His hearers not to cast their 'pearls before swine' (Mt 7<sup>6</sup>). The idea of having 'a beam in one's own eye' is grotesque, as He meant it to be (Mt 7<sup>3-4</sup>). When He bade His hearers take no care for the morrow, because caring for the morrow was the distinguishing mark of the Gentile as contrasted with the Jew (Mt 6<sup>25</sup>), He spoke with full knowledge of Jewish character, and must have known that His hearers would smile. 'Do not even the publicans so?' (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>), is an instance of reductio ad absurdum. 'Is it lawful on the Sabbath days to do evil or to do good?' (Lk 6<sup>9</sup>), was, His critics on the spot would feel, an absurd question, except that it caught them in a dilemma. Similarly, to ask the rich young ruler if he had kept the commandments, 'Thou shalt not kill,' etc., must have struck the onlooker as odd, and Jesus can hardly have failed to feel this (Mk 10<sup>19</sup>). The simile that follows, of the camel and the needle's eye, shows recourse to the grotesque again (Mk 10<sup>25</sup>). It should be remembered that Jesus' hearers were not unfamiliar with religious teaching given in ironic form.

There is humour in the appeal to the practice of the Egyptians and Syrians of calling their tyrannic and worthless rulers Euergetes, 'Benefactor' (Lk 22<sup>25</sup>); and in the accompanying suggestion that the real chief among Christ's followers is 'he that doth serve' (Lk 22<sup>26</sup>), there is a conscious reversal of ordinary notions, which would make the hearers smile even while they realized the serious meaning. There is a hint of playfulness in the promise that Peter shall 'catch men' (Lk 5<sup>9</sup>). The question put to the rich fool, 'Then whose shall those things be?' (Lk 12<sup>20</sup>), has a grim touch,—there is a suggestion in it of reckonings grievously wrong; and something of the kind lurks in the tale of the man who built his house on the sand—a tale told, it must be remembered, by one who had been a teknon (Mt 7<sup>28</sup>). There are other stories, too, of people of pretension who are ludicrously out in their reckonings, e.g. the king who went to war with a light heart (Lk 14<sup>33</sup>), and the man who could not finish his tower (v. 28). There is surely grim humour also in the words, 'It cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem' (Lk 13<sup>34</sup>). In conclusion, there are in the recorded sayings of Jesus many traces of their origin in conversation. He is a man speaking to men in the language of men, and pathos, contrast, humour, and spontaneity are the natural and pleasant marks of that language. He, like all great teachers, speaks from the abundance of His heart (Mt 12<sup>34</sup>), and a smile is felt in His words, as in the words of all who see contradiction without loss of inner peace. HUNGER.—The substantive 'hunger' (EV) is the equivalent of a Greek word (λαμός) which in the NT is used either of the suffering of an individual (Lk 15<sup>17</sup>, cf. 2 Co 11<sup>37</sup>), or, more generally, of the widespread plague of famine (cf. Mk 13<sup>8</sup>, Lk 4<sup>25</sup> etc.; see Blass' Gram. of NT Greek, p. 299, for the combination λοιμοί και λιμοί [parechesis]). The more frequently occurring verb is an altogether different word (πεινᾶν), and it is sometimes found where we might expect λαμός or its cognates (Mt 5<sup>4</sup> and Lk 6<sup>21</sup>). The latter occurs in but 6 places in the Gospels, while the former is found no fewer than 17 times.

There is, perhaps, no feature of Jesus' human experience so vividly instructive as that which is portrayed for us in the simple incidental expression 'He hungered' (Mt 4<sup>2</sup>—Lk 4<sup>2</sup>, Mt 21<sup>19</sup>—Mk 11<sup>13</sup>). This is noted twice by the Synoptists; and though we have no such direct statement by St. John, we are not left by the latter without a reference to this side of 'the humiliation of Christ.' The story of Jesus' conversation with the woman of Samaria conveys the same impression as to the physical limitations to which He was subject with which we are struck in the Synoptic writings. The anxiety of the disciples for the satisfaction of their Master's needs (Jn 4<sup>3</sup>) 'Paḡḡel, ὄσῳ' explains at least one cause of the bodily weariness which compelled Him to rest 'thus by the well.'

It is of the greatest interest to notice that, on the two occasions when it is definitely stated that Jesus suffered the pangs of hunger, the writer has pointedly attached to the narrative a lesson of psychological and spiritual value. St. Matthew and St. Luke both inform us not only that on the completion of His forty days' fast 'he hungered'; they also tell us that the Tempter attacked Him on the side of His consequent weakness. 'If thou art the Son of God, command that these stones become bread' (Mt 4<sup>7</sup>, cf. the stronger and more graphic mould in which St. Luke casts the narrative by adopting the singular τῷ λίθῳ τούτῳ for οἱ λίθοι οὗτοι and ἄpros for ἄpros, Lk 4<sup>3</sup>), expresses the subtle nature of this temptation in a manner which is profoundly in keeping with all human experience (see F. W. Robertson's sermon on 'Elijah,' second series).

It is surely more rational to accept the Synoptic statement that this was, in point of fact, the first of the three temptations, for the reason given above, than to adopt the order given in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, as G. Holtzmann is inclined to do (cf. his Leben Jesu, Eng. tr. pp. 94 and 140-150). The author of this Gospel places the temptation by hunger after that on the high mountain, which he puts first in the series. Holtzmann, moreover, argues that the first temptation, according to the First and Third Evangelists, occurred last of all. Among other reasons for this inversion, he bases his statement on the fact that Jesus met the suggestion to convert the stone into a loaf by a quotation taken from Dt 8<sup>3</sup>, whereas His answers to the other two are quotations from an earlier part of the same book (Dt 6<sup>13</sup> and 6<sup>16</sup>). To the present writer this looks like trifling with the evidence, and seems to expose this author to the charge of adopting any statement as having prima facie claims to being historical provided it be a contradiction of the sacred books. The very simplicity of the narratives as we have them forbids us to assume that the writers manufactured an order by means of 'a gradation as regards localities, or by presenting a series of grand climacterics—satisfaction of hunger, miraculous action, and sovereignty of the world.' (For the curious passage in the Gospel according to the Hebrews (. . . ἰδὲ ἀπὸ τῆς ἐπιείκους ἀρετῆς ἐδεδίει καὶ τὸ μῆλον καὶ τὸ κύνιον καὶ τὸ μῆλον τοῦ κύνιον αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἀπέστηκεν αὐτὸς ἐν τῷ ἔργῳ τοῦ μύρου τοῦ θανάτου) which makes Mt. Tabor the scene of the Temptation, see Origen, in Jocann. tom. ii. § 61., given in Nestlé's Grecum Supplementum, p. 77. The same passage is quoted more than once by Jerome, who each time refers it to the Evangelium quod secundum (iuxta) Hebræos (c.g. in Is 1513).

The other recorded occasion on which Jesus suffered from hunger was at the end of His ministry, and during that week when His last conflict with the religious authorities of His nation culminated in His Passion and Death. The incident affords an example of the way in which the Evangelists, in their choice of literary material, were guided to subordinate the selection of historical facts to the moral and spiritual importance attaching to them. Neither St. Matthew nor St. Mark was deterred from relating the story of the fruitless fig-tree by a fear lest the appearance of harshness and petulance should detract from the moral dignity of their Master. Their portrait of Him was too faithful and their insight too keen to permit any suggestion, to themselves at least, of an unworthy display, in an angry moment, of thaumaturgical energy. See art. FIG-TREE.

The union between Christ and His people, so repeatedly insisted on by Jesus as indispensable to their higher life (see, e.g., Jn 15<sup>46</sup>), is postulated in His great eschatological discourse. The sufferings of redeemed humanity are His sufferings, and the loving service, which clothes the naked and feeds the hungry, is hallowed because it is done, not merely in His cause, but for Himself (Mt 25<sup>34</sup>, cf. 10<sup>40</sup>). There is something more in these words than an expression of sympathy by a brother who has himself experienced deprivation and snifering (cf. He 4<sup>14</sup>), and who feels for one who is passing through similar stages. We have in them a vivid portraiture of that essential and spiritual oneness upon which the writer of the Fourth Gospel lays such emphasis (cf. Jn 14<sup>19</sup> 17<sup>20-22</sup> etc.; see also Ac 9<sup>9</sup> Ἐγὼ εἶμι Ἰησοῦς ὃς ἐὼν διδάσκω).

It is not without significance that not only have we this mystic union adumbrated by the Synoptists which is elaborated and, inchoatively at least, systematized by St. John; we have also recorded in the writings of all three an incident illustrative of that complete companionship in privations as well as in privileges which He demanded as the essence of discipleship from the scribe who would follow Him whithersoever He went (Lk 9<sup>58</sup> = Mt 8<sup>20</sup>; cf. Mt 10<sup>28</sup> 16<sup>24</sup>, Lk 9<sup>57</sup>, Mk 8<sup>34</sup> etc.). The fact that the disciples suffered hunger is specifically mentioned by St. Matthew, though it is only to be inferred from the parallel passages in the other two Synoptists (cf. Mk 2<sup>23</sup> = Mt 12<sup>10</sup> = Lk 6<sup>10</sup>). On this occasion Jesus takes advantage of the opportunity afforded by the carping criticism of the Pharisees to emphasize, by an appeal to the case of the hungry David, His teaching on the Sabbath question. A fine touch is added by each of the Synoptists which beautifully illustrates the spirit of camaraderie existing between Jesus and His disciples. The touch is incidental, and therefore the more effective. Each of the writers expressly states that it was the disciples who were plucking the ears of corn and not Jesus, though each commences the narrative by making Jesus the subject of the story (Ἐρωπῶντες δὲ Ἰησοῦς, κ.τ.λ., Mt 12<sup>1</sup>; . . . αὐτὸν διαρωπῶσθενα, Mk 2<sup>23</sup>, Lk 6<sup>3</sup>). It was through the disciples that the Pharisees attacked Him (cf. however, Lk 6<sup>7</sup>); and it was in their defence that Jesus met them with the unanswerable argument taken from their own armoury—the OT.

It will not surprise us to find Jesus transferring the idea of physical hunger to the spiritual life and experience, as this habit of transposition forms one of the most attractive and powerful features in His teaching. Just as in man's physical life hunger is a sign of health, and becomes an evil only when its cravings cannot be satisfied, so Jesus counts those blessed whose soul's health is robust enough to cause them to cry out from hunger after righteousness (note the peculiar construction which has the accusative τὴν δικαιοσύνην after πεινώσκει instead of the genitive of classical writers; cf. Od. xx. 137; Xen. Cyr. viii. iii. 39; Plato, Rep. 521 A; see Blass' Grammar of NT Greek, p. 89 f.; and Liddell and Scott's Lexicon). That need, because it is felt, shall be met in the fullest possible way, hence their blessedness (ὅτι αὐτοὶ χορσαθήσονται, Mt 5<sup>6</sup>; cf. Lk 6<sup>21</sup>).

On the other hand, they are to be pitied whose spiritual appetite is so deranged that they feel no need at all, because the day shall come when they must feel, and the pangs of hunger shall remain without hope of alleviation (ὅτι πεινώσκει, Lk 6<sup>26</sup>). That He possessed the power of permanently satisfying the deepest needs of the human soul, Jesus categorically asserts on more than one occasion (Jn 6<sup>35</sup>, cf. 4<sup>14</sup> and 7<sup>37</sup>). In these express assurances we may see the profoundest explanation of the words of the Magnificat: 'The hungry he hath filled with good things; and the rich he hath sent empty away' (Lk 1<sup>53</sup>), which are but the echo of the words in which the Psalmist long before had clothed his experience (Ps 107<sup>9</sup>). J. R. WILLIS.

HUSBAND (ἀνὴρ).—Betrothal and marriage were virtually one among the Jews. The former consisted in the simple act, on the part of the bridegroom or his deputy, of giving to the bride or her representative a written engagement, in the presence of two witnesses, or a piece of money, large or small, with the words, 'Be thou consecrated unto me.' Like marriage itself, of which it was the initiatory step, it could be dissolved only by death or divorce. Under the Mosaic Law, the marriage tie was comparatively easily broken, and divorces seem to have been quite common. During the period of the later prophets the ethical standard was considerably advanced ('God hates putting away,' Mal 2<sup>16</sup>). Christ Himself utterly set aside the law of Moses, and limited the dissolution of the marriage tie to the one cause of adultery; and in this respect He apparently put the two sexes on the same plane (Mk 10<sup>11</sup>). The mercy of Christ towards sinners against the law of sexual morality as laid down by Himself is, however, beautifully illustrated in His treatment of the Samaritan woman (Jn 4<sup>18-19</sup>), and in that of the woman taken in adultery (8<sup>1-11</sup>).

In Mt 1<sup>16-19</sup> Joseph is called 'the husband' of Mary, indicating, in connexion with v. 25, that true marital relations existed between them. This is in evident conflict with the Apocrypha, which assigns to Joseph the place of a guardian rather than that of a true husband, in order to uphold the perpetual virginity of Mary. See, further, art. MARRIAGE, WIFE. HENRY E. DOSKKE.

HUSBANDMAN (γεωργός).—Jesus knew well the life of the fields. His keen eye for illustrations fell readily on the most fundamental of occupations; one universal since the primeval days when simple patriarchs began to be husbandmen, and princes digged at the up-springing well ('which the nobles of the people delved, with the sceptre and with their staves, Nc 21<sup>18</sup> RV). Agriculture, in Israel's best days, had been the chief employment, and still from out the scattered villages men were to be seen at work upon the croftlike patches. As sure token of happy and successful labours, the plain was verdant with the growing grain, the vines hung graceful from the terraced slope. The human mind never fails to be arrested in religious mood by the mystic forces of nature; and in the case of the Jews there was this added discipline, that Scripture, read stately in their hearing, teemed with references to the tilling of the soil. Ready to the lips of Jesus, therefore, was an allusive speech which should prove powerful in appeal to educated and uneducated alike. The way into the popular sentiment was clear for Him. People were at least grounded in the elements of literary thought. On the principles and growth of the great Kingdom He could discourse profitably under the familiar images of seed-time and harvest, tree or plant culture in their gardens, or the ongoings in their season of the workers in the vineyard on the hill.

What probably commended this line of teaching to Jesus, however, was the fact that husbandry suggests, in singular fashion, the co-ordination of man's activity with God's. Without, on the one hand, what is graciously supplied to us—soil and seed, rain and sunshine—man's labour could be of no avail; yet, on the other hand, without that labour well directed, mankind would perish. The lesson is writ large in cultivated fields that faith and hope, zeal and patience, have a reward assured which comes immediate from the hand of God. Further, this rural imagery of Jesus met the fact that the minds hearing Him were not all equally ready to see the truth in His light. For such persons, pictures from the outer and familiar realm stored up material for self-culture in the future. And nothing better certifies the supreme justness of the Master than this, that the thousand revelations of the natural science of to-day illustrate only the more those spiritual principles and universal laws of the unseen which He was wont to enforce by reference to phenomena around Him as He spoke.

The slighter glances recorded of Jesus in this realm are fairly numerous. Compare the references to plants and trees (Mt 7<sup>16-25</sup> 12<sup>33</sup>, Lk 6<sup>42-45</sup>), the putting of the hand to the plough (Lk 9<sup>62</sup>), the application of salt to the land (Mt 5<sup>12</sup>, Lk 14<sup>35</sup>), the ox fallen into the pit (Lk 14<sup>5</sup>), the action of the airs of heaven (Lk 12<sup>35</sup>, Jn 3<sup>8</sup>), the glowing or beloued sky (Mt 16<sup>2-3</sup>, Lk 12<sup>34</sup>), the buyer gone to survey his piece of ground (Lk 14<sup>15</sup>), or busy testing his new teams (v. 15), the deeply-suggestive corn of wheat (Jn 12<sup>24</sup>), the sifting of the same (Lk 22<sup>31</sup>), the tenant counting up his measures (Lk 16<sup>7</sup>), labourers needed for the plentiful harvest (Mt 9<sup>27-30</sup>, Lk 10<sup>2</sup>), the growing whiteness of the crops (Jn 4<sup>8</sup>), the fated twain of field workers (Mt 21<sup>40</sup>, Lk 17<sup>37</sup>), and the beautiful picture of the fig-tree at the approach of summer putting forth leaves upon its tender branch (Mt 24<sup>32</sup>, Lk 21<sup>29</sup>).

But chiefly in the exquisite parables do we see that power of observation in the material world which makes Jesus so engaging as a child of nature, who lived much, and lived free, in the open air of Palestine. As we move with Him by the highways and the hedges, we descry in one field the servant ploughing or feeding cattle (Lk 17<sup>7</sup>), in another the well-remembered spot where gleanings of joy lit up the rustic's eyes who happened upon hid treasure (Mt 13<sup>44</sup>). Here we have the corn-lands green with the sprouting of the tiny blade (Mk 4<sup>26-29</sup>), tangled betimes with the tares (Mt 13<sup>25</sup>); there the rocky and the thorn-choked patches (Mk 4<sup>5-7</sup>); and over all the hovering birds (v. 4), ready to devour the precious seed. We see the labourers standing in the market-place for hire (Mt 20<sup>9</sup>), the prosperous farmer critical about his barns (Lk 12<sup>35</sup>), the shepherd searching the grassy plateau for his sheep (Mt 18<sup>12</sup>). Men are working in the clumps of vines (Mt 21<sup>28</sup>), from which the wine-press peeps (Mk 12<sup>1</sup>), and where the watch-tower stands upon its bolder coign (v. 7). See the garden where the tall mustard grows (Lk 13<sup>9</sup>), and wonder the forlorn fig-tree (v. 9) threatened with the axe. The whole world of nature, the varied scenes of toil, are laid amply under contribution, made the emblems and the witness of the highest things of the Spirit. (See art. VINE (ALLEGORY OF) for discourse upon the Vine and the Branches, Jn 15<sup>1-8</sup>, where the Father is the Husbandman; cf. also art. AGRICULTURE).

One parable must be specially noted—the story of the Wicked Husbandmen (Mt 21<sup>33-43</sup>, Mk 12<sup>1-9</sup>, Lk 20<sup>9-13</sup>), which is an incisive review of God's relations with His people. Endless pains had been taken (Mk 12<sup>1</sup>) with the vineyard of the Kingdom, yet when messenger after messenger came seeking fruit in the Divine name, they had been sent empty away, and contemptuously treated—one beaten, another wounded, a third killed (vv. 2-3). Nowhere does Jesus put Himself more clearly in line with the prophets. As the gloomy night is gathering fast around His own head, He feels full affinity of fate with them. In the passage He carries, indeed, the history of Israel's ancestral conduct not only to the days of the Baptist, but even a little beyond the moment of utterance. We have insight into the marvellous composure of the heart of Jesus as He pictures His own case in the person of the one son, well beloved, who was cast out, bruised and bleeding, his body soon to be cold in death upon the highway (v. 9). Thus, in tragic fashion, He broadens the charge against His opponents, with their complacent jealousy (v. 7), by proving their conduct to be of a piece with Israel's cruel treatment of speakers for God in the past. The note of severity and moral indignation is unmistakable, but it is blended with one of wistful sadness. Not that His own approaching death troubles Him; He fears not as He enters into the cloud, and is ready to give His life as covenant blood for the setting up of the Kingdom. But His countrymen's wayward folly, and the terrible crisis at hand for the Jewish State, weigh heavy on His spirit. Their doom, He concludes, is written with God's own finger on the wall, for those who had the eyes to see: 'He will come, and destroy the husbandmen, and will give the vineyard unto others' (v. 9).

HUSKS.—The only mention of husks (κεράτριά, so called from their shape, which resembles 'horns') occurs in Lk 15<sup>16</sup>. Husks were the pods of the carob-tree, which is also known as the locust-tree (Ceratonia siliqua). This tree, which is common in Palestine, belongs to the order Leguminosae, and is an evergreen. It attains to a height of about 30 feet, and has a dense foliage. Its leaves are of a dark, glossy green. The pods are from 6 to 10 inches in length and 1 in breadth. They contain a thick, sweet pulp, not unpleasant to the palate, and are used as food for pigs, cattle, and horses. They are also, because of their cheapness, eaten by the very poor.

Some have identified the pods of the carob with the 'locusts' (ἀσπίδες) which John the Baptist ate (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>). It is true they are sometimes called 'St. John's bread,' this name having been given to them by the monks of Palestine or by 'pious pilgrims' (Thomson, LB p. 655), but there can be little doubt that the Baptist's food was not carob-pods, but the insect, which is still eaten by the wandering Arabs. See LOCUST. HUGH DUNCAN.

HYMN.—1. Introductory.—In the earliest period the terms 'hymn' (ᾠδὴ) and 'to hymn' (ᾠδεῖν) seem to have covered practically every kind of composition which was sung or rhythmically recited in Christian worship or the Christian assemblies.

In Col 3<sup>16</sup> and Eph 5<sup>19</sup> the three terms ᾠδὴ (hymn), ψαλμοὶ (psalm), and ᾠδὴ (song) are found together as descriptive of the acts of praise offered to God in the early Christian assemblies. While the leading idea of ψαλμοὶ is a musical accompaniment, and that of ᾠδὴ, praise to God, ᾠδὴ is the general word for a song, whether accompanied or unaccompanied, whether of praise or on any other subject. Thus it was quite possible for the same song to be at once ψαλμοὶ, ᾠδὴ, and ᾠδὴ (Lightfoot on Col 3<sup>16</sup>).

Specifically hymns came in course of time to be distinguished from psalms (i.e. the canonical Bk. of Psalms) and canticles ('poetical extracts from Holy Scripture which are incorporated among the Psalms in the Divine office'). This, of course, applies to the period subsequent to the fixing of the Canon. But the earliest ecclesiastical hymns, in this sense, were not metrical.

The ecclesiastical canticles under the title of ᾠδὴ immediately follow the Psalter in certain of the Greek uncials and in a large number of the Greek cursive MSS. Nine of them are now sung at Lauds in the office of the orthodox Greek Church. Codex A gives the following in the following order:—

- (1) Ex 15<sup>1-19</sup> ('Song of Moses in Exodus'); (2) Dt 32:41 ('Song of Moses in Deut. 32'); (3) 1 S 2:1-10 ('Prayer of Hannah'); (4) Is 26:6-12 ('Prayer of Isaiah'); (5) Jon 3:8-10 ('Prayer of Jonah'); (6) Hab 3:1-19 ('Prayer of Habakkuk'); (7) Is 38:9-20 ('Prayer of Hezekiah'); (8) The Prayer of Manasseh; (9) Dn 3:25-56; (10) Dn 3:25-56; (11) Magnificat; (12) Nunc Dimittis; (13) Benedictus; (14) Morning Hymn (=full form of Gloria in Excelsis).

2. Jewish Liturgical usage.—In the Temple services the Psalms naturally played a great part. For the daily service the order of the Psalms, which were sung to a musical accompaniment by the Levitical choir, was as follows: 1st day of the week, Ps 24; 2nd, Ps 48; 3rd, Ps 82; 4th, Ps 94; 5th, Ps 81; 6th, Ps 93; Sabbath, Ps 92. Special Psalms were also used for special occasions.

It has been questioned whether psalmody formed an element in the early synagogue-service (see esp. Gibson, Expositor, July 1890, pp. 25-27). It is true that in the Mishna the only elements explicitly recognized in the synagogue-service are: (1) the Shema; (2) prayer; (3) the reading of the Law; and (4) the reading of the Prophets, and the benediction. But we know from the NT that in addition to this the practice of translating and expounding the Scripture-lection was also in vogue; and it may be inferred that on certain special occasions the 'Hallel,' at any rate, was recited in the synagogues (see HALLEL). But it is difficult to believe that other parts of the Psalter were not also recited there. The internal evidence of the Psalms suggests that some at least were specially intended for synagogue use: esp. the 'Hallelujah' Psalms (105, 106, 107, 111, 112, 114, 116, 117, 118, 120, 136, 146-150). However this may be, it is practically certain that a part, at least, of the sacred poetry of the OT, such as the Red Sea Song (Ex 15), the special Psalms for the days of the week, the Hallel, and possibly, also, the 'Psalms of Degrees,' would be known in Palestine in their Hebrew form in the time of Christ from their liturgical use in public worship, esp. in the Temple.† Examples of post-biblical poetry (Hebrew) of the early period (before the destruction of the Temple) are very rare. For an instance cf. Mishna, Sukka v. 4 (a liturgical piece).

3. The Evangelical Canticles.—The poetical pieces which we know as the Magnificat, Benedictus,

* It is possible that in Col 3<sup>16</sup>, Eph 5<sup>19</sup> the term ᾠδὴ is similarly restricted in meaning.

§ Cf. Ederheim, Temple, etc. p. 143 f.

¶ Cf. esp. Mog. iv. 3.

¶ It is worth noting that the regular term employed in the Mishna is to 'read' (קרא) the Hallel. In the Temple-service it was sung. Cf. also the benediction said before Hallel, which was probably the composition of the Pharisees ('who hast commanded us to read the Hallel').

** Cf. Cheyne, Origin of the Psalter, p. 14, note g, and p. 563 f. Pss. 146-150 form a well-defined group in the synagogue-liturgy, and are used in the daily morning service (cf. Singer, Heb. Syn. Prayer-Book, p. 291). Compare with this the custom in certain parts of the early Church of reciting the 'Hallelujah' Psalms daily. See Grünwald, Ueber den Einflus der Psalmen auf die Katholische Liturgie, Heft iii, p. 23.

† Cf. also the so-called Psalter of Solomon, which may have been intended for public or even liturgical use, and which almost certainly goes back to a Hebrew original. See ed. by Ryle and James, p. xxi.

Nunc Dimittis, and Gloria in Excelsis (Angels' song), and which are embodied in the first two chapters of the Third Gospel, are probably the earliest examples of Christian hymns. They are ascribed to the Virgin Mary, Simeon, Zacharias, and the Angels respectively; but it is more probable that they are to be regarded as original liturgical compositions, reflecting the piety and devotion of the early Jewish-Christian community in Palestine. Probably, too, they are translations from Hebrew originals, and were at first sung or chanted in Hebrew.* The hymns themselves are obviously modelled on the psalm-poetry of the OT, some of which, as has been pointed out, would be generally familiar in its Hebrew form to the Aramaic-speaking Jews of Palestine in the time of Christ.†

For details as to the dependence of these hymns on the OT see the commentaries (in particular, Plummer, Intern. Crit. Com. on 'St. Luke'). Notice the prominence of the idea of a Messianic redemption from sin, which is characteristically Jewish-Christian (cf. Lk 17 with Plummer's note; and cf. Mt 12<sup>12</sup>). For the poetical form and structure cf. esp. Briggs, The Messiah of the Gospels (1894), ch. ii, and New Light on the Life of Jesus (1904), ch. xiii. (the latter esp. valuable). The present writer finds himself in independent agreement with Briggs regarding Mt 12<sup>12-21</sup> as a translation from a Hebrew poetical piece. According to the same scholar, the full number of poetical pieces given in Luke is seven, viz.: (1) The Annunciation to Zacharias (Lk 1:5-25); (2) The Annunciation to Mary (4 parts: 128, 26-33, 38-37, 39); (3) The Annunciation to the Shepherds (2 parts: 21-22, 14); (4) the Song of Elizabeth (1:42-45); (5) the Song of Mary (=Magnificat, 1:46-55); (6) the Song of Zacharias (=Benedictus, 1:68-79); (7) the Song of Simeon (=Nunc Dimittis, 2:22-23, to which should be appended vs. 24-25). Of these all but 330, (5), are trimeter poems; (6) is a pentameter poem, is also Mt 12:12-21. Probably all go back to two long poems (a trimeter and pentameter), from which the above are extracts.

4. Other Hymns and Hymn-pieces.—(a) It has been suggested with some plausibility that the Prologue of the Fourth Gospel 'is a hymn to the Logos, composed independently of the Gospel and prefixed to it.' Here also Professor Briggs detects a trimeter poem originally arranged in three parts.‡ For other possible extracts from early Christian hymns in the NT, reference may here be made to 'Hymn' in Hastings' DB ii. p. 440 f.

In the Apocalypse, also, there are a number of songs (ᾠδᾶι) which may, perhaps, be regarded as traditional Jewish-Christian hymns (cf. 4<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>, 12:117, 15<sup>3</sup>).

It is possible that the curious phrase, 'Amen, come' (Rev 22:20), may be an acrostic reference to a Jewish hymn which is still sung in the synagogue (En Kiklahim, 'There is none like our God,' Singer, p. 167). This composition, in its present form, consists of 5 verses of 4 lines each. The initial letters of the lines of the 5 verses form the words אָמֵן וְעֹמֵן 'Amen, come.'† A Hellenized form (ἠμῆν) of the Greek term ᾠδὴ occurs in the Mishnah (cf. Ber. Euboa viii. 9: a hymn to a king).

(b) The Hosanna-hymn, or cry of praise of Palm Sunday, with which Jesus was greeted on His last entry into Jerusalem,‡ is given in various forms in the Gospels. In its simplest form it occurs in Mk 11<sup>9</sup> and Jn 12<sup>13</sup>, which really give the cry of the multitude: ἰησοῦ υἱοῦ δαβὶδ ἡσάνα ἡσάνα. The additions that occur in the other passages (τῶν ἁγίων δαβὶδ, Mt 21<sup>9, 15</sup>; and εἰ τοῖς ὕψιστοις, Mt 21<sup>9</sup>, Mk 11<sup>10</sup>)** seem really to be later amplifications * See an article by the present writer in ZNTW vi. p. 80 f. (Feb. 1905), on 'The Gospel Narratives of the Nativity,' etc.

† Cf. op. cit. p. 95.

‡ That a Hebrew original underlies these two verses is shown by the fact that the play upon words in v. 21 (Jesus shall save us) can be circulated only by Hebrew—not Aramaic—parasonology (קָוָה, יְשׁוּעָה).

§ Cf. for details Briggs, The Messiah of the Gospels (1895), pp. 495-515; he compares the above to the 'crechal hymn' in 1 Ti 3:14.

¶ Cf. Schiller-Simonsy in the Ency. Brit., s.v. 'Mishnah' (p. 286), and C. Taylor, Working of the Twelve Apostles, p. 281; also an art. by the present writer in Church and Synagogue, iii. p. 41 f. (Jan. 1903).

** Also afterwards by the children in the Temple, Mt 21<sup>15</sup>.

*** Mk 11:10 will thus be a later addition. It is noteworthy that the original form without these additions occurs only in the Fourth Gospel. Lk. (19:38) omits 'Hosanna' and alters the latter into, 'Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord.' See art. Hosanna.

due to liturgical influence, when hosanna (which in its Hebrew form הוֹשַׁנָּה is really a cry addressed to God, 'Save now!') was misunderstood as a shout of homage or greeting—'Hail!' or 'Glory to.' See Dalman, Words of Jesus (Eng. tr.), p. 220 f.

Cheyne's explanation, Encyc. Bibl. s.v. 'Hosanna,' is hardly convincing. Lightfoot, in his interesting note on Mt 21:9 (Horae Heb., ed. Gandel, II, 274 f.), ingeniously paraphrases, 'Save us, we beseech Thee, O Thou (who dwellest) in the highest,' taking in רוּחַ הַקּוֹדֶשׁ as a substitute for the Divine name. This is barely possible.

The Hosanna-cry (cf. Ps 118:26) and the palm branches naturally suggest the Feast of Tabernacles, with the ceremonies of which they were most closely associated (esp. in the 'Hosanna' processions of the Festival).<sup>4</sup> It seems, however, that such processions might be extemporized for other occasions of a joyous character (cf. 1 Mac 13:1, 2 Mac 10:1), and this was the case in the scene described in the Gospels.

Wünsche, indeed (Erklärungen der Evangelien aus Talmud und Midrasch, p. 241), supposes that a confusion has arisen in the Gospel accounts between Tabernacles and Passover; but this is unnecessary. It is noteworthy that there seem to be traces in the Midrasch on the Psalms of the Messianic interpretation of Ps. 118:26.<sup>5</sup>

HYPOCRISY.—

Hypocritae (ὑποκριταί), 'hypocrite' (ὑποκριτής), 'act the hypocrite' (ὑποκρίσασθαι). In the NT the verb appears only in Lk 20:20; ὑποκρίσασθαι only in the Synopt., but fifteen times in Mt. alone, ὑποκρίσασθαι once in Mt. (23:28), once in Mk. (12:39), once in Lk. (12:1), and also in Gal 2:13, 1 Ti 4:2, and 1 P 2:1. The root meaning of the word is to distinguish between things. From this it early came to mean to answer, and to interpret, dreams. By what link of association it came to be applied to declamation is less easy to determine. In this sense it is used by the Attic writers of orators and rhapsodists as well as of actors. Soon it was restricted to declamation on the stage, and then, by a process repeated in other languages, was used for acting a part, and so for acting a part for a base end, for giving oneself out to be what one knew one ought to be, but had no intention of becoming.

In the Apoc. the word is found in this sense of acting a part, of feigning, and with varying shades of moral obliquity. In 2 Mac 6:25 Eleazar is urged to eat his own meat while feigning to eat the swine's flesh, appointed by the king. Though the deception is urged as legitimate, Eleazar's reply shows that the word already had bad associations. Similarly 4 Mac 6:7. In Sir 32:5, as the opposite to fearing God and seeking the law, it is used almost exactly as in the NT. The LXX uses the word in Job 34:30 and 36:3, to translate ἄσβ. In the first passage, it is an implety which lays snares; in the second, it is an implety of the heart which cherishes an inward bitterness against God. Here we have the true ancestry of the NT usage, which always includes the idea of implety, of shutting out God and resolutely living in the darkness apart from Him. But the NT usage is also influenced by ὑψ, though the LXX translates that word by ἀλαλις or ἀλαλις. From the root idea of smoothness it came to be employed for flattery, and so for all kinds of evil deception. The kinship of the two words ὑψ and ὑψ may be seen in Dn 11:7, where those who are basely disloyal to the covenant expose themselves to the danger of being led into a false position towards God by smooth deceits.

Yet the conception of this vice in the popular mind of His time, to which our Lord appealed, was less determined by any particular Hebrew word than by the general teaching of the OT. The hypocrites speak with a double heart (Ps 129). They have smooth lips, and their profession is far beyond their performance (129). They imagine that wickedness can be shut up in the heart. They are brazen towards God, and deceitful towards men. They cease to hate evil, and take to planning it (36:4). Above all, they attempt to deceive God (78:36). Hypocrisy is a thing God cannot tolerate (Job 22:26), and which He is continually exposing (51). Idolatry is a sort of hypocrisy from which a man can keep by being perfect, i.e. whole-hearted, with the Lord his God (Dt 10:16). The classical passage for a hypocrisy that practises the ceremonies and knows none of the duties of religion is Is 1, but nearly every prophet has occasion to speak against the evil. All false prophecy was hypocrisy—the saying of the thing that pleased, and not of the thing that was true. The person most deceived was the hypocrite himself (Is 28:15, Job 27), but he was also a danger to the society in which he lived (Job 12:6). To all the true prophets he was the supreme danger to the State.

The Talmud lays the same stress upon hypocrisy, as the opposite of faith in God. 'There are four who cannot appear before God—the scoffer, the hypocrite, the liar, and the slanderer'—all vices of falsehood. God hates him who speaks one way with the mouth and another way with the heart. 'A society which has hypocrites for its members is abominable and falls into exile.'

Hypocrisy was plainly no new vice in our Lord's time, but an ancient heritage into which the Pharisees entered. How, then, are we to account for the sudden prominence to which it is raised? No vice is held up to such unenviable notoriety in the Synoptics, no other combated with the same direct denunciation, while in John ὁ ψευδός is a conception only a little wider than ὑποκριτής, and has the same condemnation. First of all, just because it is a sin of deception, it is mercilessly exposed, as if our Lord would give a practical demonstration that there is nothing hidden that shall not be made known. A sin which glories in misleading an opponent by smooth flatteries (Mt 22:6), which goes about in long robes and seeks to be revered by public salutations, which takes its honour for granted and cloaks oppressive avarice with long prayers (Mk 12:40), which cleanses the outside of the cup and platter while leaving them full of extortion and wickedness, which makes men hidden tombs, fair without and foul within (Lk 11:4), is met, as no other sin can be, by exposure.

Then the sin which lives by corrupting the conscience has cut itself off from the usual appeal of holiness and love by which our Lord seeks to win men from other sins. It substitutes traditional practices for living duties (Mt 15:3); it uses minutiae of ecclesiastical rule as a substitute for judgment and the love of God (Lk 11:4); it cannot receive the truth, because its eye is on man and not on God (Jn 5:4); it makes inquiries not in order to believe the truth, but in order to refute it (9:35); and it is chained to its error by a confident assurance that it alone is right (9:1). The only way of appeal left is direct denunciation.

Further, sin is, in a pre-eminent degree, the foe of all truth. The hypocrite is in a special sense the child of the father of lies (Jn 8:44). Hypocrisy is not a mere sin of impulse, but is the opposite of everything by which we may lay hold of truth and be delivered. As surely as faith reaches out towards truth, hypocrisy struggles against it. Not being able to live with truth, it can defend itself only by persecution. 'Ye seek to kill me because my word hath not free course in you' (8:7). The same spirit made their fathers kill the prophets as a natural consequence of rejecting their message, and it is only another hypocrisy which makes the descendants repudiate their fathers' deeds while cherishing their fathers' spirit. The justification for the terrible assault on the Pharisees in Mt 23, is that, sitting in Moses' seat, they show a spirit with which truth cannot dwell. The deep shadow is always in the bright sunlight, and the deep corruption is always in the place of opportunity. The Pharisees neither enter the Kingdom nor suffer others to enter. They are abundantly zealous, but in a bad cause. They pervert truth, debase it, fight against it. No appeal can touch them, and in the end their house is left to them desolate.

Then the evil of hypocrisy is more than negative. It does not stop with pretending to need signs, while it pays no attention to the evidence it has, and would be convinced by no evidence (Mt 16:3-4). Hypocrisy is also an active leaven—a dangerous assimilative principle—against the corruption of which no warning can be too ample. It is more than the shadow of truth, the absence of faith. It definitely works to debase the whole man, just as faith works to regenerate him. In addition to refusing to enter in, it takes away the key of knowledge (Lk 11<sup>25</sup>). Against everything connected with the Kingdom of Heaven it is actively hostile.

In the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 6<sup>17</sup>) hypocrisy is set over against the Kingdom of Heaven as its opposite and its negation. In the realm of hypocrisy appearances meet every requirement; in the Kingdom of Heaven all is judged by the heart. Christ says, the issues of life are out of the heart alone; hypocrisy says, they are mainly out of ceremonies. Of the whole standard of the Kingdom of Heaven hypocrisy is the daily practical denial—its broad result being the external righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, without exceeding which we shall in no wise enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. So alien is the whole unreal pretence of religion, that there is a good secrecy at the other extreme from it. Deliberate care must be taken that one's righteousness be not done in the public eye. Not only is no trumpet to be sounded before us in the street; our praise is not even to find an echo in our own heart. Not only may prayer never be used for show; true prayer is with ourselves and our Father in secret alone. Not only may we not fast with a sad countenance; the head is to be anointed and the face washed as on a day of festival. Hypocrisy is the opposite of that singleness of eye which fills the whole body with light; it turns the light that is in a man to darkness. It attempts to serve two masters while serving none. It sees notes in its brother's eye while ignoring beams in its own. It is in sheep's clothing without, and a ravening wolf within. It is the shadow of the light, the enemy of the truth. It is most of all hostile to the Kingdom of Heaven, just because that is the fullest light and the highest truth. Nor is that all. Hypocrisy, as the opposite and negation of the Kingdom of Heaven, is as ready to corrupt Christianity as it was to corrupt Judaism. Even Christ's name it is capable of turning into a substitute, not a synonym, for the will of the Father.

From all other vices men are delivered by the life of faith. For this reason our Lord never directly assails vices of impulse. The publican and the harlot He treated as the lost sheep He had come to seek. For them He set wide the door of the Kingdom. But the door, He knew, could never be made so narrow that the hypocrites would not at least appear to enter. The new hypocrisy will be to come in Christ's name, saying, 'I am he' (Mk 13<sup>9</sup>). Under that guise it will hide itself so dexterously as almost to deceive the elect; and it will use its opportunity, as hypocrisy has always done, to strangle truth by persecution. Just because hypocrisy is thus an enemy in the camp poisoning the wells, our Lord deals with it openly, directly, negatively, by the method of denunciation, as with no other form of evil.

The supreme evil of hypocrisy, as the negation of the life of faith, appears still more clearly in what our Lord says about the eternal sin. In John unbelief is spoken of as the abiding sin. 'For if ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins' (8<sup>24</sup>). Yet, from the context, it is apparent that the abiding evil is not the act of unbelief, but the absence of all love of the truth, of which the unbelief is the evidence. Christ came that the thoughts of many hearts should be revealed (Lk 2<sup>2</sup>), and those who had cherished evil were as conspicuously displayed as those who had cherished good. The publican and the harlot who had secretly thirsted after righteousness came to be shown to have faith, though all appearances were against them; the Pharisee who had used his religious position to cover worldly ends was shown to want it, though all appearances were in his favour. While the publican came to the light, the Pharisee hated the truth and sought to repress it, and to do so sought to destroy Him who spoke the truth. Thus he showed himself of his father the devil, who from the beginning was a murderer as well as the father of lies. Here in John then we have juggling with truth, hypocrisies before God and the world and one's own soul, set forth as the cardinal sin which relates us as certainly to the spirit of evil as faith does to the spirit of good, and which works in hate, as surely as goodness works in love, and which leaves men to die in their sins, because it is hostile to all that could lead to penitence and pardon.

All this is in essential agreement with what the Synoptics say of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost (Mt 12<sup>31-32</sup>, Mk 3<sup>29-30</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup>). The Pharisees had reached a turning-point in their opposition. They believed in miracles, they looked for signs. The miracle could no longer be questioned, but they could call it a sign of Beelzebub. Though unable to deny either the power or the beneficence of Christ's work, being resolved not to accept the practical consequences of belief, they call light darkness and good evil. The actual sin against the Holy Ghost, therefore, is possible only when face to face with the highest thing in religion and its clearest evidence, but the danger of coming to that point is present in all hypocrisy. Hypocrisy is ever an overweening pride, denying to other men the right to truth, and to God His power to see; and the eternal sin is only the finished result of what is always present in it. This connexion is most evident in the narrative of Luke, which begins with a warning against the leaven of the Pharisees which is hypocrisy. Nothing, it is said, can be covered, and the hypocrite has power to do only one great evil—to associate others in his spiritual destruction. Faith in the God who cares even for the sparrow can alone preserve from this fatal vice, a clear indication that hypocrisy is the negation of faith, or at least that faith is the negation of hypocrisy. The natural outcome of faith is confession before men, and the accompaniment of that is Divine protection until the day of the final award. On the other hand, to follow hypocrisy is to go the road that leads to the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost—the state of mind that has so juggled with good and evil that good has no power over it, the sin which no change of dispensation, or perhaps nothing in eternity any more than in time, can modify. This may be most apparent in Luke, but in Mark and Matthew also the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of truth, and the sin which is eternal is not an act of oversight or passion, but an irremediable state which could be reached only by a finished, proud, and tyrannical hypocrisy. See UNPARDONABLE SIN.

In every form of evil, as Martensen rightly affirms, hypocrisy is present in a partial form. All sin is egoistic, yet every man depends on society—the sinner not least. Under some pretence of goodness alone can the egoist enter society. The seducer must swear false oaths, the deceiver feign friendship, the tyrant profess care for the commonweal. A finished life of wickedness would be one great lie, which would be the only ultimate form of atheism. And just because a God of truth cannot for ever be denied, hypocrisy comes to be more and more a spirit of hatred and opposition to truth. Thus it is, more even than habéa, the cumulative element in devotion to evil. It is not only the greatest practical denial of God, it is also the greatest practical alienation from God. To be reconciled to God is primarily to be restored to truth. Wherefore hypocrisy may be taken not only as the negation of all Christ taught of God, but also as the negation of all Christ did to reconcile men to the Father, the negation of His work as a Saviour as well as of His work as a Revealer.

Throughout all the Christian centuries, wherever there has been a lively sense of the reality of Christianity, there has also been a lively sense of this shadow following the sun. The classical example of lying to the Holy Ghost found its occasion in the first flush of the Church's faith and love (Ac 5). The first great division of parties arose through the same vice, and arose almost with the Church's beginnings. The extreme bitterness of the Judaistic party was nourished by that external view of religion which could regard a ceremony as essential, and hatred as if it were godliness. Even Barnabas was almost carried away by their hypocrisy (Gal 2<sup>13</sup>), showing how the vice seeks to deceive, if possible, the elect; while their attempts to suppress Paul were limited only by their power and never by their scruples—showing that it is a vice which always persecutes as well as perverts. All the errors which cause men to fall away from the faith are, already in the NT, ascribed to the hypocrisy of men that speak lies (1 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>). Regarding this root of error in moral falsehood, and not in mere intellectual mistake, much might be said, but it must suffice to mention what Augustine says of Manichæism. Long his difficulties seemed to him intellectual perplexity about the origin of evil. When, however, he saw that wickedness was no substance, but a perversity of the will, he discovered the true root of the error.

They preferred to think Thy substance did suffer ill, than that their own did commit it' (Conf. vii. 4).

That, as our Lord predicted, Hypocrisy has continued to work under the New Dispensation as under the Old, may be seen from the state of things in the Eastern Church as pictured by Eustathius, in the Western as drawn by Dante and Chaucer, and in later times as reflected in a literature too abundant and familiar to require to be named.

HYSSOP (צִיחַ, ἕσσωπος) is twice mentioned in the NT (Jn 19<sup>29</sup>, He 9<sup>19</sup>). We know that it was used for sprinkling (Ex 12<sup>22</sup>), and that it grew on walls (1 K 4<sup>28</sup>). By Tristram it is identified with the caper-plant (Capparis spinosa); and this view is very generally accepted. It is open, however, to the serious objection that the caper is not well adapted for use as a sprinkler. Many still favour the opinion of Maimonides that it was the gatar of the Arabs. This plant, which 'springs out of the walls, those of the garden especially' (Thomson, LB p. 112), is a species of Satureia. In Morocco, the name gatar is given to marjoram (Origanum). Carthagen (Bible Educator, iv. 226) suggests that hyssop was a name applied to various plants of the genera Thymus, Origanum, and others nearly allied in form and habit. The balance of probability is in favour of this view.

IDEAL.—The word 'ideal' does not occur in EV of the NT, nor is there any term in the Gr. text which exactly corresponds to the general notion of the English word.* The subject of the highest good or moral ideal, however, is one that is constantly present in the teaching of Christ, and is wonderfully illuminated by His own character and life and influence in human history. An ideal may be defined as a mental conception taken as a standard of absolute perfection. The word is used with regard to various kinds of excellence. There are intellectual and aesthetic ideals as well as those which are properly to be described as moral. But it is to the realm of moral worth that the notion of the ideal is peculiarly appropriated, and it is with the moral ideal alone that we are at present concerned.

In the history of Ethics, discussion has always centred in this question of the ideal, the summum bonum, the 'chief end of man.' Aristotle begins his Nicom. Ethics (i. i. 1) by describing the good as that at which all aim, and he goes on to say (i. ii. 2): 'And, like archers, shall we not be more likely to attain what is right if we have a mark (σκοπός)?' This σκοπός, the target or goal of human endeavour, is just the ideal. Aristotle takes the human σκοπός to be happiness, which he defines as 'the active exercise of man's living powers, according to their highest virtue, in a life affording full room for their development' (i. vii. 15). It is a striking coincidence that the only occasion on which the word σκοπός is found in the NT is in the saying of St. Paul, 'I press toward the mark (σκοπός) for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus' (Ph 3<sup>14</sup>). The Christian ideal of St. Paul was very different from the pagan one of the Stagirite. But the Apostle, no less than the philosopher, recognized the necessity of an ideal, and its power to shape the whole conduct of life.

It would be interesting to discriminate the various ideals or ultimate moral aims which, in the progress of the world's history, have been advocated by the representatives of the leading religious or philosophical systems. These ideals, however, do not directly concern us here. It will be sufficient in the course of the article to refer to them in passing, when they serve, by way of contrast, to bring more clearly into view the distinctive features of the Christian ideal. Applying ourselves to a special consideration of the latter, we shall deal with it (1) as it is set forth in the teaching of Christ, (2) as it is embodied historically in His own person, (3) as it is made real in human experience through His constraining power.

i. THE IDEAL AS SET FORTH IN THE TEACHING OF CHRIST.—One great fault of all non-Christian, or pre-Christian, or imperfectly Christian ideals is their narrowness or one-sidedness; they ignore whole departments of the kingdom of moral worth, and do justice to one part of human nature at the expense of the rest. In contrast with this, the Christian ideal, as we meet it in Christ's teaching, strikes us by its comprehensiveness and perfect balance. A consideration of the following particulars may serve to bring out this rounded symmetry of the Christian conception of the highest good.

* The translators of the Twentieth Cent. NT render Eph 4<sup>13</sup> 'until we reach the perfection of manhood and that degree of development of which the ideal to be found in the Christ is the standard.' But this is a paraphrase rather than a translation of the original.

1. It is an ideal of blessedness attained through perfection of character.—Pope invokes happiness as 'our being's end and aim . . . for which we bear to live, or dare to die' (Epistle, iv. 1 ff.). And Herbert Spencer, in his Data of Ethics (p. 46), affirms that 'no school can avoid taking for the ultimate moral aim a desirable state of feeling, called by whatever name—gratification, enjoyment, happiness.' Newman Smyth criticises Spencer's statement as a confusion between the form and the substance of the moral intuition (Christian Ethics, p. 86 f.). But if the conception of happiness is enlarged so as to include the appropriate Christian contents, if blessedness (wh. see), in other words, is taken as the NT synonym of happiness, little fault can be found with the language of either the poet or the philosopher. The Westminster Divines were very far from being mere Eudemonists, but in the first question of the Shorter Catechism they define 'man's chief end' as consisting in this—'to glorify God, and to enjoy Him for ever.' If happiness is not the very substance of the Christian ideal, it is none the less, as Dr. Smyth himself says, 'its natural result and its necessary form' (op. cit., p. 119). By beginning His Sermon on the Mount with His great series of Beatitudes (Mt 5<sup>1-12</sup>, cf. Lk 6<sup>20-23</sup>), Jesus places the ideal of blessedness in the forefront of His teaching. So far, therefore, we may say He is on the side of the Eudemonists as against all who have sought to set up a hard abstract ideal of duty as the moral aim. But note the content of Christ's ideal, and it will be seen at once how far removed it is from ordinary Utilitarianism. The blessedness of which He speaks belongs to a character distinguished by meekness, mercy, purity of heart, and similar spiritual qualities (Mt 5<sup>1-12</sup>)—a character which finds its standard not in human perfection merely, but in nothing less than the perfection of the Heavenly Father Himself (v. 48). In its form of blessedness, happiness is to be desired by Christ's disciples; but only through perfection of character can this happiness come. No man will find delight in that vision of God which Jesus promises (v. 3); no man will 'enjoy God,' unless a resemblance to the perfection of the 'Father which is in heaven' has been growing up within his heart.

2. It is an ideal of natural as well as spiritual good.—Even when it is fully recognized that blessedness belongs to the Christian ideal, this blessedness is sometimes conceived of too narrowly. Not only is the spiritual set above the natural, as it ought to be, but the natural is ignored or despised and then refused its proper rights. This is the inherent fault of all ascetic ideals, whether pagan or Christian. Now Christ certainly exalted the spiritual above the natural. He made blessedness depend, as we have seen, upon inward qualities. Moreover, He taught that His disciples must be ready to make any sacrifice—to cut off hand or foot, to pluck out the right eye—for the sake of entering into life (Mt 5<sup>29-30</sup>, 18<sup>8-9</sup>; Mk 9<sup>43-45</sup>), and that a man was nothing profited if he gained the whole world and lost his own soul (Mt 16<sup>26</sup>). But the blessedness He holds before His followers is by no means a purely spiritual thing. The Beatitude of the meek is that they shall inherit the earth (Mt 5<sup>4</sup>). The petition for 'daily bread' is enshrined in the very heart of the Lord's Prayer (6<sup>11-12</sup>). And when Jesus comes to speak more particularly of food and raiment, the very things which are most fundamental to our natural life in this world, while He forbids anxiety regarding them, the reason given is not that they are unworthy of a Christian's thought and care, but that 'all these things shall be added' unto those who seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness (6<sup>25-26</sup>).

3. It is an ideal of social well-being attained through individual worth.—That the ideal of Jesus was a social one it is impossible to doubt. Deeply as He impressed upon His hearers the unspeakable value of the individual life or soul (Mt 10<sup>29-30</sup>, Lk 15<sup>6-7</sup> etc.), He never said anything to justify a religious individualism which concerns itself only with personal salvation. The very fact that 'the kingdom of God' (wh. see) is the phrase by which He most frequently refers to His moral ideal, shows that it was an ideal of social good. In this He was coming, so far, into touch with the prevalent Jewish conceptions of His time; for it was a social, not an individual good for which Israel looked. But whereas the Jews conceived of this social good on purely national lines, Jesus enlarged the bounds of the blessed society so as to make room in it for men of all nations. 'They shall come,' He said, 'from the east and west, and from the north and south, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God' (Lk 13<sup>29</sup>, Mt 8<sup>11</sup>). Yet while His moral ideal takes not only a social form, but one of universal breadth, He always taught that it must be through making its power felt in the individual heart that the Kingdom of God would be realized upon earth. This was where His teaching differed so greatly from the contemporary Jewish expectation, and from the thoughts of many in modern times who have been seized by the greatness of Christ's social purposes without grasping the individuality and spirituality of His methods. The Kingdom of God in popular Jewish hope was an exaltation of Israel brought about by deeds like those of Judas Maccabeus. The Kingdom of God in the vision of many earnest dreamers and workers of our own days is the result of a social revolution brought about by political activity. According to Christ's teaching, the Kingdom of God can come only through the regeneration of individual hearts. 'The kingdom of God cometh not with observation,' He said, ' . . . for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you' (Lk 17<sup>20-21</sup>). That this, and not the marginal readings 'among you' [AV], 'in the midst of you' [RV], is the proper rendering, seems to be confirmed by the second of the 'New Sayings of Jesus' discovered by Grenfell and Hunt (cf. p. 770<sup>b</sup> below). And He summed up the whole matter when He set a little child in the midst and said, 'Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 18<sup>3</sup>; cf. Jn 3<sup>3</sup>).

4. The ideal is at once a reality in the present and a promise for the future.—There are those who look for their summum bonum in the present hour, and whose philosophy of life was long ago summed up in the saying, 'Let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die' (1 Co 15<sup>32</sup>, cf. Is 22<sup>29</sup>). There are others again who have, not unjustly, incurred the charge of 'other-worldliness,' because they have despised God's present mercies and neglected their own urgent duties, while fixing their thoughts upon the hope of future blessings and rewards. But in the teaching of Jesus the ideal good is at once realized in the present and consummated in the future. On the one hand, He proclaims that the Kingdom of God is not merely coming, but already come (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>, cf. Mk 1<sup>15</sup>); it is set up here and now within the individual heart (Lk 17<sup>21</sup>); its Beatitudes are present realities (Mt 5<sup>3-12</sup>); note not only the recurring 'Blessed are they, ye,' etc., but vv. 3, 10 'theirs is [ἐστὶν] the kingdom of heaven'. On the other hand, He constantly taught His disciples to look to the future for the complete and perfect form of the Kingdom and its blessedness. His use of the phrase 'kingdom of heaven' as an alternative expression for 'kingdom of God' (and the evidence of the First Gospel points to the former as being the more habitual term on His lips), though it refers primarily, no doubt, to the spirituality of the Kingdom as coming from above and having its true home in the supersensible world, is surely not without its future reference. This Kingdom, which is heavenly in its origin and aims, is and must be heavenly also in its end. Christ's whole eschatological teaching, and especially everything that gathers round the thought of the Parousia, when all that is evil shall be cast out of the Kingdom (Mt 13<sup>41-42</sup>, 22<sup>13</sup>, 25<sup>30</sup>), and the faithful servant shall enter into the joy of his Lord (25<sup>21-23</sup>), points to the same conclusion. And if we are not to reject the evidence of the Fourth Gospel, with respect even to its testimony as to the leading ideas in our Lord's teaching, the fact that in it 'eternal life' takes the central place which in the Synoptics is held by 'the kingdom of God' points once more to a future reference in Christ's ideal. For though futurity and everlastingness are not the fundamental conceptions in the category of eternal life, they are certainly necessary for the completeness of that life which Jesus promised to His disciples as their highest good.

ii. THE IDEAL AS EMBODIED HISTORICALLY IN THE PERSON OF CHRIST.—So far, we have been thinking of the Christian ideal as set forth in our Lord's teaching. But now we must notice the fact that Jesus not only expounded an ideal, but realized it historically in His own person. It is here that the Christian ideal differs specifically from the loftiest ideals of the philosophers and moralists; it is an ideal which was once made actual in a human life. Jesus not only taught, but was. He brought down the ideal out of the region of dreams, and hopes, and words into the world of positive realities. In His own history He showed how blessedness might be attained through moral perfection; how the life of highest spirituality might prove to be the life of widest social beneficence; how it was possible, while enjoying all natural blessings as gifts from the heavenly Father's hand, to place obedience to the Father's will above everything else; how the narrow path of present duty might be illuminated by the splendours of the eternal world, while the assurance of something yet more glorious than now appeared might thrill the heart of the faithful wayfarer.

1. Jesus Christ is the Ideal Man.—His character is not merely perfect in some aspects, but perfect in all—so rounded and complete as to become an ideal for the woman as well as for the man, for the Greek as well as for the Jew, for the modern as well as for the ancient world. He is not merely free from flaws, but full of vital and creative forces; His perfection is that not of a marble image, but of a living spirit. This is the verdict of history, the verdict of all who simply read and ponder the records of His life. Even those who do not believe Him to be more than man join without demur in the universal chorus of acclamation. They acknowledge that Jesus stands alone in His moral grandeur as the incarnation of personal human worth, and that the historical Christ is the ideal of humanity.

2. As an Ideal, Christ becomes an Example (wh. see).—For whatever it may be in other spheres, in the moral world, at all events, ideals, from the nature of the case, are not merely standards of an abstract perfection, but goals after which we must strive—targets, to use Aristotle's figure, at which we aim and shoot those arrows of the soul which are the living energies of our moral being. Jesus never set Himself before men's eyes as a beautiful but impossible ideal. He claimed to be an example (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>, 20<sup>26-28</sup>; Lk 22<sup>27</sup>, Jn 13<sup>16</sup>, * 15<sup>14</sup>). As such He was taken by His first disciples (1 P 2<sup>21</sup>). And

VOL. I.—49

St. Paul, who saw the perfect and ideal man in the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ (Eph 4<sup>13</sup>), never doubted that the perfection of manhood which was found in Christ was something to be personally striven after. That was the σκόπος of the long race. On that the Christian must fix his eyes, towards that he must constantly press, if he would attain to the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus (Ph 3<sup>12</sup>). See also PERFECTION (OF JESUS).

iii. THE REALIZATION OF THE IDEAL THROUGH THE CONSTRAINING POWER OF CHRIST.—We have seen that Christ in His teaching holds up an ideal, that He embodies this ideal historically in His own person, and sets it before us as an example which we must strive to follow. But to weak and sinful men and women this presentation by word and deed of a perfect moral ideal would be little else than a mockery, if Christ did nothing more than offer us an outward standard after which we were to strive. It is in a far deeper sense than this that He is the Christian ideal. In his famous theory of Ideas, Plato conceived of the Ideal Good as an archetypal essence which becomes an efficient cause, imparting to individuals a share of its own being, as the sun imparts 'vitality, growth, and nutriment' to the creatures on which its rays fall (Rep. vi. 509). And it is in this vital and archetypal manner that Jesus becomes the moral ideal of the human race. He gives what He commands, and so has a right to command what He wills. We have constant illustrations in the Gospels of this constraining power of the Ideal Goodness as it is presented to men and women in the person of Christ. The sinful woman in the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup>), Zacchaeus, the grasping publican of Jericho (10<sup>1-10</sup>), Matthew, leaving the receipt of custom to become an Apostle (Mt 9<sup>10</sup>), may serve as examples. The author of the Fourth Gospel sums up the whole matter for us when he says: 'As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God' (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>). And to St. Paul, who brooded much over this mystery of Christ as it had been revealed to him in a profound personal experience, the secret of spiritual life and growth presented itself as an unfolding of the Christ-nature implanted by the agency of the Holy Spirit in the believer's soul. 'Christ in you,' he says, 'the hope of glory' (Col 1<sup>27</sup>); and again, 'I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me' (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>). And when in another place he describes believers as 'foreordained to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren' (Ro 8<sup>29</sup>), he suggests a figure which helps us to understand how Christ the ideal is not merely an outward type but an inward archetype. The younger brothers of a house are conformed to the likeness of the firstborn not so much by personal imitation as by the operation of secret and vital forces which spring from the very fact of their birth as members of a particular family, and which lie far deeper than the workings of the individual will. And so it is as between Christ and His people. 'For both he that sanctifieth,' says another NT writer, 'and they that are sanctified are all of one; for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren' (He 2<sup>11</sup>).

IDEAS (LEADING).—The leading ideas of our Lord may be divided into two classes, Moral and Religious. This is not an artificial division: it corresponds to two stages in His public teaching which are very clearly marked in the Gospels. The earlier stage is pre-eminently ethical, and finds its most characteristic utterance in the Sermon on the Mount. The latter is, in comparison, distinctively religious, and deals with the relation of God to man. Yet we are not to separate the two elements, for they inter-penetrate one another. They are inter-dependent, and form together an organic whole.

i. MORAL IDEAS.—1. The Kingdom.—This idea must be placed first on account of its position in our Lord's teaching. 'Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand,' was the message of the Baptist and the first public utterance of Jesus (Mt 4<sup>17</sup>; Mk 1<sup>15</sup>). From the beginning the idea of the Kingdom may be traced throughout the Gospels, and everywhere it will be found to indicate the supreme blessing which comes to man from God. In Mt. it is usually termed the Kingdom of Heaven. Elsewhere the phrase Kingdom of God is uniformly employed.

The idea of a Kingdom of God does not appear first in the NT. In the OT, the sovereignty of God is a fundamental conception. Jehovah was regarded as King over His chosen people. Israel was a theocracy. Always, whether under Judges, kings, prophets, or priests, the human leaders were looked upon as representatives or agents of Jehovah, the true King. The natural tendency was to regard this as the exclusive privilege of the chosen people. Nevertheless, in the OT it is to be found the vision of a great world-wide Kingdom of God. In the Book of Daniel especially we find how, to the prophetic mind, there was opened the glorious prospect of a universal Divinely-established sovereignty. Dn 2<sup>44</sup> and 7<sup>13-14</sup> are the clearest. The latter of these two passages is especially important, because from it, most probably, our Lord adopted the title 'Son of Man' by which He usually described Himself. It was therefore a passage much in His thoughts, and it is scarcely possible to believe that, as He proclaimed 'the kingdom,' He had not clearly in mind the words 'His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.'

It is plain that among the Jews in our Lord's time there was a widely spread expectation of some great person who was to be leader of the chosen people, and through whom that people were to be established as a great world-power. The Jews of that age were looking for a kingdom. And to them came John the Baptist and then Jesus of Nazareth, proclaiming the coming of a Kingdom. As our Lord's ministry and teaching developed, He made it quite clear that the Kingdom He proclaimed was very different from the kingdom of popular expectations. Yet the two conceptions cannot be wholly unrelated. Our Lord would not have used the popular language if His meaning had no relation to the ideas of the popular mind.

This consideration is important, because of late years there have been efforts to show that the Kingdom, as conceived by our Lord, had no social content whatever; that, by the Kingdom of God, He meant a spiritual illumination in the heart of the individual (Harnack, What is Christianity? Lect. iii). He holds that our Lord shared the eschatological ideas of the Jews of His time, but that the essence of His teaching is that the Kingdom is the rule of God in the heart of the individual). This view rests mainly on a single text, Lk 17<sup>21</sup> 'The kingdom of God is within you,' and is supported by the consideration that the primary meaning of the word which is translated 'kingdom,' βασιλεία, is 'rule' or 'dominion.'

The sentence (Lk 17<sup>21</sup>) 'The kingdom of God is within you' (ἡ βασιλεία ἐστὶν ἐν ὑμῖν) is capable of being translated, 'The kingdom of God is in the midst of you,' and this rendering suits the context better than any other, for the saying was addressed to the Pharisees. But it must be granted that the 'New Sayings of Jesus,' recently discovered by Grenfell and Hunt, have thrown fresh light on this question. The words occur in the Second Saying, and in a connexion which precludes the translation 'in the midst of you.' 'The kingdom of heaven is within you, and whoever shall know himself shall find it.' This is, at least, a very early witness to the sense attached to the words in primitive times.

But we cannot found our interpretation of our Lord's teaching on a single passage, especially when we are dealing with a leading conception which was always more or less in His mind. Some of the parables which were intended to throw light on the nature of the Kingdom, e.g. the Mustard Seed, the Tares and the Wheat, the Draw-net, seem explicable only on the understanding that the Kingdom was regarded as a visible community.

The only way of combining the two elements which seems to be truly satisfactory, is to regard the Kingdom as the rule of God, whether in the individual or in the community. It is then the Sittensinn Zweck, the Absolute Good in which both the individual and the community find their realization. It is thus both a present blessing and an ideal to guide all future development.

It is realized here and now whenever man stands in a right relation to God and to his fellows. Its perfect realization belongs to the great future: it is the end to which all creation and all history are tending. The Kingdom as a conception is thus at once moral, social, religious, and eschatological. All these aspects are distinctly visible in our Lord's teaching, and all are harmonized by the view which has just been adopted. We are now concerned with the moral aspect of this great idea.

The Sermon on the Mount, as we have it in Mt., must be taken as the fullest statement of our Lord's moral teaching. Whether it be accepted as a single discourse, or be regarded as a collection of sayings, the unity which pervades it and its perfect harmony with the rest of our Lord's utterances are manifest. Its place in the gospel of the Kingdom, as proclaimed by our Lord, is clearly defined. The Sermon is a statement of the Law of the Kingdom.

This is evident from Mt 5<sup>17-20</sup>, in which a general principle concerning the ethical relation of the gospel to the Mosaic Law is laid down, and from vv. 21-48, in which several important illustrations of the practical application of this new principle are given. Mt 6<sup>1-6</sup> and 7<sup>1-27</sup> agree with this view of the nature of the Sermon. In the former passage, the whole subject of rewards and motives is dealt with, and the end which is to govern our religious life (vv. 1-18) and our secular life (vv. 18-34) is declared to be, not the praise of men (vv. 2-6, 16), not earthly rewards (vv. 19-23), but God's Kingdom and God's righteousness (v. 33). This end includes all necessary goods (v. 33). It therefore lifts the soul above anxiety (v. 34). It is an eternal treasure (v. 35). It must be pursued with whole-hearted devotion (v. 37). In the latter passage (7<sup>1-27</sup>) the importance of doing the will of God, as contrasted with mere profession, is insisted on as a condition of entering into the Kingdom.

It is thus perfectly clear that the whole Sermon on the Mount regards human life from the point of view of the Kingdom, and lays down the moral principles which belong to that point of view. It may therefore be fitly described as the Law of the Kingdom.

At the same time, it is necessary to observe that the Sermon on the Mount is not a new Decalogue. Our Lord did not issue commandments like those of the old Law. On the contrary, He laid down principles, and taught His disciples how to apply them.

This is an important distinction. Commandments which classify actions, forbidding some and enjoining others, however necessary they may be for purposes of moral education, have always this defect, that they are sure, sooner or later, to come into conflict, and so give rise to perplexity and to casuistry. Principles, on the other hand, are truly universal, and therefore cannot conflict. There are parts of our Lord's moral teaching which have seemed perplexing to many, e.g. Mt 5<sup>31-32</sup>, 44, 41-42. But the perplexity vanishes when it is seen that these sayings contain not laws but examples, illustrations of the application of a principle (see v. 20), which has been already laid down. As examples or illustrations they must be considered in relation to circumstances, which inevitably limit every particular case.

Among moral principles laid down by our Lord, the Kingdom stands first and supreme. The passage which presents this truth most clearly has been already noticed. It occupies the whole of Mt 6, which fills the central space in the moral teaching of Jesus as we have it in St. Matthew's report of the Sermon. Here we have the motives of conduct dealt with. First, the prevailing wrong motives are pointed out: the praise of men which too often destroys the reality of the religious life (vv. 2, 5, 16, 18); greed of gain, the laying up of earthly treasures (vv. 19-24), which makes the 'single eye' impossible; anxiety for the necessities of life, food and clothing, things that will surely be given us if we live a true life (vv. 25-34).

It is characteristic of our Lord that it is in connexion with this last subject that He reveals the true motive. He contemplates the life of the average man toiling for his daily bread and filled with anxiety lest that bread should fail. There is an extraordinary tenderness and sympathy in our Lord's language here. The passage is perhaps the most beautiful in all His teaching. And the lesson reaches the highest heights of spiritual vision. 'Seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things (the necessities of life) shall be added unto you' (v. 33).

It is singularly impressive that this teaching should be given in connexion with those common everyday duties at which the vast majority of human beings must spend their lives. To the great mass of the world's toilers our Lord says: Be not anxious about your bodily needs. In doing your daily work, seek the Highest, and the necessities of life will not fail. And what is that Highest? It is the Kingdom and righteousness of God. The answer presents both sides of the truth, the external and the internal, the objective aim and the quality of character which corresponds to it.

When we come to consider more carefully what is the nature of this highest objective aim which is termed the Kingdom, we are met by the difficulty that our Lord nowhere gives a formal definition of it. His manner of referring to it is rather an indication that He desired in the first instance to convince His hearers of its existence, and for the rest to approach it in many different ways, so as to exhibit different aspects of a thing too great for its nature to be made evident by any one statement. But certain characteristics emerge with sufficient clearness. What these characteristics are will be seen as we examine the other leading ideas of our Lord's moral teaching. See also art. KINGDOM OF GOD.

2. The Pure Heart.—'Blessed are the pure in heart,' said the Lord; 'for they shall see God.' The idea expressed in this Beatitude is one of the most fundamental in the interpretation of the Law in terms of the gospel. Our Lord insisted upon the inwardness of all true goodness. An external morality had no value in His eyes. This teaching was not altogether new. Great prophets and psalmists had seen it (Jer 31<sup>8</sup>, Ps 51<sup>10</sup>). Greek philosophers had taught the priority of being to doing. But Jesus gave to the world as a whole what had hitherto been the possession of select souls. By showing the power of this principle to deepen the received code, He was able to alter the popular conception of the moral ideal. He taught that within the Kingdom the only goodness which would be recognized would be goodness of heart. All the examples which He gave to show that the righteousness of the Kingdom must exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, display the operation of this principle. See Mt 5<sup>20</sup>, 28, 34-37, 44-48, Lk 6<sup>45</sup>. Our Lord did not abolish the old Law. He fulfilled it (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>). He penetrated to the inner meaning and deeper truth which underlay it. And what is true of the good is true also of the evil: its nature is spiritual, it proceeds from the heart, and is not merely concerned with the outward action (Mt 15<sup>18-20</sup>, Mk 7<sup>21</sup>, Lk 6<sup>45</sup>, see also Mt 12<sup>34, 35</sup>).

There is a tendency to regard this purity of heart as concerned only with the negation of one class of fleshly appetites. Our Lord did indeed apply the principle most impressively with that reference (Mt 5<sup>27, 28</sup>). But, as all the illustrations show, the principle is one of universal application, and concerns the very essence of all goodness. It is the principle which the philosopher Kant stated in the terms: 'Nothing can possibly be conceived in the world, or even out of it, which can be called good without qualification, except a Good Will.' It is the doctrine which modern Ethics expresses when it declares that the goodness or badness of conduct depends upon the motive. In the last resort, the 'single eye' and the 'pure heart' are the same. They both express the inward determination to do the good just because it is the good, and for no other reason. The former regards this moral attitude from the point of view of the end which is aimed at, the second contemplates the disposition of the heart, the moral condition of soul, out of which the good inevitably springs.

3. The Infinite Value of the human Soul.—This idea is very frequent in the teaching of our Lord. Explicitly or implicitly, it occurs everywhere. See Mt 6<sup>26</sup>, 10<sup>29</sup>, 40, 42, 10<sup>31, 32</sup>, 15, 16<sup>26</sup>, 18<sup>8</sup>, Mk 8<sup>36, 37</sup>, 9<sup>37, 42</sup>, Lk 9<sup>35, 48</sup>, 10<sup>28</sup>, 12<sup>9</sup>, 24, 28, 14<sup>5</sup>, 15<sup>8</sup>, 17<sup>34</sup>, 19<sup>10</sup>, Jn 3<sup>16</sup>, 4<sup>19</sup>, 10<sup>11</sup>. All passages which tell of the love of God for the individual soul or of the sacrifice by which the salvation of the soul was effected, are witnesses to the same truth. Every person, no matter how poor, wretched, sinful or degraded, is of infinite value when compared with any mere thing. The gospel was preached to the poor. The Christ received the publicans and sinners who came to Him. None were too miserable or too lowly for His compassion. The Great Father in heaven is ever watching over His human children. The very hairs of their heads are all numbered. Better to die a miserable death than be the cause of injury to one of His little ones. God so cares for even the most sinful among His children, that He is compared to the shepherd seeking the lost sheep, to the woman searching for her lost piece of money. There is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth. God is like a loving father who rejoices over the returning prodigal. As we have it in St. John, 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son' (3<sup>16</sup>).

Apart from the religious value of these teachings, their ethical importance is incalculable. They conveyed to mankind one of the greatest gifts which even Christianity had to bestow: the belief that each human soul is of absolute value, above all price or estimation. It is the doctrine which philosophical Ethics expresses, when it declares that every person is to be regarded as an end in himself, never as a means only. This is the doctrine which underlies the mission of the Church to go and make disciples of all the nations (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>). It is the principle which has overthrown tyrannies, abolished slavery, and justified all our modern enthusiasms for liberty and for the welfare of humanity.

This doctrine, combined with that of the Fatherhood of God, affords the true proof of individual immortality. Our Lord's teaching is quite clear on this subject. There must be a future life for men because God calls Himself their God. 'He is not the God of the dead, but of the living' (Mt 22<sup>32</sup>, Mk 12<sup>27</sup>, Lk 20<sup>37</sup>). That is, God cares for men, they are precious in His sight, therefore He cannot permit them to perish. The great Father will never forsake His children.

4. The Law of Love.—Christianity teaches us to think of love as the nature of God and as the highest law of human life. We owe this noble teaching to our Lord Himself. By precept and example He taught His followers to think of the Almighty as their Father in heaven. While never ignoring the justice, the righteousness of God, He made His hearers realize the supremacy of the Divine Love. Out of this great love of God should flow a human love of the same nature, a beneficent love (Mt 6<sup>34-42</sup>, Lk 6<sup>27-36</sup>), a love which embraces even those who are bitterly hostile. Not only so, but our Lord teaches that the Law of Love is the supreme law of conduct. It includes all the commandments (Mt 22<sup>37-39</sup>, Mk 12<sup>30-31</sup>). In strict accordance with this teaching is the Law of Service. He is greatest who serves best (Mt 20<sup>26-27</sup>, Mk 10<sup>43-44</sup>, Lk 22<sup>24-27</sup>, Jn 13<sup>14-17</sup>). Loving service is the true test of the life (Mt 25<sup>34-40</sup>).

This teaching shows clearly that our Lord designed to give to men a blessing which should be, not merely an illumination for the soul of the individual, but a social bond. He set free a principle which would bless all in the blessing of each. That principle may be described as the family principle exalted to heaven for the good of all the earth. If God is 'Our Father', then all we 'are brethren' (Mt 23<sup>9</sup>). The kingdom of God is thus the kingdom of Love in which each is blessed in the blessing of all. And this is the true Summum Bonum, the ideal end, which finds its partial realization in every instance of genuine goodness in the individual life as well as in the life of the community, and which is the highest principle of all moral and social progress. Its perfect realization is the great hope of the future, the coming of the Kingdom in glory.

5. The Universality of Love.—The Law of Love in its relation to our duty to one another is expressed by the command, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' But the question arises, What is the scope of this love? Or, as it was put to our Lord Himself, 'Who is my neighbour?' (Lk 10<sup>29</sup>). The answer to this question is contained in the passage already referred to (Mt 5<sup>43-48</sup>). Our love is to be, like God's, a blessing for all who need it, the evil as well as the good, the just as well as the unjust, our enemies as well as our friends. In the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>30-35</sup>), the same answer is given in a way which makes its meaning even more distinct. To enforce the lesson, our Lord selected as the hero of His parable a man belonging to a race which was hated and despised by the Jews. There was an exquisite wisdom in this choice. Why not have made a Jew assist a Samaritan, or even a Gentile, in order to illustrate the principle? But our Lord wished to teach by an example appealing rather to the humanity than to the national feelings of His hearer. Had the act of mercy been shown by a Jew to a Samaritan it might have seemed condescension, a work of supererogation. Shown by a Samaritan to a Jew, the true character of the goodness it reveals becomes, from the Jewish point of view, far more evident. We are taught that love should be universal in its nature. It should break down the barriers erected by race, or privilege, or religion.

It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of this teaching. Ancient civilizations were for the most part founded on slavery or on the subjection of races or classes. Underlying the whole Jewish system was the idea of a privileged people. Our Lord broke through the most inveterate of prejudices, and taught the universal obligation to love and to bless. He laid the foundation of liberty and of philanthropy.

6. The Great Example.—In Mt 6<sup>33</sup>, the ideal is set before us in two ways, as an objective aim and as a type of character: 'Seek ye first his kingdom and his righteousness.' The righteousness of God is the standard. There is, and must be, a correspondence between the outward and the inward, between the Kingdom of God as a universe of souls bound together by the great love of their Father in Heaven and their love one to another, and the moral condition of each individual soul. When the latter side is considered, we ask, What is its quality? what is its standard? The answer is—the character of God. This is implied in the very name 'Father' (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>). The teaching is, 'Be sons of your Father,' be like unto God. Even more explicit is the statement in Mt 5<sup>48</sup> 'Ye therefore shall be perfect as your heavenly Father is perfect.' This standard may seem too high. It may seem unreal to say to ordinary men and women, 'Be perfect as God.' But all realization of good character in human creatures is, so far as it goes, an imitation of God, a reproduction of the Divine. Goodness is always a following of God, though it be a very long way off. What we have here is the absolute standard, the highest possible ideal of character. Our Lord will set nothing lower before us. But the ideal is brought near to us in a way which is characteristic of Christianity. Jesus Christ Himself is the incarnation of the ideal. See Mt 11<sup>29</sup> 20<sup>28-29</sup>, Mk 10<sup>45</sup>, Lk 6<sup>26</sup> 22<sup>27</sup>, Jn 13<sup>31-34-35</sup> 15<sup>13</sup>. In these passages our Lord holds Himself up as an example. And there can be no doubt that the influence of His character has been as potent a moral force as His words. He elevated humanity by being what He was. It is very hard to realize how vast was the change effected by the teaching and example of Christ. The conception of the ideal of character was altered. To see this truth we have but to compare Aristotle's picture of the 'great-souled man' with our Lord. Noble and virtuous with the splendid but imperfect nobility and virtue of pagan Greece, the great-souled man is proud, self-satisfied and pompous. His very 'greatness,' as conceived by Aristotle, makes him a poor creature when placed beside Jesus of Nazareth. Above all, our Lord's example shows us the principle of love at work in human life.

7. Self-renunciation.—When dealing with the lofty principles of absolute morality, our Lord's teaching is characterized by the most extraordinary sweetness. With joyous confidence His thought lingers on the sunny heights of truth. But when He comes to speak of the struggle through which the soul must pass in its upward progress, His manner changes. There is an awful force in the language and imagery with which He teaches the necessity of self-sacrifice. From this we learn His attitude towards sin. See Mt 5<sup>29-30</sup> 18<sup>8-9</sup>, Mk 9<sup>42-48</sup> 10<sup>27-29</sup>. Such passages show that His tenderness towards the repentant sinner involved no condoning of sin. Our Lord received sinners, but He never regarded their sins with complaisance. The following passages are important: Mt 10<sup>27-28</sup> 16<sup>24-27</sup>, Mk 8<sup>34-38</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22-25</sup> 14<sup>26-35</sup> 17<sup>33</sup>, Jn 12<sup>25</sup>, also Mt 7<sup>13-14</sup>, Lk 13<sup>24-28</sup>. In these passages the necessity of self-renunciation is expressed in terms of the most vivid intensity. Yet the denial of self is nowhere represented as an end in itself. It is a means, or rather the inevitable means. It is the way, not the goal. Yet it is a way which cannot be avoided if the goal is to be reached.

Our Lord clearly sets before us the reward of goodness and the punishment which awaits unrepented sin. The subject is a puzzling one, because of the ambiguities of language. But our thoughts will be set free from confusion if we consider our Lord's teaching as it stands, apart from certain popular misconceptions. It will be found that, in His teaching, the Kingdom is itself the reward. To gain this is to gain all, to lose it is to lose all. Sometimes it is described as 'the joy of thy Lord' (Mt 25<sup>21</sup>), sometimes plainly as 'the kingdom' (v. 34), sometimes as 'eternal life' (v. 46). But all these are ways of describing that one glorious end which is the Summum Bonum, the true and final good, that end in which God Himself with all His children shall have one undivided blessedness. To live for this reward is to live for the good itself. The goodness or badness of working for rewards depends altogether on the nature of the rewards which are sought. To work for selfish ends is always wrong, to seek as a reward that great end which is the supreme and universal blessing is always right; it is indeed the essence of all goodness.

ii. RELIGIOUS IDEAS.—We have considered the leading ethical ideas of our Lord's teaching. But, as must now be quite apparent, it is impossible to separate the ethical element from the religious. Though our Lord Himself advanced from a pre-eminently ethical stage of instruction to a stage which was more distinctively religious, yet in His thought the two are united. Indeed, the religious side of the truth is the more fundamental. It deals with the underlying principles. For example, when speaking of the ordinary work of human life, and giving the great rule, 'Seek first the kingdom,' He led His hearers on to the thought of the Fatherhood of God as the reason why they should renounce all anxiety and live for the higher ends (Mt 6<sup>25-32</sup>).

1. The Fatherhood of God.—This idea stands first among those which belong to the distinctively religious side of our Lord's teaching. He gave it a fundamental position, and conveyed it in every possible way to the minds of His hearers. By word, by manner, by the manifestation of His own spiritual experience, and, above all, by being what He was, and at the same time declaring Himself to be a revelation of the mind and will of God (see Mt 11<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>12</sup>, Jn 5<sup>36</sup> 8<sup>18</sup> 10<sup>37</sup> 12<sup>44</sup> 14-16), our Lord taught men to think of God as 'the Father,' and to attribute to Him all the benignity and bountifulness of the fatherly character. Here it is impossible to separate the teaching from the life of Christ. It is through the Christ Himself that man learns to know God as the Father. Jesus was intensely conscious of God's presence and relation to Himself. He saw in the heart of God with a clearness of vision unparalleled in human experience. He speaks of God out of a perfect knowledge, and whenever a human soul is able truly to hear, belief follows. The revelation of God made by Him carries conviction with it. It is so great a thing that it cannot but be true. When once man has grasped it, no other account of God can be accepted.

In the teaching of our Lord the Fatherhood of God is presented in three ways: (1) Jesus speaks of God as 'My Father.' This name was very dear to Jesus. It sprang from His consciousness of relationship to God. Clearly, it bore a special meaning. He was Son of God in a unique sense. This truth is emphasized by the manner in which the expression 'My Father' is frequently used (Mt 10<sup>28</sup> 33 11<sup>27</sup>, Lk 2<sup>49</sup> 22<sup>29</sup>, Jn 5<sup>17</sup> 10<sup>29</sup> 30 17<sup>5</sup> 20<sup>17</sup>; see also Mt 7<sup>21</sup> 16<sup>17</sup> 18<sup>10</sup> 19. 35 20<sup>23</sup>, Mk 8<sup>38</sup>, Lk 24<sup>46</sup>, Jn 5<sup>30-49</sup> 6<sup>57</sup> 8<sup>18</sup> 14-16). These passages fully carry out the idea expressed in the announcements at His baptism and on the Mount of Transfiguration (Mk 1<sup>8</sup> and 9<sup>7</sup>). (2) Our Lord taught His disciples to think of themselves as a family, with God above them as their Father. They were called into a specially close relationship to God, and became in that special sense His children. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus addresses His disciples, and continually speaks to them of God, calling Him 'your Father' (Mt 5<sup>16</sup> 45. 48 6<sup>1</sup> 8. 14. 18. 32 7<sup>11</sup>). 'Fear not,' He says, 'little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom' (Lk 12<sup>29</sup>). In the Lord's Prayer the address 'Our Father' has reference to the disciples as the family of God. Perhaps we dare not limit the 'our,' but the prayer was given to the disciples for their own use, and the word was surely meant to have the effect of uniting them as a family under the headship of their Father in Heaven. (3) Our Lord's teaching regards God as the Father of all men. Mt 6<sup>25</sup>, Lk 6<sup>26</sup> imply this great extension of the Divine Fatherhood. But clearer still are the parables of the Lost Sheep, the Lost Piece of Silver, and the Prodigal Son (Lk 15). The parable of the Good Samaritan extends the sphere of love beyond the bounds of Judaism, and throws light on such passages as Mt 6<sup>27</sup> and Lk 6<sup>26</sup>. Its principle corresponds, in the human sphere, to that expressed by the words, 'God so loved the world' (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>).

Our Lord, then, teaches us to think of God as the Father, and at the same time as Sovereign over the greatest of all kingdoms. The characteristic attribute of this paternal Sovereignty is love. His love is so wide that it includes the unthankful and evil, those who have turned their backs upon their Father's house and renounced His authority. It is the source from which springs all that is described as Salvation. It explains the mission of the Christ (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>). It is the inner truth of the life of Him who came to seek and to save the lost. It is that Divine characteristic from which proceed 'joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth' (Lk 15<sup>7</sup>). And when this love has won the sinner, it introduces him into a circle in which he is brought more immediately under the Divine Fatherhood. He becomes a member of the family, the Kingdom, that great order of things in which men feel and experience the love of the Great Father. Finally, there is that supreme degree of Divine Fatherhood which belongs to the relation between the Father and Him who is in a unique sense the Son. The life and death of Christ reveal the love of God to man because of this relation. God's love appears because He gave His only-begotten Son. See also art. FATHER.

2. The Son.—The second stage of our Lord's teaching is concerned mainly with Himself and His work for man. It is one of the great paradoxes of His personality, that while humility was one of His most marked characteristics, He yet preached Himself as none else ever dared to do. Sometimes the humility and the self-assertion occur side by side, expressed in a single utterance. 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls' (Mt 11<sup>28-29</sup>). The invitation and promise here constitute a great claim. Yet He adds, 'I am meek and lowly in heart'; and the story of His life proves the truth of the assertion. Furthermore, these words follow one of the greatest statements ever made of the dignity of our Lord's person, and the extent of His authority: 'All things have been delivered unto me of my Father: and no one knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him' (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>). This passage is but one out of many. Jesus continually asserted His right to the absolute devotion of the hearts of men. No sacrifice is too great to be made in His service. Even the dearest of human relationships must be counted as nothing in comparison with Him. He claims, as His right, the utmost allegiance (Mt 10<sup>37-39</sup> 16<sup>24-28</sup> 19<sup>28</sup> 39 25<sup>31</sup>, Mk 8<sup>34-38</sup> 9<sup>37</sup> 41 10<sup>29</sup> 13<sup>12</sup> 14<sup>7-9</sup>, Lk 9<sup>25</sup> 48. 57, 10<sup>22</sup> 12<sup>53</sup>, 14<sup>26</sup> 18<sup>33</sup>, and throughout St. John's Gospel. See, especially, Jn 5<sup>17</sup> 8<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>30</sup> 14<sup>6</sup>).

The only adequate explanation of these facts is that which the NT supplies, and which the Christian Church has always held: Jesus is Divine; He is the Incarnate Word of God (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>). No other doctrine can justify the claim which He makes, and explain the life, work, and teaching by which that claim is sustained. Our Lord did not declare Himself Divine, nor did He even make open proclamation of His Messiahship. That was not His method. He avoided anything which would have inflamed the minds of the multitude (Mk 1<sup>37-38</sup>, 43, 44 3<sup>12</sup>, Lk 4<sup>42</sup>, 43 5<sup>16</sup> 8<sup>8</sup>, Jn 6<sup>15</sup>). Further, He knew that faith springs into being not from names and titles, but from the recognition by the soul of that which is alone worthy to be the object of faith. Therefore He chose to reveal Himself gradually in His daily intercourse with His followers, and so lead them to discover the great truth for themselves (Mt 16<sup>13-20</sup>). That our Lord deliberately followed this method is shown by the terms which He used when referring to Himself. For example, He habitually called Himself the Son of Man. The name presented a problem to all who heard it. It suggested a reference to Dn 7<sup>13</sup>, but was not so definitely Messianic as to constitute a claim. It evoked the question, 'Who is this Son of Man?' (Jn 12<sup>34</sup>). The name occurs about eighty times in the Gospels, and always as used by our Lord of Himself. It is so characteristic of His own point of view that it is not used by others. It clearly implies His humiliation, yet it is employed by Him pointedly in those passages in which His glory is described. See Mt 13<sup>41</sup> 19<sup>28</sup> 25<sup>31</sup>, Lk 21<sup>36</sup>, Jn 8<sup>57</sup> 9<sup>35</sup> etc.

The title Son of Man expresses the humanity of our Lord. It is His own testimony to His perfect Brotherhood with men. It marks His sympathy with human infirmity, and is used impressively in connexion with His mission of salvation (e.g. Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, Lk 19<sup>10</sup>). It presents Him as the Ideal Man. This has been questioned as not in accordance with the thought of the time, but the OT had its ideal figures. Abraham, Moses, David, Elijah came to be regarded as typical representatives of whole peoples or classes. In the latter Isaiah this mode of thought reaches its most perfect development. The ideal Israel is depicted as the 'Servant of Jehovah,' and, as the prophet proceeds, the conception grows, until in Is 53 there rises into view the wonderful form of the Suffering Servant who is contrasted with, yet is one with, the people of God. There is therefore no anachronism in supposing that when our Lord styled Himself the Son of Man He intended to set Himself forth as the representative of the human race, the Ideal Man. See, further, art. SON OF MAN.

The title Son of God was not often used by Jesus Himself (see Mt 27<sup>3</sup>, Jn 5<sup>26</sup> 9<sup>35</sup>), yet in many ways He implied His right to it. His constant and peculiar use of the expression 'My Father' (see above), and the frequent occurrence of the title 'Son of God,' as attributed to Him by others and not disclaimed by Himself, show what was His position in regard to this question (Mt 4<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>29</sup> 14<sup>33</sup> 27<sup>35</sup>, Mk 9<sup>7</sup>, Lk 4<sup>41</sup> 22<sup>7</sup>, Jn 1<sup>34</sup>-43 3<sup>13</sup> 9<sup>35</sup> 11<sup>27</sup> etc.). This title was naturally seized upon by His disciples as the simplest way of expressing the mystery of His person. The essence of that mystery, as manifested in every instance in which He disclosed His inner mind, was the close relationship in which He stood to the Father (see Mt 11<sup>27</sup>). And so it was by means of this title that His Divinity was represented to the minds of His first followers. And for the practical purposes of the religious life, as distinguished from the definitions of theology, no mode of expression could have been so useful; the critical faculties were held in suspense while the needs of the soul were satisfied. See also art. SON OF GOD.

The two titles 'Son of God' and 'Son of Man' modify and explain one another. Taken together they constitute our Lord's own most characteristic way of expressing the nature of His person. It was in this way that He chose to teach men His humanity and His Divinity and the miracle of their union. Thus the Incarnation is found to be implied in our Lord's attitude towards His own consciousness of Himself in relation to God and man. For a deeper insight into this profound subject we must turn to those passages in which that consciousness is most fully revealed: Mt 11<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>31</sup>, Mk 8<sup>38</sup>, Lk 10<sup>22</sup>, Jn 6<sup>38</sup>, 8<sup>28</sup> 10<sup>25</sup> 17<sup>13</sup> etc. With this is connected our Lord's consciousness of Himself as the bond of union among His disciples, uniting them to God and to one another: Jn 14<sup>20</sup> 15<sup>1-11</sup> 17<sup>21</sup>, 22. Also He presents Himself as the means of communication between God and man: Jn 10<sup>14</sup>. These truths are aspects of His Incarnation.

Our Lord represented the work of His life as a work of salvation: Lk 19<sup>10</sup>; cf. Mt 15<sup>24</sup>, Lk 15<sup>1-10</sup>. This idea, though prominent in the Gospels from the first (see Mt 1<sup>4</sup>, Lk 2<sup>1</sup>, Jn 1<sup>9</sup>), and implied in all our Lord's language about Himself and His relation to men, yet remains undeveloped in His teaching until the end of His ministry. As the Gospels proceed, however, and His death approaches, sudden gleams of light are thrown upon the deeper meaning of salvation. In Jn 6<sup>51</sup>, the thought of Christ as the Bread of Life passes into that of the Paschal Lamb by whose death and blood-shedding the people of God are delivered. In Jn 10<sup>11</sup>, He is the Good Shepherd who lays down His life for the sheep. On the last journey to Jerusalem our Lord's mind was much occupied by the dreadful events which He knew were awaiting Him (Mk 10<sup>33-34</sup>, also Mt 20<sup>17-19</sup>, Lk 18<sup>31-33</sup>). Before this He had told His disciples of the facts (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup> 9<sup>9</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22</sup>), but now He declares something of their meaning and purpose. The occasion of the declaration was the ambitious petition of the sons of Zebedee. In reply to the two brothers, our Lord promises, in veiled language, participation in His sufferings; and to the whole body of the disciples He gives this teaching: 'Whoever would become great among you shall be your minister; and whosoever would be first among you, shall be servant of all. For verily the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many.' It is the first clear statement in our Lord's own language of the purpose of His death. With this passage must be connected Jn 12<sup>23-27</sup>, in which, contemplating the terror of His cross, He lays down the law of sacrifice. But clearer still is the declaration which He made at the Last Supper. There are four accounts in the NT (Mt 26<sup>26-28</sup>, Mk 14<sup>22-24</sup>, Lk 22<sup>19-20</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>23-25</sup>). No two of these correspond exactly. But all agree that our Lord connected the rite with the conception of His death as a sacrifice on behalf of men. He gave His body over to death, His blood to be shed 'for many unto the remission of sins.' And, as St. John tells us (chs. 14-16), that very night our Lord addressed His disciples at length on His love and His relation to the Father and to them, and said, 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.'

In the teaching of our Lord, then, the atonement is the redemption of men from sin by the giving of His life. It is the remission of sins through His death and the shedding of His blood. It is the work of love. It is the corn of wheat falling into the ground that it may perish and, through perishing, bear much fruit. The impressiveness of this teaching is greatly increased when it is taken in connexion with certain events and fragmentary utterances which give the testimony of our Lord's own inner consciousness to the fact that, in His Passion and Death, He engaged in a great conflict with evil, a work given Him by His Father, a work which He was bound to accomplish. The following passages are the most important: Mt 16<sup>22</sup>,

3. Faith.—But though the fuller explanation of the purpose of our Lord's life and death took place only towards the end, He had from the beginning made a demand which implied all that afterwards became explicit. He insisted on a faith which found its supreme object in Himself. The greatness of His personal claim has been already pointed out (see list of passages given above). We have been able to discern something of the meaning of this claim in relation to the doctrine of our Lord's person. But it is necessary also to observe that there is involved a very clear doctrine of the nature of faith. Jesus taught the supreme necessity of faith in God, the great Father. He also taught the necessity of faith in Himself. By the demands which He made, the promises He gave, the blessings He bestowed, He made it clear that He sought for a faith which should take the form of an absolute trust directed towards Himself. See Mt 6<sup>30-33</sup>, 23-24, 22, 29, 15<sup>28</sup>, Mk 14<sup>31</sup>, 41, 29, 40, 13<sup>34</sup>, 38, 65, 6, 7, 29, 21, 17-21, 16<sup>2</sup>, 14<sup>6-9</sup>, Lk 5<sup>12</sup>, 13, 20, 7<sup>30</sup>, 8<sup>25</sup>, 48, 50, 10<sup>42</sup>, 17<sup>19</sup>, 18<sup>42</sup>, 19<sup>38</sup>, 40. In the Gospel of St. John, faith of this kind is presented everywhere as the spiritual condition which enables man to become receptive of the highest blessing. See Jn 1<sup>12</sup>, 10, 21<sup>25</sup>, 23, 30, 35, 38, 44<sup>21</sup>, 42, 50, 5<sup>24</sup>, 6<sup>29</sup>, 20, 47, 8<sup>12</sup>, 9<sup>35-38</sup>, 10<sup>9</sup>, 15, 27, 11<sup>25</sup>, 26, 12<sup>45</sup>, 48, 14<sup>13</sup>, 12, etc. In these passages and throughout the Fourth Gospel, Christ Himself, in His relation to God the Father on the one hand, and to those who believe on the other, sums up all spiritual blessing. He is the source of Eternal Life, the giver of the living water, the Bread of Life, the Light of the World, the Good Shepherd, the Resurrection and the Life, the Way, the Truth, and the Life, etc. All these images imply some attitude or act of reception on the part of those who benefit. Therefore we read of the New Birth, the drinking of the Living Water, the eating of the Bread of Life, the following of the Light, etc. And whatever else may be involved, there is, in all these, the teaching that faith on the part of the human recipient corresponds to the gifts which are bestowed in Christ. See, further, art. FAITH.

Our Lord's first teaching as to preparation for the Kingdom was a call to repentance (Mk 1<sup>15</sup>). To this we must now add faith, as the subjective means by which the Kingdom is realized, a faith which, when developed, becomes faith in Jesus Christ.

4. The Coming of the Kingdom.—Our Lord came to found a kingdom, a great spiritual and social order of things, based on the principle of love, under the Fatherhood of God, and creating a Brotherhood among men. Its members were to enter into this new life through repentance and faith, and in it to realize a righteousness of heart and life far exceeding the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees. The possibility of such a thing in a world like this would have been incredible, but for the way in which our Lord presented and manifested Himself to men. In Him resided the power which would realize the Kingdom. By His death He overcame the forces which opposed the Kingdom, by His life He established it.

But though the Kingdom was a present fact from the moment that Christ brought human souls into a right relation to God, we are taught by Him to think of the Kingdom as yet to come. In the Lord's Prayer we have the petition, 'Thy kingdom come.' And there are many passages which show that these words refer to a great future realization: Mt 8<sup>11</sup> 13<sup>41</sup> 25<sup>31</sup>, Mk 8<sup>38</sup> 14<sup>25</sup>, Lk 21<sup>31</sup> 22<sup>29</sup>, Ac 1<sup>6</sup>, 7 etc. But clearest of all are the parables of growth: the Tares, the Mustard Seed, the Leaven, the Draw-net, the Seed Growing in Secret. These parables deal with the development of the Kingdom in history and its relation to the world at large. They connect the conception of the Kingdom as a spiritual fact here and now with that conception which is distinctively eschatological and regards the Kingdom as a perfected state of things in the future. It is plain that our Lord never lost sight of the great final realization of the Ideal. He constantly looked at the present in the light of the future, and taught His followers to live and work with the great end in view (Lk 13<sup>27</sup>).

5. The Paraclete.—In the Fourth Gospel we find recorded a very distinct and detailed promise of a special gift by which the disciples of our Lord were to be fitted to do their Master's work after His departure. It occurs in the solemn address of the night before the Passion (Jn 14-16). 'I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter (Paraclete), that he may be with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth' (14<sup>16</sup>, 17). Again and again in this great discourse our Lord returns to this promise, and dwells upon various aspects of the Spirit's work (14<sup>18-20</sup>, 15<sup>26</sup>, 16<sup>7-9</sup>). The presence of the Spirit involves the presence of Christ Himself. The Spirit is to teach the Apostles, to guide them into all truth, to bear witness of Christ. He has also a mission to the world (16<sup>8</sup>). It is good for the disciples that our Lord should leave them, because the Spirit's coming is dependent on His going. It is plain that the meaning is that the Spirit was to be given as a source of illumination and spiritual power for the people of Christ during the development of the Kingdom in the world. Thus the Spirit carries on the work of Christ.

In the Synoptic Gospels there is nothing as clear in regard to the office of the Holy Spirit. Yet there are passages which, though much less definite, agree perfectly with the teaching in Jn 14-16. Thus the connexion of the Spirit's work with the future of the Church is implied in Mt 10<sup>29</sup>, Lk 12<sup>12</sup>. See also Lk 4<sup>18</sup>, Mt 12<sup>28ff</sup>, Mk 3<sup>29</sup>, Lk 11<sup>13</sup>, Mt 28<sup>19</sup>. See, further, art. HOLY SPIRIT and PARACLETE.

In Ac 1<sup>4</sup> we find an important corroboration by St. Luke of the promise recorded by St. John: Christ charges His disciples 'not to depart from Jerusalem, but to wait for the promise of the Father, which, said he, ye heard from me.' In Lk 24<sup>49</sup> the promise is mentioned but not given.

The work of the Holy Ghost is therefore connected with the extension and development of the Kingdom. He is the inner regenerating power in the individual and the community. He is the Master of the movements of thought, guiding into all truth. The movements of thought are governed by ruling ideas,—ideas which present certain great ends as supremely desirable, and so become, in the true sense, ideals. Chief among all such is the idea of the Kingdom. It is the great ideal which is to be realized in and through the love of the Father, by the submission of human hearts to the Son, and under the superintending influence of the Holy Ghost. Thus the aims of men are to be subordinated to the one supreme end, that at last the Kingdom may come in its fulness.

LITERATURE.—It is not easy to supply a list of books dealing with this subject, as all commentaries on the Gospels and every 'Life of Christ' may be consulted. The most useful perhaps are: Weiss, Life of Christ; Ebersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah; Dalman, The Words of Jesus. The last mentioned is most important. Wendt's Teaching of Jesus is not so useful as it should be. Sanday's art. 'Jesus Christ' in Hastings' DB is important. Orr's art. 'Kingdom of God,' ib., should be consulted. The writer's Ruling Ideas of our Lord deals with the subject. Among works of a more general kind may be mentioned Seeley's Ecc Homo, Harnack's What is Christianity? (Was Wesen des Christentums), Liddon's Dignity of our Lord, and Latham's Pastor Pastorum. Archbishop Alexander's Leading Ideas of the Gospels deals with the ideas which guided the minds of the Evangelists. It will, however, be found suggestive on the subject of this article.

IDUMÆA (NT Ἰδουαία, which is also used in the LXX for the Heb. Edôm).—This land is mentioned once only in the NT (Mk 3<sup>9</sup>), but is also notable as the native land of Herod and his family. The Edom of the OT lay between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akabah. In the early part of the Jewish exile many of the Edomites overran the south of Judæa, and when the Nabataeans, at some time during the Persian period, conquered their own land, many more joined the earlier settlers in South Judæa, and that district became known as Idumæa. Thus Idumæa at the time of Christ was 'practically the Southern Shephelah with the Negeb' (G. A. Smith, HGHLL p. 239), i.e. roughly, all south of a line from Beth-sur to Gaza. Judas Maccabeus fought against the Idumæans with much success (1 Mac 5<sup>9</sup>) in 164. Fifty-five years later, John Hyrcanus conquered the country, and compelled the people to be circumcised (Jos. Ant. XIII. ix. 1; BJ I. ii. 6). By the law of Dt 23<sup>7-8</sup> they thus became full Jews in the third generation, though Herod himself was sometimes reproached as a 'half-Jew' (Jos. Ant. XIV. xv. 2). Although the Idumæans were 'sons of Esau,' their interests from this time were entirely merged with those of the Jews, and their country was reckoned to Judæa, Idumæa being counted one of the eleven toparchies of Judæa in Roman times (Jos. BJ III. iii. 5).

IGNORANCE.—1. Religious ignorance is uniformly regarded in the Bible as a moral and spiritual, and not merely as an intellectual, defect. Religious ignorance is always culpable, because the true light 'lighteth every man' (Jn 1<sup>9</sup>). The light of reason and of conscience shines even in the darkness of heathenism, and the heathen are plainly in fault if they 'apprehend' it not (v. 5). To put the matter in another way, the truths of Natural Religion carry their own evidence with them, and those who worship the creature instead of the Creator, or who deny that there is a God, or who think that there is no essential difference between virtue and vice, wilfully blind themselves to the truth (cf. Ro 1<sup>18-20</sup>, Ac 14<sup>17</sup>). Yet the culpability of the heathen, great as it is, is less than that of those who have received the light of revelation (Mt 10<sup>34</sup> 12<sup>4</sup>). Our Lord specially blames the Samaritans because, having received the Law, they nevertheless remained in ignorance of its Author (Jn 4<sup>22</sup> RV), and neglected to worship Him in the place which He had chosen. But far more culpable than the half-heathen Samaritans were the Jews, who had behind them a long religious ancestry of patriarchs and prophets (Ro 9<sup>5</sup>), who inherited the promises, and to whom were committed the oracles of God (3<sup>8</sup> 9<sup>4</sup>). The chosen race, wilfully blinding themselves to the true meaning of the Scriptures (Jn 5<sup>39</sup>) and to the signs of the times (Mt 16<sup>3</sup>), especially the testimony of the Baptist (Jn 3<sup>22-23</sup>), and the words and works of Jesus (Mt 11<sup>20</sup>, Jn 10<sup>33</sup> 14<sup>11</sup> 15<sup>24</sup>), were punished by having the truth hidden from them in parables (Mt 13<sup>35</sup>), and by having their spiritual understanding darkened (Mt 13<sup>35</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>14</sup>). Of the Jews the most culpable were the leaders—the Sadducees, because they were ignorant of the resurrection and the future life, truths inculcated by Moses himself (Mt 22<sup>29</sup>); and the Pharisees and scribes, those blind leaders of the blind, who led their unwary followers into a pit (15<sup>14</sup>). The case of the Pharisees was particularly hopeless, because, being ignorant, they thought themselves wise: 'If ye were blind [and acknowledged it], ye would have no sin; but now ye say, We see: your sin remaineth' (Jn 9<sup>41</sup>).

Ignorance of Jesus is treated in the Gospels as equivalent to ignorance of God: 'Ye know neither me nor my Father; if ye knew me, ye would know my Father also' (8<sup>19</sup>); 'No man cometh to the Father but by me. If ye had known me, ye would have known my Father also' (14<sup>7</sup>). If men do not come to a knowledge of Christ in this world, Christ will profess Himself ignorant of them in the next, and this will exclude them from the joys of heaven (Mt 25<sup>12</sup> 7<sup>2</sup>). Yet the obligation to know Christ in this world applies only to those to whom the gospel has been actually preached (Mk 16<sup>16</sup>, 16).

The reason why ignorance of Christ is regarded as a sin is that the truth as it is in Jesus is spiritually discerned (1 Co 2<sup>14</sup>). Lovers of truth, whose lives are virtuous and holy, perceive intuitively that the teaching of Jesus comes from God: 'Every one that doeth ill hateth the light, and cometh not to the light. . . . But he that doeth the truth cometh to the light,' etc. (Jn 3<sup>20</sup>).

Among the 'Seven Words' spoken by Jesus from the Cross there is one which bears upon this sin of ignorance: 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do' (Lk 23<sup>34</sup>). In saying this He renewed that condemnation which He had often passed upon religious ignorance, for He implied that those who slew Him had need of the Father's forgiveness—His own forgiveness the words themselves express. But what the saying immediately proclaims is that the sin of ignorance is not beyond forgiveness, even when it has led to the darkest of crimes; nay, that ignorance itself may be pleaded in extenuation (γὰρ) before Him who knoweth all. (On the genuineness of the saying see Meyer, Alford, WH [Appendix]).

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The use of illustrations is a noticeable mark of Jesus' teaching. He spoke in similes and metaphors and parables; general rules He illustrated by examples or stated in concrete instances. His aim may be gathered from observing what uses the method actually served.

Stories and similes, concrete facts and instances, catch the ear of the people. He who would win their attention must trick out his message in pictorial garb; he must weave in his truth with earthly fact and incident on the loom of fancy. Such teaching also remains in the memory. Truth pictured makes vivid appeal to the eye, and what the eye sees the memory retains, store for mind and heart to brood over. Jesus knew what was in man, and, desiring His message to be current coin for all, treasure of life for the simplest, He spoke in pictures and similitudes.

Illustrative examples serve also to make abstract truth more easily understood. A tale may enter in at lowly doors, bearing its load of truth and suggestion, when a truth stated abstractly would remain without. The concreteness of the poet, his vision of truth and symbol wedded together, of principle incarnated in fact, is closely akin to the ordinary man's ways of thinking and speaking. It is primary; the abstractness of thought, the language of reflexion and analysis, is secondary. Jesus spake to the people after their own fashion.

These uses are obvious; but they are only surface explanations; they hardly touch the main purpose. When Jesus said (Mt 7<sup>1-11</sup>), 'What man is there of you, who, if his son ask a loaf, will give him a stone? If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him?', He was aiming at something more than a clear and striking presentation of His truth. He was speaking from the heart to the heart, appealing to their feeling for what is highest and best, for what is reasonable to faith in goodness. His illustration was an argument addressed to the heart. 'In theology,' it is said to be an axiom that 'parables do not act as arguments' (Trench<sup>14</sup>, p. 40 n.); but they may in the sphere of faith. The parable of the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18<sup>21-35</sup>) was an answer to Peter's question, 'How often shall we forgive?' It gives no direct answer to that question. It is spoken not to the discursive intelligence busy about problems, but straight to the indignations of the generous spirit. The better nature is enlisted against the man forgiven who was not made thereby tender-hearted and pitiful. When the lawyer put the searching question, 'But who is my neighbour?' (Lk 10<sup>29</sup>), Jesus told the story of the Good Samaritan. That parable also does not answer the question directly. It rather sets before the heart the beauty of kindness, and its power to break down barriers between men which the neighbourhoods of race and religion may leave standing. An idea, such as that all men are potentially brothers, is apt to be barren, without conviction, without power of intellectual or spiritual inspiration; a story such as this appeals to the human heart by which we live, the tenderness in us which leaps up in admiration of a good man's deed.

The aim of our Lord's teaching was not enlightenment, the bringing of clear ideas to the mind; it was to create faith and sustain it. And the form of His teaching—His parables, similes, metaphors, concrete instances—was a means to serve that end. 'After all,' says Newman (Gram. of Assent, 94), 'man is not a reasoning animal; he is a seeing, feeling, contemplating, acting animal.' It is by the heart that man believes unto salvation. There is the seat of the emotions, the joy we have in things, the intuitions of faith, the admirations which rule conduct, and fashion character and shape our beliefs. The heart has its own reasons; visions of what is noble and fair, spells mighty there. And Jesus' illustrations are mostly pictures painted for that inward eye, music played that the ear of faith there may hear.

Many of Jesus' parables and pictures are more than mere illustrations; they have in them the imagination's power of interpretation, the revealing vision of the poet. The parable of the Pharisee and the Publican (Lk 18<sup>9-14</sup>) is more than an illustrative example, it is as Jülicher classes it, 'an example of the spiritual worth of humility before God.' It reveals, as in a transparency, the essential and hidden evil of a religious class. Our Lord's controversy with the Pharisees sums itself up in this revealing picture where the inner spirit and tendency of Pharisaism is brought to a luminous point. The parable has the force of a revelation, suddenly illumining a whole spiritual world. The same quality is in the illustrations of hypocrisy in Mt 6. These kindle a light in the spiritual imagination. Jesus takes the cases of almsgiving, prayer, fasting. These are not chosen as representing the three spiritual worlds, or spheres of duty—neighbour, God, self (Gore). That activity of the schematizing intellect is foreign to the whole method of Jesus. These were the fashionable religious virtues of the day, and therefore the chosen theatre of hypocrisy; self-seeking in religion leaves the humble sequestered virtues alone; and Christ's pictures of ostentatious service there, have that direct illumination of the religious and ethical imagination which sets it free from the bondage of all externalism. Many of the parables have this quality, such as the Seed Growing in Secret, the Good Samaritan, the Unmerciful Servant, the Prodigal Son, the Two Debtors.

In the Synoptic Gospels there is an explanation of Jesus' use of parables which is a startling paradox.

It is that He spake to those without in parables, and that He did so to hide His meaning (Mt 13<sup>10-15</sup>, Mk 4<sup>11-12</sup>, Lk 8<sup>9-10</sup>). It is easy to show that these words are not universally true, and that the aim of Jesus generally was to make Himself understood. So Jülicher (Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Parables') rejects this conception, placed on the lips of Jesus, as quite unhistorical. But we find that in all these Gospels this explanation occurs at one place, namely, between the parable of the Sower as spoken to those without and its interpretation to the disciples. And there the words have a real significance. The parable did not convey its meaning on the face of it. In the circumstances in which it was spoken, it was largely an utterance of the ironic spirit. Jesus was looking on the multitudes, drawn together by curiosity and various motives, caring so little, most of them, for the truths He had to tell them; and He gave utterance to the pathetic thoughts of His spirit. He spoke this parable which tells the disappointments of a prophet and the hope that sustains him, the faith that some, his sheep, will know his voice. It is a simple enough parable; and yet a veil does rest upon it for the careless and unsympathetic many who listen, though not any veil of subtle allegory. Jesus is speaking of hopes and fears they comprehend not; and, looking on them in their ignorance, it was natural that the words of old prophecy, with their kindred pathos and irony, should come to His lips, and He should speak about those who were being understood not, and whose hearts were darkened. That explanation has in it a hint of wider suggestiveness. Clearness and directness of speech are not the only sources of enlightenment. 'Art may tell a truth obliquely, do the thing shall breed the thought.' A truth stated objectively, indirectly, in the form of a story, may not compel the understanding; careless ones may hear it as though they heard it not; but it has greater effectiveness with those who receive it. That is exemplified in Jesus' latest parables. These are parables of judgment; the shadow of the Cross rests on them. In them, by their very form, the meaning is veiled somewhat. The intention and the value of that stand out strongly in this contrast. When Stephen stood before the Sanhedrin, he said: 'Ye stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost: as your fathers did, so do ye' . . . (Ac 7<sup>51-52</sup>). There is no mistaking that accusation, or evading it; but there is no persuasion there. No wonder the bold truth-speaker was stoned. Jesus says to His enemies, 'Hear another parable'; and after the parable of the Two Sons, He tells the parable of the Householder and his Vineyard. It is the same charge, but spoken indirectly; the reference is left to their own thoughts. That is a way of persuasion; sympathy and love, which are the sources of persuasiveness, have woven a vesture for the truth that, through the imagination, it may reach the heart. See art. PARABLES.

One great, though indirect, value of Jesus' illustrations must not be missed, i.e. their witness to the man He was, their revealing of His mind and heart. (1) His figurative method of teaching reveals the fashion of His mind. Farrar speaks of 'that kind metaphorical method of expression which our Blessed Lord adopted.' The thought there is of a stress put upon His mind through a sympathetic accommodation to His simple unlearned hearers, as though He first had a thought, and then searched for some simple familiar picture to express it. But a man's customary method of speech shows his manner of thinking. Our Lord reasoned in figures, because He had an eye for nature. Thought and image were born together in His seeing; His was the poet's mind, with its concreteness and beauty, its outlook of the whole personality, its individual vision of things flushed with emotion; and the pictures He set in the light give joy to the generations as they pass, because they first of all gave joy to Himself as they arose in His imagination. (2) The illustrations He uses reveal also the simplicity and fulness of His interest in life. It is amazing how the common life of His day passes in procession through His words! The sower in the fields, the merchant on his travels, the fisherman on the beach looking over his catch, the labourers waiting to be hired in the market-place, the beggar at the rich man's gate and the dogs licking his sores, the clamorous woman with her wrongs at the unjust judge's door, the poor woman turning her house upside down for her lost coin, the pleg of the little children in the streets; and even the faults and follies of men, the Pharisee with his broad phylacteries and wide fringes praying ostentatiously at the street corners, the craft of the dishonest steward, the son who says 'I go, sir,' and goes not, the anxious host begging for a loaf at midnight, and the grumbling friend in bed with his children—all speak of the interest with which Jesus looked on life. 'The learned eye is still the loving one.' He was no thinker whose mind ranged among ideas, no dreamer living in a world of ideals. His heart was amid the pell-mell of ordinary life, ordinary men, and ordinary duties; His thoughts of religion found their sphere there.

(3) Jesus' outlook on Nature was full of joy. That is shown, not so much by the abundance of His references, as by the light in which He places them, the thoughts they brought to Him. He speaks of the hen gathering her chickens under her wings, symbol of His own protecting love for Jerusalem; the sparrows, objects of God's care; the grass in its beauty and the lilies outvying the splendour of Solomon, symbols of the Creator's joy in the work of His hands, seeing He thus clothes these casual flowers of a day with such loveliness and grace. He touches also the common things of our life with the sudden glory of poetry—the growing of the corn, symbol of the upspringing of life in human souls; the care of parents in the home, symbol of the sleepless providence of the Heavenly Father over all His children; servants waiting for their lord, symbol of our duty to an unseen Master. When Jesus looked on Nature and the universal order of man's life, something great shone through—a Divine and beautiful mystery. It all spoke of the Father in heaven who made and loves it all; it was all instinct with the presence of God's Spirit. The beauty of religion, its tenderness and grace, is there; and the spiritual glory of life. That is an outlook of the fullest joy.

IMAGINATION.—

Imagination is the faculty by which we are able to reproduce mentally the images or 'copies' of past elements of sense-experience. This may be done in three ways: (1) passively, as when we reproduce our mental pictures in the form or order in which we experienced them as sensations; or (2) actively, as when we combine the images of past sensations into fresh groups for purposes of our own, as in the telling of an imaginary story; or (3) creatively, as when these images are used to symbolize abstract ideas, or to illustrate the teaching of moral and spiritual truth. There are great differences in the endowments of individual men and women in these respects. Many have but a faint power of mentally reproducing past events and objects, and among those in whom the power is well developed, some are able best to reproduce visual images (artists), others auditory impressions (musicians), others the images of movement (those possessing the dramatic gift). The poetic or creative temperament is richly endowed with all these aptitudes, and makes a free use of its resources in the presentation of ideal scenes and events as a medium for inculcating its message.

Students of our Lord's personality will at once recognize that He possessed the creative temperament in its noblest development. He was psychically endowed with a rich and varied imagination, which was disciplined, like all His human gifts, to the finest pitch of efficiency, and consecrated to the highest uses. His discourses are crowded with bright and vivid pictures, symbolic of the great truths which He had come to reveal. They are expressed in language that is rich, musical, and full of verbal colour and rhythmic phrases. In the narrative portions and the parables there is also a striking dramatic element, which gives them wonderful life and movement.

1. Characteristics of the imagination of Jesus.—It is the last feature—the dramatic—which is the most prominent quality in the imagination of our Lord. If the form of His teaching can be relied on as an indication of His mental endowments, it is clear that truth naturally clothed itself for Him in the form of concrete pictures and symbolic events. This is probably the key to the temptation scenes so vividly described in Mt 4<sup>1-11</sup>. The temptations of His public life became visualized in these typical scenes, and in fighting them thus prophetically, He rehearsed the long drama of His future spiritual conflicts, and overcame them beforehand. The same dramatic way of dealing with the critical facts of His life and work may be seen in such incidents as are detailed in Mt 9<sup>16-38</sup> 21<sup>11</sup> 26<sup>28</sup> 28, Lk 10<sup>3</sup>, and many others. This instinctive love of a dramatic situation as the vehicle of imparting spiritual truth, is illustrated also in the frequent use of object-lessons full of incident and movement. Sometimes He made a sudden and skilful use of opportunities offered to Him in the course of social intercourse, as in Mk 5<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>41</sup>, Lk 5<sup>21</sup> 7<sup>14</sup> 14<sup>6</sup> 17<sup>17</sup> etc. In other cases He deliberately created the situation, and then drew the lesson with which He desired to impress the spectators, as in Mk 9<sup>33-37</sup>, Mt 18<sup>23</sup>, Lk 22<sup>17-20</sup>, and Jn 13<sup>1-12</sup>. (The incident of the Blasted Fig-tree, if understood as a simple but vivid action-parable, loses all the ethical difficulties which have hidden its meaning from so many commentators.)

The picturesque side of our Lord's imagination is scarcely less obvious than the dramatic. He was temperamentally as well as spiritually in the deepest sympathy with Nature in all her varying moods, her wealth of life, her process of growth; and He was a keen and accurate observer of her ways, showing a vivid interest in the life of plants and animals (Mt 6<sup>28</sup> 7<sup>16</sup> 6<sup>28</sup> 8<sup>20</sup>) and in the common experiences of human life. These impressions were all stored up, as He watched them, in the treasure-house of a faultless memory, to be afterwards used as drapery for the everlasting truths of the Kingdom in a way which makes many of His discourses a perfect arabesque of beautiful imagery. His predominating love, however, was for images drawn from the incidents of human life and experience. He seldom used imagery of a purely natural kind, i.e. drawn from the impersonal action of physical or vital forces; there is nearly always some human agent or sufferer in view whose action or suffering invests the simile with a sympathetic as well as an intellectual aspect. Thus He was fond of drawing His word-pictures from the occupations of such familiar folk as shepherds, husbandmen, fishermen; from social customs in the home,—marriage ceremonies, feasts, salutations, journeyings; and even from bodily life and sensations,—the eye, ear, bones, feet, hunger and thirst, laughing, mourning, sickness, sleep, etc. Our Lord's use of natural imagery may be put into words written elsewhere by the present writer:

'Nature is interesting to Him only as the handiwork of God, and the mirror of His perfections or providential care for His creatures, or of Him as the Creator of human joys and sorrows. The cold impersonal attitude of the modern scientist towards the creation was impossible to the Lover of Souls. Nature with Him is the vehicle of truth as applied to conduct: she is a bundle of analogies in the sense of the poet:

*"Two worlds are ours; 'tis sin alone
Forbids us to descry
The mystic earth and heaven within Plain as the earth and sky."*

In this way our view of Nature is beautifully enriched and impregnated with higher meanings; and her operations resolve themselves into a series of delightful reminders of human duty and of Divine love' (The Master and His Method, p. 67).

The imaginative side of our Lord's mind is seen, finally, in the artistic use of language. Whether He spoke in the dialect of the common people, or (occasionally at least) in that form of Greek which was commonly known in Palestine, in which the Gospels have come down to us, it is unquestionable that even if we have His discourses only in translation, they are full of characteristic qualities of vividness, terseness, and colour. His use of popular proverbs in fresh applications (Mt 9<sup>12-13</sup> 7<sup>16</sup> 5<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>21</sup> 11<sup>15</sup> 12<sup>27</sup> 16<sup>28</sup>, Mk 10<sup>28-27</sup> etc.); His love of paradox (see Mt 6<sup>28-29</sup> for four striking instances of this; also Mk 10<sup>28</sup> and Lk 11<sup>6</sup>); the exquisite grace of some of His descriptions of natural processes (Mt 6<sup>28</sup>, 7<sup>24</sup>), and of social functions (Mt 25<sup>1-12</sup>), together with the symmetrical build of many of His sentences and discourses (esp. Mt 23<sup>1-46</sup>), show a mastery over the resources of language to which only a poet whose natural gift had been carefully disciplined to high uses could attain. The more the form of our Lord's teaching is studied, the more does this verbal skill impress the reader as complete and minute.

2. Practical uses of this imaginative element in our Lord's discourses.—The method of Jesus being exclusively oral, it is easy to see how valuable is this pictorial, dramatic, vividly expressed quality that runs through them all. In order that this method should be effective under the circumstances of the time, it was essential that it should have the marks of simplicity, concreteness, vividness, and brevity. It must be simple, as it was meant to become current not amongst scholars, disciplined in the use of complicated trains of thought, well used to abstract lines of reasoning, and capable of retaining these in their memory for a long time, but amongst the common crowd of listeners who had had only an elementary education, and were incapable of giving a close and sustained attention to any train of thought. It must be concrete, because such people always thought and spoke in such terms as were closely allied to their daily experience. It must be vivid, because otherwise no deep or lasting impression could be made on such occasional and unstudied opportunities as our Lord habitually used to disseminate His teaching. And it must be brief and portable, for it was meant not merely for those who listened to Him at the time, but also for those who should afterwards 'believe in his name' through the 'preaching and teaching' of the eye-witnesses and auditors of His earthly ministry. All these ends were perfectly served by the imaginative method of presenting truth chosen by the Great Teacher, and consistently followed by Him throughout His public life. His wisdom is shown by the event. It was probably many years before any large portion of His discourses and life-story was committed to writing. But there are clear indications that great care was taken to give the general outlines of the teaching accurately and without admixture, and that the utmost reverence was felt for the precisissima verba of their Lord's utterances by the Apostles and their first pupils. Converts were carefully taught from the earliest times in catechumen classes in the 'doctrine of Christ' (cf. 1 Co 15<sup>11</sup>, Col 2<sup>2</sup>, Lk 1<sup>1-2</sup>), and they were counselled to be specially careful to retain and transmit the exact form in which the teaching (the 'fair deposit' of truth) had been delivered to them (cf. 2 Ti 1<sup>2</sup>, a very significant passage). It was only as these first witnesses were one by one removed by death, or so scattered as to be beyond the reach of appeal, that any need for a written version of the Gospel began to be felt. Then the immediate disciples of the Apostles would endeavour to perpetuate their record of the words and deeds of Christ by committing it to writing. In this way the first two Synoptic Gospels may have taken shape, using the common basis of the oral Gospel as a foundation on which to build. In time various versions would arise, which were collated and welded together into a more accurate whole by scholarly men such as St. Luke (1<sup>2</sup>). Finally, as the last survivor of the original group passed away, his followers would have a strong desire to rescue his personal reminiscences from oblivion ere it was too late, and thus the Fourth Gospel arose as a supplement to the others.

If the Gospels and the Epistles are compared as to the form, further light is shed on the wisdom of our Lord in using the imaginative style of speech as a vehicle for His oral teaching. St. Paul's involved literary style, full as it is of technical terms, long sentences, and abstract trains of reasoning, could not possibly have served as the vehicle of a spoken Gospel, though, as a supplementary commentary and exposition of the truths enshrined in that Gospel, it is admirably adapted for its purpose; and the same is true, with qualifications, of the other NT writers.

3. A lesson for preachers.—The example of the Great Teacher still applies to those whose business it is to carry on the Christian function of preaching. In more illiterate periods, preachers naturally followed this method of putting their discourses into a concrete, illustrative, and vivid style; but as books have spread, and the habit of reading has become general, there has been a growing tendency to throw sermons into a more literary form. While this has been partly inevitable and is so far justifiable, it is certain that the pulpit has lost much of its influence because of this unconscious change of method. All spoken discourse should aim at the qualities of simplicity, concreteness, vividness, and brevity of expression, which are so remarkable a feature in the discourses and parables of Christ. The very plethora of books makes this specially needful in an age when the human mind is overburdened with the rushing details of daily experience, and the evanescent appeal of ephemeral literature. Unique as are many of the qualities that belong to Christ as a preacher, and making due allowance for the contrast between the Oriental environment in which He lived and that of our own day, there is nothing that more needs to be built into our training of young preachers than a close study of the method of the Master with a view to adapt it to our own day and circumstances.

IMITATION.—1. Christian Ethies was roughly constituted in the early centuries by the recognition of two moralities—common morality, requiring a minimum of obedience to law from those living in the world, and first-class morality, the superior or supererogatory goodness of those who practised asceticism. Into the service of the latter, with its 'counsels of perfection' (1 Co 7<sup>25</sup> with Mt 19<sup>12</sup>—these texts are very early applied in this fashion), all Christian enthusiasm tended to pour itself. This more exacting life is praised as making men resemble the angels. Christ had described the angels as unwedded (Mt 22<sup>30</sup>); an age, preoccupied with problems of sex, fastened upon this as the leading truth in regard to those exalted beings. But it is in point of fact a mere external—and therefore, of course, it is imitable! The essential thing is, that angels 'fulfil God's word' (Ps 103<sup>2</sup>). To our Lord Himself this was the essential about them: 'Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth' (Mt 6<sup>10</sup>). And, when we think of that truth, we see that our proper pattern is not the angels, but the Son. About angels we know little, if anything, that is certain. They are supernatural, almost unnatural beings. The Son came into this world that we might know Him, and has obeyed God's will under our own conditions, in their extremest and most burdensome type.

2. This reinterpretation—imitation of Christ rather than of angels—took place within Catholic ethics, with a great gain in the direction of living Christian truth. The most conspicuous leader was St. Francis of Assisi (1182–1226), 'that child of nature and child of God, half angel and half nightingale' (C. Bigg). Long before his time, the pattern of asceticism had been summed up in three virtues, Poverty, Chastity (i.e. celibacy), and Obedience. There may have been pre-Christian influences at work in so moulding Christian monasticism. But the pattern of Christ could also be recognized in these virtues. He had 'become poor' (2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>); He had 'made himself a servant for the kingdom of heaven's sake' (Mt 19<sup>12</sup>); He had been 'obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross' (Ph 2<sup>8</sup>). Of course, historical knowledge and Christian insight—but the Middle Ages were weak in both—see differences as well as similarities. Above all, Christ, who was persecuted and slain as a revolutionary, can hardly serve in fairness as a pattern of blind obedience to constituted human authorities. But, to St. Francis, the requirements of obedience—a rule for his 'Order,' and unhesitating submission to the Pope—were established conditions, which he never thought of criticising. Much the same may be said in regard to 'chastity'. The really important features of St. Francis' character, and of the movement it gave rise to, were as follows. (1) By the idea of imitating the behaviour of Jesus Christ, St. Francis cut his way direct to the centre of things, unimpeded, if unhelped, by the overgrown and often corrupt Church system of his time, and restored new life to personal religion and personal Christianity. (2) His enthusiasm for poverty was a living contribution to religious progress. Poverty to him was no inherited conventional virtue. He joyed in it. And, in this joy, he penetrated beyond externals, and showed that he had drunk from deep and full fountains. Poverty may be acquired by imitation; joy cannot. If there was something of extravagance in St. Francis' love of poverty, there was also a permanent moral idea—the 'simple life.' We cannot here discuss the claims or conditions or limitations of that virtue; but we greet it with reverence in so great a genius as our Saint. Still further, we must recognize in St. Francis' joy the influences of romance. 'Poverty' was his dear 'bride.' It was not for nothing that he lived in the days of chivalry. We recognize, too, the buoyancy of youth; St. Francis 'entered religion' at 25, and died at 44. These are accessories—innocent and touching accessories—at which Christianity may smile, but certainly will not frown. The centre lies deeper. Who can doubt that Christ's own joy dwelt in St. Francis? (3) He was a servant of his fellow-men. Here in part he inherited from the Church. The first ascetics were hermits, living in solitude; but the social instinct, guided by the sagacity of Church rulers, crept after the solitaries, drew them into union, placed them under rule, and in many cases set them to useful work. The two great orders of friars, Dominicans as well as Franciscans, were preachers. But, besides preaching, St. Francis and all his followers who really shared his spirit were helpers of men in their needs and miseries; a very genuine part of the pattern set by Christ. (4) The order of Tertiaries—semi-Franciscans, men or women, living in the world; not even pledged to celibacy—was a gallant attempt to minimize the distinction between the two moralities, and to make personal Christianity, as St. Francis had discovered it, available for non-ascetics. Here then we see the Christianity of imitation at its very best (but, as we have noted, it is more than imitation). St. Francis' Christianity is an all-round thing—living, attractive, strong, serviceable, joyous. Why could he not reform the Church by his indirect influence? Perhaps he was too sweet. Perhaps the lingering taint of the theory of two castes and two moralities frustrated him. Again, external poverty might not be in others what it was in St. Francis, the vehicle of simplicity and spiritual joy. Most obviously, external poverty broke down—even Franciscans evaded the full sacrifice. It is little shame to have failed in a region where no one wholly succeeds. Yet we must note that where St. Francis failed, Luther triumphed.

3. Monasticism has left us a literary monument of a kindred type of Christianity; one of the Church's and one of the world's classics; a Kempis' work known by the [historically doubtful] name, The Imitation of Christ. As long as human sorrow endures, and faith is not dead among men, this book will be treasured and held in reverence. Christ died on the cross; we must accept a crucifying, a denying, an abnegation of self and self-will. There the message of the book stops. Our fellow-men, even our Christian brethren, are only thought of as hindrances to Divine communion, tempters who threaten to impede our sanctification. A Kempis falls far below St. Francis, who served men for Christ's sake with eager loyalty. The dangerous one-sidedness of this glorious book is not due to externalizing Christ's example. Externally even, the Gospels rebuke it with a loud voice. And the book is not external. It has mystical depth and inwardness. Mysticism touched with the Christian spirit is its strength. But the defects which mar it lie no less deep.

4. The Reformation abolished the 'higher' morality of asceticism, with its imitation of such outward circumstances in the life of our Lord as His poverty or His celibacy. Ordinary lay Christianity was seen to involve a 'more perfect' obedience than the will-worship of the monk. (Recent study of Luther has called in question his insight on such points; but there can be no doubt that he grasped the principle, however his remarks in detail may show the distorting influence of the mediaeval tradition). It is also to be recognized that Protestant Christianity, with its emphasis on the Pauline Gospel of the cross—Christ died for us—had less receptiveness for the thought of Christ's example, in several of its forms. Bütschli and some other modern Protestants even assert that Christ's example amounts to no more than faultless fulfilment of vocation—a vocation very different from ours. This paradox belongs to the art. 'Example' rather than to the present article. What we have to insist upon is this—Christ cannot be truly followed by imitating Him in externals. But has the NT erred? He who was greatest humbled Himself; the Master of all served; the one perfectly innocent sufferer in all history forgave ungrudgingly; He laid down His life for us, that we might lay down our lives for others (Ph 2<sup>8</sup>, Jn 13<sup>15</sup>, Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>21</sup>, Lk 23<sup>34</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup>). Can this wonderful many-sided example be exchanged for a dry scholastic formula like 'fidelity to a vocation'? We have to be on our guard lest Protestantism, with its rediscovery of the gospel of God's love, and with its repudiation of false (monastic) conceptions of the higher life, should bar at some points that moral claim which is, in truth, high as heaven—high as Christ Himself.

5. Asceticism is an obsolete danger in modern Protestant circles; yet it is possible that the tendency to 'imitation' may take other forms. The socialistic reading of Christ's words—socialism crossed with crazy altruism; anarchistic socialism or socialistic anarchism; extremes meet!—is primarily a wooden way of conceiving Christ's teaching, just as imitation is a wooden way of following Christ's example. If we rise into the region of Christian principle, both dangers vanish. But there is a more subtle connexion between ideas of imitation and a false programme for the Christian life. Many schemes of the Atonement (e.g. the late Dr. Moberly's) tell us in substance that Christ initiated a process—to Dr. Moberly, a penitential process of self-mortification; to others, a process of world-redeeming love—which Christians must prolong. This is substantially imitation over again. We are to be saved by 'being such men as He was, too.' The Pauline and Protestant gospel tells us that Christ offered and finished the great sacrifice. We may well recoil from the old vulgar train of thought described by M'Leod Campbell: 'He suffered—I shall not suffer'; but God forbid we should dream that we share, in all respects and for every purpose, the lot of Christ. We fill up remaining suffering—if we are found worthy—but we do not fill out an uncompleted Atonement; that was 'finished,' once and for all, in mysterious anguish, in agony out of which springs our new life. We have not fully unlearned the dreary external programme of imitation till we confess Christ unambiguously as our life and our only hope. We are to resemble Him, partly as the younger born resemble the elder brother, partly as the saved resemble the Saviour. Confessing this, we are prepared to learn those further things He has to teach us about the ways of conformity to His image. Protestantism is to be developed or supplemented, but must not be abolished. Christian ethics presuppose the Christian gospel. They can never take its place.

LITERATURE.—The best recent book on the general subject is Sailer's Imago Christi, with its thoughtful criticism of the Imitatio. Early Christian literature is well summarized in Luthardt's Hist. of Christian Ethics (Eng. tr.). For St. Francis, see F. Schaller's Life and other writings. For the Reformers, see Charles Beard's Martin Luther, also his Hilbert Lecture, (Luther, that great religious genius, is the Reformer to study).

ROBERT MACKINTOSH.

IMMANENCE (Lat. in, 'in,' and manere, 'to remain') means abiding or dwelling in. In general it denotes the existence and operation of one thing within another. In Philosophy it expresses the identity of the originating and causal principle, involved in the genesis of the universe, with the universe itself in its progressive history. In Theology it denotes the indwelling and operation of God within the entire universe, of which He is the first cause and the abiding ground. It stands in contrast with 'transcendence,' which implies that God is prior to, and not limited by, the universe, which depends upon Him for its origin and continued existence. But immanence and transcendence are not exclusive of each other. A correct theistic philosophy gives a place to each of these principles in its exposition of the relations of God to the universe.

The history of the principle of immanence is interesting. It is perhaps first suggested by the wisdom of ANAXAGORAS, as the principle of operative intelligence in the universe. In the idealistic system of Plato, according to which the ideas that are supposed to be archetypal in God become eternal in the universe, and constitute its real essence, order, and intelligibility, the immanence of Deity is involved. The same suggestion is also implied in the eternal forms of Aristotle, according to which the framer of the world moulded it into a harmonious whole. The Aristotelian distinction between the immanent acts of the soul in forming a purpose and its transient acts in making the purpose effective, illustrates the principle of immanence in a general way.

In the later Platonic philosophy of the School of Alexandria the principle of the Logos, especially in the hands of Philo the Jew, also suggests the idea of immanence. Philo perhaps borrowed the term from the Wisdom literature, where it was used in the sense of wisdom or ratio, and applied to denote what Plato had called divina. This usage of the term Logos is interesting in itself and on account of its bearing upon the usage of the same term in the Fourth Gospel.

In modern philosophy the dictum of Malebranche, that we know things truly only when we see them in relation to God, and the monadology of Leibnitz, according to which a vital principle is supposed to lie at the heart of all things, both involve the idea of immanence. Spinoza's pantheism, as, indeed, all pantheism, so emphasizes immanence that transcendence has no place. The absolute idealism of the Hegelian type of philosophy and the Hindu theosophy both make so much of the immanence of the Deity that His transcendence is quite obscured. In the philosophy of our own time there is a tendency towards a fuller recognition of the immanence of God, and this tendency is affecting theology in a wholesome way. The result is a sound theistic philosophy, as the basis for a more vital theology.

This article has to do mainly with the idea of immanence as it appears in the Gospel narratives, and especially as it is exhibited in the teachings of Jesus Christ. The Synoptics do not give as much prominence to the Divine immanence as does the Fourth Gospel. It might be too much to say that transcendence prevails in the former and immanence in the latter; yet it is true that one of the points of difference between the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel is the way in which the relations between God and the universe are construed.

1. In the Synoptics there are hints of the Divine immanence in nature which resemble the OT utterances upon this point, e.g. Mt 5<sup>65</sup>, Mk 6<sup>21</sup>, Lk 21<sup>29</sup>. Transcendence is not excluded in these passages. God's immanence in man is also suggested by Mt 6<sup>10</sup>, Mk 13<sup>11</sup>, Lk 16<sup>22</sup>, 11<sup>17</sup>. The fact of the immanence of God in Christ is alluded to in Mt 3<sup>18</sup>, 4<sup>1</sup>, 12<sup>18</sup>, 27<sup>46</sup>, Mk 1<sup>2</sup>, 9<sup>2</sup>, Lk 4<sup>1</sup>. That God is immanent in some sense in the subjects of His Kingdom is implied in Mt 10<sup>40</sup>, 13<sup>18</sup>, 18<sup>28</sup>, 28<sup>30</sup>, Mk 1<sup>15</sup>, Lk 13<sup>21</sup>. It may be added that demoniacal immanence in men is often expressed in the Synoptics, e.g. Mt 8<sup>28</sup>, 12<sup>46</sup>, Mk 3<sup>22</sup>, 9<sup>2</sup>, Lk 8<sup>29</sup>.

We can scarcely conclude from these and similar passages that special stress is laid upon the idea of immanence in the Synoptics. The fact that God is constantly in vital and operative contact with the entire universe of being is very evident; but God's being and activity are not necessarily limited by the universe. He is the First Cause of all things, yet second causes have their place and dependent efficiency in the universe. Hence it is that God's transcendence is clearly recognized.

2. In the Fourth Gospel immanence has a larger place. Some interpreters suppose that St. John borrowed many of his ideas, especially that of the Logos, from the Platonic philosophy, as represented by Philo of Alexandria, who combined some OT ideas with the philosophy of Plato. But there are differences between the Logos doctrine of St. John and that of Philo which entirely exclude the supposition that St. John was a mere borrower.

The fact that he makes no allusion to Philo or to Alexandria, but rather assumes that he gathered his ideas from the teaching of Jesus, fully justifies this view.

As against Deism, the Gospels very plainly teach that God is in constant and vital contact with the universe. As against Pantheism, they also teach that God is vaster than the universe, and is in no way conditioned by it. Hence they present a sound Theism, which gives a proper place alike to the immanence and transcendence of God in the relations which He sustains to the universe. It may be added that the fact of this immanent and transcendent relation, rather than the mode of it, is set forth in the Gospels. The Epistles expand some of these things (cf. Ro 1<sup>20</sup> 5<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>11</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>30</sup> 2<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>10</sup> 8<sup>6</sup>, Gal 1<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>18</sup>, Eph 6<sup>10</sup>, Ph. 2<sup>13</sup>, Col 1<sup>19</sup>, He 1<sup>3</sup> 2<sup>18</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>24</sup> 4<sup>19</sup>; see also St. Paul in Ac 17<sup>25-28</sup>).

IMMANUEL (Ἐμμανουήλ) occurs once only in the NT (Mt 1<sup>23</sup>, in the quotation from Is 7<sup>14</sup> where the name is given in the form Ἐμμανυήλ). It is necessary, first of all, to examine the original prophecy before discussing the Evangelist's application of it to Jesus.

1. The circumstances which led to the prediction were as follows. Probably under the influence of a wish to force Judah into a coalition against Assyria, an attack was made on the southern kingdom by Syria and Ephraim about 735-734 (Is 7<sup>17</sup>). The attack was specially directed against the Davidic dynasty, and it was the object of the allies to dethrone Ahaz and set the son of Tabeel in his place (v. 6). The invasion filled Ahaz with panic, and he resolved to call in the aid of Tiglath-pileser, the king of Assyria (2 K 16<sup>7-8</sup>). Between the great Empire of Assyria and the petty State of Judah there could be no talk of equal alliance, Judah must forfeit its independence and become a vassal of Assyria. This involved heavy taxation and the loss of all power of independent action. Taxation would only aggravate the social misery and ruthless oppression from which the poor were suffering, and make it more difficult than ever to carry through those social reforms which the prophets regarded as most necessary. Accordingly, Isaiah vehemently opposed the king's project. He made light of the danger from Syria and Ephraim, and stigmatized the allies as flag-bands of smoking firebrands, which might cause considerable annoyance, but had lost all power for serious mischief. He bade Ahaz be quiet and fearless, assuring him that God would frustrate the designs of his foes (Is 7<sup>7</sup>), but warning him that his stability depended on his faith (v. 9). Possibly our present text is somewhat abbreviated, but at any rate Isaiah, either on that or possibly another occasion, offered him a sign in confirmation of his assurance, placing the universe from Sheol to Heaven at his disposal. Ahaz refused, since he had already made up his mind, but pretended that his unwillingness was prompted by reluctance to tempt God. The prophet passionately cries out against the conduct which, not content with wearying men, goes on to weary God. Then he proceeds to give the king a sign from God Himself, namely, the sign of Immanuel (v. 16).

The translation of the Hebrew is itself somewhat uncertain. It may now be taken for granted that the word עַלְמָא translated 'virgin' in the EV should be more correctly rendered 'young woman.' The proper Heb. term for 'virgin' is בְּתוּלָה, though even this is used in J1 1<sup>8</sup> for 'young widow.' All that can with certainty be said of the word used by Isaiah is that it indicates a young woman of marriageable age, but says nothing as to whether she is married or not. Accordingly the terms of the prophecy do not warrant us in interpreting the sign as the prodigy of a virgin conception. The natural interpretation to put on the prophecy is that a young woman, either married or the time or soon to be married, would give birth to a son and call him by this name. It is also uncertain whether we should translate with RV 'shall conceive' or with RVm 'is with child.' The former is, however, perhaps the more probable. The third question is whether we should translate 'a virgin' or 'the virgin.' The Hebrew has the article, which is correctly rendered 'the virgin,' in which case some definite person is in the prophet's mind. But Hebrew idiom often uses the definite article where in English we should translate indefinitely, so that 'a virgin' is equally correct as a rendering of the Hebrew.

These uncertainties as to the precise meaning of the words themselves naturally leave much room for difference of opinion, and this is largely increased by other uncertainties. It is therefore desirable to narrow the range of possible interpretation as much as possible. It is clear, in the first place, that the prophet is referring to something in the near future, otherwise the sign could have conveyed no message to the king, all the more that his difficulty was urgent. In the next place, we must beware of supposing that anything extraordinary is necessarily intended by the sign. Isaiah walked in captive's dress for a sign and a wonder upon Egypt and Ethiopia (Is 20<sup>2</sup>), certainly not because of any miraculous character attached to his conduct (cf. also 21<sup>3</sup>). With these considerations in mind we may approach the question, What message was the sign intended to convey? When Ahaz had been bidden ask a sign, the object was to convince him that his enemies would be overthrown and their alliance against him come to nought. We naturally expect that the sign volunteered by the prophet will have the same significance. Yet there are objections to this view. It may be argued that Ahaz's refusal to ask a sign introduced a new element into the situation, especially after the warning in 7<sup>9</sup>; and if he rejected a sign assuring him of deliverance, it would not be strange if he received one that was ominous of disaster. And such a sign, according to our present text, we seem to possess. For the prediction in v. 14, that Immanuel should eat curdled milk and honey, implies that Judah would have reverted from the agricultural to the pastoral state, in other words, would have suffered a devastation at the hands of an enemy. And this is confirmed by v. 17, wherein a terrible invasion bringing a disaster unprecedented since the days of Rehoboam is predicted. On the other hand, this is difficult to harmonise with v. 19, at any rate in its present form, for that gives as the meaning of the sign that before the child knows to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land whose two kings Ahab abhors will be forsaken. In other words, v. 16 interprets the sign as the desolation of Syria and Ephraim. It is therefore a sign, not of disaster to Judah, but of deliverance. We are accordingly confronted with the problem whether the original text is here preserved. It would suffice to bring v. 16 into harmony with v. 15.17 If the former were to read simply 'for before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good, thy land shall be forsaken'; and several scholars have adopted this expedient. In that case the sign is simply one of disaster for Judah. Nevertheless there are serious difficulties in the way of accepting this solution, and the question is forced upon us whether more radical measures are not necessary. Even with the suggested abbreviation of v. 16 it does not connect so well with v. 15 as with v. 14. But apart from that, there are other arguments for treating the sign as favourable. The name Immanuel itself, expressing the conviction that God was with His people, might, of course, be harmonized with either verse. It gains significance only on account of the distress in which the name was given, the mother's faith is a sign only when experience seems to contradict it. The name might therefore be given in the midst of the trouble caused by the Syrian invasion or in the greater distress that was to follow from Assyria. But Isaiah certainly anticipated the overthrow of Syria and Ephraim. Not only so, but a little later, in the public exhibition on a tablet of the word Maher-shalah-hash-baz, and nearly a year later in the giving of this name to his newborn son, he expressed his faith in the overthrow of the coalition. It is indeed urged that the sign of Immanuel would thus be only a duplication of the sign of Maher-shalah-hash-baz, but there seems to be no reason why such a duplication should be objectionable. Moreover, there is a significant parallelism between the two which points to such an identification of meaning. The time limit in both cases is very similar. In the one case it is before the child shall know to say 'my father and my mother'; in other words, the events described are to happen before the infant who has just been born has learnt to utter the first things that a child says. The other time limit is precisely similar: 'before the child knows to refuse the evil and choose the good.' By this the prophet need not mean before he comes to years of moral discernment, but before he learns to distinguish between good and harmful food. And the very fact that a year later Isaiah was still concerned with the invasion of the allies and in asserting his conviction of their overthrow, surely makes it probable that the same question preoccupies his attention here. Nor is there any reason to suppose that the obscurity of Ahab would make any difference to the character of the sign. Unless we are explicitly warned to the contrary, it is natural to assume that the sign given possessed the same significance as the sign offered. The present writer accordingly takes the view that the sign is of a favourable character. This involves, it is true, the elimination of v. 14 (and perhaps of v. 15, though this may belong to another prophecy), but in any case something has to be struck out of the passage to secure consistency. It might, of course, seem easier to eliminate a few words in v. 16 than to strike out a whole verse. Nevertheless, when we look at v. 15 we see that it is practically compounded of part of v. 15 and part of v. 16, whereas the words 'whose two kings thou abhorrest' make a much greater impression of originality.

The question accordingly arises, in what precisely did the sign consist? The stress may lie either on the  $\text{מָלְכֵי}$ , or the son, or the name given to him, or a combination of these. The traditional interpretation has, of course, thrown the stress on the first of these; for it the sign lay in the virgin-conception. But when the true sense of  $\text{מָלְכֵי}$  is understood, this interpretation becomes impossible. If she were one of the king's wives, then the child would be the king's son, and the possibility of an identification with the Messiah would have to be considered. It would be possible to accept, with McCurdy, the identification of Immanuel with Hezekiah, the chronological difficulties not being altogether insuperable. A third possible alternative would be to accept the view taken by several scholars, most recently by Whitehouse in the Century Bible, and identify the  $\text{מָלְכֵי}$  with the community in Zion. We have no evidence, however, that this term was used at that time for the Jewish community, and the identification with one of the king's wives must also be pronounced improbable, in spite of the fact that the trouble was dynastic even more than national, directed against the Davidic house rather than against Judah as a whole. Nor is there any reason for identifying Immanuel with the Messianic king mentioned in 9:7 and 11:3. It is true that, according to the present text of 8<sup>b</sup>, the land of Judah is represented as Immanuel's land, but it is probable that the text should be corrected in harmony with 8:10.\* We may then set aside the \* Probably instead of 'thy land, O Immanuel,' we should read 'the land, for God is with us,' thus getting a refrain at the end of v. 8 to match that at the end of v. 10. In that case the figure of the bird with wings spread over the land is a symbol of God's protecting care of Judah, shielding her from the combination of all earthly foes. The extreme abruptness of the transition from threat to promise makes it highly probable that 8<sup>b</sup>:10 is a fragment not connected with the preceding verses. It must even be granted that MarD may be right in regarding it as a later addition; for although the prophecy may be explained as Isaiah's, on the supposition that he is addressing the forces of Assyria as composed of various nationalities, yet taken by itself the reference to the coalition of the bar nations against Judah recurs as a standing feature of the later apocalyptic.

Messianic identification. With the correction of 8<sup>b</sup> no reason remains for considering that the personality of Immanuel is an important element in the sign; it is in harmony with similar cases that it is the name and not the person who bears it that is important. This is true, for example, of Hosea's children, and what is still more to the point, of Isaiah's children. The pro-baz lies not in the children themselves, but exclusively in their names. We expect the same to be true in this case. Just as would be overthrown, so the name Immanuel expresses the mother's conviction that God is with His people. The sign is impressive faith, which confronted danger without dismay, and his obstinate refusal to accept a sign there arises the mother's conviction of God's presence with His people in the name she gave her son. The personality of the mother is equally with that of the son of no importance for the sign; that consists in the mother's faith and the son's name. Accordingly it is better to translate 'a young woman' instead of 'the young woman.' Isaiah, however, does not mean precisely that any young woman, who is shortly about to conceive and give birth to a son, may call his name Immanuel. While he has no definite young woman in his mind, he predicts that some young woman will, in the future, conceive and bear a son, to whom she will give the name Immanuel. His language is not that of hypothesis but of prediction.

2. The way is now clear to discuss St. Matthew's use of the passage. This is not the place to examine the subject either of the Virgin-conception of Christ or of the early Christian interpretation of prophecy. It is quite plain that this interpretation was in general very little controlled by the original sense of the OT passage quoted. It was of a largely polemical character, since it was necessary, against the cavilling of the Jews, to prove the Messiahship of Jesus from the OT. Accordingly the Hebrew Scriptures were ransacked to find parallels with the life of Christ; and it is not unlikely that, at a quite early period, collections of these passages were drawn up for controversial use. The First Gospel is peculiarly rich in Messianic proof-texts, and it is therefore not surprising that for two facts so important to the author as the Virgin-conception and the Incarnation the writer should address an OT prophecy. But the fact that he has done so creates a very interesting problem, which, however, will be approached differently by those who accept the Virgin-conception as a fact and by those who dispute it. For the former, the fact itself is the starting-point, and the author had to find in the OT a text appropriate to it. The only question that would really arise would be as to the part played by the LXX in suggesting Is 7:14. In this passage the LXX renders  $\text{מָלְכֵי}$  by  $\text{παρθένος}$ , which suggests virginity much more strongly than the Hebrew word. At the same time, the fact that the LXX so translated shows that the author of the First Gospel may independently have taken the word in the same sense. That he did so is rendered not improbable by the fact that his translation differs in some points from that of the LXX.† The significance for the doctrine of the Incarnation of the name Immanuel, which might be translated 'God with us' as well as 'God is with us,' probably first drew his attention to the passage, and then the translation of  $\text{מָלְכֵי}$  by  $\text{παρθένος}$  would

* The connexion of v. 16 with v. 14 is as follows. A young woman will bear a son and call his name Immanuel. This will be a sign, for it will express a faith which triumphs over the appearance of imminent disaster. And it is truly God-inspired faith, for it will be splendidly vindicated. See the child thus born in days of darkness knows how to distinguish between hurtful and proper food, the hostile power will be crushed, and thus God's presence with His people will be clearly manifested. Immanuel will be a standing rebuke to the king's scepticism.

† The LXX of Is 7:14 reads in B:  $\text{δὴν τῶντι θένου, Κίςμος αὐτῶν ἔβην σφαίαν, ἰδοὺ ἡ παρθένος ἐν γαστρὶ ἕλεσεται καὶ γίγεται υἱόν, καὶ καλεῖται τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ Ἐμμανουὴλ. For ἕλεσεται, however, MAQ read ἔβη, which is the same rendering as that in Matthew. For καλεῖται we have in M καλεῖται; neither B nor M here coincide with Matthew. The text in Mt 1:23 reads  $\text{ἰδοὺ ἡ παρθένος ἐν γαστρὶ ἔβη καὶ γίγεται υἱόν, καὶ καλεῖται τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ Ἐμμανουὴλ.}$$ readily be suggested by his belief in the Virgin-conception.

Among those, however, who regard the belief in the Virgin-birth as a piece of primitive Christian mythology, there has been a controversy as to what led the author to quote this passage, and the relation between that belief and the passage in Isaiah. Many think that the former was created by the latter,* and probably in the form given to it by the LXX translation. The Hebrew, it is thought, would not naturally have lent itself to this purpose apart from the definite use of παρθένος in the LXX. Several recent scholars, on the other hand, consider that the use of παρθένος is quite insufficient to account for St. Matthew's quotation. They consider that even before the birth of Jesus there had been formed a doctrine of the Messiah, which included among other things His supernatural birth. This was ultimately derived from the pagan stories of children of the gods, but was not taken over directly from paganism by Jewish Christianity. It had arisen on the soil of Judaism itself, and it is in the Judæo-pagan syncretism, with its doctrine that the Messiah must be born of a virgin, that the origin of the belief is to be sought.

What was said of Christ was subsequently transferred to Jesus, when Jesus and the Christ were identified. A quotation from Gunkel will make this position clear. After saying that the mythological representations did not make their first appearance in the later Gentile Christianity, he proceeds: 'But this would have been impossible if Judaism itself had not previously possessed this or similar representations. The birth of Christ from the Virgin through the Divine Spirit had, we may assume, already belonged to the Christological dogma before Jesus, just as His birth in Bethlehem and from David's race, and has been transferred to Jesus only at a later time. What we have to learn then, and what will subsequently be shown again, is that this Judaism which found its way into primitive Christianity must have been strongly inclined to syncretism' (Zum religionsgeschichtlichen Verständnis des NT, p. 69). Similarly, Cheyne, in his Bible Problems, considers that the historical explanation of the statement of the Virgin-birth is that it arose 'in the story of non-Jewish origin current in Jewish circles and borrowed from them by certain Jewish Christians.' He interprets 'virgin' in a peculiar sense. In its original meaning 'it expresses the fact that the great mythic mother-goddess was independent of the marriage tie' (p. 75). For him the passage in Mt. 'is a Jewish-Christian transformation of a primitive story, derived ultimately, in all probability, from Babylonian, and analogous to the Jewish trans-

* Cf. Harnack: 'Even the belief that Jesus was born of a virgin sprang from Is 74. . . . The conjecture of Usener, that the idea of the birth from a virgin is a heathen myth which was received by the Christians, contradicts the entire earliest development of Christian tradition, which is free from heathen myths, so far as these had not already been received by wide circles of Jews (above all, certain Babylonian and Persian myths), which in the case of that idea is not demonstrable. Besides, it is in point of method not permissible to stray so far when we have near at hand such a complete explanation as Is 74' (History of Dogma, i, p. 100, n. 1). Harnack, it is true, does not assert that it was the LXX rendering which created the belief, though it may be presumed that this is his view. He is not divided in principle from Gunkel and Cheyne, since he admits that heathen myths had come into Christianity through Judaism, but he considers that the Virgin-birth does not as a matter of fact belong to these, and that an extra-Jewish source should not be sought when a Jewish source is at hand. Lobstein characterizes the method applied to the documents of the Bible by Usener as 'supremely defective,' and, after admitting the 'remarkable likeness to our Gospel tradition' in the pagan parallels he has accumulated, says: 'Yet the conclusions which he draws from them go singularly beyond his premises: the Jewish and Christian factors suffice to explain the genesis of the myth of the Nativity' (The Virgin Birth of Christ, pp. 128, 129, cf. pp. 74, 75). He thinks the LXX translation responsible for 'the religious construction adopted by the Evangelist' (pp. 74, 75).

formation of the Babylonian cosmogony in the opening section of Genesis' (p. 93). On the other hand, a good many scholars take the view that the story was created, not simply out of pagan materials, but on pagan soil and among Gentile Christians. This is the view of Usener, Schmiedel, Soltan, Pfeiderer, and others (see references below). It does not fall within the scope of this article to discuss this question further, since it is concerned simply with the bearing of the LXX translation of παρθένος by παρθένος on the development of the belief in the Virgin-conception of Christ. To rebut the Christian use of Is 74 as a prediction of the supernatural birth of Christ, later Jewish translators substituted ve'avis for παρθένος. See VIRGIN BIRTH.

A. S. PEAKE.

IMMORTALITY.—In the ordinary acceptance of the term 'immortality' connotes 'endlessness.' It has ceased to express merely or solely a denial of physical death, in its incidence or its consequences, and has been extended to include the possibility or actuality of death, considered as putting an end to conscious existence either now or in the limitless future. Whether these two alternatives really mean the same thing, whether to be capable of dying is always and ultimately to die, and so that only is immortal which by its very nature and constitution is not liable to death, while all else perishes,—as is probably the case,—is a question that hardly comes within the scope of the present article. It will, however, be just, and will conduce to clearness, to separate these two considerations; to seek to determine, in the first instance, the teaching of Christ with regard to immortality in the limited sense of a denial of cessation of existence at death; and, secondly, to review the much wider and more perplexed question of the permanence of this 'immortal' state. 'Does death end all?', according to the mind and teaching of the Founder of Christianity, is an inquiry that needs to be twice raised,—once as it concerns the terminus of the present life upon earth, and again as it refers or may refer to a future to which human thought can set no limit. It is obvious that the first question is comparatively simple and uninvolved; and that upon its answer in the affirmative depends the possibility of opening the second, which is highly complicated, and involves the most far-reaching and important problems that can present themselves for human consideration.

By some writers the terms used in the NT, and especially by Christ Himself, with reference to a life after death have been further understood to imply * Cf. also the important remarks on pp. 193-195. He thinks the translation παρθένος is so far from accounting for the belief in the Virgin-birth that it needs to be explained itself. 'In Is 74 the translator must have had some special motive, and that motive must have been not philological, but, if I may say so, ideologist.' 'As for the quotation in Mt 19<sup>11</sup> it is perfectly well accounted for as one of the subsidiary Biblical proofs which were habitually sought for by the evangelists. The real supports of their statements were traditions of one kind or another, but their belief in the written word of prophecy led them to look for a justification of these traditions in the prophetic scriptures, and with this amount of justice, that sometimes the traditions and the prophecies had a common origin.' The same view is taken by the scholars who regard the doctrine as purely pagan in origin. See, e.g., Pfeiderer, Das Urochristentum, i, pp. 551, 604, where he affirms that Mt's use of Is 74 was possible only for one who had already quite other grounds for ascribing that origin to Jesus.

blesedness. Life immortal would thus be not only life in the ordinary acceptance of conscious existence, but it would be life plus felicity. It is perhaps hardly right or wise to saddle the doctrine with this additional connotation. It will, however, be necessary to examine how far the words of Christ suggest or imply that He regarded happiness as an essential and inseparable part of the life to come, or a future existence of misery more or less prolonged as inconceivable unless it were terminated by restoration to bliss or annihilation of consciousness.

There is, however, a further preliminary consideration which must be taken into account. An examination of the whole teaching of Christ upon so momentous a theme, as it is transmitted by the Evangelists, may be expected to yield results not only positive but negative. Positive, inasmuch as upon a subject that concerns the deepest interests of men no great religious teacher can do other than afford some guidance to those who seek knowledge and truth at his lips; and negative, since the revelation which he may venture or see fit to make of his own thoughts will obviously be determined and limited by the character and capacity of his contemporaries. In a sense neither derogatory nor contemptuous towards his hearers, he will refuse to cast his pearls before swine. Environment naturally and inevitably plays a large part in moulding the form into which doctrine shall be cast, and in assigning the bounds beyond which it shall not move. Teaching appropriate and welcome to the keen-witted and philosophic circles of Athens will fall on dull and inappreciative ears by the waterside or in the fields of Galilee. And of the confessedly greatest Teacher that the world has ever known this may be expected to be pre-eminently true; He will make His sayings accord both as to form and substance with the receptive ability of those to whom they are delivered. There will be many things within the compass of His own knowledge which they cannot now bear (Jn 16<sup>7</sup>). And though He will at times give utterance to sayings hard to be understood (8<sup>26, 49</sup>), of a depth and significance beyond their comprehension, foreshadowing truths into the full understanding of which only after-generations will be able to grow, the major part of His instruction will not be concerned with these; else would that instruction be barren and profitless to the hearers, no fruitful seed germinating to new spiritual and intellectual life. Moreover, it is precisely these sayings, dealing with the higher, more abstract and supra-sensible side of things, that would be most likely to be lost upon ordinary disciples, to fail to find a place in their memory, and in their subsequent reproductions, whether written or oral, of the Master's teaching. Only by the choicer natures, the more refined and contemplative spirits among His followers, such as we conceive the Apostle John to have been, would this aspect of His discourse and doctrine be caught up and treasured, to be afterwards faithfully delivered as words φωσῶντα σκευασμένων, although for the moment they may have soared far above the care or comprehension of those who first heard them with their outward ears.

Upon a priori grounds, therefore, bearing in mind the character of the people among whom Christ lived and with whom He had to deal, we should expect to find the speculative and philosophic side of doctrine but slightly represented, while stress is laid more upon ethics and the practical conduct of life. The supernatural will be stated, as it were, in terms of the natural, the heavenly of the earthly, and with a constant recognition of the actual needs and circumstances and possibilities of His hearers. Whether and how far this is so in fact only an examination of the texts can show. Such an examination of the more or less direct references in the Gospels to a future life will be most conveniently conducted under the three divisions suggested, viz.—(1) a renewed life after death, (2) the permanence of this life, (3) its comprehensiveness, whether it is to be conceived as embracing the entire race of mankind or limited to a part thereof. It will be necessary to take separately the evidence of the Synoptic Gospels and of St. John.

A. The Synoptists.—(1) With regard to the first point little need be said, for indeed there is nothing in dispute. That the teaching of Christ assumes from first to last a conscious life beyond the grave for Himself and His hearers lies upon the surface of His words and permeates His entire rule of life. The whole tone of His speech, the implications of His parables, the sanctions with which He surrounds His encouragements and warnings, the comparative value which He teaches men to set upon heavenly and earthly things, the gravity and seriousness of His outlook into the future, all show that here at least to Him and to His hearers there was common ground; that He did not need to begin by proving to them that death was not the end of all, but that the universal postulate of religious thought of His day anticipated a renewal of personal and conscious existence after death. In this respect He was but adopting, assuming, and making the basis of impressive exhortation and warning what the majority at least of His contemporaries believed.

The repeated references to the coming of the Kingdom of God or of the heavens (Mt 3<sup>2</sup>, 4<sup>17</sup>, 10<sup>12</sup>, Mk 1<sup>15</sup>, Lk 9<sup>2</sup>, 10<sup>9</sup> al.), into which not everyone who professes loyalty will enter (Mt 7<sup>21</sup>); to the Day of Judgment or 'that day' (Mt 10<sup>15</sup>, 11<sup>22, 24</sup>, Lk 10<sup>14</sup>, Mt 7<sup>22</sup> al.); to His own Resurrection (Mt 17<sup>22</sup>, 26<sup>32</sup>, Mk 9<sup>9</sup>, 10<sup>34</sup>, Lk 18<sup>32</sup> al.) and the Coming of the Son of Man (Mt 10<sup>23</sup>, 16<sup>27</sup>, Mk 13<sup>26</sup>, 14<sup>62</sup> al.), when those who have confessed or denied Him upon earth will reap as they have sown, in a public confession or denial of them before His Father and the holy angels (Mt 10<sup>32</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup>, 12<sup>8</sup>),—all presuppose and rest upon the foundation of a belief in another life after this. The disciples are to lay up treasure in heaven (Mt 6<sup>20</sup>, Lk 12<sup>33</sup>), the enjoyment of which is clearly not designed for the present. 'In the regeneration' these disciples shall sit upon thrones in the capacity of judges (Mt 19<sup>28</sup>, Lk 22<sup>30</sup>). Even His enemies, who hound Him to death, shall 'see' the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power (Mt 26<sup>64</sup>, Mk 14<sup>62</sup>; cf. Mt 24<sup>30</sup>, Mk 13<sup>26</sup>, Lk 21<sup>27</sup>). The robber, after death, shall be with Christ in Paradise (Lk 23<sup>43</sup>). More than one parable bears emphatic witness to the same belief, for example that of the King and the Wedding Feast (Mt 22<sup>1-14</sup>), of the Talents (25<sup>14-30</sup>), of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>). These and other expressions which might be cited, figurative as some of them undoubtedly are, sufficiently emphasize the form and substance of a teaching which is not limited to the present, but always and consistently presupposes a life of active consciousness beyond the grave.

It is doubtful whether even the reputed scepticism of the Sadducees (Mt 22<sup>23-33</sup>, Mk 12<sup>18-27</sup>, Lk 20<sup>27-40</sup>) is any real exception to this. The scope and articles of the creed that they professed remain very uncertain. And their famous apologue is perhaps rather directed against the conception of a joint and common resurrection at one time and place, at which the relationships of this life would be resumed, than implies disbelief in any sequel after death to the life lived upon earth. The incident gives occasion at least to a most emphatic assertion on the part of Christ of the reality of the life that succeeds the present, and an equally emphatic repudiation of the idea that those who have died have ceased to be—'God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto him.'

(2) The question of the duration of this new life, the permanence or impermanence of the state after death, presents greater difficulties. Once again it may be said in anticipation that the probabilities of the case are strongly in favour of the former hypothesis. A teacher of the elevation and spirituality of Christ would hardly be likely to suggest to His hearers as a reward for following Him a prolonged existence indeed, but one which closed in the thick darkness of oblivion; and if He wished to convey the thought that in this respect a sharp distinction prevailed between those who loved and obeyed Him and those who did not,—the former are to be immortal, the latter entirely cease to be.—He would do so very clearly and emphatically, as presenting a further powerful and almost overwhelming incentive to hearken to His words. Moreover, it is to be noted also that the conception of 'endlessness' in the abstract is not one easily formulated or grasped, and that a doctrine of this character, assuming it to be present in His teaching, may very well prove to have been set forth in the simplest terms, rather by way of suggestion and illustration that would appeal to His hearers, than in the rigorous language of a scheme of metaphysics. The more important terms that bear upon this point are collected and will be conveniently examined together at a later stage. A few expressions only from the Synoptic Gospels call here for notice.

One of the most important passages, rather, perhaps, on the ground of what it implies than of what it directly states, is the declaration recorded in St. Matthew's Gospel (10<sup>39</sup>) of the permanence and inviolability of Christ's Church, founded and built up as it is upon Himself.* The Speaker can hardly be conceived as thinking of a mere temporary duration of that Church, united as it is with Him in the closest of all bonds; the destruction or annihilation of the one would involve a like fate for the other; the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it; now or henceforth. And if the Church is to remain, then necessarily its members collectively; for the Church is the members.

It may be said also that the abiding nature of Christ's words (Mt 24<sup>35</sup>, Mk 13<sup>31</sup>, Lk 21<sup>32</sup>), under the circumstances of their utterance, presupposes the continued existence of intelligent receptive hearers and doers. The permanence of His words is contrasted with that which in the universe appears most permanent and unchanged, 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away' (Mk 13<sup>31</sup>, cf. Mt 5<sup>34</sup>, Lk 16<sup>17</sup>); in no part or degree shall their accomplishment fail to be achieved. But this complete fulfilment does not imply the cessation of their effect upon and in those for whom they are spoken. Rather is it the beginning of a new life, which is only then perfected.

The literal demands of these passages would be satisfied by what has sometimes been termed 'racial' or 'collective' immortality; in which the race might be supposed to persist, while the individuals, each and all in turn, perished. Such an interpretation could not be ruled out of court on the ground that it is not suggested elsewhere in Christ's teaching. But a conception so remote and unusual would seem to require much more clear and definite exposition, and is hardly consistent with the numerous references to a personal and individual survival.

The indications which the Synoptic Gospels afford on the subject of the comparative duration of the existence of the righteous and the wicked after death are almost wholly concerned with the significance of words like αἰώνιος (αἰῶνας αἰ. Mt 25<sup>46</sup>, πῦρ αἰώνιον 18<sup>8</sup> 25<sup>41</sup>, αἰώνιος ἀνάπηγμα Mk 3<sup>29</sup>, εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα ἰδ.), and will be more conveniently examined together (see below). Here it need only be said that parables such as those of the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Wise and Foolish Virgins, or the Wedding Feast, do not in themselves suggest or demand any inequality of treatment as regards the mere duration of the allotted punishment or reward; and that references to the Judgment, the Day of Judgment, or the Last Day are equally neutral, as far as direct statement is concerned. While the burning of the tares in the parable of the Wheat and the Tares (Mt 13<sup>30</sup>), if the detail is to be pressed as anything more than the natural and appropriate setting of the story,—the legitimate and necessary end of weeds,—rather points in the direction of permanence and indestructibility. Burning is not annihilation of matter, but transformation of form. And this particular feature of the parable might admit of interpretation as implying renovation through suffering, but is hardly satisfied by any theory of absolute cessation of being. Similarly, it might be urged that the πῦρ ἀβύσσου of Mk 9<sup>48</sup> (cf. v. 48) implies the permanence of the fuel on which it feeds. It is clear, however, that no secure or decisive argument can be based on what are obviously allusive and metaphorical expressions.

B. St. John.—Within the Fourth Gospel, where, if anywhere in the record of our Lord's teaching, we might expect to find a reasoned and philosophical doctrine of a future life, that teaching is so entirely, or almost entirely, conveyed in connexion with a special phraseology, the leading terms of which are ζωὴ, ζωὴ αἰώνιος, and εἰς τ. αἰῶνα, that little need be said by way of anticipation of the special investigation of these terms. It is worth noting, however, at once, in view of the interpretation of these expressions which will be urged below, that every reference in St. John to a definite termination or close of a world-period is, as we saw was the case in the Synoptists, such as to presuppose and assume a continuation beyond. The conception of an absolute end, beyond which there is nothing, is as foreign to the thought of this Gospel as to that of the others. There is a 'last day' (ἡ ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα, 6<sup>39</sup>, 11<sup>24</sup> 12<sup>34</sup>), a phrase not found in the Synoptists; but it terminates one age only to usher in another more glorious. Judgment (κρίσις) again in St. John does not ordinarily await the setting up of a future tribunal; it is immediate conviction, wrought by the presence of the light. And in the one passage where it is definitely relegated to the future (5<sup>29</sup>) the parallelism of the phraseology (ἀνάστασις κτίσεως—ἀνάστασις ζωῆς) shows that whatever threatening of suffering or retribution may lie behind the word, there is no thought of extinction, or of a final end, in the mind of the Speaker,—they that have practised ill (RVm) come to the resurrection equally with those that have done good. He cannot be conceived to mean that they are raised merely that forthwith, or after a longer or shorter period, they may be destroyed.

It is in St. John also that the most emphatic assertions are found — apart from the special phraseology to which reference has been made — of the abiding blessedness and freedom from ill of those who believe in Christ. 'He that believeth in me οὐ μὴ ἀποθάνῃ' (11<sup>26</sup>); he that drinks of the Christ-given water 'οὐ μὴ διψήσῃ' (4<sup>14</sup>); 'he that cometh unto me οὐ μὴ πεινάσῃ, and he that believeth on me οὐ μὴ διψήσῃ πῶποτε' (6<sup>27</sup>). The 'many mansions' and the prepared place of 14<sup>2</sup> are clearly intended to convey the assurance of more than merely temporary resting-places. Finally, the prayer that all His followers may be one, as He is one with the Father (17<sup>21-22</sup>), and may be with Him where He is (v. 24), implies for those who are thus united a coequal duration of existence with Himself.

For the believer, therefore, the future, thus conditioned and defined, is a life of blessedness. But there is nothing to suggest, much less to show, that the continuance of the life is dependent upon its felicity; or that these two features are other than completely independent, no necessary connexion subsisting between them which would make an eternal but unblest life a contradiction in terms. αἰών, αἰώνας, εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα or τοὺς αἰῶνας. — The primary significance of the term αἰών is not seriously in question. 'Age' or 'period' suggests a limited stretch of time marked by a definite close. In this sense the word is found in the Gospels, with reference to the present era under which the speaker is living, either simply or as ethnically characterized by degeneracy and corruption. The καρὰ τοῦ αἰῶνος choke the word (Mt 13<sup>22</sup> || Mk 4<sup>19</sup>); the sons of this αἰών are wiser than the sons of light (Lk 16<sup>9</sup>); ὄψρος ὁ αἰῶν is contrasted with the αἰών that is to follow it as ὁ μέλλων (Mt 12<sup>32</sup>), or έκείνος (Lk 20<sup>34</sup>); and the latter appears again as ὁ ἔρχόμενος αἰών in Mk 10<sup>28</sup> || Lk 18<sup>30</sup>, where the present is ὄψρος ὁ καιρὸς. It is worthy of notice that in one of the above passages (Lk 20<sup>35</sup>) the future αἰών is something to be gained (τιχθεῖν); its nature or characteristic, therefore, was more prominent to the writer's mind than any mere question of duration.

In one context, the parable of the Tares in St. Matthew, the end of the present age is definitely indicated (ἡ συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος, Mt 13<sup>40, 49</sup>), and the same phrase is twice employed later in the Gospel, once by the disciples with reference to the Parousia, which they assume to be synchronous with the end of the αἰών (24<sup>7</sup>), and again by Christ Himself, when He asserts His presence with His disciples ἕως τῆς συντέλειας τοῦ αἰῶνος (28<sup>20</sup>).

In the last two passages especially it is clear that in no shape or form is there attached by the Speaker or His hearers to the phrase 'end of the age' the thought of a termination of personality or conscious life. The close of the one epoch marks the opening of another, into which pass without interruption the actors and participators in the present. The pledge given to the disciples of personal association with Himself, or rather of His personal association with them—an association which is already subsisting (ἐγὼ μετ' ὑμῶν εἰμὶ, Mt 28<sup>20</sup>), could hardly have been couched in more emphatic or significant terms, or in words less suggestive of a possible severance, however clearly they may admit or even require the thought of a change of the conditions under which it is maintained.

αἰών is also twice used in the Gospels with reference to the past, ἀπ' αἰῶνος Lk 1<sup>20</sup>, ἐκ τοῦ αἰῶνος Jn 9<sup>9</sup>. In neither case are the words those of Christ Himself. And all, perhaps, that need be said is that the speakers, Zacharias and the man born blind respectively, employ the phrase to denote in an indefinite kind of way the whole antecedent period of human history during which the conditions of life upon the earth have been such as they now know them to be, or believe them to have been in former times.

Elsewhere in the Gospels, the word under consideration is found only in the phrase εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, or εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας. The latter occurs in Lk 1<sup>38</sup> and in the inserted doxology of Mt 6<sup>13</sup> (retained in the margin of the Revised Version). It may fairly be regarded as merely a strengthened form of the other, intermediate between that and the yet more emphatic expression εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰῶνων employed especially in the Apocalypse, and by St. Paul in doxologies. Εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα occurs once in St. Matthew and St. Luke (Mt 21<sup>19</sup>, Lk 1<sup>9</sup>), twice in St. Mark (3<sup>38</sup> 11<sup>14</sup>), and twelve times in St. John (4<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>21-22</sup> 8<sup>51-52</sup> 10<sup>28</sup> 11<sup>26</sup> 12<sup>34</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>19</sup>), constituting indeed this Evangelist's sole use of the word αἰών, with the exception of the phrase above noted (9<sup>2</sup>). Setting aside Mt 21<sup>19</sup> || Mk 11<sup>14</sup>, which condemns the fig-tree to perpetual barrenness, and where μητέρα εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα is a strong negation of any possible or prospective fruitfulness at any time; and the passages from St. Luke, of which the first is Messianic and expressive of the endlessness of the Messiah's kingdom, and the second has reference to the Divine attitude or action towards men, which also can hardly be thought of as subject to termination or change; the remainder may be classified as positive or negative. In the former, the phrase εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα qualifies some verb expressive of continuance or life (ζῆν, Jn 6<sup>21-22</sup> 8<sup>51-52</sup> 12<sup>34</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>19</sup>); in the latter it is joined with a more or less emphatic negative, and denies the possibility of the contingency to which the passage refers (ὄψρ Mk 3<sup>29</sup>, Jn 8<sup>52</sup>; οὐ μὴ Jn 4<sup>24</sup> 8<sup>51-52</sup> 10<sup>28</sup> 11<sup>26</sup> 13<sup>3</sup>).

Of all these passages it may be said at once that the Speaker clearly has in mind a state of things of which no reversal is by Him conceived as possible, either now or at any future time. In presence of natural death, the solemn declaration that he who believes οὐ μὴ ἀποθάνῃ εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (Jn 11<sup>26</sup>) does not merely defer the date, but repudiates the possibility of anything that deserves to be called death for the believer. The bond-servant, again, whose sojourn in the house of his master comes to an end, is expressly contrasted with the son who μένει εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (Jn 8<sup>52</sup>); and the same expression is used of the Christ (12<sup>34</sup>), with the same associated ideas of permanence and perpetuity. Peter rejects his Master's offer of service in washing his feet (13<sup>9</sup>)—a rejection which he immediately after gladly retracts—not certainly with the idea that he may accept the offer on some or any future occasion, but sincerely, and as far as his present thought is concerned, finally. And life εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (6<sup>21-22</sup>) is not limited, terminable life, merely lengthened out as compared with the present, but is a life that needs no artificial and bodily sustenance to enable it uninterruptedly to endure. The connotation of the phrase, whether on the lips of Christ Himself or employed by another, evidently implies an outlook into a future to which the thought of the writer or speaker neither assigns nor conceives it possible to assign a limit.

The same considerations will apply to the adjective αἰώνιος, and especially as it is used to qualify ζωή in a phrase which becomes a distinctive feature of St. John's Gospel and First Epistle. For the word itself the somewhat question-begging rendering 'age-long' has been offered. In such a rendering it is evident that all depends on the conception the writers had formed of the 'age,' and the associations it bore to their minds. If they thought of it as definitely terminated or terminable, then 'age-long' is equivalent to 'temporary.' If they regarded it and wrote of it without any associated idea of a limit or end, or if the context clearly intimates that no such idea would have been admitted, then so far 'age-long' is synonymous with 'immortal,' 'everlasting,' or 'eternal.' And it appears undesirable to introduce a new and ambiguous term. Apart, however, from the phrase ζωη αιωνιος, the adjective is of rare occurrence in the Synoptic Gospels, and is not used by St. John. It is found three times in St. Matthew in association with terms expressive of suffering or retribution to be endured in the future (το πικρον το αιωνιον, 18<sup>9</sup> 25<sup>41</sup>; κολασις αιωνιος, 28<sup>36</sup>). St. Luke has a reference (16<sup>9</sup>) to τας αιωνιους σκεπας, 'the eternal tabernacles,' open to those who have been far-sighted enough to secure to themselves friends while it was in their power, from whom in their own day of need they may claim favours and return in kind. And a significant and unique phrase in Mk 3<sup>29</sup> δε ο αν βλασφημησθ . . . ενοχος εστιν αιωνιον αμαρτηματος, suggests far-reaching conclusions, with regard to which all that perhaps need be said in this place is that it stands here as an explanatory addition to an emphatic affirmation that blasphemy against the Holy Spirit hath not forgiveness εις τον αιωνα. The context, therefore, precludes an interpretation in a sense contrary to the implications of the preceding words, as though the writer might be thinking of an act of sin committed once for all, and then with all that it entailed definitely and finally set aside.

The reading αμαρτηματος is sufficiently decisively attested by the witness of BBLA 28.33, the Latin and other versions, and is adopted by all editors. It is supported also by the Sinaitic Syriac, mutilated, however, in this verse, if the transcript (3894) may be trusted. The TR εφισσε is found in K<sup>2</sup> T and the cursives, with one or two Latin manuscripts, and the Peshitta Syriac. The various reading αμαρτημα, C<sup>2</sup> D 13. 62. 346, would seem to be a correction of αμαρτηματος designed to introduce into the text the meaning of 'sinfulness' as distinguished from 'a sin.' Cf. H. B. Swete, in loc., a not wholly satisfactory note. The true exposition seems to be given by E. F. Gould in his commentary: "An eternal sin may be one subjecting the person to an eternal punishment, eternal in its consequences, that is. But certainly it is equally allowable to suppose that it describes the sin itself as eternal, accounting for the impossibility of the forgiveness by the permanence of the sin—eternus consequences attached to endless sin. This is the philosophy of endless punishment. Sin reacts on the nature, an act passes into a state, and the state continues. That is, eternal punishment is not a measure of God's resentment against a single sin. . . . It is the result of the effect of any sin, or course of sin, in fixing the sinful state beyond recovery."

With regard to the phrase ζωη αιωνιος, there is a striking difference in its associations in the few passages in which it is found in the Synoptists, and in the more frequent use of St. John; a difference which seems to reflect the varying attitude of the writers towards the teaching of Christ. In the Synoptists the sphere of ζωη αιωνιος is in the future. It is to be inherited (Mt 18<sup>30</sup>), and to be received in the coming αιων (Mk 10<sup>28</sup>; Lk 18<sup>30</sup>) in recompense for that which the disciples of Christ forego in this; which the ruler (δρακων, Lk 18<sup>18</sup>; Mt 19<sup>16</sup>; Mk 10<sup>17</sup>), or lawyer (νομικος, Lk 10<sup>28</sup>) conceives that he may inherit or attain (ερχω, Mt. l.c.) by virtue of good deeds in the present. In St. John, on the contrary, ζωη αιωνιος is a present possession. The believer has or may have it (Jn 3<sup>36</sup> 5<sup>24</sup> 6<sup>67</sup>, 3<sup>15</sup>, 15<sup>6</sup> 6<sup>68</sup>); and the bestowal of this gift is described as the express aim and purpose of the coming of the Son into the world and of His death, the fruit of the Father's love (3<sup>16</sup>) and will (6<sup>38</sup>), but conferred by the Son Himself (10<sup>28</sup> 17<sup>2</sup>). In one passage also where the same phrase is used, the closeness of the fellowship with Himself implied in the possession of ζωη αιωνιος is mystically described as an eating of His flesh and drinking of His blood, and is associated with the resurrection at the last day (6<sup>51</sup>). This last passage would by itself prove, what the others assume, that ζωη αιωνιος, though present, is not limited by the present. Elsewhere there is an approach to the Synoptic standpoint of a future life over against or following on that now lived, although sight seems never to be entirely lost of the conception of ζωη αιωνιος as subsisting already and now attainable. He that hateth his soul (ψυχη) in this world will keep it εις ζωην αιωνιον (12<sup>25</sup>); the meat (βρωσις), the gift of the Son of Man, abideth unto eternal life (6<sup>27</sup>). The same thought recurs in Christ's words to the woman of Samaria; there it is the water, His gift, which becomes a well of water springing up unto eternal life (4<sup>14</sup>). And, finally, in connection with the same incident, the harvest, the ripeness of which the disciples are bidden to recognize, is laid up unto a future which is undefined in time and place; the reaper gathereth together fruit εις ζωην αιωνιον, and shares with the sower in a common joy (4<sup>28</sup>).

Once also Christ appeals to the knowledge or belief of His hearers in the present reality of this eternal life; they think that they have it in the OT Scriptures, missing the spirit there, and the testimony of these Scriptures to Himself, and ascribing life to the letter (6<sup>45</sup>). A somewhat similar thought underlies the answer of Simon Peter to Christ's question whether he and the Twelve intend to follow the example of others, and be repelled by 'hard sayings'; 'Thou hast the words of eternal life' (6<sup>68</sup>),—words, that is to say, which in their spirit and teaching bring ζωην αιωνιον to the hearers. Finally, lest, as it were, any lingering possibility or suggestion should remain of a time-limit to be understood in the phrase, or of its being confined under a merely temporal category, it is twice expressly defined in terms which are ethical and spiritual, and transcend all limitations of time or change; the Divine ερωλη, committed by the Father to the Son and by Him transmitted to the world, is eternal life (12<sup>25</sup>); and in similar pregnant words (17<sup>2</sup>) ζωη αιωνιος is the learning to know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom He has sent.

All the passages in which this phrase is found in the Gospels have now been passed in review. An extension of the examination to the remaining books of the New Testament would not modify the conclusions reached, or throw fresh light upon its meaning. It is used twice by St. Luke in the Acts (13<sup>46</sup>, 47); by St. Paul in the Romans (2<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>21</sup> 6<sup>22</sup>), Galatians (6<sup>15</sup>), and Pastoral Epistles (1 Ti 1<sup>6</sup> 6<sup>12</sup>, Tit 1<sup>2</sup> 3<sup>7</sup>); by St. John himself in his First Epistle (1<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>25</sup> 3<sup>15</sup> 5<sup>11</sup>, 19, 20; the adjective not elsewhere), and by St. Jude (v. 21). These conclusions are entirely in harmony with the results obtained from a consideration of the term αιων, or of the adjective αιωνιος standing by itself. ζωη αιωνιος is in its significance independent of time-limits, and may be described indifferently as either present or future. When, moreover, the occasion offers to indicate its characteristics and meaning by definition, that definition is framed not on the lines of time and space, as here, there, or elsewhere, now or then, but is wholly ethical, supernatural, belonging to the realm of the mind and spirit, and lifting up ζωη αιωνιος beyond the touch of change or end, into the region of the changeless, the immortal.

At the risk, therefore, of repetition, it must again be pointed out that words and phrases which are crucial for any doctrine of immortality as taught by Christ in the Gospels, so far from implying or suggesting an absolute termination, whether nearer or more distant, to that future which the speakers or writers have in mind, seem to indicate that no such idea was ever present to them; and in some passages, which are neither isolated nor unimportant, a fair interpretation of the writer's thought in the light of the context appears to exclude the possibility of any such limit being found at any definite point or place in the 'age' towards which his gaze is directed.

ζωή, εἰσαχθεὶς εἰς τὴν ζωὴν, σώζεσθαι, σωτηρία. There remains a group of words and phrases to be referred to, which with more or less distinctness characterize the future, or contrast it with the conditions of the present. All of them, when used in their fullest sense, imply non-mortality, but they do not bear directly upon the question of the duration of existence after death, which, as we have seen, has come to be the chief element in the connotation of the term 'immortality.' The chief of these is ζωή with its derivatives, including the phrases of which it forms a part. ζωή in the Gospels is not mere physical life, but is an expression for the higher life, the life which is life indeed, life in its fullest, richest aspects. Such life was in the Word (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>); it is Christ's gift to His disciples (10<sup>28</sup>, cf. 6<sup>33</sup>); nay, He is Himself 'the life' (11<sup>25</sup> 14<sup>6</sup>). It is so good a possession that to 'enter into life' is worth the sacrifice of an eye or a limb (Mt 18<sup>8</sup> || Mk 9<sup>45</sup>). It begins after death (Jn 5<sup>24</sup>)—not in a temporal sense, but when θάνατος as a state ceases to be; and it is a 'resurrection of life' to which the well-doers will come forth from the tomb (v. 29). 'To have life in himself' is an attribute of the Father, and is His gift to the Son (v. 26); and this 'life' or 'eternal life' is repeatedly stated to be the present possession of the believer (Jn 3<sup>16</sup> 6<sup>37-40</sup>), the gift of Christ which some of them wilfully refuse (5<sup>40</sup>), and which the unbelieving will not see (3<sup>36</sup>), but which is emphatically declared to be the final end of His coming into the world (10<sup>10</sup>, cf. 20<sup>31</sup>). The words which He has spoken are ζωή (6<sup>33</sup>), and His commandment is ζωὴ αἰώνιος (12<sup>20</sup>). None of these passages suggests that the thought of a termination of the 'life' was present to the mind of the Speaker; some are hardly compatible with such a thought, and others absolutely forbid it (e.g. Jn 1<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>26</sup>). This ζωή, therefore, is fittingly represented as αἰώνιος.

A similar absence of limitation will be found to characterize expressions such as σώζεσθαι, σωτηρία, etc., which describe the future from the point of view of deliverance from the present, its calamities and its evils. These terms, however, are not in themselves suggestive of duration, except so far as their results are involved; and, as doctrinal terms, belong in the New Testament rather to the Epistles than to the Gospels. In the eschatological discourses, however, of the Synoptic Gospels, 'salvation' is described as a state to be attained by those who endure εἰς τέλος (Mt 10<sup>22</sup> 24<sup>13</sup> || Mk 13<sup>13</sup>); the saving of the life or soul (ψυχή, cf. Lk 6<sup>9</sup>) is strikingly said to be the result of willingness to lose it for Christ's sake (Mk 8<sup>36</sup> || Lk 9<sup>24</sup>, cf. εἰρήσεται αὐτήν, Mt 16<sup>29</sup>); and in St. John the salvation of the κόσμος is the purpose of the Divine mission of the Son (Jn 3<sup>17</sup>), the salvation of His hearers, the end of the words and teaching which He imparts (5<sup>24</sup>). Hence 'salvation' is contemplated as beyond an 'end'; τέλος is rather a crisis than a final close, the entrance into new conditions and a more gracious environment. Both thought and phraseology become meaningless if the subjects of the change are conceived as either annihilated or reduced to unconsciousness.

ἄγραφα. Of the 'unwritten' Sayings, few have interest or importance for the present subject. The most noteworthy and authentic is that which is embodied in St. Paul's argument of 1 Th 4<sup>13-17</sup>.

Whether all or any of this is intended to be a direct citation of Christ's words must remain uncertain. The teaching of the passage is, however, founded upon a λόγος Κυρίου. And though it has in view only 'the dead in Christ,' and their position of privilege and priority as compared with those alive at the time of the Lord's descent from heaven, it distinctly asserts of these that they will be 'for ever' (πάντοτε) with the Lord. The writer therefore contemplates for them an eternal co-existence with the Lord; and he claims that for this doctrine he has the authority of Christ Himself.

Of the Logia from Oxyrhynchus the mystical Saying, 'Except ye fast to the world, ye shall in no wise find the kingdom of God; and except ye keep the Sabbath, ye shall not see the Father' (Log. 2; Grenfell and Hunt, p. 10), may be said to imply that those who do so fast and truly keep the Sabbath will see the Father, and therefore live with Him. Of the later Logia also, which were discovered in 1908 (Oxyrhynchus Papyri, iv, p. 1 ff.), the Introduction of the new conditions which they introduce. In some instances, indeed, the writer's statement might be regarded as colourless in this respect, and the thought and context of his words would not be directly contradicted by an assumption that these conditions were themselves temporary, and at some indefinite period superseded by others. Elsewhere the tone and context strongly support, if they do not compel, the view that the state of things contemplated was contemplated, as far as the forecast of the speaker was concerned, as permanent. In a third and most important series of passages, the same expressions and phrases are directly applied to the Divine Being and to His Kingdom in such a manner as to show that no thought of a cessation or close could by any possibility have entered into the mind of the Speaker, or have been regarded by Him as conceivable.

Moreover, the change of circumstances thus introduced involves no interference with the conscious life, not, at least, to the extent of reducing it to unconsciousness. The subjects of the change are represented as speaking, feeling, and willing, with all their faculties under control and in action. Nor is there any suggestion that this condition is occasional or temporary; it is, on the other hand, tacitly assumed to be usual and a matter of course. Further, also, most prominent and characteristic examples of this manner of regarding the future were found to be associated with the terms αἰών and its derivatives. This word, originally apparently denoting a definite age, marked off by beginning and end, had come to be regularly employed to denote an 'age,' the beginning of which was, indeed, sometimes more or less obscurely indicated, but to which the Speaker did not assign a further limit, and, in some instances, would clearly have rejected the idea of a limit as contradictory and impossible. The thought underlying these expressions is not that of a terminable period, but of a limitless progression.

The only adequate rendering of such a thought in English is by the words 'eternal,' 'immortal,' or the like. For there lies implicit in these words precisely what we have found to be the implication of αἰώνιος, etc., in the Gospels; viz. that the speaker rejects the idea of a bound or limit beyond which there is nothing, or nothing for the subject of whom he is speaking; that however far off the boundary fence is in thought set up, he immediately insists that it shall be taken down, and removed farther away,—only to repeat the process as often as an attempt is made to assign a limit or define an end. This is, indeed, the only real conception which we seem able to frame of the meaning and content of such terms as immortality, eternity, etc., as they are ordinarily employed. They connote not a positive and comprehensive idea, which the mind distinctly outlines to itself as a whole, but rather the negative and indefinite one of the absence of an end; looking forth into the future, we find ourselves unable to discern a point beyond which there is an absolute blank as far as the conditions under consideration are concerned. The association of the thought of a final end with the conditions or state supposed would involve a self-contradiction, or, if we prefer to use the phrase, would be impossible. Such a conception is entirely logical and consistent, and amounts practically to defining immortality as the summation of an infinite number of intervals or spaces of time, succeeding one another without break, and receding into dim, fathomless distance.

The precise words 'endless,' 'immortal,' or 'immortality' do not occur in the Gospels; cf., however, Lk 133 'Of his kingdom there shall be no end,' οὐκ ἔσται τέλος. The omission, if omission it be, is partly supplied by St. Paul, who describes the after-state of the Christian as ἀφθαρσία and ἀθάνατος, 'incorruption' and 'deathlessness' (1 Co 15<sup>50</sup>). The latter term is shown by its use in 1 Ti 6<sup>16</sup> (the blessed and only Potentate . . . ὃς οὐκ ἔχει ἀθάνατον) to have moved far in the direction of a positive connotation.

Similar considerations apply generally to the references to this doctrine in the remaining books of the New Testament, a detailed examination of which lies outside the range of the present article. Such an examination would strengthen in detail, but would not change the character of the argument. In no instance is there a suggestion of absolute finality. The conclusion of every αἰών, for example, marks the commencement of another, accompanied by changed conditions, indeed, but not, as far as the statements and apparent train of thought carry us, by annihilation in any sense, or a destruction which involves loss of personal consciousness or life. And while the writers do not in so many words define that future into which their thought projects itself as 'immortal' or 'endless,' their attitude towards it and the phrases and descriptions which they employ are such as to negative the idea that they would or could have admitted of the drawing of a line here, there, or anywhere, beyond which absolute oblivion and death should reign. Compare Ro 12<sup>1</sup> ad fin. 6<sup>22</sup> ad fin. 9<sup>16</sup> τοῦ αἰώνιου θεοῦ, 2 Co 4<sup>18</sup> 11<sup>31</sup>, Philem 12, He 1<sup>8</sup> 7<sup>13</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>10</sup>, Rev 12.

(3) In passing to the third part of our inquiry, which relates to the comprehensiveness of the life beyond the grave, whether it is contemplated as equally endless for all, or whether a distinction is drawn as regards duration between the after-existence of the evil-doer and that of the righteous man, we are conscious of a certain reserve in description and expression on the part of the Evangelists, of a delicacy which certainly reflects the mind and teaching of the Master. The passages which refer to the future of the wicked are comparatively few in number; and the outline, as it were, of the picture presented is drawn, not, indeed, waveringly or hesitatingly, but with a light hand, as though the subject were one to which detail or elaboration were inappropriate. Reticence and brevity characterize all the utterances of Christ that bear upon the share which the evil-doers have in the life after death. Thus, while the righteous man and believer enters beyond the grave upon a renewed life, to the duration of which no limit is set, and which the hearers of Christ's words understood in this sense to be eternal, the question is justly raised whether the same statement may be made, and the same inference drawn, with regard to the future existence of those who are not righteous and do not believe. Do those who—to adopt the language of the parable—go away into the outer darkness, pass into oblivion, suffer extinction, or experience any other of the conjectural fates which have from time to time been assumed to be the lot of the wicked? or, as an alternative, may 'outer darkness' be paraphrased into 'purgatory,' on the further side of which there is light?

It may be said in limine that the presumption is against any such limitation of the duration of life beyond the grave in the case of one class or section only of humanity. It would require very strong evidence to enforce the acceptance of the view that terms or expressions which disown the idea of a boundary, an end, when used of the future state of the righteous, actually and of set purpose connote such an idea when they describe the lot of the wicked: or that the Speaker would confuse His audience with antitheses which were merely verbal, and possessed no underlying significance or reality. Upon this issue, again, only an examination and fair interpretation of the passages which bear upon the subject can decide. It will be found that such passages in the Gospels are few in number, though not wanting in suggestiveness.

The most significant and important passage is perhaps Mk 3<sup>29</sup>, to which reference has already been made; and its significance does not altogether depend upon the closing words, in which the variation of text occurs. Assuming that the reading αἰώνιου ἁμαρτήματος is correct, as we are justified in doing (see above, p. 788), it is difficult to see what other meaning can be attached to the phrase than that of a sin the results of which are permanent. An 'act of sin' cannot be permanent or endless in execution, though it may be ceaselessly repeated; it is only in its fruits that it endures. And if ἁμαρτήματος can be supposed to describe 'sinfulness' in any sense, the meaning is practically the same; for endless sinfulness necessarily involves endless retribution. The earlier part of the verse has its parallels in the two other Synoptists—

The simplest form is that of St. Luke; but it is hardly less pregnant or decisive than those of the other Evangelists. The blasphemy is personal, the conscious and wilful act of a conscious and responsible being; and therefore—unless the words are to be emptied of their force, and reduced to meaninglessness—the consequences are personal also, falling not on someone else, but on the blasphemer himself, for whom there is no place for forgiveness either in this 'age' or in that which is to come. The reason is supplied by St. Mark, and by St. Mark only,—he 'is guilty of an eternal sin,' is liable to its penalty, and subject to its consequences. The permanence of sin implies and necessitates the permanent impossibility of forgiveness. On the central and essential point the three reports are at one.

The significance for the doctrine of immortality of the parable or apocalypse of Mt 25<sup>31-46</sup> with the sentences pronounced on the 'sheep' and 'goats' and the penalties incurred, lies in the application of identical words and phrases to describe the duration of that future into which both pass from the judgment-seat. If the ζωή of the righteous is αἰώνος, so is the κόλασις of the wicked (v. 46); the fire into which the latter depart is αἰώνιον also (v. 41), although this word is not applied to the Kingdom prepared for the righteous (v. 34). It is surely an abuse of language to maintain that the Speaker designed to convey a different meaning in the two instances. If, as we have seen reason to believe, the term αἰώνιος carried with it the thought of the absence of an assigned or assignable end to that vista of the future contemplated by the Speaker, or, in other words, was practically identical in significance with our 'immortal,' 'eternal,' it cannot justly be shorn of this connotation when it is applied to the 'punishment' which overtakes those on the left hand of the Judge.

An expression is found in Jn 5<sup>29</sup> which has some bearing upon this subject. Its importance for a doctrine of universal immortality must not be overestimated; for the stress lies again upon the parallelism; but by implication, though not directly, it appears to assert the same equality of lot for all as regards the duration of the revived existence. It would not be difficult, indeed, to draw out at length a similar proof for the words ἀναστήσει and ἀνάστασις to that which has been attempted above for αἰών and αἰώνιος; and to show that these expressions never, on the lips of Christ and in the Gospels, denote a resurrection which is the prelude to a new life leading only to a new death. On the contrary, ἀνάστασις ushers in another period and fresh conditions of existence, of which no termination is contemplated or conceivable. 'All that are in the tombs . . . shall come forth.' And as the 'resurrection of life,' the portion of those who have done good, can hardly be understood to indicate a merely temporary restoration or perpetuation of existence, so no interpretation of the difficult phrase 'resurrection of judgment' will be satisfactory which postulates a distinction in this respect between the righteous and those upon whom the judgment falls.

A similar argument might not unfairly be based upon the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>), or the King and the Wedding Guests (Mt 22<sup>9-14</sup>), viz. that the conditions, the data of the parable, do not in either case suggest, but rather by their tone deprecate the idea of absolute annihilation awaiting those who, on the one hand, find no place in Abraham's bosom, or, on the other, have failed to fitly provide themselves with raiment meet for the wedding feast. It would, however, be at the best no more than an argumentum e silentio, to which no great value could be attached. The declaration of Christ also to the Sadducees, as reported in St. Luke's Gospel, that 'all live to him' (Lk 20<sup>38</sup>), though from one point of view susceptible of a universalistic interpretation, does seem on any construction to exclude the idea that there are some who finally cease to live in any real or intelligible sense of the word.

Ἀπολλύω, ἀποθνήσκει, etc. It remains to consider briefly the significance and implication of the terms employed in the Gospels to denote 'death,' 'perishing,' or 'destruction.' The principal of these are the verbs ἀπολλύναι and ἀποθνήσκειν, with the cognate nouns ἀπώλεια and θάνατος.

The uncompounded verb θνήσκειν occurs but rarely in the Gospels (Mt 2<sup>20</sup>, Mk 15<sup>44</sup>, Lk 7<sup>34</sup> 8<sup>52</sup>, Jn 11<sup>44</sup> 19<sup>30</sup>), and is always employed of mere physical death regarded as the termination of the activities, good or evil, of the present life. There is no thought of a future, either affirmed or denied, in the minds of the speakers; and in none of the passages is the word on the lips of Christ or reported as used by one of His disciples. Neither is the simple verb ἀλλύω, found in NT Greek. And the adjective θνητός is used only by St. Paul (twice as an epithet of σώμα, Ro 6<sup>12</sup> 6<sup>14</sup>, once of σῶμα, 2 Co 4<sup>11</sup>), and in antithesis to ἀθάνατος, 1 Co 15<sup>52</sup>, or to ζωή, 2 Co 5<sup>4</sup>.

Ἀπώλεια is found only four times in the Gospels. In Mt 23<sup>12</sup> || Mk 14<sup>12</sup> it is the 'waste' of the ointment. For its real purpose, as conceived by the Speaker, the ointment 'perishes,' is lost; but it is clearly not annihilated, only diverted from its proper use. In Mt 7<sup>13</sup> the way that leads εἰς τὴν ἀπώλειαν, 'to destruction,' is described as broad; no indication, however, is given as to the fate of those who traverse this way when they reach ἀπώλειαν, and it is fair, therefore, to interpret the phrase in the light of the other passages where the word occurs (in the parallel passage Lk 13<sup>24</sup> no mention is made of the broad way). Jn 17<sup>12</sup> 'not one of them is lost but the son of perdition,' employs a Hebraistic mode of expression. ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀπολείας is one who shares the qualities, is like in character to ἀπώλεια, cf. υἱὸς γένηται, Mt 23<sup>13</sup>; but though he ἀπώλετο, and nothing is directly stated as to his present condition or future destiny, the son of perdition is certainly not conceived as either unconscious or extinct, nor is there any suggestion that this is to be his ultimate fate.

In the Synoptic Gospels ἀποθνήσκειν, like θνήσκειν, uniformly expresses merely physical death as the cessation of physical activities. Two passages in St. Luke, however, call for special notice. In the parable referred to above, both Lazarus and the rich man 'die' (ἀποθνήσκω, 16<sup>23</sup>); but their conscious activity does not terminate, it is merely transferred to other spheres. And of the sons of God, the sons of the resurrection, it is emphatically said (20<sup>38</sup>) that the recurrence of death is for them impossible. Death, therefore, passes upon them once, but leaves them ἀγγέλων, 'equal to angels,' in an exalted and privileged state, no more subject to its power. The word is more common in St. John (28 times), and in accordance with the more contemplative and spiritual character of his Gospel is employed also metaphorically, though its predominant use is literal and physical. Thus 'the grain of wheat falls into the ground and dies (ἀποθνήσκει, 12<sup>24</sup>), but by and through death rises to a newer and richer life, and 'bears much fruit.' And for the believer death is but the beginning of life (11<sup>25</sup>), a life that is permanent and exposed to no return of death (πᾶς ὁ ζῶν . . . οὐ μὴ ἀποθάνῃ εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, v. 26).

Of the word θάνατος, 'death,' a similar account must be given. It is usually physical death, with no reference to or thought of that which is beyond. By the Synoptists it is employed more or less metaphorically in Mt 4<sup>16</sup>, Lk 1<sup>7</sup> (quotations from Isaiah), Mt 26<sup>28</sup> || Mk 14<sup>24</sup>. In Mt 20<sup>13</sup> || Mk 10<sup>32</sup> θάνατος is for Christ Himself the prelude to life. So in Jn 5<sup>24</sup> he that believeth . . . hath passed out of death into life; and later in the same Gospel Christ declares that he who keeps His word shall not see (8<sup>51</sup>), or taste of (v. 52) death εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα (cf. 11<sup>26</sup>).

Finally, there is the term ἀπολλύναι, perhaps the most significant of all the expressions that describe dissolution and the cessation of a worldly estate. It is apparently employed by the Sacred Writers with a weaker as well as a stronger association. The former meaning, to 'lose,' to 'find to be missing,' is illustrated by Mt 15<sup>24</sup>, Lk 15<sup>4</sup> 15<sup>8</sup>, Jn 6<sup>12</sup> 18<sup>9</sup> and other passages. The predominant sense of the word, however, is that of 'ruin,' the precise nature or degree of which will be indicated by the context; but which consists essentially in the loss or withdrawal of capacity for the due discharge of function or duty. Thus the wine-skins 'perish' in St. Matthew (9<sup>17</sup>), both the wine and the skins in St. Mark (2<sup>22</sup>); but the substance of both survives, though they have become wasted and useless. So also in Jn 6<sup>27</sup>, where the βρώσις that 'perishes' loses its nutritive power, and ceases to be able to perform the part of food. Applied to persons the word is equivalent to 'ruined,' 'undone,' succumbing to present or prospective emergency or pressure, e.g. Mt 23<sup>35</sup>; Mk 4<sup>38</sup>; Lk 8<sup>24</sup>; Lk 15<sup>7</sup>; Jn 11<sup>50</sup>. In the passages most pertinent to the present inquiry a definitely spiritual 'ruin' is contemplated, the object of which is usually the ψυχή, Mt 10<sup>28, 29</sup>; 16<sup>25</sup>; Mk 8<sup>35</sup>; Lk 9<sup>24</sup>; 17<sup>33</sup>; Lk 6<sup>9</sup>; Jn 12<sup>25</sup>; but the loss or ruin of the soul here is distinctly said to be preliminary to finding, saving, or (Lk 17<sup>33</sup>) quickening it (ζωογονεῖν). The idea conveyed is again, therefore, not annihilation or destruction of being, but change of state. Here, also, the highest form of teaching is found in St. John. Every believer in Christ, or the sheep who hear His voice, are expressly declared to be permanently exempt from ruin (3<sup>16</sup>; 10<sup>28</sup>); and while the man who 'loveth his life' (ὁ φιλοῦν τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ) is the active cause of its ruin (ἀποθνήσκει αὐτὴν), he who hates it in this world will keep it 'unto life eternal' (12<sup>25</sup>). Passages in which the word is used of mere physical destruction, in which usually no thought of the future is involved, must be interpreted in accordance with this general conception (Mt 2<sup>13</sup>; 12<sup>14</sup>; 23<sup>32</sup>; Mk 6<sup>22</sup>; Lk 17<sup>33</sup> ad.).

In the passages referred to above, Mt 10<sup>28</sup> and parallels, the antithesis τὴ ἀνάληξιν ἢ τὴ ἀπολίπιν τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτοῦ is hardly to be weakened or explained away as mere willingness to lose. There is an actual loss incurred and completed. And the 'ruin' consists in the stripping off from the ψυχή of all those qualities and connexions which have bound it to the present, and have made it what it is, material and sensual. The essential ψυχή of the soul transformed, is 'saved' by the process, and enters upon a new life. Thus the phrase is practically equivalent to St. John's 'loving and hating' (in 12<sup>25</sup>).

In attempting to estimate the value of these indications with regard to the future life of the wicked, few and slight as they seem to be compared with the fulness and frequency of the references to the blessed lot of the righteous, two preliminary conditions which are essential to their right interpretation need to be borne in mind. In the first place, it was clearly far from the intention of the Teacher to lay down or elaborate any metaphysical doctrine of a future existence, such as we might reasonably expect from formal systems of philosophy. Written across His words and actions is their immediate and practical aim; and to have mystified His plain and unlettered hearers with definitions and metaphysics would have been to repel them, and defeat His own purpose. That task He must leave to successors, who in other times, and with other surroundings, will enter into His labours. To expect to find, for example, in the Gospels a well-ordered and articulated defence of natural immortality, so called, is unreasonable. Any such expectation is by the conditions of the case doomed to disappointment. Hints, pre-indications, there will naturally be, the elucidation and development of which will be the care of after ages; but completeness, finality, from a logical or philosophic point of view, will not be found; nor a series of statements which, however fitted they might be to meet the requirements of some one or other of the later centuries, were out of touch with the thought of His own day and generation.

Again, the reticence observed as to the fate of the wicked, and the comparative infrequency of mention thereof, are entirely in harmony with what is found to be the case in the early literature of the other great religions of the world. To expatiate on a destiny of woe and pain, or upon the duration of the sufferings of the lost, is, judging from all analogy, evidence not of an early but of a late position in the history of religious thought; and were this a marked feature of the Gospels, it would justly have laid them open to the suspicion of having at least undergone modification in the interests of later and more developed forms of belief. The hymns of the Rig-Veda, for example, dwell much upon the blessed estate of the good who do that which is acceptable to the gods, and accordingly go hereafter to dwell with them; but they contain only slight and passing references to the lot of the evil-doers, who are hurled by Indra into darkness. The Egyptian Book of the Dead relates the varying trials and fortunes of the deceased in the nether world, through which he passes successfully by the aid of talismanic formulæ and the favour of the gods; but complete silence is observed with regard to the man who at the bar of Osiris fails to pass the prescribed tests. And it is characteristic also not of primitive but of mature, if not decadent, Buddhism to set forth in vivid description and with luxuriant art the series of hells in which carefully graduated torments on an ascending scale of horror are apportioned with precision to the heinousness of the sinner's crimes. It was not otherwise in early Christianity. There, too, it was left to later ages to elaborate descriptions and to reveal in details of a future life, the real circumstances of which neither human language is capable of defining nor human thought, tied down as it is to categories belonging essentially to present conditions, able to conceive. The comparative silence of the earliest authoritative documents, and of the earliest teaching so far as it has come down to us, is more eloquent and convincing than the most exhaustive and graphic statement of doctrine could ever have been.

Mohammedanism, it may be said, is an exception to this rule, and from the very beginning lavishes its descriptive powers on the torments that await the unbeliever. Islam, however, sprang adult and full-armed from the mind of its founder, and was stereotyped in the Koran. Its doctrines have already a long history of development behind them, and, if we could trace them back to the starting-point, would probably be found in all instances to conform to the prevailing type of historic growth.

The results to which we have been led may be briefly summarized as follows:—
(1) The reality of a conscious life beyond the grave is uniformly assumed and taught by Christ Himself and by the writers of the Gospels.

(2) To this future life there is assigned no terminus or end. Rather do the phrases used suggest that the thought of a final end never presented itself to Speaker or writer as either actual or possible. And where words like τέλος, ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα, etc., are employed, the 'end' or 'last day' is obviously and patently not absolute, but marks and introduces a new beginning. No philosophical theory of immortality is formulated; such a theory is not to be expected, and was, indeed, under the circumstances hardly possible. The doctrine of the Gospels, however, of a renewed life after death to which no limit is set, and for which by virtue of the very terms employed no limit appears to be conceivable, is in the last analysis all that we mean, or can mean, by 'eternity,' 'immortality.'

(3) The writers give no countenance whatever to any theory which in respect of its duration separates the lot of the righteous from that of the wicked. Slight and indefinite, overlaid with metaphor and parable, as are the indications of the conditions under which the future life of the latter will be lived, the guarded statements made and the hints allowed to fall consistently imply that in this respect equality of treatment is meted out to all. If the τῶν of the one is ἀθάνατος, and he is not to die eis tôn aiōna, the κἀναίς of the other is aiōnos likewise, and he is or may be guilty of a ἀνάργημα, the fruits of which are gathered in no less a period of time than is described by the same phrase. Theories of universal restoration, of final extinction, or of any modification or combination of these find no support in the words of Christ or of His disciples as recorded in the Gospels.

The present writer shares the convictions which have been very widely felt and expressed, that the final demonstration of immortality, if and when it is given, will have to be based on broader than any merely liberal or narrowly expository grounds. Christ spoke to His own age; and necessarily spoke such truths and in such a form as that age could receive and assimilate. That He exhausted the whole range of truth in His statement, or formulated both in shape and substance all doctrine that the mind of man could ever appreciate, is as impossible to believe as it is contrary to His own express words (Jn 16<sup>22</sup>). Nor can we doubt that if He had lived in our day, He would have delivered truths expanded and recast to meet the needs and tendencies and capacities with which He found Himself brought into touch.

That the Christian Church has been on the whole on right lines, and has been justified generally in her interpretation of the teaching of her Founder and His immediate disciples with respect to this particular doctrine, the foregoing exposition has attempted to show. The end, however, is not yet. And the ferment of thought, not less, perhaps more, characteristic of our age than of any that have preceded it, is not destined to be stilled into unconcern, or to have its efforts paralyzed, by any dogmatic creed or pronouncement of whatever authority. It claims the right to work out its own doctrinal freedom not only in the light of the Sacred Records, but under the guidance of that reason which it holds no less certainly than revelation to be an element and gift of the Divine.

LITERATURE.—The treatises on NT Theology, or Theology in general, and the History of Doctrines contain little that is relevant. See the article on 'Eschatology,' by S. D. F. IMPEDIMENT.—See DISEASE.

IMPOTUNITY.—The only passage in the EV where this word is found is Lk 11<sup>8</sup> 'Because of his importunity he will arise and give him as many as he needeth.' This rendering dates from Tindale (1526). Wyclif (1380) has 'his contynuel axynge.' Good modern translations are 'persistence' (Weymouth), 'persistence' (Twentieth Century NT). Murray's New English Dict. gives the definition 'troublesome pertinacity in solicitation'; as early as 1460 the word has this meaning, 'Through ymportunite of thair syttees.' In the companion parable, Coverdale (1535) uses the cognate adjective, Lk 18<sup>8</sup> 'yet seyng this weddowe is so importune vpon me, I will deluyner her.' The original meaning of 'importune' was 'inopportune,' 'untimely'; in Sir 32<sup>4</sup> 'display not thy wisdom out of season.' Coverdale has 'at an importunyte.' Intermediate stages in the growth of the later signification of the word from this root idea are marked by the now obsolete meanings 'troublesome' and 'urgent.'

'Importunity' (Lk 11<sup>8</sup>) is the translation of the Gr. ἀναίτια, which signifies 'the absence of αἰδώς,' 'shamelessness.' In Biblical Greek it occurs only in Sir 25<sup>22</sup>, and is rendered 'impudence.' The Lat. importunitas, 'unfitness,' is found with the stronger meaning 'insolence' (Cic. de Sen. iii. 7), and is therefore a more accurate translation of ἀναίτια than its English equivalent. But persistent asking soon becomes insolent asking. The word contains, as Trapp says, 'a metaphor from beggars, that will not be said Nay, but are impudently importunate' (Com. in loc.). Cowper uses the word (Task, iv. 414) in an instructive context:

'Knaves . . . liberal of their aid
To clam'rous importunity in rags.'

To bring out the striking contrast which our Lord's parable suggests, it is necessary to show that persistence in asking becomes those who know that prayer is never troublesome to God, and never out of season. He who 'will not be said Nay,' and he alone, has learnt the secret of prevailing prayer. Wright notes (Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek, p. 243) that St. Luke 'three times uses bad men to represent God, or to be examples to us: (1) here, (2) the unjust steward, (3) the unjust judge.'

IMPOSSIBILITY.—The modern mind flatters itself upon its frank recognition of impossibility in the world of nature. There is also an impotence of faith which is content to allow impossibility in the sphere of grace. Both these tendencies to a lazy acquiescence in a fancied inevitable are out of touch with the gospel of Christ. There is, of course, such essential impossibility as that of a good tree bearing bad fruit (Mt 7<sup>18</sup>). And there is the practical impossibility of a house divided against itself escaping ruin (Mk 3<sup>2</sup>). But the range of impossibility in the world of nature and in the sphere of grace is narrowed to evanescence by the faith of the Christian disciple. A mustard-seed of faith will remove a mountain (Mt 17<sup>20</sup>). God is able to save to the uttermost (Lk 18<sup>27</sup>), though it seems like the passage of a camel through a needle's eye for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 19<sup>24</sup>, Mk 10<sup>25</sup>). It is through Christ, the Son of God become the Son of Man, that all is possible and nothing impossible (Jn 15<sup>3</sup>, Mk 9<sup>23</sup>). He Himself showed it in the supreme triumph of the Resurrection, when the tomb had been sealed so that escape might be impossible (Mt 27<sup>66</sup>). The command over nature displayed in the stilling of the storm (Mk 4<sup>39</sup>) and in the healing of the woman with the issue of blood (Mt 9<sup>21</sup>, Mk 5<sup>28</sup>) is at the service of faith and prayer. The poor leper lost his despair in faith, and was rewarded (Lk 5<sup>24</sup>). The blind received sight, because through their faith human impossibility was swallowed up by Divine omnipotence (Mt 9<sup>28</sup>). Infinite resources, acknowledging no bounds of impossibility, are within reach of the earnest childlike faith the Lord approves (Mk 11<sup>23</sup>, Lk 17<sup>6</sup>). Such bright and uplifting lessons are remote from the gloomy and depressing problem of evil. There is, indeed, an undercurrent of impossibility in the stream of this world's development. 'It is impossible but that occasions of stumbling should come' (Lk 17<sup>1</sup>). But this species of impossibility we are not to dwell upon too long. 'The redemption draws nigh' (Lk 21<sup>28</sup>).

IMPOTENCE.—The single instance of our Lord's miracles specifically classified under this head is recorded in Jn 5<sup>2-9</sup>, where the sufferer is described as ὁ ἀσθενῶν (AV 'the impotent man,' RV 'the sick man'). The features of the case are its long continuance (for thirty-eight years); and the association of the man with the multitude of infirm and diseased people gathered round the Pool of Bethesda (wh. see). Of the nature of the ailment we have no evidence. It has been thought to be palsy, but Bennett (Diseases of the Bible) considers this doubtful. The long duration of the disease is against its being identified with locomotor ataxia. It may have been some chronic wasting disease having its origin in an enfeebled or disorganized nervous system.

The chief feature of the healing is the fact that Jesus begins the process of restoration by dealing with the hopeless condition induced and established by thirty-eight years of suffering, and by the repeated dashing to the ground of slowly-rising hopes. 'Wouldst thou be made whole?' our Lord asked, appealing to the last flicker of expectation evinced by his remaining still at the healing pool, and calling it out into new vigour and consciousness.

Another significant feature is the apparent association in the mind of Jesus of this infirmity with sin, either the sin of the sufferer or the sinfulness of the race (Jn 5<sup>14</sup>). A similar association is found in the case recorded in Mt 9<sup>1-3</sup>, Mk 2<sup>1-12</sup>, Lk 5<sup>17-26</sup> (see art. PARALYSIS). It cannot be definitely asserted that Jesus marked personal sin as the root-cause of disease in these cases, though the inference is not altogether unwarranted from the narratives. But it is at least evident that our Lord did habitually recognize the close connexion between personal and racial sinfulness and all manner of disease and sickness. While carefully guarding Himself from attributing all sickness and weakness to sin (Jn 9<sup>3</sup>), He yet declared the essential alliance of sin with all kinds of bodily disorder. 'Sins of the flesh,' as commonly understood, are notoriously responsible for many of mankind's worst diseases and infirmities; and the Apostolic catalogue of these sins includes not only adultery, uncleanness, murder, drunkenness, and revellings, but also hatred, variance, wrath, strife, envyings, and covetousness (Gal 5<sup>19-21</sup>, Col 3<sup>5</sup>, Eph 5<sup>3</sup>). Our Lord's list of sins that defile and destroy the body begins with 'evil thoughts' and ends with moral stupidity or foolishness (Mk 7<sup>22</sup>, ἀφροσύνη).

Another case which must probably be included here is that of the woman with a spirit of infirmity (Lk 13<sup>11-17</sup>). The features here are the Evangelist's description of the ailment as πνεῦμα ἔχουσα ἀσθενείας, the lengthened prevalence of the trouble (for eighteen years), and the completeness of the inability to raise herself. The description is evidently from a competent hand. The woman was bowed and crouched together (ἦν συγέπτοινα), and was in no wise able to lift herself up. The inability was εἰς τὸ παρελθεῖν (cf. He 7<sup>25</sup>, where the ability of the ever-living Christ to save mankind is also εἰς τὸ παρελθεῖν). The infirmity, however, did not debar the sufferer from attending the synagogue. The ailment may have been surgical—a gradual distortion and permanent bending, increased by old age, of the spinal column, such as in many cases is due to continual bending in field labour or in the bearing of heavy burdens. Bennett suggests 'the gradual wasting and relaxation of muscles and ligaments of the back by which the trunk is held erect, so that the body falls forward without any disease of brain or cord or mental impairment.' But it may not improperly be rather classified as due at least in part to some morbid mental condition such as hysteria. This seems to be indicated not obscurely by the description given, as a spirit of infirmity.

The reference of our Lord to Satan as binding the woman is not to be understood as pointing to possession, although it may have been a reflexion of the current idea that all bodily deformity was due to demonic agency—in which case the description is due to the Evangelist rather than to Jesus. But most probably it indicates our Lord's view of the infirmity as being part of that widespread calamity and curse that lies upon the whole race, of which complex coil Satan is the summary and representative.

The features of the healing are: (1) The Divine compassion expressed in our Lord's laying His hand upon the woman as He spoke the word of hope and deliverance; (2) His profound sense that this suffering and weakness, this crouching spirit, were completely foreign to the will of God (v. 10); and (3) His steadfast refusal to allow any pedantic Sabbath rules to stand in the way of His relief of suffering humanity. The last fact is dominant in the whole narrative, and consequently the other features and the healing are only casually reported.

IN (ἐν, ἐς, κατά, ἐπί, πρὸς, διά, ἔσω).—The word is prevaillingly used in its primary meaning of position in place, but it frequently follows the Greek ἐν in its more or less figurative ramifications of meaning. It is also employed more or less accurately to translate various other prepositions which convey a slightly different nuance of significance. In the present article we shall follow the rendering of the RV, where the use of the prepositions is more consistent and precise, as well as more conformed to the modern usage, than in the AV. (For illustration of the wider use of 'in' common in the Elizabethan period, cf. Hastings' DB, art. 'In').

1. As translation of ἐν, the word indicates: (a) Local relations: (a) 'in,' 'at,' or 'on,' of simple locality (Mt 2<sup>1</sup> 'in Bethlehem,' 24<sup>40</sup> 'in the field,' Jn 4<sup>30</sup> 'in this mountain'); (b) 'that with which one is covered or clothed' (Mk 12<sup>28</sup> 'walk in long robes,' Mt 7<sup>15</sup> 'in sheep's clothing,' 11<sup>21</sup> 'repented in sackcloth and ashes,' Jn 20<sup>13</sup> 'two angels in white'); (c) direct cohesion (15<sup>4</sup> 'except it abide in the vine'); (d) position in a writing or book (Mt 21<sup>42</sup> 'in the scriptures,' Mk 1<sup>2</sup> 'in Isaiah,' Lk 20<sup>42</sup> 'in the book of Psalms').

2. Temporal relations—the point or space of time when, or within which, anything occurs (Mt 22<sup>29</sup> 'in the resurrection,' 10<sup>42</sup> etc. 'in the day of judgment'—the AV has also 'at the day of judgment,' Lk 9<sup>38</sup> 'in those days,' Jn 2<sup>19</sup> 'in three days I will raise it up').

3. Figurative and personal relations: (a) Indicating a person: (a) conceived as the sphere where a certain quality or state of mind is found (Mt 6<sup>23</sup> 'the light that is in thee,' Mk 9<sup>39</sup> 'have salt in yourselves,' and similarly Mt 21<sup>42</sup> 'marvellous in our eyes,' 5<sup>28</sup> 'committed adultery in his heart,' Mk 11<sup>23</sup> 'doubt in his heart'); or (b) in reference to whom another stands in a certain attitude (Mt 3<sup>12</sup> 'in whom I am well pleased,' 11<sup>9</sup> 'whosoever shall not be offended in me').

(b) Of the state or condition, manner or circumstance, range or sphere in which a person is or acts: (a) state or condition (Mt 4<sup>16</sup> 'the people which sat in darkness,' Lk 1<sup>79</sup> 'serve him in holiness and righteousness,' Jn 4<sup>23</sup> 'worship in spirit and truth,' Mt 21<sup>22</sup> 'ask in prayer'); (b) manner (13<sup>3</sup> 'in parables'); (c) occasion (22<sup>15</sup> 'ensnare him in talk,' Lk 23<sup>34</sup> 'if they do this in the green tree,' 24<sup>28</sup> 'in the breaking of bread'); (d) surrounding accompaniment (Mt 6<sup>29</sup> 'Solomon in all his glory,' 16<sup>28</sup> 'coming in his kingdom,' 16<sup>27</sup> 'in the glory of his Father'); (e) range or sphere (Jn 8<sup>21</sup> 'die in your sins,' Mk 1<sup>15</sup> 'believe in the gospel' will also belong to this head, unless we admit that this is an exceptional use of πρωτεύω with ἐν. The LXX almost invariably construes the verb with the dative, the NT writers with ἐκ or ἐπί. Probably therefore the verb is used here absolutely, and ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ marks the sphere within which faith is to be exercised. The only other instance of πιστεύω followed by ἐν in the NT is Jn 3<sup>15</sup>, which the RV translates 'that whosoever believeth may in him have eternal life'. For ἐν with ὄνομα see below.

(c) Of the means or instrument, or personal agency employed, where a simple dative might have been used instead of ἐν (Mt 3<sup>11</sup> 'I baptize you with [RVm 'in'] water'; cf. Lk 3<sup>16</sup>, where the simple dative is used; Mk 9<sup>34</sup> 'By [RVm 'In'] the prince of the devils casteth he out devils'; in other cases 'with' is used as translation, as Lk 22<sup>37</sup> 'shall we smite with (ἐν) the sword?').

The very repetition of such unusual expressions indicates that the thought was a favourite one in Pauline and Johannine theology. For the determination of the meaning, special weight should be attached to the fact that complementary expressions are used repeatedly—Χριστός ἐν τινι, πνεῦμα ἐν τινι, πατήρ ἐν τινι (Ro 8<sup>9</sup> 8<sup>10</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>8</sup>, Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, Jn 10<sup>38</sup> 14<sup>20</sup> 15<sup>5</sup> 17<sup>21-22</sup>). The employment of these parallel expressions points to a relation of the most intimate communion; if the only question is how this spiritual communion is to be conceived. Deissmann, who has carefully sifted the material relating to the phrase ἐν Χριστῷ, insists that the translation 'in fellowship with Christ' does not quite adequately convey the concrete thought of St. Paul. He favours the view that the ἐν here retains its literal and local significance; the Christian lives in the element Christ, somewhat in the same way as animals live in the air, or fishes in the water, or the roots of plants in the earth. He notices the parallel use of ἐν Χριστῷ and Χριστός ἐν τινι with ἐν πνεύματι and πνεῦμα ἐν τινι, and argues that as the last phrase would be naturally understood in the most literal local sense, of one within whom the invisible powers of the Spirit resided, so in the phrases relative to Christ, the living pneumatic Christ of faith, the same local reference is implied. Or, again, the phrase ἐν θεῷ (1 Th 1<sup>1</sup>, Col 3<sup>2</sup>, Ac 17<sup>28</sup> 'In him we live and move and have our being') expresses the thought that God is the element in which we live, implying the local conception of a Divine περιχώρησις. From such analogies Deissmann is inclined to accept the most literal and local interpretation of St. Paul's favourite phrase; and he believes that if we keep in mind the equation Χριστός=πνεῦμα, Christ the everliving Divine Spirit, the conception of real locality will not appear improbable. This interpretation certainly presses the literal meaning of ἐν too far; it tends to dissolve St. Paul's mystic idea of union into a semi-physical relation, and so to destroy the moral and spiritual basis of faith. The spiritual presence of Christ is indeed pictured as a local nearness of relation; yet St. Paul elsewhere clearly distinguishes between the spiritual nearness of present fellowship with Christ and the future local fellowship with (συν or πρὸς) Christ in the life to come (1 Th 4<sup>17</sup>, Ph 1<sup>23</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>8</sup>). Even while 'absent from the Lord,' St. Paul is ἐν Χριστῷ, i.e. in spiritual but not local union. The implied ἐν θεῷ in Ac 17<sup>28</sup> 'In him we live and move and have our being,' is scarcely admissible as an analogy, since it refers rather to the natural basis of existence than to the spiritual ground. The Johannine phrases already cited (μένων ἐν ἐμοί; ἐγὼ ἐν τῷ πατρὶ μου, καὶ ὑμεῖς ἐν ἐμοί, κἀγὼ ἐν ὑμῖν) contain substantially the same thought as the Pauline ἐν Χριστῷ; and in these, in spite of the local figure employed, the idea is clearly not that of local inherence, but of spiritual inherence or communion. The mystic realism of the Pauline and Johannine phrases is rather to be found in the fact that they approach the thought of a real identification with the Logos or the pneumatic Christ. The life Divine incorporates itself in the Christian; the Spirit of Christ or of God takes the place of the human spirit, and is individualized in the life of believers. This idea of essential spiritual (mystica, hypostatica) union alone does justice to those passages where the union of believers with Christ, and even with one another, finds sublimest expression (Jn 17<sup>21-22</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>20</sup>). But while this thought of vital union is the central and original conception of the phrase used by St. Paul, the context often indicates some variety in the shades of meaning. Thus Ro 14<sup>17</sup> 'I am persuaded in the Lord Jesus,' i.e. in virtue of that fellowship; Ph 2<sup>20</sup> 'Receive him in the Lord,' i.e. in the spirit of such fellowship; it is often used as a favourite expression for 'Christianity'—Ro 16<sup>10-11</sup>; while in other cases the relationship referred to is that between Christ and the Father; 1 Th 5<sup>13</sup> 'this is the will of God in Christ Jesus'; 2 Co 5<sup>19</sup> 'God was in Christ reconciling the world.'

II. The word is also used to translate other prepositions in the following senses:

ἐν, 'within' a space of time (Mt 26<sup>6</sup> 'build it in three days').

κατά, 'throughout,' 'according to' (Lk 15<sup>14</sup> 'a famine in that land,' Mt 13<sup>11</sup> 'in a dream').

πρός, 'towards,' direction (Lk 12<sup>23</sup> 'spoken in the ear').

ἔσω, adverb, 'within' (Mt 26<sup>68</sup> 'entered in').

ἐπί, 'on,' 'upon,' 'over.' The RV has followed the more restricted use of ἐπί in many cases, and substituted 'on,' 'upon,' 'at,' 'over,' 'by,' 'unto,' 'to' (Mt 6<sup>10</sup> 'thy will be done in earth' [RV 'on earth'], 18<sup>10</sup> 'in [RV 'at'] the mouth of two or three witnesses,' 22<sup>2</sup> 'reigning in [RV 'over'] Judaea,' 21<sup>19</sup> 'in [RV 'by'] the way,' 13<sup>14</sup> 'in [RV 'unto'] them is fulfilled the prophecy,' Mk 5<sup>20</sup> 'knowing what was done in [RV 'to'] her'); but in some cases 'in' is retained, where English idiom requires it, and where the sense is not liable to be mistaken (with the genitive, Mk 8<sup>4</sup> 'in the wilderness' [RV 'in a desert place'], 11<sup>4</sup> 'in a place where two ways met' [RV 'in the open street'], and, with the dative, Mt 14<sup>9</sup> 'in a charger,' Mk 10<sup>24</sup> 'trust in riches,' Lk 18<sup>9</sup> 'trusted in themselves that they were righteous,' i.e. rested their confidence of being righteous upon themselves). For ἐπί with ὄνομα see below.

εἰς, 'into,' 'with reference to,' 'with a view to': (a)='into,' locally or figuratively, often after verbs of rest, where previous motion and direction are implied (Mt 22<sup>9</sup> 'came and dwelt in a city,' Jn 9<sup>7</sup> 'go wash in the pool,' Mt 10<sup>67</sup> 'what ye hear in the ear,' 13<sup>9</sup> 'hid in three measures of meal,' Mk 1<sup>9</sup> 'baptized in the Jordan,' 5<sup>24</sup> 'go in peace,' Jn 1<sup>18</sup> 'which is in the bosom of the Father'—εἰς τὸν κόλπον—i.e. placed in the Father's bosom and there abiding); (b)='with respect to,' 'with a view to' (Lk 22<sup>19</sup> 'in remembrance of me,' 16<sup>8</sup> 'wiser in their generation' [RV 'for their generation']). After πνεῦμα, 'believe,' εἰς is largely used (Mt 18<sup>6</sup>, Jn 12<sup>28</sup> 3<sup>18</sup> etc.)='in' or 'on' in AV, in RV invariably 'on'; it implies the direction in which the believing soul turns, the fellowship into which it enters. Specially noteworthy is the use of εἰς, ἐπί, and ἐν with ὄνομα. While the Synoptists commonly employ ἐπί or εἰς or the simple dative, and rarely use ἐν except in the phrase, 'Blessed is self alone, will suffer. (4) The goal of the religion of Israel, accordingly, is the indwelling of God in man. The coming of Israel in His fulness is the end to which the prophets of Israel look. When He comes, Israel will be renewed, and the universe, sharing the blessing, will itself be renovated. They conceived this coming of the Lord without perspective, and in the forms belonging to the world of their own day. In this way alone could the hope of the coming of the Lord have sustained and comforted their own spirits; only in such forms could they have proclaimed it to others who had themselves, waiting for the consolation of Israel, in one of continual disillusionment. Form after form broke like mist, and still the perfect form in which the presence of Jehovah would be fully realized did not come. It is little wonder, therefore, that the hope of Israel did not retain its purity and spirituality, save in the hearts of an inner circle of whom the theologians and politicians of the time took no account—the poor in spirit, the mourners, the weak, the pure in heart. Comparison between the two lines of development, that of Greek philosophy and that of the religion of Israel, shows that the ruling idea of both was union with God, and, through this, the unifying of all the elements of the life of man and of nature. On neither line had the goal been reached. In the one there was at best an occasional and intermittent experience of ecstasy. In the other there was, in the deepest nature, a living against hope, that God would yet visit His people.

Into such a world, Jewish and Hellenic, Christianity entered, with the declaration that what men had been seeking had come to pass, that union with God was no longer a mere dream or a wistful hope, but an accomplished fact. God, so the announcement runs, has visited Himself with one Man, so that all men, in this Man, who is both Christ and Logos, become one with God. The revelation of God, in this Man, was not merely an idea, but a historic Person. He is both God and man, and the universe are embraced into unity. He is with respect to the Divine purpose, and the goal of its accomplishment. It is through the transposition of the Divine purpose, and the goal of its accomplishment, that He incarnates the transposition of the Divine purpose, and the goal of its accomplishment. It is through the transposition of the Divine purpose, and the goal of its accomplishment, that He incarnates the transposition of the Divine purpose, and the goal of its accomplishment.

A. THE CHARACTER OF CHRIST.—It is remarkable that all study of Christ necessarily begins with His character. It is not so with other great men, merely a number of it (Forrest, Christ of History, etc., p. 66).

2. The second is negative. His absolute sinlessness. The evidence of the portrait constrains us to conclude, not merely that Jesus was a very good man, in whom there was "the absence of sinfulness," and "the absence of holiness," but that in Him was no sin. The testimony of His contemporaries might lead us to establish this result, though it is, indeed, most impressive to note how those who knew Him intimately bear unanimous and most solemn testimony to His sinlessness, and ascribe to Him an office which could be held only by an absolutely holy person (1 Pt. 2: 21, 22; 1 Jo. 2: 22; Ac. 1: 22). The weight of proof lies in His own consciousness. It is beyond question that in that consciousness there was no sense of personal unworthiness, of shortcomings or failures, even the slightest. He who taught others to pray for forgiveness, and never besought it of the Divine mercy for Himself; He who proclaimed the necessity of regeneration for all men, and Himself never passed through any such process of experience; He who in tenderest sympathy drew close to the sinners' side, and yet always manifested a singular aloofness of spirit, and never included Himself among the objects of the Divine compassion; He who made it His vocation to die for the remission of sins, must have been, in actual fact, sinless—either that, or He must have been sunk in a moral darkness more profound than sin ordinarily produces, even in the worst of men. The sinlessness of Jesus is a fact whose possibility ought not to be questioned through mere unwillingness to admit the inferences which follow from it. If Jesus is sinless, He stands alone in the moral history of the race. He cannot be classed along with other men, however good and great. They are approximations to an ideal. He is the Ideal. This uniqueness, moreover, cannot be interpreted as that of a forma nature, or a special product of creative power. The difference between Jesus and other good men is this, that while He has produced a conviction of sin innumerable more profound than they have evoked among their admirers, He has also awakened a confidence and a peace which they have never wrought in their closest imitators. Unnumbered multitudes of human souls have come under regenerative and sanctifying influences, which, without death, have emanated from His personality, and which have wrought in them a type of character which is the reflex of His. There is only one place in which a recent and open-minded study of the character of Christ can set Him, and that is beside God, an essentially Divine. He is certainly human. The door we draw to Him, the more clearly do we discern His humanity. There is nothing, in accepted, to divide us from Him. Pain and sorrow, temptation and conflict, electric and growth. He knows them all, in His universality all the endless variety of human experience is comprehended, so that He is kinship of every family on earth, contemporary of every generation, neighbour and friend of every soul that breathes and suffers. Yet this very humanity, we have been inclined to draw Him into our ranks, we soon find that He will not be thus classified. He is a man, yet more than man—the Holy One of God. He was born a man, yet His birth was not the inevitable product of psychological and racial conditions; it was the entrance into humanity of one whose home and native air were elsewhere. They were within the circle of Divinity. See, further, art. SIX, § 7.

such a study has been made in the article CHARACTER OF CHRIST, the details of which need not be repeated here. We may, however, restate the result of that article—the results, as we believe, to which the study of His character must necessarily lead. Contemplating Him as He is presented to us in the Gospels, two features of His character stand out prominently and unmistakably.

1. The first is positive. His perfect goodness. This quality is to be sought, and is found, in all the relations in which Jesus stood to His fellow-men and to God. (1) Between Him and God the relations were such as never existed in the case of any other man. They include (a) perfect knowledge and truth, with the complete testimony of a Son, nay, of one who, in comparison with all other men, is the Son (Mt. 11: 27). He beheld Divine realities with immediate vision, and reported what He had seen and heard (Jo. 1: 14; 8: 12-18). We see in Jesus one whose vision of God was absolutely undimmed, whose intercourse with God was unobscured by any incapacity on His part to receive, or to respond to, the communications of God to Him. Jesus, moreover, loved God with the strength of a nature which had never been injured by any breach with God. In His love for God there is no trace of the compensations, the heart-breaking memories, which make the love of the redeemed a thing compounded of tears and pain, as well as of adoration and gladness. It shows itself in serene and unbroken trust, which continually depends on the Father's gifts (Jo. 7: 7; 14: 1-3), and in perfect and comprehensive obedience, which craved no other will than the Father's (Lk. 22: 42; 24: 49). Thus loving God, He was aware that God loved Him, and did continually pour upon Him the love of the Divine love which found its outlet in the spiritual receptivity of its object. The assurance, which is the result of His love, was not restrained by incapacity or wounded by misunderstanding. It was a joy which was not shared by any other man, and has free course in Him, and returns to its source in God, and perfect mutual joy of fellowship, so unvalued to us in the communications between Jesus and God, and the sacraments reverently imitate us.

(2) Between Jesus and His fellow-men the relations were such as never existed in the case of any other man. He could not realize in His own case all possible circumstances in which man might be blessed. But He could, and did, hold such an attitude to men as would enable Him to enter with perfect sympathy and entire appropriateness into any situation into which His fellow-men were called. He loved men. It is abundantly evident that He knew them, that He knew their nature, and that He knew their individual features of the humanity and in the individual features of the humanity which came before Him. The evidence, accordingly, is that, in spite of such knowledge, He loved men, he loved in their high destiny, yearned to save them, and was ready to give His own precious blood for them (Jo. 1: 29; 10: 11).

We conclude, then, that Jesus was good, not merely in being one of a class of men upon whom we may pass this verdict without stinging them thereby as yet from their fathers, but as standing alone in the completeness of His without achievement. His character bears the mark of attainment and finality. All other goodness is to be estimated by His, and His goodness is to be estimated by His. This is not matter of dogma but of observation. He knew them, that He knew their nature, and that He knew their individual features of the humanity and in the individual features of the humanity which came before Him. The evidence, accordingly, is that, in spite of such knowledge, He loved men, he loved in their high destiny, yearned to save them, and was ready to give His own precious blood for them (Jo. 1: 29; 10: 11). impossible to confine ourselves to a merely humanitarian interpretation of it. "He who alone stands in this universal sense, is humanity cannot be merely a number of it (Forrest, Christ of History, etc., p. 66).

The door we draw to Him, the more clearly do we discern His humanity. There is nothing, in accepted, to divide us from Him. Pain and sorrow, temptation and conflict, electric and growth. He knows them all, in His universality all the endless variety of human experience is comprehended, so that He is kinship of every family on earth, contemporary of every generation, neighbour and friend of every soul that breathes and suffers. Yet this very humanity, we have been inclined to draw Him into our ranks, we soon find that He will not be thus classified. He is a man, yet more than man—the Holy One of God. He was born a man, yet His birth was not the inevitable product of psychological and racial conditions; it was the entrance into humanity of one whose home and native air were elsewhere. They were within the circle of Divinity. See, further, art. SIX, § 7.

A study of the character of Christ does not provide us with a ready-made dogma of the constitution of His person. Two things, however, it does effect: (a) it sets the person of Christ in the centre of Christianity as the main declaration and its most exact proof; (b) it makes a merely humanitarian Christianity of His personality for ever impossible. We are constrained to conceive of the sinless Christ, not as the bloom and effluence of humanity, but rather as One who has entered into humanity on an errand of profound significance for the moral history of the race. In any case, they are inseparable from what He believed Himself to be. They enter into the very texture of the narrative. They are wrought of the very fibre of the personality of Him who makes them. Whatever quality of being is required to make them valid, we must impute to Him who deliberately assumes them. Without presuming to make a complete enumeration, we note the following among the offices and functions which Jesus avowedly claims to hold and fulfil.

1. THE OFFICE OF TEACHER.—It is noteworthy that Jesus does not discuss the constitution of His Person, and gives none of the deductions with which theology has been rife. This is an indication of the truthfulness of the narrative, and shows that it has been to a wonderful degree untouched by the doctrinal development which we know had preceded its earliest written form. It suggests, moreover, that the very highest construction that can be put on the words of Christ is no more than the truth. If, in truth, Jesus be the highest that is said of Him, this is precisely the method which He would adopt in order to disclose the transcendent aspect of His being. He would make no ontological statements regarding it, but would leave it to be apprehended through the total impression of His personality.

2. THE OFFICE OF PROPHET.—As soon as we return to the portrait, we are impressed by the extraordinary claims which Jesus makes on His own behalf. He is perfect in humanity, and yet, combined with the utmost gentleness, the most winning loveliness, there is an assertion of His own supreme importance, which is as profound and as subtle. These claims are sometimes stated explicitly, more frequently they are implied in what He says and does. In any case, they are inseparable from what He believed Himself to be. They enter into the very texture of the narrative. They are wrought of the very fibre of the personality of Him who makes them. Whatever quality of being is required to make them valid, we must impute to Him who deliberately assumes them. Without presuming to make a complete enumeration, we note the following among the offices and functions which Jesus avowedly claims to hold and fulfil.

1. Teacher.—In Jesus' discharge of this office, certain features at once attract attention:—(1) The sublimity of the office. There were in Jesus day many teachers of religion, and the title of Rabbi, commonly given to them. He accepted (Mt. 23: 8-10; Jo. 1: 81-82). These others, however, were prepared to be followed by successors who might wear their title and inherit their honors. But Jesus claimed to be a teacher in a sense in which He could not be followed by any of His disciples, however learned and pious (Mt. 23: 8-10). He did not aim at raising up to him the church across Him in His office. His office of teacher is His alone. No doubt there came to be in the Church certain men upon whom the Spirit of God conferred a special gift of knowledge, and to were accordingly recognized as teachers (1 Co. 12: 28). But teachers after the pattern of Christ were not to be instituted, and were not needed in the new Society (1 Th. 4: 1, 2; 2 Jo. 2). This salient feature of His office is a remarkable fact. He was, then, the bearer of a message which could not be pronounced by other lips than His, which originated in the depths of His consciousness, and reveal all its significance and value to the personality of Him who declared it.

(2) The note of authority.—This could not be missed, and, in one who had not received the special training of a school Rabbi, it was profoundly impressive. When the people heard His first sermon in Capernaum, "they were astonished at his teaching: for he taught them as having authority, and not as the scribes" (Mk 1<sup>9</sup>). The source of this authority lies in the quality of His mind, which directly sees things Divine. His teaching is not the issue of a dialectic process; it is of the nature of a report, and implies that the Teacher lives in a habitual intercourse with God, such as no other man ever enjoyed (Jn 3<sup>3</sup>). His authority, therefore, is His own absolutely. He quotes no other Rabbi, leans on no human opinion, however sound and wise. More amazing still, He does not use the formula which marks the supernatural authority of a prophet, "Thus saith the Lord." For this He substitutes the simpler, more astounding phrase, "I say unto you." He speaks at all times with the same absolute conviction and consciousness of His Divine right. There is majesty in His least utterance, and it is nowhere more easily recognized than in the unparalleled record of the Gospel according to St. Mark (Swete, Studies in the Teaching of our Lord, p. 64). Many men have been intoxicated by their own conceit; but the swelling vanity of their time has rarely been detected. When Jesus employs the note of authority, He is simply being true to His own inner consciousness, which, to its inmost core, is clear, genuine, and reliable.

(3) The originality of the teaching.—It would be a mistake to attribute to Jesus the independence of a mind which excluded all possible sources of information or instruction, and operated only in a medium of its own imaginations or conceptions. Relations may be traced between the teaching of Jesus and ideas which found judgment in other minds than His; yet His originality is not thereby infringed. Thus, for instance, His teaching was couched in the terminology and in the forms of thought common to the religious teaching of His day. A parallel might easily be drawn to illustrate this (cf. Studies in the Teaching of our Lord, p. 71 ff.). This, however, in no way lowers the value of the teaching of Jesus. Ideas are not necessarily valueless, because found in Rabbinical theology. By taking them up into His larger and loftier thought, Jesus has placed upon them the stamp of His authority. The central idea of the teaching, moreover, is not borrowed from contemporary thought. The spirituality of the Kingdom of God is Jesus' special contribution to the religious life of His day. This conception is all His own, and is the organizing power of all His teaching. Attempts to set aside certain parts of His teaching as derived from external sources, and as being, therefore, of no permanent value, wreck themselves upon the fact that He was certainly no eclectic, and that His teaching has none of the features of a patchwork. His originality consists in the synthetic, transforming power of His mind. Again, His teaching is not independent of, rather it is rooted in, the O.T. He Himself repudiated the idea that He was breaking with the religion of Israel. He does claim, however, to "fulfil" the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>).

Law and Prophets, which are not to be done away, but to be fulfilled. (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>) is an equivalent to the O.T. laws as a whole, and stands, in its ethical and spiritual qualities, as the utterance of the Divine mind regarding the relation of God and man. This, therefore, is the inmost core of the teaching. One thing is plain, it is to be preserved as such, to remain and develop. "We are not to waste down the implicit idea. Who are authorized to give the new treatment of the Divine thought, and carry to completion the eternal purpose? Through the teaching of God, which is His own purpose. How He speaks finally and fully, His spokesman can be none other than His own (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>).

Once more, the originality of Jesus appears most strikingly in the fact that He traces all His teaching to His Father (Jn 7<sup>16</sup>). The very refusal of the claim to be independent of God is itself a claim of the most stupendous kind. He whose words and deeds are entirely the speaking and acting of God in Him, between whom and God there is complete intimacy and uninterrupted reciprocity of thought and purpose, stands apart from all human teachers, even the most brilliant and the most original. His teaching is not His own. It is the message of Another, even of Him who sent Him to carry it to the human race.

(4) The future of the teaching.—Teachers die; their great thoughts perish not. Socrates passed from the marketplace; but Plato and Aristotle, those real Socrates, took up the threads of thought, and wove them into systems which have dominated the intellectual world ever since. It is noticeable, however, that this has not been the history of the ideas of Jesus. He uttered them, and then passed from the scene of His labours. But no disciples took them and expanded them into a system. No philosophical or theological system today can claim to be His. He Himself predicted a much more remarkable future for His teaching. He would have a successor, indeed, but not St. Peter with his vigour, or St. John with his speculative gift. The successor of Jesus in the teaching office is none other than the Spirit of God (Jn 14<sup>16</sup>). He will take the thoughts of Jesus and unfold their meaning, and apply their vitalizing power to the questioning of all successive generations of men, till, finally, all uncertainties are resolved in the light of the eternal day. It is certain that He who "sat thus by the well" and talked with a woman, who preached in synagogues, and taught in the Temple, had this consciousness of Himself as initiating a teaching which was destined to continue, through the power of the Spirit of God, unfailing, imperishable, and indefeasible. In respect of this also, Jesus stands apart from and superior to all other teachers of men.

2. Legislator.—Jesus is more than a teacher, whether of the type of a Jewish Rabbi or of that of a Greek philosopher. The disciple band is more than a group of docile souls, who may be expected to assimilate and propagate the ideas of their Master. The analogy of the Schools fails to give us a true point of view. He has before Him the Kingdom of God, which has existed throughout the past ages of Israel's history, and is now about to pass into a new stage of realization. He speaks, accordingly, not so much in the character of a commentator of new ideas, as in that of a legislator laying down principles upon which the community of God shall be built or rebuilt, delivering laws which shall guide it in its future history. The tone of Jesus is not that of a prophet who, standing within the Kingdom, a member of it, like those whom he addresses, speaks out of the circumstances of his age, and addresses to his fellow-citizens words of warning, of counsel, of rebuke, and of hope. Jesus stands consciously on a far higher platform, and does not claim Himself with those whom He addresses, as though He and they bore the same relation to the Law. They are not His fellow-citizens. They are His subjects, citizens of the community of which He is head and lawgiver. The laws of the Kingdom He promulgates by His own personal authority. Six times in the Sermon on the Mount He sets aside that which was spoken to them of old time, and substitutes a rule of His own. In doing so, however, He is no mere revolutionary. He is taking the inner spiritual principle of the old

Law, and liberating it from the restrictions which had protected it in the time of man's pupilage. After the same manner He interprets and applies the Sabbath law (Mk 2:27, 28). In dealing with per-versions of the Law He is still more peremptory and drastic; e.g. as to fasting (2:18, 19) and ceremonial purification (7:2). The consciousness of One who thus legislates for the Kingdom is not that of a prophet, not even of the greatest of the prophets, who was God's instrument in the first founding of the community, and received the law at His hands. It is rather that of One in whom God comes to His people, who is the Divinely appointed King in Israel, whose relation to God is closer than any mere man's can be, who speaks, therefore, with the very authority of God Himself.

3. Messiah.—The sense in which Jesus claimed the title of Messiah is certainly not to be gathered from any views regarding the Messiah entertained by His contemporaries. The clue is to be sought in Jesus' attitude towards the OT. (a) He regards the OT as a unity. Critical questions are not before His mind, and upon them He pronounces no judgment. 'David,' 'Moses,' 'Isaiah' are simply terms of reference. What He does lay hold of is the unity of the revelation. One mind is revealed. One self-consistent purpose moves amid these varied scenes and ages. (b) He conceives the Divine purpose in the OT to be redemptive. The heart of the OT is union with God, the formation of a spiritual fellowship in which God is fully known and men enter upon the position and privilege of sons. In this connexion He preaches the Kingdom not merely as at hand (Mk 1:15), but as present in commanding power (Mt 12:28). Thus He appropriates to Himself as descriptive of His own work the picture language of Is 61:1-4. So also in the most solemn hour of His life, when He was on the verge of laying it down, He claimed redemptive efficacy for His death in accordance with the oracle of the new covenant (Mt 26:28, Jer 31:31). This was central in the consciousness of Jesus. An eschatology, no doubt, He had; but it was subordinate to the spiritual conception of redemption, and represented in terms of current thought the consummation of redemption in the world to come. Messiahship, accordingly, meant for Jesus the vocation in which the redemptive purpose of God, which had been growing to completion through the history of Israel, would be fulfilled. We can understand, therefore, how unwilling He would be to receive such a title, when its meaning in the minds of those who used it differed widely from His own conception of it; how glad He would be to accept it when it was applied to Him, not because of His supposed fulfilment of popular requirements, but in spite of His obvious non-fulfilment of these demands; and how careful He would be to train those who clung to Him as Messiah in the apprehension of His own transformed idea of it.

The passages which may be adduced as proof of the Messianic consciousness of Jesus all exhibit His own interpretation of Messiahship, as the calling of the agent of a Divine work of redemption.

(1) The Baptism.—(For discussion of Baptism and Temptation, see art. CHARACTER OF CHRIST, p. 285 f.) This is evidently much more than installation into a prophetic office. It was the solemn acceptance by Jesus of the vocation of Messiah interpreted with reference to the taking away of sin. For such an office, a personal rank superior to that of all other men, and a personal endowment of the Spirit in a measure which no other man could receive, were essential.—(2) The sermon at Nazareth. Here the Messianic era is described in terms of intense spirituality; and the Speaker claims to be the Messiah in a sense which identifies Him with the Servant of the Lord (Lk 4:18-20).—

VOL. I.—51

(3) The reply to John the Baptist. To the question 'Art thou he that cometh?' He makes a reply which is at once an affirmation and an interpretation. He is the Messiah, not after a political sort, employing external or catastrophic instrumentality, but of a far higher order, employing means which reach to the depth of man's necessity (Mt 11:2-4, cf. Is 35:4-6).—(4) The estimate of John the Baptist. In Mt 11:10 John is the messenger of Mal 3 who prepares the way for Jehovah, or for the Angel of the Covenant, who is identified with Jehovah. In Mk 9:12-13 John is Elijah, the precursor of the Messiah; while in 1:2-3 he is identified with the 'voice' of Is 40:3. The implied claim on the part of Jesus which the Evangelist repeats, is to a personal dignity not less than that of One whose coming is, at the same time, the coming of Jehovah to His people.—(5) The threefold call of the disciples. The call mentioned in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 1:35-41) is necessary to render intelligible that which is mentioned first by the Synoptists (Mk 1:16-20, Mt 4:18-22, Lk 5:10, 11). The third call in the ordination to Apostleship (Mk 3:13-14) is the culmination of the series. Messiahship and Apostleship thus receive progressive interpretation. The Kingdom, the King, and high rank even like that of prince in a tribe of Israel, are all to be interpreted in a manner that confounds and contradicts popular theory.—(6) The answer to Peter. Into one moment of intense emotional strain and profound spiritual instruction are compressed (a) joyous recognition of faith's insight and grasp (Mt 16:7); (b) solemn illumination of the truth which faith had thus, with little intelligent apprehension, made its own (Mk 8:27-30). The Messianic calling has an aim which is reached through death and resurrection. He who is competent to carry out such a scheme does not stand in the same rank of being with other men. Jesus' doctrine of His person is never dogmatically announced. It is none the less, rather all the more, impressively taught, because He allows it to grow upon the minds of believers as an irresistible inference.—(7) It is significant that Jesus' claims to Messiahship become more explicit toward the close of His career. No doubt the explanation is that misapprehension was scarcely now possible. If He be—as He is—a King, it is through humiliation He passes to His glory (Mk 11:1-11, 15-19, 13:6, 14:61, 62, 15:2).

4. Saviour.—(1) Jesus' view of sin, in respect of its guilt, and power, and pollution, was the very gravest. Yet He did not hesitate to announce Himself as able to save men from an evil for which the OT provided no institute of deliverance. He forgave sin (Mt 9:9). He restored the outcast (Lk 7:48-50, 19:10). He died to make good His claims as Redeemer (Mt 26:28). This negative form of salvation, however, is not that upon which alone, or even usually, He dwells. He dwells rather on the positive aspect of salvation, and claims to be able to bestow upon men the highest blessing of which the OT revelation can conceive, viz. life. Not merely does He promise it in the future, but He bestows it in the present. He possesses life (Jn 5:26). He bestows life (6:27). His words convey life (6:28). Those who believe in Him are media of life to others (7:38). Life consists fundamentally in knowledge of God, and of Himself as the Christ (17:3). If we admit that the Fourth Gospel has reproduced the teaching of Jesus with substantial accuracy, it is impossible not to recognize the superhuman nature of Jesus' self-consciousness. The Jews might well strive with one another (6:2) as to what His words meant. They certainly conveyed a claim which no mere man could offer in his own behalf.

(2) There is only one possible response on the part of men to the Divine saving act, viz. faith, as personal trust. There can be no doubt that Jesus did require faith in Himself, and, in so doing, consciously stood toward men in a place that can be filled by God only. It is true that the words 'believe in me' occur but rarely in the Synoptics (Mk 9<sup>2</sup>, Mt 18<sup>9</sup>). But if they have not the phrase, they have the fact. In Beyschlag's well-known words, 'the conduct of those who sought His help, to whom He says so often "thy faith hath saved thee," is, at bottom, a faith in Christ.' So also, confessing Him (Mt 10<sup>22</sup>), praying in His name (18<sup>20</sup>), coming to Him and learning of Him (11<sup>28-30</sup>), are, in essence, religious acts. What is implicit in the Synoptics becomes explicit in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 11<sup>25</sup> 12<sup>26</sup> 14<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>1</sup>), in which cases the use of eis implies trustful giving up of self to the personal object of faith). Surely there is only one justification for the man who speaks in such phrases and adopts such an attitude toward His fellows, viz. that, human though He be, He consciously occupies a relation to God radically distinct from that which can be held by any mere man. Jesus accepted a worship that can be rendered to God only. Yet He never by a breath suggested that He was a rival to Jehovah in the faith and love of men. Whom, then, did He conceive Himself to be? Whom must they, who thus worship Him, believe Him to be, if they are to be free from the error of man-worship?

6. Worker of Miracles.—If we take the standpoint of monism, that there is only one substance, and only one set of laws appropriate to it, or that of dualism or parallelism, that spiritual and material facts belong to two distinct and incommunicable orders of being, we shall find it impossible to believe in miracle; and we shall condemn, as mistaken, Jesus' evident belief that He was able to seal His redemptive activities by works of super-human power in the realm of physical nature. If, however, we hold the theistic position, which Jesus Himself held, that between God and the universe there is neither pantheistic identification nor dualistic separation, but that God maintains constant contact with the world which He has made, and directs the activities of which He is the source, towards ends in harmony with His own nature, then we shall find it possible to believe in those interventions of spiritual power in the domain of physical nature, which we call miracle. The only question we shall ask—apart from that of evidence—is that of need. In a perfect universe there might be no need for miracle. In the universe as we know it there is abundant need. Redemption is needed, at once ethical and cosmical. The Kingdom of God is miraculous in its very nature. Miracles, therefore, naturally will attend its advent into the realm of time and space. They are altogether congruous with the mission of Jesus. They are 'signs' of the Kingdom, the characteristic 'works' of Him in whom the Kingdom comes. Such, in any case, was the conviction of Jesus. Before the forces of nature, and of the obscure spirit-world that borders on the physical, in presence of disease and death, He did not own Himself conquered. He bore Himself as Master, as One to whom God's universe lay open, so that its powers were at His disposal for the furtherance of the cause committed to Him. This commanding authority of His was an element in that impression of supernatural greatness which He made on those who came under His influence (Mk 1<sup>7</sup>, Lk 5<sup>9</sup>).

7. Creator of the New Israel.—The word ecclesia is but once heard on the lips of Jesus in its special significance; but the occasion is one of solemn import (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>). Peter has made his inspired confession, and Jesus makes reply, 'Thou art Petros, and on this Petra I will build my Ecclesia; and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it.' Those who heard could not fail to identify Ecclesia with Israel, as though Jesus had said, 'on this Rock will I build my Israel' (Hort, The Christian Ecclesia, p. 11). This claim has reference to the past. That community, which originated at the first Passover, which endured through the vicissitudes of Israel's history, which cannot be identified with the nation which has rejected Christ, is now rebuilt, or built, by Jesus in His capacity as Messiah. It has reference to the future. To the Ecclesia, or community of believers in Jesus, He gives the seals of the Supper and Baptism; to it He gives the commission to carry on His work; in it He promises to dwell by His Spirit. Regarding it He predicts that it will prove invincible in face of the powers of Hades. He, Jesus of Nazareth, undertakes to erect on the bed-rock of that group of loyal disciples a new Israel, a spiritual dominion which shall not pass away while time endures. It is vain to characterize a consciousness such as this as merely human. Jesus, in His own belief, stands above humanity, Revealer and Representative of the everlasting God, superior to the lapse of time.

8. Judge.—Our view of eschatology will depend on our conception of history. If we believe in the progressive accomplishment of a Divine purpose we shall anticipate a climax, in which the whole movement will be complete. In that case we shall not be able to set aside 'Messianism' as irrelevant to the essence of religion. Our Lord certainly regarded redemption as a process to be continued through a lapse of time, whose culmination would form the completion of the world's history; and, at the highest point of that culmination, He placed Himself. Amid the many difficulties, textual and other, which surround the eschatology of Jesus, it seems clear that He keeps close to the OT representations, without committing Himself to the details elaborated in later literature. In one all-important point, however, He modifies the OT representation; where the OT placed Jehovah, Jesus places Himself as Judge (Mt 7<sup>21-23</sup> 13<sup>36</sup> 41 16<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>31, 32, 31a</sup>, Lk 13<sup>25-27</sup>).

In the Fourth Gospel there is another judgment, one which belongs to the present time, and is carried out through the presence of the word of Christ (Jn 3<sup>17, 18, 19</sup>). This, however, is not inconsistent with a final judgment, but is rather its precursor; while the final judgment itself is not absent from the representations of the Fourth Gospel (Jn 12<sup>48</sup> 5<sup>27, 28</sup>; cf. 1 Jn 2<sup>28</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>).

Here, then, is the climax of our Lord's self-assertion. There is manifest in this claim a consciousness which we should pronounce insane were it not that of the humblest and sanest man the world ever saw. Nothing can warrant such a claim, nothing justify such a consciousness, save the hypothesis that Jesus had a higher being than appertains to men, and that, as arising from this constitution of His person, He had universal functions which none other than Himself could exercise.

ii. HIS SELF-DESIGNATIONS.—The claims of Jesus, accordingly, direct us to conclude that He believed Himself to be human indeed, yet at the same time One who was related to God, in the ground and origin of His being, as no other man could be. From this consciousness the functions He claimed relative to humanity must have been derived. It must have been on the ground of what He was, and knew Himself to be, in the inherent quality of His being, that He set Himself forth as called and enabled to do certain acts in and for mankind.

It was impossible for men to listen to His claims without inquiring as to His person. Nay, He Himself stimulated the inquiry, and displayed, if one may so say, an anxiety to know what men were thinking of Him. What help, if any, does He give us in seeking for an answer? It is certain that He will not give us definitions after the style of the creeds, or analytic descriptions in the manner of a modern handbook of psychology. The most, and the best, He can do for us, is to grant such unveilings of what was and must remain His secret, as shall enable us, under the requisite spiritual conditions, to know Him and to trust Him. Christ is not a proposition to be proved, or an object to be dissected. He is a Person to be known. By what names, then, does He will to be known? Among the titles or descriptive phrases by which He designates Himself, two are of supreme importance. The discussions regarding their meaning form a kind of register of the history of modern Christology. If the Person of Christ be the centre of the Church's faith, and the apprehension of it be the note of the Church's growth, these discussions cannot be expected to reach scientific finality. The titles stand for all that Christ means in the experience of His disciples, and their wealth of meaning is, therefore, too rich for our exegetical skill to tabulate.

1. The Son of Man.—Three questions are pertinent to our present purpose.

(1) Whence did Jesus derive the title?—It would not have been necessary to ask this question—the title might have been at once accepted as invented by Jesus Himself—were it not that a phrase, suggestive of it, occurs both in the later apocalyptic literature and in the OT, in unmistakably Messianic connexions. It is inconceivable that Jesus should have adopted this title, and not have meant it to designate Himself, as the personal realization of what was but vaguely suggested in the indefinite phrase of Dn 7<sup>28</sup>. We infer, therefore, that the title 'Son of Man, stood on Jesus' lips as equivalent to the title 'Messiah,' which He would not use unless and until His use of it could not be misapprehended.

The title, moreover, is not arbitrary or empty. It suggests the type of Messiah which Jesus believed Himself to be, and the kind of actions through which He intended to fulfil His Messianic vocation. The passage in Daniel, taken as a whole, turns on the contrast between two kinds of sovereignty—that which is won by brute force, and that which belongs to a being not brutal but human. But this is precisely Jesus' conception of His Messiahship, viz. a sovereignty to be won through service. There is another passage which ought not to be forgotten when we ask for the sources of Jesus' idea of the Son of Man, viz. Is 53. It may be too much to say that Jesus intended 'Son of Man' to be a synonym for 'Servant of the Lord,' though His use of the title in Mt 9<sup>2</sup> is significant. But it is certain that He filled the phrase 'Son of Man' with the contents of that other conception, and meant by 'Son of Man' to identify 'Messiah' with the Servant who, in the prophetic vision, passed through suffering to glory.

(2) How did He use it?—Let the relative passages be placed before us, as is done in Driver's great art. 'Son of Man' in Hastings' DB, and at once a twofold use reveals itself. One class of passages describes the work which Messiahship entails upon Him, His manner of effecting it, and His relation to those for whom it is done. It is a redemptive work; it is performed in lowliest service and profoundest suffering; its motive is deep, true sympathy with men in their needy condition. The other class contains references to the sovereignty which is now hidden by the lowliness, though in no sense inconsistent with it (Mk 10<sup>42</sup>), which, when the ends of humiliation are achieved, will be demonstrated in the face of the universe. Together these passages set forth a Messiah whose work is the redemption of men, through a life of service and suffering, and a death which has in it the quality of an atonement, a Messiah whose faithfulness to His vocation will be crowned with royal honours.

(3) What does He reveal as to His own Person in it?—The interpretation of the title as 'representative' or 'ideal' man is surely too modern to be an accurate reflexion of Jesus' own mode of thinking. We shall not be in error, however, if we read in the title Jesus' identification of Himself with men, His profound insight into their condition and His acceptance of it as His own. His taking upon Himself the griefs from which they suffer, and His achieving, in the depths of His suffering, their deliverance. The title, accordingly, sums up the relations in which Jesus stands to men. He touches human nature at every point. It is true He is sinless; but this fact, so far from hindering His perfect sympathy with men, is its necessary pre-condition. Just because He is sinless, His identification with men can be complete, and He can be to men what no other can be. He can do for men what not one of themselves can do. The fulness of His humanity distinguishes Him from all individual members of the race. He is not 'a man'; He is 'the Son of Man,' the kinsman of every man, the Head and King of redeemed and reconstituted humanity.

Here is a gracious fact, verifiable in the experience of every man who will yield his heart to this Saviour and Lord. This very fact, however, opens depths of mystery within itself. Who is He who is perfect man? What is the basis of this human oneness? It cannot be a Personality, limited as ours is, needing, as ours does, some bond beyond itself to connect it with God. He who can stand in this unique relation to men must stand also in a unique relation to God. See also art. SON OF MAN.

2. The Son of God.—This title, as Jesus used it or accepted it, is plainly derived from the OT, where it is applied to the theocratic people (Ex 4<sup>22</sup>, Hos 11<sup>1</sup>), to the theocratic King (2 S 7<sup>14</sup>, Ps 89<sup>26-27</sup>), and to the Messiah (Ps 27). The OT usage evidently is not barely official, but shows a growth in spirituality of connotation and in definiteness of application. It would be too much to suppose that any OT prophet clearly discerned the Divinity of the Messiah; but at least the prophetic vision catches sight of One who should stand in a spiritual relation to God closer than that which can possibly be occupied by any member of the theocracy. The title, accordingly, as it applies to the Messiah, does not express barely His office, but rather some quality of His person which is superhuman, and is the source of reverent awe in the minds of those who contemplate the thought of Him. There is a vagueness in it which excludes either a dogmatic definition of His Divinity, or a merely humanitarian view of His person. When it occurs in the NT, we cannot get rid of it by pointing out that it simply means 'the Messiah.' No doubt it means the Messiah; but it connotes that in the man who claims to be the Messiah which lifts Him above the level of mankind.

(1) We cannot draw any definite inference from the use of it by demons, or by Satan in the Temptation narrative. Probably, however, as the idea of the 'subliminal' sphere which engirdles our conscious life makes its way into psychology, men will be more likely to give weight to narratives which imply that between such unhappy beings and Jesus there existed mutual knowledge, and that He exerted over them a peculiar and direct authority. In that case the title on their lips would certainly be a description of the superhuman dignity and power which He possessed.

(2) *Neither can we base a doctrinal proposition on the expression used by the high priest (Mk 14<sup>61</sup>, Mt 26<sup>63</sup>), for the charge of claiming to be 'the Christ' did not carry with it the verdict of capital punishment. The addition 'Son of God' or 'Son of the Blessed' looks like a climax. In St. Luke's narrative (22<sup>66-71</sup>) the question, 'If thou art the Christ' (v. 67), is separated from the second, 'Art thou then the Son of God?' (v. 70), by Jesus' claim to Divine honours (v. 69). The impression made by the scene is that our Lord's judges understood Him to be claiming superhuman dignity. This claim they regarded as blasphemous, and it formed ipso facto the warrant of the death sentence.*

(3) Peter's ascription in Mt 16<sup>16</sup> has some doubt thrown on it by the absence of the clause 'the Son of the living God' from the parallel passages in Mark and Luke. Yet an argument based on omissions is precarious. St. Matthew had access to special sources. His version has the ring of genuineness; and it is to be noted that the benediction upon Peter is not found in Mark and Luke, where the ascription of Sonship is also awaiting. If, then, we may accept the genuineness of the saying, we cannot, indeed, attribute to Peter a doctrine of his Master's person which he could reach only through experience of the risen Christ; but, certainly, we note that he is far in advance of the momentary impression of Mt 14<sup>28</sup>. He cannot mean less than that He to whom he speaks is the Son of Jehovah, having an intimacy with Him possessed by no other man, revealing Him as no other can, not even the greatest of the prophets. Peter knows nothing of dogma, but he has flung the plummet of his faith far into the depths of his Master's being. In that moment of supreme spiritual uplift a revelation has been made to him which will carry him far in after days, of which the opening verses in Hebrews and the prologue to the Fourth Gospel will be no more than the adequate expression.

(4) When we turn to our Lord's own testimony as to His Sonship toward God, we are at once lifted high above the merely official aspect of the designation. In the Synoptic Gospels He never uses the title 'Son of God'; but His filial relation toward God is not for a moment in question. A son's devotion to his father, a son's utter trust in his father, a son's joyful intercourse with his father—all these, raised to an immeasurable degree, are the characteristics of Jesus' bearing toward God. If the phrase had never occurred in the OT, or fallen from any human lips regarding Him, none the less would any sympathetic view of the Figure portrayed have yielded the inference: Here is a man who in very deed is Son of God, in a sense to which no other man ever attained or could attain. The unique Sonship which Jesus knew Himself to possess gains express utterance in three great sayings (Mk 13<sup>32</sup> 14<sup>36</sup> [cf. Lk 23<sup>44</sup> 46] and Mt 11<sup>27</sup>). The first of these sets the rank of the Son in a more conspicuous light, because Jesus is disclaiming a knowledge which, on the supposition that He was God's Son, it might have been expected that He would possess. The second unveils the mystery of the Passion, the profound acceptance of the Father's purpose in the midst of a suffering which the Father Himself appoints. The third, with its strongly Johannine phrasing, brings Jesus and the Father together in unique mutual knowledge. The loftiest Christology lies implicit in these words; and, in the consciousness which they express, the invitation which follows, addressed to all the weary and heavy laden, promising them rest, can alone find its warrant. In the Fourth Gospel Jesus is represented as using the exact phrase, 'Son of God' (Jn 5<sup>25</sup> 9<sup>35</sup> 10<sup>36</sup> 11<sup>4</sup>). In one of these passages, however, there is uncertainty as to the correct reading, and in the others the possibility that the author may have imported into the narrative phraseology of later date, may be admitted. But the correlative terms 'the Father' and 'the Son' abound; and no reader of the Fourth Gospel, whatever his critical views or theological prejudices may be, doubts that the deep consciousness of Jesus, revealed in such utterances (e.g. 5<sup>18</sup> 10<sup>36</sup> 14<sup>14</sup> 17<sup>21</sup>), is that of a Sonship toward God which belongs to Himself alone of all the human race. Few, also, will be found to deny that the representations of the Fourth Gospel are not in excess of the portraiture of the Synoptic Gospels.

(5) The Divine attestation.—At the Baptism and the Transfiguration God solemnly attested the Divine Sonship of Jesus in words which reproduce the language of the OT (Ps 2<sup>7</sup>, Is 42<sup>1</sup>). It is needless to discuss the 'objective' aspect of the communication. In any case, the attestation was made direct to the consciousness of Jesus. The language is that of Messianic prophecy; but as it fell on Jesus' inward ear, it was not a mere certification of His Messiahship, but rather a gracious assurance of that which interpreted for Him Messiahship, and made its achievement possible, viz. a relation toward God which lay deep in His being, and was the primary element in His self-knowledge.

How, then, are we to conceive the Sonship of Jesus toward God? Let us avoid modern abstractions, which were certainly not present to the mind of our Lord, or to any of those who came under His influence and have recorded their convictions. In particular, let us not be coerced by the supposed contrast between 'ethical' and 'metaphysical,' and by the alternative, which some writers would force upon us, of regarding the Divine Sonship of Jesus as being ethical merely, or of imputing to Him a metaphysical Sonship which is an importation from Greek philosophy. Ethical the Sonship of Jesus undoubtedly was. It manifested itself in knowledge of God and love to God, together with trust and obedience and other lovely qualities and experiences. The Sonship to which believers in Him are introduced is of this type, and is marked by the same characteristics. He Himself claims them as His brethren (Mk 3<sup>35</sup>). But does this mean that He and they are of one class? Does His Sonship differ from theirs merely in degree? Is He unique only in the measure in which He realized the privileges of a filial standing, which, however, belongs to men simply as men? Is this the utmost impression that the whole portrait makes upon us? It certainly was not all that His Jewish auditors inferred from His self-witness. They declared that He was making Himself equal to God, and they would have killed Him for His blasphemy (Jn 5<sup>18</sup> 8<sup>59</sup> 10<sup>33-38</sup>). Were they mistaken? He does not say so.

His retort (10<sup>36-38</sup>) is no earnest disclaimer; rather is it a reassertion of His essential unity with God. Surely this is the impression we gain from the record, that along with His intense nearness to men, there is a note of aloofness from them as of a Being of another order. Surely there are qualities in His Sonship that are incommunicable to men, aspects of it which can never be found in theirs. Could any of them ever say, 'I and the Father are one?' Could it be said of any one of them, that 'to see him was to see the Father'? It is noteworthy, and ought to be final on this subject, that Jesus never classes Himself along with His disciples as if He and they were alike children of the Heavenly Father. He distinguishes Himself as the Son from all other sons of God (cf. Mt 6<sup>32</sup> 10<sup>29</sup> with 18<sup>35</sup> 20<sup>23</sup>). They become sons, He is the Son. The correlation between 'the Father' and 'the Son' is absolute, and excludes any other son of God from that unique and perfect fellowship. When we weigh these things, the distinction between ethical and metaphysical becomes meaningless. The Sonship of Jesus has an ethical uniqueness which carries with it essential relations to God. His self-witness carries us to equality of being with God. As 'Son of Man' means humanity in the broadest, truest sense, so 'Son of God' means Divinity in the deepest signification of the term, which will require for its statement and defence the utmost range of reverent thought, while yet it cannot be comprehended or set forth in any formula.

This is the self-witness of Jesus. He is a Divine Being. His life in time under the conditions of humanity is not His whole life. He has come from a sphere wherein He dwelt with God, a conscious Person in equality with God. He entered into this world to execute a purpose which involved His completeness with humanity, and a sympathetic appropriation of a complete human experience; He had before Him, throughout His experience as a man, His return to the abode which He had left, His regaining the glory which, for purposes of infinite love, He had laid aside. He knew 'that he came forth from God, and goeth unto God' (Jn 13<sup>3</sup>). These were facts which, in the nature of the case, could not be proved by any external evidence. Sympathetic hearts and open minds would be prepared for them. Narrow-minded, unspiritual, and prejudiced persons would reject them. The truth regarding His Personality stands or falls by His own self-witness: 'Even if I bear witness of myself, my witness is true; for I know whence I came, and whither I go.' Or, if another witness is wanted, there is Another who witnesses along with Him, even the Father in whom He abides (Jn 8<sup>12-19</sup>). Of a mode of being which He had with God antecedent to His earthly life He could not speak freely. Necessarily, He could not but observe the utmost reticence regarding it. Nevertheless, His recollection of it was continually with Him, and occasionally, in great moments, for example in conflict with His critics, or in communion with His Father (Jn 6<sup>22</sup> 8<sup>38</sup> 17<sup>24</sup>).

It will be said that this highest reach of the self-witness of Jesus opens out into sheer mystery; and attempts are continually being made to bring down the teaching of Jesus regarding Himself to the terms of mere humanity, with the view of making the record more intelligible, and making Jesus Himself more accessible to our imaginations. Such attempts wreck themselves through over-strenuousness of criticism and over-ingenuity of exegesis. Moreover, they defeat their own end. If Jesus is no more than man, the Gospel narrative is for ever unintelligible; and Jesus Himself remains behind in the past, at best a pathetic memory, at worst a mere enigma. The faith which regards Jesus as 'the only-begotten Son,' or 'God only-begotten' (Jn 1<sup>18</sup>), is a just deduction from the narrative of His life and from His own self-witness. It supplies, moreover, the explanation which is wanted for the whole representation as it is given not merely in the Fourth Gospel, but in the Synoptic Gospels as well. The humanity of Jesus, with its completeness and universality, could belong only to One who was Son of God as well as Son of Man. The Messianic redemptive work of Jesus, in its efficacy, as sealing the new covenant, could be undertaken and discharged only by One who was, and knew Himself to be, the Son of God.

C. THE WITNESS OF THE APOSTLES.—The disciples of Jesus, even when He was with them as their Master and Teacher, were not a mere school. They were a community, enjoying the unexampled privilege of fellowship with the most wonderful Personality which ever impressed itself on human souls. For a brief space, which must have seemed an eternity of pain, they thought He had left them. Then He astounded, rebuked, and blessed them by His risen presence. Thus the disciples were reconstituted as a community, the secret of whose unity and vitality was fellowship with the 'unseen yet living Lord.' This is their experience: Christ is risen; no hallucination, dream, or vision, but the Lord Himself as they had begun to know Him, and now know Him as they could never have known Him had He tarried through lapse of years in flesh among them. Now that He is risen they are less than ever a school; they are an Ecclesia, His Ecclesia, as He had said Himself (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>), a fellowship of human beings, the hidden source of whose privileges and gifts is fellowship with the ever present Saviour and Head. To Him they owed that 'loosing' from sin which the elaborate institutes of the OT had failed to accomplish (Rev 1<sup>5</sup>). From Him they derived that life which was the choicest privilege of the OT, but which could not be perfectly possessed till God was fully known (Jn 17). Christianity as it is presented in the NT is life in fellowship with Jesus Christ. Such an experience cannot be stationary. It must be a growth in the grace and the knowledge of Jesus Christ. The NT throbs and thrills with life, exultant, buoyant, hopeful; expanding, deepening, increasing in energy; not without weaknesses, relapses, defects; but ever correcting its faults, cleansing its stains, renewing its vitality through fellowship with Christ, who is its unfailing source. It is important to remind ourselves that the primary fact in the NT is an experience living and increasing; lest we be tempted to go to it as to a volume of philosophy, or a systematic statement of theology, demanding from it intellectual completeness, and feel proportionately disappointed if it provide not an answer to every question which may rise in our minds. Such a doctrinaire view, whether held by the destructive critic or the constructive theologian, is erroneous and misleading. The NT is experimental to its core, and is fundamentally a witness borne to Him with whom believers are united in an ever-increasing fellowship. 'That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you also, that ye also may have fellowship with us: yea, and our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ' (1 Jn 1<sup>3</sup>). When, accordingly, we approach the records of this testimony, we anticipate that the notes of experience will be found in it, viz. (a) variety, created by differences in the spiritual history of the individual writers, as well as by differences in the occasion and circumstances of their writing; (b) development throughout the whole period covered by the NT literature, the earlier stages being marked by attention mainly to the conspicuous activities of the risen Saviour, the later being characterized by a deeper insight into the personal relations of Christ to God and to man and to the world; (c) unity, fundamentally the same view of Christ being present in all the writings, earlier and later, inasmuch as all Christian experience, in its origin as well as in its progress, is rooted and grounded in the same almighty Saviour, the same exalted Lord. The witness may be briefly summarized as follows.

I. THE EARLIER CHAPTERS IN THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.—In the midst of much critical discussion of these chapters, it can scarcely be questioned that they reproduce, with substantial truth, the type of life and teaching in the primitive Church; and give us 'a Christology which must have come from a primitive source' (Knowing, Testimony of St. Paul to Christ, p. 171). How, then, did Peter and his associates preach Christ?

Three points seem plain. (1) They lay the basis of the gospel in the humanity of Christ. They do not grudgingly admit His humanity, as though it presented an intellectual difficulty; nor do they dogmatically insist on it, as though it had been denied by some Docetic scheme. They use His human name. They dwell on His human life and character. He whom they preach as the Christ is the Jesus of that historic past which is so fresh in their memories, so lovely in their hearts. Upon what He had been and done as a man, all that He now is and accomplishes is founded (22<sup>26</sup> 4<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>38</sup>).—(2) They set the fact of the Resurrection in the forefront of their preaching. That event carries the weight of the greatest doctrines of the faith. This is the message which conveys the glory of God's accomplished purpose of mercy: 'He is risen, we are witnesses' (23-29). The Resurrection is not merely the miracle of a dead man raised. It is a great historic act on the part of God, who hereby authenticates the mission and vindicates the claims of Jesus. It is not merely that Jesus survives a tragedy. Through death He passes to a higher seat than that of His father David, even the throne of the Divine Majesty (26<sup>6</sup> 52<sup>7-8</sup>). In doing this for Jesus, God did not take a mere man and make Him what a man cannot be, or set Him where a man could not breathe. Jesus is placed in the position which is His by right, to which His person perfectly corresponds. The earliest preaching is in complete harmony with Ro 14. The idea of pre-existence, though not explicitly stated, is one of the implications of this teaching, even as it is of the Synoptic portraiture.—(3) They apply to Him titles which describe Him as the fulfilment of the highest reach of OT prophecy, and carry with them, in some instances, a distinctly Divine rank of being: Messiah, in Jesus' own interpretation of Messiah and His mission (3<sup>14-20</sup> 4<sup>29-29</sup>); Lord (13<sup>24-26</sup> 10<sup>36</sup>), i.e. the OT name of Jehovah, which could be borne only by a Divine being, though, it may well be, the theological bearings of such ascription were not fully present to their minds; Prophet (22<sup>27</sup>); Saviour (31<sup>41</sup>); Prince (4<sup>27-28</sup>); Servant (31<sup>24</sup> 26<sup>20</sup>, cf. 52<sup>23</sup>); with evident reference to the Servant of the Lord in Deutero-Isaiah; Holy or Righteous One (27<sup>31</sup> 28<sup>24</sup> 34<sup>7-8</sup>); Son of God (40<sup>9</sup>), a title used in this place only, yet significantly, as a current description of preaching the gospel.—(4) They dwell on certain present functions and activities, exercised by the exalted Saviour. He bestows the Spirit (23-29). He grants the forgiveness of sins (28<sup>28</sup> 31<sup>51</sup>). He operates in miracles of healing (31<sup>41</sup>), the condition on the human side being faith in His name. He is the Source of Salvation (41<sup>2</sup>). To Him, therefore, the preachers invite their hearers to come. They insist, however, on repentance, not merely of sin in general, but of the specific guilt of His death (3<sup>12-15</sup>), and they require faith as an act of personal trust in Him (3<sup>16-17</sup>). They announce His return, at the completion of the Messianic period, for judgment (3<sup>18-19</sup>). This announcement gave a distinctive character to the preaching; and rendered it not so much 'an argument as to certain truths, as 'the proclamation of a message' (8. Mathews, The Messianic Hope in the NT, p. 145). None the less it bore, as its heart and centre, the truth of the Lord's superhuman personal dignity.

The Divinity of Christ is not discussed by these missionary preachers. They are concerned with the facts regarding Christ, His power, His promises, His benefits. They do not unfold the doctrine of His person which is implied in their statements: their own conceptions of it were, probably, at a very early stage of development. They held and taught such things regarding Him as implied that conception of Christ which was set forth by later teachers. Those brethren who wrote at a later date, and more explicitly, were not moving away from the historic Christ. They were, rather, getting nearer to Him, and seeing Him more clearly, than had been possible to those who bore their witness at an earlier period.

ii. THE MINOR CHRISTOLOGIES.—Some NT writings have scarcely advanced beyond the point of view of the Acts. They are mainly occupied with the saving functions of the Messiah, and do not enter deeply into the consideration of His Person. With respect to the simplest of them, however, it remains true that the place of Jesus in religious experience is central and supreme. He is the object of faith, the source of every spiritual blessing.

1. James.—His Epistle has sometimes been undervalued as though it were little better than Jewish-Christian. We may content ourselves with Hort's more generous estimate: 'Unlike as it is to the other books of the NT, it chiefly illustrates Judaistic Christianity by total freedom from it' (Judaistic Christianity, p. 151). We may refer also to Dr. Patrick's recent volume, James, the Lord's Brother, p. 98 ff.

The doctrinal scheme of the Epistle is very simple, and deeply religious. God is the absolutely good One (1<sup>5-17</sup>). Man is made in His image (3<sup>9</sup>), and is meant to be separate from the world (1<sup>2</sup>), and wholly given up to God (1<sup>18</sup>). Sin is the forsaking of this allegiance, and the choice of the world instead of God, and leads to death (1<sup>14-15</sup>). For men, under the power of sin, deliverance lies in the act of God, who quickens them into a new life. This He effects by His word (1<sup>18-21</sup>); and this word comes through the mediation of Christ, by whom the old law is transformed into a new law, a royal law, a law of liberty (2<sup>8-12</sup>). Christ, accordingly, is the Saviour to whom we owe our salvation. He is the object of saving faith, which we must not belie by any inconsistent life (2<sup>1</sup>).

To St. James, as to all Christians, Jesus is also Lord, ranked along with Jehovah in honour and dignity (1<sup>1-2</sup>). To Him belongs 'the honourable name' (2<sup>7</sup>). He will shortly come for judgment (5<sup>8-9</sup>). Dörner's summary is borne out by the whole Epistle: 'Both in soteriological and in Christological form, James acknowledges the absoluteness of the Christian religion' (System, vol. iii, p. 159).

2. The First Epistle of Peter.—There is distinct advance in this Epistle beyond the statements in St. Peter's speeches reported in the Acts, though even yet the Christology is not so rich and full as in St. Paul or St. John. The sinfulness of Jesus is clearly stated (1<sup>19-22</sup>); and this gives an impression of the Personality of Christ which is inconsistent with a merely humanitarian view of His person. The death of Christ, which had once offended Peter, but which in his preaching he had declared to be part of Messiah's redemptive work, he now glorifies in as the ground of salvation, and he describes it in its atoning efficacy with rich variety of phrase—covenant blood (1<sup>2</sup>), ransom (1<sup>18-19</sup>), sin-bearing (2<sup>24</sup>), substitution (3<sup>18</sup>). One who ascribed such efficacy to the death of Christ must have taken an exalted view of His Person. Lordship in the usual Christian sense is ascribed to Him (1<sup>3-2</sup> 3<sup>18</sup>). Sonship toward God is implied in 1<sup>6</sup>. Resurrection, exaltation, supremacy have their wonted place in St. Peter's thoughts, as in all Christian faith (1<sup>3-2</sup> 3<sup>21</sup>). The wording of 1<sup>3</sup> and 1<sup>20</sup> scarcely allows us to regard these passages as distinctly teaching a personal pre-existence of Christ, although such an interpretation of them is certainly legitimate, and is, besides, much more characteristic of St. Peter's non-speculative cast of mind than the ideal pre-existence which is held by some interpreters to be the meaning. In any case, Christ is to St. Peter a Being far more than man or angel; and this means, since the thought of a demi-god is impossible to a Jewish monotheist, that St. Peter placed his Lord side by side with Jehovah, sharer with God in Divine rank and worship. This he did with the memory full and clear within him of his Master's human life. That St. Peter, who so often spoke frankly and plainly to Jesus, and once rebuked Him and once denied Him, should have come to adore Him as Divine, is a fact most wonderful, and fraught with far-reaching consequences.

3. Jude and 2 Peter.—In these brief and, from many points of view, difficult writings, there is no Christological discussion. Both Epistles, however, assume the Lordship of Christ, and look forward to His coming as Judge. In 2 P 1<sup>1</sup>, He is conjoined with the Father as the object of religious knowledge; and in the previous verse He is described as 'our God and Saviour Jesus Christ.'

4. Apocalypse.—Whatever view we take of the composition of this book, the key to which has so long been mislaid, there is no doubt that its pages glow with the glory of Jesus. It contains abundant recollections of the human life of Jesus (e.g. 1<sup>9</sup> 22<sup>6</sup> 21<sup>14</sup> 11<sup>5</sup>). It is the exalted, glorified, victorious Lord, however, who chiefly fills the seer's gaze. To Him the writer desires the eyes of the persecuted Church to turn, that she may be certified of her vindication and reward at the hand of Him whom she adores.

He is included in the sacred Threefold source of blessing (1<sup>4-6</sup>). The radiant figure of the vision in 11<sup>2-3</sup>, whose self-designations are 'the first and the last' and 'the Living one,' to whom belong 'the keys of death and of Hades,' is no mere earthly Being who has undergone apotheosis. He is a Divine being, who came out of eternity, entered into time, and on earth suffered and died, and now, within the unseen world, lives and reigns as God; who, also, will one day return for judgment (14<sup>14-15</sup> 22<sup>8</sup>). He is on the Throne (3<sup>21</sup> 7<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>5</sup> 22<sup>3</sup>). Worship is paid to Him as God (7<sup>9</sup> 21<sup>2-3</sup>). He is the Son of God, as none other can be (1<sup>5</sup> 2<sup>27</sup> 3<sup>2</sup>). He is a pre-existent and eternal Being (1<sup>17-18</sup> 3<sup>14</sup> 21<sup>6</sup> 22<sup>13</sup>); such is the interpretation which is required by these passages in view of the Christology of the book as a whole. See discussion in Stevens, pp. 538-540. To Him belongs the incommunicable Name (3<sup>17</sup> 19<sup>13</sup>). It is impossible to exaggerate the significance of the adoration of Jesus which pervades all the NT literature, and is so intense and sincere in this book. 'Although the writer is plainly a Jew of Jews, his mind saturated with Hebrew literature and Hebrew modes of thought, a true son of the race with which monotheism had become a passion, and the ascription of Divine honour to any other than the supreme God a horror and a blasphemy, he nevertheless sets Jesus, the man whom he had known in the flesh, side by side with God' (G. A. Scott, The Book of the Revelation, p. 27).

The NT books are not efforts of solitary thinkers evolving schemes out of their inner consciousness. The Christian Ecclesia, the fellowship of Christ, the communion of saints lived by such thoughts and spiritual activities as these. Its members knew nothing of the subtleties of post-Nicene Christology; but they knew Jesus, the Lamb of God, who died for them, the Living Lord in whose right hand were seven stars, who walked amid the candlesticks.

iii. THE CHRISTOLOGY OF ST. PAUL.—
Amid the manifold discussions of this topic, three positions seem to be attracting to themselves an increasing volume of consentient opinion.
(a) St. Paul's Christology is the outcome of his experience,

He had seen the Risen Christ. The simplest, most obvious, interpretation of 1 Co 9:15<sup>29</sup> is surely the truest. Attempts to assimilate St. Paul's sight of Christ on the road to Damascus with ecstatic experiences, which he also records, betray, by their very ingenuity, the a priori assumption that a fully objective revelation of the kind alleged is impossible. St. Paul's sight of Christ was of the same nature as that by which the faith of the Eleven was first established. If the 'vision hypothesis' does not do justice to the facts in their case, neither will it account for the sudden and complete revolution which took place in the life of St. Paul. That he had seen the Risen Christ, in the same sense, with the same convincing 'objectivity', as St. Peter had seen Him, is the source of Paul's authority as an Apostle. It is the source, also, of his Christian faith. It warrants the utmost and the greatest which Paul can ever say regarding the wonderful being of his Lord. From that date, the hour when he heard the words 'I am Jesus,' he had been 'in Christ.' Christ had been a present reality to him, and out of his fellowship with Christ had come every grace of his character, every privilege of his soul, every activity of his career. "That I may know him" (Ph 3:10) is the passion of his life, and his so-called 'Christology' is not a philosophy of the 'logos,' or 'stavros,' or any other type. It is the testimony he bears, incidentally, as the needs of his converts demand, to the Christ whom he knows.

(2) St. Paul's conception of Christ does not stand wholly apart from the views entertained by the primitive Church. His experience, remarkable as it was, did not differ in kind from that of other believers. The Church was from the beginning a fellowship with Christ. Every member of it is united to Christ by faith. There were others who had been 'in Christ' before St. Paul had gained that blessed privilege (Ro 1:6). The knowledge which he possessed of Christ was common to the fellowship of believers, and had been theirs while Paul was raging against the Church in persecuting fury. In fact, it was precisely the lofty claims advanced by the disciples of the Nazarene on behalf of their Master, which called the young zealot to destroy a movement which he saw clearly was an invasion of the supremacy, not of Caesar, but of Jehovah. When, in later days, he himself is glorying in the lofty attributes and Divine dignity of Christ, he is well aware that he is setting forth no novelties, is speaking out of the fullness of a personal knowledge possessed by his readers as well as by himself. Dr. Sanday's words, commanding on 1 Th 1:1, are most memorable: 'An elaborate process of reflexion, almost a system of theology, lies behind those familiar terms.' Dr. Knowling's weighty and balanced statement ought to be borne in mind by every student of St. Paul's thought: 'The evidence to be gathered from the Apostle's own writings is not to be judged as if it was only of a reflective character upon the events of the life of Jesus seen through a long retrospect of years; in some particulars it carries us up to the earliest period of the existence of the Christian Church; in other particulars it is plainly incidental, it is used as occasion demands, and it justifies the inference that it has behind it a large reserve of early teaching and tradition' (Testimony, etc., p. 211).

(3) To say that St. Paul's Christology is more developed in his later Epistles than in his earlier, is only to note the fact that his personal acquaintance with Christ grew richer as the years of his inner life and of his missionary activity passed over him. But this advance was not determined by accretions from without. He had not to wait till theological speculation suggested it to him before he ascribed the loftiest, most comprehensive position and dignity to Christ. Such ascription belongs to his earlier as well as to his later writings. Prof. Bacon has strongly emphasized the presence of Paul's later thoughts 'in a partly developed form in the earlier Epistles' (Story of St. Paul, p. 208); and Dr. Knowling's great work, already referred to, is largely devoted to an illustration of this fact (e.g. pp. 48, 90f., 206, 211f., 502).

4. Christ in His relation to God.—(1) He is a Divine Being.—St. Paul is an OT believer, utterly removed from polytheism, and wholly incapable of believing in demi-gods. He is not a Greek philosopher; impersonal abstractions or principles have no meaning for him. He of whom he speaks is 'Christ,' which with St. Paul is a proper name, the official designation being lost in the personal appellation. If, then, he ascribes to Christ the qualities which a Jewish monotheist, a member of the Old Covenant, attributed to Jehovah, he can mean nothing else than that this same person, Jesus Christ, is a Divine Being, equal with God and one with God.

(2) He attributes Lordship to Christ (2 Co 4:6); and uses the title 'Lord' habitually in connection with the historic and personal names 'Jesus' and 'Christ.' It is no courtesy title; it is used in the sense in which the LXX uses it of God, and it has the connotation of Godhead. Passages of the OT, accordingly, which belong to Jehovah are applied to Christ (Ro 10:15, 1 Co 10:2). To the Lord, therefore, as to God, worship is offered, and prayers are addressed by St. Paul and by all Christians (2 Co 12:1, 1 Co 13, Ro 10:13). (3) He designates Christ as 'the Son of God.' The teaching of St. Paul on this subject is in harmony with the other NT representations.

Believers in Christ enter upon the status of sons of God, and St. Paul even calls them sons, while St. John uses only the term children. But among such sons of God Christ is not one. He stands alone. They become sons. He is the Son (Ro 8:3, Gal 4:7). This Sonship is the very essence of Christ's being. It means Divinity in the fullest sense, in most complete reality. St. Paul testifies to the Divinity of Christ while fully recognizing His humanity. On one side of His being He is linked to humanity; and St. Paul has ample knowledge of the facts of Christ's human life, and shows no want of interest, and still less any reluctance, in referring to them. How should he, when it was his main business as a missionary to prove that this very Jesus was the Son of God? On the other side of His being, Christ possesses Godhead as the only Son of the Father. Of this Divine Sonship the Resurrection is declaration and proof (Ro 1:4). St. Paul's Christianity centres in this Divine Sonship of Christ (Gal 2:20, Eph 4:13). It was no invention of his brain, no borrowing from pagan adulation of the Emperor. It was the centre of Christianity as such, and belongs to the very earliest period of which we have literary record, being implied in 1 Th 1:1. The faith in Christ as Son of God is the differentia of Christianity. They are Christians who think of Jesus Christ 'as of God' (et rei deo), and so thinking they name Him, as St. Paul did, 'God' (Ro 9:5).

(2) He is one with the Father.—The relation of the Divine Christ to the Godhead became an insoluble problem for subsequent thought. Let the presupposed conception of God be abstract simplicity and unity. Let Him be conceived as Pure Being, Pure Form, Pure Thought, the Idea, or Substance. Then let the claim be advanced on behalf of a historic person that he is God. The result will be a problem which, in the nature of the case, must be insoluble. With such a Deity, the Divinity of the historic Christ is utterly incompatible. Christ must be lowered to the rank of a demi-god, or He must be etherialized into an impersonal principle.

Suppose, however, that God be differently conceived; in that case the claim of Divinity advanced on behalf of one who lived a human life may not lead to intellectual impossibilities. It is certain, however, that neither St. Paul nor any other NT writer held any such speculative idea of God as was prevalent in Greek Philosophy. To the men of the NT, God was the God of the OT, the living God, a Person, loving, energizing, seeking the accomplishment of an everlasting purpose of mercy, the satisfaction of His own loving nature. When, accordingly, the facts of the character and claims and resurrection of an historic person compelled them to recognize Him as Divine, they were constrained greatly to enlarge their thought of God; but they were saved the labour of stretching a logical formula to cover facts wholly irreconcilable with it, for the simple reason that no such formula had any place in their thoughts. They set the Divine Christ side by side with the Divine Father, and thus found a manifoldness in the being of God which did not destroy its unity. St. Paul, therefore, includes Christ in the Divine circle (1 Th 3:13, 2 Th 2:17, 1 Co 8:6, 2 Co 13:14). 'Abstract monotheism' has ceased, and has been 'replaced by a Theism which finds within the one Godhead room for both Father and Son' (Fairbairn, Place of Christ, p. 308). Perhaps it would be more correct to say that the monotheism of the OT was never abstract, because the God of the OT was never a conception, or a substance, but always a Person. Personality, indeed, has never the bare unity of a monad. It always makes room for distinctions; and reaches its greatest wealth of meaning in the fellowship of person with person. Between an abstraction and a historic person there can be no unity. Between two historic persons there may be unity of the profoundest kind. St. Paul, moreover, is not thinking of a mere quantitative equivalence between the Divine Christ and God. He is true to the conception of Sonship. The relation of Christ to the Father is that of a real son, including dependence and subordination (1 Co 3:11, 15:28-30). To the Son, as reward of obedience, is given a glory and a fullness which enable Him to fulfil His mediatorial function (Ph 2<sup>6-11</sup>, Ro 14<sup>9</sup>, Col 1<sup>13</sup>). This, however, in no sense lowers the Divine being of the Son, or shuts Him out of the Godhead. The glory He had with the Father from eternity, and the glory gained as He returns to the Father, are not inconsistent. Without the former, indeed, the latter would be impossible.

2. Christ in His relation to mankind.—(1) Pre-incarnate.—The Being who thus existed from eternity as God has affinities in His very nature with men. Had He been a demi-god, a tertium quid, the passage from Him to us and from us to Him would have been impossible. It may seem an ingenious plan to effect the union of God and man by inserting between them a being who is neither God nor man. Really, it makes the problem insoluble. St. Paul knows nothing of the supposed differences between the Divine and the human natures which make a tertium quid appear necessary to bring them together. God and man resemble one another in their constitution as personal beings. The problem at once of religion and of philosophy is to bring two persons together, not to force two disparate natures into an unreal unity. This problem, the problem of the human spirit, is solved in the Person of Christ. The heart of His eternal being is Sonship. He lives in a filial relation toward God, and upon the model of that relationship ours is formed (Gal 4<sup>4</sup>, Ro 8<sup>29</sup>). Our very existence depends on Him (1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>). What we are to be is determined by what He is (Eph 1<sup>20</sup>). The deepest relations of man to man find their guarantee in the relations in which He stands to God and to man (1 Co 11<sup>3</sup>, Eph 5<sup>22-31</sup>). Even before the fulness of time He was not utterly unconnected with the problem of redemption. So, at least, we may interpret the mystic utterance of 1 Co 10<sup>4</sup> ἡ πέτρα ἐστὶν ὁ Χριστός. This Rock, the fountain of life for the Church of the wilderness, was the Christ, not as an idea but as a person. Thus St. Paul conceives of Christ as existing in these past centuries, fulfilling the functions for the Church which then was, which He now fulfils for the new Ecclesia (cf. Jn 7<sup>37</sup>).

(2) Incarinate.—The Son is a real person, who conceives, purposes, acts. 'Before the foundation of the world' He had assumed the vocation of Redeemer, constrained thereto by the love which is the essence of the Divine nature. When the time comes, in God's discipline of the race, He takes up His task, which requires for its fulfilment incarnation, the complete identification of Himself with men in life and in death. In two pregnant passages St. Paul sets forth this deed of wonder, in whose depths thought and feeling lose themselves, Ph 2<sup>6-11</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>2</sup>. Three stages of the history of Christ are indicated, so far as human imagination can frame to itself a record so amazing:—(i.) A person, Divine in His being, enjoying the form and circumstance of Godhead, rich in the glory which is the manifestation of the Divine nature; cf. Jn 17<sup>5</sup>, He 1<sup>3</sup>. (ii.) This Divine Being surrendering that form and that wealth, assuming a form the most opposite conceivable, that of a servant, revealing Himself to men in their likeness, so that His humanity is no phantom, while yet it is not His by mere accident of birth, but is acquired in an act of will which extends to the assumption of man's condition as a sinner, exposed to sin's sign and seal, even death. (iii.) This same person raised from the dead, and receiving as a gift from the Father what He had not grasped at, namely, equality with God in form and circumstance, and the name which corresponds to that rank and honour, so that to this Being, known now through His humanity as Jesus, there should be rendered the worship of all intelligent creatures throughout the universe of God.

It is in connexion with the incarnate stage of Christ's career that the problem of the constitution of His Person presses most acutely. Questions press as to the relation of His Divinity to His humanity, of His knowledge as God to His knowledge as man, of His personality as a Divine Being to His personality as a human being, of His activities in the flesh to His contemporaneous activities in the Cosmos and in the circle of the Godhead. It is noteworthy that St. Paul does not discuss these questions, seems, indeed, to be scarcely conscious of them. He wonders and adores as he thinks of the love which led Christ to that stupendous sacrifice. He contemplates with delight and worship the Person of his glorified Lord, and throws his being open to the gracious influences of His Spirit. He has no other ambition on earth save to know Christ; but when he speaks of knowing, he means such spiritual intimacy as person has with person, and in particular a growing appreciation of, and entrance into, the power of Christ's resurrection, the fellowship of His sufferings, and conformity to His death (Ph 3<sup>10</sup>). But to dissect the Person of Christ, to lay out the Divinity on one side and the humanity on the other, and to discuss a communicatio idiomatum, does not lie within the four corners of Pauline thought. This fact may suggest the doubt whether questions such as the above are rightly conceived. They evidently proceed from the point of view of dualism, according to which one nature is contrasted with another; whereas Paul's views of God and of man and of the God-man, are all synthetic. Personal unity, and not logical dualism, is the key to the thought of St. Paul. Between God and man, there is the unity of moral likeness; between the Father and the Son, the unity of being and fellowship; between the pre-incarnate and the incarnate periods of Christ's experience and action, the unity of one continuous life; between Christ and those whom He saves, the unity of reciprocal indwelling.

(3) Post-incarnate.—Having become man, Christ remains human. In the Kingdom whose Lord He is, He is Jesus who was so named in His earthly life. Mediator between God and man, He is Himself man (1 Ti 2<sup>5</sup>). From Him, as the Head, life streams down to all members of the body (Col 1<sup>18</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>27</sup>, Eph 4<sup>12-13</sup>). In Him the members are 'complete,' receive fulness of satisfaction (Col 2<sup>10</sup>). In Him human nature finds itself raised to its highest perfection, hence in Him there can be none of the barriers that divide man from man (Col 2<sup>9</sup>, Gal 3<sup>28</sup>). This is the point of the comparison in Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup> and 1 Co 15<sup>45-47</sup> between the first Adam and the Second. In one sense Adam is the head of the race, in another the Risen and Exalted Christ is the Head, and from Him all life comes. This is the very heart of St. Paul's experience, and therefore also of His Christology. Christ is living. St. Paul presupposes the pre-existent Christ; his Christ could not begin to be in time. He is acquainted with the historic life through which Christ gained His glory. But that which St. Paul gazes upon with endless adoration is the Person of the Risen and Glorified Lord. Between the living Christ and him there is such union as surpasses power of language to express. Christ dwells in the believer in His complete human-Divine personality, and imparts Himself in growing fulness to the believer; and there is thus developed identity of experience and identity of character; which will ultimately be crowned by identity of outward condition (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>18</sup>, Ph 3<sup>21</sup>).

3. Christ in His relation to the Cosmos.—The intellect of the time was much occupied with speculations regarding the relation of God to the world. To Greek dualism this was really an insoluble problem. The gulf between God and the universe yawned impassable. The place of a solution was taken by a mythology of 'powers,' 'principalities,' and the like supposititious beings, who existed only in the jargon of the philosophical sects. On Jewish soil this mythology was changed into a hierarchy of angels. Wild as these dreams are, they represent a real need of thought and of religious experience. The problems of creation and redemption cannot be held apart. The creative purpose must include redemption, and redemption must have cosmic bearings. We cannot rest in a harmony with God which leaves the universe outside, unreconciled, possibly the abode of forces against which the redeeming agency would be powerless to defend us. St. Paul's view is that the universe has a part in the history of man. Injured by human sin, it will come to its completion when the children of God enter on their heritage (Ro 8<sup>21</sup>). Christ, the Redeemer of men, accordingly, is Lord of the universe. Nothing lies outside His gracious sway. The clumsy machinery of angels, or powers, or whatever these needless creations are named, is replaced by the one Person, who is the Agent of God alike in creation and in redemption (Col 1<sup>15-17</sup>). Christ, who is the manifestation of God, is of infinitely higher rank than all the creatures. All things, whatever their place and dignity, owe to Him their existence, and find in Him their goal. This exalted Person is also Head of the Church, and Agent in reconciliation (vv. 18-20). That is to say, the work of redemption can be accomplished only by One who is also the Creator. The Redeemer must be God absolutely, else there will be needed a Mediator for Him also. The Redeemer cannot have, in our apprehension, the value of God, unless He is God in His own proper being.

The testimony of St. Paul to Christ contains great heights and depths, but it exhibits no inconsistency with Jesus' self-witness. It is not a mosaic of Jewish and Hellenic elements. It is the product of experience, developed under the conditions of that Divine assistance which Jesus Himself described, Jn 16<sup>13</sup>.

iv. HEBREWS. — In this Epistle the Christian faith is defended against any attempt to belittle the person and office of the Redeemer. However glorious other agents of the Divine purpose might have been, 'this man' is more glorious by far in the dignity of His person and in the vastness and finality of His redemptive work. To Him, therefore, is applied the familiar Christian designation of Lord (2<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>20</sup>). The characteristic name applied to Him, however, is Son (1<sup>2</sup> 7<sup>28</sup> 5<sup>8</sup> 1<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>3</sup> 10<sup>20</sup> 4<sup>14</sup>). This title expresses His Divine and eternal being. The author of this Epistle follows the example of the Apostle Paul in describing the Christian salvation under the aspect of a history of the Son of God.

(1) The pre-existent state. — Not much is said on this mysterious topic. The NT writers are concerned to allude to it only in order that, in the light of it, the earthly life of Jesus may be discerned in its marvellous condescension as an act of self-sacrifice, and in order that His present position of equality with God may be intellectually credible.

In this pre-existent state the Son is the effulgence of God's glory, the very image of His substance (1<sup>3</sup>). Without formally discussing the question of the being of God, the writer has already surpassed any mere monadism. God is not bare abstract unity. With God there is One who exactly corresponds to Himself, who gives back to Him the glory which is His. Between Him and God there is perfect oneness. Between these two there is no room for a mediator. The functions of the Son in this state are not described further than to indicate that no department of the universe is outside the scope of His power (1<sup>3</sup>). There is no room, accordingly, for any being, other than the Son of God, to whom worship or gratitude is due.

(2) The incarnate life. — This writer, like the Apostle Paul, passes by all the questions, so abundantly discussed in later theology, as to 'two natures,' etc. His whole interest is concerned with the heart-subduing fact that the birth of Christ is the descent of a Divine Being from heaven to earth, the definite assumption by Him of a complete and true humanity (2<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>4</sup>). To this writer the humanity of Jesus is wonderful and glorious. A Being truly Divine has become man, and has entered fully into human experience. There is nothing human that is not His, sin excepted. Temptation, suffering, death—He passed through them all. All this He endured in pursuance of the vocation with which He entered humanity. Before Him lay His task. Beyond shone the glory. Not once, for so great a glory, would He evade one human sorrow. It was all wanted to perfect Him in His vocation (2<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>8-9</sup>). The resemblance to St. Paul's line of thought in Ph 2<sup>6-11</sup> is obvious.

(3) The exaltation. — The position of majesty which the Son now occupies is described in two aspects. (a) Its possibility is due to what He was in Himself, antecedently to His human experiences. He has been appointed heir of all things, both because He is the Son of God and because, through Him, God made the worlds (1<sup>7</sup>). He has sat down on the right hand of the majesty on high, because He is, in His very nature, the effulgence of God's glory and the very image of His substance. No being less than God, in His own person, could occupy such a place. (b) Its attainment is due to His discharge of His redemptive mission, and is of the nature of a reward for His fidelity. His present position presupposes His pre-existent place and function, and yet is distinct from them. It is that of King in God's realm of redemption.

Here, just as in connexion with the incarnate condition, questions arise which this writer does not discuss. 'The relation of this rule to the primary rule of God, or to His own primary upholding of all things by the word of His power, is not indicated' (A. B. Davidson's Comm. p. 78). It is enough for faith that, in the universe of being, there is no other power than that of the exalted Redeemer.

v. THE FOURTH GOSPEL. — St. John's Christology, like that of St. Paul, is the transcript of his experience. He makes plain his object in telling the story of the life of Christ (20<sup>31</sup>). Out of all the mass of material which his memory provides, he selects those incidents which may be most useful in proving to generations which had not the privilege of direct vision, that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. The principles of selection, and the insight into the meaning of words and deeds which are reproduced, are due to a lifetime of thought and communion, as well as to the continual illumination of the Spirit of Christ. St. John's conception of Christ is summarily set forth in the Prologue to the narrative (1<sup>1-18</sup>). No doubt these much-debated verses are meant to provide the point of view which the reader of the narrative is to occupy; but equally without doubt they do not present an idea, formed in speculation, and then employed to determine the narrative, to invent the incidents, and to create the discourses. The narrative, with the words and signs, logically precedes the Prologue, which presents us with the extracted meaning of the history. The Person portrayed in the narrative is One of whose history, in the wider sense, the earthly career is but a part. He had a being with God before He was seen on earth. He had a Divine mode of existence and exercised Divine functions, before He appeared as a man and wrought His deeds through human organs of action. At the set time He entered into humanity, and, through living intercourse with men, revealed to them the glory of His person, and interpreted for them the character of the invisible God. The remarkable feature of the Prologue is its use of the term Logos to designate Him whom the narrative leads us to know as the Son. It is certainly not the key to the narrative, which is to be read from the point of view of the Divine Sonship, which it reveals. It is not used in the narrative, though it reappears in the First Epistle of John. It is certainly not taken over from Philo, and intended to create a new religious philosophy. Probably its presence is to be explained, as are the references in St. Paul's letters, by the technicalities of prevalent philosophy or theology. Christianity appeared when the problem of the relation of God to the world had reached its fullest state. ment; when, also, the utmost that human thought could do had been done in the way of a solution. The last and most strenuous effort of human thought to meet the demand of the human spirit had found expression in Philo's Logos speculation, which owed its origin partly to developments of Hebrew thought as to the word and wisdom of God, and partly to ideas which had been the motive power of the whole history of Greek philosophy. It was not possible for Christianity to ignore the problem. Christianity is more immediately concerned with the problem of the redemption of man; but this cannot be dissociated from the wider problem of the relation of God to the world. The key to the one must unlock the other also. St. Paul and St. John, accordingly, take up the technical terms most in vogue, with whatever they stand for, and say in effect: 'What human thought has endeavoured to achieve by its machinery of angels or powers, or by its hypostatization of the Logos, has been accomplished in the Person of the Son of God. He is the life of the redeemed. He is the life also of the whole universe of God. There is but one purpose in creation and redemption, and that is summed up in Christ. He is the Logos.'

The term Logos, accordingly, is used by St. John to express the identity of Him whom we know as Jesus Christ, with the personal Wisdom and Power of God, who is God's agent in creation, who alone could redeem men, and who achieved this in the only way possible, by Himself assuming human nature, and dwelling for a space with men. The term, having served the purpose of presenting Christ as the goal of the immemorial quest of the human spirit for union with God, is not again employed in the Gospel.

It is not necessary to attempt here a detailed analysis of the Prologue (see Westcott's Com.; Dodds in Expos. Gr. Test.; and a valuable paper by Principal Falconer in Expositor, v. v. (1897) 222). The leading ideas are plain—(1) The eternity of the Logos (1. 2, cf. 17. 8<sup>8</sup>, 1 Jn 1). The Logos had a being coeval with God, and did not come into existence at a point in time, and therefore is not a creature. (2) The fellowship of the Logos with God. The Logos is personal, has a life of His own, which yet is directed toward God, so that He finds His life in God, and is 'in the bosom of the Father' (v. 18). (3) The Divine nature of the Logos, as identical in being with God, while yet distinct as a person. (4) The creative function of the Logos (v. 3, 10, cf. Col 1. 16, He 1. 2). (5) The revealing function of the Logos (v. 14). (6) The historical manifestation of the Logos (v. 14). (7) The incarnation of the Logos (v. 14, 16). This is the climax to which the Prologue has led up. This is the event of which the whole Gospel narrative is the record and description. The Logos, the same Being who had dwelt in the circle of the God-head, left the glory which He had with God (17), and, retaining His personal identity, became 'flesh,' i.e. became man, assumed human nature in its fullness, and dwelt among men as a man.

The problems with regard to the life of the incarnate Logos, which press so heavily on our minds, are not discussed by St. John any more than by St. Paul. He is wholly occupied with the glorious fact. It is amazing, but it has happened; and in that great event the whole purpose of God, creative as well as redemptive, has reached its consummation. Revelation is complete. No one can declare God save One who is God, and this is He, Jesus Christ, 'God only-begotten' (v. 18).

From the simple missionary preaching of the Acts to the high intense thinking of the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel is a long movement. It is a movement, however, not away from the facts, but toward their inward, spiritual, universal, and eternal meaning. This movement, moreover, has not been dependent on unaided human reflexion, nor are its results mere guesses or inferences. It has been conducted under the guidance of Christ's own self-witness and the illumination of Christ's own Spirit; and its conclusions express the wealth of Christian experience, and in experience find their ultimate demonstration.

Conclusion and Outlook.—A study of the character of Christ, and a close and reverent attention to His self-witness, compel the inference that His Person, completely and really human though He is, is not constituted like that of other men. It is to be admitted, however, or rather it is to be urged, that what the facts suggest and demand cannot be fully apprehended by any merely intellectual process whatever. What Christ is, in His own Person, can be known only by those who know Him; and personal knowledge has conditions which are not satisfied in any exercise of the mere understanding, however careful and exact. Such conditions are an attitude or direction of the human spirit, and an immediate operation, at once illuminating and quickening, of the Divine Spirit. When these conditions meet and interact, in that profound region where the Spirit of God and the spirit of man touch and interpenetrate one another, there is produced that knowledge of God and of Christ which our Lord describes as life. There is no other knowledge of Christ; and if Christology is supposed to be an intellectual process, governed by forms of discursive thought, and issuing in propositions for which is claimed the cogency of a logical demonstration, it stands condemned as being out of all relation to Christian experience. But this personal experience is knowledge of Christ. He is as really known in this spiritual fellowship as one human person is known by another, and is known more closely and fully than one man can be known by another. Christianity, accordingly, presents to the world the solution of its problem, the answer to its need; while, at the same time, it has before itself a constant problem, the answer to which it seeks, not with ever-growing weariness and sense of defeat, but with ever-renewed energy of faith and love.

1. The problem of the world, the more or less conscious and articulate demand of the human spirit, is, as we noted at the outset, union with God. This union is, primarily, personal—an ethical fellowship, in which God shall fully disclose His character, and impart Himself, to man; in which man shall freely open his being to the communications of God, and find in God his life and development. Such personal union, however, carries with it cosmical union also, or the harmonizing of all those differences from God which are implied in the existence of the created universe, and find their most acute expression in the self-assertion of man against God. The reconciling of man is the reconciling of all things. The solution of a problem, thus fundamentally personal, must be itself personal. Christianity, accordingly, met the problem of the early centuries, as it meets the same problem in the twentieth century, by the preaching of the personal Christ. He is the Son of God; and therefore, also, He is the Son of Man. In Christ, God is fully present; through Him, God is perfectly known; with Him, God is one. In Christ, human nature is fully realized in all that it was meant to be, both in respect of its complete dependence upon God and of its complete fulfilment of spiritual function. In Christ, accordingly, the history of creation is complete. He stands at the head of a universe reconciled to God. He is its reconciliation. Wherever the problem of union with God takes expression in concrete facts—in the sense of guilt in the individual conscience; in death, which closes human life with a pall of impenetrable darkness; in the antagonism of man to man, manifested in personal animosities, or the war of nation with nation and class with class—in facts whose gloom no pessimism can exaggerate; there, the knowledge of Christ supplies the solution. To know Christ is to be at one with God and with man. Christianity is thus both religion and ethic. It is an intense individual experience, which is the impulse of boundless social service. And when the same problem finds the precision and articulateness of philosophical expression—as it did, for instance, in that Neo-Platonism which had such strange affinities to Christianity while it was also its bitterest opponent; or as it does to-day, in that Absolute Idealism which, in some aspects, is the noblest ally of the Christian faith, and, in others, its proudest and least sympathetic rival—the key to its solution will still be found in the conception of a Personality at once Divine and human, a life lived under historic conditions, which was at once the life of God in man and the life of man in and through God. The words of the Master of Balliol apply to the present as well as to the primitive position of Christianity:

It contained implicitly the key to all the antagonisms of thought that had been developed in Greek philosophy—the antagonism of the material and the spiritual, the antagonism of the phenomenal and the ideal or intelligible world, the antagonism of the finite and the infinite, the antagonism of the temporal and the eternal. In a word, it contained in itself the principle of an optimism which faces and overcomes the deepest pessimism, of an idealism which has room in itself for the most realistic consciousness of all the distinctions and relations of the finite. (Evolution of Theology in the Greek Philosophers, vol. II, p. 363.)

2. The Incarnation of the Son of God is therefore the article of a standing Church. It is, at the same time, the abiding problem of a living Church. It is not, however, a problem which is suggested by one faculty to be handed over to another for solution. Faith does not receive Christ, and then appeal to intellect to tell us who He is, and how His Person is constituted. It has been the profound error of Scholasticism, both before and since the Reformation, to suppose that faith supplies a mass of crude amorphous facts and experiences, upon which the intellect exercises its analytic, systematizing genius, distinguishing, defining, separating, and then tying into bundles by means of formulae. The result of such a method, applied to the problem of the Person of Christ, is a Christology in whose dogmatic construction the living Christ of history and experience is wholly unrecognizable. The Reformation was the protest of Christian faith against this attempt to rob it of the personal Saviour, whom it appropriates, whom the believer knows directly and truly. Rationalism, however incomplete its constructive work may be, is nevertheless, as a protest against formalism, in harmony with the spirit of the Reformation.

The value of such a protest, however, will be greatly lessened if it lend colour to the supposition that our knowledge of Christ is confined to His benefits, while He Himself, in the secret of His being, belongs to some supposed noumenal sphere, inaccessible to human knowledge, so that it is impossible either to affirm or deny His Divinity. 'Hoc est Christum cognoscere, beneficia ejus cognoscere' is a proposition true if it mean that no one can know Christ who is not vitally one with Him, and therefore a partaker of His benefits; but certainly false if it mean that, beyond His benefits, there is a supposed substratum of being, about which nothing can be known, which may or may not be Divine (cf. Martensen, Christian Dogmatics, p. 63). Thus does the misapplied category of substance take revenge upon the critical method, which, while denying its validity, retains it as a kind of metaphysical phantom. To know the benefits of Christ, to live in fellowship with Him, to carry out His commission, is to know Himself. No shadow of unreality lies upon that knowledge, any more than it lies upon the knowledge we have of the friend whom we know better than we know ourselves. This does not mean, of course, that any believer, or the whole community of believers, now knows, or ever will know, all about Christ. Personality, even human personality, is a great deep; and the joy of friendship is the progressiveness which is the mark of personal knowledge. Much more is this true of the personality of Christ. Knowledge of Christ is boundlessly progressive; what more is to be known of Him than the Church at present apprehends, depends on those conditions belonging to the whole personal life which make any knowledge of Him possible. In short, the problem of the Person of Christ is presented by that faith, which is already knowledge, to that knowing power, which is simply faith itself, as it grows in apprehension of Christ. Christ is not divided; and there is no division in the faculty which apprehends Him, though the stages of its exercise and its acquisition advance endlessly from less to more. It follows that Christology, which is simply the reflective expression of the knowledge of Christ gained in actual experience, must not subject the fulness of its material to any form of thought borrowed from an alien sphere; or if, in the exigencies of a defensive statement, it uses loan-words derived from philosophy, it must never for a moment imagine that these explain or exhaust the living reality with which it is dealing. These words float, like derelicts, on the ocean of the Church's thought, and many a promising speculation has struck thereon and foundered. Especially ought modern Christology to be on its guard against that dualistic mode of thought, with the terminology which it employs, which is the damnosa hereditas bequeathed to theology by Greek Philosophy, the shadow of which fell upon Kant, and has not departed from the new Kantians of recent times. The task of Christology at the present day is to restate and to defend two certainties of Christian experience.

(1) To Christian experience, educated and informed by Scripture and by the Spirit of truth, Christ is known as God. The problem of the relation of the Divine Christ to the Divine Father is thus necessarily raised, and will not be evaded. If, however, the conception of absolute Godhead be modelled upon the forms of Greek dualism, the mystery becomes an insoluble problem, confounding thought and troubling faith. Within a Godhead conceived as abstract unity there is no room for the Divine Christ. The best that thought can do is to place the Son outside God, though as near to Him as possible. But this is straightway to deprive faith of its object, and to imperil the fact of reconciliation. The Church, accordingly, would have none of the Arian honorific titles applied to Christ on the presupposition that He was less than God, and would be content with nothing less than the substantiality of the Son with the Father. The term ὁμοούσιος, borrowed not without reluctance from philosophy, was probably inevitable, and served sufficiently to utter the Church's faith-knowledge of the true Divinity of its Lord. The danger lay in supposing that ὁμοία, or the category of substance, is adequate to express the infinite wealth of the Divine Personality, or, worse still, in directing men's minds to conceive of God as Substance rather than as Personality. From the baleful effects of this point of view, theology has not yet shaken itself free. The only category which can apply to the mystery of the relation of the Father to the Son is that of organic union, whose highest illustration is in the domain of personal life. There are deep and living relations which subsist between persons even within the human family. If one person not only may, but must live in another person in order to be a person, and if between these two there is such community of life that each finds his life in the other, and these two are not so much two as one, we may find ourselves on the verge of a greater mystery and a far deeper unity: the abiding of the Father in the Son and the Son in the Father, and these two, along with the Spirit of both, forming the One God of redemption and of creation. By such a path as this must Christology move to a fuller grasp of the truth, which the Nicene Creed asserted, but did not adequately or finally set forth,

(2) To Christian experience, maintained in fellowship with the living Christ, He is known as man. Faith apprehends Him as incarnate, i.e. as a Divine Being, who became man, entered into the sphere and conditions of human life, and passed through a complete human experience. Humanity, therefore, reaches its consummation in His Person; and human beings, divided though they may be from one another, find no impassable barriers between themselves and Christ. Christian experience, accordingly, is vitally concerned with the earthly life of Christ, as recorded in the Gospels. Docetism and Ebionism are both false to the conviction of faith. Between the Divinity and the humanity of Jesus Christ, faith finds no abstract opposition. Christ is known as at once Divine and human.

As soon, however, as faith seeks to make clear to itself its convictions, and to state and defend them in view of inquiry or attack, certain questions regarding the human-Divine life of the Lord inevitably arise.

(a) The problem of the origin of this life presented itself very early to the minds of those who had learned to see in Jesus Christ the Son of God. He is man, yet He is related to God as no other man can be. Is it possible that He could have come into the world, as other men do, as a child of a human father and mother? The answer to be found in two of the Gospels is that He did not; that the Holy Ghost came upon His mother, and the power of the Most High overshadowed her; that her Son had no human father. The truth of the narrative of the supernatural birth is challenged, in many quarters, on critical and on metaphysical grounds. In view of these objections, it ought to be freely admitted that the Incarnation might have taken place under normal human conditions. We are not in a position to determine a priori what course Infinite Power and Love shall take. It is impossible, therefore, to place the mode of the Incarnation, through a virgin-birth, on the same footing of religious or theological importance as the great fact of the Incarnation itself. If, however, from a study of the data, presented in the NT, i.e. from a consideration of the character of Christ, of His claims and self-witness, as well as of the testimony of His disciples, apart from the narratives of His infancy, we have arrived at the conviction of His unequalled and supreme greatness; and if we then return to a study of these narratives, we cannot fail to find in them an ethical purity and a spiritual fitness which command our glad acceptance. Their value for Christian thought lies in their providing a physical fact, correspondent to the conviction which a study of the person of Christ has wrought in us, viz. that He is not the product of a natural evolution from humanity, but is a Divine Being who has entered into the conditions and experiences of human nature.

The supernatural birth of Jesus is not our warrant for belief in His Divinity and His sinlessness. But belief in His Divinity and His sinlessness is our warrant for regarding the supernatural birth as being not merely possible or credible, but as being wholly congruous with the uniqueness of His personality, and, therefore, as serving as a welcome illustration and confirmation of the contents of Christian experience.

(b) In studying the record of the life of Christ, many questions arise in connexion with the relation of the Divine to the human aspects of His personality. Are not the notes of Godhead absoluteness, finality, completeness, independence of all the means by which human character is developed? How, then, are we to understand the evident facts of our Lord's life on earth, that He inquired, and learned, and was ignorant; that He passed through the stages of a temporal development, moving toward His goal through conflict and suffering; and that, in His communion with His Father, He employed the means of grace which are ordained for men—reading the Sacred Scriptures, and being much in prayer?

In considering such problems, Christian thought has been much hindered by the domination of metaphysical conceptions such as 'nature,' and by the controlling influence of a dualism which has opposed the Divine and human natures, regarding them as possessed of contrary attributes. The history of Christology consists, mainly, in a series of attempts to bring into harmony with one another, in the unity of the person, 'natures' which, it is presupposed, are fundamentally opposed in their characteristics and activities. Eutychianism brings them so close together as to confound them in a result which is a compound of Divine and human. Nestorianism holds them so far apart as to make them almost the seats of independent personalities. The formula of Chalcedon can scarcely be called a theory; it is rather an enumeration of the contrasted elements and a mere assertion of the unity which comprehends them. The Lutheran Christology seeks to reduce the dualism of Divine and human to the lowest possible degree by the deification of Christ's human nature. The Kenotic theories of more recent times have sought to reach the same result by the idea of a depotentiation of His Divine nature. However remarkable these schemes may be as intellectual efforts, and whatever value they may have in directing attention to one or another element in the complex fact, it is certain that they all fall under a threefold condemnation. (i.) They are dominated by metaphysical conceptions which are profoundly opposed to the ideas which prevail throughout Scripture; being dualistic to the core, whereas the ruling ideas of Scripture are synthetic, and are far removed from the distinctions which mark the achievements of the Greek mind. (ii.) They do not correspond with, or do justice to, the knowledge which faith has of the personal Christ; separating, as they do, what faith grasps as a unity, while their attempted harmonies are artificial, and not vital. (iii.) They fail to reproduce the portrait of Christ presented in the Gospels; they utterly fail to give adequate utterance to the impression which the Christ of the Gospels makes upon the minds which contemplate Him. This is true even of the Chalcedonian scheme, which, in substance, is repeated in many modern creeds and confessions.

* A Being who combines in an inscrutable fashion Divine with human properties, and of whom, consequently, contradictory assertions may be made, while His dual natures hold an undefined relation to one another. This is not a scheme to satisfy either head or heart' (Principal Dykes, papers on 'The Person of our Lord' in Expos. Times, Oct. 1906-Jan. 1906).

Christian thought, accordingly, must abandon the dualism which has so long impeded its efforts. It can never, indeed, emphasize too strongly the lowliness of man, both as creature and as sinful creature, and must never, even in its most spiritual exercises, forget the reverence that is due from man to God. But it must reject as misleading all theories which presuppose a generic difference between the Divine and the human natures. It must, therefore, reject the 'two-natures' doctrine of the Person of Christ, in the form in which it has hitherto prevailed; and must start in its study of Christ from the Biblical point of view of the essential affinity of the Divine and the human natures.

In recent literature the influence of Psychology upon Christological study is deeply marked. Instead of two natures, two consciousnesses are suggested as giving the adequate conception of our Lord's life on earth. The Son of God became the Son of Man; and had a true human experience in respect of knowledge, will, and every other aspect of normal human life; while at the same time He remained the Logos, retaining the attributes of Deity, such as omniscience. He lived, so to speak, in two universes at once, the macrocosm of creation at large and the microcosm of human life. This double life and double consciousness, it is suggested, are to be interpreted in the light of recent psychological experiments, which seem to establish the conclusion that there is a vast subliminal sphere, where the larger part of our life is lived, that which emerges in consciousness being but a section of the greater whole.

It may well be that such psychological hints are not to be thrown away. Yet it may be doubted whether success on this line is surer than under the old metaphysical control. There are curiosities of Psychology, as well as of Metaphysics; and the idea of a subliminal sphere may prove inadequate to explain the mystery of the Incarnation as the old 'bloodless' categories of 'substance' or 'nature.' The soul of Jesus is not on the dissecting table, and a psychology of it is impossible. In particular, it must be asked whether the representation of Jesus as being ordinarily absorbed in His human experiences, while having occasional visitations of His own Logos consciousness, is true to the portrait of Christ in the Gospels. Is there any suggestion in the narrative of a movement on the part of Jesus, to and fro, between the sub-conscious and the conscious spheres? Is not the deepest note in His character the continuousness of His conscious fellowship with God as the Son with the Father? Is there a hint anywhere of a shutting off of His Divine consciousness during the greater part of His human experience? There is certainly no indication of the shock which a merely human consciousness would receive if it were suddenly invaded by a Divine consciousness. Is not the dualism of the two consciousnesses as fatal to the harmony of the life and character of Christ as that of the 'two natures' ever was? Or, at least, are not the two consciousnesses really coincident, the Divine being the root of the human, the human being penetrated, formed, and inspired by the Divine?

In any case, whatever value we may attach to theories of the Person of Christ, whether metaphysical or psychological, and whatever may be our forecast of the issues of future Christological study, certain conclusions have established themselves as of permanent importance for Christian thought and experience. (i.) It is possible for a Divine Being to have a truly human experience. There is nothing in the nature of God or of man to forbid this. Scripture knows nothing of such disparity between the Divine and human natures as to make the idea of Incarnation an intellectual impossibility. Without doubt, the fact of Incarnation must be a theme of unending wonder and praise; but our view of it ought not to be confounded by the intrusion of speculative difficulties which do not belong to the actual situation. The Son of God became man. He was born, grew, thought, willed, prayed, rejoiced, suffered, died; and in and through all these perfectly human experiences He was, and was conscious of being, the Son of the Father. This Divine consciousness would, no doubt, profoundly modify, in His case, these experiences. The effect, for instance, of His sinlessness and of His filial relation to God upon the exercise of His intellectual faculties must have been such as to raise His knowledge high above that of other men, and would give to it what has been called 'intensive infinitude.' But the Divine consciousness would not make the human experiences other or less than human. Surely it ought to be admitted, once for all, that humanity, as we know it, is not complete, and that it gains completeness only as it approximates to the Divine nature. It is not so correct to say that Jesus Christ was Divine and yet human, as to say He was Divine and therefore human.

(ii.) It follows that the human experiences of such a Being constitute at once a veiling and a manifestation of the Divine glory. In the thinking, feeling, acting, suffering of the Son, the Father is drawing near to His creatures, and achieving for them the purpose both of creation and of redemption. We are to look for the Divinity of Christ, not apart from His humanity, but within it, in the facts of His character, and in those actions which He performs and those sufferings which He endures in closest fellowship with men. His human experiences, so far from casting doubt on His Divinity, or seeming to be inconsistent with it, will be its chief demonstration, and will constitute God's mightiest work for us. His most moving appeal to us. This Man is the Word of God incarnate.

(iii.) Knowledge of Christ, accordingly, is personal, and, like all personal knowledge, is ethically conditioned. All constructive statements regarding the Person of Christ, accordingly, must be, to a degree not attained in the older formulations of the Church, synthetic and concrete. We rise from a study of the life and character of Jesus, and of the experience of those who have come under His saving influence, with the conviction of His essential Godhead. We confess Him to be the Son of God. But His Godhead is not to be regarded in abstract separation from His humanity. It is the Godhead of One who is profoundly and truly human.

It is Godhead, as it discloses itself in humanity, which presents itself for our reverent study, and our no less reverent doctrinal statement.

From this point of view alone can the facts of the life of Christ be apprehended. In this light alone can the answer be presented to this generation as the answer to its need, the age-long need of the human spirit, for personal union with God.

INCENSE.—The English word comes from the Lat. incensio, 'burnt' (incendere, 'to burn'), and is applied to the materials used for making a perfume which was emitted by the materials being burned. These materials consist of fragrant gums, spices, and scents.

'Incense' is the usual tr. of θυμίαση, which occurs in the NT 6 times only: Lk 1<sup>16</sup>, 11, Rev 8<sup>3</sup> & 12<sup>12</sup>. In the passages in Rev. it is always in the plural, and in 12<sup>12</sup> is rendered in AV by 'odours.' θυμίαση is the LXX equivalent of Heb. תְּבִיבִים, which comes from תָּבַע 'to raise an odour by burning,' and so 'to burn incense.' Cognate Gr. words are θυμίαση, 'to burn incense,' Lk 1<sup>16</sup> (see 107, in NT); and θυμιατήριον, He 9<sup>18</sup> 'censer,' or 'altar of incense.' The root of these words is θίω = (1) 'to be in heat,' (2) 'to burn,' (3) 'to sacrifice (by burning)'; see Grimm-Thayer, s.v., and cf. θύω and θύωσις. The word θυμίαση is to be carefully distinguished from ἀθάναση, 'frankincense' (Heb. תְּבִיבִים). The latter was an ingredient of the former. ἀθάναση is found twice in NT (Mt 21<sup>8</sup> and Rev 18<sup>13</sup>), in the latter together with θυμίαση.

Incense came to be used in connexion with the Levitical worship in the Temple. Special care was to be taken in the making of it (Ex 30<sup>34c</sup>, P). Several passages in the OT indicate that the Israelites came to regard it (as they did other ceremonies) per se, apart from its spiritual meaning. Hence the denunciations of the prophets (Is 1<sup>13</sup> etc.). In the NT it is referred to only in connexion with the daily service of the Temple (Lk 1), and also as part of the symbolical heavenly worship in the Apocalypse. In Rev 5<sup>8</sup> and 8<sup>3</sup> it is associated with the prayers of the saints; in 5<sup>8</sup> apparently being identified with the prayers, and in 8<sup>3</sup> added to the prayers (cf. αἱς προσευχαῖς in both verses), as though to render them acceptable. RV 'with' in Rev 8<sup>3</sup> seems impossible.

The symbolism seems to be generally that of worship, which, like incense, ascends from earth to heaven. In Ps 141<sup>2</sup> prayer is thus likened to incense. Godet (on Lk 1<sup>9</sup>) thinks there was a close connexion between the two acts of burning incense and offering prayer.

'The one was the typical, ideal, and therefore perfectly pure prayer; the other the real prayer, which was inevitably imperfect and defiled. The former covered the latter with its sanctity, the latter communicated to the former its reality and life. Thus they were the complement of each other.'

Incense is used in worship in the Greek and Roman Catholic Churches, and by some congregations in the Anglican Church. Its earliest use in the Christian Church seems to have been as a fumigant (so Tertullian). No liturgical use is known for at least 4 if not 5 centuries. Up till then it was regarded as a relic of heathenism. As the Holy Communion came to be regarded as a sacrifice, and in some respects analogous to the Jewish sacrifices, incense became gradually associated with Christian worship. It is at least noteworthy that there is an entire absence of any reference to incense in the Christian Church of the NT in Acts and the Epistles, the only allusions being those in the symbolism of the Apocalypse. May not this be rightly regarded as an argumentum e silentio? Having the substance, what need is there of the shadow? (Jn 4<sup>22-24</sup>).

INDEPENDENCE.—See ORIGINALITY.

INDIGNATION.—See ANGER, and FIERCENESS.

INDIVIDUAL.—It has almost become a commonplace of Apologetics that the significance of the individual is first recognized in Christianity. In Antiquity the idea that the individual might stand over against the State, either through the sense of duty or the sense of truth, was not entertained.

Most ancient civilizations were based on slavery, which at once refused to recognize a large section of the members of the State as individuals, and placed the individuality of the others not on an equal moral basis, but on a basis of social inequality.

Yet the Christian conception of the individual did not descend upon the earth without any indication of its coming. Socrates had instructed men to know themselves, and, though his greatest disciple did not consider this teaching inconsistent with a Republic in which the family and the most sacred rights of the individual are sacrificed to the interests of the State, the real significance of the Greek Philosophy was the growing clearness with which it went on to bring out the importance of man to himself. Stoicism insisted that a man's dignity should not be at the mercy of events, and even Epicureanism taught that man's surest ground of happiness is within. Baur's contention, that the chief preparation for Christianity was a growing need for a universal, a moral religion, is only another way of saying that the individual, not as a free man, or a cultured man, or a member of a Greek State, but as an individual, was slowly coming to his rights.

This progress in the Gentile world, however, was not in any strict sense a preparation for our Lord's teaching, but, at most, of the world for receiving it. His true foundations are in the OT, and more particularly in the prophets. Here again it is a commonplace of theological thinking that the religion of the OT does not concern itself about the individual at all in the same sense as the religion of the NT. Worship is a social and even a civil act. The God men worship is the God of their fathers, i.e. the God of their race. The great body of the ritual exalts not the covenant person, but the covenant people. Even the prophets have very little to say about individual piety, but concern themselves with the rulers and the conduct of society and the destiny of the nation. We cannot be sure, even in what seem the most personal Psalms, that it is not the voice of a nation rather than of an individual that confesses sin and implores help. This uncertainty regarding the place of the individual is made greater by the indistinctness, at least in the earlier books, of the hope of individual immortality, which, however we may try to get round it, is essential to any high estimate of the worth of the individual.

No book, nevertheless, compares with the OT for the boldness with which the individual stands out in contrast and, if need be, in opposition to, the community, and that on spiritual, not social considerations. The standard of its teaching is personal responsibility, and that ultimately sets a man alone as an individual with his God. If it is a national and not an individual hope the prophets contend for, they place it on an individual not a communistic foundation. They are not concerned to reform institutions or demand new laws. The reform they seek is of personal action and manners, and the law they wish to see obeyed is God's. For this law it is the individual that signifies—the pressure of his personal call being so great that his duty to follow it is never questioned, even though it should bring him into conflict with both the State and the people. Ezekiel may have been the first to recognize the full significance of this attitude, but he was by no means the first to take it up. Of every prophet it could be said, 'Behold, I have made thy face hard against their faces, and thy forehead against their foreheads' (Ezk 3<sup>9</sup>). To each of them the Spirit of God was a power to help him to be true to himself. It set each of them on his feet before speaking to him (Ezk 2<sup>2</sup>). The very mark of a true prophet was to hear God's voice only, and not man's, and to be true to the individuality God had given him, and not to be an echo of the party cries around. To have that most selfish kind of individualism which consists in agreeing with the majority of the powers that be, was the mark of the false prophet (Jer 20).

Such an attitude of independence could not be taken up without a very strong sense of the significance of the individual for God. The significance of the solitary figure of Jeremiah could not be less because he lived for the welfare of his people, and their ingratitude left him in isolation. Ezekiel naturally followed with the application. Were Noah, Daniel, and Job in a wicked land, they could not deliver their own souls by their righteousness (14<sup>14</sup>). God deals equally with all, and every act is weighed, without prejudice either from a man's own past or from the doings of his fathers (18<sup>2-23-29</sup>). The soul that sinneth, it shall die (v. 4).

Of other OT writings the two most important are the Psalms and Job. The eye of the writers may at times be on the nation, but even that is part of their personal piety, and to our day the unflinching interest of the Psalms is the experience of the individual walking with his God. The Book of Job is wholly occupied with the problem of the individual, even if this individual be supposed to stand for the nation; and no one has ever stated with greater splendour of imagination or intellectual daring his right to fair dealing, not only from his fellow-men but from his God.

The OT conception of the relation of the moral individual to God, moreover, necessarily reached out toward the hope of immortality,—and that not merely as an extension of man's desires beyond time, but as the just requirement of an individuality that defied time and lived by the eternal.

That our Lord entered upon this heritage and accepted the estimate of each individual which we indicate by calling him an immortal soul, and that on the ground of the OT conception of the blessedness of the man whom God hears, appears from His argument with the Sadducees (Mt 22<sup>23</sup>, Mk 12<sup>27</sup>, Lk 20<sup>28</sup>), and is a postulate of His whole teaching. The saying, 'What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?' (Mk 8<sup>36</sup>), may only indicate a man's value to himself, and the other, 'How much then is a man better than a sheep!' (Mt 12<sup>2</sup>), may not seem to go very far. Christ's true conception of the individual rather appears in the belief. He offers for man's acceptance and the duty He requires that man should perform.

Of this belief the centre of everything is the manifestation of the Father. As revealed through the Son, He is a Father, which means that He does not, as a mere Ruler, deal with men in groups, but that each man has to Him the distinctiveness, the importance, the whole significance he can have to himself. The side of God's infinity which our Lord insists on, is the infinity of His care for the individual. In God's sight also, nothing can be given in exchange for a soul. By His care and guidance, that frail thing, an individual spirit, can walk without anxiety amid all the forces which might threaten his destruction, not only sure of protection, but sure that everything will be used to serve his true welfare. This attitude toward earthly cares is not sustained by hardness or indifference, but by a belief that God regards these things as the servants of His children, whose individual well-being He sets far above material things. It is not a low view of the world, but a high view of the spiritual individual, which our Lord teaches.

Speaking, as He always does, with this thought of God towards man in the foreground, Jesus is led to dwell rather on the worth of the insignificant and imperfect individual in the concrete than on the general worth of the individual in the abstract. Hard-hearted religious people spoke lightly of 'this multitude' being 'accused' (Jn 7<sup>49</sup>). He called none accused, and warned His followers against calling any one Kosca (Mt 5<sup>22</sup>); and when He used the word 'lost,' it became in His mouth tender and compassionate and full of the heart of God. The parables of the Lost Sheep, the Lost Piece of Money, and above all of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15), speak of God's unwillingness to let anything so precious as an individual be lost. The little child is the type of what is greatest (Mt 18<sup>1-2</sup>), and the little one in moral stature, whom to offend is worse than death, is guarded by the very angels of the Presence (18<sup>10</sup>).

The same estimate of the worth of the individual appears in the ideal of human duty. There is no one, however poor or humble, who should not set before him the goal of being perfect as our Father in heaven (Mt 5<sup>48</sup>). It is better to cut off the right hand than use another individual for our lusts, or to put out an eye than purpose such a thing (5<sup>27-29</sup>). Most distinctive is the duty of forgiveness. Our Lord takes for granted that it will be difficult. We shall have so much respect for our own individuality that we must be hurt, and for the individuality of others that we cannot pass over their faults easily. Only by rising to the height of God's thought can we hope to attain to God's way of dealing with the unthankful and evil. We are to understand that God also does not pardon lightly. He does not regard the whole mass of good and bad indifferently. On the contrary, He sets each individual before Him as something of great significance to Him, something whereby He can be deeply hurt and grieved, and then, out of the same love that can be hurt, He pardons him. It is the significance of the individual that gives its whole importance to the doctrine of pardon, whether on God's part or on man's.

But the very greatness of this relation to God might seem to withdraw something from the distinctiveness of man as an individual. The worth of the individual is not ultimately from himself but from God. 'If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered' (Jn 15<sup>1</sup>). This might almost seem to be a denial that there is such a thing as an individual. The individual would then be a mere manifestation of God. Spinoza's formula, omnis determinatio est negatio, would obtain, and the assertion of one's own individuality would only be as cutting off a certain portion of the air with a knife. But the inalienable secret of the gospel is that it enables a man to find God and himself at the same time. It does not deal with the endless substance, but with a Father. That He is an individual is not His limitation, but the condition of all His greatness; for it is the condition of His working by love, and love is greater than power. Conversion is thus not only a turning to God, but a finding of oneself (Lk 15<sup>17</sup>), and a coming to one's true home and to one's right possession. While no succour of God fails a man who will have it, it remains a necessity of God's love to set a man by himself in the task of working out his own destiny. He is allowed to go into the far country and waste his substance. In all the descriptions which glance out into the future there is a strange aloneness of the individual who has gone his own way, into which God Himself cannot intrude. Just because every human personality is so definitely an individual, we cannot be sure that, in the end, there may not be a lost individual. A relation of love in Christ's sense necessarily means a relation of individuals, and that means such a marking off of a man from God that even God cannot enter that personality again, except the door is opened to Him, as it were, from the inside.

This high gift of being an individual with the possibility of being a child of God, carries with it also the possibility of such exclusion of good as can make him a child of the wicked one (Mt 18<sup>23</sup>). Nor does the closest relation to God absorb the individual. Whatever ordinances there may be for public worship, the distinctive position is to enter into our closet and shut to the door, and be with our Father who sees in secret (Mt 6<sup>6</sup>). There is an individual hearing and an individual answering, which, however little our minds may compass it, are essential both in God's giving and in man's receiving. Just as there is a strange pitiful isolation of the individual who rejects God, so there is a strange saving of his own individuality in losing it, in the soul that finds God. That we remain individuals is as essential to the relationship as that we find our joy in another individual. The revelation of the Father in the Son must preclude all idea of absorption in God.

This is the ground of Ritschl's contention not only against a catholicism which bears down the individual by the weight of the institution, but also against a mysticism which reduces all individuals to mere personality, upon which a Spirit, Himself mere personality, operates not as individual with individual, but as abstract spiritual force upon abstract spiritual substance. The influence of grace we must, on the contrary, interpret through Christ, the Spirit having come in His place to bring His words to our remembrance (Jn 14<sup>26</sup>). Ritschl says that God only uses His revelation in the Scriptures on the one hand, and His dealings with us by the experiences and duties of life on the other. The tendency with him is, not only to limit God, but also to ignore possibilities in man; yet his main contention is of great value, and it helps us to understand the patient humanness of God's revelation, if we take it to be a dialogue in which God could not speak the next word till man had responded to the last.

The only influences our Lord used were the appeals of wisdom and love. In every case He respected the individuality of another, and sought to make men realize how much they were to themselves as well as to God. When any influence appeared as a substitute for personal choice, He sternly repressed it. He trusted no general movement, and appealed to nothing occult. He was always willing to leave a crowd for an individual (Mk 1<sup>37</sup>, Lk 4<sup>2</sup>, Jn 6<sup>23</sup>). The only miracle He ever wrought for the multitude He used for sifting them and for gathering individuals from among them (Jn 6<sup>27</sup>). And when a crowd did gather to hear Him preach, He gave them most individual teaching. He never departed from the method of being an individual dealing with individuals, and from requiring of them the most individual of actions—repentance and obedience to one's own call.

Nor is the individual overborne by the society (see art. CHURCH, KINGDOM OF GOD, INDIVIDUALISM). Here it suffices to say that it is just the distinctive place Christ assigned to the individual that marks His Church off from the world, and His Kingdom as a Kingdom of Heaven, a Kingdom of God. A Kingdom which treats its subjects as mere pawns in a great game, is, in that very act, marked as temporal. Other-worldliness, indeed, is not the mind of Christ, and the attempt to derive everything from the far-sighted selfishness which does 'good according to the will of God and for the sake of everlasting happiness,' leaves no room for the highest things of Christianity. But it is not true, as is argued, that we reach a higher stage when we are able calmly to recognize that the individual passes and the society remains, that everyone should be content to live on in the lives of others, and that the Kingdom of God is everything and the individual nothing. The Kingdom of God is not thereby exalted. Nay, there can be no Kingdom of God, but a mere fleeting earthly Utopia. If the individual is obliterated, then, in view of the endless ages, but a moment more, and the society is obliterated as well. It becomes the Kingdom of God only when it deals with the eternal, and that must always be the individual. It is of God and not of mere human regulation just because it respects the individual—his choice, his peace, his freedom; because it is a society of persons not constrained by force to a common purpose, but attuned to it by love and wisdom. All our Lord says of His society speaks of an association in which its members will realize what the Apostle calls the glorious liberty of the children of God, and, so long as the Church is content to stand over against men as an institution claiming external authority, Christ's great problem of how men were at once to live wholly for the Kingdom of God, and not surrender their Christian freedom, their rights as individuals, remains unsolved. (For the general philosophical questions regarding the individual, see art. PERSONALITY.)

One question yet remains. Can a person whose isolation has been thus defined to himself, ever again pass into the great undistinguishable mass? According to the orthodox conception, individuality, though a mere containing wall, is so adamant, that, whatever it may contain, it must abide. Ritschl, for one, argues that an alienation from God which the highest love cannot overcome, must mean annihilation. The very idea of a reality so important as to be inextinguishable, while all its manifestations demand its extinction, he would ascribe to the pernicious influence of the abstract Platonic idea of the soul. Nor can it be said that in the Gospels, or anywhere else in Scripture, there is any metaphysical basis of a Platonic kind for a necessary individual immortality. The Scripture hope is not in man, but in the character of God, and we cannot suppose Him under any necessity to continue evil for its own sake. On the other hand, if, as Ritschl maintains, the personality of God and man is individual, and pantheism is wholly an abandonment of the religious problem, which is how to maintain the spiritual personality against the whole material universe, through belief in the exalted Power that rules above it, it remains a problem whether evil can ever attain such power as to be able to blot out for God an individual.

LITERATURE.—The whole of modern philosophy is concerned with the problem of the individual, but special mention may be made of: Spinoza, Ethics; Hume, Human Nature; Leibnitz, de Principio Individui; Kant, Anthropologie; J. H. Fichte, Die Idee der Personlichkeit und der individuellen Fortdauer; Nathaniel Southgate Shaler, The Individual: A Study of Life and Death, 1902; Deussen, Evolution of the Individual, 1901; Beyschlag, NT Theol., esp. vol. i. 126-187 (Eng. tr.); Lemme, Christliche Ethik, esp. § 10; Kretschmar, Das Christliche Personlichkeits Ideal, 1888; J. R. Illingworth, Personality. JOHN OMAN.

INDIVIDUALISM.—The word individualism is used in two senses, and the difference of meaning is constantly employed in order to discredit one set of ideas by arguing against the other. In a general way the uses may be distinguished by calling the one philosophical and the other political. Individualism, in the philosophical sense, attempts to derive everything from the intellect and the interests of the individual. However much a man derives from others, he ultimately depends, it argues, on his own judgment and his five senses; and, however benevolent he may be, all his motives have their source in self-love. Descartes started to reconstruct our whole knowledge from the individual's knowledge of himself, and his successors naturally sought to construct our whole activity from the individual's love to himself. Shaftesbury and Butler had to affirm almost as a discovery that benevolence is as true and real a part of human nature as self-love. Only after Hume had reduced this kind of individualism to sensationism, leaving the individual himself a mere series of sensations, and after Spinozism began to be poured into the waters of speculation, was it seen that man could not be understood alone, but only in his whole context.

It is needless to prove that this kind of individualism is not maintained by the Scriptures. And still less is it necessary to show that it is not our Lord's reading of human nature. The creature that is made in the image of God is not made for himself. The creed that says, 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself' (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>), believes that it finds something more in man than even the wisest self-love to which it can appeal. The individual does not, it is true, lose in Christ's service. On the contrary, he will receive an hundredfold, and, over and above, life everlasting (Mt 19<sup>29</sup>). But that is only after he has learned the secret of forsaking all, after he has been taught, not of his own self-interest, but after he has been drawn by the Father from all self-regard (Jn 6<sup>44</sup>). This possibility in man, our Lord recognizes, was also taught by the prophets, who wrote, 'And they shall all be taught of God' (v. 45). To be taught of God means to be saved from this kind of individualism, to discover that it is not our right position and not our true selves, but is alienation from our true life and our true home; it is to learn that not only is love part of our nature, but that we have never found ourselves at all till it takes us out of ourselves (Lk 17<sup>8</sup>, Mt 10<sup>38</sup>).

Philosophical Individualism, however, is not only perfectly consistent with the appeal to authority which the other kind of individualism rejects, but it is almost entirely dependent upon such an authority for any explanation of the social order. On the other hand, what we have called Political Individualism is frequently maintained precisely on the ground that man is not, in the sense of belonging only to himself, individualistic, but has his true social quality within himself. 'Individualism' in this other sense means the rights of the individual over against authority, a position which does not, as is usually assumed, involve logically the other individualism, the individualism of every man for himself. It is not a denial of the necessity of a corporate existence or of the value of society. Its real opposite is Communism, and the real point at issue is whether society depends on the individual or the individual on society. Both Individualism and Communism, of course, would admit a mutual inter-relation, but the question is which is first, the individual or the social institution, and which is to be our chief reliance, the good-will of the individual or the control of the social machinery. So far as this kind of individualism from involving individualism in the other sense, that it rather assumes that all the elements for the highest social state exist in each man, and would come to fruition, if only the external hindrances could be removed. On this latter question, it must be admitted, our Lord's attitude is much more difficult to determine.

Of this practical individualism there are several types. First, there is the individualism of Nietzsche, to whom every altruistic feeling is the mere unreasoning instinct of the herd. That kind of individualism stood at the foot of the Cross, and said, 'He saved others, himself he cannot save; and saw in the position the height of absurdity. Then there is the vigorous Philistine individualism of Herbert Spencer. It conceives man as a creature with five senses and ten fingers, who needs nothing on earth but a free field and no favour, whose chief duty to the human race is to secure its progress by making the weakest go to the wall. The text it most firmly believes in, in the whole Bible, is, 'He becometh poor that dealeth with a slack hand'; and what it cannot away with in Jesus is that He told people to give to everyone who asked, and to sell all, and give to the poor,—a frightful encouragement to laziness and mendicancy, and a most hurtful interference with the law of the survival of the fittest. Again, there is the individualism of Mr. Auberon Herbert and the Free Life. In its eyes men are quite free to part with everything they have, and it is believed they would part with it for the best purposes, if it were not that they are robbed and also debased by being blackmailed under the name of taxes. 'Bumble' is the true name and nature of all authorities, it having been their way in all time to muddle everything, doing it wastefully and doing it badly. Freedom, on the other hand, is man's highest privilege, and would, if it could get a chance, be his surest guidance. Force, which is the sole instrument of the State, has only one right application. It has a right to resist force, to suppress violence. The State is, when it keeps to its own sphere, simply the big policeman, 'a terror to evil-doers,' and also, in so far as it kindly lets them alone, 'a praise to them that do well.' With less hesitation regarding consequences, this individualism reasserts J. S. Mill's principle, 'that the sole end for which mankind are warranted, individually or collectively, in interfering with the liberty of action of any of their number, is self-protection.' Finally, there is the individualism of Count Tolstoy, the basis of which he finds in the Gospels themselves. 'Judge not, that ye be not judged,' applies as much to a man in his official capacity as in his private, and 'Resist not evil' is required from the community as much as from the individual. No man is ever so much wiser and better than his fellows that he can have the right in any capacity to take over the regulation of their lives, and the very goal of history is to teach the folly and wickedness of any body of men trying to bear rule over others,—a philosophy of history somewhat akin to St. Paul's conception of the dispensation of the Law as meant to shut all up unto disobedience (Ro 11<sup>32</sup>).

The kindness of the Socialists towards Tolstoy seems at first sight inexplicable, for nothing could be more opposed to their method than this rejection of all visible authorities. The Socialist, moreover, has the same sympathy with Christ's teaching. Take, e.g., Headlam's Political Treatise, No. 42. The teaching of Jesus, he affirms, had hardly anything to do with a life after death, but a great deal to do with a Kingdom of God, which is a righteous society to be established upon earth. Christ's works were secular, socialistic works. Whatever may be said of His miracles of raising the dead, they show that the death of a young person was a monstrous, disorderly thing to Him. If men would live in a rational, organized, orderly brotherhood, they would be clothed as beautifully as the lily. His denunciations were for those who oppressed the poor; and the man whom He spoke of as in hell, was the man who calmly accepted the difference between the rich and the poor; while the persons who were on the right hand at the Judgment, were those who had taken pains to know that people were properly clothed and fed. The Christian society was meant to do on a large scale the social work which Jesus had done on a small. Jesus ordained Baptism to receive every human child as equal into His Church, and the Eucharist to be a sacrament of equal brotherhood; and He made the first word in His prayer the recognition of a common Father, which must involve the equality of brethren. The Song of Mary describes Him as putting down the mighty from their seats and sending the rich empty away, and His Apostles insist on every man labouring, and on the labourer, not the capitalist, being first partaker of the fruits. If, therefore, 'you want to be a good Christian, you must be something very much like a good Socialist.' The Church, we are told, is fettered, and ineffective for carrying out this task, but much 'may be done by those Churchmen who remember that the State is a sacred organization as well as the Church,' and who are willing to help to seize it for the good of the people. Their first task, strangely, will be to free the Church from the fetters of the State, for one would rather have imagined that the logical conclusion should have been Rothe's position, that it is the business of the Church so to labour that ultimately it may be absorbed in the Christian State.

This exposition clearly shows the reason for sympathy with Tolstoy. It is a case of extremes meeting. Extreme individualism and extreme Socialism are both alike conscious of the present distress. Individualism is as little satisfied as Socialism with twelve millionaires dining at one end of London and finding the cultivated globe too small to please their palates, and at the other a million and a half of their fellow-creatures not knowing whether they will have any dinner at all. Than this, both are a great deal nearer the position of Him who said, 'Sell that ye have, and give alms' (Lk 12<sup>33</sup>), 'Woe unto you who are rich' (19<sup>24</sup>), who denounced the robbery of the widow and the orphan, and no doubt included every form of ruthless competition whereby the strong get advantage of the weak. Competition has become a sacred word in these days, but it never has been a Christian word, and if some higher law does not rule above it, the fittest that will survive by it will not be the best but only the most rapacious.

Extreme Socialism and extreme Individualism, moreover, have this in common, that both carry on their propaganda in the interests of the individual and in the hope of arriving at a better state of society. The Individualist thinks a better society can be formed only out of better individuals, and regards force as the great obstacle; whereas the Socialist thinks the individual will never have a chance in the present kind of social conditions. That Christ aimed both at creating a better individual and a better society needs no proof, and it must further be recognized that the society He Himself created, considered a voluntary community of goods at least in agreement with the spirit of His teaching (see art. WALTON). The emphasis which the leaders put on this voluntary aspect of communism distinguishes Christianity clearly from Socialism, but still the experiment indicates that, in a more Christian society, the Socialist ideal might be accomplished in another way. With our present concentration on material well-being, the end of competition would be almost the end of individuality; but if our real life were less lived by bread alone, if our true individuality were dependent on higher concerns, we might come to cultivate together the soil of the earth and enjoy together all it produces as much in common as we use the air that moves on its surface and the water that comes down its hills, and we should then be enabled to accept many of Christ's commands as literal which we can only now live with as figures of speech.

One feels in reading the Gospels that what is more alien to them than either Individualism or Socialism, is the current amalgam of both, which defends all the Individualism that means personal profit and all the Socialism that means personal security and dignity, which finds all our Lord's concessions literal and all His demands figurative. The typical attitude, though not usually expressed so bluntly, is Loisy's. Christ, he says, conceived the Kingdom of God, which He thought was at hand, as the great social panacea. Though He enforced it with the enthusiasm and excess which are necessary to implant any great ideal, it was quite unworkable in this rough world. There rose up in place of it, therefore, the Church with its authorities for belief and for conduct, that useful, practical, enduring compromise between the individual and the religious society. It is this combination which most of our countrymen who love compromise as the oil, if not the water, of life, are concerned to maintain; and when they welcome the passing of Individualism, they mean to hail the revival of the power of the visible authorities; and when they object to Socialism, they only mean that they do not approve of the purposes for which the power is to be used.

The method of Socialism, nevertheless, is not the method of the gospel, and the usual course of the Socialist is that which Mr. Headlam follows,—to prove that the aims of Socialism are Christ's, and then take for granted that He would approve of the means proposed for attaining them. Even supposing we make the large concession of granting the exegesis, we still do not find the slightest attempt to show that our Lord ever in any way trusted to the State as the instrument for accomplishing His design. The usual way of avoiding this difficulty is to say that He could not be expected to look to a Pagan State as we are justified in looking to the Christian State. To this there are two very evident replies. First, Is the State ever Christian in our Lord's sense? Second, It was not the Pagan but the Theocratic State our Lord dealt with nearly all His days. It was there waiting to be adopted; yet He lived chiefly in conflict with it, and He never attempted to reform it or work through it. He certainly expected His followers to have a good deal to do with States and kings and governors, but it would be in an extremely individualistic position (Mt 10<sup>19</sup>), and all that was expected of them was not to fear them that kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul (v. 28). Our Lord's action was not revolutionary in the sense of actually overthrowing existing institutions, but He cannot be said to have cherished them. A certain regard was to be paid to the Scribes and Pharisees who sat in Moses' seat (Mt 23<sup>2</sup>), but He also subjected them to such criticism as must have sapped their power. He Himself so far honoured the religious institutions as not to oppose them; but the only evil He ever put His hand to the task of reforming, was that which disturbed the private worshipper (Mt 21<sup>12-13</sup>, Jn 2<sup>13-17</sup>), and His entire indifference to ceremonial purity rejected a great deal of the institution to the advantage of the individual. All this might seem to refer rather to the Church than the State; but if He distrusted the leadership of the former, He would not be likely any more to trust the leadership of the latter, if it took over the guidance of life. It also would be the blind leading the blind. What our Lord manifestly expects to see, is what He calls the seed of the Kingdom (Mt 13<sup>23</sup>), those who in every place are worthy, who are prepared to be as lights shining in a dark place. Why should He speak of the result as a Kingdom of God at all, if, in the final issue, it is only of man's regulation? The meaning certainly lies very near, that it was a kingdom of souls regulated only by love, a kingdom of souls bent on a direct service and obedience to God, and requiring no other rule. This fundamental distinction between it and all other earthly kingdoms would seem to be the very reason for calling it of God.

This view is confirmed by what seems the most convincing explanation of our Lord's temptations. To suppose that He was tempted merely by His own hunger and love of success and love of praise, is to ascribe to Him motives which had no power over Him at other times. But if they are temptations of His work, the temptation to provide a kingdom with fulness of bread and to rule by accepting the methods of force in the State and of display in the Church, we see how He could be touched in His deepest interests. When He turned from that way to the road that led by a solitary path to Calvary, to call many, but to choose only the few who also would be prepared to walk in it, He surely decided to look to the individual to save the institution, and not to the institution to save the individual. In view of all this, it cannot be questioned that the aristocrat in his peasant's dress, digging his bread out of the earth, and living as if the social revolution had come, in the high conviction that the Divine way is personal surrender and not social supervision, represents Christ's attitude better than the respectable persons who meantime take all the present system of competition will give, while they wait for salvation from the action of the State.

But Socialism only makes a pretence of being workable through the State, by ignoring the bearing which its action would have on the whole life of the individual, and it is with this larger question that our Lord is concerned. His Kingdom is not of this world, and its treasures are not upon earth, and it only concerns itself with the things upon earth as they have to do with the great treasure in heaven, which is character, and the great rule of the Kingdom, which is love. That He expected this idea to be embodied in an earthly society is plain, for the beginnings of it arose in His own lifetime. But it was to be a very singular society, in which none was to exercise authority on one hand, and none to call any man master on the other. The only dignity was to be service; and the higher the position, the lowlier one should serve. Nothing can reconcile this with the ecclesiastical embodiment of it in all ages, wherein the true succession has been placed in the officials, who determined not only action but belief, and who have penetrated further into the inner sanctuary of the individual life than any earthly government that ever existed. But no one recognized more fully than Christ Himself that the channels by which His influence would go down would intermingle their clay with the pure waters; and to assume that any organization is more than a dim human attempt at reaching out towards His ideal, is to neglect His own warnings. As the believer must be in the world, so he must be in the institution—in it but not of it, always retaining his right to consider whether Christ is there or not when men say, 'Lo, here, or Lo, there.' In so far as the institution serves this Kingdom of God, this kingdom of souls, whose only authority is God the Father as revealed in the Son, and whose only rule is love, it is to be honoured; but it must ever be prepared to be judged by that standard.

The great end of all progress, therefore, is not to subject the individual, but to call him to the realization of his own heritage of freedom. It is in the crowd that men have done all the great iniquities. The multitude come to take Christ; the disciples all in a body forsake Him; the rulers come together to judge Him; the whole band of soldiers is called together to buffet Him; the crowd cry, 'Crucify Him'; the chief priests mock Him among themselves. Even those that were crucified with Him stilled their pain by falling in with the cry of the multitude. Whatever institution, therefore, we may submit to, we can only belong to the true Church by first of all having 'salt in ourselves' (Mk 9<sup>50</sup>), by being of the truth and hearing Christ's voice (Jn 18<sup>37</sup>).

It is argued that the full meaning and claim of Christianity can never be explicable on the basis of Individualism, because 'from first to last it deals with minds which are in relation with actual truth in regard to the soul, the world, and God, and which have not fully attained even the limits of their own nature till they are united in the Spirit-bearing Body, through Christ to the Father' (Strong). Possibly Hume contends for the Individualism here refuted. Nobody else does. Why Christianity is so individualistic is precisely that the soul is so directly, or, at all events, can, through God's revelation and grace, be so directly in contact with actual truth, the world and God, as to make it only a distraction for another man, on merely official grounds, to come in between as a necessary channel; that the possession of such a personal relation to truth is a common bond of more power than any external tie; and that the visible organization is only vital and useful as it expresses this union. The usual way is to say the Kingdom of God is a purely spiritual condition on the one hand, and has a place and effect in the world on the other; to seek no common basis; to avoid deriving one from the other; to ascribe methods of worldly rule to the visible society, and then to transfer to it the attributes of love and truth and holiness that belong to the invisible, and so to claim for it, in subjection, the obedience which belongs to the other, in freedom. It is quite true that a person in a state of salvation is one called and admitted into a society; but, just because it is a society of saved persons, it is different in its relation to its members from all visible societies. Instead of more submission to their teachers and more obedience to their rulers, the Scripture hope of progress is still what it was of old, 'Would that the Lord's people were all prophets,'—would that each man were less concerned about his neighbour and more about his own message and his own call! Men are always ready to organize others; the fruitful and difficult task is to organize one's own soul.

LITERATURE.—Butler's Sermons, and, in contrast, Paley's Moral Philosophy. For the extensive literature for and against Socialism, see Felton Tract, No. 20, 'What to Read: A List of Books for Social Reformers.' For individual freedom, J. S. Mill, On Liberty; Herbert Spencer, Man versus the State, and Sociology; Tolstói, Essays, and many smaller works. On the relation of the individual to the Church, reference may be made to Loisy, L'Évangile et l'Église (tr. The Gospel and the Church, 1903); Newman, The Development of Christian Doctrine, 1878; and T. B. Strong, God and the Individual, 1908.

INDIVIDUALITY.—The word 'individuality' may be used merely for the quality of being an individual, but its common use is to indicate the special characteristics which distinguish one individual from another, that which, as it has been expressed, marks each one as a particular thought of God. Only in this latter sense is the word considered here.

Both in morals and in religion it has always been a difficult matter to determine the due place of individual differences. The great weakness of Deism, e.g., was that, while it abundantly exalted the individual, it had no place for individuality. Its natural religion and utilitarian ethic had, as its very standard of excellence, that it excluded everything whereby one man was different from another. Even Kant, the highest product of Rationalism, with his view of religion as an appendage to a moral law, and his supreme test of a moral law by its fitness to be a law universal, only accentuated this limitation. The Romantic reaction had as its characteristic note the glory of individuality. The marvel of the universe was just its variety, and the glory of man that he was the most varied thing in the universe. The whole duty of man was to be himself and admit no law except the law of his own nature. Then unfortunately it too frequently appeared that what man took to be his nature was only self-pleasing, and what he thought was religion was only satisfaction of the artistic sense. There was also another very strange result. This excessive insistence upon individuality came to obliterate the individual. So much stress was laid upon what was changing and varied, that nothing was thought of what is one and unchanging. Hence everything was reduced to the great World-Spirit whose artistic pleasure in unfolding His variety constituted the history of the world.

This insistence on the importance of individuality by Romanticism, nevertheless, bore large fruit in both ethics and religion. Indeed, all modern equity at least of the historical religions may be dated from Schlegel's insistence on the marked individuality of all the great founders of religion. Nor is it possible to question his right to point in particular to Jesus. The supreme human interest in all the Scriptures is their immense gallery of persons who gave scope to their individuality. For the most part they are very far from being perfect, but none of them is fashioned on the common worldly type, none of them is rolled like smooth stones on the beach, in the continual social attrition. Yet, even in this great gallery of the children of nature and of God, Jesus stands out pre-eminent. Whatever may be said of the stories of His birth, they mark the profoundest impression made on His contemporaries by a great, a striking, an unforgettable individuality. Though the many attempts at painting His human individuality, from the Apocryphal Gospels downwards, cannot be regarded as nearer a true likeness than the attempts at portraying His human features, every reader of the Gospels feels that, amid all the things He surrendered, He never surrendered His own marked human individuality. On the contrary, it continued to be a prominent thing that forced itself on everyone. He went His own way, thought His own thoughts, lived His own life, and never accorded anything to that tyranny of fashion to which, in our weak regard for others, we continually sacrifice what is greatest and best in our natures.

Our Lord's regard for the individuality of the persons He dealt with might be used as a key for understanding large portions of the Gospels. He took special care to bring out the individuality of each one's faith. He brings the modesty of the woman with the issue of blood into prominence, to give her the assurance she needed for her comfort (Mt 9<sup>20</sup>). He rejects roughly the prayer of the Canaanitish woman, to show more clearly her right to be heard (Mt 15<sup>21-28</sup>). He sits at meat in the publican's house, to create self-respect in the social outcast (Mk 2<sup>15</sup>). He meets the centurion, the man of command, by working through a command (Lk 7<sup>1-10</sup>); and He answers John, the man who had required action, by action (v. 22). He justified wisdom both in John the ascetic and in Himself who came eating and drinking, and only blamed the narrow censoriousness which could appreciate neither (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>).

In the Fourth Gospel, in particular, the key to almost everything Jesus says or does is that He knew what was in man (Jn 2<sup>25</sup>). Nicodemus, the man dried to parchment and swathed in conventional considerations, needs to be born again into a new and fresh life (3<sup>1-15</sup>). The woman of Samaria, no longer able to command the protection of even the poorest marriage tie, and too disreputable to appear at the well except when the midday sun kept the other women at home, is offered living water to refresh her soul parched for sympathy, and is so interpreted to herself that she said, 'He told me all that ever I did' (4<sup>1-26</sup>). Because the nobleman has the aristocratic spirit of his class, he is simply told to go his way, his son lives (4<sup>46</sup>); because his bed has for thirty-eight years been the centre of all his interest, the cripple at Bethesda is told to take it up (5<sup>8</sup>). All the Gospels are full of persons of vivid individuality. A striking feature of our Lord's whole ministry is the way in which, in His presence, a man's true qualities inevitably come to light. The respectable convention behind which men hide inevitably falls away, and men appear in all their real characteristics, often with the unhonoured to their honour, and with the highly esteemed to their shame. Even the Pharisee, the type in all ages in which individuality is most suppressed by creed and custom, cannot keep the curtain drawn in His presence. At first sight this definiteness seems to be lost in the strange, vague atmosphere of the Fourth Gospel, which is so strongly irradiated by one individuality—that of the writer. But in life it is not the persons who are themselves colourless who do most justice to the individuality of others. So it is that in John we see, more than in any other Gospel, the vivid individuality, in particular, of the disciples, and how Jesus recognized it and dealt with it. Andrew and Nathanael, Philip and Thomas are mere names and shadows in the other Gospels, while in John they have each one his own characteristic note. Even Peter, in the other Gospels, is little more than an inexplicable mixture of insight and error; but in John he is drawn in a phrase by the Master Himself, 'When thou wast young thou girdedst thyself and walkedst whither thou wouldst' (21<sup>18</sup>). This enterprising but impetuous character appears in the whole presentation of him in John, till, in the days of heaviness, he flung off the slackness which had fallen upon all the disciples, and said with his old grip at his girdle, 'I go a fishing' (21<sup>3</sup>). In considering the question of the authenticity of John, this, at all events, deserves consideration, that it leaves us with such a sense of the strong individuality of the Apostles, both as children of nature and as children of grace, as to make it not incredible that a handful of poor men should start to conquer the world. In this Gospel, moreover, faith is not only an individual act, which it must always be, but also an attitude which brings out a man's deepest individuality. Men do not believe, because they trust only what they see (4<sup>46</sup>). They cannot believe in Christ, because already they have not believed in the highest they knew (5<sup>37</sup>). It is a certain preparedness for Christ which makes men believe in Him (6<sup>29</sup>, 7<sup>7</sup>). Belief is a special word to oneself, a hearing from the Father (6<sup>38</sup>). Unbelief arises from being from beneath (8<sup>32</sup>), from being of one's father the devil (8<sup>44</sup>). There is, throughout, a family likeness in unbelief; while belief, in the consciousness of its own special needs, finds its own call. It does not lean on Abraham, or fashion itself on the accepted model, but, like Nathanael, it seeks God under the fig-tree, like Philip it is ready to say to conventional questions, 'Come and see.' This faith, moreover, issues in an eternal life, the present effect of which is to give us possession of our own souls, to know God in such a way as not to be greatly concerned about men, to be in the world yet not of it (17<sup>19</sup>).

Though less prominent in the Synoptics, our Lord's regard to individuality is not less significant. To enter the Kingdom, so pronounced an individuality is required that it can take by itself the narrow way, while the common course is the broad road (Mt 7<sup>13</sup>); it is to be one in so characteristic a fashion as to cause more joy in heaven than the ninety and nine who, satisfied with the received standard, need no repentance (Mt 18<sup>13</sup>, Lk 15<sup>7</sup>). This strong insistence that many are called and only few chosen, indicates not arbitrariness in dealing with individuals, but the rarity of the individuality God requires (Mt 22<sup>14</sup>). His true disciples must be of so pronounced a type that, while they shun the poor glory of self-display (Mt 6<sup>7</sup>), they must yet be the salt of the earth, and not even fear the prominence of being as a city set on a hill. They must shun the all-pervasive, assimilative creed of the time, the leaven of the Pharisees; nor will the accepted Christian formula,

'the saying of 'Lord, Lord,' be any more approved (Mt 7<sup>21</sup>).

Our Lord does not really differ from the pagan view that the worth of the individual depends upon his individuality. The difference is in the estimate of that wherein this individuality consists, and of the possibilities in each man of attaining it. Even to Aristotle individuality meant something aristocratic. The qualities in a person worth considering are liberality (ἐλευθεριότης), magnificence (μεγαλοπρέπεια), and magnanimity (μεγαλοψυχία). These all require a certain social station, a certain aloofness from the petty concerns of life, which could be possible for all men only when the great mechanical slave whom Aristotle dreamt of could be made to do the drudgery. With Christ, on the other hand, a man could have true individuality in the lowest seats and at the lowliest services.

Nor is Christ's conception that of modern culture, which, indeed, is much nearer Aristotle than Jesus. He does not seek, with Goethe, to build up as high as possible the pyramid of his nature. A man does not fail of that individuality which the Kingdom of God requires, even though he have to cut off an offending hand or pluck out an offending eye, and enter blind and maimed (Mt 5<sup>29</sup>).

The classical presentation of the type of individuality permitted and required in the Kingdom of God is in the Beatitudes. Too often they are read as a suppression of individuality, which they are if a man's chief characteristics are possessions, popularity, self-assertion, self-indulgence. But in Christ's eyes this should not be the way of showing a man's true nature. The description, taken as a whole, presents an energetic type which, just because of its superiority both to society and to nature, is bound to be of marked individuality. To be poor in spirit is not to be poor-spirited, not to bend and break under every trial, but is to be rich in a faith which accepts poverty or anything else in the assurance of never being broken or bent. The mourner is not one given to tears, but one in energetic opposition to wrong and in energetic sympathy with suffering. The meek is not the meek and mild, not the soft, timid person, but one who has too high a faith in a wiser power than his own to strive and cry. To hunger and thirst after righteousness is necessarily to take an independent and difficult course in the world; while to be merciful requires decided strength of character, most of the cruel things on earth being done not in self-will and malice, but in thoughtlessness and weakness. Purity of heart never could survive in this world as mere innocence and ignorance of evil; the soft people who seek to shun everything disagreeable are the chief makers of dispeace; and only persons of determined character and decided principles ever run any risk of being persecuted for righteousness' sake. Were there no other condition but this last, it would mark the contrast with the accepted type, with the person whose first motive is prudence, whose guiding star is agreement with the authorities, who feels an obtrusive individuality to be in bad taste, and who regards a somewhat colourless membership of the Church and of Society as the hall-mark of the Divine approval. Instead we see one who is the odd man in the hundred, one who will not walk with the crowd in the broad way, one who has something of the singularity of the prophet which will ensure for him the singularity of the prophet's reward.

This large scope for individuality is maintained chiefly by resting the guidance of life not on a rule, but on a relation to God, revealed not in a code, but in a Person. This was the basis of a rule of love to God and to man to which all the Law and the Prophets could be reduced. Love is the way of at once giving scope to our own individuality and cherishing the individuality of others. Not that love can be without law. As it has been well said, What is love at the centre is always law at the circumference. But love at the centre will always keep law mindful of human differences. It will be a law in accordance with the Apostle's interpretation of his Master's meaning when he enjoins us to be true to our own highest individuality, i.e. the special demands of our own conscience, to do nothing that is not of faith (Ro 14<sup>23</sup>); to attend so far to the weakness of our own individuality as not to be enslaved to anything; and to regard the individuality of our neighbour so far as to take heed to what edifies (1 Co 10<sup>24</sup>). Nevertheless it is no true development of Christian faith or morals, as Newman (in his Development) and countless others have argued, that the faith has been elaborated into a creed that omits no detail of doctrine, and the morality into a code that lays down every detail of duty. Nor can it ever be true humility to surrender our individuality to any other man made like to ourselves.

Yet a free Protestant code and a smaller creed do not necessarily give us a true and characteristic faith, or save us from a mainly negative standard of duty, and perhaps there is no kind of consideration for others more needed at the present day than to have courage to be ourselves.

To leave room for this individuality is one of the most difficult and most neglected tasks of theology, and to leave scope for it in the Church is a task that has never been very anxiously pursued by the ecclesiastic. Yet if the true manifestation of faith is power to become sons of God in spite of society and circumstances, a very important element it should be the maintenance of our true individuality; and though truth can only be one, there should be something characteristic in each man's faith. The preservation of this difference among the Scripture writers is the real task of Biblical Theology, which should not aim at evaporating truth into what each man thinks, but at showing how important every man is for his faith.

JOHN OMAN.

INDIVIDUALITY (OF CHRIST).—Regarded simply as a historical character, or as a subject of a visible career among men, Christ undoubtedly presents as distinct an aspect of individuality, or concrete reality, as can be affirmed of any historical personage. On the other hand, when we pass from the historical point of view to that of Christological construction, we can hardly fail to raise the question whether it is possible to escape from qualifying the category of individuality as applied to Christ on the side of His humanity. Proceeding from the latter point of view, and deferring to the Catholic postulates respecting the union of our Lord's manhood with the pre-existent Logos or Son of God, we are confronted with the task of explaining how a real concrete manhood can be taken into veritable union with the Logos without effecting a heterogeneous and double personality. The task is a very difficult one, and in wrestling with it a temptation easily arises to strip the manhood of concreteness or individuality, and thus to accommodate it more fully to the demands of personal unity. But a resort to this alternative has its own difficulty, and that by no means a slight one, since the thought of an Incarnation which means the union of the Son of God with a mutilated manhood, or with a mere semblance of manhood, is far from being satisfactory. Indeed, there is little hazard in affirming that the mind and heart of Christendom would sooner tolerate an element of unresolved dualism in the person of Christ, than sacrifice in any appreciable degree the reality and perfection of His manhood.

1. Among the prominent theories involving a sacrifice of this kind the Apollinarian is the most explicit and intelligible. By its supposition that the Logos took the place of the rational soul in the Redeemer, so that the Incarnation involved only the assumption of a human body with its principle of animal life, it evidently simplifies very much the problem of Christ's person. But the simplification takes place at too great a cost. The immutable Logos clothed in a fleshly garment is obviously no proper subject for temptation or for a real implication in human experiences generally. He cannot be brought into accord with the Gospel representations, except by resort to an artificial, Docetic interpretation. As lacking the most essential factor of manhood, He is destitute of the most apprehensible bond of brotherhood and ground of companionship. In short, the advantage which pertains to the Apollinarian theory, on the score of simplicity and intelligibility, is overmatched by the disadvantage which it incurs by its incompatibility with Gospel facts and by its abridgment of Christ's competency to enter into the life of men and thus to fulfil the complete office of mediation. In effect it abolishes the Son of Man; for the archetypal manhood, which Apollinaris supposed to be resident in the eternal Logos, is a far off thing in comparison with the concrete reality which naturally is present to our thought when we use the term 'manhood.'

2. A second historic theory which has a distinct bearing upon our theme is that of Monophysitism. This differs from Apollinarism in its formal acknowledgment that by the incarnation of the Son of God is to be understood the assumption of a complete human nature. This acknowledgment, however, turns out to be rather verbal than substantial. The Monophysite assertion of a single nature in the incarnated Christ involved the compounding of the human nature in Him with the Divine; and this, in connexion with the vast preponderance assigned to the Divine in post-Nicene thinking, meant virtually the reduction of the human to the rank of an accident, a secondary and contingent property or group of properties, superinduced upon a Divine subject. Such an outcome, it is needless to say, runs very close to the submergence of the human side of Christ. It leaves no place for the thought of a real ethical manhood; for a proper ethical character is not predicable of a selfless accident. And with this deficit is conjoined a serious metaphysical difficulty, since fundamental thinking insists upon a relation of commensurability between attributes and their subject, and does not approve the notion that attributes appropriate to a finite personality can be made properly to inhere in an infinite subject.

3. A theory favoured with more orthodox associations than the Monophysite, but having a somewhat questionable bearing on the Christological problem, is the theory of the impersonality of Christ's manhood, or more specifically, the theory that His manhood, being devoid of a personality of its own, obtained from the first moment of subsistence its personal subject in the Ego of the pre-existent Logos (the so-called doctrine of anhypostasis). This theory was broached by Leontius in the 6th cent., was advocated by John of Damascus in the 8th cent., and has had in later times considerable currency among theologians of reputed orthodoxy, though never receiving any distinct oecumenical sanction. As handled by John of Damascus, the notion of the impersonality of Christ's manhood cannot be said to have been suitably reconciled with the full reality of that manhood. While formally he assigned to the Redeemer the full complement of human faculties, he felt obliged in one connexion or another to deny to them their characteristic forms of activity. It would not do, as he conceived, to admit progress in knowledge on the part of Christ, as this would contravene the truth that the hypostatic union of the human with the Divine in Him was complete from the start. For a like reason it was considered inadmissible to impute real prayer to Him. Divinity needs nothing, and a humanity that is perfectly united with Divinity shares in its sufficiency. In relation to the will also the Damascene considered it necessary to retrench from the proper human mode. The logical issue of his representations is to deny to the human will in Christ all power of initiative, and to reduce it entirely to the office of a 'medium through which the Logos moved the man Jesus.' Quite possibly John of Damascene does not afford the best specimen of what can be done in Christological construction with the notion that the human nature of Christ, being without personality of its own, derived such personal character as pertained to it from its relation to the person of the Logos. But certainly it is difficult in the light of his exposition to discover the real Son of Man. The image of a genuine and living manhood does not stand forth in his representation of the Redeemer.

It has sometimes been concluded that a special advantage belongs to the doctrine of the impersonality of the human nature of Christ, as helping to explain the atoning efficacy of His work. The inference is made that human nature in this character is not a concrete, limited entity, such as is the human nature of the individual man, but rather generic or universal. It is then argued that Christ in perfecting His own human nature sanctified human nature in general. Again, it is claimed that, in virtue of His literal community with men, His doing was in the proper sense a transaction within, as well as for, the whole body of humanity. As an eminently spiritual writer has expressed the thought, 'every man was a part of Him, and He felt the sins of every man, not in sympathy, but in sorrow and abhorrence' (Thomas Erskine). To such representations it is legitimate to reply, that what needs to be sanctified is not human nature in itself, but myriads of human beings; that the sanctification of human nature in Christ cannot rationally be conceived to have any immediate effect upon its sanctification elsewhere, inasmuch as human nature in Christ cannot be regarded as a stuff out of which men universally are fashioned; and that a generic or universal human nature belongs purely to the realm of the conceptual, and cannot possibly have any place in the sphere of real being. In short, the line of representation in question rests upon a fiction which modern philosophy for the most part has discountenanced—the fiction of the real existence of universals.

4. While it is impossible to be satisfied with any one of these historic theories, as respects its bearing on the integrity or concrete reality of Christ's manhood, it is far from easy to offer a definite substitute which is not open to exception. Indeed, an attempt at strict construction is certain to miscarry. The extraordinary as such rebels against complete elucidation, and by supposition the union of the Divine and the human in Christ is an extraordinary fact. Any one who accepts the Incarnation must admit that the individuality of Christ's manhood was specially conditioned; but equally, any one who admits the extraordinary character of the Incarnation must grant the impossibility of giving a full explanation of the mode and measure of this special conditioning. We cannot fully construe our own relation to the Divine; how then should we expect to gain clear insight into the relation of the human to the Divine in the person of our Lord? Probably the best that can be done is to form an ideal picture of the normal relation of perfected manhood to the Divine, and then beyond this to postulate the mystery of a special bond between Christ's manhood and His Divinity. The forming of the ideal picture will be distinctly helpful. For, having clearly apprehended the great truth that manhood loses nothing of its proper character by intimate union with the Divine, that the human spirit is never more itself than when it is possessed by and inspired in the Divine Spirit, that freedom is never so complete as when the human will by its own consent passes under the absolute direction of the Divine will, we shall be prepared to believe that manhood in Christ suffered no retrenchment by its extraordinary union with the Divine, but rather is to be accounted the full-orbed specimen of manhood as respects ethical worth and all tender and beautiful traits.

Taken in a popular sense, rather than in relation to Christological theory, the subject of individuality suggests a discussion of those characteristics which may be regarded as specially distinctive of Christ as a historic personage. This discussion, however, is reserved for the art. UNIQUENESS.

INDOLENCE.—The spirit of Christ's religion is identical to indolence in the sphere of business (Lk 16<sup>1</sup>, Mt 24<sup>8</sup> 25<sup>25</sup>), but more especially indolent Christianity is salt without savour (Mt 5<sup>13</sup>). Not only is a state of salvation hard to maintain (Mt 7<sup>14</sup>), but perfection is to be aimed at (5<sup>48</sup>). An enemy sows tares while we sleep (13<sup>25</sup>). The oil in our lamps consumes as we rest (25<sup>10</sup>). Watchfulness is the very opposite of indolence (26<sup>41</sup>). The hid talent will reproach the indolent in the day of reckoning (25<sup>10</sup>). Most deadly is the spiritual indolence which is satisfied to have Abraham for father (Lk 3<sup>8</sup>, Jn 8<sup>39</sup>), or Christ for Saviour, without response to the impulses of the Holy Spirit, the source of life and motion and progress.

A signal judgment may be executed upon the indolent soul, either after a period of further probation (Lk 13<sup>24-9</sup>), or suddenly and unexpectedly when that day comes as a snare (Lk 21<sup>34</sup>), and the Judge pronounces the sentence (Mk 11<sup>14</sup>). The conscience must be kept awake and intelligent (Mt 5<sup>23-24</sup>). The beginnings of evil must be checked (v. 28<sup>10</sup>). The ears must be open to learn, and the heart ready to believe (11<sup>10</sup>). The rock foundation to build the house upon may need much toil to reach it (7<sup>24</sup>). And continually the servant of Christ must be ready for his Master's coming, with loins girded and lights burning (Lk 12<sup>35</sup>).—Love is not indolent in seeking the lost sheep (Mt 18<sup>12</sup>). Hope is not indolent in running to the sepulchre (Jn 20<sup>1</sup>), or hastening to the manger (Lk 2<sup>8</sup>). Faith is not indolent in pressing through the crowd to be healed (Mk 5<sup>27</sup>). 'The zeal of thine house shall eat me up' (Jn 2<sup>17</sup>). See also art. SLOTHFULNESS.

INFANCY.—

1. The period of infancy, properly speaking, may be taken as lying between the birth of a child and its being weaned; and Hebrew children were usually weaned at two years of age or thereabouts. Quite a number of terms are used in Heb. to describe childhood and youth at various stages; and in this earliest period before a child has become a gāmil (גָּמִיל 'weaned'), there are three different terms that may be applied to him. The infant is ṭāṭ (טָט), the (new-) born (cf. 'bairn,' 'barn'), בָּרִי (the suckling), and בָּרִי (or בָּרִי), also indicating dependence for nourishment. In NT, apart from the general use of μαρ or μαθω, the terms used are (1) βρεφ (applying to the unborn child as well (Lk 1<sup>11</sup>)), and (2) νενησ. The aspect of infancy connoted by νενησ, as contrasted with the Heb. terms, is inability to speak (=Lat. infans). In Mt. 21<sup>16</sup>, in the quotation from Ps 8<sup>3</sup>, LXX, the Greek translators use νενησ as = βρέψ, and the ptop. βρεφ (μαρ as = βρί). With the exception of Lk 18<sup>15</sup>, βρεφ occurs in the Gospels only in Lk.'s account of the birth of Christ; and νενησ, in addition to Mt. 21<sup>16</sup>, only in a figurative use in Mt 11<sup>25</sup>=Lk 10<sup>21</sup>.

2. All that the Gospels have to tell concerning the infancy of Jesus is found in Lk 2 and Mt 2. Excluding the story of the Birth, we have the following series of events:—the Circumcision, the Presentation, the Visit of the Magi, the Flight into Egypt, the Slaughter of the Innocents, the Return and Settlement at Nazareth. The insuperable difficulties in the way of weaving these narratives into a coherent and harmonious whole are now generally recognized. Harmonists have not been able to agree even as to the time-order in which the events should be placed. (Andrews, in his Life of Our Lord, p. 91 f., conveniently shows the diversity that has obtained. If it were a matter of supreme importance to settle such order, Wieseler's view (Chron. Synopsis, i. ch. iii.) seems the most reasonable, arranging as follows:—Circumcision, Presentation (or Purification of Mary), Visit of the Magi, Flight into Egypt and Slaughter of the Innocents, Return to Nazareth. So far, however, as the narrative in Mt 2 is concerned, it is evidently unrelated to Lk.'s account of the infancy of Jesus; it stands as a story by itself, detached from its own context; the opening (τοῦ δὲ Ἰησοῦ γεννηθέντος, κ.τ.λ.) is quite indefinite as a time-expression, and anything like chronological interest is at a minimum.

The accounts of the Infancy comprise: (a) normal features—the Circumcision, the Presentation (=Purification of Mary and Redemption of the Firstborn); and (b) peculiar features—the Visit of the Magi and connected incidents.

As for (a), it is noticeable that we have these particulars given in Lk. alone. The rites appointed to be performed on the birth of a Hebrew boy, a firstborn, were duly carried out. The Circumcision took place on the eighth day (Lk 2<sup>21</sup>), i.e. at the time prescribed by ancient law and usage (Lv 12<sup>3</sup>). Again, after the proper interval (Lv 12<sup>9</sup>) the Purification of Mary with all due rites took place at the Temple (Lk 2<sup>22</sup>).

The νενησ ('their purification') cannot without strain be made to refer to any but both Joseph and Mary who brought the child to Jerusalem (see also v. 38). This, as well as the interpretation making νενησ refer to mother and child (see, e.g., rendering of the Thuenen's Cont. NT) is in conflict with the ritual law (Lv 12); and the reading followed by AV ('her purification'), which has practically no MS authority, is an evident correction to remove the discrepancy.

The offering brought was that prescribed for persons in humble circumstances (Lv 12<sup>8</sup>), though the regulation is so quoted in Lk 2<sup>24</sup> that this does not explicitly appear. The Presentation of the infant Jesus involved at the same time the ancient ceremony of the Redemption of the firstborn son, as the reference to Ex 13<sup>2-15</sup> shows. In our Lord's day a rabbinical regulation had added to the Mosaic rule the condition that the child thus presented and redeemed should be free from physical defect and blemish.

In the Pentateuch this devotion of the male firstborn of both man and beast to Jahweh, carrying with it the necessity of redemption in the case of sons, is traced as to its institution to the smiting of the firstborn in Egypt at the Exodus (Ex 12<sup>29</sup>, Nu 3<sup>12</sup>). There can be little doubt, however, that there is an affinity between this Hebrew custom and the sacrifice of firstlings amongst the Arabs, and that they have a common source in ideas of taboo as associated with the firstborn—ideas belonging to a remote Semitic antiquity (see W. R. Smith, RSP p. 402 ff.).

Yet in connexion with these ordinary incidents of infancy among the Jews we have touches of the unusual, though the forecast of a great destiny thus indicated is not per se an incredible feature of the dawn of such a life. At the Circumcision the name Jesus was given, we are told (Lk 2<sup>21</sup>), in accordance with an angelic intimation to Mary prior to conception (1<sup>31</sup>), a matter in which, it may be noted, a marked contrast with the representation in Mt 1<sup>18-20</sup> appears. At the Presentation the part played by Simeon and Anna (Lk 2<sup>25-38</sup>) forms an unwonted accompaniment of the ceremonies of the occasion, and wonderfully breaks in upon the even recital of customary proceedings (cf. vv. 24-39). The close parallel, however, which exists here with the story of John the Baptist's birth cannot be overlooked. Cf. Lk 1<sup>13-66-68</sup> and 1<sup>21</sup> 2<sup>22</sup>; also 1<sup>25-29</sup> and 2<sup>27-28</sup>. The character of the narratives as a whole, and especially as regards such elements as these, suggests that we have thus conveyed to us 'the traditional Jewish-Christian views of Jesus,' and argues a special Jewish-Christian (Palestinian) source (see Moffatt, Historical NT, p. 651 ff.).

(b) The more peculiar features are furnished by the narrative in Mt 2. It is quite unnecessary to give an outline of the stories themselves; but some notice must be taken of the considerable problems to which they give rise. Did they form from the very first an integral part of Mt.'s Gospel? Considerations of style and general structure favour the probability of their being from another hand than that which furnished the main body of the Gospel. The stories are not the least rejected as without historic basis; nor are we to cast them aside on the arbitrary ground of intrinsic incredibility. But we cannot ignore the striking features of the narrative that raise the question as to what the nature of the narrative precisely is. Consider, e.g., the use made of dream-warnings (vv. 13, 18, 23); the peculiarities in the leading of the 'star' (seen first in the East, then lost sight of—else they had not gone to Jerusalem instead of Bethlehem—only to reappear and go before them to Bethlehem, moving in the heavens, and at last stopping 'over where the young child was'); the symbolic character of the threefold offering (v. 11); and, lastly, the dominant interest in the element of prophetic fulfilment, making each turn in the story answer to some passage from the prophets (vv. 6, 15, 17, 23), the correspondence in some cases being but remote and obscure. We at once characterize as legendary such embroidery of the story of the Magi as makes them 'three kings of Orient,' gives them names, and elaborates their after history, and such features as the ox and the ass incessantly adoring the Child (Gosp. of pseudo-Mt.); but is the story as it stands in Mt. absolutely free from elements of the same order? The narrative is so naive, e.g., that it seems superfluous and beside the mark to venture seriously on calculations to prove that some astronomical phenomenon, such as a conjunction of planets, really explains what is said of the star.

The story of the Massacre of the Innocents cannot be said to be inherently improbable. Herod was not the man to hesitate at such a measure if occasion arose for it. Absence of confirmatory references in history also goes for little when all the circumstances are considered. Macrobius (Saturn. ii. 4), writing in the 5th cent., states that Augustus, hearing that some baby boys of less than two years of age had been put to death at Herod's command, and that the king's own child was amongst those killed, said 'Melius est Herodis porcum esse quam filium.' This looks like a reference; but how strange, if it were so, that the Mt. narrative should fail to notice such a notable circumstance! It is a curious passage, but evidently all its interest is in the Emperor's bon mot, playing on the Gr. terms for 'pig' (5s) and 'son' (uós). It has often been pointed out that the number of little ones slain must have been comparatively small (Eilersheim says 'probably 20 at most,' 1. 214), in correction of later exaggerations (perhaps helped by the vivid language of v. 15); but this does not destroy the pathetic element in such an association with the infancy of our Lord in Christian tradition. But, all things considered, though it is plausible to suggest that we have here a designed Messianic parallel to the deliverance of the infant Moses, the parallel is not so close as to suggest pure invention, and it is difficult to imagine all substratum of fact to be wanting.

Suggestions, also, which see in the 'Repose in Egypt,' as it used to be called, only a typical indication of Jesus as the vine of Israel 'brought out of Egypt' (art. 'Gospels' in Encyc. Bibl. ii. 1780), are not wholly convincing and satisfactory. At the same time, as regards the whole narrative in Mt 2, we must be content to say that the state of our knowledge affords no solution of the difficulties to which it gives rise when compared with the representations of Lk., especially, c. f., in the implication that Joseph and Mary were continuously resident at Bethlehem probably until Jesus was nearly two years old, and that they went to Nazareth to live only after their return from Egypt.

3. The sources of the infancy narratives remain a subject of debate. Speaking of the Mt. document in particular, Sanday says 'we are in the dark' (art. 'Jesus Christ' in Hastings' DB ii. 644). Resch's well-known attempt to establish an original Hebrew 'Childhood-Gospel,' having as parts of its contents both the Lk. and Mt. stories, has failed to carry conviction. An important problem, however, is presented by a comparison of these narratives with the conspicuous features of certain of the Apocryphal Gospels, particularly the Protevangelium of James, the Gospel according to Thomas, and the Arabic Gospel of the Childhood. It may be said that it is just at such a point as this that the apocryphal writings come most noticeably into contact with our Canonical Gospels, as also it is in the ministry and teaching of Jesus that they depart most widely from them. A superabundance of fantastic elements in these Christian Apocrypha is at once revealed on the most superficial comparison: still there are elements in common, and here and there points of close contact. In the Gospel of the Childhood, e. g., we have the story of the Magi woven into the narrative, and Mt 2<sup>d</sup> is almost literally paralleled, as also the adoration and offering of the threefold gift (see H. Silke's edition of 1897, with Lat. tr. p. 17), though at the same time the most curious divergences appear. It is most improbable that our narratives were directly borrowed from any of these apocryphal works and finally incorporated in the Canonical Gospels. It seems also unlikely that our Gospels were used specifically in the production of any of the Apocrypha, and that out of our Gospels the narratives in Mt 1. 2 and Lk. 1. 2 were simply taken for expansion into the extraordinary congeries of marvels of which these extra-canonical writings mostly consist. Why may not canonical and apocryphal accounts have alike originated in a common early tradition, though they have flowed so far apart? It is well to remember that those who promulgated and those who received most of the Apocryphal Gospels sincerely believed themselves to be Christians. Pseudo-Matthew indeed openly professes to be actuated by the love of Christ in writing his wonder-crowded account of the infancy and boyhood of our Lord. Our narratives, however, are characterized by a wonderful simplicity and restraint when compared with such accounts as his; they proclaim themselves so much nearer what the facts must have been. But one source of apocryphal developments appears to have been the deep-seated fondness of Jews for haggadôth (see Donehoo, The Apocryphal and Legendary Life of Christ, p. xix); and one great feature of such haggadôth was the interest shown in connecting OT prophecies with fulfilments. The question suggests itself whether haggadic elements may not even have found their way into our brief canonical narratives. If it be so, it cannot detract from the supreme value of the portraiture of Christ in the Gospels. G. H. Box (in ZNTW, 1905, p. 80 ff.) suggests that Mt 1. 2 are to be regarded as a midrash, which means much the same thing, though otherwise expressed. The historical basis, that is to say, is treated in subservience to edification and the expression of a Messianic faith. See also art. BABE, CHILDHOOD.

J. S. CLEMENS.

INFLUENCE.—I. THE INFLUENCE OF CHRIST DURING HIS LIFE.—(a) On His disciples.—This from the very first was remarkable. The short interview that John and Andrew had with Jesus after He had been pointed out by their old master as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world seems to have carried them away at once. Andrew has no misgivings, but goes off to his brother with the great news that they have found the Messiah (Jn 1st). The disciples, spiritually minded though they were, must have felt all the prejudices that widely existed against the appearance of the Messiah as a poor and undistinguished person from a northern village of no reputation, and yet they were at once conquered. One evening's conversation convinced them that He was their Prince. A like instantaneous recognition is recorded of Bartholomew, if he be, as seems likely, the same as Nathanael. He has difficulties to overcome which he had frankly stated to Philip when he ran in with the same great news that Andrew had told Peter. But they vanish before the presence and words of his Lord. The encouraging description of his own character set Nathanael wondering, and when this was followed by news which showed that He knew of some secret passage in his life, he confesses His greatness in the fullest terms, 'Rabbi, thou art the Son of God, thou art the King of Israel' (1st). In all these cases it is to be noted that the impression is made not by any miracle or sign, but by what Christ was and what He said. A little later there follows the first sign,—the changing of water into wine,—and with it the natural deepening of the hold Christ had on His disciples (2nd). All their previous hopes were confirmed ('crediderunt amplius,' Bengel). Up to this time there are no hostile influences at work. As simple-minded men they probably supposed that all the world would share their sanguine hopes. The cleansing of the Temple, followed as it was by public questioning as to His right to take that bold step (2nd), was probably the first indication that He would not be able to influence all men alike.

From that time onward the attempt to break down our Lord's influence becomes much more definite and decided. His supposed birthplace,—Nazareth,—His humble parentage, His lack of a really good education, all these and many other objections were constantly urged (Jn 7th), and must have caused some difficulty in the disciples' minds. His great assertions that He was the Bread of Life and the Light of the world (Jn 6th—8th 9th), aroused great opposition and lost Him many friends. But when after eighteen months of criticism, obloquy, and insult, He asked His disciples definitely as to their opinion about Him; they replied through Peter without hesitation: 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God' (Mt 16<sup>16</sup>). It is true that this was the conviction they had had at the outset, but it had not been tested, it had not been held against the whole world. The disciples were not fanatics, they were not indifferent to the opinion of their own Church and nation; they felt keenly the opposition and hatred which their view everywhere encountered, and yet they held it. It is a striking proof of our Lord's personal influence. That He knew their difficulties is plain from the fact that He prayed for them before He asked the question (Lk 9<sup>18</sup>). That He rejoiced in their loyalty is also plain from the great words spoken to Peter (Mt 16<sup>17-19</sup>). The Transfiguration followed quickly (Mt 17<sup>1-6</sup>), in order that the three disciples who knew Him best might have something to fall back upon in the greater difficulties that lay before them. Soon our Lord became a proscribed person, not only excommunicated from all the synagogues of the land, but bringing under that ban all His friends (Jn 9<sup>22</sup>). Their loyalty, however, remained unbroken except in one case, that of Judas. This man must have felt our Lord's influence at one time, and indeed been always more or less under it. He could not tear himself away from it, though he was feeling more and more uncomfortable in the barren prospects that Christ's language and the hostility of the world seemed to suggest. Only little by little he stifled it, and we may well believe that it was not till the very last, even after he had promised to betray Him, that it failed. Then St. John (13<sup>37</sup>) adds the significant words: 'After the sop, then entered Satan into him,' and the disciple was lost.

The severest test was felt after the arrest. That the Prince and Messiah should be betrayed by His own people into the hands of the heathen, and that they should clamour for His death, was the greatest trial that a faithful friendship has ever had to bear. It is true the disciples ought to have known their Scriptures; but, like good people to-day, they followed current interpretations instead of searching the Holy Writings for themselves. That our Lord's influence would have remained with them had He not risen again is, of course, certain; but it would have been the influence of a holy life and a great example, not of an abiding Presence and a magnificent hope. This was given them by the Resurrection, which at once illuminated all the perplexities of the past and made His Messiahship a felt reality. And after Pentecost they found their minds and imaginations extraordinarily stimulated by the presence of the Holy Ghost who witnessed to every word and act of the Crucified and Risen Christ.

(b) On the people.—This was as surprising in its own way as His influence on the disciples. 'They heard Him gladly' (Mk 12<sup>37</sup>). They would have taken Him 'by force and made him king' (Jn 6<sup>15</sup>). They prevented any open act of hostility against Him on the part of the rulers, who were afraid of them (Lk 20<sup>19</sup> 22<sup>2</sup>). They never could make up their minds who He was, but yet were convinced He was no ordinary person. He was either Elijah, or the great expected Prophet, or Jeremiah, or even the Baptist risen again (Mt 16<sup>14</sup> 17). That they turned completely round at the last was no doubt due to the malign influence of the Pharisees joined to the great disappointment experienced when nothing followed the events of Palm Sunday. Like the people of Lystra, they were enraged at having openly declared themselves on the side of a movement which seemed to have no result. Our Lord's influence on the people was just what we should expect, as we shall see when we consider its particular character.

(c) On His enemies.—At first it strikes us strangely that One who not only did no harm, but always went about doing good, One who refused to be entangled into any political movement, One who observed fasts and festivals, attended synagogue and temple, should have excited such bitter hostility. He had none of the marks of a great social reformer, disliked crowds and great cities, refused to take advantage of any excitement caused by His words or deeds, chose for His intimate friends plain middle-class men who had no particular mark about them except their religiousness. All His teaching was constructive rather than destructive. He did not speak of the Gentiles as His servant Paul did, nor of the Temple as Stephen did. He was indignant at the abuses of the time, and was unsparing in His condemnation of Pharisees and scribes, but the hostility had set in before that, and its only explanation is the hatred of bad men to a holy life.

(d) On individuals.—(a) The visit of Nicodemus shows something of the power Jesus exercised in public. Although Nicodemus was a person of some importance, he treats our Lord, in spite of His humble circumstances, as not only a great but Divine teacher from whom he would gladly learn (Jn 3<sup>2</sup>). And the conversation with Him on that occasion bore fruit. (β) Pilate, too, was evidently greatly impressed by Jesus. With his in-born contempt for the Jews he would have decided the matter the Sanhedrin brought before him very quickly, had it not been for the majesty of Jesus' presence and the brief but striking words He spoke. That he should have been afraid when the Jews told him that the prisoner had claimed to be the Son of God and at once sought another interview, shows that there was a mysterious influence about our Lord which made the governor feel uncomfortable; and this fear was only increased when his question, 'Whence art thou?' received no answer (Jn 18<sup>13</sup>). (γ) Even Caiaphas treats Christ with a respect which he would have gladly dispensed with. His continued silence led the high priest to take the very unusual step of forcing some statement out of Him by solemn adjuration (Mt 26<sup>63</sup>). (δ) The most touching illustrations of Christ's influence are found amongst the sinful. They were drawn to Him as steel to the magnet. He was their friend (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>), to whom they could give their confidences. Tired of life they turned instinctively to Him, and gladly gave Him their all. Matthew, Zaccheus, Mary Magdalene, the woman that was a sinner, are only typical of hundreds of men and women who came to Him because they were sure of His love, and recognized that He had power to forgive.

2. SECRET OF CHRIST'S INFLUENCE.—(a) Not the influence of His position as Son of God.—When we remember who He was, the Word made flesh, the eternal Son of God, we are perhaps surprised that our Lord never used the influence of His unique position. Had He chosen, He could have done what He was tempted to do, forced men to believe by some plain unmistakable wonder like that of throwing Himself from the pinnacle of the Temple (Mt 4<sup>9</sup>). He could have appeared as the great I AM attended by legions of angels (26<sup>53</sup>). He could have declared authoritatively that He was the great God, and proved it by the destruction of the towns and villages which denied it (Lk 9<sup>26</sup>). He could have used His position and forced men to recognize it. And again and again, as the above references show, He was tempted to do it. But He rejected the temptation. It is a method, as we know, freely employed in the world, and widely popular. People prefer the influence of the direct to the indirect. They like to have some sign from heaven which will save them the trouble of thinking, and be a short cut to a difficult conclusion. And the Jews were always seeking this (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>); always hoping that He would either show that His claims were invalid and that He was unable to give a sign, or satisfy their curiosity by some miracle. Our Lord tells them that, even if He gave them a sign, the sign of a man risen from the dead, it would have no effect in changing their lives (Lk 16<sup>7</sup>). It may be asked—But what about His miracles? In the first place, they were never done as a proof of His claims. He never proclaimed a great truth and then worked a miracle to show it was true. They were all in obedience to an earnest call for help; and faith, where it could be had, was a condition essential to His working (Mk 6<sup>9</sup>). When done, they were evidences, but only secondary to the evidence of His own personality. If men were too dull to believe in Him for what He was, then there was still the sign of His works. 'Though ye believe not me, believe the works' (Jn 10<sup>38</sup>); 'Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me; or else believe me for the very works' sake' (14<sup>11</sup>).

(b) Not the influence of popularity.—In the next place, Jesus did not seek influence through flattering people or rulers. Satan recognized in Christ extraordinary attractive powers. His love and manners were such that He could, had He chosen, have won over the whole world to His side. Never in anyone had there been such rich human gifts, such wide sympathies, such intimate knowledge of men's ways and hearts. Satan's attempt to persuade Christ to do him homage (Mt 4<sup>9</sup> || Lk 4<sup>7</sup>) was more subtle than is often supposed. It was the temptation to win, through flattery of the world-power,—a path that has again and again been pursued by great men. It is needless to point out that Christ never sought influence that way. The Pharisees and Herodians only expressed the general feeling in saying, 'Master, we know that thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth, and carest not for anyone; for thou regardest not the person of men' (Mt 22<sup>24</sup>).

(c) The influence of personality.—Christ influenced men not by the majesty of His position nor by His marvellous works, but by His personality. It was what He was more than what He said or did. Men felt about Him that He was always infinitely greater than anything He said. And it was because of the tremendous force that sprang forth from His personality that He could say the most amazing things without amazing. It must be remembered that the disciples were, during His lifetime, feeling their way towards the mystery of His Person. They did not know at first what they knew afterwards. And yet they could feel thankful for teaching which placed Him before wife and child, before brother or sister (Mt 10<sup>2</sup>). They welcomed Him as the Way, the Truth, and the Life. He did not point it out, for He was it. He did not give it as something apart from Himself. All this, which would have been intolerable from anyone else, was a relief from Him, as it expressed in words their own feelings (7<sup>2</sup>). So, too, the weight of His authority was not that of the scribes, dependent on others, but that derived from His own personality. It was this that astonished the people, who were accustomed in their teachers to quotations from others and to second-hand information. With Him it was always personal: 'We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen' (Jn 3<sup>1</sup>). Now and again it flashed forth in a way that dazzled and overpowered, as when the men of Nazareth wished to fling Him over the cliff, as when those of Jerusalem would have stoned Him, as when those sent to arrest Him fell back when He declared who He was (Lk 4<sup>29</sup>, Jn 8<sup>59</sup> 18<sup>6</sup>).

(d) Power of the Holy Ghost.—Beyond all this there is something far more difficult to explain, viz. the effect of the descent of the Holy Ghost at His Baptism. When the Baptist was asked to account for the influence of Christ, he replied, 'A man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven,' and went on to say that not only was the Christ above all as coming from above, but that He was endowed with the Spirit beyond all measure (Jn 3<sup>34</sup>). It would seem, though the passage is not clear, that part of His influence was due to the co-operation of the Holy Ghost with His own spirit. The Holy Ghost given to man in such measure as man's limitations allow, was given to the infinite heart and mind of Christ fully, infinitely, without bound. And in the power of that Divine Spirit He began His ministry (Lk 4<sup>18-21</sup>), not only teaching men's minds, but by the 'finger of God' (11<sup>20</sup>)—an expression interpreted by some of the Holy Ghost—casting out devils. But whatever may be the mystery of the union of the Holy Spirit with Christ, it is certain that He laid stress on this Power as being that which would be the source of the influence His disciples should exercise.

3. INFLUENCE OF THE DISCIPLES.—All Christ's disciples, without exception, were to be influential. The words, 'Ye shall receive power, when the Holy Ghost is come upon you' (Ac 1<sup>8</sup>), were probably spoken to the 120 disciples, numbering some women amongst them. They were to rely upon Him. He had told them previously that in the difficult situations which persecutions would create, they were not to be anxious as to how best to answer the accusations of their adversaries; He Himself would give them 'a month and wisdom,' and then further explained by saying, 'for it is not ye that speak, but the Holy Spirit' (Lk 21<sup>14</sup>). They were then to influence the world not primarily by intellectual power or by wonderful signs, but by that which is deeper than thought or gifts, namely, their own personality. It would be what they were, not what they had, the power of their own inner spirit, not that of cleverness; and this through the power of the Eternal Spirit. Spirit can be touched only by spirit, personality can be developed only by personality. When, then, the Holy Spirit came down upon them on the Day of Pentecost, it was the depths, not the surface of their lives, that were stirred. It was not the development of mere intellectual gifts which enabled them to communicate with others, but such an enlargement of their own spirits that they felt in touch with the whole world, and in their struggle to express this rush of sympathy, found a language suitable for each person with whom they came in contact. So afterwards we do not find the gift of tongues a new language, but rather an endeavour to express the new enlargement of their own spirit. They felt more than they could express, more sometimes than their minds could recognize (1 Co 14<sup>2</sup>). And this growth of personality is what we see even in the brief records of the NT: Simon becomes Peter; Levi, Matthew; Bartholomew, Nathanael; Joseph, Barabbas; and Saul, Paul. Their characters are not only stronger, but fuller and larger, and through them they built up churches, and changed the face of the world in which they lived. Our Lord never supposes they will be effective through education or culture or the presence of gifts. 'Apart from me ye can do nothing' (Jn 15<sup>5</sup>). But the co-operation which He promises as the secret of their success is not that of a master who gets over his pupil's difficulty by solving it for him, but that of one who by his sympathy, power, and skill enables him to meet it for himself. Christ dwelt in them through faith by the power of the Holy Spirit, and worked in them and through them in every painful task they had to accomplish.

INHERITANCE (Mt 21<sup>28</sup>, Mk 12<sup>7</sup>, Lk 20<sup>14</sup>; Lk 12<sup>13</sup>: κληρονομία, derived from κληρος, 'lot,' 'portion,' 'possession,' and νέμεω, 'to own or administer').—The ordinary Biblical idea of inheritance is 'the enjoyment by a rightful title of that which is not the fruit of personal exertion. The heir being what he is in relation to others, enters upon a possession which corresponds with his position; but there is no necessary thought of succession to one who has passed away' (Westcott, Epistle to the Hebrews, p. 168). In the Gospels, however, the idea of succession to a deceased person is the prominent one, as with ourselves. The difference between the ordinary ancient and the ordinary modern conception of inheritance is this: We have more regard to the mere change in the ownership of certain property which takes place: the ancient civilized races looked rather to the position of the heir as executor and administrator of the deceased's property, and as the person who, being clothed, so to speak, with the personality of the deceased, took upon himself all the obligations of the testator, as well as the continuance of his race and the perpetuation of his family religion. The last considerations were the most prominent, and account for the prevalence of adoption in ancient society.

An adopted son, or a relative conjoined to marry the deceased's daughter, could carry on the family and its rites as well as a real son. (See Maine's Ancient Law, ch. vi., and artt. 'Heir' and 'Inheritance' in Hastings' DB). See also art. HEIR.

ALEX. SOUTER.

INN.—Inns in the time of Christ were neither so infrequent nor so ill-equipped as many writers have represented.

Thus Stapfer (Palestine in the Time of Christ, 1866, p. 222), quoting from the Talmud a story of some Levites, who, travelling from Zoar, left at an inn one of their number who had fallen ill upon the road (Feb. xvi. 7), adds the comment, 'Such hostilities were rare, and were found only in very remote places.' Other writers convey the impression that the only inns existing in Palestine were a few khans, as bare and comfortless as those now found in many parts of the East, and often described by modern travellers (see, e.g., Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, 1822, p. 89; Leyard, Win. and Edn., 1828, p. 408; Kinglake, Soften, ch. xvii.; also Kitto's Cyc., art. 'Caravanserais'; and Vigouroux's Dict., art. 'Caravanserais').

This seems to the present writer a mistaken inference, arising partly from exaggerated notions of Oriental hospitality, and partly from attributing to the 1st cent. A.D. social conditions which prevailed, it is true, in patriarchal times, and are found even now on the great trade and pilgrim routes across the desert, but did not obtain to anything like the same degree in the busy, populated, and prosperous country of the Herods. The customary hospitality of the East (see Hastings' DB, s.v., and art. 'Guest' in Hamburger's RE) may, of course, be a reason why inns in the modern sense of the word should be less needed than in Western countries; but the statement that 'the warm commendations of hospitality in the NT show that even in the Roman period the buildings set apart for strangers to lodge in were of a simple character in Palestine' (Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Inn'), requires considerable modification.

Some of these commendations obviously refer to the interchange of courtesies among members of the Christian community only (e.g. Ro 12<sup>13</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>9</sup>, 3 Jn 9), while others which definitely mention 'strangers' and 'enemies' are not necessarily any indication of the rarity and poverty of existing places of entertainment, but a sign of the new Christian spirit (Ro 12<sup>13</sup>, He 13<sup>9</sup>). Ramsay argues (Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol. p. 294a) that the motive of this urging of hospitality was the desire to preserve Christian converts from the corrupting influences among which they would be thrown at the public inns.

Numerous passages are cited from the Talmud to prove the extent to which hospitality prevailed among the Jews; but this traditional virtue was probably more praised than practised in the 1st century. The conditions peculiar to a nomad life came to be very materially modified when the countryside was covered with populous villages and towns. It is true that, at the Passover, if a Jew came up to Jerusalem from any part of the empire, he would find entertainment at a private house. It was the basis of the Rabbinic that, notwithstanding the crowds, no man could say, 'I have not found a bed in Jerusalem to lie in' (Lightfoot, Works, 1823, ix. p. 128); but what if the Jew came at some other time than at one of the great national feasts? What if a Samaritan came? Moreover, there was a large population of heathen; and even if Jewish habits of hospitality to Jews were equal in practice to the theory, no provision was made for the Gentile. Even to a Jew a Jew would shut his door. When Jesus is sending out His disciples to preach, He does not take it for granted that they will always find a ready welcome or free entertainment (Mt 10<sup>11-14</sup>, Mk 6<sup>10-11</sup>, Lk 10<sup>10-11</sup>).

Nor is it safe to argue from the comparative silence of contemporary records that inns were rare. It would not be guessed by a reader of the Gospels that in Jerusalem there were many synagogues.* It is quite possible that there were almost as many inns in Jerusalem. At any rate, it is misleading to make the general statement, as though it applied to all periods of Jewish history, that 'inns in our sense of the term were, as they still are, unknown in the East' (McClintock and Strong, Cyc. s.v.). A truer view is given in the Jewish Encyc. (art. 'Caravanserais'): 'By NT times the Holy Land had been sufficiently developed to afford opportunity for real inns.'

The influx of Greeks into Palestine, the constant presence of a large Roman element, civil and military, the mixed retinue attached to the Herodian court, the increase of trade, the importation of foreign workmen, the presence in several towns of companies of gladiators, actors, and the like,—would necessitate not only inns, but various kinds and grades of inns.

There were inns built on a large scale, comfortable and elegant, suited for high officials (see CHL iii. 612, where Mommsen explains pretoria as 'diversoria nobiliora magistratibus iter facilius reliquique honestioribus destinata'). Epictetus draws a picture of a traveller lingering at a fine hotel because he finds everything agreeable there (Diss. ii. xiii. 86). Josephus (Ant. xv. v. 1) relates that when Herod the Great was celebrating games at Caesarea, he entertained a number of ambassadors and other visitors at the public inns (καταξωματα). On the other hand, there were inns of the lowest description. At the same port of Caesarea there would doubtless be a number of taverns for sailors (cf. Jos. BJ i. xxi. 7). The numerous Talmudic references to inns (which, of course, must be used with some degree of caution) indicate that they were a distinct feature of social life, e.g. 'a public inn in which Israelites come and go' (Aboda Zara, v. 3); 'An Israhelite and a heathen were once at an inn drinking wine' (ib.); 'R. Papa used to stand outside the store of the heathen and drink his beer' (ib. 4). R. Ishmael bar Jose declared that his father used to pray in an inn (ib. iv. 7); 'Cups must not be placed in the inns of heathen' (Aboda Zara, ii. 1).

There can be little doubt that there were numerous taverns where food as well as drink could be obtained (cf. Franz Delitzsch, Jewish Artizan Life in the Time of Christ, p. 47). Not only heathen were innkeepers, but Jews; not only men, but women. 'A Jewish woman dealing in wine once left her keys in charge of a heathen, and the question came up whether her wine she has in the tavern is allowed' (Aboda Zara, v. 3).

Jülicher (Gleichnisse, ii. p. 590; cf. Bertholet, * See Talm. Bab. Kethub. 105a; Jerus. Megilla, 73d (although, of course, the 400 is a characteristic exaggeration).

Die Stellung der Israeliten und der Juden zu den Fremden, p. 24) rightly maintains that the inn of Lk 10<sup>8</sup>, to which the good Samaritan took his patient, was a hostelry ('nicht bloß Caravanseral sondern Gasthaus'). The word used in this passage (καρδύκειον) is significant. It was taken over into Rabbinic Hebrew, and is the usual word (קָרַד) for 'inn' in the Talmud. The Greek name shows that inns were largely a product of the Hellenistic period (see Schlüter, HTP II. 1. 33). Other Rabbinic terms, קָרַד and קָרַד, are equivalents of hospitium and ξενία; and as these replace the OT terms פָּרַק and מָוֶה, they seem to indicate that something is intended quite different from the khan of the lonely road or the 'lodging-place of wayfaring men in the wilderness' (Jer 9<sup>1</sup>).

It is difficult to fix the exact significance of καρδύκειον, the other word used in the Gospels for 'inn.' Etymologically, it means 'the place where burdens were loosed for the night.' In Lk 2<sup>7</sup> it is generally taken to mean an inn of the khan type. Polybius uses it in the plural form (II. xxxv. 1). Diodorus (xiv. 43) relates that the Romans, in gratitude for the services of one Timasitheus, granted him ἐπιτόκιον καρδύκειον.* The καρδύκειον of Mk 14<sup>14</sup> and Lk 22<sup>11</sup>, where the Last Supper was eaten, is generally supposed to have been a private house (Hastings' DB, art. 'Inn'); and the use of the verb καρδύκειο, as in Lk 19<sup>7</sup>, is quite in keeping with this. Nothing very definite, however, can be deduced from these names as to the precise character of the place of lodging.

Did Jesus Himself ever enter or stay at inns? It is usually assumed that His disciples always provided hospitality for Him. Yet the only recorded cases in which He accepted it are those of Peter's house at Capernaum and the house at Bethany. The words, 'the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head' (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>, Lk 9<sup>58</sup>), suggest that hospitality was not always forthcoming. We know that it was not in Samaria (Lk 9<sup>52</sup>) and among the Geraseses (8<sup>27</sup>). During a considerable part of the year it would be no hardship to spend the night in the open air, and apparently Jesus often preferred this, that He might have opportunity for quiet prayer, and more privacy than would be possible in a house or an inn. (Cf. J. L. Porter, Giant Cities of Bashan, 1866, pp. 157-159; also, for the habits of St. Francis and his followers, P. Sabatier, Vie, 1894, p. 88 f.). There is, however, no reason against His having resorted upon occasion to places of public entertainment. These were sometimes kept by Jews; but, if kept by a Gentile, this would not necessarily deter Him from going in. Strict Jews objected to entering the house of a Gentile, lest they should incur defilement (Jn 18<sup>28</sup>, cf. Hausrath, Hist. NT Times, ii. 85); but Jesus, while recognizing that His mission was to Jews primarily, never allowed His action to be limited by ceremonial considerations. For instance, He did not hesitate, in spite of protest, to visit the house of Zacchæus, and the freedom of His intercourse with all kinds of people brought on Him the charge of being a 'wine-bibber,' and of consorting with the lowest classes (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>, Lk 7<sup>34</sup>). His desire to seek 'the lost' suggests that He would not avoid the places where these were most likely to be found.

In this connexion it is interesting to note that the Talmud has the following passage: 'In the time of the Messiah the people will be impatient, and be given to drinking; public-houses will flourish, and the vine will be dear' (Sotâ, quoted in M'Clintock and Strong's Cyc., art. 'Inn').

The reputation of inns seems to have been generally bad; they were very often houses of ill-fame, and hostesses were looked upon with suspicion.

* In inscriptions in the Hauran we find ἐπιτόκιον καρδύκειον (Le Bas and Waddington, vol. iii. n. 2462).

Yet some of the larger inns would bear a better character and be centres of influence, and there is no reason why Jesus should not have visited them. In most countries and periods the itinerant preacher has found the public inn to be a soil where the word might readily take root. (Cf. Fox, Journal, 1901, vol. i. pp. 118, 261, 258; Wesley, Journal, under March 1738; Borrow, Bible in Spain, passim).

INNOCENCE.—Innocence, strictly speaking, denotes the entire absence of sin in a human soul. As such, in its primary meaning, we have no personal experience of it in ourselves or in others. 'For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God' (Ro 3<sup>23</sup>). We can, therefore, have no actual knowledge of what would be the effect of this quality upon a human character. In this sense it is an attribute of Jesus Christ alone among men, who 'was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (He 4<sup>15</sup>); 'who knew no sin' (2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>); who could address to His watchful foes the challenge, 'Which of you convicteth me of sin?' (Jn 8<sup>46</sup>). The gulf between innocence and the state of the soul that has once committed sin can be realized only as we comprehend the nature of sin and its immeasurable depravity and consequences. See art. SINLESSNESS. (For the subject of our Lord's innocence of the charges which led to His crucifixion, see art. TRIAL OF JESUS CHRIST).

Innocence in a comparative sense may be attributed to men who, though fallen, are yet, in respect of particular sins, innocent, or who from circumstances of upbringing, or by the special grace of God, are shielded from that knowledge of sin by personal experience which is the common lot of men. Such a man was John the Baptist, who 'was in the deserts until the day of his shoving unto Israel' (Lk 1<sup>80</sup>). It has been said that there are only two states of life open to the man who wishes to serve God. The one is the state of innocence, the other of penitence. John the Baptist may be taken as a type of the one, St. Peter of the other. It must not be supposed that innocence implies ignorance or weakness. If John the Baptist, in whose life no fall is recorded, the essence of whose career is one unbroken record of devotion to the service of God, be taken as a type of innocence, he is pre-eminently the stern masculine type of character, and he displays great knowledge of men and power of dealing with the varied temptations of soldiers, publicans, and professors of religion.

The temptation specially addressed to innocence is the knowledge of evil as well as good (Gn 3<sup>7</sup>), but the experience of evil which entails the irrecoverable loss of innocence is not wisdom in the true sense of the word. 'The knowledge of wickedness is not wisdom' (Sir 19<sup>23</sup>). Innocence possesses an intuitive perception of right and wrong, observable in the child, which becomes blunted by the indigence of sin; it also implies a strength which is lost by a fall. Each successive lapse from innocence makes the soul weaker in that particular direction in which the fall has taken place.

For further treatment of this subject the reader may be referred to a sermon on the subject in Hingworth's University and Cathedral Sermons, p. 99 ff.

INNOCENTS.—In Mt 2<sup>16-18</sup> we find the narrative of what is called the Massacre of the Innocents. Adopting the language of Jer 31<sup>15</sup>, the Evangelist represents Rachel, the ancestral mother of the people of Israel, as weeping over the cruel death of her children. Herod the Great, hearing from the Magi about the birth of a king of the Jews, foreshadowed by the star in the East which they had followed, inquired of the chief priests and scribes where this promised prince should be born. They quoted to him the words of Micah (5<sup>3</sup>), who speaks of the governor ruling Israel, who is to come out of Bethlehem in Judah, the city of David. When the Magi, having offered their gifts before the young child at Bethlehem, refused to inform Herod, but returned to their own country another way, the enraged king gave orders that all the children from two years old and under should be slain. This was done with much cruelty, so that in Bethlehem and the surrounding country there was great lamentation.

The truth of this story has been questioned. The chief ground is the silence of Josephus on the subject. While he speaks of many cruel deeds of Herod, he passes this one by. But it is plainly quite a piece with Herod's well-known character, and, indeed, compared with his other deeds of monstrous cruelty, it would easily escape notice. The whole number of victims, probably not more than twenty or thirty, would not make a very great sensation at that time. Besides, the whole of Josephus' statements in regard to the Messianic expectations and doings of his time are to be looked upon with some suspicion, for he seems to have been ready to make many clear and direct allusions to those matters. See INFANCY.

The deed illustrates well Herod's general character for bloodthirsty cruelty and short-sighted folly. But all his efforts to defeat the purposes of God with His people turn out to be vain. Joseph, warned in a dream by the angel, took Mary and the young child hastily down to Egypt, where they could calmly await the death of the tyrant. Heaven's vengeance soon fell on the blood-stained usurper, dyed with so many inhuman crimes, and he passed away from earth under the maledictions of his down-trodden people.

INSIGHT.—In ordinary literary usage the word 'insight' is employed to signify the intellectual apprehension of the cause or processes to which an object or event owes its origin, as distinguished from the mere perception of the object or event itself. We get an insight into the working of a steam-engine, e.g., when we have mastered the principles of engineering; or into some great political crisis, when the various motives that acted upon the minds of the statesmen who took part in it are revealed to us. Insight is also used to designate the faculty that penetrates into the causes that lie behind appearances. A man of practical insight is a man of quick discernment of the principles that determine the appearance of the objects or events that are recurrent in the business or intercourse of life. A man of political insight is a man who instinctively understands what the community will think, desire, or do at any particular period or special conjunction of circumstances.

In the spiritual or metaphysical sphere, 'insight' has the same double meaning. It is the immediate apprehension of the spiritual significance of truths that can be stated as objective facts. It is also the faculty of the higher reason which intuitively grasps this spiritual significance. Goethe says: 'There are men who put their knowledge in the place of insight.' Here the word is used in the first sense of intuitive apprehension of spiritual truth. 'Jealousy to resist metaphor,' says Francis Newman, 'does not testify to depth of insight.' Here it is the faculty that is referred to. The limits or even the precise nature of this faculty of insight have never been adequately defined. It is used of those subtle processes of thought that elude the syllogistic reason, but with which all are more or less familiar in experience. It is used also to designate that higher faculty of the soul through which the mystic claims to attain to the immediate cognition of the Absolute in its pure being.

Generally it may be said that, in the religious meaning of the word, insight is direct perception of, or the faculty of the soul that perceives, the spiritual order that lies behind phenomena. Sight sees the visible, the phenomenal; insight grasps the invisible, the noumenal. The very definition involves a theory. It implies that there is in the universe a spiritual order, of which man is a constituent element, to perceive; that the noumenal is real, and that what is called immediate cognition of it conveys genuine knowledge, knowledge that can be relied upon as a safe guide to action. It is clear that this theory cannot be proved by any of the ordinary processes of reasoning, seeing it is the result of an immediate cognition which is valid only for the individual. Sight carries its own evidence; and insight, which is the higher sight, must do the same. Truths which come to us through insight, and which press themselves home to the soul with irresistible conviction, must prove themselves in experience by their power of explaining the facts and solving the problems of life. Experience must be the ultimate test of reality. Truths of insight are the postulates of experience. The soul recognizes its immediate cognitions as corresponding with reality, because they are necessary to make its experience rational.

It is a characteristic of Jesus that with Him sight is insight. The spiritual vision is to Him so clear that it is unnecessary to designate the faculty or its object by another term. Jesus is the only-begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father (Jn 1<sup>9</sup>)—the Logos which was with God and which was God (v. 1). Jesus sees God as no man can see Him, for human vision of God can only be through the light with which He illumines the soul (v. 18). Because of this unique relation with the ultimate spiritual Reality, His insight into the nature of God is a clear and open vision. The claims He makes, therefore, as to His intimate union with God are the outcome of a personal consciousness which is part of His essential being. It is similar to our own assurance of selfhood. When Jesus says, 'I and the Father are one' (10<sup>30</sup>), He is as certain of the fact as when we say, 'I am I.' For Jesus is living in a realm where the object of consciousness is not deflected and refracted by the illusions of sense or the distortions of passion, but where the spirit sees things as they are. It is the realm of pure Reality. There the soul sees what is, not what seems to be. And, further, Jesus thus living in the Absolute and Eternal, sees the lives of men and the processes of history purely in the light of their spiritual issues. What touches His consciousness in the great human drama is the hidden movement that is working out human destiny. With Him the fact is merely the symbol, and the symbol has become so luminous that His vision is always of the spiritual processes of which it is an indication. Browning in the Epistle of Korzhin, the Arab Physician, has made a daring attempt to get into a consciousness similar to that of Jesus, by trying to imagine how a man whose soul had assimilated the pure spiritual environment of heaven, would feel and act were he permitted to come back to earth and to envisage life from the standpoint of the new experience. It would be 'Heaven opened to a soul while yet on earth, Earth forced on a soul's use while seeing heaven.'

The attempt is strikingly suggestive, but Lazarus remains a man with a finite soul, who cannot find his true function in what is now an alien environment. With Jesus this spiritual consciousness was so perfect that it mastered its alien environment and moved through it calmly and serenely, indicating its true place in the Divine purpose, and giving the right interpretation to all its manifestations. The teaching of Jesus is thus a key to the meaning of life, because He sees life in its essence, and has a sure insight into those hidden processes that are evolving the visible order of existence.

And again, from His very nature, the insight of Jesus into the individual souls of men is no less sure and unerring. He reads the human soul like an open book. He needed not that any should testify of man, for He knew what was in man (Jn 2<sup>25</sup>). He could trace accurately the working of the ideas He was instilling into the minds of His disciples, as they mingled with their own crude religious conceptions (6<sup>6</sup>). He understood perfectly the feeling of instinctive resistance that arose within the minds of the Pharisees at the impact of spiritual truth upon the hard crust of an artificial religionism which had become part of their very nature (Lk 6<sup>5</sup>, Mt 12<sup>29</sup>). And He recognized the uprising of a pure spiritual emotion in the hearts even of the most degraded when it was spontaneous and genuine (Lk 7<sup>34</sup>), while He could repress and discourage the most fervent offer of devotion when He detected in it a vein of insincerity (9<sup>27-28</sup>). It was this insight into human nature which was the secret of His amazing power over men in the days of His flesh. It is a faculty possessed by men in very varying degrees. Its accuracy and intensity depend upon the richness of a man's nature—upon his knowledge of and sympathy with the gamut of human emotion. There have been many men of wonderful insight, and therefore of strong personal magnetism. But man's insight is always obscured by individual bias and by the obstruction of the medium of sense which conceals the soul's working. Men are always more or less deceived, and even men of the keenest insight often break down in their reading of character at the point where it is most essential for them to be right. Jesus was perfect man, and therefore His sympathy with men was full and entire, and touched human nature at every point. For Jesus, who viewed human life in the light of eternity, the sense-medium did not exist. It was the spirit that was always before His vision, and therefore His knowledge of the human heart was instinctive and unerring. Hence it was that the method of Jesus in dealing with diverse types of character is so full of suggestiveness and instruction.

This conception of the consciousness of Jesus must be kept clearly in mind when we study His sayings. His is a consciousness that moves freely in the realm of pure Reality, and visualizes God, human destiny, and the individual soul in the light of their eternal relations. Hence those marvellous revelations of the essence of the Divine Nature in its correspondence to human needs and human aspirations. Hence, too, it results that it is the spiritual meaning of human actions alone that gives them value to Him, and the measure of their value is the degree of spiritual vitality they indicate. Thus Jesus continually reverses the valuations of the world, which are based on the theory of the reality of the objects of sense-perception. He that is greatest among men is he that is the servant of all (Mk 9<sup>35</sup>). The two mites thrown by the widow into the Temple treasury are a more munificent offering than the costly gifts of the Pharisees, because they represent a greater degree of sacrifice (12<sup>33-34</sup>). The action of Mary in breaking over the head of Jesus the alabaster box of very precious ointment, is one of the memorable events of history, because it indicates a fine perception of what is due to the Lord of life at the supremely critical moment of world-development (Mk 14<sup>3</sup>, Jn 12<sup>3</sup>). Jesus gives to the penitent thief the assurance of immediate entry into Paradise, because full and adequate penitence for sin is itself the crossing of the threshold of the spiritual realm (Lk 23<sup>43</sup>). If this clue be rigorously applied, it solves many of the difficulties that beset a literal exegesis of the words of Jesus. It is especially significant when we study His apocalyptic utterances. Here the difficulty of interpretation frequently lies in the fact that the commentator often attempts to force upon them a materialistic meaning that was never intended. Language is material, and has been constructed primarily to indicate the phenomena of sense-perception. When it is used to describe spiritual processes, the ideas conveyed must be detached from the medium of conveyance, if they are to be rightly understood. Jesus lived in the noumenal world. What He saw there He could convey to the souls of His hearers only by the use of words that had been coined to connote totally different conceptions. When Nathanael, struck by Jesus' recognition of him under the fig-tree, hails Him as the Son of God, Jesus says: 'Because I said unto thee, I saw thee under the fig-tree, believest thou? . . . Verily, verily, I say unto you, Henceforth ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man' (Jn 1<sup>50-51</sup>). It is significant that the AV translates ἀπ' ἄρτι 'hereafter.' The translators were evidently dominated by the idea that Jesus is describing a physical marvel which Nathanael will witness in the distant future. But Jesus clearly means that the intercourse of Nathanael with Himself will bring heaven to his soul, and enable him to realize that a living link of communication has been established between God and man.

The words of Jesus regarding death, judgment, His second coming, and the life to come, can be interpreted with rigorous precision, even although they clothe spiritual conceptions with a material garb. They are not mere metaphors, for a metaphor is rarely, if ever, the exact counterpart of the idea it illustrates. Jesus is dwelling in eternity and contemplating the processes of the spiritual world, and He conveys to the receptive soul by the only medium at His command the impression He Himself receives from His direct vision of the truth He is envisaging. The medium is of value only in so far as it serves its purpose. To the irresponsible soul it has no meaning or value at all. To the soul that has the faculty of vision the words are luminous, and reveal God's secrets. There is no question here of metaphor except in so far as nine-tenths of spoken words are metaphorical. There is nothing overstrained or untrue.

The bearing of this on the doctrine of Revelation cannot here be overlooked. Revelation is insight in its intensest form. The revelation granted to the prophets in OT times was their insight into the meaning of God's ways, their vision of the spiritual processes through which the higher life of humanity is evolved. The revelation granted to the Apostles was their response to the brilliancy of the light that streamed from the Eternal Word during the brief period of His incarnation. Jesus reveals because He is the Light of the world. He never argues. He knows nothing of the dialectic process in pressing home the higher truths to the soul. He sees and He would have others to see, and only in so far as they see is He capable of blessing them (Jn 12<sup>44-46</sup>). It follows that all revelation is personal, and incommunicable from one man to another. Only the Triune God is the Revealer of the spiritual mystery. A written revelation is thus, in the strict meaning of the words, a contradiction in terms. The Bible is not a revelation, but a record of a series of revelations that were given to men of insight, men who possessed the faculty of vision. Its purpose is not to reveal, but to put the soul in an attitude of expectancy by telling what other men have seen. It is the Holy Spirit that quickens the soul and conveys the gift of vision to which alone Divine Truth can be revealed. This is everywhere the doctrine of Scripture, and has never been more clearly or beautifully stated than in the Westminster Confession of Faith (ch. i. par. 5).

Jesus invariably attaches a knowledge of the Divine mysteries to a certain spiritual attitude apart from which nothing can be known. It is the pure in heart who see God (Mt 5<sup>8</sup>). It is the doer of God's will who alone can judge of the truth of His doctrine (Jn 7<sup>18-17</sup>). The sin of the Pharisees is that they are blind while they think they see (9<sup>41</sup>). No matter with what brilliancy the light may shine, so long as the spiritual orb is darkened it can reveal nothing of the wonders of the spirit-land (1<sup>8</sup>). And St. Paul says that no man knoweth the things of God; it is the Spirit of God alone who knoweth them; and only in so far as the spirit of man is illumined by the Spirit of God can they be revealed to him (1 Co 2<sup>11</sup>). Only when the Divine in man meets and mingles with the Divine that is without and around him can there result that spiritual certainty which is revelation.

Insight, then, in the spiritual sense of the term (which is the sense in which it is generally used), links itself on to the doctrine of the Holy Spirit (wh. see). It is the Light that lighteth every man coming into the world; for we must assume that the capacity, in germ at least, is universal as humanity, otherwise there would be some to whom religion is impossible. But it is given in varying degrees, and is conditioned by varying environments. The visions it sees are not always of reality, for the medium through which it looks is often obscured by earthly passions and prejudices. But when it does see right into the heart of things, it enunciates truths to which the soul clings as essential to its very life.

INSPIRATION.—The term employed to denote the action of the Divine Spirit upon the writers of Scripture. Literally signifying a breathing into, it has the secondary meaning of breathing a certain spirit into the mind or soul, and is therefore naturally employed to express the influence of God upon the sacred writers. Inspiration in general is the influence of one person upon another; Divine inspiration is the influence of the Divine Person upon the human (Wood, A Tenable Theory of Insp. p. 10). In Scripture itself we find the idea in Hos 2 (LXX) expressed by the word πνευματοδότης—though in this case the inspiration was not Divine. In the NT (2 P 1<sup>21</sup>) similarly ἐπὶ πνεύματος ἁγίου φερόμενοι. In non-Christian literature inspired men are spoken of as θεοδιδάκτοι, θεόφοροι, θεοφοροῦμενοι, θεόδοχοι, θεόπνευστοι, ἔνθεοι, ἐπιπνεοί, βακχυνόμενοι, μαυόμενοι, δίνωιο πνεύματι ἁπλάτ, inspirati, furentes. The use of the word 'inspiration' to express the Divine factor in Scripture is probably derived from the fact that the words of 2 Ti 3<sup>0</sup> πᾶσα γραφή θεόπνευστος are rendered in the Vulgate 'omnis Scriptura divinitus inspirata.' The definition given by Lee (Insp., p. 271) is sufficient as conveying the general idea attached to the word. 'By inspiration I understand that actuating energy of the Holy Spirit, in whatever degree or manner it may have been exercised, guided by which the human agents chosen by God have officially proclaimed His will by word of mouth, or have committed to writing the several portions of the Bible.' Sanday's explanation of the word is excellent: 'Just as one particular branch of one particular stock was chosen to be in a general sense the recipient of a clearer revelation than was vouchsafed to others, so within that branch certain individuals were chosen to have their hearts and minds moved in a manner more penetrating and more effective than their fellows, with the result that their written words convey to us truths about the nature of God and His dealings with man which other writings do not convey with equal fullness, power, and purity. We say that this special moving is due to the action upon those hearts and minds of the Holy Spirit. And we call that action Inspiration' (Dampton Lect., p. 127). Or we may say that as God revealed Himself in creation, in the history of His people, and especially in Jesus Christ, He also enabled certain persons to perceive and express the significance of that revelation; and this ability is what we mean by inspiration.

Inspiration is claimed not only for our Scriptures, but for the other sacred books of the world. The Vedas, the books of Zoroaster and of the Buddhists, the Koran, all rest their claim to be received on the belief that they proceed from a Divine source. Even where tribes are too uncivilized to possess sacred writings, there exists a belief that God makes known His mind through dreams, oracles, or inspired individuals, and the presence and action of God is frequently spoken of as an affluens, the blowing of a breath or wind upon the inspired person. To the idea that knowledge is supernaturally conveyed to persons who are not in the historic line of Scriptural revelation, sanction is given in the OT by the instances of Abimelech, Pharaoh, and Balaam. And while in the sacred books of the world there is a great deal that is superstitious, contemptible, and degrading, there is also much that illustrates man's thirst for God, and much also to show that God responds to that thirst. We naturally expect to find a fuller inspiration in those who were in touch with, and were called to record, the great progressive historical revelation which culminated in Christ; but we need not therefore deny all Divine response and assistance to those who on other lines were setting their faces Godwards.

1. THE CLAIM OF SCRIPTURE TO BE INSPIRED.—The OT was accepted as inspired both by the NT writers and by all their Jewish contemporaries. At that date certain of the books eventually included in the OT had not been definitely admitted to canonical authority; but, speaking generally, the writings of the OT were universally held to be Divine, sacred, in some true sense the word of God. Of this there is abundant evidence.

(a) Our Lord Himself appeals to the OT as a final authority (Mt 19<sup>4</sup>, Jn 5<sup>39</sup>). He refers to it as the prophetic index to, and justification of, the providential dealings of God (Lk 24<sup>44</sup>, Jn 10<sup>35</sup>). Expressly, in citing Ps 110, He introduces the quotation with the words, 'David himself by the Holy Spirit said' (αὐτὸς Δαυὶδ εἶπεν ἐν τῷ πνεύματι τῷ ἁγίῳ), Mk 12<sup>9</sup>. And significantly in adducing the Law in contrast to the traditions of the elders, the highest human authority, He altogether neglects the human mediation of the writer, and simply says, 'For God said' (Mt 15<sup>6</sup>). His personal reliance upon Scripture is visible in His use of it as His defence in the stress of temptation (Mt 4<sup>7-10</sup>) and as the authentication of His ministry (Lk 4<sup>17-21</sup>). It was the OT which preserved the knowledge of the marvellous history of which He recognized Himself to be the culmination. In it He met all that was Divine in the past, and acknowledged the regulating Divine Spirit throughout.

(b) As with the Master, so with the disciples. In the First Gospel the writer has ever in his eye τὸ ῥηθὲν ὑπὸ κυρίου διὰ τοῦ προφήτου (1<sup>22</sup>). In their first independent action the disciples were determined by their belief that they must fulfil the Scripture ἢν προέειπεν τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον διὰ στόματος Δαυὶδ (Ac 1<sup>6</sup>, cf. 28<sup>25</sup>). For St. Paul as for St. Peter the utterances of the OT are the λόγια θεοῦ (Ro 3<sup>2</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>11</sup>). 'It is written' is the ultimate authority. The Scripture is identified with God, so that St. Paul can say (Ro 9<sup>5</sup>) 'the scripture saith unto Pharaoh', and it is God who speaks in the prophets (9<sup>6</sup>). In the Epistle to the Hebrews the same conception of Scripture prevails. Quotations are introduced with the formula, 'the Holy Spirit saith'; and the revelation of Christ is but the completion of the revelation of the OT. It was God who spoke in the prophets (He 1<sup>1</sup>). The very titles under which the OT Scriptures are designated sufficiently manifest the belief that they were written under the inspiration of God. (For these titles, see Ryle, Canon of OT, p. 302).

(c) As representative of contemporary Jewish thought it is enough to cite Philo and Josephus. The former explicitly affirms the inspiration of Moses, speaking of him as 'that purest mind which received at once the gift of legislation and of prophecy with Divinely inspired wisdom' (θεοφωρῶστος σοφία, de Congr. Erud. c. 24, ed. Mangey, i. 538) and as καταπνευθεὶς ὑπ' ἑρως οὐρανοῦ (de Vita Mos., Mangey, ii. 145). To Isaiah and Jeremiah 'as members of the prophetic choir,' he expressly ascribes inspiration (τῶν προφητικῶν θιασάτης χοροῦ, de καταπνευθεὶς ἐθνοειδῶν ἀνεφθέρηστο, de Conf. Ling. c. 12, Mangey, i. 411). Josephus is equally explicit. Vying with Philo in reverential esteem for the OT, he bases this esteem on the belief that the authors of the various books wrote under the influence of the Divine Spirit (Ant. iv. viii. 49, iii. v. 4, x. ii. 2; cf. c. Apion. i. 7).

No belief of later Judaism was more universal or constant than this acceptance of the OT Scriptures as inspired. 'Die heilige Schrift ist entstanden durch Inspiration des heiligen Geistes, stammt also von Gott selbst ab, der in ihr redet.' This statement of Weber's (Lehren d. Talmud, p. 78) is amply justified by the passages he cites, as, e.g., 'He who affirms that the Thora is not from heaven, has no part in the future world' (Sanhed. x. 1). Bonsett (Die Religion d. Judentums, p. 125) reaches the same conclusion: 'Die heiligen Schriften sind nach spätjüdischem Dogma inspiriert.'

This belief in the inspiration of the OT was the natural and inevitable result of the phenomena it presented; and was not, as has sometimes been suggested, the mere reflexion of the vague idea that all ancient writings, especially if poetical, were inspired.* Moses is represented as speaking face to face with God and as receiving the Law from Him. The prophets demand attention to their words by preacing them with the announcement, 'Thus saith the Lord.' In Ex 4<sup>10-12</sup>, Is 50<sup>1</sup>, Jer 1<sup>9</sup> the equipment of the prophet is described by the expression, 'I have put my words in thy mouth.' From these two phenomena it was a necessary inference that at any rate the Law and the Prophets were inspired. Prof. Sanday (Insp. p. 128) justly remarks that 'the prophetic inspiration seems to be a type of all inspiration. It is perhaps the one mode in which the most distinctive features of Biblical inspiration can be most clearly recognized.' It must, however, also be borne in mind that among the Jews themselves it was the Law, rather than the Prophets, which satisfied, and perhaps suggested, their idea of inspiration. Latterly they went so far as to say that, had the Law found in Israel recipients worthy of it, nothing beyond would have been required. The Law itself was a perfect and complete revelation, and neither Prophets nor Hagiographa were indispensable (see passages in Weber, Lehren d. Talm. p. 79). The response of conscience to the Law confirmed the traditional accounts of its origin, and the belief in its inspiration was inevitable. Possibly it was the belief that the whole OT was normative that prompted the usage by which even the Prophets and the Psalms were cited in the NT as 'the Law' (see Jn 15<sup>25</sup> 10<sup>34</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>16</sup>, Ro 3<sup>2</sup>).

The inspiration of the NT stands on a somewhat different footing. The supreme instance of inspiration is our Lord Himself (Lk 4<sup>17-21</sup>); and He is also its source to His followers. At His Baptism, Jesus was formally called to, and equipped for, His ministry; and His equipment consisted in His receiving the fulness of the Holy Spirit. Under the influence of this Spirit all His works were done and all His words spoken. 'He whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God, for he giveth not the Spirit by measure' (Jn 3<sup>34</sup>); 'My teaching is not mine, but his that sent me' (7<sup>16</sup>); 'as the Father hath taught me, I speak these things' (8<sup>28</sup>). And it is His words, spoken under the influence of the Divine Spirit, that form the nucleus of the NT Canon. They were the first portion of that Canon to be recognized as authoritative, and however difficult certain writings found it to gain access to the Canon, the words of our Lord were from the first, and universally, regarded as Divine by all Christians.

But those whom He appointed to be His witnesses and to explain to the world the significance of His manifestation, required above all else the inspiration of the Author of salvation. This was emphatically and reiteratedly promised to them. The presence of the Divine Spirit was promised not only to prompt and support them on critical occasions, as when they were summoned before magistrates (Mk 13<sup>11</sup>, Mt 10<sup>20</sup>, Lk 12<sup>11</sup>), but as the Spirit of truth He was promised as the very substitute of Christ Himself: 'He shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I said unto you' (Jn 14<sup>26</sup> 16<sup>13</sup>). This promise cannot be understood as meant to assure the disciples that they would be able to recall every word their Lord had said; as little as this assurance is conveyed to all Christians by the words of St. John (1 Jn 2<sup>27</sup>), 'His anointing teacheth you concerning all things.' At the same time it was meant to encourage them to believe that their sympathy with their Lord and their acceptance of His Spirit would give them a sufficient remembrance and understanding of His teaching.

That this promise was fulfilled is certain. The relation of the risen Lord to His Church, His presence with those who represented Him, and the aid He afforded them in accomplishing His purposes, compel the conclusion that His Spirit dwelt in those who taught and built up the Church by word and letter. 'Those who preached the gospel discharged their function 'with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven' (1 P 1<sup>12</sup>). Of this the outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost was the earnest. In guiding the Church the aid of this Spirit was experienced (Ac 13<sup>2</sup> 15<sup>28</sup> etc.). In writing to the Galatians, St. Paul claims to have been instructed by the Lord in the gospel he preached. In 2 Co 13<sup>3</sup> he is prepared to give 'a proof of Christ that speaketh in me.' And even in less essential matters regarding which he can claim no definite instructions or revelation, he yet in the exercise of his own judgment believes himself to be guided by the Spirit of God (1 Co 7<sup>40</sup>). In his enumeration of the various manifestations of the Spirit, the writing of sacred books, it is true, finds no place, neither do the writers of the Gospels claim to be inspired. But 'the word of wisdom,' 'the word of knowledge,' the charism of the prophet and the teacher, may quite reasonably, if not even necessarily, be supposed to include written as well as spoken discourse.

2. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE CLAIM TO BE INSPIRED, OR THE MEANING AND EFFECTS OF INSPIRATION.—Several opinions or theories present themselves. And in determining which of these is correct, we must be guided not by a priori ideas of the results which must flow from inspiration, but only by the phenomena presented in the Bible; in other words, by the actual effects of inspiration as these are seen in the writings of inspired men. 'What inspiration is must be learned from what it does.' We must not determine the character of the books from the inspiration, but must rather determine the nature of the inspiration from the books' (Bowne's Christian Revelation, p. 45).

(1) The 'mechanical' or 'dictation' theory, or theory of verbal inspiration.—This is the theory that in writing the books of Scripture the author was merely the mouthpiece of the Divine, and that therefore every word in the Bible as truly represents the mind of God as if He had dictated it. 'Facts, doctrines, precepts, references to history or chronology, quotations from writers sacred or profane, allusions to scientific truth, visions or prophetic declarations, mere references to the most ordinary actions of life, according to this view, are not the work of man but of Omnipotence. The only use which has been made of human agency in the book has been to copy down with pen, ink, and paper what has been dictated by the Divine Spirit.' Absolute inerrancy is on this theory presumed to be the accompaniment of inspiration. As one of its defenders says: 'God employed men in writing. But these men were so controlled by Him, that He is the Author of the writing; and so the Author, that any charge of inaccuracy against the record, or Scripture, as originally given, must be preferred against Him' (Kennedy, The Doctrine of Insp. 1878, p. 6). To use the common way of putting it, the writers were 'the pens, not the penmen' of God. They were possessed by God, so that it was not so much their own mind and their own experience, but the mind of God that was represented in their writings.

This theory has all the prestige which antiquity can give it, for it runs back to those primitive stages of civilization in which possession by a deity was produced by inhaling fumes, or by violent dances and contortions. This frenzied state being induced, the words spoken were believed to be Divine. The theory has also the prestige which is conferred by the advocacy of great names. Plato countenanced the idea that the inspired man is so possessed by the Divine that his words and thoughts are not his own. In the Timæus (p. 71) and in the Phædrus (p. 244) he maintains that when a man receives the inspired word, either his intelligence is enthralled in sleep, or he is demented by some distemper or possession. The relation of the Divine to the human is viewed quantitatively. As the Divine comes in, the human must go out and make room for it. It was probably through Philo that this view gained currency in the Church. Philo's account of inspiration is quite explicit. 'A prophet,' he says, 'gives forth nothing of his own, but acts as interpreter of the prompting of another in all his utterances; and as long as he is under inspiration he is in ignorance, his reason departing from its place and yielding up the citadel of his soul, when the Divine Spirit enters into it and dwells in it, and strikes out the mechanism of his voice, sounding through it to the clear declaration of that which he prophesieth' (de Sp. Legg. ii. 343, quoted in Sanday's Insp. p. 74). Again (in the tract Quis rer. div. i. 511) Philo explains that 'so long as we are masters of ourselves we are not possessed; but when our own mind ceases to shine, inspiration and madness lay hold on us. For the understanding that dwells in us is ousted on the arrival of the Divine Spirit, but is restored to its own dwelling when that Spirit departs; for it is unlawful that mortal dwell with immortal.' A theory identical with or similar to this of Philo's has been largely held in the Church.

There are also expressions in the NT which seem, at first sight, to countenance such a theory. In Mt 5<sup>18</sup> our Lord is reported as saying: 'Till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in nowise pass from the law, till all things be accomplished.' But, as the context shows, that which our Lord intimates in these words is that it was in Himself the Law and the Prophets were to find their fulfilment. Immediately upon giving utterance to this saying He Himself proceeds to repeal commandments of the Law, substituting for them His own better principles, and thus showing that what He had in view was not Scripture as Scripture. Another passage which to the superficial reader might seem to countenance this theory is that in which St. Paul contrasts the wisdom of God with the wisdom of men (1 Co 2<sup>10-16</sup>). After speaking of the things revealed by the Spirit of God, he says, 'which things we also speak, not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Spirit teacheth' (v. 13). But a consideration of the passage makes it apparent that what he means is that he had arrived at the conclusion that his style of address should be in keeping with his subject, and that 'the mystery of God' did not require the garnishing of meretricious ornament or anything which the world might esteem as 'excellency of wisdom,' but such simplicity and directness as the Holy Spirit prompted. He is contrasting two methods, two styles, the worldly and the spiritual, and he is justifying the style he himself adopted. To conclude from this that St. Paul considered that every word he spoke was dictated by infallible wisdom is quite illegitimate.

This mechanical theory is beset by grave difficulties. (a) Inspiration and dictation are, as has more than once been pointed out, two different, even mutually exclusive, operations. Dictation precludes inspiration, leaving no room for any spiritual influence. Inspiration precludes dictation, making the prompting of words unnecessary by the communication of the right spirit.

(b) It is irreconcilable with the phenomena presented in Scripture. The authors, instead of being passive recipients of information and ideas and feelings, represent themselves as active, deliberating, laborious, intensely interested. The material used by the historical writers has been derived from written sources, or, as in the case of the Third Gospel, from careful critical inquiry at the most reliable witnesses. They do not tell us that their knowledge of events had been supernaturally imparted, but either that they themselves had seen what they relate, or that they had it from trustworthy sources. The Apostles were inspired witnesses of Christ, and proclaimed what they had seen and heard. But if supernatural information was even more trustworthy, why should they have been chosen only from those who had been with our Lord during His ministry? 'If they did not really remember those facts or discourses when they asserted their reality, they are found false witnesses of God. If they were the mere dictation of the Spirit to their minds, St. Peter's declaration which he made to the Jewish Council, "We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard," would have to be corrected into, "We cannot but speak the things which the Spirit has introduced into our minds" (Row, Insp. p. 154). Similarly, if the intense emotions expressed in the Psalms or in the Epp. of St. Paul are not the outpouring of human sorrow and human experience, they at once become artificial and false. When St. Paul in 2 Co 11<sup>9</sup> says, "That which I speak, I speak not after the Lord, but as in foolishness, in this confidence of boasting," it is intelligible to say that an inspired man is speaking, it is not intelligible to say that this is God speaking. The mind of God is discernible through the words, but it is not the mind of God we are directly in contact with.

(c) Another class of phenomena presented by Scripture is inconsistent with this theory. For if God be the sole Author, then it is impossible to account for errors in grammar, imperfections of style, discrepancies between one part and another. But such errors, imperfections, and discrepancies exist. The sayings of our Lord are variously reported in the several Gospels. Even in reporting the Lord's Prayer the Evangelists differ. It is impossible to remove from the Book of Acts all disagreement with the Pauline Epistles. And in the disagreement between Peter and Paul at Antioch, we see how possible it was that men equally inspired should hold divergent and even antagonistic opinions upon matters essential to the well-being of the Church. In the face of these discrepancies, it is impossible to suppose that inspiration carries with it literal accuracy of expression.

(d) The manner in which the NT writers quote the OT books proves that while they believed these books to be authoritative and their writers inspired, they did not consider that their inspiration rendered every word they uttered infallible. Taking 275 quotations from the OT in the NT, it has been found that there are only 53 in which the Hebrew, the LXX, and the NT writer agree: while there are 99 passages in which the NT quotation differs both from the Hebrew and from the LXX, which also differ from one another, and 76 in which the correct rendering of the LXX has been erroneously altered.* No doubt when the correct citation of a single word serves the writer's purpose, as in the insistence by St. Paul on the singular instead of the plural (Gal 3<sup>26</sup>), there stress is laid upon the very word; but in the face of the general style of quotation above indi-

(2) To escape the psychological and other difficulties of a mechanical, verbal inspiration, other theories have been devised. Observing the different values of the various books of Scripture, the Jews themselves supposed that there were three degrees of inspiration corresponding to the tripartite division of the OT. Attempts were made by the Rabbis, by the schoolmen, and by some modern writers to differentiate between suggestion, direction, superintendence, and elevation. Thus Bishop Daniel Wilson (Evidences of Christianity, i. 506, quoted by Lee) defines as follows: 'By the inspiration of suggestion is meant such communication of the Holy Spirit as suggested and dictated minutely every part of the truths delivered. The inspiration of direction is meant of such assistance as left the writers to describe the matter revealed in their own way, directing only the mind in the exercise of its powers. The inspiration of elevation added a greater strength and vigour to the efforts of the mind than the writers could otherwise have attained. The inspiration of superintendency was that watchful care which preserved generally from anything being put down derogatory to the Revelation with which it was connected.' Obviously this theory is very open to criticism. That there are different degrees of inspiration is true, but it is very questionable whether any such classification is complete. In this theory there are hints of truth, but not the whole truth.

(3) The so-called dynamical theory brings us somewhat nearer the truth, though it too falls short. This theory is a reaction against the mechanical, and affirms that the human qualities of the writers are not superseded, but are cleansed, strengthened, and employed by the Divine Author. 'The Divine influence acted upon man's faculties in accordance with their natural laws'; classical expression is given to this theory in the words of Augustine (de Joan. i. i. 1), 'inspiratus a Deo, sed tamen homo.' The Divine Agent selects suitable media for His communications, and does not try 'to play lyre-music on flutes, and harp-music on trumpets.' The imperfections and weaknesses found in Scripture are human, the truths uttered are Divine. The theory in its most acceptable form, and as held by Erasmus, Grotius, Baxter, Paley, and many modern writers, suggests that the Biblical writers were so inspired as to secure accuracy in all matters of conduct and doctrine, while it declines to pledge itself to their perfect accuracy in non-essentials or subsidiary particulars. Hence it is sometimes called the 'essential' theory.

This theory, while it endeavours to recognize the facts of Scripture and to account for them, yet fails to give us an understanding of inspiration. It does not explain, or even attempt to explain, how writers should be possessed of supernatural knowledge while inditing one sentence, and in the next be dropped to a lower level. It fails to give us the psychology of that state of mind which can infallibly pronounce on matters of doctrine while it is astray on the often simpler facts of history. It makes no attempt to analyze the relation subsisting between the Divine mind and the human which produces such results. Nor does it explain how we are to distinguish essentials from non-essentials, or disentangle the one from the other.

(4) Constructively we may make the following affirmations regarding Inspiration, derived from the facts presented in the Bible:

(a) It is the men, not directly the writings, that were inspired. 'Men spake from God, being moved by the Holy Ghost' (2 P 1<sup>21</sup>). Inspiration does not mean that one inspired thought is magically communicated to a man in the form in which he is to declare it to his fellows, and in no connexion with the previous contents and normal action of his mind. As he sits down to write, he continues in that state of mind and spirit in which he has been living and to which the Spirit of God has brought him. The book he produces is not the abnormal, exceptional product of a unique condition of mind and spirit, but is the natural and spontaneous outflow from the previous experience and thought of the writer. All his past training and knowledge, all his past strivings to yield himself wholly to the Spirit of Christ, enter into what he now produces.

(b) When we say that a writer of Scripture is Divinely inspired, we mean that as he writes he is under the influence of the Holy Spirit. All Christians possess this same Spirit, and are by Him being led into a full knowledge of the truth that is in Christ, to a full perception of that whole revelation of God which is made in Christ; and when some of their number are characterized as inspired, this means that such persons are distinguished above their fellow-Christians by a special readiness and capacity to perceive the meaning of Christ as the revelation of God and to make known what they see.

(c) Inspiration is primarily a spiritual gift, and only secondarily a mental one. The Spirit of God may dwell richly in a man and yet not render him infallible even in matters of religion. In 1 Th 4<sup>o</sup> St. Paul speaks of his converts as θεοδι-δωτοι, but to one end, and that a spiritual not a mental end. Our Lord (Jn 6<sup>o</sup>) applies to all those who come to Him in Spirit the prophetic words, 'They shall be all taught of God,' but no one can suppose that this involves infallible knowledge. It cannot be summarily argued that because God dwells in a man, all that the man speaks partakes of the Divine omniscience. Inspiration operates as any newborn passion, such as maternal love, operates. It does not lift the person out of all limitations, but it seizes upon and uses all the faculties, elevating, refining, and directing to one purpose. It illuminates the mind as enthusiasm does, by stimulating and elevating it; it enriches the memory as love does, by intensifying the interest in a certain object, and by making the mind sensitive to its impressions and retentive of them. It brings light to the understanding and wisdom to the spirit, as purity of intention or a high aim in life does. It brings a man into sympathy with the nature and purposes of God, enables him to see God where others do not see Him, and to interpret His revelations in the same Spirit in which they are given.

INSURRECTION (στάσις, Mk 15<sup>7</sup>, and Lk 23<sup>19</sup>, 25 where AV gives 'sedition') is defined by Plato (Rep. v. 470 B) thus: ἐπι γὰρ τῆ τοῦ οὐκ οὐκ ἔχοντος στάσις κίεληται, ἐπι δὲ τῆ τῶν ἀλλοτριῶν πόλεμος. Its use in these passages is important as showing that Barabbas was not merely a robber (ἄρπστης, Jn 18<sup>40</sup>), but also a leader in one of those fierce fanatical outbursts which were so common in the last years of the Jewish nation, especially from the accession of Herod. Josephus tells of notable leaders such as Ezekias, his son Judas, and his four grandsons, all of whom were put to death (Ant. xiv. ix. 2, xvii. x. 5, xviii. i. 1; BJ ii. iv. i, viii. i, xiii. 5, etc.; cf. Ant. 21st). Josephus in his account of the final troubles uses στάσις and ἄρπστης almost as convertible terms. Nothing further is known of this particular στάσις, unless, as Ewald (HI vi. 67 f.) suggests, it may have arisen on account of the aqueduct which Pilate had built with money taken from the Temple treasury (Josephus, BJ ii. ix. 4; cf. Lk 13<sup>7</sup>). Barabbas may have been moved by patriotic ideas at the first, becoming an outlaw and notorious robber when his rising was suppressed; or he may have used aspirations after freedom merely as a cloak for brigandage (see Westcott, Some Lessons of the Revised Version of the NT, p. 74 f.).* He was 'lying bound with them that had made insurrection' (στάσις, v. l. συστασιαστων, Mk 15<sup>7</sup>), including probably the two robbers who were crucified; for him the third cross may have been intended. Such men had a deep hold on the popular sympathy, which goes to explain the strong demand of the people for the release of their hero, and the interest which the priests showed on behalf of Barabbas, notwithstanding their pretence to holiness. But the hollowness of their newfound zeal for Caesar was thereby exposed, seeing that Barabbas was admittedly guilty of the crime which they alleged against Jesus. See, further, BARABBAS.

V. H. DUNDAS.

INTERCESSION (the act of one who goes between) is generally taken to mean that part of prayer in which we approach God on behalf of others. The corresponding word in NT, ἐπρωξίς, which occurs only at 1 Ti 2<sup>o</sup> 4<sup>o</sup>, does not necessarily mean what we now understand by intercession, but rather, as its connexion with προξένος implies, drawing close to God in free and familiar prayer (see Trench, Syn. p. 190, where, however, it is added, 'In justice to our translators it must be observed that intercession had not in their time that limited meaning of prayer for others which we now ascribe to it').

Intercession has always been regarded as a characteristic duty and privilege of believers in Christ. There is no fact or aspect of prayer more distinctive of the Christian religion than this, in which the Christian heart, rising above all consideration of self, expands with a Christ-like benevolent desire for the welfare of every living soul, and prays for all mankind. Accordingly, we find that from the beginning intercession has been looked upon as a specific and characteristic part of the vocation of the Christian Church as a whole as well as of its individual members. The practice was enjoined by Christ, He Himself setting the example to His disciples. As prayer, in the general sense of the word, is essential to the Christian life, so intercessory prayer has always been looked upon as an essential part of Christian prayer.

Christ, when on earth, prayed for His followers, and still continues to plead for them beyond the veil, though in thinking of this aspect of His intercession it is a mistake to confine it merely to prayer. This has been admirably and convincingly pointed out by Milligan in The Ascension and Heavenly Priesthood of our Lord (pp. 149-153), and though this aspect of Christ's intercession belongs to a subsequent heading (§ 2 below), yet, because the intercession of Christians must always be based upon the Lord's intercession, it may be premised here that in the intercessions we offer to God the idea is wider than mere petition on behalf of others. 'Intercession and giving of thanks' are to be made for all men (1 Ti 2). It is a commonplace that prayer is more than mere petition; and so even in prayer on behalf of others mere asking of benefits for them cannot be the whole of prayer. Intercession, then, would appear to embrace thanksgiving for benefits bestowed on others as well as imploring favours for them. Further, intercession also seems to imply that in praying for others, if we pray sincerely, we place ourselves with our means and our energies at God's disposal for His purposes of grace towards those for whom we pray. Intercession thus leads up to and necessitates self-dedication. In proceeding now to examine our Lord's teaching, we note:

1. The duty of intercession.—The duty of intercession is explicitly and frequently taught by Christ in the Gospels. It has often been remarked about His teaching as to prayer that He seldom, if ever, gives a direct command to His followers to pray, but, taking it for granted that they do pray and do not need to be told to pray, He simply gives them directions how to pray, and shows them what are the essential elements, characteristics, and conditions of prayer (cf. e.g. Mt 6<sup>5-8</sup>, Mk 11<sup>24-25</sup>, Lk 18).

It hardly needs to be remarked that the Christian religion, being a social religion, implies that prayer on behalf of others is an essential and distinguishing element in its devotions. It would have been surprising if Christ had not taught the duty of intercession. This, of course, must not be taken as meaning that He taught it for the first time. Under the OT dispensation God's people were admitted to the privilege of intercession, and their prayers for others were availing. In particular, 'the prophets were intercessors in virtue of their calling. The ground of this was twofold. The prophet was an acceptable person; but, further, he had the Spirit, and the possession of it enabled him not only to interpret the mind of God to man, but also the mind of man to God' (Bernard in Hastings' DB, vol. iv, p. 40<sup>b</sup>). But in the Gospels we might have expected to find, as we do find, that the duty and privilege of intercession is advanced and developed. In Christ's teaching, intercession takes a wider range and a higher view than under the OT dispensation, for no section of mankind is excluded from the scope of His redemption. Jewish prayers, even of intercession, had been offered to 'the Lord God of Israel' or 'the God of our Fathers,' but in our Lord's pattern prayer, as well as throughout His teaching, every human being is invited to call upon God as his Father, and in so doing to regard all mankind as his brethren. 'When His disciples ask to be taught to pray, He gives them a prayer very unlike what John would have given, for it contains not a word of that petition for blessing upon Israel which, in any prayer that an Israelite offered, contained, to his mind, the gist of the whole' (Latham, Pastor Pastorum, p. 416).

The Incarnation has furnished a new motive and a new power for intercession. The man who is in Christ is no longer an isolated unit: he is a member of the Body of Christ, and therefore prays for all mankind as Christ did; for, knowing that God has loved him in Christ, he loves others for whom as for himself Christ came, and in the power of that love he prays for all men living.

When we come to our Lord's express teaching as to intercession, we are at once arrested by the fact that in the Lord's Prayer—given to the disciples in response to their request to be taught how to pray—intercession not only holds the first place, but the spirit of intercession pervades it all.

This prayer, which is the peculiar prayer of the Christian believer, the use of which marks him out from all others (witness the fact that in the early Church it was not taught to the catechumens till they were competentes and on the eve of their baptism), is a prayer of intercession. 'Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.' Here the disciples are taught to pray that all mankind may be brought into the Kingdom of God, that they may reverence His name, that they may learn to do His will and submit themselves to His rule. Here all limits of space and time are transcended, and he who prays the Lord's Prayer prays for all mankind, even for the generations yet unborn. It would hardly, therefore, be an exaggeration to say that in Christ's teaching upon prayer, intercession holds the first place. This is in keeping with the whole tenor of His teaching and with the genius of His religion, who all His life took thought for others, and whose first utterance on the cross was a prayer for His murderers (Lk 23<sup>34</sup>). Following upon this, it is noteworthy that, according to Lk 11<sup>25</sup>, it was in direct sequence to and by way of commentary upon the Lord's Prayer that Christ spoke the parable of the Friend at Midnight, in which He teaches the necessity of importunate prayer, the importunity inculcated being the importunity of one for his friend. Intercession, therefore, according to Christ's teaching, is not only to be offered, but it is to be offered with importunity.

2. Christ's personal example.—Besides His great prayer of intercession recorded in Jn 17, the Gospels afford several instances of our Lord's personal example in intercession. His prayer on the eve of the ordination of the Twelve, when He continued all night in prayer (Lk 16<sup>29</sup>), was, it is highly probable, largely occupied with intercession for them. He prayed for St. Peter (22<sup>32</sup>). His first word from the cross was a prayer for His enemies. There is also the prayer recorded in Mt 11<sup>27-28</sup>, and His prayer at the grave of Lazarus (Jn 11<sup>41</sup>), both of which are intercessory.

Christ teaches that, as He is the Mediator between God and man, intercession must be offered through Him. He is the Intercessor, and our intercessions can avail only because He intercedes, presenting our prayers to the Father. He prayed for His disciples and for all who through their word might believe, and now He prays within the veil, carrying forward the intercession begun on earth. This comes out clearly in His 'Intercessory Prayer' (Jn 17), or, as it has perhaps been more fittingly designated, His 'High Priestly Prayer.' Reading it in the light of the happily correct rendering of RV, we see that He is speaking as if He had already entered into the glory, and were looking back upon His earthly course. In the joy of His anticipated triumph He presents Himself before the Father and pleads for the fulfilment of the Father's will. Christ's intercession for mankind which was begun on earth is continued in heaven, and our prayers for others are presented by Him in virtue of His mediation. At the same time, this prayer affords an unfailing guide to our prayers of intercession, teaching us that prayer is to be offered for the ingathering of men into the Kingdom, for the unity of the Church of God, for the perseverance of believers, and for the sanctification, for all these ends, of those who are engaged in the Church's work.

3. The scope of intercession.—Our Lord is careful to tell His disciples to pray for their enemies (Mt 5<sup>4</sup>), and in so doing He bids them remember in prayer those whom they might not have thought of including, assuming that they would, without being specially directed, pray for all others. He thus teaches both by direct precept and by implication that intercession is to be full and universal. The only other special direction He gives in this connexion is that they are to pray for labourers to be sent into the Lord's harvest (Mt 9<sup>38</sup>, Lk 10<sup>2</sup>). Christ gives these few general directions as to the scope of intercession, leaving it to time and growing experience to suggest their amplification. The scope of Christian intercession must always be widening.

'It grows with the growth of the Church and her needs; it grows with the growing complexity of human society as new classes and new objects rise up to claim its help. . . . Intercession is also an ever widening element in each individual life; as a man's interest and experiences widen, so must his prayers' (Frere, Sursum Corda, p. 1).

4. The conditions of intercession.—Two distinct, though sometimes confused, conditions of acceptable intercession are laid down by Christ. (1) In Mk 11<sup>25</sup> He shows that effectual intercession presupposes a forgiving spirit. Those who pray for others through Christ must have the spirit of Christ. (2) In Mt 5<sup>23-24</sup> the disciples are taught that a condition of acceptable prayer is that they must seek reconciliation with any one who regards them (rightly or wrongly) as having done him a wrong (see Zahn, ad loc.). There must be a removal of the sense of injury from his mind as well as forgiveness to those who have wronged themselves. He who prays for others must be in peace and charity with all men.

LITERATURE.—Most of the modern popular books on Prayer are astonishingly silent as to intercession. In many of the so-called 'divisions of prayer' intercession does not even find a place. But in Matthew Henry's Method of Prayer, a book little used now, intercession is prominent. Of the few modern books in which the subject is dealt with, mention may be made of Worledge on 'Prayer' in the Oxford Library of Practical Theology; Frere and Illingworth's Sursum Corda; Reid's Christian Prayer; Rendel Harris' Union with God, pp. 41-44.

INTEREST.—'Interest,' found twice in RV of the Gospels (Mt 25<sup>27</sup>, Lk 19<sup>22</sup>) instead of 'usury' of AV, represents the Greek tokos which in the LXX is the equivalent of the Heb. neshekh in the whole of the eleven passages in which the latter occurs (Ex 22<sup>25</sup>, Lv 25<sup>35</sup> etc.). Now neshekh is rightly rendered 'usury,' the reference being to the interest, often exorbitant, charged by money-lenders in the ancient East. In the NT tokos, though often used in contemporary Greek in the sense just defined, clearly signifies 'interest on deposit paid by a banker.' There were many banks in the Roman period scattered over the Graeco-Roman world, some called 'public banks' and others private firms (e.g. 'Theon & Co.', 'Herodes & Co.' at Oxyrhynchus). These, however, seem, from a lately discovered text, to have farmed from the government, in Egypt at any rate, the right of administering business; the Roman authorities, it would appear, following in some degree Ptolemaic precedent (Papyri of Oxyrhynchus, No. 513, vol. iii.: cf. the note on p. 248 f.). Not much seems to be known about the deposit department of ancient banking. The technical term for a deposit on which interest was paid was creditum. The amounts lodged in Roman banks towards the end of the Republic and under the Empire must have been, in some instances, very large. About the rate of interest paid to depositors there seems to be little or no information. The statement of Suetonius, that Augustus branded some people with infamy (notavit) because they borrowed at low interest and invested at high (Octavius, 39), may hint how the bankers made money out of the funds entrusted to their care. The usual rate of interest on loans under the Empire seems to have been one per cent. per month, or twelve per cent. per annum. This rate is repeatedly mentioned in the Papyri of Oxyrhynchus (No. 243 of A.D. 79, and No. 270 of A.D. 94, etc.). The rate paid to depositors will have been much lower. A considerable banking business was also done in ancient temples. So in ancient Babylonia (Johns, Babylonian and Assyrian Laws, Contracts, and Letters, 211), and in the Greek world, at the temple of the Ephesian Artemis, for instance (Anabasis, v. iii. 6 f.). That the temple of Jerusalem was used in this way is expressly stated by Josephus (J.B. vi. v. 2), and in the legend about Heliodorus (2 Mac 3<sup>10-12</sup>). About the management of this temple bank nothing seems to be known. Our Lord's references are probably to local praxerai, the Eastern representatives of the Roman argentarii. See also BANK.

INVITATION.—The method of public teaching adopted by our Lord being exclusively oral, it was necessary that two features difficult to combine should be prominent in the form of His instruction,—an immediate impression, and a firm grip on the memory. This He secured by mingling freely in the social life of the time, and by an abundant use of similes and illustrations drawn from facts in the daily life and social customs of the people whom He addressed. This is one of the reasons why He clothed so many of His doctrines in parables and figures centred in the idea of hospitality.

The Hebrews were an eminently sociable people. In the earliest times, the laws of hospitality were specially sacred; strangers were made heartily welcome at the door of the patriarch's tent (Gn 18<sup>3</sup>, cf. He 13<sup>2</sup>); and in later times a surly attitude towards travellers needing refreshment was considered a serious offence against good manners (1 S 25<sup>4-10</sup>). Many strict injunctions were laid down in the Mosaic Law (Lv 19<sup>33-34</sup>, Dt 14<sup>29</sup> etc.) as to the duty of kindness to strangers. At a still later period, when the community was settled in towns and cities, an elaborate code of manners grew up, both as to giving and receiving hospitality. There was much entertainment of friends, relations, and strangers among the Jews in the time of our Lord; social meetings were frequent, and religious gatherings frequently took on a festive character.

Jesus freely accepted such opportunities of social intercourse as were offered to Him; He was fond of being entertained by His friends (Lk 10<sup>8</sup> etc.), and distinguished Himself from the outset of His public career as an eminently sociable man (Mt 9<sup>10</sup>), often accepting invitations from quarters that gave offence to those who considered themselves leaders of society (v. 1, cf. Lk 19<sup>7</sup>). This, however, He did, not merely because He delighted in the fellowship of men and women, but mainly because of the unexampled opportunity it afforded Him of spiritual instruction (Mt 9<sup>12-13</sup>, Lk 7<sup>41-42</sup>), and of bringing His influence to bear on those around Him, whether they were His personal friends (Lk 19<sup>4-5</sup>), or secret enemies (7<sup>9</sup>), or the general public (Jn 12<sup>9</sup>), or individuals who were denied entrance into recognized society (Lk 18<sup>10</sup>). It was a sign of His insight and wisdom as well as of His broad sympathies, that in a community so eminently sociable as that in which He moved, He should make such free use of the machinery of hospitality for His Messianic purpose, and devise many parables and illustrations drawn from the customs of the day, and from the etiquette that ruled the relations of hosts and guests, from the highest circles of life to the lowest.

It is partly from this point of view that we are to understand His frequent habit of representing the gospel of grace as God's invitation to the soul to partake of the blessings of salvation. It made an instant appeal to the sympathies of His audience; it brought spiritual realities within reach of the intelligence of the humblest and most ordinary people, and it predisposed them to receive His message willingly; and, as the similes and illustrations in which He clothed His teaching represented recurrent facts and exigencies in their lives, it helped to drive home deep into their memory the lessons which He taught, and to bring them back frequently to their recollection. In this way the method of His teaching helped to perpetuate its substance till the time when it took a written form. But the parables of invitation have a wider appeal, for the relationships from which they were drawn are universal, and belong to all nations and communities where the customs of social life are honoured. These customs vary in detail in different ages and lands, but the root-relations of hosts and guests are permanent. These parables are a kind of Esperanto of the spiritual life, and appeal to the universal intelligence and sympathies of mankind. Thus the human side of Christ's teaching forms an ideal channel for its Divine contents.

When we pass from the form to the substance of the teaching, which represents the gospel as an invitation, the simile is further justified by its appropriateness and its beauty.

1. It emphasizes the bright and genial aspects of religion, which shine with so clear a lustre in the teaching of Jesus. It has been a recurrent and baneful feature of theological learning that it has tended to envelop religion in an atmosphere of gloom, by making so much of the horror and mischief of sin, and dwelling so exclusively on the need of repentance, atonement, and justification. Religious ritual introduced another baneful element into the spiritual life by representing its duties too much as a series of sacerdotal observances, which by frequent recurrence became mechanical and wearisome. Ethical writers have likewise been prone to dwell exclusively on the responsibilities of religion, to the obscuration of its privileges. In the teaching of Jesus there is nothing of this mischievous tendency. His parables are full of the sound of wedding-bells, of the voice of laughter, of the joy of a great deliverance, of the discovery of a precious and unsuspected happiness. There are clouds on the horizon, and the echo of distant thunders; but the foreground is full of happy figures intent on celebrating the marriage of the soul to its Divine Lover and Friend, and on enjoying the new-found fellowship of God as the Giver of life and salvation. Without in any way obscuring the evils from which the soul is delivered by the gracious ministries of the gospel, preachers should follow their great Model in placing greater emphasis on the sunny joys and holy privileges brought within our reach in Jesus Christ. One reason why the common people heard Him so gladly was, that He took them away from the word-splitting and elaborate discussions of the Rabbis, and transported them into that circle of happy human relationships from which He mainly drew His illustrations. What was true then is just as true to-day.

2. The presentation of the gospel as a Divine invitation throws emphasis on another of its essential features,—that it embodies a free gift of grace from God to man. The central idea of hospitality is that one gives freely what the many receive and enjoy 'without money and without price.' Jesus in the 'parables of grace' teaches us that the gospel contains something infinitely precious which is given to us, but which we could never deserve or buy. Religion is not a bargain between man and God; it is a boon, a largess bestowed by God on man. It is not commerce, it is reconciliation and friendship. It is thus represented not as an exchange of commodities in a market-place, but as a feast where the one side gives all and receives nothing back, save in realizing the happiness and loyal gratitude of the invited guests. Jesus justifies this idea of a one-sided benefit by nearly always making use of a simile of feasting in which a superior invites his inferior to a banquet. It is a king inviting his subjects to the wedding-feast of his son (Mt 22<sup>2-14</sup>); it is a great man entertaining a miscellaneous assemblage of guests from all quarters (Lk 14<sup>15-24</sup>); it is a father welcoming home a renegade son with the best of the flock. In all these cases there could be no question of a return in kind. The conditions were satisfied by the coming of the guests, and their happy enjoyment of the good things provided. 'The gospel is ever a gospel of grace.'

3. A third significant aspect suggested by the simile of an invitation is its voluntariness on both sides. There can be no compulsion in the invitation to a feast of rejoicing. Unwilling guests have no place at a banquet. Religion has no room for the idea of spiritual compulsion. The invitation is free to all; acceptance must be as free. Thus is the sacred function of spiritual liberty, of the freedom of the will, safeguarded by the gospel. Those who refuse or neglect a social invitation may be incurring a grave responsibility; but they can do so if they choose. The spiritual appeal of religion may also be refused; it lies with the soul whether it will respond to the call of God or reject it.

The word translated 'compel' in Lk 14<sup>25</sup> (ἀναγκάζω) must be read in its secondary meaning of 'constrain by persuasion.' It 'reflects in the first place the urgent desire of the master to have an absolutely full house, in the second the feeling that pressure will be needed to overcome the incredulity of country people as to such an invitation to them being meant seriously. They would be apt to laugh in the servant's face' (Bruce in Expositor's Gr. Test., in loco).

4. The idea of an invitation thus merges into that of response; and it is important to notice that great stress is laid on this side of the question in the parables. In not a few it is clearly the pivot on which the teaching turns. There is one way in which an invitation may be worthily accepted; there are several in which it may be rejected: e.g. it may be (1) openly scorned, (2) accepted and then rejected or ignored, (3) accepted in a wrong spirit, or with an imperfect realization of its privileges and value. Each of these situations is dealt with by Christ to typify the attitude of men to His gospel. In the parable of the Marriage of the King's Son, the first guests invited treat the offer with scorn (Mt 22<sup>3</sup>), and 'make light' of it, preferring to find their satisfaction in their own way, and even maltreating the king's messengers. By this Jesus exposed the attitude of the Pharisees and scribes towards His gospel, and in a wider sense that of all those who in a thoroughly worldly spirit have since treated His offer of salvation with derision or disrespect. In the parable of the Great Supper, the guests first accepted the invitation, and then, finding other more absorbing interests, sent various excuses for not attending. These represent the fickle multitude, who at first thronged to hear the 'gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth,' and afterwards left Him, having exhausted the sensational aspect of His ministry and wonderful works, and having no love for His higher message. Returning to the parable of the Marriage, we find a final episode in which the man without a 'wedding-garment' is dealt with. Clearly he stands for those who, having heard and accepted the invitation of the gospel, show that they have failed to realize the lofty and decorous spirit in which the soul should respond to it, and who treat it as a common thing, with no sense of its high privilege. The care with which Jesus developed these situations in His parables, and proclaimed the doom that followed, shows how deeply He felt the importance of a right attitude towards spiritual realities. It is as though He were repeating in many tones and accents the fact that God offers man His best in the invitations of the gospel, and expects man to be at his best in responding to them, otherwise he perils his soul (cf. Mt 22<sup>7-13</sup>, Lk 14<sup>28</sup>).

When we turn from the teaching to the practice of Christ, the same attitude of appeal and invitation is manifested, and the same spirit of loyal and worthy acceptance is expected in turn. Everywhere in His dealings with men we find Him acting as God's messenger of goodwill, and urging them to respond to heavenly grace with grateful hearts and willing service. Where men do so He promises them a great reward (Mt 19<sup>27-30</sup>); where they fail to do so He shows a Divine and touching sorrow (23<sup>37-38</sup>); and though He is clear in revealing His own disappointment at such a result, He lays the chief stress on the loss and misery which rejection must bring on those who are guilty of spurning or ignoring His ever-renewed appeal.

The heart of the gospel is found in the central invitation given by Christ to all men in the words, 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest' (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>).

ISAAC.—Named (1) in our Lord's genealogy, Mt 1<sup>2</sup>, Lk 3<sup>34</sup>; (2) in such collocations as 'sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob' (Mt 8<sup>11</sup>), 'see Abraham and Isaac and Jacob' (Lk 12<sup>29</sup>), 'see God of Abraham and of Isaac and of Jacob' (Mt 22<sup>29</sup>, Mk 12<sup>26</sup>, Lk 20<sup>27</sup>). See ABRAHAM, and FATHERS. The sacrifice of Isaac came at an early date to be used by Christian writers as a type of the sacrifice on the cross (cf. e.g. Ep. of Barn. ch. 7). It is just possible that some such thought underlies Ro 8<sup>32</sup> 'He that spared not his own Son.'

ISAIAH.—There are seven instances recorded in the Gospels in which Jesus quotes from the prophecies of Isaiah, besides numerous other cases in which His language is more or less manifestly reminiscent of expressions in the book. The most notable passages are two in which our Lord applies to Himself the terms used by the prophet of the Exile with regard to the Servant of Jehovah, viz. Lk 4<sup>16-21</sup>, where Jesus reads and expounds the words of Is 61<sup>1-2</sup>; and Lk 22<sup>27</sup>, where He adopts as a prediction of His own experience a clause of Is 53<sup>12</sup>. Our Lord thus plainly taught that, alike in the mission and in the vicarious suffering of the ideal Servant of Deutero-Isaiah, His own person and work were typified and foreshadowed. More general is the application of Is 6<sup>9-10</sup> to the people of His own time (Mt 13<sup>14-15</sup>, Mk 4<sup>12</sup>, Lk 8<sup>10</sup>); and also His use of Is 29<sup>18</sup> of the Pharisees and scribes (Mt 15<sup>9</sup>, Mk 7<sup>7</sup>). All three Synoptists record the quotation from Is 56<sup>7</sup> with which He rebuked the temple-traders (Mt 21<sup>13</sup>). St. John alone gives the quotation of a general character from Is 54<sup>13</sup> (Jn 6<sup>45</sup>), while St. Mark records an expression which manifestly comes from Is 66<sup>24</sup> (Mk 9<sup>48</sup>). In only three of the above seven cases is Isaiah mentioned by name, and in no case is there any indication that bears in the slightest degree upon the question as to the authorship of the various parts of the book.

In addition to these more direct references, there are many expressions in the discourses of Jesus in which we have echoes of Isaiah's language. Our Lord's mind was filled with the OT, and it was to be expected that His utterances should be cast in the mould, and often expressed in the very words, of psalm and prophecy. In Mt 5<sup>24-25</sup> we perceive a reminiscence of Is 66<sup>1</sup>; Mt 21<sup>33-43</sup> at once suggests Is 5<sup>1-2</sup>. Other less obvious instances are probably to be found in Mt 11<sup>23</sup> (cf. Is 14<sup>12-19</sup>) 16<sup>29</sup> (Is 22<sup>29</sup>) 6<sup>9</sup> (Is 26<sup>9</sup>); and various expressions in the eschatological discourses of Mt 24 and Lk 21. To these others might possibly be added; but it is not warrantable to find in every case of verbal similarity a reference to, or even a reminiscence of, the words of the OT. But apart from doubtful cases, it will be seen that the Book of Isaiah, both in its earlier and in its later portions, is fully acknowledged as used in the teaching of Jesus.

It is not less so with the Evangelists themselves. All four quote Is 40<sup>3</sup> with regard to the mission of John the Baptist (Mt 3<sup>3</sup> and J); while Mt., who uses the OT so largely in connexion with the ministry of Jesus, applies to His coming and mission the passages Is 7<sup>14</sup> (Mt 12<sup>13</sup>) 9<sup>1-2</sup> (Mt 4<sup>4-16</sup>) 53<sup>1</sup> (Mt 8<sup>17</sup>) 42<sup>1-4</sup> (Mt 12<sup>18-21</sup>). St. John (15<sup>26-4</sup>) quotes Is 53<sup>1</sup> 6<sup>10</sup> in reference to the rejection of Christ by the people; and the Synoptists all record the voice heard at the Baptism and the Transfiguration as using the language of Is 42<sup>1</sup>.

As with the words of Jesus Himself, so, in the case of the Evangelists, no theory with regard to the actual authorship of any part of the book can claim to be supported by the manner of the references. 'Isaiah', even when named, stands manifestly for the reputed author, and (as in Jn 12<sup>38</sup>) the mode of expression is naturally and rightly that popularly used and understood. No critical conclusions can be drawn from any of the references.

With regard to the original Messianic import of the passages applied in the Gospels to Jesus Christ and His work, there is no difficulty in those cases where the 'Servant of Jehovah' is identified with the Messiah. And even in such passages as Is 7<sup>14</sup> 9<sup>1-2</sup> quoted by Mt., we must recognize, beneath and beyond the immediate prophetic reference, an ideal element which permitted and justified the specific application by the Evangelist. Especially is this so with the prophetic conception of 'Immanuel', an ideal figure in whom we find the earliest portraiture of the Messianic King (Is 7<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>8-10</sup> 9<sup>6-7</sup>). Though it might in some cases be without historical or critical exactitude (as in Mt 4<sup>14-15</sup> from Is 9<sup>1-2</sup>), it was quite legitimate to find unexpected correspondences between the earlier and the later stages of Providence and Revelation, based on the deep underlying unity and consistency of the Divine purpose and methods.

J. E. M'OUAT.

ISCARIOT.—See JUDAS ISCARIOT.

of Judah, and lived in the country of Judah, it became a wider term, after the return from Babylon, for all who were members of the Hebrew race. 'Israel' differed from both of these as being the name of privilege given by God to Jacob, the ancestor of the race (Gn 32<sup>28</sup> 35<sup>10</sup>), and the thought of the theocratic privileges of the chosen people and of God's covenant with them always underlies the term. See esp. Mt 2<sup>1</sup>, Lk 1<sup>16</sup>, 2<sup>25</sup>, 22<sup>24</sup>, Ac 1<sup>16</sup>, all of which reveal the national conviction that the Messiah would come for the benefit of Israel, and that to Israel were God's attention and love especially given. But in marked contrast to such passages are those which imply that the theocratic nation has failed to fulfil the Divine purposes for it—a Roman centurion exhibits greater faith than was to be found in the holy nation (Mt 8<sup>10</sup> || Lk 7<sup>9</sup>); the house of Israel are as a whole 'lost sheep' (Mt 10<sup>6</sup> 15<sup>24</sup>); they need someone to turn them to the Lord their God (Lk 11<sup>10</sup>); an honoured and official teacher of Israel is shown to be ignorant of the fundamental principles of the spiritual life (Jn 3<sup>10</sup>); incidents in the OT prove that some Gentiles received God's care and blessing, and were preferred to Israelites (Lk 4<sup>22-27</sup>); and a mysterious intimation is given of the supremacy of the Church of Christ hereafter (Mt 19<sup>28</sup> || Lk 22<sup>29</sup>); it is character, and not theocratic privileges, that makes a man 'truly an Israelite' (Jn 1<sup>17</sup>). See NATHANIEL. Thus the Gospels teach incidentally what St. Paul lays down categorically: (a) that Israel does not comprise all who are of Israel (Ro 9<sup>6</sup>); (b) that the privileged position of Israel is to be taken by Christians, for the latter are 'the Israel of God' (Gal 6<sup>16</sup>, cf. Eph 2<sup>11-12</sup>); (c) that this is for the purpose of ultimately restoring Israel to spiritual communion and salvation (Ro 9-11).

2. The status of the chosen people before God is to be taken by Christians. But that does not mean that Christianity is merely to be substituted for Judaism. Christianity is not a completely new creation fallen from heaven, but rather a growth from the religion of Israel—a growth far surpassing the germ from which it sprang, as an oak surpasses an acorn, but yet composed of elements which are discernible in the earlier dispensation in a rudimentary form. In order, therefore, to estimate the relation in which the Gospels, and particularly our Lord's teaching, stood towards Israel, it is necessary to estimate broadly how much the New was indebted to the Old, and how much it discarded in rising out of it with its Divine and potent growth.

(a) Monothelism was the chiefest glory of Judaism. Part of the inspiration of the people of Israel is seen in its 'genius for religion,' the capacity for realizing the supreme and only existence of God. A step towards this had been monolatry, the national adhesion to one Deity only, which was compatible with the recognition that other nations and lands were under the protection of other deities (Jg 11<sup>24</sup>, 1 S 26<sup>19</sup>). But it was not long before the Hebrew prophets taught that Jehovah was the God of all the nations of the earth, a spiritual Being whose service was incumbent upon all mankind, that service consisting not primarily in ritual but in morality. And this truth is the very fibre of Christianity; a Christian is in the truest sense a Unitarian. 'Jesus answered, "The chief [commandment] is—Hear O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord; and thou shalt love the Lord thy God"' (Mk 12<sup>29</sup>). But even in the OT there are not wanting intimations that the God-head is not a 'monotonous unity,' but that there are distinctions within It; e.g. 'the Angel of Jahweh or of God,' i.e. His presence manifesting itself in outward act (Ex 3<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>19</sup> 22<sup>22</sup>); 'the Captain of Jahweh's host,' who is also called Jahweh (Jos 5<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>7</sup>); 'His Holy Spirit' (Is 63<sup>10</sup>); see also the thrice repeated name (Nu 6<sup>24-26</sup>), and the Tersanctus (Is 6<sup>3</sup>).* According to the reports of His teaching as contained in the Gospel records, our Lord expressly formulated the truth of the unity of God, but never that of the Holy Trinity; and yet the latter pervades the whole record. 'In the gradual process of intercourse with Him, His disciples came to recognize Father, Son, and Holy Spirit as included in their deepening and enlarging thought of God.' But the truth is definitely implied in the discourses in the Upper Room (Jn 14-17), and in the baptismal formula (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>). See Gore's Bampton Lectures, pp. 134 ff.; Illingworth's do., pp. 87 ff.; Gibson, The Thirty-nine Articles, vol. i. pp. 93-101.

(b) Covenant.—The monolatry which preceded monothelism was calculated to give birth to the idea that between Jahweh and His people there was a close and mutual agreement. If He was exclusively their God and Protector, they were bound to do Him service. It is not easy to say at what period the conception arose. But the earlier prophets, though they do not expressly mention a covenant—except Hosea (6<sup>7</sup> doubtful, 8<sup>1</sup>)—all teach the truth that Jahweh requires moral, ethical service from His people. And in the JE compilations of the national traditions the covenant relationship with God is firmly established in the religious thought of Israel. The covenant with Abraham (Gn 15) is the starting-point. The covenant at Sinai (Ex 24<sup>1-11</sup> 24<sup>16-28</sup>) opens the second stage of the history. D has yet another covenant, based on the contents of the Deut. law, and made on the borders of Moab (Dt 29<sup>1-9</sup>, 12, 14, 21; cf. 26<sup>16-19</sup>, 2 K 23<sup>2-21</sup>). But when Israel was carried into Babylon, the Old Covenant was in reality at an end; they had broken it by their sins. Jeremiah, therefore, speaks of a New Covenant (31<sup>31-34</sup>), forgiveness of sins, righteousness, peace and joy. It had been foreshadowed in the life story of Hosea, and was to be the fulfilment of the dreams and longings of all the prophets. 'In the visions of the new covenant the OT becomes Christian.' And the thought is the inspiration of Ezekiel and of Deutero-Isaiah. But there were two other crises in Israel's history where the idea of a covenant is prominent. God gave a covenant, i.e. a promise, to Levi of a perpetual priesthood in the tribe (Dt 33<sup>8</sup>, Jer 33<sup>21</sup>, Mal 2<sup>4</sup>), and to David of a perpetual lineage on the throne (2 S 7, 23<sup>5</sup>, Ps 89<sup>3-24</sup>, Jer 33<sup>17-21</sup>). Thus there were several factors which went to make up the fulness of the Christian covenant. In the Gospels, with the exception of Lk 1<sup>2</sup>, where the Abrahamic covenant is referred to, the only occurrence of the word is at the Last Supper (Mt 26<sup>28</sup> || Mk 14<sup>24</sup>, Lk 22<sup>20</sup>); our Lord uses Jeremiah's term, 'the new covenant,' but at the same time the words 'This is my blood' refer to the covenant at Sinai (Ex 24<sup>8</sup>). This application of the word to the results of His own Person and work served as a starting-point for the fuller working out of the thought by the Apostolic writers. The analogy of the Abrahamic covenant is drawn out chiefly by St. Paul (Ro 4, Gal 3), while the Ep. to the Hebrews deals with the kingship (ch. 1; cf. Mt 22<sup>4</sup>), the priesthood (7-10), and, closely connected with the latter, the spiritual covenant of the forgiveness of sins (10<sup>16-18</sup>).

(c) Law.—A study of the passages in the Gospels which speak of the Mosaic Law shows in a striking manner the relation of Christ's teaching to the religion of Israel. On the one hand, He recognized the Divine authority of the Law, in its true meaning and spirit, and not as interpreted and embodied in the 'deformed righteousness' of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 5<sup>20-22</sup> 19<sup>17</sup> 23<sup>1</sup> Lk 16<sup>7</sup>). But, on the other hand, in order to 'fulfil' (ἀναπέ-σαι) the Law He was obliged to take a negative or critical attitude. 'The Law and the Prophets,' as a dispensation, have had their day, and have given place to 'the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 11<sup>12</sup>. || Lk 16<sup>9</sup>), and to 'grace and truth' (Jn 1<sup>17</sup>; and see Mt 9<sup>13</sup> || Mk 2<sup>14</sup>, Lk 5<sup>20</sup>). Even the Law and the Prophets meant something deeper than they had hitherto been understood to mean (Mt 7<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>34-40</sup>), and this deeper meaning is contained in a 'new commandment' which Jesus gives to the disciples (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>). The Law had generally been considered as a compendium of positive commands bearing on the details of life; but the only parts of it that mattered were 'the weightier things,' judgment, mercy and faith (Mt 23<sup>23</sup> || Lk 11<sup>42</sup>). Other criticisms of the Law are found in Mt 5<sup>21-48</sup> 19<sup>8</sup> (divorce) 12<sup>1-12</sup>, Lk 13<sup>10-17</sup> 14<sup>1-6</sup>, Jn 5<sup>8-17</sup> 9 (Sabbath). Our Lord took care to avoid causing offence (Mt 18<sup>6</sup>), though showing at the same time that He was raised above bondage to purely ritual and non-ethical enactments: e.g., in the payment of the Temple tax (Mt 17<sup>24</sup>), in touching the leper, but at the same time telling him to offer the requisite sacrifices (Mt 8<sup>1-4</sup>). The one decisive breach that He made with Jewish legalism was in dealing with the distinction between clean and unclean foods, and with ceremonial washings (Mt 15<sup>1-20</sup>, Mk 7<sup>1-23</sup> [note IV of v. 19], Lk 10<sup>10</sup> 11<sup>30-31</sup>).

(d) Sacrifices.—The Jewish ordinances of sacrifice formed part of the 'Law,' and were also in intimate connexion with the covenant idea; this section, therefore, must to some extent overlap the two preceding. Our Lord accorded to sacrifices the same recognition that He accorded to the Law as a whole; He accepted them as of Divine authority, and binding upon the Jews. He told the recovered leper to offer the prescribed gift (Mt 8<sup>4</sup>); He assumed that His hearers offered them as an ordinary practice (5<sup>23</sup>). But the latter passage also shows that He relegated them to a subordinate place as compared with the higher moral duties. He twice quoted the saying of Hosea that God desires 'mercy and not sacrifice' (Mt 9<sup>13</sup>). And by the inauguration of the New Covenant in His own blood, the whole Jewish system was by implication abrogated by being transcended. The thought of sacrifice seems also to underlie the words in Mt 20<sup>28</sup> || Mk 10<sup>45</sup>. Christ gave His life as a 'ransom' (λύτρον)—a means of redemption or release. The word is used in the LXX as a rendering of חַטָּאת a 'covering' or 'atonement.' But such a passage as Nu 35<sup>31</sup> shows that it does not necessarily imply the death of an animal; and it is precarious to press our Lord's words to support any theory of the Atonement, as has been done with disastrous results by widely differing schools of thought. Further, Jn 19<sup>36</sup> refers to the Passover lamb; and possibly also Jn 1<sup>29-36</sup>, but it is safer to regard the Baptist's words as an allusion to Is 53<sup>7</sup>, where the sufferings and death of the Servant of Jahweh are described as being in some sense vicarious, and availing to 'take away the sin of the world'; this truth was depicted symbolically by the 'scapegoat' on the Day of Atonement. The words of our Lord at the institution of the Eucharist were, as has been said above, the starting-point for the fuller teaching of the Apostolic writers. Of the debts which Christianity owes to Israel, none is more fundamental than the conception of sacrifice. The references to the subject in St. Paul's writings, though not numerous, are quite enough to show that he had a deep and firm belief in the sacrificial and propitiatory character of Christ's death (Sandy-Headlam, Romans, pp. 91 f.). See also I P 1<sup>2</sup> (an allusion to the covenant sacrifice at Horeb), 19<sup>9</sup> (the Passover lamb), 24<sup>4</sup> (a general description of an atoning sacrifice). And it is the paramount thought in Hebrews, which shows how Christ's sacrifice and priesthood were analogous to but infinitely surpassed, the Jewish sacrifices and the Levitical priesthood (see art. DAY OF ATONEMENT).

(e) Messianic expectations.—(i.) The universal expectation in Israel in our Lord's time that One was to come who should be a national deliverer, had its roots as far back as the Divine promises to Abraham; but the focussing of all hopes on a King was due to the promise made to David that his line should have perpetual possession of the throne. The hopes of national peace and glory under a king reach a climax in Isaiah and Micah. But they received a terrible reverse at the Captivity, and in subsequent OT writings the idea largely disappeared. It was revived, however, to a certain extent in apocryphal and especially in apocalyptic literature. In two of the earlier portions of the Sibylline Oracles, in parts of the Ethiopian Enoch and in the Psalms of Solomon, there are indications of the hope, though the title 'Messiah' is not used. The Christian belief that Jesus was the Messiah (though the truth was guessed by the first disciples, Jn 1<sup>41-49</sup>) was due to His own claims, which were not, however, put forward even to the Twelve till near the close of His ministry. He pronounced Simon Peter blessed because the truth had been Divinely revealed to him (Mt 16<sup>17</sup>); and He acknowledged to Pilate that He was a King (Mt 27<sup>11</sup> || Mk 15<sup>2</sup>, Lk 23<sup>3</sup>, Jn 18<sup>36</sup>). But while He declared the fact, He raised it into a new sphere of thought—'My kingdom is not of this world; if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight . . . but now is my kingdom not from hence.' And in conversing with the Twelve He linked with it the clear announcement of His approaching sufferings (Mk 8<sup>31-32</sup> and parallels; cf. Mt 20<sup>20-28</sup>).

(ii.) The kingship of the Messiah was the only conception which had been entertained by the Jews themselves. But 'in the minds of the first members of the Christian Church the experiences of the Cross, the Resurrection and Pentecost, together with the impression which the character and work, the life and teaching of Jesus had made upon them, led to a rapid transformation, pregnant with important consequences, of the idea of the Messiah which they held as Jews' (Hastings' DB iii. 356<sup>a</sup>). As they studied the OT Scriptures in the light of these experiences, 'they found scattered there the elements of a relatively complete ideal, which had been perfectly fulfilled in Jesus' (ib. 356<sup>b</sup>). The very mode of life and teaching which He had adopted drew their attention to the promise of a 'true prophet' (Dt 18<sup>15</sup>, Ac 3<sup>22</sup>, 7<sup>37</sup>). And in the miracles which He performed He appeared to be a counterpart of OT prophets. This working of miracles formed part of the current Messianic conception, as is implied by John the Baptist (Mt 11<sup>3</sup>), and in the questionings of the Jews (Jn 7<sup>21</sup>). Another trait in the prophetic office of the Messiah—that of the revealer of unknown truths—is implied by the Samaritan woman (Jn 4<sup>22</sup>). This had formed no definite part of the earlier Messianic expectations, though the nation had looked forward to a true prophet (I Mac 14<sup>4</sup>). In our Lord's time men hoped for the return of one of the old prophets (Mk 6<sup>15</sup> 8<sup>27</sup>), or the coming of one who was called 'the prophet' (Jn 1<sup>21-22</sup> 6<sup>14</sup>); but there is no indication that 'the prophet' was identified with the Messiah.

(iii.) The more clearly the atoning value of Christ's death was realized, the more completely was He seen to be the ideal Priest foreshadowed by the Levitical priesthood. His own words would form the starting-point for this conception; He 'laid down' His life, He 'gave' His life as a ransom (see above). The double thought of Christ as Victim and Priest is fully worked out in Hebrews on the basis of Ps 110<sup>4</sup>.

(iv.) The OT contains many passages which teach that Divine purposes are accomplished through the sufferings of the righteous; and in the later chapters of the Book of Isaiah the righteous portion of the nation merges into the vision of one representative Servant of Jahweh, whose preaching was to bring the whole nation, and even Gentiles, to the light, and whose sufferings were to have a vicarious value. This representation does not appear to have exercised any influence on the later Jewish expectations of the Messiah. The inspired utterance of John the Baptist (Jn 1<sup>29-36</sup>) pointed towards the truth, though his hearers do not seem to have understood his words. The Twelve could not realize the necessity for Christ's sufferings until He had suffered, when the great truth dawned upon them (Mt 12<sup>28-31</sup>, Ac 3<sup>12-26</sup> 4<sup>27-30</sup>). It has been suggested that the servant (עבד) of Lk 14<sup>26</sup> may be an allusion to the same figure of prophecy.

(f) Eschatology.—The Jewish and Christian Messianic beliefs were closely bound up with eschatological teaching as a whole. In the OT the expectations with regard to a hereafter consisted mainly of the aspirations of saints who felt certain that righteousness is eternal, and that God's power and dominion are infinite. This intuitive assurance that the present life with its inequalities and anomalies cannot be the whole of life, maintained itself in some minds side by side with the popular notions held by the Hebrews in common with the Babylonian and other Semitic peoples, that Sheol was a state in which man would continue to exist, but only in a shadowy, nerveless, purposeless reproduction of his present personality. In apocalyptic literature an advance was made, to some extent. The 'last things' began to be detailed in a great variety of forms—some of them, indeed, sensuous, and marred by narrow Jewish exclusiveness, but others more spiritual and universal; in some the Messianic kingdom is to be on this earth, in others in a transformed heaven and earth; in some the enemies of Israel are punished at death in Sheol or Hades, which thus becomes equivalent to Hell, while the righteous (i.e. Israel) attain to a resurrection; in others the resurrection is universal, and a prelude to a final spiritual judgment. And Christian teaching borrowed much, both from the OT and from later Jewish writings; but it rose to a spiritual height and certainty far beyond the former, while at the same time it discarded the gross, exaggerated, and unspiritual elements which marred the latter. Christ's own eschatological teaching centres round the Kingdom of God. He, like the OT writers, does not discuss theoretical or speculative questions, but deals with broad moral issues. His teaching 'unfolds the course of the Divine kingdom which had been the object of OT faith and the centre of OT hope. It presents that kingdom as a thing of the actual present, brought to men in and by the Teacher Himself, but also as a thing of the future which looks through all historical fulfillments to a completer realization—a thing, too, of gradual, unobtrusive growth, yet destined to be finally established by a great conclusive event' (Hastings' DBI 730<sup>3</sup>). Our Lord, as reported by the Synoptists, gave a large place to the promise of His own Return, an objective event, the time of which was not yet revealed even to the Son. In some passages this is closely connected with a quite distinct occurrence—the destruction of Jerusalem (Mt 24<sup>1</sup> Mk 13; cf. Mt 10<sup>23</sup> 16<sup>27</sup>, Mk 8<sup>38</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup> 21<sup>2</sup>). Connected with the Parousia, and the cause of it, is the Final Judgment, which will occur at the end of the world, a judgment of individuals, and of universal scope, in which Christ the Son of Man will be Himself the Judge. The Fourth Gospel, while not without indications (cf. 12<sup>48</sup>) of this final judgment, lays stress rather on a present judgment, 'fulfilling itself in a probation of character and a self-verdict which proceed now' (21<sup>2</sup> 12<sup>34</sup>). With the teaching of Jesus on the Parousia and Judgment is connected the doctrine of a Resurrection. In the OT this was not a doctrine, but a vague longing of a few great minds for a deliverance from Sheol, a life superior to death. It was only gradually and at a late date that the conception became more distinct. At first it was a re-animation of Israel as a whole, but Is 26<sup>19</sup> seems to breathe the more individual hope; and the clearest statement is reached in Dn 12<sup>2</sup>, the latest OT utterance on the subject. Nowhere in the OT is a resurrection thought of as extending beyond the case of Israel; but the doctrine of a resurrection of all men was gradually evolved, and had been accepted before the Christian era by the Pharisees and the mass of the people, though rejected by the Sadducees, in accordance with their principle of rejecting all traditions and accretions later than the OT. Our Lord's teaching holds a course between the two; it is based on the great principles of the OT, but is coloured, as to some details, by the eschatology of later writings, being at the same time free from the crudeness and extravagances of the popular beliefs. See Mt 22<sup>23-33</sup> Mk 12<sup>28-29</sup>, Lk 20<sup>27-28</sup>; Mt 8<sup>11</sup>, Lk 13<sup>28</sup>; Mt 10<sup>28</sup>, Lk 14<sup>14</sup>, Jn 5<sup>28-29</sup>, 11<sup>51-52</sup>.

(h) Scripture.—This has been placed at the end, and not at the beginning, of the series, because the growth of Christianity out of the religion of Israel would remain a fact even if all the Jewish records had been destroyed. But it is true that the possession of, and devotion to, the OT Scriptures had an enormous effect on the formation of Christian thought and teaching and phraseology. The direct quotations from the OT in the NT are very many; and there are, besides, a mass of more or less distinct allusions and reminiscences which must be studied in their OT context if their meaning in the NT is to be understood. See art. OLD TESTAMENT, and QUOTATIONS.

ISSUE OF BLOOD.—One peculiarly distressing case of this ailment is mentioned in the Gospels (Mt 9th αἰμορροῖσα, Mk 5th, and Lk 8th ὄψα ἐν πόρει αἰματος). The description indicates a very severe and obstinate form of uterine hemorrhage possibly arising from internal growth, for the patient had suffered many things of many physicians and only grew worse for the treatment; and she had endured the complaint for twelve years. The malady was in general regarded as incurable by medical treatment, and was handed over to be dealt with by magic charms and amulets. Its painful character, apart from its enfeebling and prostrating effects, was increased by the fact that it involved a rigorous isolation from society, and was looked upon with particular horror. All female discharges, even the normal monthly occurrences, were peculiarly repugnant to the Semitic mind, and came under the cycle of custom and legislation to which the Polynesian term taboo has been applied. The terror arose from the dread of supernatural penalties and of malignant agencies which were supposed to emanate from women at such times. Supernatural powers were believed to reside in the blood of the meneses, on account of which it was itself held to be efficacious as a charm. The idea may have been modified before NT times, and yet would remain at least as a vague undefined repugnance and fear (see W. R. Smith, ES, Note on 'Holiness, Uncleanness, and Taboo'). The sufferer would further be compelled to perpetual celibacy.

Among Talmudic cures of this malady we find the following: 'Let the patient sit at the parting of the ways with a cup of wine in her hand, and let some one coming up behind startle her by calling out, Be healed of thine issue of blood.' And, 'Take three measures of onions, boil in wine and give the patient to drink, at the same time calling out suddenly, Be healed of thine issue.'—An interesting anticipation of certain familiar features of modern therapeutics.

That our Lord's healing of the sufferer was regarded as memorable and attained to a considerable vogue apart from the NT record, is evidenced by the legend that the votive figure at Baniás, supposed to be that of Christ, was erected by this woman out of gratitude to her Deliverer, and other kindred legends.

The chief feature of the miracle was the fact that the healing was gained surreptitiously, apart from the will and initiative of Jesus. Our Lord was pressing through the crowd on His way to the house of Jairus, when the woman, moved by a great expectation of healing, drew near to touch at least the fringe of His garment (in which special sanctity resided), assured that even this slight contact would remove her trouble. Having accomplished her object, 'immediately she felt in her body that she was healed of the plague,' and our Lord became conscious that 'virtue' had gone out of Him. The idea that healing power was resident in the body of Jesus, comparable to a charge of electric energy, is not to be entertained. The casual touching of His body by any sick person would have had no such result. We must emphasize (1) the touch of faith. The whole nature of the woman had been roused to activity and hopefulness. No labour of Jesus to create and evoke this essential condition of being healed was necessary or possible. The expectation existed at full tension, and she was prepared mentally and therefore physically to receive the healing power. And (2) corresponding to this exercise of faith is a Divinely great capacity for sympathy resident in the spirit and life of Jesus. While this capacity infinitely transcends the forces of human sympathy which exist in humanity, it still may be believed to operate on the same plane and to be not alien but kindred. The possibility of sympathetic relations being in existence between 'mind and mind,' quite irrespective of consciousness or will on the part of both or of either, is an ascertained fact, however it may be explainable. Various theories are put forward to account for the phenomena, but meanwhile the fact must be recognized—the power of mind to affect mind by other than the channels of sense. Moreover, (3), our Lord's own teaching must be duly weighed, that His works were due to the indwelling Divine power. The nature of Jesus was strung to sympathy with the whole complex coil of human suffering and need. At the very moment of this occurrence His heart was full of intensest sympathy with the sorrowing ruler. Such a nature then would present, quite apart from the immediate exercise of will, a fitting instrument for the Divine healing energy. The Divine power utilized and made more efficacious these already powerful sympathies and expectations; but while this is to be freely recognized, the chief emphasis is to be laid on the holy will of the unseen Father, with whom our Lord was morally and essentially one.

ITURÆA.—This term is used in Lk 8th among other designations of political and geographical districts, the identification of whose rulers is intended to give a fixed chronological starting-point for the ministry of John the Baptist. It does not occur as a substantive in any pre-Christian writer. Neither does it occur again in post-Christian literature until the days of Eusebius, and doubtfully then. The term 'Itureans,' however, as the name of a people, is frequently mentioned. The first mention among Greek writers of the Itureans is that of Eupolemus (B.C. 150) as quoted by Eusebius (Prep. Evan. ix. 30). Cicero (Philipp. ii. 112) speaks of them as a predatory people, and Cæsar (Bell. Afr. 20) calls them skilful archers (cf. Jos. Ant. xiii. xl. 3 [Dindorf reads 'τροπῶται'; but it is commonly agreed that this is incorrect, and Naber's and Niese's reading, 'τροπῶται', is preferred]; Strabo xv. ii. 10, 18, 20; Dio Cass. xlix. 32. 5; Appian, Civ. v. 7; also Virgil, Georg. ii. 448; Lucan, Pharsal. vii. 230, 514).

The most important fact brought into view by the history of the Itureans, so far as the understanding of Lk 8th is concerned, is their migratory character. They first appear as the sons of Jetur (Gn 25th, 1 Ch 1st), a branch of the race of Ishmael

(cf. artt. 'Jetur' and 'Ishmael' in Hastings' DB). Their original home was the territory to the S.E. of Palestine. In the course of their wanderings they drifted northward, and some time before the Exile reached the country adjacent to Israel, east of the Jordan. Late in the 2nd cent. B.C., Aristobolus I. conquered certain bands of non-Israelites who had settled in Galilee, and compelled them either to submit to circumcision or leave the country. It has been conjectured that among these there were some Itureans, who moved still farther north. At any rate, in the next generation the Itureans are definitely located in the region of Lebanon. Strabo (XVI. ii. 10) speaks of them as inhabiting the 'mountain country' which with Chalcis and Marseyas was ruled by Ptolemy the son of Mennæus (B.C. 85-40). He further describes them in association with the Arabs as 'all lawless men dwelling in the mountain region of the Libanus and anti-Libanus territory,' and harassing the agricultural population of the adjacent plain. D. Æmilius Secundus, a military commander under Quirinius, reports that in a campaign against the Itureans in the Lebanon range, he had stormed a fortress of theirs (Mommsen, Ephemeris Epigr. iv. 1881, p. 638). With the death of Ptolemy, the government of this entire region passed into the hands of his son Lysanias, whom accordingly Dio Cassius calls 'king of the Itureans' (xlii. 32). Lysanias was put to death by Mark Antony in B.C. 34, and a little over ten years later (B.C. 23) this territory came, by way of a lease, under the control of a chief named Zenodorus (Jos. Ant. xv. x. 1; BJ i. xx. 4); but in B.C. 20, upon the death of Zenodorus, Augustus gave a portion of it to Herod the Great; and when Herod's kingdom was broken up among his heirs into tetrarchies, it fell to the lot of Philip to possess it (Jos. Ant. xv. x. 3; BJ ii. vi. 3). Subsequently to the mention of Iturea by St. Luke, the emperor Caligula bestowed it upon a certain Soemus (A.D. 39), entitled by Tacitus (Ann. xii. 23) and Dio Cassius (lii. 12) 'king of the Itureans.' From A.D. 49, the date of the death of Soemus, and onwards, the country appears as a part of the province of Syria, furnishing a quota of soldiers for the Roman army (Ephem. Epigr. 1884, p. 194).

The mention of Iturea by St. Luke raises the following questions: (1) Did he use the term as a noun or as an adjective? This is partly a question of correct Greek usage. A noun 'Iturea' would be a linguistic anachronism at the time of St. Luke. It is unknown until the 4th cent.; but that the Evangelist fell into the error of using it as such is maintained by Schürer and H. Holtzmann, while Ramsay (Expos., Feb. 1894, p. 144 ff., Apr. p. 238 ff.), contends against this position.*

(2) Out of this linguistic question grows the historical one: Did St. Luke speak accurately when he enumerated the Iturean country as a part of the tetrarchy of Philip? For even if the Evangelist did use the word 'Iturea' as an adjective, it does not follow that he has correctly located the country. H. Holtzmann (Hand-Com. 'Syn. Gosp.' p. 58) calls it an error that Iturea should be included with Trachonitis in Philip's tetrarchy, and explains that St. Luke probably had in mind a later arrangement of the territory under Agrippa. As a matter of fact, Josephus describes the tetrarchy of Philip as consisting of 'Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and certain parts of the house of Zeno (Zenodorus) about Paneas yielding a revenue of one hundred talents' (Ant. xvii. xi. 4; BJ ii. vi. 3). Iturea is not given in this description. But it does not seem probable that St. Luke, who is writing with so much regard for historical details, should have failed at this point. Hence efforts have been made to account for his statement as it stands. Of these it is easy to set aside as futile (a) the identification of Iturea with Jedur (a region S.W. of Damascus), as etymologically unsound, and as not corresponding geographically to the descriptions given by Strabo. According to these, the Itureans lived in a mountainous region. (b) Cheyne (art. 'Iturea' in Encyc. Bibl.) proposes an interesting emendation of the text of Luke. Instead of Tropaias he would read Asparitidos. But in order to get this substitution he assumes that by a transcriptional error s was dropped from Asparitidos, and the remainder of the word, thus left in confusion, was by another transcriptional manipulation converted into Tropaias. Evidently this is too elaborate and too purely conjectural a proceeding to be accepted. (c) Statements of Eusebius (Os. p. 298, Tropaias ἢ καὶ Tropaias), and p. 298, Tropaias ἢ καὶ Tropaias; cf. also Jerome's translation of the same, 'Trachonitis regio sive Iturea,' Lib. de Situ, etc., p. 238) definitely identify Iturea and Trachonitis, and have been accepted as satisfactorily removing the difficulty. The terms 'Trachonitis' and 'Iturea' do not, however, seem to be used by the Evangelist with the exact equivalency that the phraseology of Eusebius suggests. Hence (d) it is best not to identify Iturea with Trachonitis as a whole, but to assume a certain overlapping of the two, giving a fairly painstaking writer good ground for connecting them together in the attempt to present the situation broadly. This conclusion is supported by the constantly changing character of the territory occupied by the Itureans, as exhibited in the sketch of their history above given, as well as the repeated shifting of the boundary lines in this general region during the centuries before and after Christ.

JACOB.—4. According to the genealogical list in Matthew, Jacob (Ἰακώβ) is the father of Joseph the husband of Mary (Mt 1<sup>5</sup>, 19).

2. One of the reputed progenitors of the Jewish nation. Apart from the reference to Jacob's well

* The importance of this conclusion by Professor Ramsay, apart from the purely academic vindication of St. Luke as a master of good Greek, is that it establishes an analogy for the South-Galatian theory so strenuously advocated by himself.

early times (Ex 22<sup>q</sup> 15-16, Lv 26<sup>q</sup>, 1 K 18<sup>q</sup>, 2 K 19<sup>q</sup>, Jer 32<sup>q</sup>, 1 Ch 29<sup>q</sup>, 2 Ch 30<sup>q</sup>), and occupied a place apart in Jewish thought. According to the Rabbis, they alone were entitled to be called אבות 'fathers.' To them was traced not only the origin of the nation, but also the beginning of true worship. As a descendant of these three, a Jew might claim nobility and a special relationship to God. This claim was recognized as אמת 'righteousness of the fathers,' and was based on Ex 32<sup>q</sup>. It was denounced by John the Baptist (see ABRAHAM, and cf. Mt 3<sup>q</sup>, Lk 3<sup>q</sup>), and it figured prominently in the conflicts between Jesus and the Pharisees (cf. Jn 8<sup>33-37</sup>). Apparently in the time of Jesus it was liable to be abused, and on this account later Rabbis refused to lay stress upon it, declaring it no longer valid. In Rabbinic literature, Jacob is recognized as the most important of the three patriarchs (cf. Lv 26<sup>q</sup>). He prevails with God (Gn 32<sup>q</sup>). He names the sanctuary the house of God (28<sup>22</sup>), and, in contrast to Abraham the father of Ishmael, and Isaac the father of Esau, Jacob inherits the promise in all his children (49).

LITERATURE.—A most suggestive analysis of the character of Jacob, and a full discussion of the problems of the narrative in Genesis, including the names 'Jacob' and 'Israel,' is given by Driver in Hastings' DB ii. 528-535; cf. also Stanley, Jewish Church, i. pp. 46-66; Gore, Studies in Bible, iii. 371; Ph. JACOB'S WELL.—On the arrest of John the Baptist by Herod Antipas, Jesus left Samaria and returned with His loosely-attached followers to Galilee (Mk 1<sup>4</sup>). He travelled by 'the great north road' through Samaria. This road, after skirting the W. edge of the plain of Mukmeih, and passing under the slopes of Gerizim, enters the wide bay forming the approach to the Vale of Nablus. Here it divides, one branch striking west, the other going north across the bay, past the ruins and spring of 'Askar. In the fork of these roads is Jacob's Well (Bir Ya'qub), where Jesus, being wearied with His journey,—it was about the hour of noon,—sat down and rested (Jn 4<sup>6</sup>).

The well is described (Jn 4<sup>6</sup>) as in the neighbourhood of 'a city of Samaria called Sychar, near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph.' This parcel of ground (χωριον) is evidently the plot referred to in Gn 33<sup>19</sup> as lying 'before' (or 'to the east of') Shechem, which Jacob purchased from the native Shechemites for 100 kesitahs. Somewhere within its borders the bones of Joseph were afterwards buried (Jos 24<sup>32</sup>; cf. Ac 7<sup>12</sup>); and the plot came to have for the N. Kingdom the kind of sanctity that Machpelah had for the Kingdom of Judah. It is nowhere recorded that Jacob dug a well here; but the fact had become a matter of common and well-established belief by the time of Jesus, and no serious doubt has since been raised as to the origin or locality of the well. The traditional sites of Jacob's Well and Joseph's Tomb (a little to the N.) are acknowledged by Jews, Samaritans, Christians, and Moslems alike. The tradition for the well goes back to Eusebius (OS, s.v. 'Sychar'). See also art. SYCHAR.

In v. 6 the well is called πηγή ('fountain') ποῦ ἵακώβ; in v. 11 the woman refers to it as πηγάδι ('the cistern or pit') which Jacob gave. The latter is the more exact description, inasmuch as it is not an 'ain, a well of living water, but a ber, a cistern to hold water' (PEFS, 1897, p. 197). Rain-water probably formed the greater part of its supply, though another smaller portion may have been due to infiltration from the surrounding strata. This would partly account for the 'great local reputation' of the water 'for purity and flavour among the natives of El 'Askar and Nablus.' The neighbouring springs were 'heavy' (or hard), being strongly impregnated with lime, while Jacob's Well contained 'lighter' (or softer) water, 'cool, palatable, and refreshing' (G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 676). The woman's presence at the well at noon may have been due to the fact that she was seeking water for workmen on the adjacent cornlands, rather than for domestic use (PEFS, 1897, p. 149). The sacred associations of the spot, together with the 'real excellence' of the water, probably drew visitors regularly both from 'Askar (½ mile away) and from Nablus (1½ miles distant), in spite of nearer and more copious supplies.

The true mouth of the well is several feet below the surface, and beneath a ruined vault, which once formed part of the ancient cruciform church mentioned by Arculph (A. D. 700), and referred to by Jerome (OS, s.v. 'Sychar'). This narrow opening, 4 ft. long and just wide enough to admit the body of a man, broadens out into the cylindrical tank or well itself, which is about 7½ ft. in diameter and over 100 feet deep (G. A. Smith, l.c. p. 373). The interior appears to have been lined throughout with masonry, and thick layers of débris cover the bottom.

If the uniform tradition as to the well's origin be correct, probably the incomer Jacob sank this 'deep' pit to avoid collision with the natives among whom he settled. A well of his own, on his own ground, would make him secure and independent.

JAIRUS.—1. The name Ἰάειρος occurs in Mk 5<sup>22</sup> and in the Lukan parallel (8<sup>1</sup>), but not in Mt. (9<sup>18</sup>). Such variants as Ἰάειρος, Ἰάειρος, Ἰάειρος (as Cod. N) are also to be met with in the MSS. It cannot be positively identified with the Heb. name יָרֵי (as in Jg 10<sup>2</sup>, = prob. 'Jahweh enlightens'), the LXX equivalent of which is variously Ἰαίρ, Ἰαίρ, Ἰαίρ, by simple transcription. In favour of regarding Ἰάειρος as the Grecized form of the Heb. name is the fact that this form occurs in LXX in Est 2<sup>8</sup> for יָרֵי, the father of Mordecai (Cod. A, by a curious slip, has ταρδά), as also in the Apocrypha (Est 11<sup>2</sup>), where the EV has 'Jairus' as the name of the same person. In any case, however, analogy permits the adoption of 'Jair' as the English equivalent of Ἰάειρος; and were the name in familiar vogue, like such names as 'Paul,' this would naturally be its form. The AV 'Jairus' follows the Vulg. (Wyclif, 'Jayrus'). Note the RV 'Jairus,' fixing it as a trisyllable; and cf. other modes of transcription, as e.g. 'Jaeirus' (Twentieth Cent. NT, ed. 1904).

Cheyne (Ency. Bibl. ii. s.v.) regards the name as unauthentic, 'the spontaneous invention of a pious and poetic imagination.' He rejects its identification with OT יָרֵי, and yet he does not hesitate to explain it by reference to יָרֵי, simply because the meaning of the latter term, as he gives it ('he will awaken'), suits his theory of a fanciful creation to fit the drift of the story. This is quite arbitrary and precarious. (Note, the name יָרֵי occurs in 1 Ch 20<sup>9</sup> as the Ἰαίρ; EV 'Jair').

2. Jairus is described in Mk. as εἰς τῶν ἀρχισυνάγωγων (5<sup>22</sup>) and similarly afterwards as ἀρχισυνάγωγος. Lk.'s ἀρχων τῆς συναγωγῆς (8<sup>1</sup>) is perhaps simply explanatory of this term which he himself uses later (v. 49). Mt. has ἀρχων alone (9<sup>18</sup>); but there is no need to suppose that this is intended to represent Jairus as a member of the Sanhedrin, or in any other capacity than that indicated in the other Gospels. The brevity and conciseness of the form in which Mt. gives the story probably explain this loose use of ἀρχων. Wyclif's 'prince' here is due to the Vulg. princeps, and elsewhere he invariably uses 'prince of the synagogue' as ἀρχισυναγωγος. The Vulg., however, uses archisynagogus in the Markan passage, whilst in Lk 8<sup>46</sup> it has principem synagogae, perhaps through the influence of the phrase in v. 41. The Gr. term exactly = the Heb. title שַׂרְיָהוּ שָׂרִי, and the office held by Jairus had well-defined functions. Pre-eminently the 'ruler' (al. 'president' or 'leader') was the director of public worship. Schlürer holds that generally there was 'but one archisynagogus for each synagogue' (HJP II. ii. 65). The expression used in Mk 5<sup>22</sup> quite agrees with this, as it describes the class to which Jairus belonged (one of the 'synagogue-rulers' or 'synagogue-presidents') rather than a particular body of 'rulers' of which he was a member. The locality of the synagogue in which he held office is not definitely indicated. See artt. RULER and SYNAGOGUE.

3. In the triple narrative in which Jairus figures, Mk 5<sup>21-43</sup> = Mt 9<sup>18-26</sup> = Lk 8<sup>40-48</sup>, the condensed form of Mt.'s account is most noticeable. In addition to the omission of the ruler's name and the loose use of ἀρχων (see above), there is no mention of the servant who met our Lord and Jairus on the way with the news that the child was dead (Mk 5<sup>25</sup> = Lk 8<sup>49</sup>). In harmony with this, whilst Mk. says she was in extremis (ἐσχάτως ἔχει), and Lk. that she 'was dying' (ἀπέθνηκεν), when her father came to Jesus, Mt. represents her as already dead (ἄντη ἐπέλειπεν). Perhaps, as a matter of structure, the prefatory link in Mt 9<sup>18</sup> may be compared with the phrase in Mk 5<sup>23</sup> (= Lk 8<sup>46</sup>) ἐν ἁδού λαιούτος, with a bearing on this point.

Cheyne thinks the Mt. form of the story the most original, and explains the representation in Mk. on this point as due to the feeling of a later time that no one would have had a sufficiently bold faith to ask Jesus to restore one who was already dead. So far as that goes, however, the Markan account is parallel with the situation in the story of Lazarus (Jn 11); and we have no other instance in the Gospels besides this in Mt. of a request that one dead should be restored to life. Compression still best accounts for the form in Matthew. The account of the actual restoration to life is also given with the greatest brevity.

The effort to explain this incident as a case of restoration from trance is not quite successful. Mk.'s narrative would admit of such an interpretation, but Lk.'s definite phrases in vv. 42, 43 distinctly fix the sense otherwise. In the primitive tradition the daughter of Jairus was believed to have been brought back from death to life. The story as a whole is full of grace and beauty, and 'belongs to the earliest stratum of the Gospel tradition' (Cheyne, Evng. Bibl. ut supra).

J. S. CLEMENS.

JAMES (Heb. יָחִיָּהּ, Gr. Ἰακώβ, Ἰάκωβος. The English name James is analogous to the Portuguese Xoyme and Gael. Hamish).—The name does not occur in the OT except in the case of the patriarch, but had become common in NT times, and is borne by several persons mentioned in the Gospels. Passing over the father of Joseph the husband of the Virgin Mary, according to St. Matthew's genealogy (Mt 1<sup>8</sup> where the form is Ἰακώβ), we have—1. James the father (AV 'brother') of Judas, Lk 6<sup>16</sup> ('not Iscariot,' Jn 14<sup>22</sup>; the Thaddeus of Mt. and Mk.). The AV translation is derived from the Latin of Beza, and is due to a confusion of this Judas with a quite different person, Judas (Jude) the 'brother of James' (Jude<sup>1</sup>, Mt 13<sup>30</sup>). The older English versions have either 'Judas of James' (Wyclif = Vulg. Judam Jacobi) or 'Judas James' sonne' (Tindale, etc.). Further, St. Luke's practice is to insert ἀδελφός when he means 'brother' (Lk 3<sup>16</sup>, Ac 13<sup>2</sup>). Nothing more is known of this James.

2. James the brother of John (Mt 10<sup>2</sup>, Mk 3<sup>17</sup>, Lk 6<sup>14</sup>, Ac 1<sup>13</sup>), elder* son of Zebedee, a well-to-do Galilean fisherman, most probably a native of Capernaum. The call of James to Apostleship is related in Mt 4<sup>21-22</sup>, Mk 1<sup>19-20</sup> and (perhaps) Lk 5<sup>10</sup>. † The two sons of Zebedee appear to have been partners (καταναύται, μετρώται) with Peter in the fishing industry. Their mother's name was Salome, who was probably a sister of the Virgin Mary (see art. SALOME). The two brothers received from our Lord the name Boanerges ('sons of thunder'), perhaps because of their impetuous zeal for their Master's honour, shown by incidents like the wish to call down fire to consume certain Samaritans who refused Him a passage through their country (Lk 9<sup>54</sup>; cf. Mk 9<sup>48</sup>, Lk 9<sup>54-56</sup>). James is specially mentioned as present at the healing of Peter's wife's mother (Mk 1<sup>30</sup>), at the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5<sup>27</sup>), at the Transfiguration (Mk 9<sup>35</sup>), at the Mount of Olives during the great 'eschatological' discourse (Mk 13<sup>3</sup>), and at the agony in the Garden of Gethsemane (Mk 14<sup>30</sup>). On two of these occasions, the first and the fourth, Andrew is associated with the three; but on all the others, Peter, James, and John are alone with Christ. The special favour accorded to the two brothers (and perhaps their kinship to Jesus) probably prompted the ambitious request of Salome that they might sit as assessors to Him in His kingdom (Mk 10<sup>38-41</sup>, Mt 20<sup>20-23</sup>). James was called upon to 'drink the cup' of suffering (Mk 10<sup>38-39</sup>) first of all the Apostolic band, being beheaded by Herod Agrippa I. in A.D. 44 (Ac 12<sup>2</sup>). An untrustworthy tradition represents him as preaching the gospel in Spain, of which country he is patron saint. Eusebius (HE ii. 9) relates, on the authority of Clement of Alexandria, that, when he was tried for his life, his accuser was so greatly affected by his constancy that he declared himself a Christian, and died with him after obtaining his forgiveness and blessing. See, further, Hastings' DB ii. 541.

3. James the son of Alphaeus, one of the Twelve (Mt 10<sup>2</sup>, Mk 3<sup>18</sup>, Lk 6<sup>14</sup>, Ac 1<sup>13</sup>). In each list he stands at the head of the third group along with Simon Zelotes (with whom he is coupled by St. Luke), Judas of James (= Thaddeus, with whom he is coupled by Mt. and Mk.), and Judas Iscariot. The Gospels tell us nothing more about him, but he was most likely a brother of Matthew, who also was a 'son of Alphaeus' (cf. Mt 9<sup>9</sup> with Mk 2<sup>14</sup>). He has been identified with (4) and (5); but the probabilities seem to the present writer to be against the former identification, while the latter is almost certainly wrong.

4. James ὁ μικρός (Mk 15<sup>40</sup>; cf. Mt 27<sup>56</sup>, Jn 19<sup>25</sup>). He is mentioned as the son of a Mary, probably the wife of Clopas, one of the four women, of whom the other three were Mary the Lord's mother, Mary Magdalene, and Salome, present at the crucifixion. This Mary, with Mary Magdalene, re-

 † He had 'hired servants' (Mk 13<sup>30</sup>). His wife was one of those who ministered to Christ 'of their substance' (Mk 15<sup>41</sup>, Lk 8<sup>3</sup>).
 ‡ The question whether the Lukan narrative refers to the same incident as that related by Mt. and Mk. is not easy to decide. Hammond, Trunch, Wordsworth, and other commentators answer it in the affirmative; Alford, Gresswell, etc., in the negative. Plummer ('St. Luke' in Internat. Crit. Com.) is doubtful. A. Wright regards it as a conflation of the Markan narrative with that found in Jn 21<sup>1-4</sup>. The characteristic features of the Lukan account are: (1) there is no mention of Andrew or Zebedee; (2) St. Peter is the prominent figure; (3) there is no command to follow Christ; (4) the fishermen are washing (not casting or mending) their nets; (5) there is a miraculous draught of fishes.
 § St. Jerome's rendering minor (Vulg. Maria Jacobi minoris), on which he founds an argument for the identification of this James with (3) and (5), takes no account of the fact that the Greek is positive, not comparative.

mained to see where Jesus was buried. She had another son Joseph. Those who identify this James with (3) argue that Alphæus (Ἀλφᾶίος, ἄγιος) and Clopas (Κλωπᾶς) are two forms of the same name (Meyer, Alford). Philologically this is improbable. The extant Syriac Versions render 'Alphæus' by Chalpai, while 'Clopas' is rendered by Kleopha. Nor can it be said to be absolutely certain that ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ of Jn 19<sup>25</sup> means the wife of Clopas. It may mean 'daughter of Clopas.' And it is unlikely that St. Mark would describe James the son of Alphæus by a new designation, James 'the Little' (in stature).* Moreover, it is hard to see why St. John, writing for readers acquainted with the Synoptic Gospels, should introduce into his Gospel the name Clopas if he meant Alphæus. On the whole, therefore, we must conclude with Ewald (Hist. of Israel, vi. 305, note 4) that the identification is unlikely.† Of this James we know nothing further.

5. James the Lord's brother. He is mentioned by name twice in the Gospels (Mt 13<sup>55</sup>, Mk 6<sup>3</sup>). He is the eldest of four brothers, James, Joseph, Judas, and Simon (Simon and Judas, Mt 13<sup>55</sup>). Other references to the Brethren of the Lord are found in Mt 12<sup>46-50</sup>, Mk 3<sup>31-35</sup>, Lk 8<sup>19-21</sup>, Jn 7<sup>2-5</sup>. From these passages we learn that they thought Him mad, and opposed to Him. St. John tells us plainly that His brethren did not believe in Him.

The following passages outside the Gospels have to do with this James: 1 Co 15<sup>7</sup>, Ac 1<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>17</sup> 15 (passim) 21<sup>18-22</sup>, Gal 1<sup>19</sup> 2<sup>1-10</sup>; Jos. Ant. xx. ix. 1; Eusebius, HE ii. 1 (quotation from Clement of Alexandria), ii. 23 (quotation from Hegesippus), vii. 19; Jerome, de Vir. Illus. (quotation from the Gospel according to the Hebrews); Clementine Homilies (ad init.); Apostolic Constitutions, viii. 35. From these passages we learn that he was converted to a full acknowledgment of Christ (probably by the Resurrection), that the Lord appeared to him specially, that he became head of the Church of Jerusalem, and that he was put to death by the Jews either just before the siege (Hegesippus) or some ten years earlier (Josephus). He was sur-named the Just by his fellow-countrymen, and was greatly respected by all classes in Jerusalem.

The Epistle bearing his name, which is almost universally attributed to the brother of the Lord, is of the greatest interest to students of the Gospels. There is no Epistle which contains in a small compass so many allusions to the teaching of Christ subsequently contained in the Gospels as we have them. The following list includes all the more striking parallels: Mt 5<sup>3, 7, 9, 11, 22, 24-27</sup> = Ja 2<sup>a</sup> 2<sup>b</sup> 3<sup>18</sup> 12. 12. 5<sup>2</sup>; Mt 6<sup>18, 24</sup> = Ja 5<sup>2, 4</sup>; Mt 7<sup>1, 7-8, 12, 18, 24</sup> = Ja 4<sup>11-12</sup> 2<sup>2</sup> 3<sup>11, 12</sup> 12<sup>2</sup> (all these are from the Sermon on the Mount). Cf. also Mt 12<sup>28</sup> with Ja 3<sup>1, 2</sup>; Mt 18<sup>1</sup> with Ja 4<sup>8</sup>; Lk 6<sup>21</sup> = Ja 5<sup>1</sup>; Lk 12<sup>18-21</sup> = Ja 4<sup>14</sup>; Lk 8<sup>15</sup> 21<sup>19</sup> (τρομαχῶν), used by Lk. only in the Gospels) = Ja 1<sup>5, 4</sup> 5<sup>11</sup>; Jn 3<sup>3</sup> = Ja 1<sup>17</sup>; Jn 8<sup>31-33</sup> = Ja 1<sup>2</sup>; Jn 13<sup>17</sup> = Ja 4<sup>17</sup>. † On these passages it may be remarked (1) that, while some of the parallels may be explained as coincidences, there remain others which even Renan (L'Antéchrist 2, p. 54) admits to be reminiscences of the words of Jesus; (2) that the evidence is cumulative, and includes correspondence in teaching (e.g. on riches, formalism, prayer) as well as in language; (3) that the most striking parallels are with the Gospel according to St. Matthew, and with the earlier parts of that, suggesting the possibility that James may at first have been a hearer of our Lord, and making it fairly certain that he was acquainted with the special Matthean 'source.'

A second point to be noticed is that the Epistle of James is clearly the work of one trained in the strict observance of the Law, while at the same time his obedience to it is the obedience of zealous love, as far removed as possible from the Pharisaic formalism denounced by our Lord (Ja 1<sup>22-27</sup> 28-12 4<sup>5-7</sup> 5<sup>10, 11</sup>). Both in his case and in that of St. Paul, although they developed on somewhat different lines, the Law was a παραγωγὸς εἰς Χριστόν. This view of the training of James, and consequently of our Lord his Brother, is confirmed by the Gospels. The names of the four brothers, James, Joseph, Simon (=Simeon), and Jude (=Judah), are those of patriarchs. The parents are careful to observe the Law in our Lord's case (Lk 2<sup>22-24, 28, 41, 42</sup>).

The Western Church, in regarding James the Lord's brother as identical with James the son of Alphæus, seems to have been influenced by the authority of Jerome, who, in replying to Helvidius (circa 383 A.D.), urges that, as James the Lord's brother is called an Apostle by St. Paul (Gal 1<sup>19, 20</sup>), he must be identified with James the son of Alphæus, since James the son of Zebedee was dead; and, further, that he was our Lord's first cousin. (Jerome does not identify Alphæus with Clopas). But it may be observed (1) that Jerome himself seems to have abandoned this view (Ep. cxx. ad Hedibian); (2) that ἀδελφός never = ἀνεψιός in the NT; (3) that James the brother of the Lord is always distinguished from the Twelve (Jn 2<sup>13</sup>, Ac 1<sup>13</sup>; cf. Mt 12<sup>50</sup>); (4) that 'His brethren did not believe in him' (Jn 7<sup>8, 9</sup>); (5) that the ἀπέρρολος, on which Jerome relies, is not confined to the Twelve (Ac 14<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>4</sup>).* [For a fuller discussion of the question see the article BRETHREN OF THE LORD].

JARED.—Father of Enoch, named in our Lord's genealogy (Lk 3<sup>37</sup>).

1. The jealousy of God in the OT is connected with the truth that He is God alone, and it is expressed mainly in two ways. First, in the exclusive claims which He makes for Himself: 'Thou shalt have no other gods before me' (Ex 20<sup>3</sup>); 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart,' etc. (Dt 6<sup>5</sup>); 'I am the Lord, that is my name; and my glory will I not give to another, neither my praise unto graven images' (Is 42<sup>8</sup>). This exclusiveness or intolerance of God—His jealousy for Himself, as it may be called—pervades the OT. It is the source of that compulsion which He puts upon the human race to learn the most important lesson which the mind is capable of receiving, that there is one only, the living and true God. This is the presupposition not only of all uplifting religion, but of all science, and of all morality which rises above caste and convention; and what we see in the OT is the jealousy of God working monotheism into the constitution of a race who should impart it to the world. In this sense the jealousy of God is represented in the mind of Christ by the exclusive claims which He makes for Himself, and in the rest of the NT by the reiteration of these claims through the lips of His disciples. Sometimes the expression of it is informal: e.g. 'He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me' (Mt 10<sup>27</sup>); or, 'Blessed is he whosoever shall find none occasion of stumbling in me' (11<sup>9</sup>). Sometimes, again, it is quite explicit: 'No one knoweth the Son save the Father; neither doth any know the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him' (11<sup>27</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel this tone predominates, and there could not be more precise and formal expressions of the jealousy of God, as God is revealed in Christ, than are found, e.g. in Jn 18 6<sup>28</sup> 14<sup>7</sup> (see art. PREACHING CHRIST). This jealousy of God for Himself is echoed in passages like Ac 4<sup>12</sup> ('There is none other name,' etc.), 1 Co 3<sup>11</sup> ('Other foundation can no man lay,' etc.), Gal 1<sup>8</sup> ('Though we or an angel from heaven should preach unto you any other gospel,' etc.); the peculiarity of the Pauline as opposed to the Judaizing gospel being that it ascribed the whole of salvation to Christ alone, and did not share His glory with the Law, and 2 Jn 9<sup>7</sup>.

The second way in which the jealousy of God expresses itself in the OT is in God's unreserved identification of Himself with His people. It is a jealousy for them, in which their cause is His, in which His honour (if such a word can be used in such a connexion) is touched if they are wronged, in which His love rises into passion, and takes on itself responsibilities for them of which they would not have dared to think. Sometimes this, too, is informally expressed: e.g. 'He that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his eye' (Zec 2<sup>8</sup>). Sometimes it is quite explicit: e.g. the great Messianic promises of Is 9<sup>10</sup> are sealed in v. 7 by 'The jealousy of Jahweh of hosts shall do this.' Cf. also the striking passage Zec 8<sup>22</sup>. All this is reproduced in the mind and words of Jesus. He is jealous for His people, especially for 'the little ones' (who, however, are not so much a class of Christians, as Christians generally—a weak and inconsiderable folk in ordinary eyes), and nothing that concerns them is alien to Him. The very slightest service done them has a reward solemnly assured to it (Mt 10<sup>42</sup>); the sin of causing one of them to stumble is denounced with a passion which startles us still as we read (18<sup>6</sup>); cf. art. ANGER, 2 (a). The most thrilling illustration of this jealousy of Jesus for His 'little ones' is given in the Final Judgment: 'Inasmuch as ye did it (or, did it not) to one of these least, my brethren, ye did it (or, did it not) unto me' (25<sup>40, 45</sup>). Jealous love can go no further than this.

2. Since God, especially God revealed in Christ, is in this twofold sense a jealous God, it is clear that there must be in the Christian religion and character a corresponding intensity and passion. Christians ought to be jealous for Christ, sensitive to all that dishonours Him, and especially to all that degrades Him from the place which He claims, and which belongs to Him alone. The NT gives Him what He demands, the name which is above every name; and it is inconsistent with jealousy for Him to give Him only a name alongside of other names—to classify Him, as is often done, with prophets or religious heroes or founders of religions. Jealousy, no doubt, is apt to be a turbid virtue; the OT examples of it—Phineas, Elijah, and Jehu—all illustrate this; and even in Christian history jealousy for Jesus as sole Lord and Saviour has often been confounded with zeal for a definition of one's own making, or for the predominance of one's own ecclesiastical or political faction. Of all virtues, it is the one which most readily calls the old man into the field to reinforce the new, a process which always ends in disaster. Nevertheless, it is the primary virtue of a Christian, just as the keeping of the first commandment was the primary virtue of a Jew.

3. Apart from their use in the sense of an ardent and exclusive devotion to God in Christ, and to the cause of Christ in His people (2 Co 11<sup>2</sup>), the associations of the words ἰζήλος, ἰζηλοῦν in the NT are rather repellent. Sometimes ἰζήλος is anger (Ac 5<sup>17</sup>), the Heb. קָנָן being at least once rendered θυμὸς in LXX; often it is envy (Ac 13<sup>45</sup>; so the verb 7<sup>17</sup>); in this sense, too, it is frequently combined with ἔσς (Ro 13<sup>13</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>20</sup>, Gal 5<sup>20</sup>); only rarely does it denote a keen and affectionate interest (2 Co 7<sup>11</sup>). But this last sense is the one which is really congruous with the fundamental import of jealousy as the sense of self-respect and of honour in the God who is revealed in Christ as Love.

JAMES DENNEY.

JECHONIAH.—Also called in OT Jehoiachin and Coniah; mentioned in Mt 1<sup>12</sup> as a link in our Lord's genealogy.

JEHOSHAPHAT.—A king of Judah, named in our Lord's genealogy (Mt 1<sup>9</sup>).

JERICHO was situated in the valley of the Jordan, about 5 miles west of the river and about 6 north of the Dead Sea. The distance between Jerusalem and Jericho was about 17 miles. The immediate vicinity enjoyed the advantage of abundant springs (2 K 2<sup>19-22</sup>), and showed great fertility. It was the 'city of palms' (Dt 34<sup>6</sup>, 2 Ch 28<sup>13</sup>), and Josephus gives an enthusiastic account of the abundance and variety of its products (BJ IV. viii. 2, 3).

The Jericho which was destroyed by Joshua was a considerable town, characterized by the wealth of its inhabitants and the strength of its fortifications (Jos 6 and 7). The rebuilding of the city is described in 1 K 16<sup>34</sup>, but the place is referred to at earlier dates (Jos 15<sup>1</sup>, 2 S 10<sup>6</sup>, 1 Ch 19<sup>5</sup>). A school of prophets was established at Jericho (2 K 2<sup>23</sup>), and it was from Jericho that Elijah and Elisha went down to Jordan. Other references are found in 2 Ch 28<sup>13</sup>, 2 K 25<sup>5</sup>, Jer 39<sup>5</sup>, Eze 2<sup>34</sup>, Neh 3<sup>27, 28</sup>.

In the time of our Lord, Jericho was a large and important town. Antony granted the revenues of Jericho and the surrounding district to Cleopatra, and these were farmed from her by Herod the Great. Afterwards Herod received Jericho by gift from Augustus, and erected a citadel, which he called Cypros, above the town. He also built within the city a palace, in which he died. This palace was rebuilt by Herod Archelaus after it had been burned down by Simon during the troubles which followed upon the death of Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. XVII. x. 6 and xiii. 1). After the deposition of Herod Archelaus as tetrarch of Judæa, Jericho was held directly by the Roman procurator, who farmed out its revenues.

Modern Jericho (er-Riha) is a miserable village of 200 inhabitants; the forest of palms has entirely disappeared, and only here and there can traces of the former fertility of the district be seen. The exact site of the Canaanite Jericho does not correspond with that of the modern village, and probably there were two towns, a little apart from one another, which, during the prosperity of the Roman occupation, may have been united by continuous building.

By tradition, Jericho has been closely associated with the Baptism of Jesus and the Temptation. The site of Bethany or Bethabara (wh. see), however, cannot be fixed with certainty, and some (e.g. Conder) maintain that the ford east from Jericho cannot be the place, but rather a ford farther north, lying east from Cana of Galilee. The traditional scene of the Temptation is a mountain called from this association Quarantania, lying to the west of Jericho. But the uncertainty of the scene of the Baptism and the vagueness of the phrase 'the wilderness' (Mt 4<sup>1</sup> ||) make this a matter of tradition only.

From Jericho to Jerusalem there are three roads. The central one of these is the most direct, and was that used by pilgrims going from Galilee to Jerusalem, who took the circuitous route in order to avoid entering Samaria. It is an extremely arduous path, and wayfarers were much exposed to the attacks of robbers, who easily found secure concealment among the bare and rugged hills which it traversed: a fact which gives vividness to the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>9</sup>). This road was that which Jesus took on His last journey to Jerusalem. After the raising of Lazarus, Jesus and His disciples withdrew 'into a city called Ephraim' (Jn 11<sup>54</sup>). (On its site see art. EPHRAIM.) From this place Jesus could see the pilgrim bands from Galilee going down to Jericho on their way to Jerusalem. And in all probability, when the Passover was nigh at hand, "He joined one of these bands, and so paid that visit to Jericho with which the names of Bartimeus and Zacchaeus are associated. See art. BARTIMEUS and ZACCHAEUS.*

1. NAME.—This appears in the Gospels as Ἱερουσόλυμα and Ἱερουσαλὴμ. The former of these names, and the more used, appears to have come into common vogue a century or so before the commencement of the Christian era. It occurs in 2 Maccabees (3<sup>9</sup>), in the Letter of Aristeas, and in Strabo, and it is the form always employed by Josephus. In Latin Pagan writers, e.g. Cicero, Pliny, Tacitus, it is employed transliterated as Hierosolyma. Ἱερουσαλὴμ unquestionably is much nearer to the Hebrew ירושלם, however this was vocalized, and is therefore the more primitive. St. Luke specially employs this both in his Gospel and in the Acts. It is noticeable that it is the form put into the mouth of Jesus when His words are professedly reported verbatim (Mt 23<sup>7</sup>, Lk 13<sup>34</sup> 23<sup>28</sup>). The name Jerusalem, as used throughout the Western world, and the Arabic form used in Palestine to-day, Yerusalem, are both derived from this Greek form. In Mt 4<sup>5</sup> 27<sup>51</sup> we have the expression, used previously too in the OT, 'the holy city.' This is familiar to us in Western lands, but it is also, for other reasons, the name for Jerusalem throughout the Moslem world. El-Kuds, or, more classically, el-Mukaddas, 'the sanctuary' or 'holy place,' is the common name for this city in the East.

* The statement is frequently met with, in connexion with our Lord's treatment of Zacchaeus and also in connexion with the parable of the Good Samaritan, that Jericho was a sacerdotal city. In regard to this, it is certain that the priests and Levites did not all reside in Jerusalem, but were scattered throughout the towns and villages of Judaea. Jericho, as within easy reach of Jerusalem and an important place, may have been a favourite residence for the priests (see Schürer, HJP II. 1. 229).

2. NATURAL SITE.—Modern Jerusalem occupies a situation which is defined geographically as 31° 46' 45" N. lat. by 35° 13' 25" long. E. of Greenwich, and lies at levels between 2300 and 2500 feet above the Mediterranean. It is overlooked by somewhat higher ground to the N., to the E., and the South. On the West the outlook is somewhat more open, but even here the view is not very extensive; only along a narrow line to the S.E. a gap in the mountains exposes to view a long strip of the beautiful mountains of Moab across the Dead Sea, itself invisible in its deep basin. Although the exact situation of the city has varied considerably during historical times, yet the main natural features which gave Jerusalem its strength—and its weakness—both as a fortress and as a sanctuary, may be easily recognized to-day. Built, as it has been, in a peculiarly bare and ill-watered region, off the natural lines of communication, it could never have enjoyed its long and famous history but for certain compensating advantages.

The city's site lies slightly to the east of the great mountainous backbone of Palestine, upon a tongue-shaped ridge running from N.W. to S.E. This 'tongue' is the central of three branches given off at this point. The N.E. one terminates opposite the city as the Mount of Olives, while a southern branch given off near the high point before the modern Jaffa road commences to descend to the city, runs almost due south, and terminates near the commencement of the Wady el-Wurd, at a point on which is situated to-day the summer residence of the Greek Patriarch, known as Kalamun. The whole mountain group is isolated from its neighbours on the N.W. and W. by the deep Wady Beit Hanina, to the S.W. by the roots of the Wady es-Surda, and to the E. and S.E. by the Wady en-Nar and other steep valleys running down towards the Jordan and the Dead Sea. To the north and south, where the ancient caravan road from Hebron and the Negeb runs towards Samaria and Galilee, it is separated from the main backbone by only shallow and open valleys. The special ridge of land on which Jerusalem stands is roughly quadrilateral in shape, but merges itself into higher ground towards the N. and N.W. The surface direction is generally downwards from N. to S., with a slight tilt towards the E.; this is due to the dip of the strata, which run E.S.E. Like all this part of the country, the rocky formation is grey chalky limestone, deposited in beds of varying hardness. The least durable, which still lies on the surface of the Mount of Olives, having been denuded here, the top layer over the city's site, is a hard limestone with flinty bands, known locally as the Mezzeh. This is the formation most suitable for building-stone, though the hardest to work upon. Under this are thick strata of a soft white stone of uniform consistence, known locally as Meleki. These softer layers have been of the greatest importance in the history of the city, as in them have been excavated the countless caves, cisterns, and tombs which cover the whole district, and from them in ancient times most of the building-stones were taken. In many places this Meleki rock when first excavated is quite soft and easily worked with the most primitive tools, but on exposure to the air it rapidly hardens. The stones from this soft layer, however, never have the durability of those from the Mezzeh; and doubtless it is because of the poor material used that so few relics of real antiquity have survived till to-day. Under the Melckî is a layer of dolomite limestone which comes to the surface in the valley to the south of the city, and is of importance, because along its non-porous surface the water, which percolates through the other layers, is conducted upwards to the one spring—the Virgin's Fountain.

The enormous accumulation of débris over the ancient site renders it difficult to picture to-day its primitive condition. The extensive investigations made during the past fifty years, as well as the examination of many kindred sites in other parts of Palestine, lead to the conclusion that the whole area before human habitation consisted of an irregular, rocky surface, broken up by a number of small shallow valleys in which alone there was sufficient soil for vegetation. To-day the rock is everywhere covered with débris of a depth varying from 40 to 70 or more feet. Only those who understand how much this vast accumulation has blotted out the ancient natural landmarks can realize how very difficult are even the essential and elementary questions of Jerusalem topography.

Of the broad natural features that survive, most manifest are the two great valleys which demark the before-mentioned tongue of land. The Eastern Valley commences a mile north of the city wall in a shallow depression near the watershed, a little to the N. of the highest point on the Jaffa road. It at first runs S.E., and is shallow and open: it is here known as the Wady el-Jôz. It then turns due south, and soon becomes a ravine with steep sides, called by the Moslems the Wady Sîhî Mirâm, and by Christians since the 4th cent. the Valley of Jehoshaphat* (a name very probably connected originally with the neighbouring village of Shafat, and corrupted to Jehoshaphat because of 11 3<sup>a</sup> 12). This ravine, on reaching the northern extremity of the village of Silwan, turns S.W. and joins the Western Valley near the well now called Bîr Eyyûb. In ancient times this part of the valley with its steep and, in places, precipitous sides, must have formed a most efficient protection to the whole E. and S.E. sides of the city. It is mentioned in the NT as the 'brook' (χεῖμα) of Kidron (Jn 18<sup>3</sup>). The valley is almost all the year quite dry, but after a sudden heavy storm quite a considerable torrent may pour down its centre. The present writer has traversed the road along the lower parts of the valley immediately after such rain, with the water half-way to his knees.

The Western Valley—known to-day as the Wady er-Rabâbî—is shorter and more crooked than that on the East. It commences to the S. of the modern Jaffa road close to the Birket Mamilla, its head being now occupied by a large Moslem burying ground. After running E. towards the Jaffa Gate—near which it has been extensively filled up with rubbish during recent years—it curves south, and some 300 yards down is crossed by the arched, though now half-buried, 'low-level aqueduct.' A little further on it is transformed by the erection of a barrier across its breadth into a great pool—the Birket es-Sultân. Below the barrier it rapidly deepens and curves S.E., until at Bîr Eyyûb it joins the Kidron Valley; the new valley formed by their union runs, under the name of the Wady en-Nâr (the Valley of Fire), down to the Dead Sea. The Wady er-Rabâbî is very generally considered to be the Valley of Hinnom. Several good authorities are against this identification, but for the present purpose there is no need to enter into this discussion, and here it may be provisionally accepted. Although not so steep a valley as the Eastern one, the Wady er-Rabâbî presented a much more effective protection to the walls in ancient days than present conditions suggest. In NT times it must have made attack along the whole W. and S.W. sides almost impracticable. Only to the N. and N.W. was the city without natural defence, and it was from these points that she always proved vulnerable.

The quadrilateral plateau enclosed by these valleys, about half a mile in breadth and some 1000 acres in extent, was subdivided by several shallow natural valleys. Of these the most important, and the only one which to-day is clearly seen, is a valley known as el-Wad. This, commencing near the present Damascus Gate, runs S. in a somewhat curved direction, dividing the modern city into two unequal halves, and after passing out near the Dung Gate joins the Kidron Valley at the Pool of Siloam. Although extensively filled up in places, the outline of the valley may still be clearly seen from any high point in the city near the Damascus Gate, and its bed is to-day traversed by one of the two carriage roads in the city. Though crossed near the Bab es-Silsîleh by an artificial causeway in which was discovered 'Wilson's Arch,' it again appears near the Jews' Walling-place, much of its bed being even to-day waste ground. At this point the W. hill still preserves something of its precipitous face,* but on its E. side it is largely encroached upon by the S.W. corner of the Haram. This valley is evidently that described as the Tyropœon or Cheesemongers' Valley, and by it the whole natural site of Jerusalem is divided into Western and Eastern hills.

The broader and loftier Western hill is without doubt that called by Josephus the Upper Marketplace and the Upper City, and it is the one which since the 4th cent. has been known as Zion. Josephus (BJ v. iv. 1) mentions that in his day it was called the Citadel of David, and this tradition survives in the name the 'Tower of David,' given to the fortress at the Jaffa Gate. This is not the place to discuss the position of Zion, but it is now fairly generally admitted that the tradition which placed the Citadel of David and Zion on this Western spur was wrong, and that these sites lay on the Eastern hill south of the Temple. Josephus (BJ v. iv. 1) describes the Western hill as 'much higher' and 'in length more direct' than the other hill opposite to it. The buildings on it extended southward to the Valley of Hinnom, but to the north it is bounded by a valley which runs eastward from near the modern Jaffa Gate to join the Tyropœon Valley opposite the Western wall of the Temple area. It is to-day largely filled up, but its direction is preserved by David Street. The first wall ran along the S. edge of this valley, and the suburbs which grew up to its north were enclosed by the second wall.

Regarding the Eastern hill, or, rather, regarding the name for part of this Eastern hill, there is much more dispute. Josephus (BJ v. iv. 1) wrote of the 'other hill, which was called Akra, and sustains the lower city': it 'is the shape of a moon when she is horned; over against this there was a third hill'—evidently, from the description, that covered by the Temple—'but naturally lower than Akra, and parted formerly from the other by a deep valley.' He narrates how Simon Maccabæus, after capturing the fortress which stood there, set his followers to work night and day for three years levelling the mountain, so that it should no longer be able to support a fortress which could overlook the Temple. As a result of this work, the valley between this hill and the Temple was filled up.

* Robinson, ERP i. 390.

The conclusion is therefore that this hill, which we learn was the 'City of David' at the time of the Maccabees, formed in the days of Josephus one hill with the Temple hill, and further that it was separated from the Western hill, whereon was the Upper City, by the valley which 'extended as far as Siloam.' All this points to the Eastern hill south of the Temple as the site of Akra* and of the Lower City. Akra cannot have lain north of the Temple, for here lay the Antonia (Ant. xv. xi. 4; BJ v. v. 8), the ancient Baris or tower, a fortress distinct from the Akra, indeed largely its successor; and north of this again was Bezetha, the New City.

There is much to confirm this view of the position of the Akra. The Akra was built on the 'City of David,' and this is identical with the Jebusite Zion. On quite other grounds Zion has been placed on this hill by many modern authorities. Then Akra is associated, in the description of the taking of Jerusalem, with 'the fountain,' i.e. the Virgin's Fountain, and Siloam (BJ v. vi. 1).† The appropriateness of the name 'Lower City' for the part of Jerusalem which sloped down south from the Temple is as evident as 'Upper City' is for that which actually overlooked the Temple on the west. If this, the most ancient part of Jerusalem, is not that described by Josephus as Akra and Lower City, what name did it have? It must have contained a very large share of the ordinary dwellings of the people. Ophias (the Ophel of the OT) seems in Josephus (BJ v. iv. 2) time, at any rate, to have been only a particular knoll near the S.E. corner of the Temple.

The topographical difficulties are not insurmountable if the history is borne in mind. It is highly probable that a valley does exist either south of the present Temple area, or even on a line between the present Temple platform and the el-Aksa mosque. The name may have remained associated with the highest parts of the hill, even though the wall of the Temple at the time of Josephus may have encroached on the hill, and even have covered part of the site of the ancient fortress. The Lower City seems to have extended up the Tyropoeon Valley at least to the first wall, and hence the descent by steps from one of the W. gates of the Temple described by Josephus presents no real difficulty to the view of the position of Akra here maintained.

The older view of Robinson, Warren, Conder, and others, that Akra was the hill now sustaining the Muristan and the Church of the Sepulchre, north of the W. branch of the Tyropoeon Valley, presents many difficulties. This was the area enclosed by the second wall, and Josephus calls it not the Lower City, but 'the northern quarter of the city.' Then the condition of neither the hill nor the valley tallies with the description of Josephus, and in his day the valley between this and the Temple must have been very much deeper than it is to-day. Josephus is more likely to be wrong in stating that the hill had once been higher than the Temple and was separated from it by a deep valley—a statement which depended on tradition—than in describing the hill as lower in his time and the valley as filled up—facts which he must have seen with his own eyes.

3. CLIMATE AND DISEASES.—The climate of Jerusalem, while bearing the broad characteristics common to the land, presents in some respects marked features of contrast to that of the Jordan Valley and other low-lying places which were the scenes of the ministry of Jesus. There is every reason for believing that the general climatic features are the same to-day as then. On the whole, Jerusalem must be considered healthy, and what disease there is, is largely due to preventable causes. The marked changes of season, the clear pure atmosphere, with frequent winds, and the cool nights even in midsummer, combine to give Jerusalem a climate superior to the lower parts of Palestine. In winter the cold is considerable but never extreme, the lowest temperature recorded in 20 years being only 25° F. As a rule, a frost occurs on some half a dozen nights in each year. January, February, and December are, in this order, the three coldest and wettest months, though the minimum temperature has occurred several times in March, and a night temperature as low as 40° at the end of May (cf. Jn 18<sup>8</sup>). Snow falls heavily at times, but only in exceptionally severe winters. The average rainfall is about 26 inches, a lower mean than at Hebron, but higher than in the plains and the Jordan Valley. The maximum fall recorded (1847) was 41.62 inches, the minimum (1870) was 13.39. So low a fall as this, especially if preceded by a scanty fall, means considerable distress in the succeeding season. During the summer no rain falls, and the mean temperature steadily rises till August, when it reaches 73.6, though the days of maximum heat (near or even over 100°) are often in September. It is not, however, the seasons of extreme heat or cold that are most trying to the health, but the intermediate spring and autumn, especially the months of May and October. This is largely due to the winds. Of all the winds the most characteristic is the S.E.—the sirocco—which in midwinter blows piercingly cold, and in the spring and autumn (but not at all in the summer) hot, stifling, and often laden with fine dust from the deserts whence it comes. On such days all Nature suffers, the vegetation droops and man and beast feel debilitated and depressed, but is actually more liable to illness, especially 'fever' and ophthalmia. The N.W. is the cold refreshing wind which, almost every summer afternoon and evening, mitigates the heat. The S.W. wind blows moist off the sea, and in the later summer brings the welcome copious clouds and, in consequence, the refreshing 'dews.' In the early mornings of September and October thick mists often fill the valleys till dispersed by the rising sun. The onset of the rains, in late October, is not uncommonly signalized by heavy thunderstorms and sudden downpours of rain, which fill with raging and destructive floods the valleys still parched by seven months' drought. As much as 4 inches of rain has fallen in one day.

* This view was apparently first put forward by Olshausen, and has been recently revived by Benzinger, G. A. Smith, and Sanday.

† CE BJ v. iv. 1, vi. 3, and v. vii. 2.

The diseases of Jerusalem are preventable to a large extent under proper sanitary conditions. Malarial fevers, ophthalmia, and smallpox (in epidemics) are the greatest scourges. Enteric fever, typhus, measles, scarlet fever, and cholera (rarely) occur in epidemics. Tubercular diseases, rheumatism, erysipelas, intestinal worms, and various skin diseases are all common.

4. WATER SUPPLY.—The water supply of Jerusalem has in all its history been of such importance and, on account of the altitude of the city, has involved so many elaborate works, which remain to-day as archaeological problems, that it will be well to consider it separately. The city never appears to have seriously suffered from want of water in sieges, but probably at no period was Jerusalem more lavishly supplied with water than it was during the Roman predominance, and most of the arrangements were complete before the time of Christ.

Of springs we know of only one to-day, and there is no reason to believe there were ever any more. This spring is that known to the Christians as 'Ain Sitti Miriam'—the spring of the Lady Mary—or the Virgin's Fountain (from a tradition that the Virgin washed the clothes of the infant Jesus there), to the Moslem fellahin as 'Ain umm ad-dary'—the spring of the mother of the steps, and to the eastern Jews as 'Aaron's (or 'the priests') bath.' The water arises in a small cave reached by 30 steps, some 25 feet underground, in the Kidron Valley, due south of the Temple area. Though to-day lying so deep, there are ample evidences that originally the mouth of the cave opened out on the side of the valley, and that the water flowed out thence. It has become buried through the accumulated debris in the valley bed. At the back of the cave—some 30 feet from the entrance—is a tunnel mouth, the beginning of the famous Siloam aqueduct (see SILOAM). The flow is intermittent, about two or three times a day on an average. This fact is recorded by Jerome, and is by many authorities considered a reason for locating here the Pool of Bethesda (see BETHESDA). The water is brackish to the taste, and chemical examination shows that, to-day at any rate, it is contaminated with sewage. It is undoubtedly unfit for drinking purposes: it is used chiefly by the people of the village of Silwan, especially at the Siloam-pool end of the aqueduct, for watering their gardens.

Further down the valley, at its junction with the Valley of Hinnom, there is a well, 125 feet deep, known as Bir Eyyub, or Job's Well. This, though rediscovered by the Crusaders, is almost certainly ancient and may have been the En-rogel of the OT. From here great quantities of water are drawn all the year round, much of which is carried in skins and sold in Jerusalem, but it is in no way of better quality than that from the Virgin's Fountain. After a spell of heavy rain the water rises up like a genuine spring, and overflowing underground a little below the actual well mouth, it bursts forth in a little stream and runs down the Wady en-Nar. Such an outflow may last several days, and is a great source of attraction to the people of Jerusalem, who, on the cessation of the rain, hasten out to sit by the 'flowing Kidron' and refresh themselves beside its running waters. During the unusually heavy rains of the winter 1904-5 the 'Kidron' ran thus four times. A little farther down the valley there occurs, at the same time and under the same circumstances, another apparent 'spring'—the 'Ain el-Liz'—due to the water of Bir Eyyub finding its way along an ancient rock-cut aqueduct and bursting up through the ground where the conduit is blocked.

The Hamman esh-Shefa (bath of healing) under the W. wall of the Haram area has by many been considered an ancient spring. To-day the water collects in an extensive underground rocky chamber at the bottom of a well 80 feet deep. Quite possibly before the area to the north was so thickly inhabited, when, for example, this well was outside the walls, a certain amount of good water may have been obtainable here, but now what collects is a foul and smelling liquid which percolates to the valley bottom from the neighbouring inhabited area, and it is unfit for even its present use—in a Turkish bath.

More important than springs or wells are the innumerable cisterns with which, from the earliest times, the hill of Jerusalem has been honeycombed. It has already been pointed out that the rainfall of this region is considerable, and rain-water collected on a clean roof and stored in a well-kept cistern is good for all domestic purposes. There are private cisterns under practically every house, but there are in addition a number of larger reservoirs for public use. In the Haram—the ancient Temple area—there are 37 known excavations, of which one, the 'great sea,' it is calculated, can hold about 2,000,000 gallons.

In other parts the more important cisterns are—the Birket Mamilla, Hamman el-Batrak, Birket Israel, Birket es-Sultan, 'The Twin Pools,' the so-called 'Pool of Bethesda,' and the two Siloam pools—Birket Silwan and Birket el-Hamra. The last three are dealt with in the special articles BETHESDA and SILOAM respectively. The Birket es-Sultan, the misnamed 'Lower Pool of Gihon' in the Valley of Hinnom, was probably first constructed by German knights in the 12th cent., and was repaired by the Sultan Suleiman ibn Selim in the 16th cent., while the 'Twin Pools' near the 'Sisters of Zion' were made in the most of the Antonia fortress after the destruction of the city in A.D. 70; so neither of these needs description here. The other three require longer notice. The Birket Mamilla, incorrectly called the 'Upper Pool of Gihon,' lies at the head of the Valley of Hinnom, about 700 yards W. N. W. of the Jaffa Gate, and used to collect all the surface water from the higher ground around; in recent years the Moslem cemetery in which it lies has been surrounded by a wall, which has largely cut off the supplies. After a spell of heavy rain it often used to fill to overflowing. It is 97 yards long, 64 yards wide, and 19 feet deep. It appears to be 'the Serpents' Pool' of Josephus (BJ V, iii, 2). The outlet on the E. side leads to a conduit which enters the city near the Jaffa Gate and empties itself into the great rock-cut pool—Birket Hamman el-Batrak (the pool or bath of the Patriarch), commonly known as the Pool of Hezekiah. The pool, 80 yards long by 48 yards wide, is largely rock-cut, and lies across the W. arm of the Tyropoon Valley; there are indications that it extended at one time further north than it does at present. Josephus apparently refers to this as the Pool Amygdalon (κορυμβήρα Ἀμυγδαλον), a name perhaps derived from Berekat ha-migdalim (Pool of the Towers) on account of the near proximity of some of the great fortresses on the neighbouring walls. As the pool is not mentioned in Josephus until after the second wall had been captured, it may be presumed that it was within that wall (BJ V, xi, 4).

The Birket Israel is built across the width of a natural valley which runs from N.W. to S.E., and passes under the N.E. course of the Haram at this point. It is supposed by some authorities that the pool itself did not exist at the period of Christ's ministry, but as a defence to the Temple enclosure and to the neighbouring Castle of Antonia (wh. see) it may well have been the Pool Struthius mentioned by Josephus (ib.). He says the fifth legion raised a bank at the tower of Antonia 'over against the middle of the pool that is called Struthius.' It must, however, be stated that M. Ganneau and others propose to identify the 'Twin Pools' with Struthius.

Constructed for Jerusalem, though seven miles from the city, are the three great reservoirs known as 'Solomon's Pools,' or el-Buruk. They lie one below the other down a valley; their floors are made of the valley bed, deepened in places, and they are naturally deepest at their lower or eastern ends; they increase in size from above downward. The largest and lowest is nearly 200 yards long, 60 yards wide, and 50 feet deep. To-day they are useless, but when kept in repair and clean were no doubt valuable as storeplaces of surplus supplies of surface water from the surrounding hills and of water from the springs. Regarding the question when these pools were made there are most contrary opinions. It is highly improbable that they go back anything like as far as Solomon's time, and the association of his name with any great and wise work is so common in the East that the name 'Solomon's Pools' means nothing. On the whole, it is likely the work was not later than Roman times.

The system of aqueducts which centre round these pools has a special interest. Two were constructed to carry water from the four springs in the Valley of the Pools to Jerusalem, and two others duct, still in use along a good part of its course, may easily be followed to-day along its whole length of 11½ miles. It brought water from the springs into the Temple area. It is very probably the source of the 'spring' which is said by Tacitus (Hist. v. 12) to have run perpetually in the Temple. Of the two supplementary aqueducts, one, of exactly the same construction as the last mentioned, brought water from the copious springs at Wady Arráb—two-thirds of the way from Jerusalem to Hebron—along an extraordinarily winding conduit 28 miles long. The other, built on an altogether different principle, is a four-mile channel which gathers water from a long chain of wells in the Wady Biár on the plan of a Persian kharij, such as is extensively used in Northern Syria. This, pronounced by Sir C. Wilson 'one of the most remarkable works in Palestine,' is probably comparatively late. It seems to have been used to supplement the water of the springs in the Valley of the Pools.

The special interest of the great 'low-level aqueduct' described above, with its total length of 40 miles, lies in the historical fact that it, or some part of it, was one of the causes of the recall of Pontius Pilate. 'Pilate (Ant. XVIII. iii. 2) undertook to bring a current of water to Jerusalem, and did it with the sacred money, and derived the origin of the stream from the distance of two hundred furlongs.' A riot took place, and a 'great number' of people were slain. 'This may be the incident referred to in Lk 13<sup>11</sup>. If Josephus is correct in saying that Pilate was bringing water a distance of 200 stadia (=26 miles), then this must apply to the extension of the aqueduct to Wady Arráb. In any case, it is highly improbable that his was the initiation of the whole work. The very absence of inscriptions and of contemporary references makes it probable that the conduit was at least older than Roman times. If we allow that the high-level aqueduct goes back to the days of Herod the Great, then the low-level aqueduct may well go back some centuries earlier.

5. TOPOGRAPHY OF THE CITY IN THE TIME OF CHRIST.—The city walls.—At the time of Christ, Jerusalem had two walls which had been restored by order of Julius Caesar (Ant. XIV. x. 5). In A.D. 43, Agrippa I. commenced a third one of great magnificence, which, however, seems never to have been properly finished.

(a) The first wall had 60 towers; it encompassed the ancient and most important secular buildings of the city. Though some minor details are yet unknown, its general course is perfectly clear. The tower Hippicus, at which it arose—one of those magnificent towers built by Herod—was situated close to the present so-called 'Tower of David,' in which indeed its remains may even be incorporated. From here it ran along the S. edge of the W. arm of the Tyropoeon Valley. It then passed the Xystus, joined on to the Council House near the present Mehkemeh or Town Hall, and ended at the Western Cloister. It probably crossed the Tyropoeon Valley, where to-day there is the causeway leading to the Bab es-Silsaleh of the Haram. The western wall commenced at the tower Hippicus, and probably followed the line of the present western wall to the great corner tower, the rocky foundations of which are now included in the C.M.S. Boys' School. Somewhere near this part of its course it passed 'a place called Bethso'—unidentified; it then bent S.E. 'to the gate of the Essenes, and went thence southward along the steep edge of the Valley of Hinnom down to the Pool of Siloam.' It had 'its bending above the fountain Siloam,' which probably implies that it surrounded the pool on the W., N., and E., but did not enclose it, as a wall at another period undoubtedly did. It then ran on the edge of the steep rocks above the Virgin's to supplement this supply. The first two are the well-known high- and low-level aqueducts. The former appears to have reached the city somewhere about the level of the Jaffa Gate, and may also have supplied the Birket Mamilla. It is specially remarkable for the way it crossed a valley on the Bethlehem road by means of an inverted syphon. Large fragments of this great stone tube have been found, and from inscriptions carved on the limestone blocks the date of its construction or repair must have been in Roman times and, according to some authorities, as late as about A.D. 195. Unless, however, the account given of the royal palace gardens of Herod is greatly exaggerated, the aqueduct must have been in use in Herod's days, as it is the only conduit by which running water could have reached the city at a level high enough to have supplied these gardens. The low-level aque-

Fountain—called, apparently, by Josephus 'Solomon's Pool'—and thence to 'a certain place which they called Ophlas, where it joined to the eastern cloister of the Temple' (BJ v. iv. 2).

Extensive remains of this wall have been traced. Those of the great tower at the S. W. corner were examined by Maudslay in 1874. He found the base of a tower 20 feet high hewn out of the native rock. It was nearly square, and projected 45 feet from the scarp to which it was attached—altogether a great work, and at a point which must have always been specially well fortified.* A little to the east is another great scarp, and here Bliss† began to trace out the buried remains of the south wall. He found near the commencement of his excavations a gate which may very probably be the Gate of the Essenes. In tracing the wall towards Siloam, foundations belonging to two distinct periods were excavated. Bliss considered that the higher of these belonged to the wall of the period between Herod and Titus. A little to the W. of Siloam he found the remains of a fine gateway showing three periods of use—the sill lying at different heights in each period—and a fine rock-cut underground drain, almost certainly Roman work, which he traced for a great distance up the W. side of the Tyropean Valley, where it came to lie under a paved street ascending the valley in the direction of the Temple.

After leaving the before-mentioned gate, there were indications—not, it must be admitted, decisive—that the wall at one period surrounded the pool on three sides, as Josephus apparently describes, while at another period it crossed the mouth of the Tyropean Valley on an elaborate dam. To the east of the pool the rock scarp is exposed, and almost every trace of the wall has been removed. As regards the E. section of this southern wall, Sir Charles Warren in 1875 traced the buried remains of a wall 14½ feet thick and, in places, 70 feet high from the S. E. corner of the Temple southwards for 90 feet, and then S. W. for 700 feet. Two hundred feet from the end he unearthed the remains of a massive tower standing to the height of 66 feet and founded upon rock. The wall itself had been built, not on rock, but on virgin soil. The course of the wall, as described by Josephus, thus appears to be very fully verified by modern discoveries.

(b) With regard to the second wall a great deal of uncertainty prevails. There are few more hotly disputed problems in Jerusalem topography. This second wall appears to have been on the line of that made by the later kings of Judah, to have been repaired by Nehemiah, and used by the Hasmonæans. It is dismissed by Josephus (BJ v. iv. 2) in a very few words; it 'took its beginning from that gate which they call Gennath, which belonged to the first wall; it only encompassed the northern quarter of the city and reached as far as the tower of Antonia.' It had 40 towers on it. No remains of the gate Gennath have been found, but the configuration of the ground makes it improbable that the wall could have taken its rise very far to the E. of the present Jaffa Gate, as here there exists a narrow neck of high ground, but a little to the E. the level abruptly descends into the W. arm of the Tyropean. In 1886 some 30 yards of the remains of what seemed a city wall were discovered 15 feet below the street, where the foundations of the Grand New Hotel were dug. They were supposed by Messrs. Merrill and Schick to be part of the second wall at its W. end, but too short a piece was examined to allow of positive conclusions. The other supposed traces of the second wall are even more ambiguous. In the N. part of the Muristan, where to-day stands the German church, Schick found remains of which he said, 'I am convinced that these are traces of the second wall': these would fall in line with a wall 10 or 12 feet thick, which, according to Robinson (ERP I. 408), was found N. of the Pool of Hezekiah, when the foundations of the Coptic Convent were laid. Again, just to the N. of the German church and E. of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre were found extensive ruined walls, which are to-day treasured by the Russian ecclesiastical authorities as sure evidences that the site of the traditional Holy Sepulchre was outside the ancient walls. It is, however, much more probable that these remains, which are quite unlike city walls, are really fragments of Constantine's Great Basilica.

The question is thus quite an open one, but the argument that the second wall cannot, on military grounds, have followed a course S. of the site of the Sepulchre is an unsafe one. As Sir C. Wilson* points out: 'There are several Greek towns in Asia Minor where the city walls or parts of them are quite as badly traced according to modern ideas. In ancient towns the Acropolis was the principal defence, the city wall was often weak.' It may indeed be suggested that this very weakness made Agrippa undertake his new wall along a better line for defence.

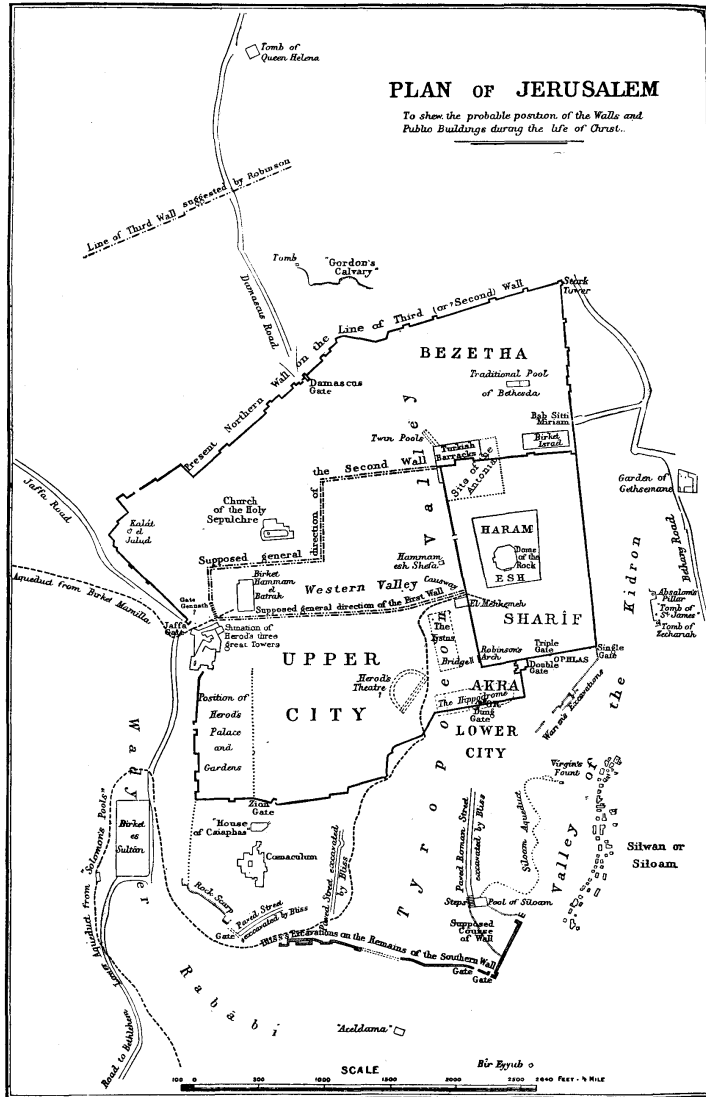

(c) The whole question of the second wall depends largely on what view is taken of the course of the third wall constructed by Agrippa I. The most widely accepted opinion to-day is that this followed much the same course as the present N. wall. It was begun upon the most elaborate plan, but was never apparently finished on the scale designed, because Agrippa feared Claudius Caesar, 'lest he should suspect that so strong a wall was built in order to make some innovation in public affairs' (BJ v. iv. 2). It was, however, at the time of the siege, over 18 feet wide and 40 feet high, with 90 massive towers. It began at the tower Hippicus, and had its N. W. corner at a great octagonal tower, called Psephinus, 135 feet high and overlooking the whole city.† From here was an extensive view of Arabia, i.e. the Land of Moab, at sunrise, 'as well as of the utmost limits of the Hebrew possessions at the sea westwards' (BJ v. iv. 3). The foundations of this tower are supposed to survive to-day just inside the N. W. angle of the modern city, under the name Kalât el-Jalud, or Goliath's Castle. From this corner the wall 'extended till it came over against the monuments of Helena, queen of Adiabene, the daughter of Izates' (BJ v. iv. 2). This, however, must be read in the light of the statement of Josephus in another place (Ant. xx. iv. 3) that this tomb is 'distant no more than three furlongs from the city of Jerusalem.' The so-called 'Tombs of the Kings' are now very generally identified as the very notable tomb of Queen Helena, and, that being so, the distance given, 3 stadia or furlongs (700 yards), is a fair description of the distance of this monument from the present north wall near the Damascus Gate. He next states that 'it extended further to a great length, and passed by the sepulchral caverns of the kings'—these last may very well be the extensive caves known as 'Solomon's Quarries.' The wall 'bent again at the tower of the corner,' which then may have been where the present Stork Tower at the N. E. corner of the city is, 'at the monument which is called the monument of the fuller'—probably destroyed—and joined the old wall at the valley called the Valley of the Kidron. This was probably near the present St. Stephen's Gate. The exact course at the N.E. corner is very doubtful; it is quite possible that it turned S.E. near 'Herod's Gate'. It will be observed that the description fits in very well with the course followed by the existing N. wall. At the Damascus Gate there are unmistakable evidences that a gate at least as ancient as Roman times stood there. The supporters of the view that the second wall ran here lay stress on certain supposed remains of the third wall further north. A candid examination of such of these as survive, and of the accounts, both verbally and in publications, of those that have been removed, does not seem very convincing. One of the best marked pieces, forming the side of a cistern near Helena's Tomb, proved on recent examination to be but a piece of smooth scarp facing towards the city, and not remains of a building at all.

As is clear from the history of the taking of the city, there was another wall, no doubt greatly inferior in strength to those before mentioned, which ran along the western side of the Tyropœon, bounding in that direction the 'Upper City' (Tacitus, Hist. v. 11), and it is probable that some kind of wall, though doubtless only a temporary one, ran along the opposite or eastern side of the valley.

Towers.—Of the great towers the three erected by Herod the Great yet remain to be described. Josephus, in his usual exaggerated manner, says they 'were for largeness, beauty, and strength beyond all that were in the habitable earth' (BJ v. iv. 3). They were dedicated to Herod's friend Hippius, his brother Phasael, and his wife Mariamne, whom he had murdered. Each of these towers was of solid masonry at the base. The base of Hippius was about 44 feet square and 50 high, over which was a reservoir and several rooms, and surmounting all battlements with turrets; the total height was 140 feet. The second tower, Phasael, was 70 feet square at the base and nearly 160 feet high, and, it is said, 'wanted nothing that might make it appear to be a royal palace.' The Mariamne tower was smaller and less lofty, but 'its upper buildings were more magnificent.' As to the position of these towers, the present 'Tower of David' is generally considered to contain the remains of Phasael, with various Crusading and Saracenic additions. Hippius must have been near this spot, perhaps where the Jaffa Gate now stands, and Mariamne probably a little more to the east on higher ground. The three are all described as being 'on the north side of the wall,' and from a distance they all appeared to be of the same height. The N.W. corner of the city, where they stood, was one without much natural defence, and they bore the same important relation to the King's Palace as the other fortress, the Antonia, did to the Temple.

Of the other great architectural works of the period we have but scanty description and still scantier remains, with the exception, of course, of the Temple, for which see art. TEMPLE.

Herod's great palace, built on the site of the palace of the Hasmonæans (Ant. xx. viii. 11), evidently adjoined the before-mentioned towers on the south, and occupied an area of land now covered by the English church and schools and the Armenian quarter, probably extending also to the Patriarch's house and gardens—the greater part, indeed, of the area between the present David Street (along the line of which the first wall ran) to the N. and the modern city walls as far east as the Zion Gate to the south. It is quite possible that the present course of the southern wall was determined by the remains of the S. wall of this palace. From the walls an extensive view could be seen, and at a later time Agrippa II. gave great offence when he added a lofty dining-room from which he could watch all the doings in the Temple. To frustrate this, the Jews raised a wall upon the 'uppermost building which belonged to the inner court of the Temple towards the west.' This gave annoyance not only to Agrippa but also to Festus, who ordered it to be removed. On appeal, however, Nero gave his verdict in favour of the Jews. The palace had walls, in parts over 50 feet high, with many towers, and was internally fitted with great luxury. Around it were numerous porticos, with 'curious pillars' buried among groves of trees, and gardens well irrigated and 'filled with brazen statues through which the water ran out.'

Between the palace grounds and the Temple lay the Xystus, a gymnasium surrounded with columns, for Greek games. Connecting the W. wall of the Temple with the W. hill and the 'Upper City,' was a bridge which had been broken down when Pompey (Ant. xiv. iv. 4; BJ i. vii. 2) besieged the Temple in B.C. 65, but had been repaired. The projecting arch of this bridge was first recognized by Robinson, and the PEF excavations not only uncovered the central pier, but beneath the early Roman pavement found an old vousoir of the earlier bridge of Pompey's time, which had fallen through into an ancient drain below the street. No remains of this bridge have, however, so far been recovered further to the west.

The hippodrome apparently lay somewhat to the south, on the borders, perhaps, of the Tyropœon Valley near the present Dung Gate; this was very probably the 'place of exercise' of 2 Mac 4<sup>2</sup> (cf. 1 Mac 1<sup>b</sup>), and the description 'under the very castle' would well suit this place if Akra was where it is here proposed to locate it. Of the position of Herod's theatre nothing at all is known.

Next to the Temple, perhaps the most famous building in Jerusalem was Antonia, the great fortress of the Temple, and the acropolis of the city, which from its lofty height is described by Tacitus (Hist. v. 11) as pre-eminently conspicuous. It had received the name Antonia from Herod after Mark Antony, but it had in Hasmonæan times been known as Bevis. Nehemiah (2 RV) mentions a castle (birah) as being here—to the north of the Temple: this the high priest Hyrcanus (BJ i. vi. 1) made his headquarters. It is interesting that at least a portion of the site with so great a reputation as a military stronghold should even to-day be occupied by troops—the Turkish garrison. A great rock scarp on which part of the ancient fortress stood is still clearly visible from the Haram, and in the moat cut to protect its northern aspect lie the 'Twin Pools.' The fortress lay at the N.W. corner of the Temple enclosure, and is described by Josephus as being built on a rock over 87 feet high, 'on a great precipice'; the rock was covered with smooth stones, and upon the rocky platform was a building 70 feet high fitted up with great magnificence. At the four corners were towers 87 feet high, except that at the S.E. corner, which was over 120 feet high; from it the whole Temple was overlooked, but a considerable space separated it from the Temple itself (BJ vi. ii. 5-7). At the W. corner there were passages into the W. and the N. cloisters by which the Temple guards could obtain access to the Temple. The Western boundary was probably on the line of the present W. wall of the Haram, and the moat (BJ v. iv. 2) to the N. appears to have been demonstrated, but the S. and E. boundaries are unknown. The total area must have been large, as it held a whole Roman legion, and it is clear from history that it was a powerful fortress. Even before its extension by Herod, Antigonous could not capture it until after the city and the Temple had been taken by storm, and in A.D. 70 the capture of Antonia is recorded as one of the fiercest of the fights of the siege (BJ vi. i. and ii.). It is commonly believed that the Prætorium (Mk 15<sup>ant.</sup>) was in part of Antonia, for there undoubtedly was the Roman garrison (Ac 21<sup>2a</sup>). See PRÆTORIUM.

JERUSALEM

Near the W. wall of the Temple where is now the Turkish Town Hall (el-Mehkemeh) was the Town Council House. Possibly it was here the high priest held his court.

The palaces of Monobazus, King of Adiabene, and of his mother Queen Helena appear to have been on the southern slopes of the Eastern hill, the former probably due east of the Pool of Siloam.

Of the great number of tombs around Jerusalem the majority of the most conspicuous and notable belong to a later period than Christ's life. The monuments of Queen Helena, known as the 'Tombs of the Kings,' and probably almost all the tombs in the valley in which the 'Tombs of the Judges' are situated, are of a date very soon after Christ's death. The same is probably true of the famous group of tombs near the S.E. corner of the Temple, the so-called 'Pillar of Absalom,' the 'Tomb of Jehoshaphat,' the 'Grotto of St. James,' and the 'Pyramid of Zacharias.' It is very tempting to connect these highly ornamented tomb structures with the words of Jesus (Mt 23<sup>29-30</sup>), spoken as they probably were almost within sight of this spot. If so, the indications of work of a later period may be additions to earlier constructions of the Herodian era. The so-called Tombs of Joseph of Arimathea and of Nicodemus, to the W. of the shrine of the Holy Sepulchre, though only by a late tradition associated with these NT characters, are undoubtedly old tombs, probably much before Christ's time. The traditional tomb of Christ has been treated in a separate article. See GOLGOTHA.

A general view of the city in the time of Christ from such a height as Olivet must have been an impressive sight. In the foreground lay the great Temple in a grandeur and beauty greater than it had ever had in all its long history, its courts all day crowded with throngs of worshippers from every corner of the known world. To the north of this, Antonia, with its four massive towers, stood sentinel over the city and the Temple. Behind these lay the Upper City crowned by the magnificent palace-fortress of Herod, with its great groves of trees and well-watered gardens. To the right of this lay the great towers Hippicus, Phasael, and Mariamme. Then between these buildings and the Temple lay the central valley with the Xystus and its many columns, the lofty bridge, and, a little to the south, the great Hippodrome. Then somewhere among the houses, which rose tier above tier from the valley, very probably in that part of the city which is described by Josephus (Jnt. xv. viii. 1) as like an amphitheatre itself, lay the theatre of Herod, doubtless facing the distant mountains of Moab. Then southward, covering both the hills as they descended into the deep valleys towards Siloam, were the thick built houses of the common folk, with other palaces such as those of Monobazus and Helena rising like islands from among them. Enclosing all were the mighty walls of the Temple and of the city—these latter alone with a hundred towers—rising up, in many places precipitously, from deep valleys, suggestive at once of strength and security. To the north lay the New City, yet unvalled, where, doubtless, countless villas rose amid the fresh greenness of gardens and trees.

'The devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them' (Mt 4<sup>8</sup>). Did they not all lie beneath the gaze of the Man of Galilee if He were brought from the neighbouring wilderness into the blaze of material glory—Greek, Roman, and Hebrew—spread out beneath Him in the Holy City?

The city over which the Son of Man wept (Lk 19<sup>41</sup>), must have been a city representing, in small area, more extravagant display, more intense contrasts of materialism and religious zeal, of Rome's iron discipline and seething rebellion, of the East and the West, and more seeds of that fanatic hatred that spells murder than the world has ever seen. Elements were here gathered that made the city a miniature of the whole world, of a world, too, hastening to destruction.

The total population of the city cannot have been large, and the numbers given by Josephus (BJ ii. xiv. 2, v. vi. 1, vi. ix. 3) and Tacitus (Hist. v. 13) are manifestly exaggerated. The present permanent population of modern Jerusalem, which covers a considerably larger area than the city in the time of Christ, is about 65,000. However closely the people were packed in the ancient city, it is hardly possible that there could have been so many as this, and many put the estimate at one-half this number. At the time of the Passover, when numbers were camped on the Mount of Olives and at other spots around, it is possible to believe that the population may have been considerably higher than that of to-day.

8. HISTORY OF JERUSALEM DURING THE PERIOD OF THE GOSPELS.—For a few short years before the birth of Jesus, Jerusalem enjoyed a time of extraordinary material prosperity, during which the great architectural works of Herod the Great were completed. It is evident, as has often been the case in the East, that this work was carried out only by means of great oppression, so that the king, while he left behind him vast monuments in stone, left also a memory execrated in the hearts of the common people. Some twenty years before the birth of Jesus the magnificent palace of Herod was finished; * the three great towers, the theatre, the Xystus, and the Hippodrome (these last two adorned, if not initiated, by Herod) were completed early in his reign. Several years (B.C. 19-11) were also spent in adorning and extending the Temple, a work which was being continued during the life of Christ (Jn 2<sup>20</sup>). At this time the Temple must have attained a grandeur and beauty exceeding all previous eras. Yet the declining days of Herod the Great found the city seething with rebellion, which, just before his death, found vent in the public destruction of the golden eagle (BJ i. xxxiii.) which he had erected over the gate of the Temple. In revenge for this forty persons were burnt alive, and others were executed in less terrible ways. When the king considered that his last hour was imminent, he shut into the Hippodrome the most illustrious of the Jews, with orders that they should be executed when he died, so that the city might on his death be filled with mourning, even if not for him.

Herod's death in B.C. 4, the year of the Nativity, let loose on all sides the disorderly elements. Archelaus, the heir by Herod's will, advertised his accession by ascending a golden throne in the Temple on a 'high elevation made for him,' and hastened to ingratiate himself by promising all kinds of good things to the expectant and worshipping crowds. He was, however, unable to satisfy the excessive and exacting demands of the unruly crowds, who had been deeply stirred by the heavy punishment meted out by Herod in the affair of the golden eagle, and at the approach of the Passover a riot followed which ended in the massacre of three thousand Jews—mainly visitors to the feast, who were encamped in tents outside the Temple. Archelaus forthwith hastened to Rome to have his appointment confirmed, leaving the city in utter confusion. As soon as he had taken ship, Sabinus, the Roman procurator, hastened to the city, seized and garrisoned the king's palace and all the fortified posts of which he could get possession, and laid hands on all the treasures he could find. He endeavoured to assert his authority with a view to opposing the absent Archelaus, for he at the same time sent to Rome a letter accusing him to Caesar. At the succeeding feast of Pentecost the crowds of Galileans, Idumeans, and trans-Jordan Jews, with recruits from the more unrestrained elements from Jerusalem, rose in open rebellion, and commenced to besiege Sabinus in the palace. One party assembled along the whole W. wall of the Temple to attack from the east, another towards the south at the Hippodrome, and a third to the west—apparently outside the W. walls of the city. Sabinus, who seems to have been an arrant coward, sent an appeal for help to Varus, the governor of Syria, who was then in Antioch, and shut himself up in the tower Phassel. From there he signalled to the troops to fall upon the people. A terrible fight ensued, at first in the city itself and then in the Tyropoeon Valley, from which the Roman soldiers shot up at the rioters assembled in the Temple cloisters. Finding themselves at great disadvantage from their position in the valley, the soldiers in desperation set fire to the cloisters, and their Jewish opponents, crowded within and upon the roof, were either burnt to death or were slaughtered in attempting to escape. Some of the soldiers pursuing their victims through the flames burst into the Temple precincts and seized the sacred treasures; of these Sabinus is stated to have received 400 talents for himself. Upon this, other parties of Jews, exasperated by these affairs, made a counter attack upon the palace and threatened to set it on fire. They first offered a free pass to all who would come out peaceably, whereupon many of Herod's soldiers came out and joined the Jews; but Rufus and Gratus with a band of horsemen went over to the Romans with three thousand soldiers. Sabinus continued to be besieged in the palace, the walls of which the Jews commenced to undermine, until Varus arrived, after which he slunk away to the seacoast. The Jerusalem Jews excused themselves to the governor by laying all the blame on their fellow-countrymen from other parts. Varus suppressed the rebellion with ruthless firmness, crucifying two thousand Jews; and then, leaving a legion in the city to maintain order, he returned to Antioch. Archelaus returned some months later as ethnarch, and ruled for ten years, until, being accused to Caesar of oppression, he was banished to Vienna.

During the rule of Coponius (6-10), the procurator who succeeded, another Passover disturbance occurred. This was due to the extraordinary and defiant conduct of a party of Samaritans, who threw some dead bodies into the cloisters of the Temple just after midnight,—a step which must, without doubt, have deepened the smouldering hatred between Jews and Samaritans (Jn 4<sup>9</sup>). Marcus Ambivius (11-12) and Annus Rufus (13) after short and uneventful terms of office were succeeded by Valerius Gratus (14-25), whose eleven years were marked only by the many changes he made in the high priesthood. His successor, Pontius Pilate (26-37), left the stamp of his character on secular history by making a great show of authority, in constituting Jerusalem the military headquarters, and introducing Caesar's effigies into the city, but entirely reversing this policy when it was vigorously opposed by the more fanatic elements of the Jews. On this occasion a great gathering of Jews assembled in, apparently, the Xystus (ἐν τῷ μεγάλῳ σταδίῳ), and preferred to bare their necks to Pilate's soldiers to withdrawing their demands (Ant. XVIII. iii. 1). Mention has already been made of the 'current of water' Pilate brought to Jerusalem, and the riot which followed because he used for the work 'sacred money' of the Temple. When persuasions had failed to quell the tumult, Pilate gave a signal to the soldiers, whom he had distributed in disguise through the crowd, and many were killed and wounded (Ant. XVIII. iii. 2).

The whole secular history as given by Josephus shows in what an excitable and unstable condition the Jews were, specially at the time of the feasts, when the city was filled by outsiders. In such a city it is not wonderful that twice (Jn 8<sup>20</sup> 10<sup>21</sup>) Jesus was threatened with stoning. The histories of past Passovers in the Holy City may have made Pilate acutely anxious as to whether the commotion connected with the arrest of Jesus was tending; the leaders of the Jews, on the other hand, had doubtless learnt by their victory in the matter of Caesar's effigies to anticipate that, if they blustered and threatened enough, Pilate was unlikely finally to withstand their demands.

7. JERUSALEM IN THE GOSPELS. — The earliest Gospel incident connected with the city is the foretelling to Zacharias in the Temple of the birth of John the Baptist (Lk 1<sup>26</sup>); the second, the arrival of the Magi to inquire in the city where the 'king of the Jews' was born (Mt 2<sup>1-20</sup>). Shortly after this occur the purification of the Virgin Mary and the presentation of Jesus in the Temple (Lk 2<sup>22-29</sup>); and some twelve years later the first (?) Passover of Jesus in the Holy City and the incident of His staying behind to discuss with the doctors in the Temple (Lk 2<sup>41-49</sup>). After this, with the exception of one brief scene in the Temptation (Mt 4<sup>3</sup>), the Synoptics are silent regarding any events in the city until the last week of His life. It is clear that Jesus rather avoided the city, and that the city was hostile to Him. It was Jerusalem as the centre of Jewish religious life which alone drew Jesus there; almost exclusively His being there was connected with attendance at a feast; and, with the single exception of the incident at the Pool of Bethesda, all His doings were, till the last week, in the courts of the Temple. In the Fourth Gospel there is mention of a Passover at which Jesus cleansed the Temple, and later had His discourse with Nicodemus (Jn 2<sup>13</sup> 3<sup>1-21</sup>). Then a year and a half after, while He was attending the Feast of Tabernacles, occurred the incidents of the adulteress and the blind man (Jn 7<sup>28</sup> 9<sup>1-17</sup>), ending in an attempt to arrest Him and a threatened stoning. A little later in the year, at the Feast of Dedication, He appeared in the Temple and was again threatened with stoning (Jn 10<sup>22-29</sup>). After the raising of Lazarus at Bethany, Jesus deliberately avoided entering the city, but shortly afterwards He determinately turned His face towards it, with the consciousness that suffering and death inevitably awaited Him there (Mk 10<sup>22-24</sup>).

When at last the step of return to the metropolis had been taken and the triumphal entry into the city (Mt 21<sup>1-11</sup>, Mk 11<sup>1-10</sup>, Lk 19<sup>28-44</sup>, Jn 12<sup>12-19</sup>) and the second cleansing of the Temple (Mt 21<sup>12-18</sup>, Mk 11<sup>11</sup>, Lk 19<sup>45-46</sup>) had occurred, Jesus seems to have gladly withdrawn Himself night after night from the turmoil of the city to the quiet of the village life of Bethany, out of sight of the sad and tragic city over which He could but weep (Lk 19<sup>41-44</sup>). The night of His arrest seems to have been the first in that fateful week He spent in the immediate environs of the city. Then during the closing days came teaching by the miracle of the fig-tree (Mt 21<sup>20-22</sup>, Mk 11<sup>20-22</sup>) and by parable (the Wicked Husbandmen, the Ten Virgins, the Sheep and the Goats), as well as by direct prediction, to enforce the lesson that judgment on the city and the nation was nigh at hand. The wickedness and hypocrisy of the city led to the sterner denunciations of the scribes and Pharisees by One who considered that their doom was practically sealed (Mt 23). Only in the incidents of the widow's mite (Mk 12<sup>41-44</sup>, Lk 21<sup>1-4</sup>) and in the coming of the Greek strangers to Jesus (Jn 12<sup>20-22</sup>) is there any sign of this lifting of the heavy clouds of approaching tragedy. The efforts of Pharisees, Sadducees, and lawyers to catch Him in some political indiscretion or unorthodoxy in His teaching were alike foiled, and at length the leaders of the Jews made their unholy compact with the traitor Judas.

As the first day of Unleavened Bread drew nigh, the disciples were sent into the city to prepare the Passover. The scene of this incident is to-day pointed out as an upper room (50 feet by 30 feet) near the modern Zion gate of the city; tradition, according to Epiphanius, records that this was one of the few buildings which escaped destruction by Titus. It is certainly on the sic, even if it is not the actual room, referred to by Bishop Cyril of Jerusalem in the middle of the 4th cent. as the place where the disciples were assembled on the day of Pentecost. Arcus is the first (about A. D. 685) to point to the Cenaculum. Since 1561 the buildings, with the traditional tomb of David adjoining, have been in the hands of the Moslems.

After the Supper, Jesus withdrew with His disciples to the Garden of Gethsemane. The fact that He crossed the Kidron points to some spot on the lower slopes of the Mount of Olives, and tradition since the 4th cent. has fixed on one which is now preserved as a garden by the Franciscans. If the site of the Cenaculum is correct, it is probable that Jesus reached Gethsemane along the line of the paths now running outside the S. wall of the city, leaving the city south of the Temple.

After arrest, Jesus was taken by the soldiers to the palace of the high priest in the Temple precincts. Probably the procession followed the general direction of the road which to-day runs from Gethsemane to St. Stephen's gate, though there are indications that in ancient times this road was more direct than it now is. In the early morning He was brought before Pilate in the Prætorium, and he in turn sent Him (Lk 23<sup>7-11</sup>) to Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, who happened to be in Jerusalem at the time. The natural place where Herod would have his quarters would be in some part of his father's palace on the W. hill, and it may well be argued by those who think it more likely that the Prætorium was in the same enclosure, that it is hardly probable that Pilate would have lightly risked sending Jesus twice through the streets when so many Galileans were about the city.

After the condemnation came the procession to Golgotha. The traditional route of this, known as the Via Dolorosa, has been selected on very slender grounds; indeed, all the 'stations of the cross' on the way have varied greatly from time to time. Even the first station, the site of the Prætorium, has been placed in many parts of the city. In the 4th cent. it was near the present Bab el-Kattanin, two centuries later it was marked by the basilica of St. Sophia. During the Crusading period it was placed first on the W. hill, under the idea that Pilate's house must have been near the Royal Palace, as several good modern authorities think it was; but at a later period it was transferred to the present Turkish barracks, indisputably on some part of the site of Antonia, as the more probable. The starting-point of the Via Dolorosa being so arbitrarily fixed, it necessarily follows that the various 'stations of the cross' are the flimsiest traditions. The second station—where the cross was laid on Jesus—is below the steps descending from the barracks. Near this is the well-known Eccc Homo arch—a construction of the 2nd cent.; and inside the adjoining institution of the Sisters of Zion is shown a large sheet of pavement belonging to the Roman period (and identified by the Latin authorities as the Gabbatha of Jn 19<sup>13</sup>), which may quite possibly have been in position at the time of the Crucifixion; part of its surface belongs to a street. The third station is shown where the street from the barracks—Tarék Bab Sitté Miriam—joins the carriage road from the Damascus Gate, running along the ancient Tyropoeon Valley; the spot is marked by a broken, prostrate column. Here Jesus sank under the weight of the cross. A few yards farther down the carriage road, the fourth station—where Jesus met His mother—lies on the right. At the next turning to the right is the fifth station, where Simon of Cyrene took the cross from Jesus; and if we ascend this street by a series of steps, the sixth station—the scene of the incident of St. Veronica's handkerchief—is found, near where the road becomes arched over. When the Via Dolorosa crosses the central street of the city, Sûk es-Semany, the procession is supposed to have left the city walls. This is the seventh station. The eighth station, where Jesus admonished the women not to weep for Him but for themselves (Lk 23<sup>27-28</sup>), lies up the ascent towards the Church of the Sepulchre; and the ninth station, where Jesus is said to have fallen a second time under the weight of the cross, is in front of the Coptic monastery. The remaining five stations are included in the Church of the Sepulchre, for which see art. GOLGOTHA.

The last mention of Jerusalem in the Gospels is in the injunction to the disciples to begin preaching the gospel there (Lk 24<sup>47</sup>). The full force of this, and the necessity for their being specially commanded, is fully realized only when it is seen what a unique position Jerusalem held in the mind of Jesus, as was recognized by His regular attendance at the Temple services and the periodical feasts; how deep was His pity for its close approaching doom; how bitter had been the hostility to His teaching and His claims; and, lastly, how extraordinarily important was Jerusalem at that time as a meeting-place of many intensely held religious ideals.

JESUS (the name).—It is strange that even this name has not yet been explained with certainty. Ἰησοῦς (gen., dat., voc. Ἰησοῦ; acc. Ἰησοῦν, Mt 1<sup>1</sup> 8<sup>34</sup>, Mk 1<sup>24</sup>, Mt 1<sup>21</sup> [on Ἰησοῦ as gen. and dat. see Winer-Schmiedel, § 10, note 6]) is the Greek form of the Hebrew יהושע or יהוה. Aquila has for the latter (Dt 1<sup>28</sup>) Ἰησοῦν; in some passages Ἰησοῦς is found (1 Ch 7<sup>7</sup>, 2 Es 2<sup>6-9</sup>); see Redpath's Concordance.

No satisfactory explanation has yet been offered of the varying forms יהושע and יהוה. The high priest, for instance, who led the Jews back from Babylon with Zerubbabel, is constantly called יהושע; in the prophetic books of Haggai and Zechariah (IV 'Joshua', not 'Jehoshua', as in the name of his father 'Jozadak'), and with equal constancy יהושע in the historical books of Ezra and Nehemiah (where also the name of his father is written in the abbreviated form 'Jozadak'). Were, then, both forms used at the same time? Or is this a hint that the difference is due to later recensions, and that the form 'Jehoshua' is later than the time of the Exile? Again, how did 'Jehoshua' become 'Jehoshu'? The question is the more difficult as nowhere is the intermediate form 'Joshua' found, as in the other names formed with 'Jeho-', e.g. יהושפט side by side with יהושפט, etc. The nearest parallel seems to be the name of the king of Moab, who is called 'Meha' (מֶחָא) in the MT of 2 K 8, but מוֹשֶׁה in the LXX; or the name 'Moab', which is explained as H = mō'ab in Gn 18<sup>7</sup>. The reason for the vowel change has been sought in the analogy of names beginning with eh, or merely on phonetical principles (differentiation, as reshon from resh, etc.). (For quite a different explanation, which will hardly stand examination, see Fr. Prætorius in ZDMG lix. 342.) The difficulty is increased by the fact that the name is spelt יהושע (with y) but twice (Dt 32<sup>7</sup>, Jg 2<sup>7</sup>); and יהושע may therefore have been originally 'Jehoshu', like יהושפט alongside of יהושפט.

Hitherto it has generally been presupposed that the name was formed from the root ישע 'to save' (or rather 'to be safe'), like ישעיהו, which, according to Nu 13<sup>16</sup> and Dt 32<sup>4</sup>, was the earlier name of 'Joshua'; cf. the name ישעיהו a Palestinian jar-handle, combined by Macalister with the name ישע 1 Ch 4<sup>20</sup> (PEFS, 1905, p. 330). But the dropping of the first letter is not easily explained on this theory. And the analogy of the names ישע, ישעיהו, ישעיהו side by side with ישע, ישעיהו, ישעיהו, points to the possibility that יהושע is related to יהושע, as ישע is to ישע. As to the meaning of these names nothing is certain. That to popular sentiment the name recalled the idea of salvation is proved for the OT by Nu 13<sup>16</sup>, and for the NT by Mt 1<sup>21</sup> 'Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins.' Perhaps also in 1 Th 1<sup>10</sup> Ἰησοῦν τὸν ἐσώμενον ἡμᾶς, we have an allusion to this etymology. Greek Christians were reminded by the name of the root ἰάσμαι, 'to heal'; cf. Sib. Or. i. 351 καὶ τότε θῆ νεοτροπὸς ἰάσεται; Clem. Al. Pedag. i. 7. 61 τοιοῦτον ἡμῶν ὄνομα σωτηρίου προφήτεται παιδαγωγῶν . . . ἵνα οὐδὲν ἄλλοθεν ὁ παθὴν οὐκ ἔσται ἀπελευθέρηται, κ.τ.λ., ib. iii. 12. 98 ὁ ἰάμενος ἡμῶν καὶ σῶμα καὶ ψυχὴν, τὸν ἀδίκον ἀβρωστον, Ἰησοῦς; Cyril of Jerusalem, Cateches. x. p. 88 Ἰησοῦς τοῖσιν ἐστὶ κατὰ τὴν Ἑλλάδα γλωσσᾶν ὁ ἰάμενος. Ἐπειδὴν ἱατρός ἐστι ψυχῶν καὶ σωμάτων, καὶ θεραπευτὴς πνευμάτων, τυφλῶν μὲν ἀσθητῶν θεραπευτὴν . . . χαλῶν φαινομένων ἱατρός; Epiphanius, Haer. 29, Nazar. § 4 Ἰησοῦς γὰρ κατὰ τὴν Ἑβραϊκὴν διάλεκτον θεραπευτὴς καλεῖται, ἦτοι ἱατρός καὶ σωτὴρ. Epiphanius betrays in these last words also a knowledge of the Hebrew root; and the same is the case with Chrysostom, who expressly states (Hom. 2 in Matth. p. 23), τὸ γὰρ Ἰησοῦς τοῦτο ὄνομα οὐκ ἐστὶν Ἑλληνικόν, ἀλλὰ τῆ Ἑβραίων φωνῆ ὄνομα λέγεται Ἰησοῦς: ὁ ἐστὶν εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα γλωσσᾶν ἐμμενεύμενος, σωτὴρ ἰωτήρ δέ, ἀπὸ τοῦ σώσαι τὸν λαὸν αὐτοῦ. To the same effect is the statement of Eusebius (Dem. Ep. iv. 17, p. 199), who compares Christ with the high priest of the Return, and writes on their names, § 23, Εἰκότως οὖν τῆς εἰκότως ἐνεκα καὶ οὗτος τῆς τοῦ σωτῆρος προσηγορίας ἤξιστο. . . ἐπειδὴ σωτήριον θεοῦ εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα φωνῆν τὸ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ μεταληφθέν ὄνομα σημαίνει: Ἰησοῦ μὲν γὰρ Ἑβραίων σωτήρια, νῦν δὲ Ναυὴ παρὰ τοῖς αὐτοῖς Ἰησοῦ ὀνομάζονται: Ἰησοῦ δὲ ἐστὶν ἰάω σωτήρια, τοῦν' ἐστὶ θεοῦ σωτήριον, εἰκότως ἐφ' οὗ θεοῦ σωτήριον ἐν τοῖς Ἑλληνικοῖς ἀντηγράφοις ὀνομάσται, οὐδ' ἄλλο τι ἢ τὸν Ἰησοῦν κατὰ τὴν Ἑβραίων φωνῆν πέπεσο δηλωσέσθαι; cf. also Theodoret, ii. 385, on Is 61<sup>1</sup>, ἐν τῇ Ἑβραίων φωνῇ τὸ ἰάμενον σωτηρίου ἰάμενον ἰερατοῦ καλεῖται, τοῦν' ἐστὶ Χριστοῦ. Lagarde (Ubersicht, p. 97) concludes from this that יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, the Syriac form of the name, had a double ḥ.

Already in the oldest MSS of the Gr. Test. the name is written with abbreviations ιϚ, ιν, ιθ; but occasionally in some MSS, and regularly in the Codex Bezae, ιηϚ is found (in the Codex Sinaiticus ιην and ιν in consecutive lines in Rev 22<sup>20-21</sup>). The Epistle of Barnabas seems to have known the abbreviation ιη, because the number 318 (= τμη) in Gn 14<sup>4</sup> is explained there of the cross of Jesus; and the same inference may be drawn for Irenaeus from a comparison of the texts of Irenaeus, Hippolytus, and Epiphanius on the Marcosians (see Expt xvii. [1905] pp. 44, 139).

H. Leclercq, in art. 'Abbreviations' in Cabrol's Dict. d'Archéol. Chrétienne, has a special paragraph 'de l'abréviation ΙΗϚ' (col. 177-180). The earliest coins exhibiting the symbol ΙΗϚ are of Justinian II. (685-695, and 705-711). In the legend ΙΗϚΧΡΙΣΤΥΣ ΝΙΚΑ found on coins of Constantine II. (705-707), the second letter is pronounced to be the Greek η, despite the Ϛ in ΝΙΚΑ. On the story that the monogram of Christ was found written on the heart of Ignatius (theoph.), when at his martyrdom it was laid bare by the claws of the lions, see A. Bell, The Saints in Christian Art, i. [1901] p. 205.

On the power of the name Ἰησοῦς, which cannot be translated, see Origen, c. Col. i. 25. Like the names Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, καὶ ἄλλοι Ἰησοῦς, αὐτὸ τὸ ὄνομα κυρίου καὶ ἰατροῦ ἰατροῦ, ἀποκαταστατὴν ψυχῶν καὶ σωμάτων, ἰατροῦ καὶ ἰατροῦ ἔσθ' ἡ ἀποκατάστασις. We have as yet no explanation of the statement of Irenaeus: Ἰησοῦς autem nomen secundum propriam Hebraeorum linguam litterarum est duarum ac dimidiae, sicut periti eorum dicunt, significans dominum eum, qui continet eum et terram, quia Jesus secundum antiquam Hebraicam linguam colum est: terra autem iterum saba ussa dicitur (= saba ussa? 'heaven and earth'). In another passage Irenaeus writes: 'Nihilominus autem et unigenitus et maxime autem super omnia nomen, quod dicitur Deus, quod et ipsum hebraice Baruah dicitur, et duas et dimidium habet literas.'

The Jews now write יֵשׁוּעַ, which is explained by Händler (Lexicon der Abbréviationen, 1897) יֵשׁוּעַ יֵשׁוּעַ, by Lagarde (Mitteilungen, ii. 290) יֵשׁוּעַ יֵשׁוּעַ, 'may his name (and memory) be wiped out (and perish)'; Jastrow's Dictionary explains it as an abbreviation of ישע; Reuchlin and other Christian Hebraists wrote the name ישעיהו, as a combination of the tetragrammaton יהוה, with v, wherein they found deep mysteries.

The first letter of the Greek Ἰησοῦς seems to be treated as a consonant in the hexameter Ἰσακ ἢ δ' Ἰακωβ Ἰησοῦς Δαμῆλη τ' Ἡλιας, Sib. Or. ii. 247; also in the verse of Theodorus Prodromus: τοῦ δ' Ἰησοῦ θανόντος Ἰουδας μένει. On its numerical value (10) and its straight form see speculations in Clement's Pedag. i. 8. 25 ἡ εἰδικα καὶ κατὰ φύσιν, ἢν αἰνίσσεται τὸ Ἰῶτα τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, ἢ ἀγαθωσίην αὐτοῦ, and ii. 43. 3, the psalter of ten strings; in Epiphanius, Haer. i. 3 = the 10th of Nisan, on which the Paschal lamb was chosen; in the titles (δεκάται σωτηρίου ἀρχὴ ὄνοματ' Ἰησοῦ) in Apost. Constit. ii. 25; in the Opus interpretif. in Mt. (Migne, lvi. 618).

On the spelling of the name in the Latin MSS of the Bible, Iesus, Ihesus, Hiesus, see Wordsworth-White on Mt 1<sup>1</sup> and p. 776; H. J. Lawlor, Chapters on the Book of Matthew, p. 76; the letter of Amalarius to Bp. Jonas of Orleans and to Abp. Jermias of Sens 'de nomine dñi Iesu,' whether iuc or ihs is the correct spelling, whether the middle letter is the Greek η or the Latin h, whether the last letter is Greek or Latin. In the Russian Church there was at one time a violent dispute about this orthographical question. In mediæval poetry, for instance in Ekkehart iv. of St. Gall, Isus is made to rhyme with visus, etc.:

Virgo prior visum cunctis agnoverat Isum . . .
Sed nec ab his volumus nudetur laudibus Isus.

Damasus formed the lines:

In rebus tantis Trina conjunctio mundi
Erigit humanum sensum laudare venustE,
Sola salus nobis et mundi summa potestas
Venit peccati nodum dissolvere fructu
Summa salus cunctis nituit per secula terris.

The Mohammedan form 'Isā was certainly adapted to get an assonance with Mūsa (like Ibrāhīm with Ismaīl, Kabil with Habil), and not to identify the name with Esau. This was the more easy because the Nestorians pronounced the name Ishō, not Jeshū like the Jacobites. On the proposal to introduce the Mohammedan form 'Isā instead of Giesū into the Urdu NT, see Bible House Papers, No. iii. p. 28.

That the name contains 4 vowels and one consonant doubled, and has the numerical value 888 (10+8+200+70+400+200), is shown by 3D. Or. l. 329 ff. and by the speculations of the Macrobian (ren. xv. 3; Hippel. v. 10).

On the monograms for the name of Jesus see PRE<sup>3</sup> xii. esp. p. 371 f.; Jerome, 'de monogramma XPI' in Anecdota Maredotiana, iii. 3 (1903), pp. 198-198; P. Chazar, Leveo nome Gesù, Napoli, 1890, p. 390.

In the Ethiopian Church the name Jesus is avoided as a proper name (ZDMG xxviii. 309); in the Syriac Church it is 'still very commonly used as a man's name' (Maclean, Dict. of the Dioceses of Jerusalem, 1901). It would be an interesting task to collect the proper names formed with Jesus as first or second part; they seem especially frequent in the Syriac and Persian Churches. EB. NESTLE.

JEWS.—This term, originally perhaps applied only to men of the tribe of Judah, 'men of Judaea,' is employed in the Gospels (1) in opposition to Gentiles, proselytes, or Samaritans: Mk 7, Jn 2<sup>6-13</sup> 4<sup>9-22</sup> 5<sup>1</sup> 6<sup>4</sup> 7<sup>19</sup> 9<sup>40</sup> 10<sup>24</sup>; (2) specially of Jews as antagonistic to our Lord, a usage which is characteristic of Jn. as distinguished from the Synoptics: Mt 23<sup>10</sup>, Jn 6<sup>4</sup> 7<sup>22</sup> 8<sup>45-47</sup> 9<sup>13</sup> 10<sup>19</sup> 11<sup>19</sup> 12<sup>31</sup> 12<sup>32</sup> 12<sup>33</sup> 12<sup>34</sup> 11. On the inferences that have been drawn from this usage as to the authorship and date of the Fourth Gospel, see art. JOHN (GOSPEL OF). 'The Jews' in this sense were blind followers of the Pharisees, and bitter opponents of Christ. Scrupulous about all the practices sanctioned by the elders,—washing of hands, of cups and pots and brazen vessels, Sabbath observance, etc. (Mk 7<sup>4</sup>, Jn 5<sup>10</sup> etc.),—they had forsaken the 'old paths' trodden by their fathers, and the things commanded by God. 'For fear of the Jews' men hesitated to confess Christ (Jn 7<sup>13</sup> 8<sup>22</sup>).

For customs of the Jews see art. SOCIAL LIFE. See also art. ISRAEL and JERUSALEM.

LITERATURE.—Westcott, Gospel of St. John, introd. p. viii ff.; Andrews, Life of our Lord [ed. 1883], p. 470; Fairbairn, Studies in the Life of Christ, ch. x. J. SOUTAR.

JOANNA.—A link in our Lord's genealogy (Lk 3<sup>37</sup>).

JOANNA (Ἰωάννα, Tisch. and Revisers' Text; but Loana, WH and Nestle; from Aram. yoḥānā, Heb. יוחנה).—The wife of Chuza, the 'steward' of Herod Antipas. In Lk 8<sup>1-3</sup> she appears as one of certain women who had been healed, and in gratitude ministered to Jesus and His disciples. The passage reads as though she had herself derived physical benefit from Jesus; but it is possible, as Godet suggests in loc., that the 'nobleman' or king's officer of Jn 4<sup>46-48</sup> was Chuza. If so, Joanna may have been led to attach herself to Christ through the restoration of her son's health, or even of his life if the Johannine narrative is to be identified with Mt

8<sup>1-3</sup> and Lk 7<sup>1-10</sup>. The latter identification, as early as Irenæus (adv. Har. ii. 33), and not without distinguished support (Wetstein, Ewald, de Wette, Baur), is attractive but precarious. Joanna is mentioned again in Lk 24<sup>10</sup> as one of the women who went to the sepulchre to embalm the body of Jesus. She is almost certainly the same person as in 8<sup>1</sup>, though her husband's name does not occur in the later passage. There is no need to explain the omission by a suggestion that he was dead, or had become obscure through dismissal from his office by Antipas because of the relations of his household with Jesus. The Evangelist had already sufficiently marked the identity of Joanna, who through her own devotion would be well known to the disciples. See also CHUZA.

i. JOHN'S IMPORTANCE, AND SOURCES FOR HIS HISTORY.—The significance of John the Baptist for the history of Christianity is shown by the place given him in the Gospel records by every one of the four Evangelists. St. Mark describes John's mission in the very first words of his narrative as 'the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God' (1<sup>1</sup>). St. Luke makes the story of John's birth the prelude to his wonderful narrative of the greater birth at Bethlehem (1<sup>26</sup>). The three Synoptists are agreed in representing his mission as the necessary preparation, in accordance with OT prophecy, for the manifestation of the Christ (Mk 1<sup>2-3</sup>, Mt 3<sup>1</sup>, Lk 3<sup>4-6</sup>), while in all the Gospels his baptism of Jesus becomes the moment of the Lord's equipment with the Spirit for His Messianic office (Mk 1<sup>10</sup>, Mt 3<sup>16</sup>, Lk 3<sup>21</sup>; cf. Jn 1<sup>33</sup>). In the Prologue to his Gospel the Fourth Evangelist describes John as 'a man sent from God,' who 'came for a witness, to bear witness of the light, that all men through him (i.e. Jesus) might believe' (1<sup>7</sup>). In accordance with this general sense of John's great importance for Christ and Christianity is the space devoted to him in the Gospel narratives as a whole. It is true that Lk. alone furnishes any information about him previous to the moment when he suddenly issued from his retirement in the wilderness and began to preach the baptism of repentance in the Jordan Valley, and true also that in the case of the Fourth Gospel it is difficult often to distinguish between the Evangelist's statements as a historian and his own subjective exposition. But when we put together all the references to John's ministry and history and character which we find either in the form of historical narrative, or testimony from the lips of Jesus, or reflexion on the part of an Evangelist, and when we make use besides of one or two sidelights which fall from the book of Acts and the pages of Josephus, we find that for knowledge regarding the Baptist's mission, his character, his relation to Jesus Christ, and his place in the history of both the old and the new dispensations, we are in no lack of plentiful and trustworthy sources of information.

ii. BIRTH, YOUTH, AND PRE-PROPHETIC LIFE.—

The fact that Lk. alone of the Gospels gives an account of John's earlier life, together with the artistic nature of the narrative and its presumed discrepancy with the representation of the Fourth Gospel in respect of a connexion between John and Jesus previous to the baptism of the latter (cf. Lk 1:35-56 with Jn 1:1-3), has frequently been supposed to reduce this exquisite story to the level of pure legend. In view, however, of St. Luke's claims to historical accuracy (1:4), and of the vindication of these claims at so many points by modern research (cf. W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, ch. 1, Was Christ born at Bethlehem?; Chase, The Credibility of Acts), it is impossible to set his narrative aside as if it rested on no basis of historical fact. It is full of poetry, no doubt, but it is the kind of poetry which bursts like a flower from the living stem of actual truth. Any attempt to dissolve the narrative into fictions of a later growth must reckon with the fact that the Evangelist is evidently making use at this point of an early Aramaic source steeped in the colours of the OT—the earliest documentary evidence respecting the origins of Christianity which has come down to us, evidence which may justly be called contemporary* (Plummer, 'St. Luke' in Internat. Crit. Com., p. 7). This document, which, if it is historical, must have rested in large part upon the authority of the Virgin Mary, St. Luke, 'as a faithful collector of evangetic memorabilia', allows to speak for itself, with here and there an editorial touch' (Bruce, Expositor's Gr. Test., ad loc.). To appreciate the historical sobriety and manifestly primary character of this early Jewish-Christian source, we have only to compare the first chapter of Lk. with the relative sections of the Protocanonicalum Jacobi, and especially with those chapters (22-24) which Harnack calls the Apocryphum Zachariae (see Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. p. 431).

According to Lk., John was the son of Zacharias, a priest of the course of Abijah (see art. ZACHARIAS), and his wife Elisabeth who belonged to the family of Aaron (1:5). Elisabeth was a kinswoman (not 'cousin', see Plummer, op. cit. p. 25) of the Virgin Mary (1:35), who paid her a three months' visit immediately before the birth of John (v. 24, cf. vv. 26, 30, 40). John was the senior of Jesus by six months (1:31, cf. 2). The name John, properly Johanan (1:25, 1:37), cf. Heb. text and LXX of 1 Ch 3:1, 2 Ch 23:1, was given to the child by his parents in obedience to a Divine direction (1:13), and in spite of the opposition of neighbours and kinsfolk (vv. 28-29).

Regarding the place of John's birth there has been much discussion. Lk. describes the house of Zacharias as in 'a city of Judah' which lay in 'the hill country' (v. 2, 3, 40). A number of commentators have assumed, without any warrant, that this must have been Hebron, as being a priestly town in that region. Others have suggested that βηθ is a corruption for βηθ lezzar (Beland, Pal. p. 570; Robinson, BRP ii. 206), so that the Baptist's birthplace would be Jutah or Juttah, to the south of Hebron (Robinson, op. cit., 26, and i. 486), which is mentioned in Joshua as having been allotted to the priests (21:16). A tradition as early as the Crusades assigns the honour to 'Ain Karim, a village which lay between Jerusalem and Bethlehem. All this, however, is purely conjectural, and it is best to be content to say that John was born in a town unknown, in the hill country of Judah. See, further, art. JUDAH.

Of the external incidents of John's childhood and youth Lk. gives no information. All that is told us bears upon his spiritual growth. According to an announcement of the angel Gabriel, he was to be 'filled with the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb' (1:15). That a peculiar Divine blessing did rest upon him from the first is implied in the words, 'the hand of the Lord was upon him' (v. 40); that this Divine presence made itself manifest in the development of his character is evident when the Evangelist adds, 'and the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit' (v. 40).

But whatever the outward tenor of John's way in that priestly house in the hill country of Judah, a great crisis must have come at last, followed by a sudden break in his manner of life. A priest's son, he would naturally, according to all Jewish traditions, have stepped into the priestly office, and enjoyed the honours, abundance, and comparative ease that were parts of his birthright. But spiritual instincts and powers which had long been unknown in Israel began to make themselves felt in the young man's heart, and this son of a priest went forth into the deserts to be shaped in solitude into a prophet mightier than Elijah or Isaiah. Of the precise nature of the impulse which first led him to withdraw himself from his fellows, the duration of his stay in the wilderness, and the fashion of his life while there, no Evangelist has anything to tell us. But it is certainly a grotesque mistake to suppose that he left his home and the haunts of men in order to become an Essene (see the excellent remarks of Godet on this point, Com. on Lk. i. p. 117 f.).

There was absolutely no resemblance between John, the desert solitary, as he is described to us in the pages of the Gospels (Mt 3:1-11<sup>12</sup> || 11<sup>18</sup>), and the Essenes with their white garments and their cenobitic establishments, as we come across them in the pages of Josephus (BJ ii. viii. 2-13, Ant. xviii. 1. 5). All that can be said is that John was an ascetic as the Essenes were, and that in both cases the revolt against prevailing luxury and corruption sprang out of the deep seriousness which marked the more earnest spirits of the time (see Rüegg, art. 'Johannes der Täufer' in PRB<sup>3</sup>). John's withdrawal into the wilderness indicated his disapproval of society as he found it, it signified more especially an absolute break with the prevalent Pharisaic type of piety. But in his case it meant much more than this, much more even than the adoption of severely ascetic habits in the interests of his own spiritual life. It was as one who was conscious that he was set apart for the office of a prophet (cf. Lk 1:17, 76), and who felt himself called in particular to take up in Israel a work of reformation similar to that of Elijah (Lk 1:17; cf. Mt 11:14 17:12, Jn 1:21), that John betook himself to the deserts (Lk 1:80) and there lived the life of one who hides himself from men that he may the better see the face of God. Locusts and wild honey were his food, while his clothing was a loose cloak (ἔσθυμα) of woven camel's hair and a leathern girdle about his loins (Mt 3:4, Mk 1:6; cf. 2 K 1:8).†

How long John remained in 'the deserts,' by which is doubtless meant the awful solitudes of the Wilderness of Judaea, and how he grew into the full sense of the precise nature of his prophetic vocation as the forerunner and herald of the Messiah, we cannot tell. But the Holy Ghost who had been working in him, and the hand of the Lord which had been laid upon him from the first, his own constant brooding over words of ancient prophecy (Jn 1:23, cf. Mt 3:1), and a deep intuitive reading of the signs of the times, would gradually bring him to a clear knowledge both of his function as a prophet and of the time when he must begin to exercise it. And so came at last the day of his 'sheaving' (ἀράβεται) unto Israel (Lk 1:80).

iii. THE PUBLIC MINISTRY.—It was in the 15th year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar that the word of God came to John in the wilderness summoning him to enter upon his work as a prophet (Lk 3:2). Immediately he obeyed the summons (v. 3). The scene of his ministry, according to Mk., was 'the wilderness' (1:4), according to Mt. 'the wilderness of Judaea' (3:1), according to Lk. 'all the country about Jordan' (3:2). Probably, as hitherto, the Wilderness of Judaea continued to be his home—that wild region which stretches westwards from the Dead Sea and the Jordan to the edge of the central plateau of Palestine; but when he preached he must have done so in some place not too far removed from the haunts of men, while, owing to his practice of baptism (almost certainly by immersion), the Jordan necessarily marked the central line of his activity (Mt 3<sup>6, 13, 16</sup>, Mk 1<sup>9, 10</sup>). To Jn. we owe the information that he baptized on both sides of the river (1<sup>28, 30</sup>). John's work may be considered under two aspects, (1) his preaching, (2) his baptism.

* This theory, put forth by Grätz (Gesch. der Juden, iii. p. 100) and adopted by many since, has been repeated once more in the art. 'Essenes' in Jewish Encyc., where it is added that the silence of the NT about the Essenes 'is perhaps the best proof that they furnish the new sect (i.e. Christianity) with its main elements as regards personnel and views'—as striking an illustration as could well be discovered of a fallacious use of the argumentum e silentio. On John's relations to the Essenes see Lightfoot, Colossians, Desert, iii.

† That he ate locusts, as the Bedawin still do, not carob-beans, is now the prevalent opinion of scholars (cf. art. Locust, and in Hastings' DB, s.v.). Cheyne, however, holds out for carob-beans (Encyc. Bibl., art. 'Bunks' and 'John the Baptist'). See also Encyc. Times, xv. [1894] pp. 282, 283, 429, xvi. [1895] p. 322.

1. John's Preaching.—According to Mt. the essence of John's preaching, the text as we might say of all his sermons, was this: 'Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand' (3<sup>2</sup>). The second part of this text was the fundamental part. It shows that John was fully conscious that the long-expected Messianic age was now about to dawn, and that it was his mission to proclaim the fact. By his trumpet-voiced proclamation of this fact he thrilled the nation to its heart and drew forth the multitude into the wilderness to hear him (Mt 3<sup>5</sup>, Lk 3<sup>7</sup>; cf. Jos., Ant. xviii. v. 2)—men from Jerusalem and men from Galilee (Jn 1<sup>19, 28</sup>), civilians and soldiers (Lk 3<sup>10, 14</sup>), Pharisees and publicans side by side (Mt 3<sup>7</sup>, Lk 3<sup>12</sup>).

But while the preacher's fundamental message was the announcement of the near approach of the Messianic Kingdom, he combined with these glad tidings of good a stern summons to repentance. Repentance, he said, μετάνοια, a change of mind and heart, were indispensable as preparatory condition for all who would share in the privileges of the new order about to be set up. To the Jewish mind this was an unexpected and unwelcome note in a herald of the Messiah; and John's utterance of it and strenuous emphasis upon it form one of the marks of his profound originality as a prophet. According to popular conviction, all Israel would have a lot and a part in the blessings of the Messianic age, and that specifically because of their descent from Abraham. It was recognized that judgments would accompany the appearance of the Christ, but these judgments were to fall upon the Gentiles, while Abraham's children would be secure and happy in that day of the Lord. The Talmud explains the cry of the prophetic watchman, 'The morning cometh, and also the night' (Is 21<sup>12</sup>), by saying, 'The night is only to the nations of the world, but the morning to Israel' (Jerus. Taan. 64a, quoted by Edersheim, Life and Times, i. 271). Not so, said John. Repentance is the prime requisite for all who would enter the Kingdom of heaven. Descent from Abraham counts for nothing (Mt 3<sup>9</sup>). Every fruitless or worthless tree must be hewn down and cast into the fire (v<sup>10</sup>). The very leaders of the nation themselves, the Pharisees and Sadducees, must bring forth fruit worthy of repentance if they are to escape from the wrath to come (vv. 7-9).

2. John's Baptism.—Alongside of the spoken word John set that great distinctive symbol of his ministry from which his title 'the Baptist' (ὁ Βαπτιστής) was derived. He came not only preaching but baptizing, or rather, so closely was the symbol interwoven with the word, he came 'preaching the baptism of repentance' (Mk 1<sup>4</sup>, Lk 3<sup>3</sup>). To understand John's baptismal doctrine it is necessary to think of the historical roots out of which it sprang. For though he gave to the rite a depth of meaning it had never had in Israel before, he evidently appealed to ideas on the subject which were already familiar to the Jewish people. In particular, three moments in the preceding history of the religion of Israel appear to be gathered up in the baptism of John as it meets us in the Gospels.

βαπτίζω had come to be the regular term alike for those ceremonial washings and for the Messianic baptism of the Forerunner (for detailed proof and ref. on these points see the present writer's Sacraments in the NT, p. 56 f.). And yet, though John's baptism finds its earliest historical roots in the Levitical washings, it is far from finding its complete explanation there. It was essentially an ethical rite, and thus very different from an outward ceremony to which some value could be attached apart from the moral and spiritual condition of the recipient. In the case of all who came to him John insisted upon repentance; and they 'were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins' (Mt 3<sup>6</sup>).

(b) The Messianic illustration foretold by the prophets.—Long before the time of John, prophetic souls in Israel had seen that for a true cleansing the nation must look to those Messianic days when God should open a fountain for sin and for uncleanness, sprinkling His people with clean water, and putting a new heart and a new spirit within them (Jer 31<sup>31</sup>, Ezk 36<sup>25, 26</sup>, Zec 13<sup>1</sup>). It was John's function to declare that those great Messianic promises were now going to receive their fulfilment at the hands of the Messiah Himself. His baptism, we have said, was a baptism of preparation for the Kingdom, preparation which took the form of repentance and confession. But even more than a baptism of preparation it was a baptism of promise, promise both of the Kingdom and the King, being a promissory symbol of a perfect spiritual cleansing which the Messiah in person should bestow—'I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance; but he that cometh after me . . . shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire' (Mt 3<sup>11</sup>).

(c) Another historical moment which should not be lost sight of is the proselyte baptism of the Jewish Church. It may now be regarded as certain that the baptism of proselytes had been the rule in the long before NT times (see especially Schürer, HJP II. ii. 319; Edersheim, Life and Times, ii. 745 ff.); and proselyte baptism helps us to understand the baptism of John in certain of its aspects. When a Gentile 'sought shelter under the wings of the Shekinah,' it was understood that he was utterly renouncing his past. And John insisted on a like renunciation in the case of candidates for his baptism. The danger of the proclamation that the Kingdom of heaven was at hand lay in the fact that multitudes would claim to enter that Kingdom as a matter of course, without being prepared to submit to the necessary conditions. Not so, said John. God does not depend upon Israel alone for the peopling of His Kingdom. He 'is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham' (Mt 3<sup>9</sup>). Even a Jew, if he is to be received, must come as a humble penitent who casts himself upon the Divine grace. He must come like a stranger and a proselyte renouncing the past, not as one who claims an inalienable right, but as one who seeks by fruits of repentance to flee from the wrath to come (Mt 3<sup>7, 9</sup>; Lk 3<sup>9</sup>). For the baptism of the Coming One is a baptism of judgment. His winnowing-fan is in His hand; and while He will gather His wheat into the garner, He will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire (Mt 3<sup>12</sup>, Lk 3<sup>17</sup>).

On the baptism of John see, further, art. BAPTISM. IV. JOHN'S BAPTISM OF JESUS AND WITNESS REGARDING HIM.—1. The baptism of Jesus by John is recorded in all the Synoptics (Mt 3<sup>13</sup>, Mk 1<sup>9</sup>, Lk 3<sup>21</sup>), but is not mentioned in the Fourth Gospel. The author, however, makes the Baptist refer to the descent of the Spirit upon Jesus in the form of a dove (Jn 1<sup>33</sup>) as an authenticating sign which he received that He was the Messiah; and this incident is represented by the other three as following immediately upon the baptism, though the first two, and probably the third also, describe the visible sign as bestowed upon Jesus Himself along with the approving voice from heaven (Mt 3<sup>16</sup>, Mk 1<sup>10</sup>, Lk 3<sup>21</sup>). If the scene of the baptism was the same as that of John's subsequent witness to Jesus recorded in the Fourth Gospel, it took place at 'Bethany beyond Jordan' (Jn 1<sup>28</sup>), a site which has been much discussed, but cannot be said to have been certainly identified (see art. BETHABARA).

It was here, then, in all likelihood, that Jesus met John when He came from Galilee to be baptized of him (Mt 3<sup>13</sup>). At first John was unwilling to perform the rite upon such an applicant, but Jesus insisted. 'Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness' (v. 14). He recognized John's baptism as an appointment of the Divine righteousness which it was proper that He should accept. If the fitness of that baptism in the case of Jesus is called in question, we must remember that it had an initiatory aspect which would commend it to Him as He saw in it an opportunity of consecrating Himself definitely and openly to the Messianic kingdom and its tasks. But if John's words of protest (v. 14) imply that even in the baptism of Christ the cleansing aspect of the rite was in view, was it not proper that the 'Lamb of God' (Jn 1<sup>29-36</sup>), who had no sense of personal guilt, nothing to repent of or confess, should even now begin to bear upon His heart the burden of the sins of others, even as on a coming day He was to bear them 'in his own body on the tree' (1 P 2<sup>24</sup>)?

2. Of the intercourse of John with Jesus, the Fourth Gospel gives an account which differs widely from that presented in the Synoptics; but apart from the Johannine colouring of the later narrative, the difference is sufficiently explained on the ordinary view that the Synoptists describe the meeting between the two at the time of our Lord's baptism, while the Fourth Evangelist concerns himself only with John's subsequent testimony to the now recognized Messiah (cf. Jn 1<sup>36</sup>). There is no real discrepancy between John's 'I knew him not', reported in the Fourth Gospel (1<sup>31</sup>), and the representation of Mt. (3<sup>32</sup>), that when the Man from Nazareth presented Himself at the Jordan, John declined at first to baptize Him, on the ground of his own unworthiness in comparison. Even if we suppose that in spite of their kinship and the friendship between their mothers the two had not met before, the fact that John's baptism was a baptism of repentance and confession seems to imply a personal interview with applicants previous to the performance of the rite—an interview which in the case of Jesus must have revealed to one with the Baptist's insight the beauty and glory of His character. On the other hand, the 'I knew him not' of the last Gospel, as the context shows, only means that John did not know that Jesus was indeed the Messiah until he received the promised sign (1<sup>33</sup>).

It is true that in the Fourth Gospel John is made to bear a witness to Jesus by the banks of the Jordan (1<sup>33-34</sup>) which finds no parallel in the earlier narratives; but if we follow the ordinary view of students of the chronology of our Lord's life—that the narrative of the Fourth Evangelist comes in after the forty days of the Temptation have intervened, and that John now sees Jesus in the light not only of the authenticating sign given at the baptism, but of his own reflexion ever since upon the subject of the character of Jesus and the fulfilment of the Messianic promise—the fulness and explicitness of his testimony upon this later occasion appear perfectly natural. The twice-repeated ἐμπροσθεν μου ἴδοντες (vv. 14, 33), it is true, cannot be understood, so far as the Baptist himself is concerned, as referring to pre-existence, though this was probably involved in the thought of the Evangelist. But the designation of Jesus as 'the Lamb of God' (vv. 29, 36), and especially the phrase 'which taketh away the sin of the world' (v. 29), reveals a conception of the Saviour's Messianic functions which is certainly profound, but which, in spite of the objections which have been taken to it, cannot surprise us in the case of one who had brooded like John over the utterances of OT prophecy (cf. especially Is 53).

The Fourth Evangelist records a further witness regarding Jesus which John bore to his own disciples on a later occasion, when he was baptizing in Aenon (wh. see), near to Salim (3<sup>22</sup>). In this passage the difficulty of discriminating between the original words and facts of history and the Johannine setting and atmosphere is even greater than usual, but the figure of the Bridegroom 'that hath the bride' and the Bridegroom's friend who rejoices in the other's joy (v. 29), and the saying, 'He must increase, but I must decrease' (v. 30), are so thoroughly in keeping with other utterances of the Baptist recorded in the Synoptics as well as in the Fourth Gospel regarding the relations between the Messiah and himself (Mt 3<sup>11</sup>, Jn 1<sup>27</sup>), that it is difficult to resist the impression of historical reality which they make upon the reader.

v. JOHN'S IMPRISONMENT AND DEATH (Mt 14<sup>1-12</sup>, Mk 6<sup>17-29</sup>, Lk 9<sup>19-20</sup>; cf. Jos. Ant. XVIII. v. 1, 2).

—According to the Synoptists, the arrest and execution of John were due to the spiteful hatred of Herodias (wh. see), because he had rebuked Herod for making her his wife in flagrant defiance of the law of Israel (Lv 18<sup>20</sup>). Josephus, on the other hand, says that Herod put the prophet to death because he 'feared lest the great influence John had over the people might put it in his power and inclination to raise a rebellion; for they seemed ready to do anything he should advise.' The two statements, however, are not irreconcilable; and certainly the evidence of Josephus, whose interests as a historian lay altogether in the political direction, is not such as to cast any suspicion on the trustworthiness of the more detailed and more intimate Gospel narrative. It may very well have been the case that, while John's death was really due to the implacable hate of Herodias, Herod felt that this was hardly an adequate ground, or one that he would care to allege, for the execution of the Baptist, and so made political reasons his excuse. Assuredly there was nothing of the political revolutionary about John; yet his extraordinary influence over the people and the wild hopes raised among certain classes by his preaching might make it easy for Herod to present a plausible justification of his base deed by representing John as a politically dangerous person.

There may seem to be a contradiction within the Evangelic narratives themselves, when we find Mt. saying that Herod would have put John to death but that he feared the multitude (14<sup>9</sup>), while Mk. alleges that Herod 'feared John, knowing that he was a righteous man and an holy, and kept him safe . . . and heard him gladly' (6<sup>20</sup>). But the contradiction lies in Herod's character rather than in the testimonies of the two writers, and the words πολλὸν ἠπρόβη, 'he was much perplexed' (Mk 6<sup>20</sup> WH and RV), explain adequately enough a moral situation of which we have the final revelation in Herod's weakly vacillating behaviour: 'letting I dare not wait upon I would,' when Herodias through her daughter Salome (Mt 14<sup>6</sup>, Mk 6<sup>22</sup>; cf. Jos. Ant. XVIII. v. 4) presented her horrible request. That Herod did not really regard John as a political fanatic is suggested by all that the Gospels tell us as to the way in which he treated him while he lay in prison; by the personal audiences he granted him (Mk 6<sup>30</sup>), and by the fact that he allowed him to have intercourse with his disciples (Mt 11<sup>2</sup>, Lk 7<sup>18-19</sup>), and through them to exchange messages with Jesus (Mt 11<sup>2-5</sup>, Lk 7<sup>18-25</sup>).

The message which John sent to Jesus has often been regarded as exceedingly strange on the part of one who had previously borne so signal a witness that Jesus was the Christ, and it has even been suggested that he sent his messengers not because there was any wavering of his own faith, but for the sake of his disciples, to whom he wished some confirmation of the Messiahship of Jesus to be given (see Bobb in Hastings' DB li. 680<sup>o</sup>). But the more simple explanation is also the one which is truer to human nature. The depression wrought by imprisonment on one accustomed to the freedom of the wilderness, together with his disappointment at the seeming delay of Jesus to assert His power and authority as the Christ of Israel, had resulted in an hour of the power of darkness in the soul of the great prophet, when he began to wonder whether after all he had not made a great mistake. That in spite of his doubts he had not lost his faith in Jesus is shown by the very fact that it was to Jesus Himself that he applied to have these doubts removed, as well as by that message of encouragement and 'strong consolation' which the Bridegroom sent back to His sorely tried friend: 'Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me' (Mt 11<sup>5</sup>, Lk 7<sup>23</sup>).

From Josephus we learn that the Castle of Machærus (wh. see) was the scene of the Baptist's imprisonment (Ant. XVIII. v. 1, 2). Machærus was a powerful stronghold, at once a fortress and a palace (BJ VII. vi. 1-3; cf. Pliny, Hist. Nat. v. xvi. 72), situated on the eastern shores of the Dead Sea (G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 569 f.). Within these gloomy walls, then, the death of John took place, one of those awful tragedies for which nature has provided here so sympathetic a theatre' (op. cit. in loc.). Of this tragedy St. Mark has furnished us with the fullest account (6<sup>17-29</sup>) in a narrative which is not more thrilling in its dramatic vividness than it is instinct with the elements of what might almost be described as self-evidencing moral and historical truth.

vi. JOHN AND HIS DISCIPLES.—Besides the crowds that came to him to be baptized, John appears to have drawn around him a circle of closer followers, who are referred to in all the Gospels as his 'disciples' (Mt 9<sup>14</sup> [¶ Mk 2<sup>18</sup>, Lk 5<sup>27</sup>] 11<sup>2</sup> [¶ Lk 7<sup>18-19</sup>], Mk 6<sup>29</sup>, Lk 11<sup>1</sup>, Jn 1<sup>35-37</sup> 3<sup>25-41</sup>; cf. Ac 18<sup>25-26</sup> 19<sup>35</sup>). It appears that, unlike Jesus, he enjoined regular fasts upon his disciples (Mt 9<sup>14</sup> ¶), and that he also gave them forms of prayer (Lk 11<sup>1</sup>) which they were in the habit of employing frequently (Lk 5<sup>28</sup>). Possibly he utilized them as assistants in the work of baptizing, for which he could hardly have sufficed personally when his movement was at its height.

It was from the circle of these disciples of the Baptist that the disciples of Jesus were immediately drawn (Jn 1<sup>35-36</sup>), and that not only with John's full consent, but through his own express witness both in public (Jn 1<sup>36-38</sup>) and in private (v. 36.) to the superior worth of Jesus and to his own function as the mere herald and forerunner of the latter. And yet he did not, as we might have expected, decline, after Christ's baptism, to stand any longer to others in the relation of a master to his disciples. Perfectly loyal as he was to Him whom he recognized as the Messiah, he evidently felt, as Jesus also did previous to John's imprisonment (Jn 3<sup>22-23</sup> 4<sup>1-2</sup>), that there was still need for a work of preparation, and room therefore for a discipleship to the Forerunner. But when his disciples grew jealous of the rapidly growing popularity of Jesus, and came to him with their complaint, he proclaimed to them once more the true relation between that Other and himself,—'He must increase, but I must decrease,'—and reminded them how he had said from the first that he was not the Christ, but was sent before Him (Jn 3<sup>28</sup>; cf. Mt 3<sup>11</sup> ¶).

The fidelity of John's disciples to their master is shown by their holding together and continuing to observe his prescriptions after he was cast into prison (cf. Mt 4<sup>12</sup> ¶ with 9<sup>14</sup> ¶), by their attendance upon him during his captivity (Mt 11<sup>2</sup>, Lk 7<sup>18-25</sup>), and by their loving and reverent treatment of his corpse (Mk 6<sup>29</sup>). The vital impression he made upon them, and the self-propagating power of the baptism of repentance in the absence of a higher teaching, is proved by the fact that more than 20 years afterwards, and in the far-off city of Ephesus, St. Paul found certain disciples, including no less a personage than Apollos, the Alexandrian Jew, who knew no other baptism than that of John (Ac 19<sup>3</sup>, cf. 18<sup>25</sup>). Before the growing light of Christianity John's baptism as a baptism of preparation for the Messiah soon vanished away, but the traces of his memory and influence are found lingering long afterwards in the name, doctrines, and practices of the Hemerobaptists, who claimed John as one of themselves (Chron. Home. ii. 23; cf. Hegesippus in Euseb. HE iv. 22; Justin Martyr, Dial. c. Tryph. On the relation of the Hemerobaptists to John, see Lightfoot, Colossians, p. 402 ff.).

vii. OUR LORD'S ESTIMATE OF JOHN.—The task of appreciating the character and activity of John the Baptist is rendered easy for us by the frequent utterances of Jesus Himself. If the worth of praise is to be measured by the lips from which it falls, no mortal man was ever praised so greatly as he whom Jesus described as 'a burning and a shining light' (Jn 5<sup>35</sup>), as one who was 'much more than a prophet' (Mt 11<sup>9</sup> RV, Lk 7<sup>26</sup>), as the Elijah who by his coming was to 'restore all things' (Mt 11<sup>14</sup> 17<sup>12</sup>, Mk 9<sup>13</sup>); and of whom He said: 'Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist' (Mt 11<sup>11</sup>; see the whole passage, and cf. Lk 7<sup>24</sup>). That John had his limitations Jesus made clear (Mk 2<sup>28</sup>), but He attributed these not to any personal shortcomings, but to the fact that he belonged to the time of preparation, and so stood by a dispensational necessity outside of the realized Kingdom of God (Mt 11<sup>13</sup>, Lk 7<sup>28</sup>).

Again and again Jesus revealed His sense of the Divine value that attached to the baptism of John. He showed it when He insisted on submitting to that baptism Himself, and by the words He used on the occasion (Mt 3<sup>12</sup>). He showed it when He asked the question, 'The baptism of John, whence was it? from heaven, or of men?' (Mt 21<sup>25</sup> ¶), a question to which His own answer was self-evident, and which St. Luke answers for us when he says that 'all the people when they heard, and the publicans, justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John. But the Pharisees and the lawyers rejected for themselves the counsel of God, being not baptized of him' Lk 7<sup>29</sup>). And may we not say that in His words to a certain Pharisee (Jn 3<sup>1</sup>) about the necessity of a birth 'of water and the Spirit' (v. 5), He was indicating once more the deep religious value of John's water-baptism, while insisting at the same time on the indispensableness of that spiritual birth which comes only from above (v. 3)? Time after time, too, even to the closing days of His ministry, words which Jesus let fall reveal to us that He carried about with Him continually the thought of His predecessor's career, and perceived the bearing of its lessons upon His own ministry and earthly lot and fate (see Mt 9<sup>12</sup> 11<sup>1st</sup>, 1st. 17th, 21st, Lk 16th). And, finally, after His resurrection, we find that as He had justified John at the first by taking up his baptism of preparation, so now He crowns the work of the Forerunner by instituting the baptism of the Kingdom itself (Mt 28th). John had adopted the rite as the distinctive symbol of his reforming activity and the gateway into the sphere of Messianic preparation. Jesus transformed it into a sacrament of the Christian Church—at once the token of the gospel of forgiveness and the sign and seal of discipleship to Himself.

JOHN (THE APOSTLE).—As the Gospels are but memorabilia of Jesus, giving relatively but meagre accounts of His life and works, it is to be expected that they can afford us only glimpses of the Apostles. Such is the case; and, while a few more references are made to Peter, James, and John than to the others, we have no such material as allows any more than a fragmentary account of any one. Tradition has, in the case of each Apostle, added to the Scripture narrative a story of subsequent activity and fate. For convenience of reference, therefore, to all that is known of John we may group the materials under the following heads: (1) those found in the Scriptures; (2) those given us by tradition. To the account thus obtained we shall add a brief delineation of his character.

I. THE TESTIMONY OF SCRIPTURE.—Preliminary to giving the facts in their chronological order, it is well to call attention to the almost universal identification of the unnamed disciple of the Fourth Gospel with John.*

John is first introduced to us as a disciple of John the Baptist (Jn 1st). How long he had been with this stern preacher of the desert we do not know, but the time was one of preparation for the higher discipleship soon to follow. After the Temptation Jesus returned to the Jordan. Then and there John first met Jesus, and, with Andrew, showed such deep interest in Him that He invited them to go with Him to His abode. So critical was the hour when they went—four o'clock in the afternoon—that it was remembered long years after (13<sup>th-40</sup>). John's home was in Galilee (probably at Bethsaida), where his father, Zebedee, a man apparently of means (Mk 1st), was busy as a fisherman on the Lake. His mother was Salome (cf. Mt 27th with Mk 15th). On the next day after his first meeting with Jesus, John accompanied Him to Galilee, and was present at the marriage feast at Cana (Jn 2<sup>nd-11</sup>). From Cana they went to Capernaum, in order, perhaps, to make ready for going up to Jerusalem to the Passover. At this first Passover Jesus cleansed the Temple, and also 'did signs' which awakened popular interest. Here also He conversed with Nicodemus (2<sup>nd-3rd</sup>). The capital had not shown itself ready for the work He wished to do, so Jesus withdrew into the country of Judea and summoned the people to the baptism of repentance, just as the Baptist himself was doing.

* Dr. Dehl has with considerable force advanced and defended the theory that 'the disciple whom Jesus loved' was not the Apostle John, but a younger disciple, who shared all the privileges of the Twelve, but who was a native of Jerusalem and a member of the higher aristocracy. While this theory explains satisfactorily some of the facts given in the Gospels, it is beset with grave difficulties.

John was with Him all through this sojourn of over seven months in Judea, and doubtless assisted in the administering of the baptismal rite, for Jesus did not Himself baptize (4th). At the end of this period Jesus returned by way of Samaria to Galilee. On the way occurred the incident of the Samaritan woman, so fully depicted for us in the Fourth Gospel (4<sup>th-42</sup>). Once more the Master came to Cana, and while there cured the nobleman's son (vv. 46-54). For a brief time John seems now to have been at home, and to have engaged in his customary business of fishing; but the Baptist's imprisonment was the signal to Jesus for more vigorous work, and He appeared at the Lake-side to call to be His permanent escort the men who had already acknowledged Him and given Him some service (Mk 1<sup>st-20</sup>, Mt 4<sup>th-22</sup>, Lk 5<sup>th-11</sup>). John now entered upon that second stage of discipleship which was to prepare him for his life-work. The record of events which shows Jesus performing miracles and preaching in the towns and villages of Galilee is the record of John's training (see Mk 1<sup>st-29</sup>). When, some time afterwards, John was chosen to the Apostolate (Mk 3<sup>rd-13a</sup>, Mt 10<sup>th-4</sup>, Lk 6<sup>th-13a</sup>), it was but to confirm him in the position he had already occupied, and to make more definite his mission. At this time Jesus called him and his brother Boanerges, that is, 'sons of thunder' (Mk 3rd). See BOANERGES.

As from this time onwards the most of John's experiences were common to all the Apostles, it is necessary to mark only those which were in any way exceptional for him. They are sufficient to show that he was among the most prominent of the little band, and that he was especially close in friendship to the Master. With Peter and James he saw the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5th, Lk 8th). These three were with Jesus upon the Mount of Transfiguration (Mk 9th, Mt 17th, Lk 9th). It was John who 'answered and said, Master we saw one casting out devils in thy name; and we forbade him, because he followeth not with us' (Mk 6<sup>th-8</sup>, Lk 9th). It was he and James who wished to call down fire upon an inhospitable Samaritan village (Lk 9th). His mistaken ambition for high place at the side of his Master is recorded in Mk 10th, Mt 20th. He took part in the questioning about the time for the fulfilment of the solemn prophecies concerning Jerusalem (Mk 13th). He and Peter were sent to make ready the Passover (Lk 22nd). At the supper itself he reclined 'in Jesus' bosom' (see art. BOSOM), and asked Him who it was that was to be the betrayer (Jn 13<sup>th-26</sup>). In the garden of Gethsemane he was, with Peter and James, near his Master (Mk 14th, Mt 26th). Panic-stricken, he fled with all the other disciples at the time of the arrest (Mt 26th), but soon recovered himself, and followed the procession to the palace of the high priest (Jn 18th). Being known to the high priest, he was admitted to the court of the palace, and secured entrance for Peter (v. 16). Faithful now to the last, he stood near the cross, and there received the commission to care for the mother of Jesus (19<sup>th-27</sup>). On the morning of the resurrection Mary Magdalene tells him and Peter of the empty grave, and they hasten together to the spot (20<sup>th-3</sup>). In the account of the appearance of the risen Lord in Galilee (21<sup>st-7</sup>) the 'sons of Zebedee' have special mention, and again in the closing scene and words of the Fourth Gospel the impression that he should not die before the Lord's coming is corrected, and the truthfulness of his witness as given in this Gospel confirmed (21<sup>st-24</sup>).

Outside of the Gospels there are but few references to him in the NT. In the Acts he appears twice in the company of Peter. As they were going together, at the hour of prayer, to the Temple, they met a man, lame from birth, at the Beautiful Gate, and cured him. The deed caused great excitement, and a large crowd gathered around them in Solomon's porch. While they were speaking to the people the authorities came, and 'being sore troubled because they taught the people,' arrested them, and on the following day brought them before the Sanhedrin (Ac 4<sup>9</sup>). Later, he and Peter were sent to Samaria to those who had received the word of God under Philip's ministry, and 'they prayed for these that they might receive the Holy Ghost' (8<sup>14-15</sup>). About A.D. 50 we find John in Jerusalem, for at that time Paul meets him there and consults with him regarding his work among the Gentiles (Gal 2<sup>1-2</sup>). He was at this time one of the pillars of the Church. The only other mention of him in the NT is in Rev 1<sup>4, 9</sup>.

ii. THE TESTIMONY OF TRADITION.—1. Regarding John's residence in Ephesus.—From the time of his meeting with Paul in Jerusalem until his activity in later life at Ephesus, we have no certain knowledge of the Apostle. Nicephorus (HE ii. 2) tells us that Mary lived with John in Jerusalem for eleven years after the death of the Lord. There is nothing unlikely in this story, unless it be, as Godet suggests, that 'his own home' (Jn 19<sup>27</sup>) was in Galilee rather than in the capital, in which case there would be an explanation of the Apostle's absence at the time of Paul's first visit to the city (Gal 1<sup>18-19</sup>). It is but conjecture, however, which fixes the date of his final departure from Jerusalem, though we know that he was not there when Paul came for the last time (Ac 21<sup>18</sup>), and that the signs of the impending destruction of the city caused all the Christians to retire to Pella, c. 68 A.D. (Eus. HE iii. 5. 3). It is of more moment to inquire why he should go to Ephesus, and in answer two reasons may be given: (a) the importance of this city as a centre for missionary activity; and (b) the necessity of carrying on and developing the work of Paul. In the latter part of the 1st cent. 'the Church's centre of gravity was no longer at Jerusalem; it was not yet at Rome; it was at Ephesus' (Thiersch, quoted by Godet, Com. on John, vol. i. p. 45). Not only within the borders of this city had Christianity made a marked impression, but all about were cities in which the Church had been established. The seven letters in the Apocalypse enable us to see what ceaseless vigilance and intelligent care were needed to protect these Churches from error in doctrine, and to keep them faithful in life. No louder call for Apostolic service could be given than this part of the world was then giving, and, as far as tradition is concerned, there can be little doubt that John responded to this call. Just at this point, however, criticism, in the interest of its discussions regarding the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, has taken its stand, and tried to make it appear that tradition is untrustworthy. The Ephesian residence of John is therefore a critical matter, and as such must be given somewhat extended attention. The main witnesses for the common tradition are Irenaeus, Polycrates (Bishop of Ephesus), and Clement of Alexandria.

(a) Irenaeus bears repeated testimony to the Apostle's presence in Asia, and says explicitly:

'Afterwards' (i.e. after the first three) John the disciple of the Lord, who also lay on His breast, likewise published a Gospel while dwelling at Ephesus' (adv. Haer. iii. 1). Polycarp was not only instructed by the Apostles, and had intercourse with many who had seen Christ, but he was also initiated by the Apostles as Bishop in Asia in the Church at Smyrna. 'We also saw him (Polycarp) in our earliest youth, for he lived very long, and left this life at a great age, having suffered a glorious and brilliant martyrdom, and having always taught what he had learned from the Apostles.' Also the Church at Ephesus, founded by Paul, and with which John lived till Trajan's time (98-117), 'is a truthful witness to the tradition of the Apostles' (ib. iii. 3, 4). In a letter to Florinus, a part of which has been preserved by Eusebius (HE v. 20), Irenaeus tells of his vivid recollections of Polycarp. The way of the venerable martyr's life, his bodily form, the discourses he gave to the people, and the account which he gave of his intercourse with John and with the rest who had seen the Lord, were clearer to him (Irenaeus) in memory than many recent experiences. Again, when Victor the Bishop of Rome excommunicated the Quartodeciman Churches, Irenaeus wrote admonishing the Bishop, and, in the course of what he had to say, referred to the difference between Anicetus and Polycarp over the Paschal question, in these words: 'Anicetus could not persuade Polycarp not to observe what he had always observed with John the disciple of our Lord and the other Apostles with whom he had associated' (Eus. HE v. 24).

The value of all this testimony is enhanced when one marks the overlapping of lives which is here evident. Polycarp suffered martyrdom in the year A.D. 155 at the age of 86. He was born, therefore, in the year 69. If John lived until Trajan's time, it were easily possible for the two to have associated with each other. Irenaeus while a boy (12-18 years of age) listened with peculiar and observant attentiveness to Polycarp. These three names cover over a century. They link together in such a manner the experiences of personal associations and reverent memories that the evidence for John's presence in Ephesus seems well-nigh conclusive. Its cogency, however, is supposed to be greatly weakened by two important considerations: (a) the silence among older writers regarding the Ephesian residence, and (b) the possible confusion, on the part of Irenaeus, of John the Apostle with John the Presbyter. At first sight the silence of Polycarp and Ignatius is surprising, but it is not beyond explanation. Polycarp's letter is to the Philippian Church, and calls for no reference to John. The absence of all mention of the Apostle in the Epistle of Ignatius to the Ephesians is not so easy to account for, but an argument from silence is precarious when one considers how sparingly he brings in even the name of Paul. It is apparently the similarity of their fortunes which leads him to speak of this Apostle at all, for just as Paul had sent for the elders of the Ephesian Church to meet him at Miletus on his way to imprisonment in Rome, so Ignatius at Smyrna received a delegation from Ephesus (Ephes. 12). This would exclude any reference to John; and in view of all other evidence, it can be as certainly affirmed, as it can be denied, that the general reference in the previous section covers the name of John. This reference is, 'May I be found in the lot of the Christians of Ephesus, who have always been of the same mind with the Apostles through the power of Jesus Christ' (Ephes. 11). When, moreover, one takes into account the scantiness of the remains of this early period, the probable growth of John's reputation during the 2nd century, and the prevalence in the Ignatian Epistles themselves of a Johannine type of teaching (see von der Goltz's 'Ignatius von Antiochien als Christ und Theolog' in TU, Bd. xii. [1894]), the argument from silence loses much of its force. The other consideration urged against the testimony of Irenaeus is really a seconding of the correction made by Eusebius of the declaration of Irenaeus that 'Papias was a hearer of John and a companion of Polycarp' (adv. Haer. v. 33. 4).* The words of Eusebius are found in his History, iii. 39. After quoting the above words from Irenaeus, he says, 'But Papias himself by no means declares that he was himself a hearer and eye-witness of the holy Apostles'; and then he goes on to infer that it was the Presbyter John who was meant in the statement of Irenaeus. This brings us to the examination of the witness of Papias in his bearing upon the whole question. In his preface to his Expositions of the Oracles of the Lord he says:

* This objection is urged by Keim, Harnack, Holtzmann, and other modern critics in their discussion of the authorship of John's Gospel.

But I shall not hesitate also to put down for you along with my interpretations whatsoever things I have at any time learned carefully from the elders and carefully remembered, guaranteeing their truth. For I did not, like the multitude, take pleasure in those that speak much, but in those that speak the truth; not in those that relate strange commandments, but in those that deliver the commandments given by the Lord to faith and springing from the truth itself. If, then, anyone came who had been a follower of the elders, I questioned him in regard to the words of the elders—what Andrew or what Peter said, or what was said by Philip, or by Thomas, or by James, or by John, or by Matthew, or by any other of the disciples of the Lord, and what things Aristion and the presbyter John, the disciples of the Lord, say. For I did not think that what was to be gotten from the books would profit me as much as what came from the living and abiding voice' (Eus. HE iii. 39).

A just interpretation of these words must allow for a distinction between the Apostle John and the Presbyter John, but the inference based on the tense of the verb in the sentence, 'What things Aristion and the Presbyter John, the disciples of the Lord, say,'—that Papias was actually a hearer of the Presbyter,—is very questionable. Much discussion has been given to the import of this latter part of Papias' preface. A thoroughly satisfactory understanding is, however, that which makes these words we have just quoted refer not to the spoken witness, but to the written testimony of Aristion and the Presbyter John.* In his search for enlightenment Papias inquired after the unwritten sayings of all referred to except Aristion and John the Presbyter. In their case his inquiry was concerning their written sayings about which there might be some doubt. 'The books,' bearing possibly such titles as 'Narratives of Aristion,' or 'Traditions of the Presbyter John,' needed confirmation by competent witnesses. Papias had not the same confidence in them as in oral reports. Points which confirm this understanding are (1) the hesitation of Eusebius about his own inference that Papias was an actual hearer of John the Presbyter ('at least he mentions them frequently by name, and gives their traditions in writing' [HE iii. 39]); (2) the suggested antitheses in the phrases 'his own writing' and 'unwritten tradition,' which are found in the accounts of the sources of Papias later on in the same section (HE iii. 39); 'The same author has communicated also other things that came to him as from unwritten tradition'; 'but he also commits to his own writing other narratives of the sayings of the Lord of the aforesaid Aristion and traditions of the Presbyter John'. 'His own writing' suggests somebody else's writing; the 'unwritten tradition' suggests written tradition. If this interpretation of the words of Papias be true, then it affords no evidence that Papias was a hearer of the Presbyter John. Indeed, it does not require us to think that he was living at the time the words of Papias were written, or that he was even ever in Ephesus at all. The only support we have for this last supposition is Dionysius of Alexandria, who in the interests of the authorship of the Apocalypse by some other John than the Apostle cites the tradition that 'there are two monuments in Ephesus, each bearing the name of John.'

We come back now to Irenæus. The statement which he makes regarding the relationship of Papias to the Apostle John and to Polycarp is not derived from the preface of Papias (see above), and if there is no possible confusion in the two Johns, we need only ask what value the positive statement of Irenæus really has. Recall for a moment his reference to Polycarp. If these words are true, and there is no reason to doubt them, then it was no mere passing acquaintance which Irenæus had with Polycarp. He had carefully observed him, and attentively listened to his discourses. Can it be possible that he understood him, whenever he spoke of John, to be referring to John the Presbyter, and was Polycarp himself talking of his intercourse with John the Presbyter? Such confusion as this on the part of men so intimately related is quite improbable. Certainly it is equally improbable that, at the early time of Polycarp, John the Presbyter should have become such a figure in Ephesus that Polycarp could speak of him exactly as if he were John the Apostle. There is therefore no sufficient reason for doubting the testimony of Irenæus.

(b) In turning to the witness of Polycrates, it is well to note that he was Bishop of Ephesus, had seven relatives who were bishops, and was at the time of his letter to Victor, Bishop of Rome, an old enough man to have been living at the time of Polycarp. He was therefore in a position to know fully whereof he wrote. This fact of the continuity of experiences as lying behind these several testimonies needs repeated emphasis. In his letter to Victor (see Eus. HE v. 24) he is writing upon the Quartodeciman question, and citing his authorities for the observance of the 'fourteenth day of the Passover according to the Gospel.' Among these he places 'John, who was both a witness and a teacher who reclined upon the bosom of the Lord, and being a priest wore the sacerdotal plate. He fell asleep at Ephesus.'

The reference to one 'who reclined upon the bosom of the Lord' seems to point unmistakably to the Apostle, but two statements of Polycrates seem to some to run counter to this: (1) That he was a priest and wore the sacerdotal plate (2<sup>a</sup> version). From the fact that Epphianus (Her. xvii. 34) says the name of James the brother of the Lord, it is probably a purely figurative statement, indicating the exalted and revered position of these men among their Christian brethren. (2) The other counter-statement is derived from the notice given of Philip in this same letter. It is claimed that Polycrates has clearly confused the Apostles and Evangelists, hence he may have in the same way confused John the Apostle with John the Presbyter. The whole question turns upon the allusion to the daughters of Philip. Briefly stated, the disputed evidence is this. Papias, the earliest witness, places Philip among the Apostles (HE iii. 39). Then he goes on to relate a wonderful tale which he heard from the daughters of Philip. There is no indication whatever that this is not the same Philip just referred to. Polycrates now follows with his testimony that among those who had died in Asia was 'Philip, one of the Twelve Apostles, who sleeps in Hierapolis, and his two virgin daughters and another daughter who lived in the Holy Spirit and now rests at Ephesus' (HE iii. 31). Again the reference to the Apostle is clear. Clement of Alexandria declares that the Apostles Peter and Philip had children, and that Philip gave his daughters to husbands (Strom. ii. 6). From all this it is clear that the Apostle Philip had daughters. So far there seems to be no confusion. If this comes in at all, it appears in a statement of Proclus, who, speaking of the death of Philip and his daughters, says: 'After this arose four prophetesses, the daughters of Philip, at Hierapolis in Asia. Their tomb is there, and the tomb of their father' (HE iii. 31). The close resemblance of this record to the statement in Ac 21<sup>9</sup> makes it appear that the Evangelist is referred to, but even if the identification of the two Philips be here allowed, it is made comparatively late, and need not involve Polycrates. 'The report of Polycrates deserves our credence rather than that of Proclus, because, in the first place, Polycrates was earlier than Proclus; in the second place, because his report is more exact, and it is hard to imagine how, if all four were buried in one place, the more detailed report of Polycrates could have arisen, while on the other hand it is quite easy to explain the rise of the more general but incorrect account of Proclus' (McCliffert on Eusebius, in loc.). It should be noted also that we have in Polycrates, as a contemporary of Irenæus, an independent witness.

(c) It is in connexion with the story of the young convert who subsequently became a robber that Clement of Alexandria speaks of John's residence in Asia. The value of this testimony lies in the fact that Clement, in gathering memoranda to be 'stored up against old age as a remedy against forgetfulness,' had collected traditions handed down 'from the holy Apostles Peter, James, John, and Paul, the sons receiving it from the father.' As Drummond says of this witness, 'It seems probable that we have here a distinct line of tradition which affords independent confirmation of the statements of Irenæus and Polycrates.' The clearness, positiveness, and fullness of the witness of these three, taken together with the personal relations involved, affords adequate basis for the general belief of the Church that in the latter part of his life John made his home in Ephesus.

2. Regarding John's banishment to Patmos.—The discussion of the deliverances of tradition in regard to John's exile in Patmos is vitally connected with the authorship of the Apocalypse (see art. 'John, Gospel of,' in Hastings' DB ii. 707 ff.). The references to this fact are quite numerous in the Fathers, and begin with Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 190). Tertullian, Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Jerome all speak of it, but do not agree as to the time of it. Epiphanius (Hær. 12) assigns it to the reign of Claudius, while Clement of Alexandria, Eusebius, and Jerome place it in the reign of Domitian. Internal evidence from the Apocalypse itself favours an early time, while tradition is explicit about the later date. All testimonies to the exile are probably based upon the statement found in Rev 1<sup>9</sup>, and this gives no real foundation for any banishment at all. If John was in Patmos, it may be that he went thither, as Weiss supposes, to find a religious retreat, or, as others think, to avoid persecution.

3. Regarding John's death.—In accord with the statement of Irenæus that 'John remained among them (the disciples) in Asia up to the time of Trajan' (adv. Hær. ii. 22), it has been generally believed that the Apostle lived to ripe old age, and died quietly in Ephesus. Of late this opinion has been earnestly disputed, on the basis of a statement found in the Chronicle of Georgius Hamartolos (9th cent.), which reads, 'Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, declares in the second book of the Oracles of the Lord that John was put to death by the Jews.' This testimony has been confirmed by the de Boor Fragment, which expressly says that Papias tells in his second book of the death of James and John at the hands of the Jews. Of course, if John the Apostle died in this way, there is nothing left but to take some other John as the John of Ephesus; and all the testimony of Irenæus, Polycrates, and Clement of Alexandria has a confusion of names underlying it; also the John of the Apostolic council (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>) was not the son of Zebedee. All this is by no means likely. Various attempts have been made to account for the record of Georgius—such as Lightfoot's supposition of a lacuna, which was later filled in as we now have it (see Essay on Supernatural Religion, p. 211 ff.); or Zahn's (Forssch. vi. 147-151) of an interpolation, and that Papias was really referring to the Baptist; but the more probable explanation is that the statement arose from a desire to find a fulfilment of Mk 10<sup>38-39</sup>, and a mistaken interpretation of the word μαρτυρῶν, which in its earlier sense did not necessarily involve death. It is certainly not easy to understand why Eusebius and others ignored the fact, if such it was.

Thus far we have sought to get at the real facts of tradition. It will surprise no one to know that the life of one so eminent as John was embellished with all manner of legends, such as his meeting with Cerinthus in the bath-house at Ephesus (adv. Hær. iii. 3, 4); his being carried in extreme old age to the church, and saying, 'Little children, love one another' (Jerome, Com. ad Gal. vi. 11); his recovery of the young robber from his life of shame (Eus. HE iii. 23); his immersion in a caldron of boiling oil (Tert. Præscript. Hær. ch. xxvi.); and a number of others. Some of them may have germs of truth in them. They all seek in some way to illustrate the noble character of the man, or to interpret the prophecy of the Gospels regarding his earthly destiny.

iii. THE CHARACTER OF JOHN.—It is commonly thought that John was of a gentle, contemplative nature, and almost effeminate in character. Contemplative he was, and the Gospel is but an expression of his profound meditation upon the character and work of his Master; but a moment's reflexion upon some of the scenes of the Gospels (see Mt 20<sup>28-29</sup>, Lk 9<sup>55-56</sup>), in correspondence with which are some of the legends regarding his later life, will show that this Apostle was, at least in earlier life, impetuous, intolerant, and ambitious. Doubtless he was effectively moulded by the Spirit of Christ during his long discipleship, but he was always stern and uncompromising in his hatred of evil and in his defence of truth. He loved with a strong, passionate devotion, and he hated all wrong and untruth as only one can who understands as profoundly as he did the significance of his Lord and His teaching. Because of his profound understanding, he writes as one who has an immediate perception of truth. He does not reason as does Paul. He saw 'the King in his beauty,' or, to use his own words, 'the glory of the only-begotten of the Father' (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>). His strength and devotion made him courageous; his affection and sympathy made him tender and abundantly helpful. His was the finest type of strong manhood made beautiful by spiritual purity.

Literature.

Introduction.—It is important to remember that the Kingdom of Christ was in being before the Gospel records were written. They did not originate the institution, but are themselves the expression of it. Previous to the publication of the Johannine Gospel, which is the latest of the four, St. Paul had completed his mission to the Gentiles; and in Ephesus, where the Gospel was written, his doctrine had already an assured place in the Christian Church. It is therefore historically untrue to say that faith in the Divine Person and work of Jesus is destroyed if the authenticity of the Fourth Gospel cannot be proved. For the basis of our faith we must dig deeper than the results of critical investigation.

The question, however, of the authorship of this Gospel is more than a merely academic one. It occupies a unique position. None of the other three claims to be written by the man whose name it bears, but the Fourth Gospel is issued with an explicit statement to that effect (21<sup>24</sup>). Moreover, its contents are vitally connected with the individuality of the author. The very way in which his identity is studiously concealed shows that the writer is himself conscious that the Gospel contains a personal testimony, which he does not hesitate to present as objective and impersonal. We desire to know who it is that claims to be an eye-witness; who it is that narrates events and discourses of Jesus so distinct in character from the Synoptics, and yet meant to occupy a place alongside these without contradiction; who it is that has so boldly mingled historic fact and ideal conceptions, that has given to the Person of Christ a timeless cosmic significance, and has represented our Lord in His acts and in His words as Himself justifying that impression and those claims. If, as is certain, the work is influenced by developed theological conceptions, and reflects the contemporary historical situation of the Christian Church, we desire to be certain that the writer was in a position not seriously to misrepresent the actual facts. This is no merely antiquarian question. There can be no doubt that the Gospel is intended to be read as the work of the Apostle, and it would seriously detract from its value, if, as extreme critics are more and more inclined to allow, that claim means only that it contains a nucleus of Johannine tradition. The same objection applies to all partition theories of the Gospel (e.g. Wendt's), and it is assumed in this article that their authors have failed to prove their case. If, on the other hand, the writer was the beloved disciple, an eye-witness possessing a specially intimate knowledge of the mind and character of Jesus, we have an assurance that when, for example, he wrote the opening sentences of the Gospel, he felt himself in touch not merely with current theological thought, but with the historic fact of the consciousness of Jesus of Nazareth. So far from being a stumbling-block to the Johannine authorship, the Prologue even gains in value and significance with the acceptance of the traditional view. The striking juxtaposition in the Prologue of the timeless Logos idea and the historical witness of the Baptist, to whom the conception was unfamiliar, and the frequent mention of the Baptist throughout the Gospel, even at times when the situation scarcely demands it (e.g. 10<sup>40-42</sup>), are saved from abruptness only if the writer is developing an impression made on him by his earliest teacher, who led him to Christ. His experience stretches in one continuous whole from that time to this when he begins to write.

I. EXTERNAL EVIDENCE FOR THE AUTHORSHIP OF THE FOURTH GOSPEL.—The face of the Johannine problem has greatly changed since the days of Baur and his school. The prophecy of Lightfoot, that 'we may look forward to the time when it will be held discreditable to the reputation of any critic for sobriety and judgment to assign to this Gospel any later date than the end of the first century or the very beginning of the second,' has been amply fulfilled. 80-110 A.D. may be regarded as the termini a quo and ad quem for the date of the writing, and the trend of modern opinion is towards the end of the 1st century. This result makes it desirable to throw the emphasis in a less degree on the external evidence for an early date, and in a greater degree on the evidence for the Apostolic authorship. If, however, the problem of external evidence be presented in this form, we must guard ourselves against a certain feeling of disappointment at the meagre results. In the first place, there is no evidence that the Apostolic authorship was contested in the 2nd cent. except by the Alogi; and none that it was ever debated. The questions that agitated the mind of the Church in this period seem to have been entirely doctrinal (Gnosticism and Montanism). Again, it is not until the latter part of the century that there are indications of a distinct value attached to each separate Gospel. Εὐαγγέλιον was the term employed to denote the general contents of those books that embodied the facts concerning the life and teaching of our Lord, and we first find the term εὐαγγέλιον in Justin (Apol. i. lxvi.). The contrast between the Synoptics and John in this period arose entirely from the differences in subject-matter, and there is no indication that the Fourth Gospel was set on a lower plane of authority.

One remarkable fact in connexion with the external evidence is that none of the writers in question ever actually calls St. John an Apostle. This fact is never lost sight of by opponents of the Apostolic authorship. It is true that Irenaeus speaks of 'John and the other Apostles'; but in referring to St. John alone he always calls him 'the disciple.' This is in accordance with the usage of the Fourth Gospel itself, where the title ἀπόστολος is only once used (20<sup>3</sup>), and there in a sense that seems to depreciate any presumptuous or meretricious claim to official position. If such claims were rife in Ephesus, perhaps St. John himself preferred to be known as 'disciple' (cf. H. T. Pugh, Johann. Probleme and Modern Needs, ch. iii.).

We shall now proceed to examine in detail, working backwards from the end of the 2nd cent., the evidence of those Ecclesiastical writers who have made direct or indirect reference to the Fourth Gospel.

A group of writers in the last quarter of the 2nd cent. whose geographical distribution over the Christian Church gives evidence of a widespread tradition.

(1) Irenaeus was bishop of Lyons in Gaul. His work entitled Against Heresies has come down to us, and in the writings of Eusebius we possess other fragments. An important letter to Florinus has also been preserved. The date of his literary activity may be put within the limits 173-190. He explicitly attributes the Fourth Gospel to the Apostle, and gives it a place alongside Matthew, Mark, and Luke. He says that 'John, the disciple of the Lord, who leaned upon His breast,' wrote it 'while dwelling in Ephesus, the city of Asia' (adv. Her. iii. i. 1). Stress is also to be laid on the fact that Irenaeus speaks of the Gospels not merely as Apostolic, but also as inspired by the Holy Spirit. For him the tradition of the fourfold Gospel, which he supports strongly, has passed into a deep spiritual fact, which he seeks to establish, not by bringing forward proofs of authorship, but in his well-known mystic fashion. 'The gospel is the Divine breath or word of life for men; there are four chief winds; therefore four Gospels.' He brings forward other analogies, all of which are equally fanciful, but serve to show that this firm belief in the fourfold Gospel as a Divine arrangement could not have been a creation of his own mind, but represents a tradition of considerable antiquity. The opinion of Irenaeus is corroborated by a contemporary letter written by the members of the Churches at Vienna and Lyons to the brethren in Asia Minor during the time of persecution in 177. Thus Irenaeus is in touch with the living Church around him.

(2) Clement of Alexandria is the author of a statement preserved by Eusebius (HE vi. 14), which professes to represent 'the tradition of the Presbyters from the first (πρώτων τῶν ἀρχαίων ἀποστόλων) that John, last, having observed that the bodily things (σωματικά, i.e. the simple facts relating to the life and teaching of Christ) had been set forth in the Gospels, on the exhortation of his friends (σφόδρα), inspired by the Spirit, produced a spiritual Gospel.' From about 189, Clement was head of the celebrated catechetical school at Alexandria. His great reverence for his teacher Pantenus, who also preceded him in office, may fairly be regarded as indicating that he represents the ecclesiastical tradition at Alexandria. He was also in living touch with opinion at other centres. He travelled in Greece, Magna Graecia, Syria, and the East, expressly for the purpose of collecting information about the Apostolic tradition. In his extant writings he quotes words from all the four Gospels, regards them as possessing Divine authority, and lays great emphasis on the differences between them and other writings professing to be Gospels.

(3) Tertullian was a famous theologian of the Western Church, and was born at Carthage about 160. The style of his writing suggests that he was trained as an advocate. He was reputed a man of great learning. Jerome speaks of his 'eager and vehement disposition,' and his habit of mind is in striking contrast to the philosophic temper of Clement. It is needless to quote passages from his writings, as he undoubtedly assumes without question the genuineness of the Gospel, and lays under contribution every chapter. Little is known of his personal life, but he was certainly in touch with theological opinion, not only at Carthage, but also at Rome. In the line of argument that he adopts in his reply to Marcion he is concerned above all else to show that the doctrine of the Church is in line with Apostolic tradition. He makes appeal in another writing, de Præscriptione Hæreticorum, to the testimony of those Churches that were founded by Apostles, or to whom Apostles declared their mind in letters. Among these he mentions Ephesus, evidently in connexion with the name of St. John. His term for the fourfold Gospel is a legal term, Evangelicum Instrumentum, i.e. a valid document finally declaring the mind of the Church with regard to spiritual truth. He became a distinguished leader of the Montanists, and would on that account be predisposed to contest any objection, if it had been urged, against the authenticity of the Gospel. At the same time, he is not indifferent to questions of literary criticism, applied to the Gospels. In his reply to Marcion he makes careful and scholarly investigation into the text of St. Luke, and is able to prove that Marcion's Gospel is a mutilated copy.

(4) The Muratorian Fragment on the Canon.—This fragment contains the earliest known list of the books that were regarded at the date at which it was written as canonical. It was published in the year 1740 by an Italian scholar, Muratori.

Lightfoot, Westcott, and others argue for a date 150-175; but Salmon, Zahn, and Harnack agree in placing its date, from internal evidence, not earlier than A.D. 200. Sanday, in his Gospels in the Second Century (pp. 264-266), suggests 170-180, and perhaps within ten years later. Stanton, in The Gospels as Historical Documents (p. 247, n. 1), inclines to the later date.

The writer gives an account of the origin of the Fourth Gospel which is plainly legendary. The important statement in it is that the Gospel is the work of St. John (Johannes ex discipulis), who is also the author of at least two of the Epistles (in suis epistolis). The further statement is made that he resolved to write it after a fast had been held, and at the request of contemporary Christians (cohortantibus condiscipulis et episcopis suis), and the concurrence is also claimed of the rest of the Apostles (recognoscentibus cunctis). The second statement seems, like the epistola of Clement, to be founded on Jn 1st and 21st, and possesses no independent value, except as an interpretation of internal evidence.

The object of the author was clearly controversial, 'to draw a broad line of separation between the inspired writings of the Apostolic age and modern additions' (Salmon, Introduction, p. 46). He strongly protests, for example, against the inclusion of Hermas in the Canon, though he has no objection to its being 'read.' Bacon (Hibbert Journal, April 1903) has interpreted the Muratorian Fragment as indicating the existence of controversy in the Church at that date as to the Apostolic authorship; but the emphasis on that question might easily be explained by the fact that the historicity—the varia principia of the Gospels—was alone in question. There is no attempt to harmonize the statements in the various Gospels; but it is sought to secure for the contents of the Fourth Gospel a place of equal authority with the other three.

Throughout the whole history of the NT Canon the admission of a book was not decided solely on the question of authorship, but far more on the general consideration whether its teaching was congruent with the received doctrine of the Church. Salmon thinks that the writer of the Muratorian Fragment is arguing against the Montanists, and Zahn and Drummond that he is opposing the Alogi (see below). The legendary account of the origin of the Gospel would seem to indicate that the fact of the Apostolic authorship was already well established and well known. An additional confirmation of the view that the historicity alone is within the purview of the writer is that the words of the First Epistle (it is true in a somewhat inaccurate rendering), 'What we have seen with our eyes, and heard with our ears, and our hands have handled, these things we have written' (hæc scripsimus), are quoted as a reference by the author to his Gospel.

(5) Theophilus, bishop of Antioch (c. A.D. 180), wrote, among other works, a defence of Christianity, addressed to Autolytus, 'a real or imaginary heathen friend of wide learning and high culture' (Watkins). He is the earliest writer of the 2nd cent., who, while quoting a passage from the Gospel (1st), also refers to St. John by name. His words are, 'We are taught by the Holy Scriptures and all Spirit-bearing men, among whom John says'; and then follow verbatim quotations from the Prologue to the Gospel. There are also other sentences in his work that recall the Fourth Gospel. It is significant also, as belying any appearance of controversy as to the authorship of the Gospel, that he introduces the name of St. John in this quite incidental fashion. Commentaries on the Gospels are also attributed to him, but their genuineness, upheld by Zahn, is assailed by Harnack. This part of his evidence must at present be set aside.

2. Justin Martyr.—The works of Justin that are relevant in this connexion are the two Apologies and the Dialogue with Trypho the Jew. They may be set within the limits A.D. 140-161. Palestine was his birthplace, and he was brought up in the religion of his father, who was a heathen. He was an ardent student of philosophy, and after an unsatisfying experience of various teachers he ultimately became a Platonist. After his conversion to Christianity, of which he gives a full account in Trypho, II.-viii., he was 'kindled with love to Christ,' and consecrated his philosophic attainments to the defence of the Christian religion.

Among the authorities to which Justin refers in the course of his writings, he gives an important place to 'The Memoirs of Christ, composed by the Apostles and those who followed them.' The battle of criticism still rages around the question whether Justin includes in these Memoirs only the four Gospels. It may now, at least, be regarded as settled amongst all classes of critics that Justin makes use of the Gospel (cf. Schmiedel, Encyc. Bibl., art. 'John, Son of Zebedee,' ii. 2546). It is not so generally admitted that he includes it among his Memoirs of the Apostles. Those, however, who deny that Justin regarded the Gospel as the work of the Apostle are laid under the necessity of explaining how his contemporary Irenæus could be so assured that the Gospel is a genuine Apostolic work.

(1) Quotations.—The locus classicus in Justin is the passage on Baptism (Apol. I. lxi.). He describes how those who are about to make a Christian profession

'are brought by us where there is water, and are born again in the same manner in which we ourselves are born again. For in the name of God the Father and Lord of the universe, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit, they then receive the washing with water. For Christ also said, "Except ye be born again, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." (ὅτι μὴ ἀναγεννηθέντες, οὐ μὴ εἰσέλθετε εἰς τὸν βασιλείου τοῦ οὐρανοῦ).

Now that it is impossible for those who have once been born to enter into their mother's wombs, is manifest to all.

This passage immediately recalls Jn 3rd. The language, however, reveals some striking variations from the text of the Gospel. No one would now endorse the verdict of the author of Supernatural Religion, that 'there does not exist a single linguistic trace by which the passage in Justin can be connected with the Fourth Gospel.' It may be conceded that some of his expressions have more than an accidental relationship with Mt 18th. Justin certainly uses ἀναγεννηθῆναι ('born again') instead of γεννηθῆναι ἄνωθεν ('born from above') of the Fourth Gospel, but this variation is at least a possible rendering of the Johannine expression. There are, however, other linguistic differences. The difficulty is increased by the discovery that in the Clementine Homilies (xl, 26) there is a passage containing similar linguistic deviations from the Gospel. Has their author copied Justin, or does the similarity point to the use by both of a common source other than the Gospel? The fact that the context in each is quite different excludes the first hypothesis, and the second may well be viewed as improbable, until the alleged common source—that 'ghost-like' Gospel of which Volkmar speaks—has emerged from the place of shades, and embodied itself in a MS (cf. Drummond, Character and Authorship, pp. 88-96).

It ought to be sufficient to establish the high probability, amounting to certainty, that Justin notes Jn 3rd, that, giving due weight to linguistic differences, the Fourth Gospel is the only source known to us from which he could have derived such ideas. The idea of birth as applied to spiritual change is found in none of the Gospels but St. John; and it is significant that both Justin and St. John expressly connected this thought with the rite of Baptism. As regards the impossibility of a second physical birth, it is to be noted that this somewhat wistful, and, at the same time, wilfully absurd, objection of Nicodemus—which in the Gospel is the symptom of a heart profoundly moved, and has a living place in the context—is precisely reproduced by Justin. This is evidently the result of a familiar association of ideas derived from the passage in Jn 3. The words, 'for Christ also said,' introduce the quotation, and the document from which it is taken is clearly looked upon as an authoritative source for the words of Christ.

Justin has other correspondences with the peculiar thought of the Fourth Gospel. He uses the title μωυσηϊς of Christ, and in the next sentence speaks of the Virgin-Birth (Dialogue 105), adding the words, 'as we have learned from the Memoirs.' This seems to point to a combination of St. John and the Synoptics. Justin has also made much use of the thought of the Logos Gospel in his doctrine of the Logos, and his teaching on that subject is influenced by the theology of the Gospel. It is sometimes urged as an objection that Justin does not make more use of the authority of the Gospel in his teaching about the Logos, but this is to presuppose that the thought was first suggested to him by that source. Justin's philosophy is filled with Alexandrine ideas, but the thought of the Incarnation of the Logos of which Justin makes use is found only in St. John (Apol. 1, 32). The Johannine expressions φῶς, σὺς are also found in Justin.

On the question of the relationship between Justin and the fragment of the Gospel of Peter, discovered in 1892, see Hastings' DB iii, 535; Drummond, Character and Authorship, pp. 151-155. The evidence is insufficient to prove that this Gospel is one of Justin's Memoirs. Loisy and Harnack hold that the Gospel of Peter is dependent on the Fourth Gospel, to whose existence it would therefore be the most ancient witness. The date of the Gospel of Peter is put c. 110-130 by Loisy (Le Quatrième Évangile, p. 16) and Harnack (Chron. 1, 625).

(2) His use of the Gospel.—Another consideration is adduced to prove that Justin did not regard the Gospel as an authority on the same level as the Synoptics, and therefore viewed it as non-Apostolic. Schmiedel (Encyc. Bibl., art. 'John, Son of Zebedee,' ii, 254b) states that 'his employment of it is not only more sparing but also more circumspect' than his use of the Synoptics. There are occasions on which it would be open to him to use it in proof of his doctrine of the Logos and of the pre-existence of Christ. Why has Justin not used the Fourth Gospel more? It is perfectly relevant to reply that we do not know, and perhaps never shall know, with complete certainty. At the same time, there are certain considerations that ought to be borne in mind. Justin is certainly the first writer who displays the tendency to attach a separate value to the four Gospels; he is the first to speak of εὐαγγέλιον instead of εὐαγγέλιον; but he can scarcely be expected to have completely emancipated himself, at this transition stage, from the older conception of the gospel as embracing equally the contents of the four. Justin's purpose and his audience must be borne in mind, and these would insensibly lead him to rely mostly on the Synoptic Gospels. It is specially noticeable that the witness of Christ to Himself, so prominent in the Fourth Gospel, is nowhere used by Justin as an argument, and in one place in the Dialogue with Trypho (ch. 18) he even apologizes for citing the words of Christ alongside the words of the prophets. His Apologies are addressed to the Emperor, Senate, and People of Rome, and to quote to them the Christian writings in proof of Christian doctrine would have been to reason in a circle. Moreover, it may be suggested that not even at that date was the Gospel regarded as, strictly speaking, historical, and its spiritual or reflective character rendered it hardly so suitable for Justin's purpose as the Synoptics.

(3) Evidence as to Apostolic authorship.—Is there any evidence in Justin that he attributed the authorship to St. John the Apostle? In the first place, if the Memoirs are composed of our four Gospels, we may answer the question with certainty in the affirmative. Justin describes them as composed by 'the Apostles and those that followed them,' a description which tallies completely with the four Evangelists. The plural 'Apostles' could be used only if he believed in the Apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel. Again, the strongest argument adduced against Justin's evidence is still the argument from his silence as to the name of the author. It seems, however, to have been the custom among apologists not to mention the Evangelists by their names, which would carry no weight with unbelievers. Moreover, it has been pointed out that Justin never mentions the name of St. Paul, although it is certain that at least four of his Epistles from which he quotes are of undoubted authenticity. Justin once names St. John as the author of Revelation (Dialogue 81), but 'he nowhere quotes this work, which he regarded as inspired, apostolic, prophetic, though it contains so much which might seem to favour his view of the person of Christ' (Ezra Abbot, p. 61). In the passage he speaks of the author as one whose name is not likely to carry weight ('a certain man with us, whose name was John'), but it is essential to his argument, in thus making use of a Revelation or Vision, that he should mention the recipient. (Cf. Stanton, Gospels as Historical Documents, i, p. 89).

3. Tatian was a native of Syria, and, like Justin, travelled as a wandering philosopher. His conversion to Christianity took place at Rome about A.D. 150. He became a disciple of Justin, during whose lifetime he wrote the Oratio ad Græcos. After Justin's death in 166, Tatian taught in Rome, and ultimately adopted a heretical position. He died about A.D. 180.

Tatian clearly quotes the Gospel in his Oratio, which was written perhaps as early as 153 (so Zahn and Harnack), although he does not refer to the author by name. The important work, however, for our purpose is the Diatessaron. It is a compendium of the Life and Teaching of our Lord, founded on our four Gospels, and containing also some material taken from the Apocryphal Gospels. The book had apparently an ancient place in the worship of the Syrian Churches. Theodoret, bishop of Cyrillus, near the Euphrates, in 459, tells how he found more than 200 copies of the work in the churches of his district. These he collected and, with considerable difficulty, put away, substituting for them the four Gospels.

The Diatessaron includes the whole of the Fourth Gospel, except 1st, the first half of 2nd, the Pericope Adultera, and some other passages that are common to the Synoptics.

The significance of Tatian's work lies in the fact that an authoritative value is attached to the contents of our four Gospels, and that the Fourth Gospel is placed on a level with the Synoptics. Moreover, Tatian's use of the Fourth Gospel renders it very difficult to doubt that it was also one of the Memoirs of his contemporaries, Justin.

4. The Apostolic Fathers.—(1) Papias was bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia. Unfortunately his testimony has given rise to more questions about the Gospel than it solves. Only one or two fragments of his work preserved by Eusebius have come down to us. We know that in the time of Eusebius the only writing of Papias to which he had access was a work in five books, entitled 'Exposition(s) of the Oracles of the Lord' (Λογίων κυριακῶν ἐξηγήσεις [or -εις]). Cf. Drummond, op. cit. note 4, p. 195.

The 'Oracles' were probably a collection of sayings of our Lord, together with some kind of historical setting.

There is a tendency among modern critics to fix a later date than formerly for the writings of Papias. His written work seems not to have been produced till about the age of sixty. The change in the date is owing to the discovery of a fragment, purporting to contain statements by Papias, that was published by De Boor in 1888. It dates from the 7th or 8th cent., and is in turn probably based on the Chronicle of Philip of Sidé (c. A.D. 490). Among other matters it relates that those individuals who had been raised from the dead by Christ survived 'till the time of Hadrian.' Hadrian reigned 117-138, which compels us to fix a date for Papias' work not earlier than 140-160 (so Harnack, Drummond, and Schmiedel. Sanday in his most recent work, The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, includes the date of Papias among the 'unsolved problems'). The date of his martyrdom is also very uncertain.

Eusebius says that Papias 'evidently was a man of very mean capacity, as one may say, judging from his statements' (UE iii. 39). This judgment must be considered strictly in connexion with the context. Eusebius is speaking of his millenarian notions, and of the unimaginative way in which he interpreted the figurative language of the Apostolic writings. These defects do not reflect on his accuracy in matters of fact, but rather indicate a literalness and exactness which may at times be painful, but are yet a source of strength in the present discussion.

(i.) Papias is best known by the famous extract from the Preface to his work which is preserved by Eusebius:

'I will not hesitate to place before you, along with my interpretations of the Oracles of the Lord, everything that I carefully learned, and carefully remembered in time past from the elders, and I can guarantee its truth. For I take no pleasure, as do the many, in those who have so very much to say, but in those who teach the truth: nor in those who relate commandments foreign (to the mind of the Lord), but in those (who record) such as were given to the faith by the Lord, and found on the truth itself. Moreover, if I met with anyone on any occasion who had attended the elders, I used to inquire about the words of the elders; what Andrew or what Peter said, or what Philip, or what Thomas, or James or John or Matthew, or any other of the disciples of the Lord said, and what Aristion and the elder John, disciples of the Lord, say. For I was not inclined to suppose that statements made by the books would help me, so much as the utterances of a living and abiding voice' (UE iii. 39).

Several questions of moment are raised by these words of Papias.

(a) Who are the elders or presbyters of whom he speaks?—They clearly include the Apostles themselves, and Papias derives his information from their friends, i.e. those who not merely 'had followed them' in the literal sense, but had 'attended to' (παρακολουθήσας) their words. He is in search of direct oral tradition about the 'Oracles.' At the same time he mentions two, Aristion and John, who are not Apostles, and whom he regards as 'presbyters' or elders. He also designates the whole group as 'disciples of the Lord.' In the case of Aristion and the Presbyter John, μαθηταί is found only in one MS, and the preferable reading is to omit the article. In the first case, the use of the article with μαθητῶν means 'the disciples' specially known as such, and the key to the use of the term 'disciple' in the second case, is found in the statement of Ac 6th, where all those who were members of the first Christian community are called 'disciples.' The 'Elders,' then, signify all those men who were members of the primitive Christian Church who may or may not have followed the Lord Himself.

Irenæus has said that Papias was 'a hearer of John,' by whom he evidently means the Apostle. This would place him in immediate contact with the Apostolic circle. If, however, we are to rely only on the statements in the Preface, it is plain that Eusebius must be right when, in opposition to Irenæus, he says that 'Papias certainly does not declare that he himself was a hearer and eyewitness to the holy Apostles.' Yet even with the later date assigned to Papias, there is no chronological impossibility in his having known the Apostle; and it must not be forgotten that Irenæus was not necessarily dependent solely on the words of the Preface, but may have had other statements of Papias, or the living tradition of the Church, on which to found his assertion. If the position has to be surrendered that Papias was a 'hearer of John,' it is at least certain that he put himself in the most favourable position to hear clearly 'the living and abiding voice' of Apostolic times, conveyed to him through the 'friends' of the Elders.

(b) What can we determine regarding the nature and purpose of the work of Papias?—He contrasts his sources with 'those who have so very much to say' (τοῖς τὰ πολλὰ λέγουσιν), with 'those who relate commandments foreign to the mind of the Lord' (τοῖς τὰς ἀλλοτριὰς ἐπιβολὰς μνημονεύουσιν) and with 'the contents of the books' (τὰ ἐκ τῶν βιβλίων). 'The books' which he mentions have been interpreted as meaning some form of 'the Gospels' (Jülicher, Introd., Eng. tr. p. 487), and also as 'writings of Aristion and the Elder John' (Drummond and Bacon). In regard to the former interpretation, it seems out of the question that Papias should oppose 'the living and abiding voice' to the sources of his Logia. On the other hand, it is hardly likely that Papias would minimize the value of the oral evidence of Aristion and the Presbyter John by disparaging their written work. The simplest explanation is that given by Lightfoot (followed by Schwarz, Ueber den Tod der Sohne Zebédai, p. 11), that the exegetical commentaries on the Gospels written by Gnostics like Basilides are meant. It is to these also that he refers when he speaks of 'foreign commandments' and of 'those who have so very much to say.' Papias himself seems to have been a commentator on the 'Oracles of the Lord,' and seeks to support his own explanations (ἐξηγήσεις) by direct oral tradition from those who were in touch with the first Christian community.

(c) What position does the Presbyter John hold in Papias' view?—It is noticeable that while the past tense 'said' (εἶπεν) is used of the first group of Apostles, as though they were dead at the time of writing, the present tense 'say' (λέγουσιν) is used of Aristion and the Presbyter John. The entirely unconvincing explanation of Lightfoot, that the tense should probably be regarded as an historic present, introduced 'for the sake of variety,' must be rejected. On the other hand, the present tense seems rather meagre evidence on which to rest the hypothesis that books written by these two men were before Papias (so Drummond, Character and Authorship, p. 200), especially as he distinctly tells us that it is oral evidence of which he is in search. There is evidence in the writing of Papias that some literary productions of these men were extant, but the intention of Papias in his Preface seems to be to convey the impression that they were alive at the time he wrote. Papias had begun, at a much earlier time ('in time past'), to collect information from the elders, and had gone on doing so up to the time of writing. He means that Aristion and John are still available for anyone who wishes to check the authority of the explanations he gives.

The foregoing establishes the reality of the second John. It is no longer possible to regard the existence of the Presbyter 'as due to a confusion of Eusebius,' or to accuse Papias of 'lovenliness of composition,' which would lead us to suppose that two Johns are mentioned, while all the time he is only referring to the same man a second time. The question is debated by modern critics whether this Presbyter John has any connexion with the authorship of the Gospel. It is necessary only to indicate the grounds on which the suggestion is based. Eusebius, in the passage from which we have quoted (HE iii. 39), suggests that he is the author of Revelation. He controverts the statement of Irenaeus that Papias means to be looked upon as a hearer of the Apostle John, and gathers from the use of the present tense (ἔστυνεν) that he is really a hearer of Aristion and the Elder John. We have seen that in the time of Papias these two men were still alive, but the evidence as to his relationship with them rather suggests that he had not himself met them. Papias seems to have had to collect information about what they 'say,' and Eusebius himself puts forward his statement about an oral relationship merely as a suggestion. It does not follow that Eusebius, in attributing the authorship of Revelation to the Presbyter, even hints at the idea that he is also the author of the Gospel. He may have regarded it as an advantage to assign another authorship to the book, that the Apostle John might not be held responsible for the millenarian ideas of Papias. Papias accords the Presbyter no special place of honour in his list, and indeed places him last, after Aristion. If Papias had recorded anything of importance about him, no doubt Eusebius would have noted it, in order to support his view of the authorship of Revelation. See also art. ARISTION and PAPIAS.

(ii.) We have next to inquire whether there is any evidence in the writing of Papias that he used the Fourth Gospel. (a) A passage occurs in the writings of Irenaeus which contains a quotation of Jn 14<sup>2</sup> 'Our Lord has said, that in the abode of my Father are many mansions.' The passage is introduced, like many others in Irenaeus, as a quotation from the words of 'the Elders.' Is Irenaeus here quoting from the sayings of 'the Elders' as reported by Papias? By the way in which the Johannine quotation is prefaced, it is fair to suppose that 'the Elders' are here referring to a written record, and not reproducing merely oral tradition, and that some well-known and accepted source for the words of our Lord is meant.

An additional confirmation of the position that Irenaeus quotes verbatim from the Elders of Papias is found in another portion of his work. He is speaking of the fruitfulness of the earth at the millennium, and inserts a fanciful passage about vines with ten thousand shoots. He says that he received it from 'the Elders who saw John, the disciple of the Lord.' After quoting the passage, he adds: 'Papias also, a hearer of John and companion of Polycarp, an ancient man, confirms these things in writing.' Harnack contends that the words 'also' and 'confirms in writing' 'certainly ought not to be pressed' to mean that Irenaeus is giving a confirmation from Papias of the words of the Elders, but that he only means to indicate the written source from which he takes them. (This position is stoutly opposed by Schmiedel, op. cit. ii. 2649, where see a statement of the whole controversy and its issues).

If Papias quotes 14<sup>2</sup> we have here an important clue to an early date for the Gospel. The Elders of Papias belonged to the early Christian community.

(b) There are indications in the Preface of Papias that the Gospel permeates his thought, and that the references would be apparent to his readers. He speaks of 'those who teach the truth' (τῶν ἀληθῶς διδάσκοντων), and he also applies the term 'the Truth' to Christ. It is also not without significance that St. Andrew and St. Peter and St. Philip are named in the exact order in which the names occur in the first chapter of St. John, while St. Philip and St. Thomas are prominent only in the Fourth Gospel.

(c) Eusebius (HE iii. 39) says that 'Papias has used testimonies from the former Epistle of John and from that of Peter similarly.' If I John and the Gospel are by the same author, we have here additional confirmation that Papias knew and used the Fourth Gospel. This item of evidence, however, can have weight only in connexion with the rest of the evidence. Formerly the fact that Eusebius, while mentioning his use of the Epistle, is silent as to any use of the Gospel by Papias, was relied upon as a strong argument for the non-existence of the Gospel before 160-170 (e.g. in Supernatural Religion). After Lightfoot's complete answer to this position (Essays on Supernatural Religion, ii.), it is not now possible to deny a much earlier date for the Gospel. Modern opponents of the traditional view now rely on the argument from the silence of Eusebius, as proving that Papias nowhere appeals to the Gospel as of Apostolic authority (e.g. Bacon). It is therefore necessary to examine anything in Papias which seems to indicate that he regarded the Gospel as the work of St. John the Apostle.

(iii.) The evidence of Papias as to the authorship of the Gospel.—(a) Eusebius, in the often quoted passage, says that Papias distinguishes the Presbyter John from John the Apostle, 'evidently meaning the Evangelist.' The words in inverted commas would seem to point to some indication that Eusebius found in Papias' writing that he spoke of St. John the Apostle as the Evangelist. To this may be added the naming of St. John immediately after the Evangelist St. Matthew in the Preface.

(b) A Vatican MS of the 9th cent. contains the statement: 'Evangelium Johannis manifestatum et datum est ecclesis ab Johanne adhuc in corpore constituto; sicut Papias nomine Hierapollitanus, discipulus Johannis carus, in exotericis—id est in extremis—quinque libris retulit. Descripsit vero evangelium dictante Johanne recte.' The words are part of a translation of an early Greek argumentum or proof that the Gospel was written by John the Apostle. As the passage stands, the words exotericis and extremis are unintelligible, and the conjecture of Lightfoot may be accepted that the former should read exegeticis and extremis should read externis, which was an explanation of the false reading exotericis. Again, it is nonsense to say that the Gospel was published 'by John while he was yet alive'; and Harnack suggests (Chron. i. 665) that the preposition ab should be deleted. With these changes it is possible to make sense of the words. The statement 'Johanne adhuc in corpore constituto' would then imply that there was an interval between the writing and the publection of the Gospel, and has reference to Jn 21<sup>25</sup>. This would explain why Papias had found it necessary to say that the Gospel was published 'in the lifetime of the Apostle.' The statement at the end, that Papias wrote the Gospel at the dictation of St. John, may safely be set aside. At the same time, apart from the fact that it is necessary so to edit the fragment, there are serious difficulties in the way of accepting it as reliable evidence. For one thing, it is strange that Eusebius does not mention such a statement in Papias, although he mentions similar statements of his with regard to St. Matthew and St. Mark. Moreover, in view of the modern question of the Presbyter authorship, there is nothing to indicate which John is meant. (For discussion of the alleged statement of Papias recorded by Philip of Sidé, that John died a martyr in Jerusalem, see art. JOHN [THE APOSTLE].)

If the direct testimony of Papias must be regarded as inconclusive, it may fairly be asked whether we have a right to expect more. There is a very high probability that the Gospel was one of the sources of the 'Oracles' which he expounded, and his silence as to the author, so far from displaying any uncertainty on the question, may quite as easily be interpreted as meaning that the personality of St. John was eclipsed in the mind of Papias by the desire to hear the living voice of the Lord Himself in the Gospel. It is probable that in Papias we are in the presence of a certain conservatism which marked with some regret the dying generation who were in possession of the oral tradition about the life and teaching of Jesus, and the gradual substitution of the written word as the authority for the Christian life which, of necessity, was taking place. It was his aim from an early period in his activity to collect the oral tradition. One thing at least is practically certain, that if Papias knew and quoted the Gospel, it must have been for him an authentic record. If the Gospel emerged at the close of the 1st cent. or the very beginning of the 2nd, as it undoubtedly did, and did not bring with it the strongest credentials and most unmistakable indications that it was in complete accord with the accredited oral teaching so much valued by Papias, it is difficult to think that in a mind of such simplicity as his it could have raised, as it appears to have done, only the merest ripple on the surface.

(2) Ignatius was bishop of Antioch in Syria. A number of letters have come down to us under his name, of which only seven are genuine. The writer was at the time on his way from Antioch to Rome under sentence of death. The date 110-117, the closing years of Trajan's reign, may be assigned to them.

In Romans vii. 2, Ignatius says, 'There is not in me a fire fed by fleshly motive, but water living and speaking in me, saying within me, Come to the Father.' These words inevitably recall Jn 4<sup>14</sup> (cf. also 4<sup>26</sup> 'the Father seeketh such to worship him'). Not only the ideas, but the coincidence of ideas, seem to point to the story of the woman of Samaria as to a passage in the Gospel which is affording him comfort in his trial. Again, in Philad. vii. 1, he says, 'The Spirit is not deceived, being from God; for it knoweth whence it cometh and whither it goeth, and searcheth out the hidden things' (cf. Jn 3<sup>8</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>21</sup>). There are some striking differences in the thought of the parallel passages; but it is difficult to resist the conclusion that the words of Ignatius are due to the influence of these Johannine passages 'floating in his mind' (New Test. in Apost. Fathers, Oxford Society of Historical Theology, 1905, p. 82, where see other parallels). Both in expression and in doctrine there is an undoubted affinity between Ignatius and the Evangelist. Loisy admits that Ignatius, in his Christology, is dependent on the Gospel (Le Quatrième Évangile, p. 7). Von der Goltz holds that the affinity of thought is so deep that it cannot be explained by the influence of a book, and that the writer of the letters must have been imbued with the tradition and thought of a school (quoted by Sanday, Crit. of Fourth Gospel, p. 243). Sanday himself doubts whether there is any other instance of resemblance between a Biblical and patristic book that is really so close' (ib.).

Two arguments, taken from the writings of Ignatius, are relied upon by opponents of the Apostolic authorship. (a) It is urged that he nowhere quotes the Gospel as of Apostolic authority, although there are occasions (notably Smyrn. iii. 2) where it would have been exceedingly apposite to do so. It may be pointed out as having a bearing on this objection, that, although it is quite evident that Ignatius knew 1 Cor. 'almost by heart,' he has 'no quotations (in the strictest sense, with mention of the source) from that Epistle' (NT in Apost. Fathers, p. 67). This is only another instance of the precariousness of the argument from silence, considered apart from the idiosyncrasies of a writer. (b) Again, it is also objected that in writing to the Ephesian community in which St. John is said to have laboured, Ignatius mentions St. Paul as a hero of the faith, whom he sets before himself and them for imitation, but makes no mention of St. John (Ephes. xii.). To this argument it must be admitted that no very satisfactory answer has yet been given. Ignatius is, indeed, predisposed to mention St. Paul's name, through his evident desire to compare his own experience and the Apostle's in calling together the elders of Ephesus. Again, the writings of St. Paul, which have more clearly in view the various heresies of the time, would perhaps suit his purpose better.

It cannot be regarded as certain that Ignatius used the Gospel. His evidence is on the borderline between evidence for the existence of the Gospel and proof of the influence of a milieu of Johannine teaching and thought. It is probable that Ignatius had access to some document containing Johannine teaching (cf. e.g. his reference to the narrative of the woman of Samaria); on the other hand, that might easily have been a story told orally by the Apostle in the course of his preaching and teaching, and embedded in the hearts and minds of those who heard him.

(3) Polycarp was bishop of Smyrna. His writing has come down to us in the form of an Epistle to the Philippians. The date of his martyrdom was long uncertain, but the investigations of Lightfoot and Harnack have led to the almost certain conclusion that he died in 155 at the age of 86.

As regards the Gospel, we have two sources from which we may derive evidence as to his opinions, viz. the Epistle and some reminiscences of Irenaeus. (a) In the Epistle, Polycarp makes no reference to any document, except that he refers to St. Paul's Ep. to the Philippians immediately after mentioning his name, and in another passage again quotes the Epistle without remark. There is also a sentence which, though not verbally accurate, bears every trace of having been taken from the First Epistle of St. John: 'Everyone who shall not confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is Antichrist' (cf. 1 Jn 4<sup>2</sup>). He has also a passage that recalls at once words of Christ in the Gospel and the thought of the Epistle: 'He that raised Him from the dead will raise us also, if we do His will and walk in His commandments, and love the things which He loved' (cf. Jn 7<sup>14</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>6</sup>, 3<sup>2</sup>). We also find in Polycarp, v. 2, 'As He hath promised to raise us from the dead.' This promise is found only in Jn 6<sup>4</sup>. These parallels at least show that he was familiar with a circle of Johannine thought. He does not once mention the name of St. John; but the Church at Philippi had not been directly in contact with that Apostle. Moreover, his habits of quotation hardly lead us to expect any other result (cf. NT in Apost. Fathers, p. 84).

(2) Irenaeus gives Polycarp a foremost place among the elders whom he quotes. He says that he 'had not only been instructed by Apostles, and associated with many who had seen the Christ, but had also been placed by Apostles in Asia in the Church at Smyrna as a bishop, whom we also saw in our early life' (Ev. τῆς πρώτης ἡλικίας) (Hær. III. iii. 4). Eusebius has preserved for us a letter of his to Florinus, in which he gives an account of his listening with peculiar attention to Polycarp, and vividly recalls the very place where he sat when he discoursed, his manner of life, and his personal appearance, and how he would describe his intercourse with John, and with the rest who had seen the Lord, and how he would relate their words. And whatsoever things he had heard from them about the Lord, and about His miracles, and about His teaching, Polycarp, as having received them from eye-witnesses of the life of the Word, would relate them in accordance with the Scriptures' (ep. Euseb. HE v. xx. 6). Again, Irenaeus also, in a letter to Victor, bishop of Rome, on the Paschal controversy, uses as an argument the fact that Polycarp followed the example of 'John the disciple of the Lord, and the rest of the Apostles with whom he consorted'. Irenaeus is undoubtedly referring to the Apostle John; and if that be so, there can be little doubt that 'the Scriptures' to which Polycarp referred contained the Fourth Gospel in some form. Thus the silence of Polycarp, in the solitary writing that has come down to us, is balanced by the explicit statement of Irenaeus that Polycarp knew St. John, and referred to him in his discourse.

Opponents of the Johannine authorship of the Gospel have cast doubt on the trustworthiness of Irenaeus in this matter. They allege that he made a mistake in regarding Papias as a hearer of John, and that he has possibly done the same in the case of Polycarp. The John to whom Polycarp referred may have been the Presbyter. Irenaeus was still a boy (τεταράς) when he heard his teacher. At the same time, it is hardly likely that the vivid personal impression he has of Polycarp contains a mistake of this kind. Polycarp evidently mentioned the name of John with some frequency, and there is no evidence that the Presbyter John was a man of such note in Asia as to be thus referred to in Polycarp's lectures. It is inconceivable that, if there had been any prospect of confusion in the mind of a youth who was listening to him, Polycarp would not have guarded against it (see Stanton, Gospels as Hist. Doct. pp. 214-215).

(4) We have still to deal with a group of writings classed among the Apostolic Fathers, whose evidence on the subject is rendered vague and inconclusive, inasmuch as they contain no definite quotations from the Gospel, and there is also uncertainty as to their dates. (a) The Epistle of Barnabas reflects the condition of thought in Egypt, and the date may lie anywhere between 79 and 132. The theory that Barnabas used the Fourth Gospel found strangely a strong champion in Keim, who assigned the date 120-130 (Jesus of Naz. I. 192-195). Loisy, on the other hand, accepting the date c. 130, urges complete ignorance of the Gospel on the part of Barnabas, and uses the argument to prove that the Johannine writings had not yet taken complete possession of ecclesiastical usage (Le Quatrième Évang. p. 5). In Barnabas, use is made of the idea of the Brazen Serpent; and the conceptions of 'eternal life,' which often occurs, and of 'feeding upon the words of life,' seem to point to the influence of a Johannine current of thought. (b) Only one of the epistles known under the name of Clement of Rome is genuine. It was written from the Roman community to the Corinthian, c. 100. Here, again, the writer seems to be influenced by Johannine teaching (cf. Clem. xlix.

and Jn 14<sup>15-20</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>1-3</sup>). (c) The Didache, or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, is a composite document, and is the earliest manual of Church procedure extant. The elements of which it is composed may have been in use at the end of the 1st cent., but the work in its present form was published much later. It contains a specimen of a prayer of thanksgiving for use after the Eucharist, in which there is a very remarkable parallel to the anti-sacramentarian treatment of the ideas of the Supper in the Fourth Gospel (ch. 6): 'Thou, Almighty Master, didst create all things for thy name's sake, and didst give food and drink unto men for enjoyment, that they might render thanks unto thee; but didst bestow upon us spiritual food and drink and eternal life through thy Son' (Did. x. 3). (d) The Shepherd of Hermas (c. 100 Zahn, 135-145 Harnack) displays a Johannine colouring of thought.

5. Evidence derived from Opponents of Church doctrine in the 2nd century.—(1) The Clementine Homilies.—These are the work of a Jewish Christian, and were published at Rome not earlier than A.D. 180-170. In one of the Homilies (discovered by Dressel in 1837) there is an undoubted quotation (xix. 22) from Jn 9<sup>2-3</sup>. There are also in the Homilies other apparent references to the Gospel.

(2) The Gnostics.—There were two great schools of Gnostics—the Valentinians and the Basilidians. The date of the literary activity of Valentinus is uncertain, but we know that there existed a school of his followers before A.D. 150. Heracleon was a pupil of Valentinus; and it is exceptionally strong evidence, not only for the early existence but also for the authenticity of the Fourth Gospel, that he composed a Commentary on it which is quoted by Origen. Tertullian contrasts Valentinus and Marcion as to the way in which they use Scripture. He says that Marcion used the 'knife,' while Valentinus 'accepted the whole instrument' (i.e. the four Gospels), but with an ability not less than Marcion's 'laid hands upon the truth.' We hear of a school of Basilides c. 133, and his own period of activity was A.D. 117-138. Hippolytus in his Refutatio quotes Basilides, and in the quotations there are undoubted extracts from the Gospel. The question discussed by modern criticism is whether these are quotations from Basilides or from the representative of a school (cf. Drummond, op. cit. 296-301). There is a strong preponderance of evidence in favour of Basilides himself as the source.

So far as the earlier Gnostics are concerned—the Naasseni, Perate, Ophites, and Doctæa—it is generally admitted that the Gospel is earlier than these controversies; and Hippolytus tells us that they made abundant use of the Gospel.

(3) Marcion was a contemporary of Valentinus.—The principle of his work is to secure a Gospel that shall represent the pure doctrine of Christ, un-mixed with Jewish prejudices, which he regarded as inherent in the minds of the primitive Apostles. We find him rejecting all others in favour of St. Luke, which was written under Pauline influence; and he mutilated even that Gospel to suit his purpose. We cannot expect to find in his writing any reference to the Gospel of John, but, from his action in rejecting the writings of the early Apostles, we may draw the negative conclusion that if the Gospel was regarded as written by St. John it would be sufficient reason for its rejection. He made use of the passage in Galatians where St. Paul rebukes 'Apostles themselves' 'who walked not uprightly according to the truth of the gospel' (24). His silence as to the Fourth Gospel is all the more striking because of its anti-Judaic tendency, which would have predisposed him in its favour had it not been written by a primitive Apostle.

6. The Quartodeciman controversy.—In the latter part of the 2nd cent. a controversy was rife between certain Asiatic Christians and the Church with regard to their Paschal observance on the 14th Nisan. They appealed to the example of the Apostle John in defence of their practice. In the Gospel the Paschal meal falls on the 13th and it was contended by Bretschneider, followed by the Tübingen School, that therefore the Apostle could not be the author of the Gospel. A fuller investigation, however, into the rationale of the Quartodeciman controversy goes far to remove the difficulty. In opposition to the Tübingen School, it was held that the 14th was kept not in commemoration of the Passover, but in commemoration of the death of Christ, which would be in accord with the Fourth Gospel. This still leaves the difficulty unsolved, that in the Synoptics the death of Christ falls on the 15th. Accordingly, Bleek (followed by Schürer) and Stanton maintain that the observance in question was neither of the institution of the Supper, nor of the death of Christ alone, but that the Christian Jews gave to the Passover day a new meaning which made it a commemoration of the entire fact of redemption, including the Supper, the Death, and the Resurrection of Christ. This interpretation seems to be the correct one. At the same time, while it surmounts the difficulty caused by the chronology of the Fourth Gospel, there still remains the fact that the Quartodecimans of the latter half of the century appealed to the example of Christ as eating the Passover on the 14th. If such an appeal was made in the earlier part of the controversy, and at the same time the example of St. John was quoted in support, we should be face to face with a strong argument against the apostolic authorship of the Gospel. There is no proof, however, that the argument from the example of Christ was used before the time of Apollinaris. Apollinaris distinctly assumes that the Synoptics and St. John must not be made to contradict one another; and Polykrates as distinctly holds the Apostolic authorship, although he is a Quartodeciman (cf. Schmiedel, op. cit. ii. 252-253, who regards the Quartodeciman argument as still valid against the Apostolic authorship. The question is fully discussed by Stanton, op. cit. i. pp. 173-197, with a result favourable to the traditional view).

7. The Alogi.—These were a party in Asia Minor (c. A. D. 180) who rejected the Johannine authorship of the Gospel and the Apocalypse. They are first mentioned by Epiphanius and Philaster (4th cent.), but it may now be safely admitted that Irenaeus opposes their views in Her. III. xi. 12 (Zahn and Harnack). They attributed the authorship to Cerinthus, and founded their argument chiefly on the chronological disparity with the Synoptics. The main interest in the Alogi centres round the question whether they betoken uncertainty in the ecclesiastical tradition. Epiphanius ranks them among heretics, but it is certain that they were a party in the Church (Schürer and Harnack). The name 'Alogi' is a jest of Epiphanius, and indicates merely that they rejected the Logos Gospel, with more than a hint at their stupidity (αλογος—'unreasonable'). It gives no clue to their doctrinal position. Epiphanius, himself very orthodox, says 'that they seem to believe as we do.' Probably they were opposed to some form of the Montanist heresy, and in their zeal sought to get rid of the teaching of the Gospel on the Holy Spirit by rejecting the whole. This step they strove to justify by the chronological disparities with the Synoptics and other internal discrepancies. Irenaeus says of them that 'they frustrate the gift of the Spirit.' The millenarian views of the Montanists may have directed their first attack on the Apocalypse, which they extended to the Gospel 'by a piece of sheer bravado' (Sanday, Crit. of Fourth Gospel, p. 65). Their influence seems to have been small. Irenaeus and Epiphanius refer to them slightly, and Schwarz (op. cit. p. 33), in common with Salmon, although from a different motive, narrows them down to a single individual with perhaps a coterie behind him. We may admit that the presence of the Alogi in the Church indicates that the belief in the Johannine authorship had not reached that stage of clear definition and regular acceptance which only controversy and time could give. They 'came upon the tradition unawares' (Loisy). The Church was not yet in a position either to challenge with critical weapons, or to expel as heretics those who differed from her traditional beliefs about authorship (Irenaeus could only defend the fourfold Gospel mystically), especially when they were fighting, as in this case, a common foe in Montanism. Indeed, the Alogi can really be pressed into the service of tradition. 'Its ascription to Cerinthus, an impossible author, betrays the recklessness of the judgment pronounced; while the naming of a contemporary and fellow-townsmen of the Apostle may be accepted as an indication of the true date of the Gospel' (Dods, Expos. Gr. Test. i. p. 659).

II. THE INTERNAL EVIDENCE.—No text of the Gospel that we possess is without the categorical statement of 21<sup>24</sup> that the book contains the witness of the Apostle John and is written by him. It seems the more probable view that this whole chapter was composed by friends of the Evangelist, either towards the end of his life, or after his death, in order to remove a misinterpretation of a saying of Jesus about him. The position assigned to St. Peter in the chapter might be explained by the desire to show that, although the Gospel leaves him weighted with the guilt of his denial, he was restored to his place in the Apostolic circle, and that no disparagement or supersession is intended of the Petrine Gospel that lies at the basis of the Synoptics. We have no moral right to regard the statement of 21<sup>24</sup> as anything but a bona fide statement of the earliest view of the authorship, and in the internal evidence we have to consider how far the book itself corresponds with this suggested view.

1. The author is a Jew.—(1) His attitude towards the OT shows unmistakably that it was for him a valuable aid to faith and a deep source of religious experience. The opening words of the Gospel are reminiscent of Gn 1<sup>1</sup>; 3<sup>14</sup> recalls Dt 30<sup>12</sup>. 'His own' in 1<sup>11</sup> can betray only the tragic consciousness of a Jew that the chosen nation rejected the Christ. The words in 10<sup>35</sup> 'the Scripture cannot be broken,' may be taken as expressing the Evangelist's own conviction. He sees in certain incidents in the life of Jesus that would otherwise cause perplexity, especially some connected with the Passion, the fulfilment of the OT. Twice the conduct of Judas is explained by Scripture (13<sup>18</sup> 17<sup>12</sup>). The mournful sight of the garments of Jesus distributed among the rough soldiers brings to mind a prophecy (19<sup>24</sup>). The thirst of Jesus, who Himself had the gift of the living water, is a fulfilment of Scripture (19<sup>28</sup>). It is in Scripture that he finds a solution for the problem of the failure of Christ's ministry and teaching (12<sup>37</sup>). The very spear-thrust has a place in the counsels of God (19<sup>36</sup> 37), and becomes an aid to faith (19<sup>36</sup>). While the Evangelist rarely cites incidents from the OT, and the great majority of the OT references are contained in the discourses of Christ, it has to be borne in mind that the Gospel was written for Gentile readers, to whom only the outlines of the history would be familiar.

(2) The writer is familiar not only with the Messianic expectation, but also with the limitations that it suffered in the popular mind. The hope is current in Galilee (14<sup>22</sup> 42 6<sup>16</sup> 22 23<sup>24</sup>), in Samaria (4<sup>25</sup> 26 43), in Judea (5<sup>38</sup> 45<sup>2</sup> 7<sup>26f</sup> 40-42 8<sup>30f</sup> 10<sup>34</sup>). 'Among friends, among foes, among neutrals alike, it is discussed.' The purpose of the Gospel is to induce belief that Jesus is the Christ (2<sup>22</sup>). Not only so, but the limitations and misconceptions of the idea of the Christ in the popular mind are familiar to him; Elijah and the Prophet are not yet come (1<sup>21</sup>); the outlook is unspiritual (6<sup>14</sup> 15); the Messiah will never die (6<sup>50</sup> 12<sup>34</sup>); Jesus does not satisfy their conventional ideas (7<sup>27</sup> 42).

(3) The writer is familiar with the ideas and customs of the Jews. We have a picture of a Jewish marriage feast (2<sup>2-10</sup>), of pastoral life (10<sup>1-14</sup>), of burial customs (11<sup>38</sup> 44 19<sup>40</sup>), the estimate of women (4<sup>27</sup>), the disparagement of the Dispersion (7<sup>28</sup>), the heredity of sin (9<sup>2</sup>). The religious observances of the people are known to him, and he displays great familiarity with the Temple and its services. The Synagogue and the Temple are places of resort (18<sup>20</sup>); he knows the side of the Temple where shelter is to be had in inclement weather (10<sup>22-23</sup>); it was forty-six years in building (2<sup>20</sup>); he speaks of the treasury (8<sup>20</sup>). The two feasts of Tabernacles and of Dedication are familiar to him, even to the implied ritualistic details (Westcott, v. 1). He speaks of the 'great day' of the feast of Tabernacles. He is familiar with the narrow Sabbatarian views of the Jews (5<sup>10</sup> 9<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>21-22</sup>). In the last passage a subtle argument is founded on the knowledge that circumcision is allowable on the Sabbath.

Does the statement that Caiaphas was 'high priest that same year' (11<sup>51</sup> 12<sup>31</sup>) imply that the writer imagined that the office was tenable only for a year? The repetition after the manner of the Evangelist is meant to impress more than a chronological fact. Either the words may have an ironical significance, arising from the fact that the three predecessors of Caiaphas had been deposed after a year's tenure, and would be an allusion to the present uncertainty of the office (Quint. Gesch. des Rabbi Jesus von Nazareth, pp. 88, 89); or the Evangelist seeks to connect emphatically the office of the high priest with the part that he took in accomplishing the death of Christ. The high priest entered alone once a year into the Holy of Holies, where he offered atonement for the sins of the people (He 9<sup>7</sup>), and in 'that memorable year' Caiaphas is but an unconscious instrument in bringing about the great and final sacrifice (Westcott, v. 1; cf. also B. Weiss, Com. ad loc.).

(4) It has been contended against these indications that when the writer mentions the Jews he seems to speak of them as a foreigner would speak. They are throughout represented as the bitter enemies of Christ (2<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>38</sup> 6<sup>4</sup> 7<sup>16</sup> 8<sup>22</sup> 10<sup>24</sup> 11<sup>38</sup> 13<sup>33</sup> 20<sup>1</sup>). The term of Ἰουδαῖοι is sometimes used to denote the Jews as a nation, in distinction from other nations: sometimes as Judeans distinguished from Galileans or Peraeans; and sometimes the leaders of the Jewish people alone are meant. This somewhat indefinite mode of speech has a sufficient explanation if the Evangelist wrote as he used to speak (Drummond, op. cit. 416, note). There is no indication in his tone of national antagonism. Rather his attitude is like that of St. Paul to his countrymen. The Jews are 'His own' (1<sup>11</sup>); Jesus Himself is a Jew (4<sup>9</sup>); salvation is of the Jews (4<sup>22</sup>); Nathanael is an 'Israelite indeed' (1<sup>47</sup>); there are believing Jews (8<sup>21</sup> etc.).

This Gospel also preserves words of Christ that trace the subsequent persecution by the Jews to its roots in their ignorance of the Father and the Son (16<sup>2</sup> 5). In this Gospel Jesus never denounces the leaders of the people in as strong terms as He uses in the Synoptics. That He expressly distinguishes His disciples from the Jews (13<sup>36</sup>), and also speaks of 'your law' (8<sup>7</sup> 9<sup>13</sup>), 'their law' (15<sup>25</sup>), implies that this external attitude adopted by the writer was not unknown during the ministry on earth (cf. Dods, Evangel. Gr. Test. i. 666).

2. The author is a Jew of Palestine.—Many of the preceding characteristics are already indications that the writer is a native of Palestine. (1)

He is also familiar with sites and places. Jacob's well is deep (4<sup>11</sup>); the mountain and the ripening cornfields are suggested in the most natural fashion (vv. 26, 21, 25); it is a descent from the high ground where Cana stood to the shores of Genesareth at Capernaum (v. 4). Ch. 6 contains some minute information as to the district. Bethsaida (14<sup>12</sup>) and Bethany (11<sup>1</sup>) are not merely localities, but connected with the names of friends. He carefully distinguishes Bethany 'nigh unto Jerusalem about fifteen furlongs' (11<sup>18</sup>) from 'Bethany beyond Jordan' (1<sup>28</sup>). Nazareth is mentioned not only as the home of Jesus, but as a place so well known to Nathanael that he considered it unlikely that 'any good thing' could spring from such commonplace surroundings (1<sup>46</sup>); cf. the details as to Sychar (4<sup>9</sup>), Amon (3<sup>23</sup>), Ephraim (11<sup>14</sup>). A very striking feature is the accurate knowledge displayed of the topography of Jerusalem and its environs (cf. 5<sup>2</sup> 13<sup>1</sup>); the Kidron; which is a ravine on the way from the city to the Mount of Olives, and a torrent only in winter (χειμάρον, 18<sup>1</sup>); the Pavement (Gabbatha) in the Prætorium (19<sup>13</sup>); Golgotha (19<sup>17</sup>). The acclaiming multitude carried in their hands 'the branches of the palm trees' which grew on the Mount of Olives (12<sup>13</sup>).

(2) It has been customary to regard the so-called Hebraisms of the Fourth Gospel, which it was supposed to share with the other NT writings, as an indication that the writer was a Palestinian. The study of the papyri has revolutionized this idea. It is now no longer permissible to speak of Hebraistic Greek. The papyri are written in the vernacular Greek, and range in date from the 3rd cent. B.C. to the 7th cent. A.D. The earlier specimens furnish a convincing parallel in language to the Greek of the NT. Where there are Hebraic modes of expression, these must be traced to direct translation from the Aramaic, or to those causes that operate in the introduction of foreign elements into the vernacular of any language (Moulton, Grammar of NT Greek, Prolegomena, vol. i. pp. 18, 19). At the same time, while we must attribute the simple structure of this Evangelist's sentences and the absence of connecting particles to his use of the vernacular, we are not left without evidence that he knew Hebrew. In his quotations from the OT he made use of the LXX (2<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>38</sup> 19<sup>36</sup> 19<sup>36</sup>); but he is also independent of it (16<sup>30</sup> 7<sup>28</sup> 12<sup>31</sup> 6<sup>51</sup>); and there is an interesting group of cases where the LXX seems to be corrected by reference to the Hebrew (6<sup>50</sup> 13<sup>33</sup> 19<sup>37</sup>; cf. Westcott, Gospel of John, xiii-xiv; Drummond, op. cit. p. 364).

(3) Can the Logos conception of the Gospel be shown to have greater affinity with Alexandrian than with Hebrew thought? It is noteworthy that the term λόγος is not used throughout the Gospel, either in the discourses or in the narrative parts, except in the ordinary sense of 'word'; but we must not neglect other passages where the Logos idea is in the background. The lofty and undefined sense of the plural subject in such passages as 3<sup>1-18</sup>, the well-known pre-existence passages, the assertion by Christ of what He had seen with the Father (6<sup>46</sup> 8<sup>38</sup> cf. 1<sup>18</sup>). His teaching which is not of Himself (7<sup>14-17</sup>). His complete unity of existence with the Father (14<sup>2-11</sup>), are all expressions of the Logos consciousness (cf. Grill, Untersuchungen über die Entstehung des vierten Evangeliums, i. pp. 32, 33). On the other hand, in order to prove that the Evangelist had either a literary acquaintance with the works of Philo, or was deeply influenced by his thought, it would be necessary to discover a much closer correspondence between them than is actually to be found. In the Stoic philosophy with which Philo closely identifies himself, the term 'Logos' has the double significance of 'reason' (λόγος ἐνδιάθετος) and 'word' (λόγος προφορικός), and in the Fourth Gospel there is not a trace of the former sense. Jesus is the manifestation of God, the uttered Word. Again, in the Gospel the Logos is identified with the Messiah, and in Philo there is no such identification. It is doubtful whether Philo attributes personality to the Logos; but there can be no doubt of the personal existence of the Logos in the Gospel. At the same time, the author of the Fourth Gospel, like every Hebrew thinker, is no metaphysician, and he simply projects the conception of personality, which he derived from the knowledge of the Incarnate One, into the Word in its pre-incarnate existence. The Angel of the Lord and the personified Wisdom in the OT are not so much independent existences as immanent determinations of the Divine Being. Moreover, the Incarnation of the Logos is an idea quite foreign to the mind of Philo, not because with him matter is essentially corrupt, but because it is regarded as a principle purely negative, arresting, limiting, restraining the penetration of the Divine action, in proportion to its thickness and opacity" (Réville, Le Quatrième Évangile, p. 87). For Alexandrian thought an Incarnation of the Logos could only be Docetic; and this may have given rise to the heresy of 1 Jn 2<sup>d</sup>.

There are, however, some very striking affinities of expression between Philo and the Fourth Gospel. Philo speaks of 'a second God' (θεῶς δεύτερος); the Word Himself is God and the Son of God (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ); the Word is the agent or instrument in creation (ὁ λόγος ἡ ἀρχὴ τῆς κτίσεως); Light and Life are conceptions of Philo as applied to the Logos; he uses the term 'Paraclete,' but applies it to the 'cosmos' and not to the 'Logos.' The Logos exists in heaven; reveals the name of God; possesses supernatural knowledge and power; is continually at work; is eternal; is free from sin; instructs and convicts; dwells in the souls of men; is high priest towards God; is the source of unity, joy, and peace; imparts eternal life; is bridegroom, father, guide, steersman, shepherd, physician; imparts manna; is the food of the soul (Grill, pp. 115-128). For a discussion of the whole question see Sanday, l.c. pp. 185-200. These coincidences cannot be overlooked in deciding the question of authorship. We must bear in mind that 'Logos' is the word by which the Hebrew idea of the Word of God is translated in the LXX, and that there are passages in the OT, the Apocrypha, and in the Jewish Targums that afford equally important coincidences of thought (Ex 33<sup>d</sup> 10th 14th; Is 40th 55th 11; Wis 9th 10th 18th 18. For the Memra of the Targums, see Ederheim, Life and Times, i, pp. 46-48). The Evangelist would meet with these ideas nowhere more readily than in Hebrews, which was also the home of the Logos philosophy of Heraclitus. He would be disposed to keep in view his Greek readers, among whom these expressions were current. Again, we find similar coincidences of thought with Philo in the writings of St. Paul and in the Epistle to the Hebrews. If, indeed, we were to isolate the Prologue to the Gospel, which may be regarded as containing all that was in the author's mind essential to the Logos idea, and to rid ourselves of all associations of the word 'Logos' derived from Greek philosophy, we should find that the thought remains within the limits of the OT, except in the case of vv. 1-14.

3. The writer is a contemporary of the events and persons in his narrative.—(1) His knowledge of the ecclesiastical situation and feeling of the time.—A deputation is sent to the Baptist from the ecclesiastical authorities in Jerusalem consisting of priests and their attendant Levites (1st); and the writer breaks the narrative of the deputation to insert the remark, evidently meant to explain the question that follows, that the deputation included some Pharisees (v. 24). Their inquiry betrays an interest in ritual and in the orderly observance of the Law which is characteristic of that party, as distinct from the Sadducees. The Sadducees seem to have applied rationalist principles to the old religion, and were distinguished by dogmatic differences not only regarding the rule of faith, but in connexion with such questions as the life after death, and the question of free-will and predestination (Ederheim, Life and Times, i, pp. 310-324). The writer does not speak of Pharisees and Sadducees, but of Chief Priests and Pharisees, showing that he is acquainted with the fact that the Sadducees held the offices in the time of Christ. The passage 11th-29 is full of ecclesiastical knowledge. The discussion in the Sanhedrin is occasioned by the influence on the people of the raising of Lazarus, and we can clearly distinguish the attitude of the two parties. The Pharisees are represented as in touch with the people (11th, cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 6), and they are afraid lest a tumult should arise, and thereby the ecclesiastical influence (ἐκκλησιαστικὴ) and the national existence be destroyed by Rome. The reply of Caiaphas is characteristic. He scornfully sets aside the question of the miracle, and urges an opportunist policy to deal with the actual situation (vv. 40, 50). It can scarcely be without meaning that the Evangelist, who knew the Sadducean disbelief in predestination, should represent Caiaphas as the unconscious prophet and instrument of the death of Christ (vv. 31, 32). In 7th-8th there is displayed a similar knowledge of ecclesiastical circles. After the triumphal entry the Pharisees seem to have been filled with dismay at their loss of influence with the people, and at the popularity of Christ (12th), and it is the ruling Sadducean party who plot the death of Lazarus (v. 10). Again, it is the Fourth Evangelist who tells us of the informal trial before Annas, who, though still wielding much power, had been deposed in favour of his son-in-law (18th-24).

These indications of an acquaintance with opinion in ecclesiastical circles are in complete correspondence with the statement in 18th about the disciple 'who was known to the high priest.' In this Gospel alone are we told the name (Malchus) of the servant of the high priest whose ear was cut off by Peter. It is noteworthy, also, that the Evangelist is acquainted with Nicodemus, and with Joseph of Arimathea, who belonged to the Pharisaic party. In this connexion may be mentioned the tradition of Polyocrates that 'John, who learned on Jesus' breast, also wore 'the frontlet' (περαλοῦ) of the high priest (Eus. HE III. xxxi. 3).

Delf has propounded the theory that the author of the Fourth Gospel was an unnamed native of Jerusalem, not of the number of the Twelve, but a man of high-priestly family, and a member of the higher aristocracy. He founds on 124, on the statement of Polyocrates, and on the other indications in the Gospel. He identifies the author with 'the disciple whom Jesus loved,' and describes him as a kind of 'supernatural disciple.' Sanday (Crit. of Fourth Gospel, 90-108) has discussed this theory with great generosity, but it necessitates a further theory of interpolations, and itself presents some insuperable difficulties. This disciple and Peter are often named together (cf. Ac 3:11 4:13 5:4 Gal 2:9). We cannot suppose that within the Apostolic circle there were two pairs of friends, one identical in each. Again, if Delf is right, the Apostle John is not once referred to in the Gospel, and, on the other hand, this unknown disciple has completely vanished from history, unless he be the timorous man who fled at the arrest, leaving his linen cloth behind him, or the shadowy Presbyter John of Papias. It will be admitted that Delf's conclusion goes considerably beyond the evidence, but we must be prepared, in assigning the authorship, to recognize the undoubted insight of the Evangelist into the ecclesiastical situation.

(2) His knowledge of the opinions of the populace (ὄχλος).—He knows their varying verdicts about Christ (7th-12); the wonder of the 'Jerusalemites' at the immunity Jesus enjoys from injury, notwithstanding His fearless speaking (7th-27); the belief of some of the crowd (7th, cf. v. 40); the fickleness of the populus aura is graphically described (7th-44); the excitement among the people in view of the request of the Sanhedrin for information as to the whereabouts of Jesus, and the possibility of His appearance at the feast, is vividly portrayed (11th-57). The climax of popular acclamation is reached in 12th-13.

(3) The writer speaks as one to whom the men and women of his narrative are personally familiar.—Nicodemus is introduced somewhat suddenly into the narrative, but that is in the manner of the Evangelist, and presupposes that his readers are aware, either from the other Gospels, or from the oral tradition, or from personal acquaintance, of his historical existence. Nicodemus is introduced almost in the same words as John the Baptist (cf. 1<sup>o</sup> and 3<sup>o</sup>), a fact which must not be forgotten in view of the tendency to find allegorical meanings in the characters (cf. 1st and 4th). It would be strange if the Evangelist should take so little pains to distinguish between characters known to be historical, and those that are allegorical. The reality of the characters is witnessed by the words they utter. It is not stupidity, but a profound emotion that makes Nicodemus speak as he does in 3<sup>d</sup>, when he discovers that all that he has learned must be unlearned, and that he must begin the process of human experience anew. He is on the threshold of a world of facts as yet unrealized by him (3<sup>d</sup>). The woman of Samaria is introduced upon the scene, amid real surroundings, at Jacob's well, on the road from Judea to Galilee. Her character is revealed in her nonchalant air and bantering mood, behind which she conceals an aching and guilty heart, and is much too true to life for allegory. How can the woman of Samaria be an allegory of the Samaritan Church, and her five husbands symbolize her idolatrous worship? (so, e.g., Keim, Jesus of Naz. i. 159, note 1; Loisy, Le Quat. Évangile, p. 354). It is not necessary to suppose that the Evangelist was present at these interviews. It is enough to remember that Christ was present, and that the Evangelist is the 'disciple whom Jesus loved,' with whom confidences of that kind would be exchanged. Leaving for the moment the lifelike characters of the Apostolic circle, we are confronted in the closing scenes with a group of men that could have been painted only by a contemporary hand. The writer knows Caiaphas so well that he is able to reveal the man in a single sentence that fell from his lips (11th). Pilate is depicted, irresolute, and fettered by a guilty past of oppressive and cruel government. At the critical moment, the Evangelist places in the hands of the people the powerful weapon of a covert threat to denounce him to the Emperor (19th).

4. Relationship of the Evangelist to Jesus and the Apostolic circle.—It is evident that the author was able in a peculiar degree to interpret the mind of our Lord. He tells us of His emotions, thoughts, and motives (11th 13th 24th 4th 6th 13th 18th). Is the writer identical with 'the disciple whom Jesus loved'? Jn 21st, 24th leaves us in no doubt. It is an entirely inadequate interpretation to say that the phrase is meant to stand for 'the type of the perfect Gnostic, the spiritual witness of Jesus' (so Loisy, Le Quat. Évang. p. 125). It is a strong argument against the view that a purely ideal figure is meant, when we note the variety of the references. His existence is implied in 1st; in 13th he is described as leaning on Jesus' breast; in 18th he is mentioned as 'another disciple who was known to the high priest.' It would also be necessary to interpret the scene in 19th as allegorical, if the disciple is not a historical figure. The variety of the situations shows that the author had a real person in his mind.

We have, however, to explain the difficulty that when the personality of the Evangelist is obtruded, he describes himself as 'the disciple whom Jesus loved.' If there is an apparent lack of modesty in the use of the phrase, it may be questioned whether this charge would not be equally relevant in those passages where the Evangelist confidently interprets the inmost thoughts of our Lord. The fact that he should describe himself in this indirect fashion at all will be matter for discussion under the question of the historicity of the Gospel. In the meantime it is sufficient to point out that in every case where the phrase is used, the writer is laid under the necessity of referring to himself individually. In 13th he explains the fact that he is lying on Jesus' breast. And in 19th Jesus addresses him directly. Perhaps in 20th there is the suggestion of a thought in Mary's mind that the disciple would tell the mother of Jesus. The only alternative in these cases is to use the personal pronoun or to mention his own name, a course which the Evangelist systematically avoids. If ch. 21 is an appendix by another hand, there is no difficulty about the use of the phrase in vv. 7, 20.

It is also apparent that the author of the Gospel stood in a very intimate relationship to the Apostolic circle. We have miniature portraits of several of the Apostles, conveyed often through questions they put. Philip throughout appears as a man of somewhat practical and business-like turn of mind (14th 6th 14th). Andrew is wise, helpful, and unobtrusive (1st 6th, 9 12th). Thomas is despondent: his moods colour his outlook, and he experiences violent reaction (11th 14th 20th 22nd). Peter is over-confident and impulsive, and at a time cowardly (13th 36th 18th 26th). The scandal of Judas' presence among the Twelve is referred to as if by one who felt the shame of it and was eager to clear the situation (12th 13th 26th 30 18th). He knows also their places of resort (11th 18th 20th), and the thoughts of the disciples at critical moments (2nd 17th 27 6th 9 12th 13th 28 29th).

5. Is St. John the Apostle the author of the Gospel?—Is he the unnamed disciple who is identified with the writer? This unnamed disciple is called among the earliest disciples, and remembers even the hour of the day (1st). He is closely associated with St. Peter in the closing scenes. We know from the Synoptics that St. Peter and the two sons of Zebedee were in specially close relationship with Jesus. St. Peter is out of the question; St. James died early; only St. John is left. Unless John be the beloved disciple, one of the 'pillar' Apostles (Gal 2<sup>d</sup>) is never once mentioned in the Gospel, except indirectly in 21st. A very strong argument for supposing that St. John is meant may also be founded on the fact that nowhere does the author refer to 'the Baptist,' but always to 'John.' Elsewhere he is very careful to distinguish names (e.g. 14th), but in this case he seems to have thought that no confusion was possible.

If St. John is the writer of the Gospel, why does he so studiously conceal his identity? The Fourth Gospel is distinguished from the Synoptics by the fact that, while in them we have a purely impersonal narrative except in the preface to St. Luke, in St. John we have a narrative where individual experience ('testimony') is prominent. Is it solely because St. John is himself the author and writer of the Gospel, that he sedulously veils his own name? Why was it not possible for him to incorporate his own testimony in the Gospel without keeping himself in the background in such a way as really to attract attention? There must be some reason for this conduct other than a modesty which thus defeats its own end. It is quite evident that the authority of the Gospel for the Church is regarded as depending on the fact that St. John the Apostle wrote it. It is permissible to see in 21st an indication that it was felt necessary, even at that early date, to authenticate the position that the Apostle John made himself responsible for the statements contained in this Gospel. This is not because there was doubt as to the Johannine authorship, but because the Gospel differs so much in character, subject, and content from the Synoptics, which already held the ground as authorities for the life and teaching of the Lord.

We shall be able to find an answer to these questions if we consider the two passages in the Gospel itself that have been most relied on as direct statements of Johannine authorship. (a) 1st. In what sense is 'we beheld' to be taken? It has been contended that a seeing with the bodily eye is not meant, but spiritual vision. If we compare the parallel passage in 1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup>, there can be little doubt that the 'hearing' and the 'handling' there mentioned demand the sense that the 'seeing' is also literal. The presumption is in favour of applying the same interpretation to the passage in the Gospel. By 'we' is meant a group of eye-witnesses who are associated with St. John in the statement. Who these were it is impossible actually to determine, but perhaps it is unnecessary to limit the range of 'we' to the circle of the Twelve. The Gospel shows that the writer is interested in the testimony, however imperfect it may sometimes be, of many others besides his fellow-Apostles. Clement of Alexandria says that 'last of all, John, perceiving that the bodily facts had been set forth in the other Gospels, at the instance of his disciples and with the inspiration of the Spirit composed a spiritual Gospel.' With this may be compared the statement in the Muratorian Canon: 'It was revealed to Andrew, one of the Apostles, that John should narrate everything in his own name, subject to the revision of the rest' (ut recognoscantibus cunctis Johannes suo nomine cuncta describeret). While these statements may not have independent historical value, and may themselves be based on the internal evidence of the Gospel, and especially on 21<sup>24</sup>, surely they must be regarded as the simplest and most direct interpretation of the facts. A group of eye-witnesses was concerned in the origin of the Gospel. We may therefore offer the hypothesis that, while St. John wrote the Gospel and impressed upon it his own personality, the form in which he expresses himself, the philosophical mould in which the writing is cast, the Philonic phraseology, and the extraordinary power of analyzing situations and characters, would owe much to the intellectual environment of Ephesus, and in some cases to direct suggestion on the part of some fellow-disciple, not necessarily one of the Twelve. The value of the Gospel and its authenticity are confirmed by the fact that it is the expression of St. John's own experience, attested by that of his fellow-disciples who had seen the Lord. The purpose of the Gospel is to treat the facts of the life and teaching of Jesus in such a way as to advance faith in the hearts of those who had not been eye-witnesses, and were therefore all the more inclined to regard their position in relation to the 'bodily facts' as a loss and a hindrance to faith. So far from this, the climax of faith is not to have seen and yet to believe (20<sup>29</sup>). There would, no doubt, be men like Thomas in the early Church, easily cast down, and satisfied only by the bodily presence of Christ, to whom all else was unreal. No personal assurance was sufficient to convince them. St. John, therefore, veiled his identity, and emphasized the joint-testimony of the group of eye-witnesses to which he also belonged. This is also the origin of the impersonal reference in 20<sup>31</sup>: 'These things are written,' etc.

(b) 19<sup>35-37</sup>. Here is an instance where the Evangelist is compelled to distinguish his own personality from the circle in whose name he speaks. St. John alone of that group was present at the Cross (19<sup>28</sup>). In this case he has to find, in accordance with his principle, some means of authenticating his testimony. It is interesting to notice how this is done, and the character of the Gospel as not dependent on the evidence of a single testimony alone vindicated. A threefold corroboration is adduced. (a) 'His witness is true' (ἀληθὴς), i.e. confirmed by the 'Spirit of truth' (14<sup>17-20</sup>). (β) Reference is made to One who 'knoweth that he saith true.' It is possible, but awkward, to refer ἐκείνος to the Evangelist. Rather it is meant to denote Christ Himself (cf. 1<sup>18</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>). It is so taken by Sanday (op. cit. p. 78) and Schmiedel (Encyc. Bibl. ii. 1809). This interpretation is as old as Erasmus. (γ) The Scriptures are adduced as a witness, i.e. the witness of God Himself (vv. 26, 27). The fact of the flow of blood and water from the pierced side can be explained medically, and the emphasis is laid not on the fact, but on the interpretation to be put upon it. It is a 'sign,' and the writer must have regarded it as of peculiar value to his readers. Perhaps some form of the Docetic heresy is aimed at (cf. Haussleiter, Zwei Apost. Zeugen, p. 29).

In conclusion, the Gospel is a genuine Johannine work from the pen of the Apostle, who wrote from Ephesus.* We cannot, however, overlook the undoubted fact that the writer is concerned to hide his own identity, and thereby to impress the fact that the Gospel is not the work of a single individual, but the testimony of a group of eye-witnesses. With John's as the guiding mind, they conjointly made themselves responsible for the statements contained in the book. This is at once the oldest and simplest solution of the problem of authorship.

Two objections, on general grounds, to the traditional authorship may here be mentioned.

1. Can a Galilean fisherman have written this Gospel?—There is no question of NT criticism where the need is more imperative to rid ourselves of prejudice than this question of the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel. It is possible to have a completely mistaken conception of the connexion between letters and handicraft in the days of the Apostles. St. Peter and St. John are described in Ac 4<sup>13</sup> as 'unlearned and ignorant men' (ἀγῶμαροι καὶ ἄσῳτοι). ἄσῳτος marks a caste distinction, in opposition to the learned or academic classes. The use of the vernacular tongue by the Apostles would be sufficient to suggest the expression. The Pharisaic objection is, as Delitzsch reminds us, a decline from the traditional honourable connexion between the Rabbi and the hand-worker (Jewish Artisan Life, p. 54). Zebedee owned his own fishing vessel, and the presumptuous request of the mother of Zebedee's sons betrays a somewhat overweening sense of social position. St. John was 'known to the high priest.' Moreover, we too must take knowledge that he 'had been with Jesus,' and it would not be easy to estimate, in addition to the spiritual training, the purely educative influence of companionship with Jesus of Nazareth. The over-ardent spirit that sought to call down fire on a hostile Samaritan village, finds a nobler expression in the withering exposure of Judas (12<sup>9</sup>) and of Caiaphas (11<sup>49-52</sup>). He who with such insight lets us into the spiritual incapacity of Nicodemus, must have been himself born again into a new world, and have gained a new outlook.

2. Is it impossible that John, a 'pillar' Apostle (Gal. 2<sup>9</sup>), who so favoured the claims of the circumcision, should also have written such an anti-Judaic Gospel?—Yet even then he cordially recognized, by the giving of the right hand of fellowship, St. Paul's mission to the Gentiles. Does the love for his own nation not breathe in the emphasis he lays in the Fourth Gospel on the tragedy of their rejection of Christ? The effect of the destruction of Jerusalem must have been very great on a mind like John's, and the Gospel was written forty years after that event. None of the other Evangelists lays such stress on the teaching of events as the Fourth. In Ephesus also he would breathe the atmosphere of the Pauline gospel, full of thoughts of the sovereignty of God, the condescension of the Divine grace, and the universality of the gospel message. He who beheld the awe-inspiring vision of the Risen Christ in Patmos, might well, in the calm of later years, write the majestic words of the Prologue.

III. RELATION TO THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS.—It is impossible to doubt that the Fourth Evangelist presupposes that his readers are acquainted with the contents of the first three Gospels, or that he himself is acquainted with them. We shall confine ourselves in this discussion to certain points of divergence between John and the Synoptics.

1. The scene of the ministry of Christ is for the most part confined to Jerusalem. The Galilean ministry is referred to in 2<sup>3</sup> 6<sup>1-9</sup> 7<sup>21</sup>. We are not now concerned with the demand for chronological correspondence with the Synoptic account. It will be sufficient to show that there is no inconsistency in the prominence given in this Gospel to the events in Jerusalem. The Judean ministry is presupposed in Lk 4<sup>4</sup>, but the reading is doubtful. Scribes and Pharisees from Jerusalem came to attend on the Galilean ministry (Lk 5<sup>17</sup>, Mk 3<sup>22</sup> 7). Judas was a native of Kerioth, in Judea. The friendship of Joseph of Arimathea, who in all probability resided in Jerusalem, has to be explained. The relations with Martha and Mary point to frequent visits to Bethany. We have also the 'How often'! of Mt 23<sup>27</sup> and Lk 13<sup>34</sup> 3<sup>9</sup>, which indicates not merely unfulfilled desire, but baffled effort. After the Ascension the disciples make their headquarters in Jerusalem. It is well-nigh impossible to explain the attitude of the authorities, and many incidents of the closing days (e.g. the friend at whose house the Supper was eaten), unless by the Johannine accounts of the visits to Jerusalem. The Synoptics tell us of only one Passover, but events could hardly have ripened there as they did unless Jesus had been previously known in Jerusalem.

2. Certain incidents are omitted in St. John which in the Synoptics are crises in the life of Christ.—The omission of the Temptation narrative is perhaps not strange in one who knew the mind of Jesus so intimately. The beloved disciple would be well qualified to understand the parabolic nature of the story. The essence of the Temptation narrative is the possession of Divine power and the refusal to use it for selfish ends. Similarly, Christ's freedom of action, especially in regard to His death, is frequently emphasized in the Fourth Gospel (cf. 10<sup>18-19</sup>). The outward glory of the Transfiguration is merged in a higher glory, which is seen in the communicating of Life and Light to men (1<sup>9</sup>). As regards the omission of the narrative of the institution of the Lord's Supper, it was no doubt unnecessary, at the time at which the Gospel was written, to repeat words that were in common use in the Church. The inner meaning of the sacrament is perhaps displayed in ch. 6, and throughout chs. 13-17, as an abiding union with Christ, and the redemptive death is emphasized elsewhere in the Gospel. It is possible that there had been creeping into the Church superstitious views of the ordinance, and the author is concerned both to bring out the spiritual meaning and to show that the ideas usually connected solely with the institution, of eating and drinking the flesh and blood of Christ, were already familiar to His disciples. It is the washing of the disciples' feet in the Fourth Gospel to which a symbolic meaning is attached (13<sup>8-9</sup>). The Fourth Evangelist omits the Agony in the Garden. It is suggested that he would regard it as incompatible with the dignity of the Logos, and damaging to his conception of the Person of Christ. Certainly the Christ of the Fourth Gospel retains no trace of the Agony when at His word the Roman soldiers fall back on the ground. The Intercessory Prayer also preserves 'an imperial calm.' Yet we must take into account such statements as 12<sup>27-28</sup>, and the recalling of the very words of the Agony in 18<sup>11</sup>. Moreover, it is untrue to say that the Fourth Evangelist regards bodily weakness as incompatible with the Logos. Jesus sits at Jacob's well tired and weary (4<sup>6</sup>). He weeps at the grave of Lazarus, and thirsts on the cross (19<sup>28</sup>). The last passage gives us a key to the author's attitude in reference to the person of Christ. Jesus spoke the words in full consciousness ('knowing,' etc., i.e. they were not wrung from Him), and in speaking them fulfils a great Divine purpose ('that the scripture might be fulfilled'). In his picture of Jesus upon earth, the Evangelist brings out in strong relief attributes of His Person which presented themselves to him in their full significance only through his experience of the Risen Christ. The two conceptions of Christ's humanity and Divinity are naively set side by side (cf. 6<sup>3</sup> 12<sup>20</sup> 11<sup>5</sup> s. d. 4<sup>2</sup>).

The reverse side of the question is presented in the miracle of the Raising of Lazarus. Here the Fourth Evangelist inserts an occurrence which is also a crisis in the last days, and yet the Synoptics do not mention it. The contradiction is partly resolved if we remember that the Synoptic account may really be reduced to one original document closely corresponding to our Gospel of St. Mark, and containing recollections of the preaching of St. Peter. Again, the mere fact that a miracle of raising from the dead has been omitted need excite no surprise. Jairus' daughter also was dead. The difficulty is that the miracle should be one of such central importance in the working out of the end. It may be that in the preaching of the early Apostles, which is the basis for the oral tradition of the Synoptics, the incident would not be dwelt on, considering the hatred provoked against Lazarus himself (12<sup>10</sup>). At all events, the extraordinary knowledge displayed by the Fourth Evangelist of the situation, in the closing days at Jerusalem, leads to the presumption that he is right in the place he gives to the miracle.

3. The date of the Last Supper.—All the Synoptics agree in putting the Last Supper on the evening of 'the first day of unleavened bread,' i.e. on the evening which began Passover day, according to Jewish reckoning (Mt 26<sup>17-20</sup>, Mk 14<sup>12-17</sup>, Lk 22<sup>13-14</sup>). Thus the day of the Crucifixion is the Passover day, or 15th Nisan. On the other hand, the Fourth Gospel regards the day of the Crucifixion as identical with the day of Preparation for the Passover (19<sup>14-15</sup> 4<sup>2</sup>). The rulers would not enter the Pretorium lest they be prevented by defilement from eating the Passover (18<sup>28</sup>). Jn 13<sup>1</sup> puts the Supper 'before the feast of the Passover.' Elaborate and ingenious attempts have been made to bring either the Synoptics into harmony with the Fourth Gospel or vice versa. No successful attempt has yet been made to reconcile the two accounts chronologically, and it does not appear probable that any solution can be found in that direction. The only points on which all four are agreed are that our Lord suffered on a Friday (but see Westcott, Introd. to Study of Gospels, p. 322), and rose again on the following Sunday. We must choose between the Crucifixion on the 14th Nisan (John) or on 15th Nisan (Synoptics).

There are two questions that call for answer. (1) Is this Friday Passover day (i.e. 15th Nisan according to Jewish reckoning from sunset to sunset)? (2) Is the Supper held on the evening of Friday the regular Paschal meal?

(1) There are various internal contradictions in the Synoptic account. Chvolson has challenged the accuracy of the expression 'the first day of unleavened bread' as applied to the day of preparation. He holds that the words can strictly be used only of the first day of the Passover week, i.e. of Passover day itself. It was the case, however, that the leaven began to be removed from Jewish houses in the daytime of the 14th Nisan, and this would be sufficient to account for the phrase. Again, we are told that the Sanhedrin determined to avoid putting Jesus to death during the feast (Mk 14<sup>2</sup>). Did they change their plans? (Mk 14<sup>12-17</sup> and 43-46). Peter is armed, and the servants of the high priest are accompanied by an armed band. This was, strictly speaking, contrary to Jewish law on the Passover days; but the situation might well be regarded as exceptional. It is not so easy to believe that a hurried meeting of the Sanhedrin would be held immediately after partaking of the Paschal meal. Simon of Cyrene is coming up out of the country (Mk 15<sup>21</sup>)—not necessarily from his work, which would, of course, indicate that it was not yet Passover, but more probably to purify himself for the Passover (Jn 11<sup>55</sup>). Again, it is not easy to account for the haste with which it was sought to take down the body of Christ (Mk 15<sup>43</sup>), unless the Passover was imminent. Joseph buys fine linen, and lays the body in the tomb, which could scarcely be done on Passover day. These considerations serve to show that the Synoptic account is at least uncertain. Thus there are also indications in the Synoptic story that go to confirm the clear statement of the Fourth Gospel that Jesus ate the Supper and was crucified on the day of Preparation for the Passover. The only argument against the Johannine position is that urged by Baur and his school, that an attempt is made, in a theological interest, to show that Jesus died on the day on which the Passover lamb was slain.

(2) If we accept the Johannine view, it follows that the Last Supper was not the regular Paschal meal. It is remarkable that in none of the Gospels is there mention of the lamb. John expressly distinguishes the Supper from the Passover (13<sup>16</sup>). At the same time it must not be forgotten that in Lk. Christ speaks of the meal as a Passover (22<sup>15</sup>), and in such a way as to imply that there was some foreboding in His mind that they would not celebrate the Passover together on the legal day. The Thronens Paschale, quoting Clement of Alexandria, says that the disciples learned that Jesus was Himself the Lamb, the food and the wine of the feast. St. Paul seems to imply that he identified in his mind the Crucifixion with the sacrifice of the Paschal lamb (1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>). If the Supper is meant by Jesus to anticipate the Passover meal, the shifting of the day would have as its secondary cause the haste with which the final preparations for arrest were made. At the same time it is hardly correct to say that the Fourth Evangelist is himself conscious of discrepancy with the Synoptics. Observe the phrase in 13<sup>2</sup> would have been more exact. His references (13<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>14</sup> 31. 32) rather imply that a definite tradition is before him. (An exhaustive discussion of the question will be found in Hastings' DB ii. p. 711; Drummond, op. cit. pp. 47-59. See also art. DATES, LAST SUPPER, LORD'S SUPPER.)

4. The conception of miracles.—In the Fourth Gospel the miracles are interpreted as manifestations of Christ's glory, with the view of calling attention to His Person. In the Synoptics they are performed as the outcome of His compassion. St. John certainly lays stress on the evidential aspect of the miracles, but he cannot be said to overlook the motive of compassion. Jesus created wine to add to the happiness of a perplexed marriage party (2<sup>1-11</sup>). 'Whence shall we buy bread, that these may eat?' is a question full of tender feeling (6<sup>9</sup>). After their discouraging and chilling interviews with the Jews, Jesus 'found' both the sick man of Bethesda and the man born blind (5<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>8</sup>), and spoke further words of spiritual healing. The allegory of the Good Shepherd is spoken for the sake of the excommunicated man, and breathes compassion (10<sup>1-18</sup>). The Evangelist guards against the delay of two days being interpreted as a want of compassionate love for the sisters of Lazarus (11<sup>9</sup>). There is nothing in the high claims of Jesus inconsistent with the Synoptic account. Compare the lofty claim that is implied in the sending forth of the Apostles in Mt 10, and the impression produced by His calming of the storm (Mk 4<sup>41</sup>). Note the tenderness and solicitude for the troubled and sorrowful disciples in the valedictory discourses (cf. further, 5<sup>26</sup> 6<sup>7</sup> 10<sup>9</sup> and Mt 11<sup>28-30</sup>, Lk 10<sup>37-39</sup>). We may admit that there is 'a certain heightening of the effect,' as, for example, when we are told that the man at Bethesda had been a cripple for thirty-eight years, and that Lazarus was four days in the tomb. On the other hand, this Gospel is alone in declaring that the miraculous is an interior kind of evidence (14<sup>10-14</sup>, cf. 22<sup>22-23</sup>).

5. The picture of the Baptist has been regarded as inconsistent with the Synoptics. Sometimes, indeed, the Baptist speaks in the manner of the Evangelist, but it has to be remembered that only one aspect of the Baptist, viz. his witness to the Person of Christ, is emphasized. Baldensperger has contended (Prolog des vierten Evangelium) that the Gospel is written with the purpose of combating a sect in Asia Minor who were inclined to exalt the claims of the Baptist above those of Jesus. If we modify his statement so far as to admit that this is one of the aims of the Gospel, and that it has in view such a sect as we are told of in A. D. 182<sup>a</sup>-197<sup>a</sup>, we are provided with the means of explaining the striking introduction of the Baptist as 'a man' sent from God (1<sup>6</sup>); his being contrasted with the Logos in the Prologue; why he is represented in the Fourth Gospel solely as directing his disciples to Jesus (13<sup>26</sup>); why it is stated that the Baptist's work and Christ's went on simultaneously, and that Jesus did not merely take up John's work where he left it (3<sup>22-30</sup>); why the baptism of Jesus is mentioned in such a way as to exclude the conferring of any charism on Him by the Baptist (1<sup>21-28</sup>).

6. It is urged as an objection to the Fourth Gospel that there is a lack of development in connexion with the claims of Jesus. At the very beginning He is hailed as the Messiah (1<sup>41-42</sup>), and as Son of God (1<sup>34-35</sup>). He reveals Himself as Messiah to the Samaritan woman (4<sup>26</sup>). A process of development, however, is represented (e.g. 2<sup>22</sup>) as going on in the minds of the disciples, and the transition is easy, from remembering what Jesus had said, to unconsciously mingling with the actual narrative the expansion of the meaning of words and events through time. Moreover, the narrative moves in growing cycles of belief and disbelief. His reply to His mother (2<sup>4</sup>), His brethren's insinuation (7<sup>5-4</sup>), His own words in 7<sup>7</sup>, the reproof of Philip (14<sup>9</sup>), and the speculations of the crowd (7<sup>26-38</sup>), all indicate that the understanding of men did not keep pace with His own declarations. In this Gospel we still find the echo of the Messias-geheimnis (10<sup>24</sup>; cf. Sanday, op. cit. pp. 162-165). Again, is it not to be expected that if a Fourth Gospel was thought necessary, it would present a somewhat different aspect of Christ's claims and teaching? The Synoptics tell us how Jesus taught the earthenness of Galilean peasants. The Fourth Gospel deals largely with the experience of individuals, and of the inner group of disciples, and the way in which Christ's claims were met by the authorities at Jerusalem (cf. Dods, Expos. Gr. Test. Introduction, pp. 671-676).

IV. HISTORICITY OF THE GOSPEL.—Clement of Alexandria described the Gospel as 'spiritual,' in contrast to the Synoptics, which relate the 'bodily facts' concerning Christ. In the Prologue itself we have an example of the way in which statements of spiritual truth and historical fact are characteristically interwoven, and the Evangelist tells us that he aims at presenting, out of the fullness of his knowledge, such an impression of Christ and of His teaching 'that ye may believe' (20<sup>31-33</sup>). Can we understand more clearly from the character of the Gospel itself the impulses that actuated his mind? Can we in any measure detach the ideal element from the historical in the Gospel?

1. The narrative of events.—(1) There are many signs in the Gospel that the author is narrating facts in which he himself had a personal interest. He claims to be an eye-witness (1<sup>14</sup>). He gives us exact notes of time (1<sup>28</sup> 2<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>50</sup> 6<sup>22</sup> 7<sup>14</sup> 11<sup>6</sup> 12<sup>1</sup> 19<sup>21</sup> 20<sup>1</sup>). The hour of the day is mentioned (13<sup>30</sup> 4<sup>9</sup> 19<sup>14</sup>). Similarly, exact numbers are given (13<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>6</sup> 6<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>13</sup> 19<sup>28</sup> 20<sup>1</sup>). The significance of these marks of real recollection is increased by the fact that they occur chiefly in connexion with incidents of critical importance in the life of Jesus or in the experience of His followers. Note the accurate chronology dealing with the rise of faith in the Apostolic circle (1-2<sup>11</sup>), and with the Passion week (18-20). This Evangelist alone tells us of 'the barley loaves' (6<sup>9-10</sup>), that Mary 'fell down at his feet' (11<sup>2</sup>), of 'the house filled with the fragrance of the ointment' (12<sup>3</sup>). Note also such personal impressions as 13<sup>24</sup> 18<sup>19</sup>. These touches are introduced spontaneously, forming an integral part of the consciousness of the writer.

Again, it is evident that a selection has been made out of a number of incidents that were available (21<sup>26-27</sup>). Incidents related in detail in the Synoptics are implied (7<sup>42</sup> 3<sup>24</sup> 13<sup>28-29</sup>). Barabbas is mentioned without introduction, and the single comment, 'Now Barabbas was a robber,' is full of suppressed meaning (18<sup>40</sup>). The trial before Caiaphas is not described. Two great miracles are related substantially as in the Synoptics (6<sup>2-21</sup>). Compare also the Anointing (12) and the Triumphal Entry (12<sup>23-24</sup>). The Trial scenes and the Crucifixion correspond in the main with the Synoptics. The Denial of Peter gains in verisimilitude by being broken up into separate incidents. The Baptist's words in 3<sup>29</sup> are confirmed by Mt 9<sup>12</sup>. The Baptist's ministry is implied in 10<sup>41</sup>.

(2) The Evangelist describes himself not as a biographer, but as a 'witness.' He brings forward others as witnessing. In 21<sup>24</sup>, if the order is significant, 'witnessing' is looked upon as of prior importance to 'writing.' A governing idea in the writer's mind is 'the truth,' which consists not in historical fact, but in having the mind brought into tune with the Divine facts of love and self-sacrifice. The miracles are not only actualities (ἔργα), they are also signs (σημεία). The Evangelist's mind is specially open to any suggestion of spiritual truth conveyed by the actual facts (e.g. 2<sup>11-17</sup>). Siloam is 'sent,' the sending forth of the waters being typical, perhaps, of the Christ sent of God (9<sup>7</sup>). Judas goes out of the light of the upper room 'into the night' (13<sup>30</sup>). 'It was winter' at the Feast of the Dedication (10<sup>6</sup>), symbolizing the storm of hatred and the chill of indifference that met the warmth of Jesus' love. The use made of the sign in 19<sup>35-36</sup> is also typical of the Evangelist's mind. The reflective character of the writing is seen in the frequent use of καὶ and οὐ as connective particles. He emphasizes on various occasions the doctrine of a higher purpose running through the history (e.g. 11<sup>51</sup>; cf. 'the hour,' 2<sup>4</sup> etc. 3<sup>27</sup> 19<sup>28</sup>). This idea of the sovereignty of God in events is found also in St. Paul, and is not represented in the Christian tradition solely by the Fourth Evangelist. There is also the frank confession that the disciples failed to understand some sayings and incidents at the time, and that only the Spirit, mediated through the teaching of events, revealed the hidden meaning (e.g. 22<sup>67</sup> 12<sup>16</sup>). This is in accordance with the abstract expression of the same idea in 14<sup>26</sup>.

It is impossible fully to understand the author's conception of history without taking into account his clear consciousness that the gift of the Spirit of Truth must be part of the equipment for writing such a narrative as this Gospel (14<sup>27</sup>, cf. 19<sup>35</sup> and the use of ἀπολύσει). The theory of history that is exemplified in the Gospel is summed up in 15<sup>24-27</sup>. Even the situation of distress in the Church at the time he wrote finds its interpretation only in the prophetic words of Christ (14<sup>29</sup> 16<sup>4</sup>).

With a conception of history so far removed from that of the mere chronicler, it is not surprising that the perspective of certain incidents (e.g. the Cleansing of the Temple) has been disturbed. There was a careful selection of those events in the life of Christ that were best fitted to illustrate in all their varying phases the belief and unbelief called forth by the Person and teaching of Jesus, but the Evangelist always starts with what he has seen (14). There are some difficulties of sequence that would be removed by giving a different order to the narrative; e.g. 'Arise, let us go hence' (14<sup>31</sup>), where the discourse is resumed in ch. 15. Again, the discourse in 7<sup>15-24</sup> would be eminently in place at the end of ch. 5. These transpositions might have taken place through various causes after the document had left the writer's hands (see Bacon, Introduction, pp. 271-274).

2. The discourses.—There are differences in style and in length between the discourses of Christ in the Fourth Gospel and those in the Synoptics. At first sight they seem far removed in character. Yet nothing could be farther from the truth than to say that the personal contribution of the Evangelist in the discourses is more apparent than his desire to reproduce the exact words of Jesus, or that he makes use of the Synoptics in mechanical fashion. He has preserved one or two isolated sayings (1<sup>43</sup> 5<sup>3</sup> 6<sup>29</sup> 13<sup>31-32</sup> 20<sup>19</sup>) which are also found in the Synoptics, and the discourse in 5<sup>14-47</sup> contains many coincidences of word and thought with Mt 11<sup>12-19</sup>. (For other coincidences see Westcott, lxxxii.) Yet there is no sufficient evidence to warrant the hypothesis that even in these cases the Evangelist was entirely dependent on the Synoptic narratives, although it is probable that he had them before him. Even the discourses of the Fourth Gospel, when reduced to their elements, are full of short and pregnant sayings, such as we are accustomed to connect with Christ (see a most suggestive collection in Drummond, op. cit. p. 16 ff.). Discourses much longer than any that are found in John are to be found in the Synoptics. It is true that the style of the discourses and the style of the Evangelist are practically identical, but that may be partly due to the fact that the words of Jesus have been translated from the Aramaic. The dialogue form is more fully represented in the Fourth Gospel than in the others, which would rather make for authenticity.

There are indications in the Gospel that the Evangelist is concerned to keep his own ideas separate from those of Christ. The actual Logos idea outlined in the Prologue is never put into the mouth of Christ except as underlying His words in certain cases. He keeps separate his own explanations of words of Christ (2<sup>23-24</sup> 12<sup>32</sup> 7<sup>29</sup>). What can only be an actual saying of Christ is represented as haunting the minds of the disciples in 16<sup>44-49</sup>. Again, in 13<sup>44-49</sup>, in the midst of a passage containing his own reflexions, there is a summary containing a free rendering of words of Christ that are repeated elsewhere in the Gospel; 14<sup>2</sup> would seem to indicate that the same ideas had been expressed before, and would be familiar to the disciples.

On the other hand, it is clear that it is not the concern of this Evangelist to record the precise phrase that 'once for a moment ruffled the air of Palestine.' 'The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life' (6<sup>63</sup>). At one point the disciples think they understand clearly the words they hear, but Jesus shows them their ignorance still (16<sup>30-31</sup>). The teaching by parables appears only as transformed into allegory. In 10<sup>1-19</sup> the image and the interpretation are inextricably intermingled. In some of the discourses the meaning is carried up to a certain point, and is then repeated like a motif, as though the Evangelist sought to express himself more clearly (e.g. the valedictory discourses). There are some cases where there is doubt as to where the words of Jesus end and the words of the Evangelist begin. It is conceivable that a more exact study of his language would afford us critical appliances more capable of detaching the two elements than those we now possess. Abbott, in his Johannine Grammar (2066b), has suggested that where γάρ is used as a connective it is an indication that the Evangelist is entering on his own words. This would certainly suit such cases as 3<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>21-22</sup> 23. 27. At the same time, whatever further grammatical study may reveal, we must be prepared to regard the Johannine tradition of the words of Christ as differing in many aspects from that of the Synoptics. On the other hand, affinities are found in earlier NT writings with the words of Christ as reported in the Fourth Gospel (cf. 1 P 5<sup>2-4</sup> and Jn 10<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>23</sup> and Jn 10<sup>18</sup>; also 1 P 1<sup>8, 23</sup>, Ro 6<sup>18</sup> and Jn 8<sup>24</sup>; Gal 5<sup>7</sup> and 5<sup>22</sup>, Eph 2<sup>26</sup> and Jn 10<sup>16</sup>; Ph 2<sup>3</sup> and Jn 10<sup>17</sup>), and in all probability the question of the historicity of the words of Christ is not a problem peculiar to the Fourth Gospel (see P. Ewald, Das Hauptproblem der Evangelienfrage). The dialogues with the Jews in this Gospel have taken on the abstract form that we should expect if they had often been orally repeated by the Evangelist in his preaching, before they were written down. The discourses themselves are definitely connected with historical situations, and may, in some cases, be the expansion of fragmentary reminiscences. On the other hand, the gaps in the thought seem sometimes to point to abridgement. The problem is the same as in the case of the Sermon on the Mount. The valedictory discourses have no doubt taken their continuous form through the welding together of recollections of the closing days, suggested by the desire to make plain to the early Church their present condition of anxiety and distress and anticipated with solicitous forethought in the prophetic words of the Saviour. The prayer in ch 17 is the prayer of One who has become the Great High Priest of His Church and of humanity. There is no reason for denying that the mind of the writer had a place in the composition of these. The spiritual equipment of the Evangelist is the guarantee for the fidelity of his psychological attitude as a 'witness,' and we must be prepared to trust not only the man himself, but above all his peculiar and intimate knowledge of the mind of Christ. We may thus reverently examine the material of which his unique spiritual experience is composed, but may well refrain from dividing a seamless robe.

The most important works hostile to the traditional view of the authorship are: Bretschneider, Probabilia, 1820; Strauss, Leben Jesu, 1838-1840 (mythical view); Baur, Die Kanonischen Evangelien, 1847 (date a. d. 170, tendency critical); Keim, Jesu von Nazara, 1867 (written by a Jewish Christian, 110-115, under name of Apostle John); J. J. Taylor, An Attempt to ascertain the Character of the Fourth Gospel, 1867; Supernatural Religion, 1874 (replied to by Lightfoot, Cont. Rev., Dec. 1874, Jan. 1875; Sanday, Gospels in Second Century; Luthardt, St. John the author of Fourth Gospel, 1875); Albrecht Thoma, Die Genesis der Johann. Evang., 1882 (Gospel an Alexandrian allegory of Platonic character); Oskar Holtzmann, 1887 (especially valuable for Jewish element in Gospel); H. J. Holzmann, Handcom. zum NT, 1893; Jean Réville, Le Quatrième Évangile, 1901 (unknown author; 'beloved disciple' not an individual but an ideal type); Moffatt, Historical NT, 1901; Schmiedel in Encyc. Bibl. II, art. 'John, son of Zebedee,' and 'Die Johann. Schriften in Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher'; Wrede, Charakter und Tendenz, 1903; Loisy, Le Quatrième Évangile, 1903.

2. A mediating position is represented by: Weiss, Ev. Geschichte, 1888, Die Evangelische Frage, 1896 (discourses and prologue Apostolic); C. Weissiker, Untersuchungen, 1894, reprinted 1901 (written by disciple of John; narratives and discourses in substance historical, but contains a large ideal element); Renan, Vie de Jésus, 1863 (practically abandons the historicity of discourses, but retains narrative as fundamentally Johannine); Hugo Delff, Grundzüge der Entwicklungsgeschichte d. Religion, 1888, Das vierte Evangelium, and Neue Beiträge, 1890; Jülicher, Einführung, 1901 (tr. 1904); B. W. Bacon, Introduction, 1902; Wendt, Lehre Jesu, 1896, I, 215-242, Das Johannesevangelium, 1900 (translator) [a development of the partition theory of Weiss; criticised by Watson Stewart in Reporters, Jan., Feb. 1903, and Drummond, Character and Authorship, pp. 399-401]; Harnack, Chronologie d. altchrist. Literatur, vol. I.

3. The Apostolic authorship is maintained by: Neander, Life of Christ; Luthardt, op. cit.; Andrews Norton, Genuineness of the Four Gospels (all three in answer to Strauss); Bleek, Einführung, 1822, tr. (in answer to Baur); Pressense, Jésus Christ: son Temps, sa Vie, etc.; Sabatier, États sur les sources de la Vie de Jésus; Godet, Introd. and Com. (1864, tr. 1896, posthumous edition, 1901) (still most valuable in every direction); R. H. Hutton in Encyc. Theological and Literary, 1871 (defending historical credibility against Baur); Sanday, Authorship and Historical

Character of the Fourth Gospel, 1872; M. Arnold, God and the Bible (from Contemp. Review, 1875); Willibald Beyschlag, Zur Johann. Frage, 1876, NT Theol. (Eng. tr. I, 216-221); Salmon, Historical Introduction, 1885; Westcott, Introd. and Com., 1881 [classical]; Reynolds, Pulpit Commentary, and art. in Hastings' DB; Watkins, Bampton Lectures, 1890 (especially valuable for external evidence); P. Ewald, Das Hauptproblem der Evangelienfrage, 1890 (seeks to show that the Johannine element has a fundamental place in the entire Evangelic tradition of four Gospels); Gloag, Introd. to the Johann. Writings, 1891 (containing valuable summary of positions); Volume of Essays by Ezra Abbot, A. P. Peabody, J. B. Lightfoot, 1892; B. Weiss, Einführung (tr. 1888), Das Johann. Evangel., 1897; Marcus Dods, Expos. Gr. Test. vol. I, 1897; Zahn, Einführung, 1899; Drummond, Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, 1903 (very significant owing to the theological position of the writer; especially suggestive in treatment of external evidence; displays tendency towards allegorical interpretation); Stanton, Gospels as Historical Documents, I, 1903 [external evidence]; Sanday, Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, 1905 (containing surveys and estimates of recent theories, and valuable criticism of critical methods); Barsh, Biblisches Zeit- und Streitfragen, 'Das Johann. evang. und die Synops. Evang.', 1905.

The series of volumes by Edwin Abbott, entitled 'Dialectica' (esp. From Letter to Spirit, 1903; Johannine Vocabulary, 1905; Johannine Grammar, 1906), contains much fresh matter, suggested by an elaborate study of the language of the Fourth Gospel.

Among articles in magazines may be mentioned W. Milligan in Contemp. Review (Sept. 1867, Aug. and Nov. 1868), and British and Foreign Evangelical Review (Oct. 1871) (directed against Baur and his school); Schürer, Contemp. Review, 1891 (a review of the position of the problem, replied to by Sanday, Oct. 1891); Bacon, Hilbert Journal, April 1893, Jan. 1904, 1905 (has developed theory of editorship by author of 1-3 Jn. and ch. 21); three important articles on conservative side by an anonymous writer in the Church Quarterly Review, 1904-1905. The monograph by Schwarz, Ueber den Tod der Söhne Zebedaei, 1894, while completely hostile to the traditional view, is valuable for certain portions of the external evidence.

R. H. STRACHAN.
JOHN, GOSPEL OF (II.: Contents).—1. Character of the Gospel.—The interesting fragment of Eusebius (HE vi. 14), quoted from the lost 'Outlines' of Clement of Alexandria, gives us the earliest view which was taken of the Fourth Gospel. 'John, last, having observed that the bodily things had been set forth in the [earlier] Gospels, and exhorted thereto by his friends, and inspired by the Spirit, produced a spiritual Gospel.' The word 'spiritual,' or 'pneumatic,' is here, as usually with the Alexandrians, opposed to 'bodily,' or 'somatic.' And what the difference was, as regards the records of the past, is shown admirably by Origen's comment on Jn 2<sup>13</sup>. He says that if all the four Gospels are to be believed, the truth of them cannot be in their 'bodily characters,' but in their spiritual meaning. The Gospels, he says elsewhere (de Princ. 4), contain many things which are said to have happened, but which did not happen literally; and in one place of his Commentary on St. John he says that when the writers of Holy Scripture were unable to speak the truth 'at once spiritually and bodily' (i.e. at once literally and with a deeper symbolical or allegorical meaning), it was their practice to prefer the spiritual to the corporeal, 'the true spiritual meaning being often preserved in the corporeal falsehood' (σώζουσαν τοῦ λόγου τὸ ἀληθὲς πνευματικὸν ἐν τῷ σωματικῷ ψεύδει). So Epiphanius says of St. John's Gospel: 'most of the things spoken by him were spiritual, the fleshly things having been already attested' (Hær. II. 19).

These passages are very important for the study of the Fourth Gospel. They are evidence, not of course, for the author's method of composition, but for what was thought of the Gospel in the latter part of the 2nd cent. and the first half of the 3rd, that is to say, as soon as it was widely known. It was accepted as 'a spiritual Gospel,' and by spiritual was meant, not devotional, ethical, and philosophical, but allegorical as opposed to barely historical.

The distinction between the two modes of treatment was familiar at Alexandria, and had been familiar long before the Fourth Gospel was written. Philo compares the literal meaning to the body, and the spiritual to the soul. He applies this exegetical principle to the OT narratives with great thoroughness. To the literal truth of ancient sacred history he is very indifferent. Particular events are important only in proportion to their universal significance. To grasp the truth of a narrative is to see its relation to universal spiritual law or fact. He would have considered the laborious investigation of historical detail to be merely learned trifling, worthy only of a grammarian or a pedant. Moral edification and gnosis were the only objects for which it was at all worth while to trouble about the records of the past.

We have, of course, no right to assume that the 2nd cent. was right in classing the Fourth Gospel as a 'spiritual' work. We shall have to consider its allegorism in detail before we can pronounce on its relation to history. But it should be perfectly obvious that its author did not mean it to be studied as a plain historical narrative. He would probably have said that he had a higher aim than to record trivial details, some of which had no spiritual meaning. The Gospel is, and claims to be, an interpretation of our Lord's Person and ministry, an ideal construction which aims at producing a certain impression about the Person of Christ. This impression is to be the true interpretation of the historical Jesus—the author is infinitely anxious about this. He is writing no mere historical romance, like the Life of Apollonius of Tyana, which was afterwards concocted as a rival to the Gospels. He is no Docetist, as is shown by several passages in the Gospel, and more categorically in 1 John, which, if not by the same author, is in closest connexion with the Gospel. But a very slight critical investigation is enough to show that he allows himself a free hand in manipulating the facts on which he is working. It is perfectly honest history, as history was understood by the ancients. But even the most scientific of ancient historians did not scruple to put his own views of the political situation into the mouths of the chief characters in his period; and among the Jews the composer of a haggadah had no fear of being branded as a romancer or a forger.

The plan of the Gospel is clearly stated in 20<sup>30, 31</sup>, an impressive passage which was intended to be the conclusion of the book, and was so until the appendix was added. The object here avowed is strictly adhered to throughout. No other book of the NT is so entirely dominated by one conception. The theology of the Incarnation, taught in the form of a historical narrative, with an underlying framework of symbolism and allegory, which, though never obtruded, determines the whole arrangement and selection of incidents—this is the topic of the Fourth Gospel. And unless it is read in the light of this purpose, and with a due recognition of the peculiar method, the seven seals of the Apocalypse will remain set upon the 'spiritual Gospel'.

Different opinions have been held as to the readers whom the writer has mainly in view. Réville thinks that 'the author has wished to prove to his contemporaries who had remained in the liberal and philosophical Judaism of the Diaspora, that, in Jesus Christ, the revelation of the Logos, admitted by them in the OT, has its full and definitive fulfilment.' But the Gospel is not an apologia written for the Jews. The extremely unconciliatory tone, used throughout in speaking of them, is enough to disprove this hypothesis. There is a subordinate element of apologetic, but the main object is clearly to edify and teach the faithful, not to convert the unbeliever. The author never descends to his opponents' ground, but remains throughout on his own. His aim is didactic, but not exactly dogmatic. He wishes, not to prove a theological thesis, but to confirm and perfect the believer in his adhesion to Christ as the Incarnate Word, the principle of spiritual regeneration, and the nourishment of 'eternal' life. This is the foundation of his own faith, and the characteristic Johannine ideas are the intellectual form of this faith, which is centred in the unio mystica. There is no sign of a polemic against Docetism, Ebionism, or against Cerinthus. Still less is he writing against liberalized Judaism, as Réville seems to suggest. Whatever was his attitude towards Philo (and the question is not an easy one to answer), it was not one of conscious antagonism.

The author, then, is writing for Christians. But for what Christians? It has often been maintained or assumed that his object is to teach a philosophy of religion—that he is, in fact, the author of the formula 'Jesus Christ, the promised Messiah of the Jews, is the Incarnate Logos of God.' But this view is untenable. There is no systematic philosophy in the Gospel—not even in the Prologue. And besides, the Logos theology was not new. It is not propounded as new in the Gospel; and it exists in substance in St. Paul's Epistles, as well as in the Hebrews. There can be little doubt that Apollonius, the learned Jew of Alexandria, made this identification in his preaching, which was so mightily convincing. For at this time 'Logos' was as familiar a term to all educated persons as 'Evolution' is to our own generation.

The Gospel is not a philosophical treatise. Is it, then, an attempt to mediate between two parties in the Church, between the advocates of 'Faith' and 'Knowledge,' of Gnosis and Pistis? The conflict between these two parties was acute at the end of the 2nd cent., as we see from the caution imposed upon Clement of Alexandria by conservative prejudice, and on the other side by the diatribes of the obscurantist Tertullian against philosophy. At that period Gnosticism had gained a footing within the Church, and orthodoxy had become alive to the dangers which threatened the Christian religion from this side. The intellectualists were even strong enough to drive Montanism out of the Church. During the first quarter of the 2nd cent. the great Gnostics were outside the Church, and the chief danger was that the party of ψαψ πρωτος, ignorant and superstitious, with materialistic notions of religion and hopes of a coming reign of the saints, might make the position of the Christian philosopher impossible, and drive him into the arms of the Gnostics. Moreover, at the time when the Gospel was written, the inadequacy of both presentations of Christianity was becoming apparent. The primitive revivalism was decaying; the hopes of a Parousia were growing faint; while, on the other hand, Docetism and the fantastic schemes of the Gnostic party were visibly tending to discard the Gospel in favour of a barbarized Platonism. The author of this Gospel interposed his powerful influence to save Christianity from being either swamped in a mythology or sublimated into a theosophy. 'The Jews' demanded miracles, 'the Greeks' a philosophy; this Gospel, like St. Paul, presents both with 'Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God' (1 Co 1<sup>22-24</sup>). The author addresses himself chiefly to the Faith-party, who most needed teaching. He tries to recall them to real history, by subtly spiritualizing the miraculous narratives, to which they attributed too much importance, and bringing out their ethical and spiritual significance. He never makes the slightest attempt to rationalize a miracle,—on the contrary, the miracles which he records are more startling than anything in the Synoptics,—but no stress is laid on any physical portent as momentous in and for itself, or as evidence, apart from its symbolical value as a type of the Person, work, and office of Christ. This design of spiritualizing the tradition is kept in view throughout; but it is carried out so subtly and quietly that it has often been overlooked.

A glance at one of the old-fashioned 'Harmonies' of the four Evangelists makes us realize how few of the events of our Lord's life, before the last few days, are recorded by the Synoptists and also by St. John. And even the few common elements are employed differently, and in different settings. There are notable and irreconcilable differences in the chronology, including, as is well known, a discrepancy as to the date of the Crucifixion. The development of Christ's mission is differently conceived, the Johannine Christ making the most exalted claims to equality with the Father near the beginning of His career, and in the presence of His enemies (2nd 6th 38th etc.), whereas in the Synoptics the question and answer at Caesarea Philippi are clearly intended to be of crucial importance (Mt 16<sup>32nd</sup>). The form and substance of the discourses are also very different, the Christ of the Synoptics speaking as a man to men, as a Jew to Jews; conveying His message in pithy aphorisms, easily understood and remembered, and in homely parables, adapted to the comprehension of country folk. These discourses are directed rather to bringing men to the Father, and to righteousness and consistency of life, than to incantating any doctrines about His own Person; sometimes He expresses His attachment to the Law, and repudiates any intention of abrogating it. Our Evangelist, on the other hand, represents Jesus as taking part in long polemical disputations with 'the Jews,' who are as much His enemies as they were the enemies of the Christian Church 80 years later; the parables have disappeared, and their place is taken by 'proverbs' or symbolic language; and, above all, His whole teaching is centred upon faith in and devotion to Himself. The emphatic ἐγώ occurs 15 times in St. Matthew, 117 times in St. John. Many facts to which our Evangelist attaches great importance are completely strange to the Synoptic tradition. Such are: the marriage in Cana of Galilee, with which the public ministry opens; the conversation with the Samaritan woman; the healing of the paralytic at the pool of Bethesda; the incident of the man born blind; the raising of Lazarus, which in St. John's Gospel appears to have been the immediate cause of the plot against the life of Jesus; the washing of the disciples' feet at the Last Supper; the conversation with Pilate at the trial; the presence of the beloved disciple and Mary at the Cross; the appearance to Thomas after the Resurrection. On the other hand, the writer of the Fourth Gospel omits the genealogy and the birth from a virgin, because it could be of no interest to him to prove that Jesus (or rather Joseph) was descended from king David, and the Incarnation of the Logos is a far grander conception than a miraculous birth by the operation of the Holy Ghost; he omits the Baptism of Jesus, of which notwithstanding he shows knowledge, because, again, the true Baptism is the Incarnation of the Logos in Jesus, and also partly, perhaps, because he is anxious to discountenance the Adoptionist views of the Person of Christ which were prevalent at the time when he wrote; he omits the Temptation, because it is no part of his plan to exhibit Jesus as experiencing any temptation or weakness; he omits the Transfiguration, because in his view the whole life of Christ on earth is a manifestation of His glory, not by visible light but to the spiritual eye; he omits the institution of the Eucharist, because he has already given his sacramental doctrine in his discourse about the Bread of Life (Jn 6<sup>50th</sup>), following the miracle of the 5000, and does not wish the truth of the mystical union to be bound up too closely with the participation in an ecclesiastical rite; he omits the Agony in the Garden of Gethsemane, and the cry, 'Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani,' because the impression which he wishes to convey of the complete voluntariness of Christ's sufferings and death, and of the 'glory' which was manifested by His humiliation as well as by His triumph over death, might be impaired by incidents which seem to indicate human weakness and hesitation; and, lastly, he omits the Ascension and the descent of the Paraclete, because he does not wish the withdrawal of Christ's bodily presence, and the continuation of the Incarnation in another more spiritual form, to be associated with physical portents, or to be assigned to particular days.

There can be no question that these omissions are deliberate, and not the result of ignorance. Those who wish to discredit any of the narratives which appear in the Synoptics, cannot rightly draw any inferences from St. John's silence. Such features of the Christian tradition as the Birth at Bethlehem and the Ascension must have been well known by any well-instructed Christian at the beginning of the 2nd cent., and there are no signs that our Evangelist wishes to correct his predecessors from the standpoint of one who has had access to better information. Not only are incidents like the Baptism referred to incidentally (1<sup>3th</sup>), but an attempt is made to provide substitutes for several of the omitted narratives. Instead of the Davidic ancestry of Joseph, we have the eternal generation of the πατρὸς; instead of the Lord's Prayer, taught to the disciples, we have the High-Priestly prayer of ch. 17, in which almost every clause of the Lord's Prayer is represented, though in each case, except the last ('Deliver us from the evil one'), the petition is changed into a statement that the work has been done, the boon conferred. The institution of Baptism is represented by the discourses with Nicodemus and the Samaritan woman; that of the Eucharist by the miracle in ch. 6 and the discourse on the Bread of Life which follows it. The Transfiguration is represented by the voice from heaven in 12<sup>7th</sup>; while the preceding verse (which should be printed as a question, 'Shall I say, Father, save me from this hour?') is intended to compensate us for the loss of the Agony in the Garden. Lastly, the words to Thomas in 20<sup>29th</sup>—the last beatitude—more than reconcile us to the loss of any description of the Ascension.

The number of miracles is much reduced; but those which are given are representative, and in some cases are more tremendous than those of the Synoptics. The healing of the son of Herod's official (4<sup>46th</sup>) is the only miracle which has the true Synoptic ring; in the others no 'faith' is required in those who are to benefit by the sign, and the object seems to be to manifest some aspect of Christ's Person and work. In the marriage at Cana, the feeding of the multitude, the healing of the blind man, and the raising of Lazarus, the Evangelist himself tells us the spiritual meaning of the miracle, in words spoken either by the Lord Himself or by some one else.

There is, however, a great deal of symbolism in the Gospel which is unexplained by the author, and unnoticed by the large majority of his readers. The method is strange to us, and we do not look out for allegories which would be at once understood by Alexandrians in the 2nd century. A few examples are necessary, to justify the view here taken that symbolism or allegorism pervades the whole Gospel. In 1<sup>3th</sup> John the Baptist designates Christ 'the Lamb of God,' with clear reference to the Paschal sacrifice. The prophetic type of the Paschal lamb dominates the whole of the Passion narrative in St. John. Even the date, it would appear, is altered, in order that Christ may die on the day when the Paschal lambs were killed. The change of the 'reed' of the Synoptics to 'hyssop' seems to have been made with the same object, when we remember the ritual use of hyssop at the Passover. The Gospel abounds in enigmatic utterances, such as 'Thou hast kept the good wine until now' (2<sup>9</sup>); 'It is expedient that one man should die for the people' (11<sup>50</sup>); 'Judas went immediately out, and it was night' (13<sup>30</sup>); in which the reader is plainly meant to see a double meaning. The symbolism is often in three stages. The text presents an apparent sense, which is in figure a second, which in turn points to a third and still deeper signification. Especially in the narrative, a prophetic utterance quoted from the OT is sometimes the intermediate stage in this allegorical construction. The type of the Paschal lamb comes as it were between the literal feeding of the 5000 and the idea that Christ gives His life to take away the sin of the world, and that He may be our spiritual food and sustenance. The words quoted from the Psalms, 'the zeal of thy house shall eat me up,' come in like manner between the cleansing of the Temple at Jerusalem and the idea of the glorification of Jesus as the building of the true Temple, the body of Christ, the Church. There are, we might venture to say, three temples in the mind of the Evangelist—the material temple built by Herod, the temple of Christ's natural body, which was to be destroyed and raised up 'in three days,' and the temple which is the spiritual body of Christ—namely, the Church. Similarly, in 7<sup>38</sup> the quotation, 'out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water,' comes, as it were, between the thrust of the lance and the effusion of the Holy Spirit on the disciples and the Church.

But the most remarkable part of the allegoric method is that connected with numbers. There can be no doubt, in the opinion of the present writer, that the Philonic method of playing with numbers had a strong fascination for our Evangelist. The examples are far too numerous to be accidental. The number 7 recurs in the number of the miracles (omitting ch. 21 from our calculations), in the number of solemn declarations beginning 'I am'; in the number of 'witnesses' borne to Christ, and perhaps in other places. The officer's son is healed at the seventh hour; the paralytic on the seventh day. It is thoroughly in accordance with the method of the Evangelist, that he avoids the word ἔσθι, just as he avoids the two crucial words γινώσκω and πίστευω, which had become watchwords of parties. As for the number 3, perhaps too much ingenuity has been shown in cutting up the whole Gospel into arrangements of 3; but unquestionably the book does lend itself very readily to such classification, and the fact that it is concealed rather than obtruded is in accordance with what seems to have been the method and design of the writer.

With regard to higher numbers, the extreme precision of the Evangelist must excite suspicion of an allegorical motive; and when we find that 38, 46, and 153 can be plausibly explained on Philonic principles, the suspicion becomes almost a certainty. For example, the 153 fish may be the 'fulfilment' of  $10 + 7 + 1 + 2 + 3 + \dots + 17 = 153$ ; or, as Bishop Wordsworth suggests, it may be the square of  $12 +$  the square of 3. It is said that 200 (Peter is 200 cubits from the land) signifies, in the Philonian lore, repentance. The 'forty-six years' since the beginning of the building of the Temple may possibly be connected with the age assigned to Jesus ('not yet fifty years old'); it has been suggested that the Evangelist wishes to make Him seven times seven years old at the Crucifixion; but this is very doubtful. The frequent use of number-symbolism in the Gospel is more certain than the correctness of particular interpretations. These interpretations would occur readily to the 'Gnostic' of the 2nd cent.; to us they must be guesswork.

Some critics, such as Renan, have objected to this discovery of allegorism in the Fourth Gospel, that the allegorist always tries to attract attention to his symbols, whereas St. John clearly does not, but conceals them so carefully that the large majority of his readers do not even suspect their existence. This sounds plausible. But the question really is whether the Evangelist has not done all that he need have done in order to be understood by those among his first readers who knew his method. It is not suggested that the Johannine symbolism was meant for all to understand. There is abundant evidence that those who valued the 'Gnostic' were agreed that it must not be profaned by being explained to all. We find this conviction in Philo, and very strongly in Clement of Alexandria, who, as a Christian, is important evidence. He says that to put the spiritual exegesis before the common people is like giving a sword to a child to play with. He will not write all that he knows, because of the danger that it may get into wrong hands. There are some religious truths which can only be safely imparted orally. There is reason to think that he abandoned his project of putting the coping-stone on his theological works by a book of an esoteric character, because a published treatise cannot be confined to those who ought to read it. Since, then, the existence of the symbolic method, and the obligation of concealing it from the ordinary reader, are both proved, there is nothing strange in the veiled symbolism which we have found to characterize this Gospel.

The Evangelist writes throughout for two classes of readers—for the simpliciores, who would be satisfied by the narrative in its plain sense, and for the 'Gnostic,' who could read between the lines without difficulty. And yet he wishes all his readers to rise towards a spiritual understanding. Again and again he puts the key in the lock—in such solemn utterances as 'I am the Bread of Life—the Light of the World—the Resurrection and the Life.' His own word for the allegoric method is 'proverb' (ἔσθησις). Up to the end of the last discourse, Jesus has spoken to His disciples in proverbs; but the time was coming (after the withdrawal of His bodily presence) in which, through the medium of the Paraclete, He should no more speak to them in proverbs, but should show them plainly of the Father. The proverb is different from the Synoptic παράβολα, which is a story with a religious and moral application—a story which has a complete sense in itself, apart from the lesson, which is generally conveyed by the story as a whole, and not by the details. St. John, however, tries to keep the historical parabolic form in which Jesus actually taught. Yet, in spite of himself, he half substitutes the Alexandrian and Philonic allegory for the Synoptic parable. The double sense runs all through the narrative. Whenever the Johannine Christ begins to teach—whether His words are addressed to Nicodemus, the Samaritan woman, 'the Jews,' or His own disciples—He nearly always begins by enunciating a proposition which contains, under a sensible and symbolic image, a religious truth. The auditor regularly misunderstands Him, interpreting literally what should have been easily perceived to be a metaphor. This gives Jesus an opportunity to develop His allegory, and, in so doing, to instruct the reader, if not the original hearer of the discourse, whom once or twice (as in ch. 3) the Evangelist seems to have quite forgotten. The Johannine Christ loves words which, at any rate in Greek, have a double sense, such as ἀκούω, πίστευω, λέγω (cf. esp. 10<sup>21-28</sup>). Whether the very numerous cases where a verb may be indicative or imperative are intentionally ambiguous, it is not easy to say. The symbolism reaches its height in some of the discourses to the Jews; the last discourses to the disciples are more plain, and in ch. 17, which is the climax of the teaching of the Gospel, the mystical union is expounded with much directness. One of the most difficult problems in connexion with the classes of readers for whom the Gospel was intended is presented by certain explanations introduced by the Evangelist. The chief of these are 2<sup>21</sup> 6<sup>24</sup> 8<sup>7</sup> 9<sup>29</sup> 12<sup>23</sup> 18<sup>9</sup>. These explanations seem to us at times superficial and unworthy of their context. We cannot be surprised that they have given force to partition-theories like that of Wendt, who maintains that the discourses are on a higher intellectual and spiritual level than could be within the compass of the author of parts of the narrative. The difficulties in the way of partition-theories seem to be insuperable. A more plausible hypothesis is that the Evangelist deliberately introduced these childlike observations for the benefit of the simpliciores, trusting to the educated reader being able to divine his purpose. But this theory is not very satisfactory. We have seen that St. John is able to see as many as three meanings in a simple occurrence. And so he may have felt that 'the Temple' might mean Christ's natural body as well as the stone building and the Church of Christ, which last must have been mainly in his mind when he foresaw the downfall of the Jewish sanctuary and all which it represented.

The style of the Fourth Gospel is as different from that of the Synoptics as the matter. Instead of the variety which we find in them, we have a small number of essential thoughts repeated again and again under a small number of images. From this results a strange impressiveness, common in mystical writings, which often share this peculiarity, though to some readers the monotony appears tedious and inartistic. The discourses of Christ have a sweet and melancholy charm, with an indescribable dignity and grandeur; over them all hangs the luminous haze of mysticism, in which mystery seems clear, and clearness itself is mysterious. The phraseology is Hebraic, not Greek; in the Prologue we have a species of rhythm which recalls the old prophets, and in many places we find the parallelism of Hebrew poetry. The arrangement is that of the writer's own thought, not chronological. The appearance of detailed accuracy is not, as has often been seriously argued, a proof of first-hand knowledge, but is due to the vividness of the Evangelist's mental images. The numbers, as has been said, seem often to have a symbolic meaning; the figures, such as Nicodemus and the Greeks who asked for an introduction to Jesus, disappear from the writer's mind as soon as the point is made. No difference can be detected between the style of the various speakers, or between the discourses of Christ and the Evangelist's own comments.

2. Theology of the Gospel.—The first question which meets us is the relation of the Prologue to the rest of the Gospel. Harnack, whose antipathy to the Logos theology apparently influences his judgment, suggests that the Prologue was merely prefixed to the narrative in order to predispose the Greeks in favour of the views which the author was about to propound, views which do not really at all correspond with the Logos philosophy as they understood it.

The Prologue brings in conceptions which were familiar to the Greeks, and enters into these more deeply than is justified by the presentation which follows; for the notion of the incarnate Logos is by no means the dominant one in the Gospel. Though faint echoes of this idea may possibly be met with here and there in the Gospel,—I confess I do not notice them,—the predominant thought is essentially that of Christ as the Son of God, who obediently executes what the Father has shown and appointed Him (ZTAK II. 180 ff.).

This strangely perverse judgment has evoked protests from several critics who understand the Gospel better than Harnack, among others from Réville, who has certainly no bias in favour of traditional views. It would be easy to show that every one of the dogmatic statements in the Prologue is reasserted in the body of the Gospel. For the pre-existence of the Logos, beyond time, in personal relation to, and in essential union with, God, cf. 6<sup>52</sup> 8<sup>58</sup> 14<sup>10</sup> 17<sup>5-24</sup>. For the Logos as the Agent in creation, and its life-giving and sustaining principle, cf. 6<sup>52</sup> 8<sup>58</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>. (From the nature of the subject-matter, there is not much cosmological teaching in the Gospel; but what there is, is in full accordance with the Prologue.) For manifestations of the Logos before the Incarnation, by revelations and by His immanent presence, cf. 8<sup>58</sup> and 9<sup>1</sup>; 'whenever I am in the world,' etc. There is thus chapter and verse in the Gospel, and in Christ's own words, for every statement in the Prologue; and though Jesus never calls Himself the Logos, this sublime conception of His personality pervades the whole narrative. The stumbling-block to Harnack and others has been what some critics (e.g. Beyschlag and Réville) have called the 'contradictory double theology' of the Gospel. By the side of a conception of Christ's Person which seems to class the Evangelist as a speculative mystic or Gnostic, we have statements which seem to belong to the school of Christianity which was dominated by Jewish positivism. Such doctrines are the actual 'becoming flesh' of the Logos, as opposed to a theophany 'under human form'; and the repeated mention of 'the Last Day,' a conception with which, as Reuss says, 'mystical theology has no concern.' But the Evangelist does not write or think as a philosopher. The supreme merit of his book as a Gospel is that he does not write the life of Christ as a Christian Platonist might have been tempted to write it, but keeps a firm hold on the historical Jesus, and on the concrete facts in His teaching. There is, undoubtedly, a double thread of the kind indicated. In some parts of the narrative we feel that 'tabernacled among us' is a truer description of the character of the Johannine Christ than 'became flesh.' There is an aloofness, a solitary grandeur, about the central figure which prevents Him from seeming fully human; while in other places there is an approximation to the Synoptic portrait. But it is only to the minute critic that these difficulties become apparent. To the religious consciousness of Christendom there has never been any hesitation in recognizing the profound agreement between the Synoptic and the Johannine presentations of Jesus Christ. See, further, art. LOGOS.

The intense ethical dualism of the Fourth Gospel is another perplexing phenomenon to those who look for philosophical consistency in a religious treatise. Christian Platonism, into which the Logos theology passed as its most important ingredient, seems to leave no room for a personal devil, or for human beings who are children of the devil. It seems rather to favour the conception of evil as mere privatio boni. St. John, however, is quite unconscious of any such difficulty. Although the Logos is the immanent cause of all life, so that 'without him nothing whatever came into being,' the 'darkness' in which the light shines is no mere absence of colour, but a positive malignant thing, a rival kingdom which has its own subjects and its own sphere. Some critics have even been reminded of the metaphysical dualism of Manichean speculation. This last, however, is in too flagrant contradiction with the Logos theology to effect a lodgment in the Evangelist's mind. The Logos is the true light which lighteth every man as it comes into the world. But since the philosophical problem is not present to the mind of the writer, he is not careful to draw the line between the ethical dualism which was part of his religious experience, and the metaphysical dualism which would have subverted the foundations of his intellectual system. The sources of this ethical dualism may be found partly in the spiritual struggles of an intensely devout nature, but to a greater extent, probably, in the furious antagonism of Judaism to nascent Christianity, a hostility which, to a Christian, must have seemed really diabolical. The temper of his own age was unconsciously transferred to the ministry of Jesus, who certainly could not have adopted the attitude of uncompromising antagonism to 'the Jews' which we find in this Gospel. But it is worthy of note that some of the devotional literature of later times, which shows the closest affinity with Johannine ideas,—the Theologia Germanica is a particularly good example,—displays the same extreme ethical dualism as the Gospel. Stöckl, in criticising the Theologia Germanica from the standpoint of modern Romanism, finds in it the 'Gnostic dualism' which, with equal justice, he might have detected in parts of the Fourth Gospel. In neither the one nor the other does the distinction correspond with the Gnostic division of mankind into pneumatic and psychic, with an impassable gulf between them. Compare, e.g., the Evangelist's use of the word 'in 15th'.

(1) Doctrine of God the Father.—According to the logic of the system, it has often been said, God should always manifest Himself through the Logos. No man hath seen or heard God at any time (1st 5th 6th). So Philo holds that there can be no immediate communication between God, who is transcendent and unknowable, and the world. Nevertheless, it is impossible to impose this philosophical idea upon St. John. His God is not the unknowable 'One' of the later Platonism. He is Spirit (4th), that is, on the negative side, He is non-material, not appreciable by sense, spaceless and timeless. Yet He is not darkness, but Light; and light includes the ideas of radiation and illumination. Further yet, He is Love. He loves the world. As loving the world, He is the principle of action, the principle of the activity of the Logos. He is the Father, who 'draws' men to Himself. Several other passages (e.g. 5th 3rd, 9th) imply independent direct action by the Father. Still, we must not over-emphasize this as a proof of the Evangelist's disagreement with Philo. Philo, no doubt, could not acknowledge an Incarnation; but the idea of theophanies was naturally very familiar to him from his OT studies. There is nothing un-Philonic in the 'voice from heaven' (12th). Philo, too, speaks of 'a voice formed in the air, not coming from any animate body.'

(2) Doctrine of the Holy Spirit.—The dualism of Flesh and Spirit in St. John is one expression of the ethical dualism of which we have spoken above. It is very clearly set forth in the conversation with Nicodemus, when Christ says that no one can see the Kingdom of God unless he be born from above (or afresh). This He explains by repeating that unless a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot see the Kingdom of God. 'That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit.' This regeneration by water and the Spirit is the birth from above, not a simple moral renovation, but a real communication of the Divine Spirit. Natural generation is only a feeble image of this supernatural generation, which, says Loisy (perhaps too boldly, in the absence of any expression of this thought in the Gospel), 'is attached to the same order as the Incarnation of the Word.' St. John does not draw this comparison; but he says of the elect that they 'were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God' (1st). The sphere of the Spirit forms a world absolutely opposed to the world of the flesh. What, then, is the content of this world of the Spirit? Since God is Spirit, the world of Spirit is the world of God, and partakes of the Divine attributes. It is absolute and indestructible; the Father 'hath life in himself,' and has given this absolute life to the Son also. Even so the Son can transmit it, 'quickening whom he will.' The Spirit quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing: it was to communicate to men a life which they have not naturally, that the Word became incarnate. This gift of spiritual life is figured as 'the bread from heaven' and 'the living water,' symbols which, as the Evangelist was far from forgetting, are the outward and visible signs in the two great Sacraments. The Divine gift is also typified as Light and Truth, words which imply an illumination of the intellect. So in 17th life eternal is defined as the knowledge of (or rather, the process of knowing) the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom He sent. This advancing knowledge is the highest form of life. Those who 'are of the truth' listen to the words of Christ; but the contemptuous or careless question of Pilate, 'What is truth?' receives no answer. The truth also 'makes us free'; it breaks the yoke of sin. In opposition to this higher world, St. John develops the idea of the cosmos, which is the direct opposite of the Spirit. It has only the appearance of life; he who has been redeemed from it 'has passed from death into life' (5th). It is therefore possible to call the devil the prince of this world; although the passage from the kingdom of the world to that of the Spirit is open (3rd and 17th). Jesus Christ, who has full possession of the Spirit, is come to raise men from the sphere of the world into that of the Spirit. Thus, the Johannine soteriology contemplates an enrichment, not a restoration, of human nature. The Evangelist regards sin as essentially a failure to recognize the Divine in the world. Those to whom the light has not been brought are blind, but not guilty; those to whom it has appeared, and who turn their backs upon it, are the typical sinners. From henceforth, these lovers of darkness are doomed to destruction (ἀπόλεια), when Jesus shall 'overcome the world' as a triumphant conqueror.

The relations of the Spirit to the Logos are difficult to define. What, for example, was the office of the Spirit in the world before the Incarnation? Life, as we know, was immanent in the Logos: there seems to be no room for another πνεῦμα ζωοποιόν. The descent of the Holy Spirit upon Jesus at His baptism is referred to in St. John, but not described. To him, the Baptism could have no such importance as it appears to have in the Synoptic record. The Spirit was given to Christ 'without measure' from the first.

During the ministry we do not hear much of the Spirit. St. John tells us bluntly (7th) that 'There was as yet no Spirit, because Jesus was not yet glorified.' Instead of the Spirit, we have a quasi-independent power ascribed to the words of the Lord Jesus, which are spoken of in the same sort of way in which Philo speaks of the λόγος and δυνάμεις. Jesus insists that the words are not His own, but come from God (3rd and several other places). The words are, of course, inoperative, unless they are received and taken into the heart: but if they are so received, they will abide in the heart as a living and spiritual principle (15th 6th). 'He that keepeth my words shall never see death,' says Jesus (8th), and St. Peter exclaims, 'Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life' (6th): that is to say, not words about eternal life, but words which confer eternal life, as in 8th. Of the disobedient, He says, 'The word which I have spoken will judge him at the last day' (12th); and to His disciples, 'He that heareth my words hath passed from death unto life' (5th); 'Now ye are clean through the word that I have spoken unto you' (15th). The word or words would thus seem to exercise all the functions of the Paraclete. But they must not be identified: for the words were addressed to all who heard them; the Paraclete was given only to the faithful disciples. Moreover, the ministry of the Spirit, properly speaking, begins only after the glorification of Jesus Christ. Remembering that the Johannine theology implies a Trinitarian doctrine of equality and oneness between the three Persons of the Trinity, we may still say that the office of the Son, during the period of His sojourn on earth, was to reveal the Father, while the office of the Holy Spirit was, and is, to reveal the Son.

St. John takes no interest in purely speculative or dogmatic questions, and therefore he does not trouble himself about such questions as the office of the Holy Spirit, as distinguished from that of the Logos, before the Incarnation. From the practical point of view it is possible to say, as he does, that 'there was as yet no Spirit' before Jesus was glorified. After this glorification, although the action of the Holy Spirit is often represented as that of Christ Himself returning to His own, there is a difference between the mode of action of the Incarnate Christ and that of the Holy Spirit. Not only is the former external, the latter internal; but the Incarnate Christ addressed Himself to all who came into contact with Him, and was obliged to adapt His teaching to the limited intelligence of His auditors. The Paraclete is a principle of spiritual life in the hearts of believers, on whom He acts directly and without intermediary. His work consists in glorifying Christ, bearing witness to Him and continuing His work of revelation. It is quite useless to ask whether, for St. John, the Paraclete is a distinct hypostasis in the Godhead. The category of personality is quite foreign to the Evangelist, as to his whole school, and no answer to such a question can be drawn from his words. The Evangelist does not speculate about the relation of the Spirit to the Father, who 'sends' Him. The expression 'God is Spirit' (not 'the Spirit') expresses, so to speak, the quality of the Divine nature; it does not assert the identity of the Father and the Holy Ghost, any more than ὁ θεὸς ἦν ἰσὺς in the Prologue asserts such an identity between the First and Second Persons. The Evangelist is much more concerned with the relation of the Paraclete to Christ. This indeed is one of the dominating thoughts of the Fourth Gospel. Jesus 'baptizes with the Holy Ghost' (1<sup>26</sup>); that is to say, the gift of the Holy Ghost is an end of the ministry of Jesus. A very important passage is 14<sup>17</sup>, in which Jesus says that the world cannot receive the Paraclete 'because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him: but ye know him; because he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you.' The words 'dwelleth with you' must refer to the presence of Jesus Himself, who has received the Spirit in absolutely full measure, in the midst of His disciples: after His departure the Spirit 'shall be in you,' a condition which did not yet exist at the time when the words were spoken. This gift was, in a manner, communicated when, after the Resurrection, Jesus breathed on the disciples and said, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost.' But it would be quite foreign to the thought of the Gospel to attach importance to the physical 'insufflation' as the vehicle of the gift of the Holy Ghost. The gift would follow in response to the prayer of Christ (14<sup>16</sup>). He would be sent in Christ's name (14<sup>26</sup>). Jesus Himself will send Him (15<sup>26</sup>). After the gift has come, when the disciples have entered into the sphere of the Spirit, they will still look to Christ as the principle of their life. He will still be the true Vine, of which they are the branches. It is even possible for Him to promise, 'I will see you again'—certainly not with reference to the appearances after the Resurrection, but to the spiritual vision which has nothing to do with bodily presence (16<sup>19-20</sup>). So when He says, 'I have declared unto them thy name, and will declare it' (17<sup>26</sup>), the intention does not refer to any future discourses with the disciples on earth, before or after His Passion, but to the relations which will exist between Him and them under the dispensation of the Spirit. The expressions 'we will come unto him, and make our abode with him' (14<sup>23</sup>); and 'I will come again and receive you unto myself' (14<sup>23</sup>), have the same meaning, though in the latter passage there may be a special reference to the 'coming' of Christ at the death of each believer. There is no reference in St. John to such a picture as that drawn by St. Paul in 1 Co 15. In Jn 16<sup>13</sup> there is a remarkable statement about the Paraclete, that 'he shall not speak of himself . . . he shall take of mine and shall show it unto you.' The relation of the Paraclete to Christ is thus exactly the same as that between Christ and the Father (cf. 5<sup>19</sup> 6<sup>28</sup> etc.).

But the special office of the Spirit in the world begins with Christ's departure from earth. The death of Christ, in St. John, has not the same significance as in the Pauline theology. St. John even shrinks from the idea of death in connexion with the incarnate Logos. 'The death of Christ,' says Reuss, 'in the Johannine theology, is an exaltation, not an abasement. The end of the ministry of Christ,' says Réville, 'is not, properly speaking, His death. His death is in reality a deliverance.' The redemptive element in the death of Christ is not His suffering, but His glorification. And yet we must not forget that the idea of sacrifice, and of Christ as the true Paschal Lamb, is frequently in the mind of the Evangelist. It appears not only in the 'testimony' of John the Baptist (1<sup>29, 30</sup>), but in the High-Priestly prayer, where the words 'for their sakes I consecrate myself' (17<sup>19</sup>), have a definitely sacrificial meaning. This doctrine was part of the Christian tradition, which St. John accepts heartily without attempting to bring it into line with his own dominant ideas. It is, however, true to say that it is by His life, and not by His death, that the Johannine Christ gives life to the world. 'Because I live, ye shall live also' (14<sup>19</sup>). The principle of life within them will be the Holy Spirit. As Paraclete, He will be their defender and helper against all adversaries, ghostly and bodily. He will also be their Comforter (we cannot wonder that some have defended this meaning of Paraclete); He will change their sorrow into joy, as a grain of wheat dies only to live again, or as a woman, when she is in travail, exchanges her pain for joy that a man is born into the world; He will guide them into all truth—a word which in St. John has a predominantly moral significance. His action on the unbelieving 'world' is one of 'conviction' (ἀποκρίσις, 16<sup>8</sup>), a Platonic expression, of somewhat obscure meaning. St. John does not seem to contemplate any direct action of the Holy Spirit, except in the hearts of the faithful: the office assigned to Him in the Anglican Catechism, as the 'sanctifier of all the elect people of God,' is quite Johannine; but indirectly He will show in their true colours, and condemn, those who are the enemies of Jesus Christ. See, further, art. HOLY SPIRIT, 14 (6).

3. Scheme of the Fourth Gospel.—After the Prologue begins a section of the Gospel which may be called 'The Testimony.' We have first the testimony of John the Baptist, then of the disciples, then of 'signs'—the miracle at Cana. The Evangelist next describes how Jesus manifests Himself, first in Judæa, then in Samaria, and thirly in Galilee. But another thread seems to run through these chapters, which also lends itself to the arrangement in triplets. We might call these first chapters the doctrine of Water. First we have the water of the Law superseded by the wine of the Gospel, typified by the changing of the water into wine at the marriage-feast; next we have the water of purification mentioned in the discourse with Nicodemus; and thirdly, the water of life, the nature of which is expounded in the dialogue with the woman of Samaria. In ch. 5 begins the second of the three great divisions of the book, which should be called the Conflict or eplosis. After two more 'signs' a prolonged controversy with the Jews is described, in which the divergence between Christ and the hierarchy becomes more and more acute, till the final catastrophe is seen to be inevitable. The tension comes to breaking point after the final 'sign,' and the end of Christ's public ministry. It is at this point that the unstable 'multitude' quits the scene with the significant question, unanswered like that of Pilate, 'Who is this Son of Man?' (12<sup>34</sup>). In these chapters also a subordinate thread may be discovered in the doctrine of Bread (ch. 6), the doctrine of Light (ch. 8), and the doctrine of Life (the transit through death into life a spiritual law). The third part of the Gospel may be called the Chorification (ὁδοί). Jesus reveals Himself to His disciples in a series of esoteric discourses, addressed to them only, in view of His approaching departure from them. This section culminates in the High-Priestly prayer (ch. 17). Then follows the narrative of the Passion, conceived throughout as the glorification of Christ through self-chosen suffering. The humiliation and sacrifice, no less than the triumph of death, are part of the ὁδοί. This part of the Gospel ends with the appearance to Thomas, and the 'last beatitude.' Ch. 21 is an epilogue.

2. Characteristic Words in the Fourth Gospel.

(1) Life (ζωή).—In the Prologue an interesting and rather important question of punctuation arises in connexion with this word. Ought we to read with AV ζωὴς ἀπὸ τοῦ αἰῶνος ὁδὸς ἐν ἡμῶν. ἐν ἀπὸ τοῦ αἰῶνος, or, with ACD and nearly all the Ante-Nicene Fathers who comment on it, should we put the full stop at ἐν? The former view, which is supported by Chrysostom, has prevailed in modern times, though several authorities, such as WH, put the stop at ἐν. The latter theory seems to give a richer and deeper meaning, and one more completely in accordance with the religious philosophy of the Gospel. 'All things were made by Him (as the instrument), and without Him nothing came into being. That which has come into being was, in Him, life.' The Logos is the vital principle from whom all that lives derives its life. Whatever life exists in the world was, eternally, timelessly, in Him. To have 'life in Himself' is an eternal attribute of God the Son; all that appears on this fleeting scene exists, so far as it exists, by participation in His life. In short, the Logos, as life, is a cosmic principle. The idea that all things pre-existed eternally in the mind of God, and are, as it were, unrolled as the ages go on, was familiar to Jewish thought. But St. John's doctrine is more Greek—that the things of time derive whatever reality they possess from a sphere of higher reality beyond time and place. With this accord the other passages in the Gospel where Life is mentioned. In 6<sup>51-52</sup> Christ is declared to be the Bread of God which cometh down from heaven to give life to the world. Whoso eateth His flesh and drinketh His blood hath eternal life. He who is closely united to Christ—who makes the life of Christ his own—has the principle of life within him. In 17<sup>3</sup> the knowledge of the Father and of the Son is said to constitute eternal life. This knowledge can be possessed only through the indwelling of Him who is the principle of life. The same idea recurs in 11<sup>25</sup>, and in 14<sup>6</sup> Christ, 'in whom all things consist,' as St. Paul says (Col 1<sup>3</sup>), is Himself the Resurrection and the Life, and the Way, the Truth, and the Life. Accordingly, the Life is a present possession rather than a future hope. He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life (3<sup>36</sup> 5<sup>24</sup>).

Christ came that we might have life, and have it abundantly (10<sup>10</sup>). See LIFE.

(2) Truth (ἀλήθεια).—St. John's use of this word cannot be paralleled in the Synoptics, but it occurs in the Epistles of St. James, St. Peter, and St. Paul. Typical examples of the use of the word in this Gospel are 1<sup>17</sup> 'grace and truth came by Jesus Christ'; 8<sup>32</sup> 'the truth shall make you free'; 14<sup>6</sup> 'I am the truth'; 16<sup>12</sup> 'the Spirit of truth shall guide you into all truth'; 17<sup>17</sup> 'thy word is truth.' Christ, however, came 'to bear witness to the truth' (18<sup>37</sup>), so that it must have been in the world before the Incarnation. Those that 'are of the truth' heard and accepted Him. From these passages we gather that 'the truth' is all that really exists in every sphere, and this is why Jesus Christ, as the Logos, calls Himself the Truth (cf. Scotus Erigena: 'certius cognoscas Verbum naturam omnium esse'). Recognition of this brings freedom, because truth corresponds with the law of our being. For those who have eyes to see, all experience is a commentary on, and witness to, Christ's religion. But the children of the evil one, who was a liar from the beginning, cannot hear the words of truth (8<sup>44</sup>).

(3) Closely akin to Truth is Witness (μαρτυρία). This idea is never absent from St. John's mind, particularly in the earlier part of his Gospel. Every event in history, every experience, is valuable as a witness to the truth. Christ is the centre, to whose Person and claims everything testifies. The Father bears witness concerning Christ. Christ bears, and yet does not bear, witness concerning Himself (5<sup>31</sup> contrasted with 8<sup>14</sup>); the Spirit will bear witness concerning Him (15<sup>26</sup>); cf. 1 Jn 5<sup>9</sup> 'it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth'; John the Baptist and the disciples bear witness (1<sup>7</sup> 15<sup>27</sup>); especially the Evangelist himself (19<sup>35</sup> 21<sup>24</sup>); the Scriptures bear witness (5<sup>39</sup> 40); and lastly, the 'works' of Christ bear witness (10<sup>25</sup> 14<sup>11</sup>). The 'witness,' therefore, is found in every avenue through which the truth can reach us. Converging from all sides upon the Person of Christ, it is the means of progressive initiation (ὅσα γὰρ ἐκεῖ καὶ γὰρ ὁρατοίρα, 10<sup>28</sup>) into the whole truth—that is to say, into the knowledge and love of Christ. The contradiction in 5<sup>31</sup> and 8<sup>14</sup> is only partially explained. Christ makes a unique claim for Himself (in 8<sup>14</sup>), as having full knowledge of past, present, and future.

(4) Light (φῶς).—When the First Epistle, putting into terse and definite phrases the teaching of the Gospel, says that 'God is light' (1 Jn 1<sup>5</sup>), it means, in modern language, that it is the nature of God to communicate Himself. This self-communication is effected through the Logos as the principle of life. 'The life was the light of men' (1<sup>9</sup>). Christ is 'the true light which lighteth every man as he comes into the world.' There is not much room for doubt that this is the right translation of 1<sup>9</sup>. The 'coming' is repeated or continues; cf. 9<sup>9</sup> 'whenever (ὅταν) I am in the world, I am the light of the world.' The Evangelist certainly asserts that there were earlier partial Christophanies, as there will be later and even greater Christophanies through the Spirit. And yet there is a sense in which Jesus could say, 'Yet a little while is the light with you' (12<sup>35</sup>).

(5) The Light converges upon one point, where it shines forth as Glory (δόξα), another very characteristic word. Christ was in glory with the Father before the world was (17<sup>5</sup>); an important passage as negating the pantheistic conception that the Word is only the life and light of the world—that the world is the complete and only expression of His being. He was incarnate to 'glorify' the Father on the earth (17<sup>5</sup>), and thereby was also glorified Himself (13<sup>31</sup> 14<sup>13</sup>). The Spirit, too, will glorify Christ by making Him more fully known (16<sup>4</sup>). It has been said that in St. John the universe is the poem of the Word to the glory of the Father.

(6) Judgment (epais).—As at the creation God divided the light from the darkness, so the Incarnation necessarily and naturally divided mankind, condemning those who would not receive the light. This is 'the judgment' (3<sup>9</sup>). With regard to Christ's own function as Judge, we have another formal contradiction (cf. 12<sup>48</sup> 3<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>47</sup> with 5<sup>22</sup> 7<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>30</sup>). The contrast is striking, but the Evangelist's meaning is clear. The coming of Christ disclosed an actual relation; He made no new, more severe laws; He only revealed, in all its unfathomable depth, the gulf that yawns between God and the devil, and between their respective servants. The 'one that seeketh and judgeth' (8<sup>17</sup>) is the eternal power of righteousness which is symbolized in the Law (5<sup>4</sup>), and expressed in the Gospel (12<sup>48</sup>). At the same time, the judgment is a personal one, and is committed to Christ as a son of man (5<sup>27</sup>). Mankind is judged by a human standard, though by the standard of humanity at its best.

(7) World (kosmos).—It is remarkable that St. John uses kosmos, while the Synoptics use alwv. The former is the Greek, the latter the Jewish way of envisaging reality; for the Greeks pictured it more readily under the form of space, the Jews under that of time. The 'world' is the sum-total of existence viewed (by abstraction) without the spiritual world. It is 'the things below' (8<sup>20</sup>), as opposed to 'the things above.' The concept is therefore an abstraction for certain purposes, and has no real existence, for the world is upheld in being only by the Logos, who is 'not of the world.' It comprises all that belongs to the categories of time and place. Christ 'came into the world' at His incarnation, and He is 'in the world' till His death and glorification. He prays not that His disciples may be taken out of the world, but that they may be kept from the evil. From this idea comes that of the world as human society as it organizes itself apart from God, hence the severe judgments passed upon the world; e.g. 1 Jn 5<sup>19</sup> 'the whole world lieth in the wicked one,' and similar phrases in the Gospel. Thus the world is that which is external, transitory, and corrupt. The Evangelist, it need hardly be said, does not follow up the thought of the unreality of the world apart from God, into acosmistic speculations. Thinkers who have done so have been driven into a purely negative conception of evil, and have often drifted into a dreary pantheism. But St. John, as we have seen, presents us with an intense ethical dualism, including a belief in a personal or quasi-personal devil, who is the de facto prince of this world.

(8) To believe (πιστεύειν).—This, and not the substantive πίστις, is St. John's chosen expression. The verb has two constructions: (1) with the dative (5<sup>24</sup> 8<sup>30</sup>), both mistranslated in AV, to believe a person or statement—accept the veracity of the former, or the truth of the latter; and (2) π. εἰς τινά—a construction characteristically Johannine, which occurs only once in the Synoptics (Mt 18<sup>8</sup> = Mk 9<sup>24</sup>). In the Synoptics generally faith is relative to a particular object—the condition of obtaining some special miraculous benefit. But in St. John faith is allegiance to Jesus Christ, and, as such, a condition of eternal life (1<sup>12</sup> 6<sup>40</sup>), which is also a progressive state, depending on knowledge (17<sup>2</sup>) as well as faith. The Evangelist studiously avoids πιστεύω as well as πίστις, using in both cases the verbs only.

(9) Love (ἀγάπη).—This is the new commandment (13<sup>34</sup>). Love is the bond which unites the Son to the Father, the disciples to the Son, and the disciples to each other. 'As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you' (15<sup>9</sup>). 'That the love wherewith thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them.' The virtue of love is no vague sentiment, but shows itself necessarily in action. 'He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me' (14<sup>21</sup> 23). Love is not to be sharply distinguished from faith, though the former is a state mainly of the affections, the latter of the will and the intellect. Theologians who developed the Johannine ideas further, like Clement of Alexandria, agree that faith is the beginning, love the crown, of the spiritual life. Faith and love are both simple states, and, as Clement says, 'are not taught.' The soul passes out of the simplicity of faith, through the multiplicity of strenuous interests in the life of duty, into a second and more Divine simplicity, and immediacy of intercourse with God. St. John's teaching about love culminates in ch. 17, in which our Lord seems to imply that the 'name' of the Father, which He has declared to His disciples, is Love.

(10) The miracles of the Fourth Gospel.—The miracles in St. John are either 'signs' (σημεῖα), in which case their abnormal and also their symbolic character is emphasized, or 'works' (ἔργα), in which case no distinction between natural and supernatural is thought of, and the 'works' are only component parts of the one 'work,' to do which Jesus came into the world. The Johannine Christ does not wish faith in His person to rest on the signs, though He allows them a legitimate weight in fortifying a weak faith. It is better to believe for the sake of the words than of the works, He implies in 14<sup>11</sup>; and the last beatitude (20<sup>30</sup>) is a reproof of Thomas, who believed only when he had ocular testimony to the Resurrection. The seven miracles selected by the Evangelist have the value of acted parables, and in some cases the symbolical significance is clearly indicated.

(1) The miracle at Cana in Galilee (2<sup>11</sup>).—Christ is represented as beginning His public ministry at a wedding. Unlike the Essenes, and unlike John the Baptist, Jesus was not personally an ascetic. He drank wine, and ate what was put before Him. There was, indeed, a special appropriateness in this festivity at the beginning of His ministry, when He had just called together His family of Apostles, whom He loved to compare to a bridal party (cf. Mt 9<sup>15</sup> ||). The miracle may have taken place on the last of the seven days usually given up to bridal festivities. The occasion gives Christ an opportunity to assert the superior sacredness of His mission to any family ties (His words to His mother convey an unmistakable rebuke), and also (through the mouth of the master of the ceremonies) to indicate symbolically the supersession of the water of the Law by the good wine of the Gospel.

(2) The healing of the official's son (4<sup>46</sup>).—The miracle of healing, performed for the benefit of a court official (βασιλικός) of Herod Antipas, is the only 'sign' of the Synoptic type recorded in St. John. The miracle is conditioned by the faith of the father; it is a work of mercy, pure and simple, and no symbolic meaning can easily be detected in it.

(3) The paralytic at Bethesda (5<sup>14</sup>).—This work of healing at first sight resembles the last, and it introduces the situation, familiar in the Synoptics, of a quarrel with the strict legalists about Sabbath observance. But the Evangelist has a deeper lesson to convey by this work of healing on the Sabbath, one which profoundly modifies the whole conception of the way in which that day should be kept. 'My Father worketh hitherto, and I work' (v. 17). That is to say, the Sabbath rest of God is unimpeded activity, and that is the true notion of rest, as opposed to inertia. It follows that a mere negative abstinence from exertion of every kind is not an intelligent or acceptable mode of honouring God. The verse is also theologically important, as separating the Christian idea of God the Father from the Neo-Platonic Absolute, and from the God of such speculative mystics as Eckhart and Silesius. Lastly, by co-ordinating His own activity with that of the Father, Jesus claims to be Himself Divine.

(4) The feeding of the five thousand (6<sup>25</sup>).—This miracle is also recorded by the Synoptists, but St. John tells it with a very different purpose. In no other miracle is the didactic purpose, referred to by St. Augustine, more apparent. 'Interrogatus ipsa miracula quid nobis loquantur de Christo; habent enim, si intellegantur, linguam suam. Nam quia ipse Christus Verbum Dei est, etiam factum Verbi verbum nobis est.' How much this miracle is an acted parable is shown by v. 20, where, in answer to the challenge of the Jews, Christ does not make any appeal to the miracle as a 'sign.' His answer is, 'My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven—not only in one miraculous act, but always. In v. 24 the metaphor is misunderstood by the hearers (a favourite literary device of the Evangelist), and then comes the great saying in v. 25. The device recurs in vv. 26-28. The discourse on the Bread of Life does not refer directly to the Eucharist, which had not yet been instituted; but the Evangelist undoubtedly wishes, by narrating it, to spiritualize and generalize the Eucharistic doctrine current when he wrote, and to check the tendency to formality and materialism (cf. esp. v. 63). In v. 21<sup>c</sup> there is clearly an allusion to the Paschal lamb, the blood of which was sprinkled on the lintels and doorposts; and therefore the thought of sacrifice was already in the mind of Jesus. But the leading idea is that of identifying ourselves with the life of Christ, being reborn into His spirit; this union constitutes eternal life. Christ is Himself the gift which He brings; even through apparent failure He fulfils His work (vv. 24-28). A spiritual preparation is needed to understand how a man can thus unite earth and heaven (vv. 24-26); but in part the question is answered in the OT (vv. 22-24), and in part the believer must co-operate (vv. 27-28). Man lives only by participation in the virtues of Christ's life and death, which brings with it a personal union between the believer and Christ (vv. 28-29). The whole discourse (lógos, not 'saying,' v. 25) seemed 'harsh' (εὐχρηστος) to those who heard it; it pointed to self-devotion, and surrender even to death. Accordingly, many even of His disciples left Him. Christ thereupon said (v. 25), 'Does this offend you? What if ye shall see the Son of Man ascend where he was before?' When the bodily presence is withdrawn, and the flesh entirely disappears, the meaning of the 'harsh discourse' will be made manifest—viz. that the union with Christ is spiritual, and therefore a truth for all times and places. Unlike the eating of manna by 'the fathers,' which only nourished their bodily frames for a few hours, the bread from heaven confers eternal life. The flesh profiteth nothing; the words which He spoke to them were spirit and life. This language would bring great comfort to the disciples of the Evangelist's own day, when the 'hope deferred' of the Second Coming was making many hearts sick. It can hardly be an accident that the designation of the traitor, which in the Synoptics occurs at the same hour as the institution of the Eucharist, in this Gospel follows immediately the discourse on the bread of life. The whole passage represents, under another form, the narrative of the Last Supper.

(5) The walking on the sea (6<sup>16</sup>). is closely connected with the more important miracle, and merely illustrates the power of Christ over another element.

(6) The man born blind (ch. 9).—The disciples are confronted by one of the most perplexing problems of life—that of a vie manquée. A beggar lies before them, who has been blind from his birth. Was this crippling infirmity a punishment for his own sins, either in a previous state of existence or in anticipation of those which he was going to commit, or for the sins of his parents? Jesus says that neither explanation is the right one; the reason is 'that the works of God might be made manifest in him.' He adds that for all alike 'the night cometh, when no man can work.' The moral difficulty about the justice of human suffering receives no direct answer. The most significant verses in the discourse about the Light of the world are 28, 29, 41. Jesus has come into the world for judgment, not only for a discernment of good and bad people, but (as a necessary result) to procure for the first eternal life, and to pardon the last. The blind man typifies humanity converted to Christianity, coming out of darkness and made to see by Christ; while the representatives of Judaism, proud of their enlightenment, are struck with blindness—'blind leaders of the blind.'

(7) The raising of Lazarus (ch. 11).—The narrative of this, the last and greatest of the seven 'signs,' contains several characteristic features. The suggestion implied in v. 3 does not induce Jesus to hurry His action at all. He deliberately waits two days before starting for Judaea. Similarly in 28<sup>c</sup> the Evangelist is anxious to show that He did not act upon His mother's suggestion. Still more instructive is the misunderstanding of Christ's words in v. 12, and the conversation of Martha (v. 22<sup>c</sup>). She makes a half request, which she does not dare to put directly (v. 2), to which Christ answers: 'Thy brother shall rise again.' Martha misunderstands this to refer to the resurrection at the last day. But Christ did not mean either this or that He intended to bring Lazarus to life again. Just as in ch. 6 He refuses to mention the miracle, in reply to the question 'What sign showest thou?' (v. 26), but gives as the sign the declaration, 'I am the bread of life'; so here He does not invite attention to what He is about to do, but to His own Person. 'I am the resurrection and the life.' The deep significance of this is often missed. If the words referred only to the approaching miracle, they would convey but hollow comfort to the Christian mourner, for whom no miracles are wrought; if we take them to refer to the future resurrection at the last day, we are forgetting that the words were spoken as a correction of that thought. The words bid us concentrate our thoughts upon the Person of Christ. 'He that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live; and he that liveth and believeth on me shall never die.' This is not a promise of resurrection; it is a denial of death. The resurrection is a personal communication of the Lord Himself, not a gift to be obtained from another. Martha had spoken of a gift to be obtained from God and dispensed by Christ. Jesus answers that He Himself is (not 'will give or procure') the Resurrection and the Life. By taking humanity upon Himself He has revealed the permanence of man's individuality and its indestructibility. The Incarnation brought life and immortality to light. Death is abolished; the grave has been robbed of its victory by the fact that Christ lives, and is the life of the individual believer. In Him all that belongs to the completeness of personal being finds its permanence and consummation. Because He is the Life, He must also be the Resurrection; in other words, our true life is hid with Him in God. The dead in Christ are alive, in virtue of their union with Him who is the Resurrection and the Life. After this sublime lesson, the physical miracle seems almost an anti-climax, a thing to be half regretted, like the restitution of Job's large fortune and his flourishing family by his second marriage. But not only is the miracle a parallel in act to the verbal revelation which precedes it, but it emphasizes the very deep lesson that though life in its highest sense is indestructible, we must pass through the gate of death in order to reach it. This is one of the profoundest and most characteristic doctrines of Christianity. Those who have found in the maxim 'Die to live' the kernel of Christ's religion, have penetrated a large part at least of His 'secret'. This, and the lesson that it is the Person of Christ Himself, revealed as the Resurrection and the Life, rather than the hopes of a gift to be one day conferred by Him, that should be the truest consolation for mourners, are the two main points in the narrative of the raising of Lazarus.

Conclusion.—The Fourth Gospel gives us an answer to the question, 'What think ye of Christ?' Moreover, it maintains that the answer to this question is the dividing-line between light and darkness. To know Christ is to know the Father; and no man cometh to the Father except by Him. The Christ 'whom to know is to live' is not, of course, merely the human Jesus, but the eternal Word who tabernacled among us in human form. The Evangelist would have accepted Bengel's dictum, that 'conversio fit ad Dominum ut Spiritum.' But he regards the identification of this spiritual power with Jesus of Nazareth as essential. The vigorous words of 1 John (1<sup>3</sup>-4<sup>1-3</sup>) unquestionably express the Christological position of the author of the Gospel, even if some doubts exist as to the common authorship of the two books. It is the peculiarity of the Johannine theology that we pass backwards and forwards between the universal and the particular, between time and eternity, present and future, outward and inward. To the philosopher this oscillation is most perplexing; but it is the true normal pulsation of the spiritual and moral life, in which we may always trace a double movement of expansion and contraction. On the one hand, we must lose our souls in order to find them, we must die daily in order to live. We must continually pass out of ourselves, forget ourselves, and identify ourselves with interests of which we are not the centre. We must enlarge our life till there is nothing selfish, personal, or limited about it. And, on the other hand, exactly in proportion as we succeed in doing this, we shall enrich our lives and become more keenly conscious of the worth and value of our own souls in God's sight. There will be no blurring of individual distinctions, no Buddhist absorption in the Infinite, but a growing sense that the soul of man is the throne of the Godhead, and his body the temple of the Holy Ghost.

JONAH (Jonas, Heb.  $\text{יֹנָתָן}$  'dove,' AV of NT Jonas).—A prophet, the story of whose mission to Nineveh is related in the Book of Jonah, and who is probably to be identified with the Jonah of 2 K 14<sup>25</sup>; referred to by our Lord twice at least (see below) in the Gospels (Mt 12<sup>39-41</sup> || Lk 11<sup>29-32</sup> and Mt 16<sup>4</sup>).

Certain of the scribes and Pharisees, not content with our Lord's many miracles or signs (cf. Jn 12<sup>37</sup>), some of which were, after all, like those performed by their 'sons' (Mt 12<sup>27</sup>; Lk 11<sup>19</sup>), demanded of Him a special sign, most probably, as in Mt 16<sup>1</sup> || Mk 8<sup>1</sup>, from heaven, since such a sign would at once attest His Divine mission (cf. Jn 6<sup>26-27</sup>). He replied: 'An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall no sign be given to it [and we must naturally understand such a sign as they demanded] but the sign of Jonah the prophet; for as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the whale, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. The men of Nineveh shall stand up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it: for they repented at the preaching of Jonah; and behold, a greater than Jonah is here.' The parallel account in Lk. has the appearance of being a summary report of that in Mt., and there are some notable differences. In place of the reference to the three days, Lk. has, 'For even as Jonah became a sign unto the Ninevites, so shall also the Son of Man be to this generation,'—words which many think refer only to Jonah's preaching. Again, the verse concerning the rising up of the men of Nineveh in the judgment follows that referring to the queen of the south instead of preceding it as in Mt. The reference to Jonah in Mt 16<sup>4</sup> was obviously made on another occasion; it contains only the words, 'An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign [here plainly from heaven, cf. v. 1]; and there shall no sign be given unto it, but the sign of Jonah.'

Although it is not the purpose of this article to discuss the difficulties connected with the story of Jonah as told in the OT, or to consider the arguments advanced for and against the historicity of the book, it will yet be necessary to allude to some of them in connexion with the problems arising out of our Lord's references to the prophet. Those who maintain the historicity of the Book of Jonah, and who hold that it contains a record of facts, find no special difficulties in our Lord's allusions to it.—He referred to Jonah and to facts in his history, just as He referred to other historical personages and to facts in their history, as to Abraham, for instance, to Moses, or to the queen of Sheba; for such persons the only difficulties are the subordinate ones belonging to the exegesis and application of the passages in question. On the other hand, those who deny the historicity of the book, and who hold, with whatever modifications, that the story is a fictitious symbolic narrative with a didactic purpose, like some others in the OT and in the Apocrypha, find many grave difficulties in our Lord's use of the book—difficulties which perhaps do not admit of an absolutely certain solution. Before, however, adverting to them there is a preliminary point to be considered.

It has been maintained by some that Mt 12<sup>40</sup> is no part of our Lord's original utterance, but is either an amplification by the Evangelist of 12<sup>39</sup> (and cf. Lk 11<sup>30</sup>, Mt 16<sup>4</sup>), or at least a very early interpolation. Against the verse it is said: (1) It runs counter to the Gospel history, for according to that history Jesus had wrought many signs, and could not therefore say, 'No sign shall be given.' (2) The resurrection was not a sign to the men of that generation, i.e. such as they demanded (cf. Ac 10<sup>41</sup>). (3) The clause is unnecessary, and interferes with the balance which without it exists in Mt 12<sup>39-42</sup> || Lk 11<sup>29-32</sup>, for it was Jonah's preaching and the consequent repentance of the Ninevites, in contrast with His own preaching and the indifference of the men of His generation, to which Jesus especially alluded; His words without v. 40 are a complete answer to their demand for a sign: the repentance-preaching Jonah was a sign to the Ninevites of God's mercy; the repentance-preaching Jesus of Nazareth was a sign, though a greater one, to the Jews. (4) Add that (3) harmonizes well with Lk 11<sup>30</sup>, which was perhaps the original out of which Mt 12<sup>40</sup> was evolved. (5) There is the difficulty about the reckoning of the three

To these objections it may be replied: (1) There is no contradiction of the Gospel story, for the scribes and Pharisees plainly demanded a sign of a different character from those which they had so far witnessed (see above). (2) The resurrection was a sign, since the Apostles proclaimed it (Acts and Epistles passim), and made it the corner-stone of their teaching about the Christ. (3) V.<sup>40</sup> is unnecessary only on the gratuitous assumption that Jonah's preaching was the only way in which he was to be a sign to the men of Christ's generation; the introduction in v.<sup>40</sup> of another particular in which Jonah was to be a sign does not weaken or interfere with what our Lord says about the prophet's preaching. (4) Lk 11<sup>30</sup>, instead of being the original, may well be a summary report of Mt 12<sup>39</sup> as suggested above,—an explanation rendered not improbable by the whole form and tenor of the passage in Lk. referring to Jonah. (5) This difficulty, such as it is, makes rather for than against the authenticity of the verse (see below). To these replies it may be added: (6) There is some ground for the conjecture that allusion was made on another occasion by our Lord, and also by St. Paul, to Jonah's deliverance after three days from the 'whale' as typifying the resurrection (Lk 24<sup>46</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>), it being much more unlikely that the reference in these places is to Hos 6<sup>2</sup> or Gn 22<sup>3</sup>; and this may be thought to add some strength to the probability that our Lord did utter the words recorded in v.<sup>40</sup> (cf. also Mt 27<sup>52</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Jn 2<sup>19</sup>). (7) There is no textual authority for the rejection of the verse. On the whole, the conclusion that this verse is really part of our Lord's original utterance can be fully justified.

We have now to consider briefly the difficulties connected with our Lord's use of the story of Jonah on the supposition that the book is not historical, but a fictitious narrative with a didactic purpose. (1) Did our Lord cite details from the story of Jonah as facts, He Himself thinking them to be facts? If we reply in the affirmative, we must admit that our Lord was not completely omniscient, and that on a point of literary knowledge He was and could be in error. Into a discussion of the great question of the limitation of our Lord's human knowledge we cannot, of course, enter here; it must suffice to point out that the most earnest maintainers of our Lord's Divinity have in all ages recognized, in view of such passages as Mt 24<sup>38</sup> (RV) || Mk 13<sup>35</sup>, Lk 24<sup>45</sup>, Ph 2<sup>7</sup>, not only a gradual growth of His human knowledge, but even a mysterious limitation of His knowledge of Divine things; and however difficult it may be to understand the union of the Divine and the human in one Person, we must not, in maintaining His Divinity, forget that He was 'perfect man.' 'Is it,' asks Dr. Sanday, 'inconsistent with our Christian belief to suppose that He who called Himself the Son of Man, along with the assumption of human flesh and a human mind, should also have assumed the natural workings of such a mind, even in its limitations?' (Bamp. Lect. viii. p. 415). (2) But did our Lord know in Himself that the story of Jonah was fiction and yet cite details from it as though they were facts, His hearers thinking them to be such? Here, again, we might reply in the affirmative, and that without detracting from our Lord's honesty as a moral and religious teacher, for He would have been but speaking according to the beliefs of His hearers, as many other teachers in all ages have done. Speaking to children in knowledge, He spoke to them as such. In this way, it is nearly universally agreed, we are to explain His words about Hades and Abraham's bosom in the graphic parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus; i.e. in warning and in inculcating truth He spoke according to the beliefs of His hearers and of His age, without necessarily endorsing those beliefs as true. (3) Or did both our Lord and His hearers, the scribes and Pharisees, regard the story of Jonah as a parable or fictitious narrative, like others in the OT and in the Apocrypha, and did He thus refer to it? Although in view of To 14<sup>4-8</sup>, 3 Mac 8<sup>8</sup>, Jos. Ant. IX. x. it is not very probable that our Lord's hearers regarded the book as fictitious, we might yet admit without hesitation that part of our Lord's reference could be thus explained. Even so firm a maintainer of the historicity of Jonah as Huxtable writes in the Speaker's Commentary: 'The reference to Jonah's experiences, as yielding an illustrative parallel to what would be seen in His own case, or even as predictive of it, seems as cogent on the supposition of the book being an inspired parable, as on that of its being authentic narrative.' And in fact a teacher might, without doing any violence to right teaching, cite well-known fiction (The Pilgrim's Progress, Rasselas, Shakespeare's characters) to enforce warnings or moral truth, and so could our Saviour have done. There is, however, an objection to this explanation, besides that referred to above, which, if it be not a fatal one, is at least of considerable force, viz. that our Lord would not naturally have said of persons whom a fiction represented as repentant, that they would rise up in the Judgment; nor would He have put as a parallel case to a fiction the facts of the queen of Sheba's visit to Solomon.

It does not seem possible to pronounce a decided verdict in favour of any one of these hypotheses to the exclusion of the others, though it may be allowed that (3) contains more of difficulty than (1) or (2); and whilst of these latter (2) is perhaps the more attractive, (1) can certainly be held without belittling our Lord's Divinity or detracting from His authority as a moral and religious Teacher, and without weakening the force of the lessons for all generations derivable from the use He made of the story of Jonah for the edification and warning of the men of His own day.

It remains to notice the difficulty connected with the reckoning of the three days and three nights. It is certain that this length of time did not literally elapse between the burial and the resurrection of Christ, and the commentaries in explanation usually follow the lead of St. Jerome and of St. Augustine, who point out that we must understand the passage on the principle that the part is taken for the whole; and accordingly it is usually said that our Lord was in the 'heart of the earth' on three day-night periods or νυκθημερα (reference is made to Gn 1<sup>5</sup> etc., Lv 23<sup>34</sup>, 1 S 30<sup>12-13</sup>, 2 Ch 10<sup>12-14</sup>, Dn 8<sup>4</sup> margin). It must be confessed, however, that this explanation seems somewhat forced, in view of the peculiar form of the sentence in v.<sup>40</sup>, and there is not a little to be said against it; and it is perhaps more satisfactory to suppose that our Lord was speaking only in general terms. At any rate the difficulty, such as it is, lends support to the arguments for the authenticity of the verse, since if it were an amplification by the Evangelist, or an interpolation, the Evangelist or the interpolator would hardly have made our Lord utter a prediction expressed in a form not in literal and precise accord with the facts of the resurrection as related in the Gospels.

It is worth noticing that the story of Jonah had a peculiar interest for the early Christians; his deliverance from a strange sea-monster is depicted many times in the Roman catacombs as typifying the resurrection.

JONAM.—A link in our Lord's genealogy (Lk 3<sup>30</sup>).

JORAM.—Son of Jehoshaphat, named in our Lord's genealogy (Mt 1<sup>9</sup>).

JORDAN.—1. Name.—The name of this river is in the OT יַרְדֵּן; LXX Ἰορδάνης, Ἰορδανος, Ἰορδάνης; NT always Ἰορδάνης; Jos. Ἰορδάνης, Ἰορδανος.

The form of the word Yardên is difficult to explain. To say, with Ewald (Auf. Lehrbuch der heb. Sprache, p. 426), or with Ohlhausen (Lehrbuch der heb. Sprache, p. 403), that the primitive form is Yardân or Yardân, does not help us much; and we can hardly suppose, like Stade (Lehrbuch der heb. Grammatik, p. 170) or Winkler (Attonen. Forsch. I, p. 422 f.), that it is a word borrowed from another language, seeing that it is accompanied by the article, it might be better to hold, with Seybold (MNDPF, 1896, p. 10 f.), that the LXX has preserved the real vocalization, Yordan, formed on the analogy of Yordan, shubân. The name of the Jordan has not yet been found in the cuneiform inscriptions; but it figures in an Egyptian text (Aanak, I, xxiii. 1) in the form of Y-ura-du-na (W. M. Müller, As. u. Eur. pp. 97 f., 196).

The word יַרְדֵּן is a common noun, and is therefore always accompanied by the article (יַרְדֵּן), with a few exceptions, which will be pointed out below. Yet it is worthy of note that we have no single passage in which Yardên is treated with certainty as a common noun.

From the point of view of etymology, it is most natural to connect this word with the verb יָרַד 'to descend', and this is how it is treated by the prevalent opinion, found, however, more frequently among geographers than among philologists, according to which the Jordan is 'the descending', 'the flowing', a name which might, of course, be applicable to any stream of water, and which, in a single particular case, would have become a proper name, just as the Hebrews called the Euphrates נַהַר, 'the river.' But it is more probable that, while retaining the root יָרַד as our starting-point, we should interpret Yardên as the place to which one goes down, sc. to drink, i.e. 'the watering-place.' Two authors, Seybold (MNDPF, 1896, l.c.) and Cheyne (Encyc. Bibl. II, col. 2575), have, independently of each other, suggested this explanation. If this derivation is correct, the modern Arabic name of the Jordan would be a literal translation of the old name, for they call it ash-Sheri'a, 'the watering-place', and more fully ash-Sheri'a el-Kebireh, 'the great watering-place', to distinguish it from another stream, its tributary, the Sheri'at el-Manadireh (Yarmuk). However, there is found also among the Arabs the name el-Urdunn, an approximate transcription of the Hebrew name (cf. Kampffmeyer, in ZDPF xv, [1892] p. 27; Ed. König, Lehrgebäude der heb. Sprache, II, I, p. 481).

We must mention one other way of explaining the name of the Jordan, which used to be in great favour with the Fathers of the Church as well as the Jewish teachers. According to this interpretation, the name Jordan may be divided into Jor and Dan, and these two monosyllables denote the two sources of the river. Dan, that is to say, is the name of the city of Dan, formerly Laish or Leshem (Jos 18. 19th), and consequently that of the branch of the river issuing from it; Jor is the name of the other stream, and Jordan is the final name of the river from the point where the two branches unite. This explanation was given by St. Jerome, and accepted by many writers after him. An attempt has been made to support it by interpreting Jor as a contraction of Ye'ôr (יְעוֹר), a Heb. word meaning 'watercourse,' and used especially in reference to the Nile. This strange etymology has now no interest except that of curiosity, and is not upheld by anybody, any more than another found in the Talmud (Bechoroth, 55), which takes Yardên to be a contraction of Yeredan or Yored-dan, and thus brings in both the verb 'to descend' and the name of the city of Dan.

The only passages in which Yardên is used without the article are: (a) Job 40<sup>26</sup>, where it may be equally well translated by 'the Jordan' or 'a river'; but several commentators doubt whether the text is reliable; Budde suggests deleting this word as a gloss; Gunkel and Winkler change it into Ye'ôr (יְעוֹר), because in the same passage reference is made to the Nile; Cheyne into Gidôn (גִּדּוֹן) for the same reason. (b) Ps 42, where eref hay-Yardên (עֲרֵף יַרְדֵּן) seems to denote 'the country of the Jordan,' i.e. probably the region round about the sources of the river, which is confirmed by the mention of Hermon or rather the Hermons (in the plural) in the same verse. It must be observed, however, that, according to the Talmud, the river bore the name of Jordan only between the Lake of Tiberias and the Dead Sea, a statement which is neither confirmed nor contradicted by the Bible, and cannot be proved in any way; we may add that, according to some writers, the present custom is exactly the opposite, for it is alleged—has the claim any foundation—that at the present day only the part of the river above the lake is called Urdunn, and the part below, Sheri'a.

The word Jordan in the rôle of common noun is further proved by the expression 'Jordan of Jericho' (יַרְדֵּן יְרִיחוֹ), in the construal state. The meaning of this will be examined below, in connexion with the lower course of the river near where it falls into the Dead Sea.

2. General geography and geology.—The total length of the valley of the Jordan, from its source to its mouth at the Dead Sea, is 120 miles. It stretches from north to south in a practically straight line. It begins as a continuation of the Beke'a (Coele-Syria), that valley which stretches between the Lebanon on the west and the Anti-Lebanon on the east, but whose waters run towards the north. Almost immediately after leaving Lake Huleh, which is 7 feet above the level of the Mediterranean, the Jordan begins to fall below the level of the sea; the Lake of Tiberias is 682 feet, the Dead Sea 1292 feet, below it. There is not another example of such a marked depression on the surface of our globe, except with tracts covered by the seas; the other cases which may be cited attain much less depths; the greatest is about 300 feet in the Sahara, while, taking into account the depth of the Dead Sea (1300 feet), we get a total of almost 2600 feet. G. A. Smith has well said (HGHL p. 407): 'Among the rivers of the world the Jordan is unique by a twofold distinction of Nature and History. . . . The Nile and the Jordan, otherwise so different, are alike in this, that the historical singularity of each has behind it as remarkable a singularity of physical formation. . . . Every one knows the incomparableness of the Nile. . . . In its own way the Jordan is as solitary and extreme an effect of natural forces. There may be something on the surface of another planet to match the Jordan Valley; there is nothing in this.'

As regards the geological explanation of this remarkable phenomenon, we may say that it was supplied in the 19th cent. in a very satisfactory manner by the experts who made a study of Palestine, and the valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea in particular: Fraas, Hull, Lartet, and Blanckenhorn. The following is briefly the result of their labours. When, during the Eocene period, and even before it, during the Cretaceous period, successive strata of limestone had been deposited, there was produced towards the end of the Eocene epoch, by the action of lateral (east and west) pressure, a falling away, i.e. a 'fault' or fracture was formed in the earth's crust. This movement, however, was not of a convulsive nature, it was not a sudden cataclysm, but a slow and gradual process, extending over a long period of time. The result of it was the formation of the parallel chains of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, and further south that of the two ranges of hills which skirt the Jordan valley. The southern end of this depression is, from the point of view of the flow of water, a transverse ridge reaching 650 feet above the Red Sea and the Mediterranean, and situated about 46 miles from Akabah and more than 73 miles from the Dead Sea.

At the end of the Miocene and the beginning of the Pliocene period, the waters in the Jordan valley must have been just about at their present level. But the pluvial period (Pliocene) brought about a considerable raising of the aqueous surface enclosed; the Jordan valley became a lake which must have been about 200 miles long and more than 2000 feet deep. The glacial period (post-Pliocene), during which the temperature sank considerably and the rainfall increased, only served to accentuate this state of affairs still more. Then, at the close of this period, the streams of water diminished, and also the lake, until things once more arrived at their present state. On the lateral slopes of the valley traces of the heights to which the waters rose are still distinguishable; some of the most notable of these traces are 1180, others 347, feet above the present level of the Dead Sea.

Alongside of this theory, held in common by those who have studied this question, we must mention, as worthy of attention, the one which W. Libbey, Professor of Physical Geography in the University of Princeton, has recently published (Libbey and Hoskins, The Jordan Valley and Petra, ii, pp. 251-260).

The ancients were completely ignorant of the fact that the bottom of the Jordan valley lay below the level of the Mediterranean Sea. Nor were they aware at that time that the depression between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akabah was intersected by a sort of natural barrier, forming two anticlinal slopes and making a dividing line for the waters. And even in the first part of the 19th cent. it was held by Carl Ritter, W. M. Leake, de Hoff, Léon de Laborde, etc., that formerly—perhaps even in historical times before the catastrophe of Sodom and Gomorrah—the Jordan passed through the Dead Sea, continued its southward course, and flowed into the Red Sea. Those are ideas which have had to be given up. It was in 1836-37 that two German scholars, von Schubert and Roth, and at the same time two Englishmen, G. H. Moore and W. G. Beke, discovered that the Jordan valley sank far down below the level of the sea. The Austrian Russegger, the Frenchman Jules de Bertou, and the Englishman Symonds soon confirmed this sensational discovery, as a consequence of explorations carried on in quite an independent way. Before them, famous travellers, such as Seetzen (1806-07), Burckhardt (1810-12), Irby and Mangles (1817-18), had visited those same parts without any suspicion of the strange phenomenon regarding the altitude.

The course of the Jordan is interrupted twice—first by the Lake of Huleh, a description of which occurs later in the course of the present article, then by the Lake of Tiberias or Sea of Galilee (which see); we have not to examine this here. These interruptions quite naturally cause us to divide the next part of this article into three sections: (a) the sources of the Jordan, (b) the Upper Jordan as far as Lake Tiberias, (c) the Lower Jordan from the Lake of Tiberias to the Dead Sea.

3. The sources of the Jordan.—Just as in the Alps the traditional opinion of mountaineers does not always show as the principal source of a river the one which tourists or even geographers would denote as such, so is it with the Jordan. The most northerly of its sources, the one which gives rise to the stream which covers the longest distance, is found near Hasbeya, at 1846 feet above the sea, at the foot of the Great Hermon. The name Hasbani is given to the river which starts there and flows towards the south, following a course parallel at first to that of the Litani; between these twin valleys there is only a short distance and a ridge of mountains of moderate height; so that one might quite well imagine the Hasbani rejoining the Litani, and falling along with it into the Mediterranean. But, on the contrary, it remains faithful to its course from north to south, and is joined by a tributary, which some modern scholars would include among the sources of the Jordan—the Nahr-Bareighit (Plea River), 'the smallest of the four sources of the Jordan' (Libbey and Hoskins, i, p. 89), but which is usually left aside, so that attention may be given only to the three other more important ones. These are, besides the Hasbani, the one which springs forth at Tell el-Kadi, and the one which emerges from the grotto of Banias. The Tell el-Kadi source is called the Leddán. This unexplained name is interpreted by some as containing an allusion to the city of Dan, situated in this region, and generally (G. A. Smith, however, is an exception, HGH, pp. 480, 678) identified with Tell el-Kadi, Kadi, 'judge', being considered the exact equivalent of the Heb. Dan. The source of Tell el-Kadi is doubtless, in the sense that it streams forth, at 500 feet above the sea, in two places close together under a hillock which is about 300 feet broad and covered with tall trees, and rises in a very striking manner from the plain, over which it towers about 60 feet. The stream which flows from it is the shortest but most copious of the sources of the Jordan; it is not, therefore, on account of its abundance, but because of its short length, that Josephus calls it 'the little Jordan' (BJ iv. i. 1; Ant. viii. viii. 4), or 'the lesser Jordan' (Ant. v. iii. 1). Lastly, we find the 'river of Banias,' Nahr-Banias, which starts at 1200 feet above the sea from a grotto, the ancient shrine of the Semite, and then of the Græco-Roman gods, well known under the name of Paneion, and round which arose the city known under the names of Cæsarea Philippi and Paneas, and now called Banias, a corruption of the latter name. Josephus mentions, under the name of Paneas, both the town and the district of which it was the centre; he also mentions the Paneion, and speaks of 'the famous fountain' (cf. BJ i. xxi. 3, iii. x. 7; Ant. xv. x. 3, xviii. ii. 1). He adds that the water of the source comes from Lake Phiale, situated 120 stades from Cæsarea; this is, undoubtedly, the small lake nowadays called Birket-Bam (cf. Schumacher in ZDPV ix. [1886] p. 256 f.), but it is only 60 stades distant. There is, however, no subterranean communication between this lake, an ancient volcanic crater, and the Paneion source.

The Leddán and the river of Banias meet at an altitude of 148 feet, after the Leddán has flowed 5 miles. A little farther down, the Hasbani, in its turn, becomes united with them: whence the Jordan is formed.

4. The Upper Jordan.—From the confluence, which we have just mentioned, to the Lake of Tiberias the course of the Jordan is unimportant from a historical point of view. The books of the Bible do not speak of it, and later writers very seldom. Nor, from a specifically geographical point of view, has this part of the river any great importance. Its chief interest lies in the fact that at 10 miles distance from the confluence it forms a lake or lagoon, the Bahr or Buheirat (lake or small lake) Huleh, triangular in shape, the level of which is 7 feet above the Mediterranean, and which is rich in papyrus plants. The size of this sheet of water varies very much according to the seasons:

at one time it is a considerable limpid stretch, at another it is simply a kind of huge morass. Its traditional identification with 'the waters of Merom' (Jos 11<sup>a</sup> 7) must be regarded with caution (cf. ZDPV ix. [1886] p. 252); the evidence of Josephus is not favourable. He gives this lake another name, that of 'the lake of the Semehonites' (BJ iv. i. 1; cf. ZDPV l.c. and p. 348 f.). As regards the modern name Huleh, it is perhaps derived from the word Ullaha, by which Josephus denotes a district near Banias. For the description of the whole upper course of the Jordan from its sources to the Lake of Tiberias, including Lake Huleh, see Macgregor, The Rob Roy on the Jordan, 1869, 5th ed. 1880.

As soon as it leaves Lake Huleh, the Jordan begins to flow below the level of the sea, and falls almost 700 feet in a distance of 10 miles. We must here notice a bridge, the Jisr Bndt-Yakub, 'bridge of Jacob's Daughters,' sometimes wrongly called 'bridge of Jacob' or 'bridge of Jacob's Sons'; the name itself is really difficult to explain; see on this subject an ingenious solution suggested in PEFS, 1898, p. 29 f., by B. Z. Friedmann.

B. The Lower Jordan. The Jordan issues from the Lake of Tiberias at a place called Bab et-Tum, leaving on the east the little modern village of Semakh, which has no bridge connecting it with the right bank, and as the river is not fordable at this place, the passage, naturally of frequent occurrence, is accomplished by means of boats. A little farther down there are the remains of an ancient bridge called at the present day Umm el-Kanafir, and again at a short distance below, the ruins of another bridge, Umm es-Sidd. There the Jordan begins to assume a very sinuous course, describing endless meanders; Pliny spoke of it as an amnis ambitiosus, i.e. a winding river. The distance in a straight line from the Lake of Tiberias to the Dead Sea is about 65 miles, but if we take into account all the sinuosities of the river it reaches a total of 200 miles.

The Jordan valley at this part is now called the Ghór, i.e. 'depression,' 'valley.' Even in the OT it was designated (Jos 13<sup>b</sup> 7) by the name hanekef, 'the valley,' in opposition to the neighbouring heights. But a name much more frequent in the OT is Arabah, which was applied to the valley to the north as well as that to the south of the Dead Sea; nowadays the name Arabah, which has been preserved, is applied only to the valley to the south of the Dead Sea. In Greek, not in the LXX, but in Jos., Eusebius, etc., Arabah is rendered Αραβία. Josephus also uses the expressions 'wide wilderness' and 'the great plain' (BJ III. x. 7, IV. vii. 2; Ant. iv. vi. 1).

The Ghór is hemmed in on either side by chains of mountains, or at least hills, of variable height, but sometimes rising 1500 or even 1800 feet above the bed of the river. The slopes are generally somewhat steep, but not to such an extent as to prevent their being scaled. Especially at the spots where the wadis come down from one of the side mountains, means of access are opened up. The soil of the valley is fertile, especially in the northern and middle parts. As to the river itself, it flows in a bed which it has hollowed out for itself, called the Zór. This bed is somewhat variable in breadth, and it may be easily seen that the river has frequently changed its course. Thus at Damieh, of which we shall speak below, and where we find the half-ruined arches of a bridge of the Middle Ages, the Jordan actually no longer passes under the bridge, but at some distance from it. The ground bordering either side of the river is covered with very thick brushwood; this is undoubtedly what is called in Jer 12<sup>a</sup> 49<sup>b</sup> 50<sup>a</sup>, Zec 11<sup>a</sup> the רִמְיָהוּ, i.e. 'the majesty (RV 'pride') of Jordan' (AV 'the swelling of Jordan' [in the Jer. passages] arises from a wrong interpretation, as if the reference here was to the floods of Jordan; these do exist; they are sometimes sudden and very violent, rendering the fords impassable; cf. Jos 3<sup>a</sup>, Sir 24<sup>ab</sup> (86)).

The vegetation, especially as we go further south, becomes very nearly tropical, and the fauna resembles that of Africa. The lion, which abounded in ancient times, and continued to be encountered even in the Middle Ages, has completely disappeared. But other carnivorous animals are found here, leopards and hyenas, as well as wild boars, porcupines, etc. In Palestine 58 species of birds are met with, which are also N. African; nearly all of them belong to the Ghór. The flora has the same character, it recalls that of Nubia, Abyssinia, the Sahara, and the region of the great African lakes. Great heat prevails throughout this whole region, a fact which is quite naturally explained when we remember that it is a valley shut in between high walls, at its highest point 682 and at its lowest 1292 feet below the sea-level. The temperature varies from 77° to 130° Fahr. This circumstance undoubtedly accounts largely for the fact that there are not and never has been any towns on the banks of the Jordan. But another reason for the latter important fact may be found in the danger to which the inhabitants would be exposed, owing to the impossibility of effectually fortifying themselves against attacks. The few towns of the Ghór at one time populated, e.g. Phasaël and ericho, are on the height at some distance from the river, near protecting mountains. The other inhabited places are only wretched villages.

The Jordan forms a very large number of rapids; about thirty may be counted, apart from the whirlpools, which are numerous. There is also a considerable number of fords; the majority of them—82—are in the northern part, to the north of Karrn Sartabeh; there are 8 more in the south. A little to the north of Beisan there is a bridge, which dates from the Middle Ages, the Jisr el-Mujamieh, on the way—an ancient Roman road—leading from the plain of Jezreel to Gadara and Damascus. Further south is the ruined bridge of Damieh; and lastly, near Jericho, a modern bridge, the Jisr el-Ghoraniyah, at the place where the mosaic map of Madaba indicates a ferry-boat. For information regarding the fords of the Jordan, see G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 336 f.

The configuration of the Jordan valley is remarkable for its formation into terraces (in Arabic tabaqât), the river flowing between the lowermost of these. There is no comparatively equal and continuous incline from the mountain to the river, but a succession of horizontal platforms, with sudden and very steep slopes, which form what are called the steep banks or cliffs of Jordan. They are marly, and have a tendency to become worn, and even to give way. The Zór itself is bordered by them, and the Jordan often flows, at least at one side, along the foot of a declivity impossible of ascent. This is the case, e.g., in front of the so-called place of the Baptism at the latitude of Jericho. These terraces correspond to the different levels attained by the waters of the great lake which at one time filled the whole valley, and which first increased and then sank down again.

The Jordan is fed by numerous tributaries. The most important of these are on the left bank. One of them, the Hieromaz of the Greeks, the Yarmuk of the Rabbis, the Sherî at el-Manadireh of the Arabs, already mentioned above, flows down from the high plateau on the east of Lake Tiberias, and passes between the warm springs of el-Hammah and the ancient Gadara (modern Umm Keis). Further south, also on the eastern bank, the Jordan receives the Zerka (blue river), the Yabboq of ancient times, which, after passing Amman (Rabbath-Ammon, Philadelphia), describes an immense semi-circle towards the east, resumes its westward course, passes to the south of Jerash (Gerasa), and at last empties itself into the Jordan; the position of its mouth has considerably changed in the course of the centuries. On the right bank, we must mention the Nahr-Jalud, which springs from the fountain of Harod at the foot of Mt. Gilboa and passes to Beisan; then, close to Jericho, the Wadi el-Kelt, which tradition, probably wrongly, identifies with the Cherith of the Bible.

It is scarcely necessary to say that the Jordan is not navigable. Yet on three occasions the attempt has been made to sail down its course from the Lake of Tiberias to the Dead Sea. The first time it was an Irishman, Costigan, who, in 1835, accomplished this daring feat alone in a boat for one oarsman; the second time it was Lieutenant Molyneux, of the British Navy, in 1847. Both succeeded in reaching the Dead Sea, but both died soon after from the strain which they had undergone. Lastly, in 1848, an American expedition, under Lieutenant Lynch, sailed all the way down in two boats specially built for the purpose, reached the Dead Sea, and were able to record a whole series of very useful observations. Other travellers have also made a careful study of the Jordan valley, but from the land; besides those whom we have already mentioned, we may recall the names of Robinson, Guérin, and Conder. Long before there was any question of scientific explorations, pilgrims had followed the course of the Jordan through the whole of the Ghor, e.g. Antonius Martyr in the 6th cent., Willibald in the 8th; we may add to these the name of King Baldwin I., who passed up from Jericho to the Lake of Tiberias.

While the northern part of the Ghor is fertile, and more especially the environs of Beisan, it is very different in the south, near Jericho. This town, it is true, and its immediate neighbourhood, form a kind of oasis; but the rest of this region is not nearly so rich, the soil being impregnated with salt substances; one is reminded of the nearness of the Dead Sea.

It is this district that is referred to in the passages of the OT where the 'Jordan of Jericho' is spoken of. This does not mean a particular branch of the river, far less another stream of the same name (as, e.g., they say in Valais, 'the Visp of Saas' and 'the Visp of Zermatt'). It is simply 'the Jordan in the district of Jericho.' See Nu 22: 23, 28, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100. We must correct the AV and RV in this respect, and remember that Jordan is originally a common noun.

Another Biblical expression referring to this particular region is Kikkar hay-Yarden (קִיקָר הַיַּרְדֵּן), Gn 13:10, or hab-Kikkar (בְּנֵי הַקִּיקָר) (Gn 13:11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100). It may seem at first sight that this expression should apply to the whole valley, but it is more probable, considering the passages in which it is used, that it is only a designation of the broader part lying to the north of the Dead Sea, with Jericho as centre (cf. De 34), and stretching northwards until near Sartabeh (cf. 2 S 18:18, 1 K 7:46, 2 Ch 4:17), and perhaps also including the basin of the Dead Sea. This latter point depends on the position assigned to the cities of the Kikkar (Cities of the Plain), and to Zoar in particular; the present writer thinks their site ought to be sought to the north of the Dead Sea, and this frees him from the necessity of extending the term Kikkar to embrace the region of the Dead Sea.

We also find as a designation of the region of Jericho, the phrase arboth Jericho (אֲרֻבוֹת יֶרִיכוֹ), 2 K 25:19, and for the district facing it, to the east of the Jordan, arboth Moab (אֲרֻבוֹת מוֹאָב) (Nu 21: 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100). The Hebrew word used here is the plural of Arboth.

6. Historical and political rôle.—It is a commonplace to say that the Jordan separates E. Palestine from W. Palestine. But one often yields to the temptation to over-estimate the importance of this separation. The Jordan has been called 'the great Divider.' We should not exaggerate. The separation does exist, but it is not so great as people think. And if separation there is, it is not the river itself, with its narrow breadth—45 to 90 feet on an average, at places perhaps as broad as 180 (?) feet—and its numerous fords, that constitute it; it is rather the valley as a whole, the Ghor enclosed between its lateral ramparts, with its intolerable heat, and its want of security. The stream itself is so little of an obstacle that it is constantly being crossed, easily, too easily.

In ancient times it kept back neither armies nor raids. The pilgrims of Galilee, who in the times of Judaism made their way to Jerusalem, had so little dread of passing the river that they chose to cross it twice and make their journey by way of Perea rather than pass through the territory of the Samaritans. John the Baptist baptized beyond the Jordan, and that did not prevent crowds from going to him. Later on, the river was again crossed at all times and with great ease, and down to the most recent epochs the incursions of trans-Jordan Bedawin have not been prevented by the river, any more than the expeditions sent forth in pursuit of them. And this was as little the case when the Midianites invaded the territory of the Israelites, and Gideon put them to rout and pursued them, while the Ephraimites held the fords. The mountain-slopes are here and there quite accessible; it is easy to descend and ascend the lateral wadis. The valley which stretches down from Jezreel to Beisan is the most convenient of the great routes, and there are many others. G. A. Smith has admirably shown the close connexion between Samaria and the country of Gilead (HGH p. 335 f.).

The Jordan valley is so ineffectual a barrier, that at all times the possessors of the western district have felt the necessity of establishing themselves on the eastern bank for the sake of safety. The 24 tribes of Israel quartered on the left bank were a rampart guarding their western brethren from the invaders and pillagers of the east. The Romans realized the need of occupying the country across the Jordan in a strong and unassailable manner. And in our day security was not really re-established on the west of the Jordan until the Turkish Government imposed its authority in a firm and permanent fashion in the provinces east of the river.

7. OT references.—It has been well said (Jewish Encyc. vii. p. 239), 'There is no regular description of the Jordan in the Bible; only scattered and indefinite references to it are given.' There are 176 references to the Jordan in the OT, the majority of which are found in the narrative books of Jos. (67), Deut. (26), Nu. (20), Sam. (17: 2+15), Kings (12: 3+9), Jg. (12), Ch. (7: 1+6), Gn. (5). But by far the greater number of those have to do with topographical expressions such as 'on this side Jordan,' 'beyond Jordan,' 'to go over Jordan,' 'by Jordan.' If those cases are deducted, all that remain are very few. Besides, as the present Dictionary is devoted to the Gospels, we have not to enter into details as we should have to do if it treated of the OT. We shall confine ourselves therefore to noting the following. (a) The crossing of the Jordan by the Israelites (Jos 3-4: cf. Ps 114: 3). This narrative must be compared with what happened on the 8th of December 1267 at the bridge of Damieh, in the reign of the Sultan Beibars I. (1260-77), according to the Arabic historian Nowairi (PEFS, 1895, pp. 253-261, 334-338), and the mention of a similar fact in the Val Blenio, in Tessin, when in 1512 a landslip stopped the flow of a stream for 14 months, after which a clearance was effected by the bursting of the barrier which had been formed. (b) The seizing of the fords of the Jordan by Ehud after the murder of Eglon (Jg 3: 28). (c) The campaign of Gideon (Jg 7-8) against Midian. (d) That of Jephthah against the Ephraimites (Jg 12). (e) The flight of David before Absalom, the battle which

8. NT references.—Here again, several times, the Jordan is mentioned in the phrase 'beyond Jordan.' See Mt 4<sup>18</sup> (which quotes Is 9<sup>1</sup>) 4<sup>23</sup> 19<sup>1</sup>, Mk 3<sup>8</sup> 10<sup>1</sup>. All the other passages of the Gospels which mention the Jordan are connected with the ministry of John the Baptist, and the baptism of Jesus, or make a retrospective allusion to them. Thus Mt 3<sup>6</sup>, Mk 1<sup>9</sup>, Lk 3<sup>21</sup> describe John at work, preaching and baptizing; and on this point Mt. and Lk. mention the  $\pi\epsilon\rho\iota\chi\alpha\pi\omicron\varsigma$  of the Jordan, a word which we explained when speaking of the Kikkâr of the OT (see above, § 5). Others (Mt 3<sup>18</sup>, Mk 1<sup>9</sup>) show us Jesus baptized 'in the Jordan,' and then leaving the banks of the river (Lk 4<sup>3</sup>) in order to go away to the desert. The Gospel of John is the only one which defines more precisely the place where John baptized and where Jesus was baptized. Jn 1<sup>28</sup> tells us that 'these things were done in Bethany beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing,' and two later passages in the same Gospel recall the same fact; 3<sup>23</sup> 'He that was with thee beyond Jordan,' and 10<sup>40</sup> 'He went away again beyond Jordan to the place where John at first baptized.' See art. BETHABARA. Without entering here into the discussion of the problem which is raised by the substitution (by Origen) of Bethabara for Bethany, we may say that the latter is infinitely better attested, and ought to be preferred (this does away with the topographical hypotheses based on Bethabara). As regards Bethany, the knowledge at our disposal does not enable us to determine its site. It must be (a) beyond Jordan, which excludes the traditional so-called 'place of the Baptism' near Jericho; and (b) near Jordan, which renders improbable the suggestions of Grove, Wilson, and Cheyne, who would combine Bethany and Bethabara into Bethanabara, and the view of Furrer ('Das Geog. im Ev. nach Joh.' in ZNTW, 1902, p. 257 f.), put forward also by Zahn (Einl. NT ii. p. 561), and noted by Sanday (Sacred Sites of the Gospels, p. 94), which identifies Bethany with Betaneh = Betonim (Jos 13<sup>26</sup>). JORIM.—Named in our Lord's genealogy (Lk 3<sup>29</sup>).

JOSEPH (AV Joseph).—Named in our Lord's genealogy (Lk 3<sup>29</sup>).

JOSEPH (Ἰωσήφ).—1. The patriarch, mentioned only in the description of the visit of Jesus to Sychar (Jn 4<sup>5</sup>).—2. 3. Joseph son of Mattathias and Joseph son of Jonam are both named in the genealogy of Jesus given in Lk. (3<sup>24, 30</sup>).—4. One of the brethren of the Lord, Mt 13<sup>55</sup> (AV Josea, the form adopted in both AV and RV in Mt 27<sup>55</sup>, Mk 6<sup>3</sup> 15<sup>40, 47</sup>). See JOSEPH.

5. Joseph, the husband of Mary and the reputed father of Jesus (Lk 3<sup>23</sup>), is not mentioned in Mk., and only indirectly in Jn. (1<sup>40</sup> 6<sup>42</sup>). He was of Davidic descent; and, though Mt. and Lk. differ in the genealogical details, they connect Jesus with Joseph and through him with David (Mt 1<sup>16</sup>, Lk 3<sup>23</sup>). Joseph, who was a carpenter (Mt 13<sup>55</sup>) and a poor man, as his offering in the temple showed (Lk 2<sup>24</sup>), lived in Nazareth (2<sup>23</sup>) and was espoused to Mary, also of Nazareth (1<sup>2</sup>). By their betrothal they entered into a relationship which, though not the completion of marriage, could be dissolved only by death or divorce. Before the marriage ceremony Mary was 'found with child of the Holy Ghost,' but the angelic annunciation to her was not made known to Joseph. He is described as a just man (Mt 1<sup>19</sup>), a strict observer of the Law. The law was stern (Dt 22<sup>23, 24</sup>), but its severity had been mitigated and divorce had taken the place of death. Divorce could be effected publicly, so that the shame of the woman might be seen by all; or it could be done privately, by the method of handing the bill of separation to the woman in presence of two witnesses.† Joseph, not willing to make Mary a public example, 'was minded to put her away privily' (Mt 1<sup>19</sup>). An angel, however, appeared to him in a dream, telling him not to fear to marry Mary, as the conception was of the Holy Ghost, and also that she would bring forth a son, whom he was to name Jesus (v. 20<sup>6</sup>). The dream was accepted as a revelation,‡ as a token of Divine favour, and Joseph took Mary as his wife, but did not live with her as her husband till she had brought forth her firstborn son (v. 24<sup>1</sup>).

Before the birth of Christ there was an Imperial decree that all the world should be taxed, and Joseph, being of the house and lineage of David, had to leave Nazareth and go to Bethlehem, to be taxed with Mary.§ In Bethlehem Jesus was born;

* Joseph the son of Juda in v. 20 (AV) becomes Josech the son of Joda in RV.

† Cf. Eidersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. 154. Dalman asserts that Eidersheim is incorrect in stating that public divorce was possible (see Hastings' DB, art. 'Joseph').

and there the shepherds, to whom the angel had announced the birth of the Saviour, found Mary and Joseph and 'the babe lying in a manger' (Lk 2<sup>16</sup>). At the circumcision, on the eighth day after the birth, the child received the name 'Jesus' which Joseph had been commanded to give Him; and on a later day, when Mary's purification was accomplished (cf. Lv 12<sup>2-4</sup>), she and Joseph took Jesus to the temple in Jerusalem (Lk 2<sup>22</sup>), to present him to the Lord* and to offer a sacrifice, according to the requirements of the law (Ex 13<sup>2</sup>, Lv 12<sup>2</sup>). Joseph fulfilled the law as if he were the father of Jesus; and after the ceremonies in the temple he must have returned with Mary and her son to Bethlehem, which was 6 miles distant from Jerusalem. In Bethlehem the Wise Men who had come from the East saw Mary and 'the young child' and worshipped Him; and after their departure the angel of the Lord appeared again to Joseph, bidding him take Mary and the child and flee into Egypt on account of Herod, who would seek to destroy Him (Mt 2<sup>23</sup>). Joseph was quick to obey, and rising in the night he took the young child and His mother and departed for Egypt, where Herod had no authority (v. 14). In Egypt they were to remain till the angel brought word to Joseph (v. 13); and there they dwelt, possibly two or even three years, till the death of Herod, when the angel again appeared in a dream to Joseph. The angel commanded him to take the young child and His mother and go into the land of Israel. Obedience was at once given by Joseph, but he became afraid when he learned that Archelaus was reigning in Judaea. Again the angel appeared in a dream, and after a warning Joseph proceeded to Nazareth, which was not under the rule of Archelaus, who had an evil reputation, but under that of the milder Antipas (vv. 14, 23).

It is recorded of Joseph that he and Mary went every year, at the Passover, to Jerusalem, and that when Jesus was twelve years of age He accompanied them. On that occasion Jesus tarried in Jerusalem, after Joseph and Mary, thinking He was with them in the company, had left the city. When they had gone a day's journey they found He was not with them, and they turned back to Jerusalem. After three days they found Him in the temple among the doctors, and they were amazed. Mary's words, 'Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing,' called forth an answer which Joseph and Mary did not understand. But after the incident in Jerusalem, Jesus went with them to Nazareth and 'was subject unto them' (Lk 2<sup>41-51</sup>). Mary's words and the record of the subjection of Jesus to her and Joseph indicate that Joseph stood to Jesus in the place of an earthly father. How long that relationship continued is unknown, since the time of the death of Joseph is not stated in the Gospels. It may be accepted as a certainty that he was not alive throughout the period of the public ministry of Jesus, seeing that he is not directly or indirectly mentioned along with His mother and brothers and sisters (Mk 3<sup>31-35</sup>).

6. Joseph of Arimathea (Ἰωσήφ ὁ ἀπὸ Ἀρμαθαίας, see ARIMATHAEA).—A rich and pious Israelite (Mt 27<sup>57</sup>), a member of the Sanhedrin (Mk 15<sup>43</sup>), who, secretly for fear of the Jews, was Jesus' disciple (Jn 19<sup>38</sup>). He had not consented to the death of Jesus (Lk 23<sup>51</sup>), and could not therefore have been present at the Council, where they all condemned Him to be guilty of death (Mk 14<sup>64</sup>). The timidity which prevented him from openly avowing his discipleship, and perhaps from defending Jesus in the Sanhedrin, fled when he beheld the death of the Lord. Jewish law required that the body of a person who had been executed should not remain all night upon the tree, but should 'in any wise' be buried (Dt 21<sup>22-23</sup>). This law would not bind the Roman authorities, and the custom in the Empire was to leave the body to decay upon the cross (cf. Hor. Ep. i. xvi. 48; Plautus, Mil. Glor. ii. iv. 19). But at the crucifixion of Jesus and of the two malefactors, the Jews, anxious that the bodies should not remain upon the cross during the Sabbath, besought Pilate that the legs of the crucified might be broken and death hastened, and that then the bodies might be taken away (Jn 19<sup>31</sup>). According to Roman law, the relatives could claim the body of a person executed (Digest, xlviii. 24, 'De cadav. punit.'). But which of the relatives of Jesus had a sepulchre in Jerusalem where His body might be placed? Joseph, wishing the burial not to be 'in any wise' (cf. Jos 3<sup>9</sup>), but to be according to the most pious custom of his race, went to Pilate and craved the body. The petition required boldness (Mk 15<sup>43</sup>), since Joseph, with no kinship in the flesh with Jesus, would be forced to make a confession of discipleship, which the Jews would note. Pilate, too, neither loved nor was loved by Israel, and his anger might be kindled at the coming of a Jew, and the member of the Sanhedrin be assailed with insults. Pilate, however, making sure that Jesus was dead, gave the body. Perhaps he had pity for the memory of Him he had condemned, or perhaps the rich man's gold, since Pilate, according to Pilto (Op. ii. 590), took money from suppliants, secured what was craved. Joseph, now with no fear of the Jews, acted openly, and had to act with speed, as the day of preparation for the Sabbath was nearly spent. Taking down the body of Jesus from the cross (and other hands must have aided him), he wrapped it in linen which he himself had bought (Mk 15<sup>46</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel it is told how Nicodemus, bringing a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about an hundred pound weight, joined Joseph, and how they took the body and wound it in linen clothes with the spices (Jn 19<sup>39</sup>). Near the place of crucifixion was a garden, and in the garden a new sepulchre, which Joseph had hewn out in the rock, doubtless for his own last resting-place; and in that sepulchre, wherein was never man yet laid, was placed the body of Jesus prepared for its burial (Mt 27<sup>60</sup>, Jn 19<sup>41</sup>). In the court at the entrance to the tomb, the preparation would be made. All was done which the time before the Sabbath allowed reverent hands to do; and then Joseph, perhaps thinking of the pious offices that could yet be done to the dead, rolled a great stone to the door of the sepulchre and departed (Mt 27<sup>60</sup>). On late legends regarding Joseph of Arimathea see Hastings' DB, vol. ii. p. 778.

J. HERKLESS.
JOSES (Ἰωσήφ, 'w', a shortened form of Ἰωσήφ, 'he adds'; cf. Gn 30<sup>24</sup>). The identity of the two names is doubted by Lightfoot (Gal. 2<sup>11</sup>, note 1), chiefly on the ground of the use of different forms in the Peshitta; but Dalman (Gramm. Aram. 75) rightly views 'w' as dialectical, and probably Galilean, abbreviation of Ἰωσήφ. The names are apparently interchangeable [cf. Mt 13<sup>56</sup> with Mk 6<sup>3</sup>]; in Mt 27<sup>56</sup> WH and Nestle with Tisch. read Ἰωσήφ, and in all the passages there is textual evidence, sufficiently strong not to be overlooked, for the name rejected].—1. A brother of Jesus (Mk 6<sup>3</sup>). This brother is not mentioned anywhere else except in the above passage of Matthew (27<sup>56</sup>). For views as to his real relationship see Hastings' DB i. 320 ff., and art. BROTHERS OF THE LORD in present work. 2. The brother of James the Little (Mt 27<sup>56</sup>, Mk 15<sup>40-47</sup>). The name of Joses stands alone in the last passage, but that of his better known brother is substituted by the 'Western' text.

The father was Clopas (Jn 19<sup>25</sup>); but of him, as of his son Joseph, nothing certain is known. Both must have been familiar to the members of the early Christian community; but the Syriac versions are against the identification of Clopas with Alphæus, and Hegesippus does not say enough (Eus. HE iii. 11) to warrant the conclusion that Joseph was a nephew of Joseph of Nazareth.

JOT.—This modern spelling of the AV, followed by RV, which has discarded the 16th cent. 'iote' (in Tindale, Coverdale, Cramer 'iott') of Rhemish, Bishops', AV (1611), somewhat obscures the etymology of the word, which is simply a transliteration of the Greek term (iōta = 'i'). Wyclif's translation and paraphrase ('oon i, that is lest lettre') was not adopted by any of the subsequent English versions. The Greek trisyllable being pronounced 'jota' (cf. Spanish 'jota', German 'jota', 'jodt', 'jott', 'jot'), the reduction to the monosyllable, 'iote' (pronounced 'jote') with its variants 'ioyt', 'ioit' (Scots form: see J. Knox, Hist. Ref. 1572, Wks. 1846, i. 107; and Davidson, Commend. Vp'richtnes, 152 (1573), in Satir. P. Ref. xl.) and 'jott', was natural and normal. The German authorized version is still Luther's paraphrase: 'der kleinste Buchstabe' for which Wiclif'sker prefers the transliteration: 'ein Jota,' while the French versions also transliterate: 'un (seul) iota.'

The proverbial phrase iōta ēv ἡ ψα κεφαία (Mt 5<sup>18</sup> only) derives its point from the fact that iōta in the Greek alphabet, like its equivalent letter and original yod in the Hebrew, is the smallest character. In fact, as Dr. Hastings notes (s.v. in DB), the yod being more distinctively the smallest, provides an argument in favour of those who regard Aramaic as the language of Jesus.

After Tindale's introduction of the word (1526), its meaning, derived from the passage above cited, was not so much 'the least letter or written part of any writing,' as in a more general application 'the very least,' 'a whit,' and was usually preceded by a negative expressed or implied. Thus: Bale (1538), God's Promises, iii. in Dodsley O. Pl. i. 1: 'I wyll not one iote, Lord, from thy wyll dyssent'; Shakespeare (1596), Merch. of Ven.: 'This bond doth give thee here no iot of bloud'; Spenser (1595), Sonnets, lvii.: 'That wonder is how I should live a iot.'

JOY.—In the Greek of the NT there are two verbs, with their corresponding nouns, used to express the idea of joy. These are ἀγαλλῆναι, ἀγαλλῆσαι, and χαίρειν, χαρᾶ.

The word ἀγαλλῆναι conveys rather the idea of exultation or exuberant gladness, and is a favourite with St. Luke, who has been called the 'most profound psychologist among the Evangelists.' It is in the pages of his Gospel also that we find the most frequent mention of circumstances of joy attending the proclamation and reception of the gospel message, and the whole character of his writing reveals our Lord in the most joyous relation to His own disciples and to the world at large. The Gr. word for 'gospel' (εὐαγγέλιον) means 'good tidings,' or, as it is described in Lk 2<sup>9</sup>, in the message of the angel to the shepherds, 'good tidings of great joy' (εὐαγγελίζομαι ὑμῖν χαρὰν μεγάλην). In the case of the angel messenger to Zacharias, the two words are combined in his greeting. Thus at the very outset the idea of joy attends the prophecy of even the harsher ministry of John the Baptist. 'Thou shalt,' says the angel, 'have joy and gladness (χαρὰ καὶ ἀγαλλῆσαι), and many shall rejoice (χαρῆσονται) at his birth' (Lk 1<sup>4</sup>). Another strange attendant circumstance of the joy of these days that preceded our Lord's incarnation is the utterance of Elisabeth, who, when Mary, the predestined mother of the Messiah, comes to visit her, cries out in an ecstasy of wonder and joy, 'Behold, when the voice of thy salutation came into mine ears, the babe leapt in my womb for joy' (v. 44). In the same scene there immediately follows the song of thanksgiving known in the Church as the Magnificat (wh. see), which is pervaded by the spirit of joy, and in which the word 'rejoiced' occurs at the very outset (v. 47).

When we turn to the historical account of the beginnings of the proclamation of the gospel, we find that, according to Jn's narrative, when John the Baptist declared the coming of the Greater than himself, he heralded His advent in the words, 'He that hath the bride is the bridegroom: but the friend of the bridegroom, which standeth and heareth him, rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice: this my joy therefore is fulfilled' (Jn 3<sup>29</sup>).

This statement is rather remarkable in the light of the accounts of the Baptist's ministry given in Synopses. The ascetic note is much more prominent, and it is our Lord who says that, because John came 'neither eating nor drinking,' the people supposed he had a devil (Mt 11<sup>18</sup> & Lk 7<sup>33</sup>). Whether we are to think that the Fourth Evangelist had carried back the conception of his Lord's ministry into the prophetic description of it given by His forerunner or not, it is difficult to decide. In any case, the statement here attributed to John the Baptist stands alone, and is not characteristic of his general attitude or of the question which, according to Mt. and Lk., he addressed at a later time to our Lord Himself.

In the parables in which the secret of the Kingdom is itself set forth by our Lord, we meet the word 'joy' several times. In the interpretation of the parable of the Sower we are told: 'He that was sown upon the rocky places, this is he that heareth the word, and straightway with joy receiveth it' (Mt 13<sup>20</sup>), a striking characterization of the temper of those who eagerly adopt a new idea, but are just as ready to exchange it for some more recent fashion. It is a temper that our Lord describes in another place, when, discussing the ministry of His forerunner, He says: 'He was the lamp that burneth and shineth, and ye were willing to rejoice for a season in his light' (Jn 5<sup>35</sup>). Joy of a deeper and more permanent character is that of the man who found a treasure hidden in his field, and 'in his joy he goeth and selleth all that he hath and buyeth that field' (Mt 13<sup>44</sup>). This is the true and evangelical temper of a proper reception of the gospel message. In Lk 15 joy is given a higher place and a yet more spiritual significance. In the three famous parables that fill that chapter, the joy of God's own heart is set forth under the images of the shepherd with his sheep, the woman with her precious coin, and the father with his restored son. Joy, says our Lord, in the two former cases, fills all heaven, even increasing the gladness of the angels in sympathy with their King; while the exuberant picture of the joy of the household at the prodigal's return gives a still more tender and touching picture of the Divine Fatherhood. The reward promised to the faithful servant in the parable of the Talents is to enter into 'the joy of his Lord' (Mt 25<sup>21</sup>). The meaning of this is obviously that the servant should be partaker in the richer and fuller joy that is his Lord's portion, which may probably be the joy that comes from the exercise of higher responsibilities, and the opportunities of fuller usefulness (see the Comm. in loco).

In the narrative in Lk. descriptive of the return of the seventy disciples from their mission in Galilee, we read (10<sup>17</sup>) that they 'returned with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us in thy name.' It may be that our Lord regarded this as too much akin to the shallow joy which He had exposed in the parable of the Sower, or, at any rate, as detrimental to the more serious thought with which He wished their minds to be filled; for He replied (v. 20): 'Howbeit in this rejoice not that the spirits are subject unto you, but rejoice that your names are written in heaven.' The keynote thus given to the real joy of the disciple is the assurance of his belonging to the Kingdom of God, a joy, therefore, that is 'with trembling.' According to Lk.'s account, it is at the same moment that we read of Christ's rejoicing, but the parallel in Mt. does not bear out the same historical connexion (cf. Lk. 10<sup>23</sup> and Mt. 11<sup>23</sup>).

In Lk.'s narrative also there is the unique expression, 'He rejoiced in the Holy Spirit.' What exactly is meant by this phrase it is most difficult to say, and some have even supposed it to be a foretelling of the strange experiences of the Christian Church after Pentecost. This does not seem very probable, and it may be that Lk. is only expressing with greater fulness and exactitude the truth that it was through the inspiration of the Spirit that our Lord was able clearly to thank His Father for the manner in which His mighty works were done, as well as to perform these works themselves.

In the passage in which Lk. gives his setting of the Beatitudes, he puts very strongly the blessing of suffering for righteousness' sake, the words being, 'Rejoice in that day, and leap: for, behold, your reward is great in heaven' (Lk. 6<sup>23</sup>).

In Jn. there is a very striking use of the verb 'rejoice' in a passage of great difficulty (8<sup>29</sup>). It occurs in the reported controversy of our Lord with the Jews, where He tells them, 'Your father Abraham rejoiced (ἠγαλλιάσατο) to see my day: and he saw it, and was glad' (ἐχάρη). The force of the Greek implies that Abraham 'exulted that he should see,' that is, presumably, in the promises that were made to him, while the actual seeing of it, of which the Lord speaks, is possibly an assertion of Abraham's living with God, as in Christ's similar use of the text, 'I am the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob,' to prove the reality of the doctrine of the resurrection.

We must next turn to a class of passages contained in the closing addresses of our Lord to His disciples, as recorded in the Fourth Gospel, where much stress is laid upon our Lord's own joy and the disciples' share in it. The clear declaration of His commandments is to effect the purpose of their partaking in His own joy of obedience, and to secure the permanence and completeness of their own glad following of the Divine will (Jn. 15<sup>11</sup>). Again, the natural sorrow at His approaching departure is to be a sorrow like that of a woman in her birth-pangs,—a sorrow, that is, which is not only full of purpose, but is a necessary element in a great deliverance; and the joy that will succeed not only causes forgetfulness of the previous suffering, but abides, while the pain is only a passing and comparatively unimportant experience (16<sup>20-24</sup>).

And, finally, in the great prayer of intercession contained in Jn. 17, our Lord requests that the joy which was His own peculiar possession should find its full accomplishment in the hearts of His disciples (v. 13). The joy thus foretold and interceded for is noted by the Evangelist as a possession of the disciples immediately after the resurrection. In Mt. 28<sup>8</sup> we are told that the women departed from the tomb 'with fear and great joy,' while the effect of the gladness is noted by Lk., with a truthfulness to human experience that is most remarkable, as being itself a ground of scepticism (see Lk. 24<sup>41</sup>). This joy was not only the possession, but the abiding possession of the early Church, as frequent notes in the Book of Acts prove; and many passages in St. Paul's Epistles speak of joy as one of the true fruits of the indwelling of the Holy Spirit (see Ac. 13<sup>8</sup> and Gal. 5<sup>22</sup>).

While the passages above examined contain most of the instances in which the words 'joy' or 'rejoice' are used in the Gospels, there remain very many passages in which the idea is prominent. Our Lord's own description of Himself, for instance, as the Bridegroom when He is vindicating the liberty of His disciples to abstain from the ascetic practices of the Pharisees, shows how He conceived His mission and ministry (see Mk. 2<sup>18-22</sup>). Many of the parables, other than those already named, set forth the inherent joy of the Kingdom, as, for example, those of the Wedding Supper and the Ten Virgins. The Lord's Supper itself was a feast of joy, for, according to Lk.'s account (22<sup>17</sup>), our Lord said: 'With desire I have desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer,' thus indicating that He had eagerly and gladly anticipated it; and in the further words that He speaks on that occasion He indicates that there is only to be a pause in the joy which will be resumed and heightened in other surroundings. 'I will not,' He continues, 'drink from henceforth of the fruit of the vine until the kingdom of God shall come,' or, as Mt. phrases it (26<sup>29</sup>), 'until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's Kingdom.'

There must have been much in our Lord's intercourse with the people that led them to see in Him a helper of their joys rather than a restraint upon their merriment. He was, for example, an honoured guest at a wedding feast (Jn. 2<sup>2</sup>), and at many a social meal (cf. Lk. 14<sup>8</sup> and Jn. 12<sup>2</sup>); and when He decided to abide at the house of Zacchaeus, we are told that the latter 'received him joyfully.' In His triumphal entry into Jerusalem the people gladly welcomed Him (Lk. 19<sup>37</sup>), and the children cried joyfully in the Temple, 'Hosanna to the Son of David' (Mt. 21<sup>9</sup>). All these more or less exuberant outbursts of spontaneous joy greatly offended the Pharisees and other formal religionists; and while it would not be correct to say that our Lord designedly arranged circumstances in which the contrasts would be clearly manifested, still the conditions in which they were so displayed were admirable parables in action of some of the deepest truths of His Kingdom.

There is much beauty, as well as truth, in the imaginary description of Emma: 'He thus traversed Galilee in the midst of a continual feast. When He entered a house it was considered a joy and a blessing. He halted in the villages and at the large farms, where He received open hospitality. In the East when a stranger enters a house it becomes at once a public place. All the village assembles there, the children invade it, they are put out by the servants, but always return. Jesus could not suffer these innocent auditors to be treated harshly. He caused them to be brought to Him and embraced them. . . . He protected those who wished to honour Him. In this way children and women came to adore Him' (Life of Jesus, ch. xi.).

The joy that emanated from our Lord's person and presence during His earthly ministry was without question a great part of its power. His attitude stood in such clear contrast to the general character of the religious people round about Him, that the consciousness of it must have been felt by all the onlookers; but in addition to this fact was the whole teaching about His Kingdom, which, as set forth in parable and precept, was to be a Kingdom of gladness. In this latter respect it came into line with what the prophets had described as the marked characteristic of the Kingdom of God, and also with what the Jewish apocalypses pictured as the outcome of the Messiah's advent. That a more earthly conception of joy filled the hearts of many of the disciples there is little reason to question, but a great deal of our Lord's teaching was directed to spiritualize their hopes and to deepen their insight into the true character of spiritual joy.

JUDÆA.—1. In its earlier signification the term 'Judæa' (Ἰουδαία) was applied to a limited district, of which Jerusalem was the centre, occupied by the captives who returned from Babylon after the decree of Cyrus. The scattered remnants of the Israelites who availed themselves of this opportunity, representing most, if not all, of the several tribes, joined forces with the men of Judah in rebuilding the Temple and its defences; and from this date, except on the lists of the genealogical and tribal records, they were not distinguished from them. Hence the tribe of Judah, which, according to Josephus, arrived first in those parts, gave name both to the inhabitants and the territory, the former being designated as Jews and the latter as 'Judæa' or 'Jewry' (Ant. xi. v. 7). At a later date both names were used in a wider sense, including all the Israelites who returned, and also their settlements or possessions in other sections of the land. Under Persian rule the land of Judah was designated as a province of the Empire, and was administered by a governor, who resided at Jerusalem (Ezr 5<sup>8-14</sup>, Neh 11<sup>3</sup>, Hag 1<sup>1-14</sup>). During the period of the Roman occupation the term was sometimes used as a general expression for Palestine as a whole (BJ vii. 2; Strabo, xvi. 2. 21; Tacitus, Hist. v. 6; Lk 1<sup>5</sup>, Act 28<sup>21</sup>), also to include a portion, apparently, of the trans-Jordanic country (Ant. xii. iv. 11; Mt 19<sup>1</sup>, Mk 10<sup>1</sup>; Ptol. v. 16. 9). Apart from this exceptional usage, the name ordinarily—as we find it in the NT and the writings of Josephus—is applied to the southernmost of the three districts—Judæa, Samaria, the name into which Western Palestine was divided in the time of Christ. With some variations on the north and west borders at different periods, Judæa covered all of the territory south of the Wady Isar and the village of Akrabbeh (PEFS, 1881, p. 48), from the Mediterranean to the Jordan Valley and the Dead Sea. According to Josephus, its limits extended from a village on the north called Anath, or Borkeos, identified with Aina Berkit, to Iardas (possibly Tell Arad), on the edge of the desert, to the south. Its breadth he defines, in general terms, as extending from the river Jordan to Joppa (BJ iii. iii. 5). In other words, its area practically corresponded with the area of the kingdom of Judah in the period of its greatest enlargement. As thus defined it included the tribal possessions of Simeon, Judah, Benjamin, Dan, and, to some extent at least, of Ephraim.

A distinction should be noted here between the use of the word Judæa to designate strictly Jewish territory, from which the outlying Hellenistic or Gentile towns were excluded, and the Roman usage of the word to designate a political division, which for administrative purposes included all the coast towns south of Mt. Carmel, the chief of which in the time of Christ was Caesarea, the residence of its Procurator. In the one case its northern limit was Antipatris, on the plain of Sharon; in the other it extended to Acre (Ptolemais) beyond Mt. Carmel. The S.E. portion of Judæa has sometimes been designated as a separate district under the name Idumæa, but this term properly describes a settlement of the Edomites in Judæa, and not a separate division of the country. Idumæa, according to Josephus, was one of the eleven toparchies into which Judæa proper was divided for administrative purposes under Roman rule (BJ iii. iii. 5). See IDUMÆA.

2. When our Lord was born, Judæa constituted a part of the dominion of Herod the Great, who accordingly is called by the Evangelists 'king of Judæa' (Lk 1<sup>5</sup>; Mt 2<sup>1</sup>). After the death of Herod, the Roman emperor assumed the right to settle the dispute which had arisen among his sons concerning the division of the kingdom, and by his decree Judæa and Samaria were in the partition assigned to Archelaus. The sovereignty of Rome was more fully asserted also at this time in refusing to any of Herod's sons the title 'king.' When by the same authority Archelaus was deposed (A.D. 6), the territory over which he held rule was attached to the province of Syria, and thus for the first time came under immediate Roman rule. From this date it was administered by a governor or procurator, who was chosen from the equestrian order. Following Archelaus the province was administered by five procurators during the life and ministry of Jesus, viz. Coponius (c. A.D. 6-9), Marcus Ambivius (c. 9-12), Annus Rufus (c. 12-15), Valerius Gratus (15-25), Pontius Pilate (26-36). It was during Pilate's rule that the word of God came to John the Baptist in the wilderness, and some years later this Roman procurator made his name for ever infamous by giving sentence that the Christ, whom he had openly declared to be innocent of crime, should be led away to be crucified.

3. The physical features of Judæa are sharply outlined and singularly diversified. Its distinctive characteristics fall naturally into five subdivisions, originally suggested by the OT writers, viz. the 'Plain of the Coast,' the 'Shephelah' or region of the low hills, the 'Hill country,' the 'Negeb' or dry country, and the 'Wilderness.'

The Maritime Plain varies in width from 10 to 16 miles. It is for the most part flat or rolling, and rises gradually toward the base of the mountains. The upper portion (Sharon) is noted for its rich pasturage; the lower (Philistia) for its vast grain-fields, which have yielded enormous crops without the use of fertilizers, except such as nature has distributed over its surface from the wash and waste of the mountains, for forty centuries. The international highway which follows the line of the coast inside the region of the sand-dunes is one of the oldest caravan and military roads in the world. Most of the noted towns of the Plain are on or near this ancient highway. This section of Judæa has no associations with the life or ministry of Jesus, but in the Acts there are several references to visits which were made, or events which took place, in its towns, in connexion with the work of the Apostles or their associates (chs. 8-10 and 18-21).

The 'Shephelah' belongs to the plain rather than to the central ridge of the mountains, from which it is distinctly separated by a series of almost continuous breaks or depressions. It has been aptly described as 'a loose gathering of chalk and limestone hills, round, bare, and featureless, but with an occasional bastion flung well out in front of them.' There are several noted valleys, which begin their courses as wadis in the central range, and cut their way through the Shephelah to the plain. Each of these affords a passage-way into the heart of the mountain stronghold of Judæa, and each has its distinct characteristics and historical associations. Apostles and evangelists entered this region soon after the dispersion of the believers at Jerusalem, and in its limestone grottoes, in the days of the persecutions, multitudes of hunted and outlawed Christians found refuges and hiding-places (HGHL, ch. xi.).

The 'Hill country' or highland region fills most of the space between the Jordan Valley and the sea, and gives character to the district as a whole. In its present condition it is the most rugged and desolate section of the Lebanon range. In former times its hillsides were terraced, and every available break in its table-lands was carefully cultivated; and yet in every period of its history it has been regarded as a rough, stony land, more suitable for pastoral than for agricultural pursuits. Its watershed is an irregular, undulating plateau, which varies in width from 12 to 18 miles. The general direction of the numerous ravines or torrent-beds which diversify, and in some sections deeply corrugate, its sides, is east and west. On the east side they are short, direct, and deeply cleft; on the west, comparatively long and shallow, reaching the coast often by circuitous routes. The highest elevation (3564 ft.) is es-Ramah, a short distance north of Hebron. The general average of the plateau on which Jerusalem is located is about 2500 ft. South of Hebron there is a gradual descent by steps or terraced slopes to the region which for many centuries has borne the distinctive name 'Negb' or dry country.

The 'Wilderness' includes the whole of the eastern slope or declivity of the Judean mountains. It is a barren, uncultivated region, unique in its setting, and notable above all other sections of the land for its desolation, its loneliness, and its scenes of wild and savage grandeur. The variation in levels from the edge of the plateau to the surface of the Dead Sea is but little short of 4000 ft., nearly one half of which is a precipitous descent from sea-level to the margin of the deeply depressed basin amid the silent hills. In this 'land not inhabited' John the Baptist sought seclusion while preparing for his ministry as the forerunner of the Messiah; and here the Holy One, concerning whom he bore record, abode 'forty days tempted of Satan; and was with the wild beasts; and the angels ministered unto him' (Mt 3:1-12 || Lk 3:1-17 || Mk 1:12-13).

4. The sacred memories and thronging events which have been, and for ever shall be, associated with these holy hills cannot be fittingly expressed by voice or pen. In the long ages past the highways of this Judean plateau have been trodden by the feet of patriarchs, prophets, priests, and kings, and for centuries its sanctuary on Mt. Zion was the dwelling-place of Jehovah; but, more than all else in its wonderful history, it was the place of the incarnation, the self-denying ministry, the agony, the death, the resurrection, and the ascension of the Son of God, the Saviour of the world.

ROBERT L. STEWART.

JUDAH—The eponymous ancestor of the tribe to which our Lord belonged (Mt 1:2, Lk 3:34, He 7:14; cf. art. GENEALOGIES).

JUDAH (Ἰουδᾶ).—Two passages in the Gospels mention 'Judah' (RV), or 'Juda' (AV), which is orthographically distinct from 'Judas' (Ἰουδᾶς) as well as geographically smaller. The one is Mt 2:1 'And thou Bethlehem, land of Judah, art in no wise least among the princes of Judah,' etc., alluding to Bethlehem, the birthplace of Christ, in the heart of the hill country. The other is Lk 1:16 'And Mary arose in these days and went into the hill country with haste, into a city of Judah'; which also probably alludes to some town in the centre of the hill country, the birthplace of John the Baptist. In the latter passage, however, instead of εἰς πόλιν Ἰουδᾶ, Reiland in 1714 (Pal. p. 870), endorsed by Robinson in 1841 (BRP ii. 206) and others of more recent date, emend to read εἰς πόλιν Ἰούδα, i. e. 'Juttah' in lieu of 'Judah.' But there is no good philological reason for thinking that the latter is a corruption or softer pronunciation of the former; and, as the context would indicate, the word 'Judah' in v. 30 seems to be parallel to the 'hill country' of v. 28 (cf. Cheyne, art. 'Juttah' in Encyc. Bibl., also Plummer, Int. Crit. Com. ad Lk 1:20). It is, therefore, probably better to treat the passage as a reference to that portion of the hill country of Judah round about Hebron, or to the south of it. Tradition has fixed upon Ἰβν Kārīm, a little west of Jerusalem, as the birthplace of John the Baptist. See, further, art. JUDEA, HILL, etc.

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

JUDAS.—1. Judas the son of James. The eleventh name in two lists of the Apostles (Lk 6:16, Ac 1:13) is Ἰουδᾶς Ἰακώβου. RV 'Judas the son of James' is a better rendering than AV 'Judas the brother of James.' The note in RVm is 'Or brother.' See Jude 1; but in Jude 1 there is no ambiguity; the Gr. text is ἀδελφὸς Ἰακώβου. The AV rendering is grammatically possible; but it is improbable that the genitive has two different meanings in one short list of names (cf. AV and RV 'James the son of Alphaeus'), and it is noteworthy that in Lk 3:31 ἀδελφός is expressed. The AV rendering may have been caused by Jude 1; certainly it has led to the erroneous identification of these two Judases. The evidence of Versions is in favour of RV. Syr<sup>1</sup> and Theb. have 'son of'; 'none suggests the exceptional rendering "the brother of" (Plummer in Smith's DB, vol. i. pt. 2). Syr<sup>2</sup> has 'Judas son of James' instead of Thaddeus or Lebbaeus in Mt 10:4, Mk 3:19.

In two lists of the Apostles (Mt 10:4, Mk 3:19) 'Judas the son of James' has no place; the other names correspond in all four lists. In Mt. and Mk. Thaddeus (v. l., in Mt., Lebbaeus) is one of the Twelve. There is little doubt that 'Judas the son of James' had a second name 'Thaddeus,' and perhaps a third name 'Lebbaeus.' Jerome (Com. in loc.) calls him trinomius. Cf. Nestle in Hastings' DB iv. 741.

It is significant that on the only occasion when this obscure Apostle is referred to in the Gospels, he is distinguished from his notorious namesake as 'Judas, not Iscariot' (Jn 14:22). All that we know of 'Judas Thaddeus' is that he asked the question, 'Lord, what is come to pass that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world?' He could not understand how the kingdom was to come unless the Messiah would make a public disclosure (ἀποκάλυψις) of His glory. The answer of Jesus explains that in the very nature of the case it is not possible for Him to reveal His glory to unloving and disobedient hearts. The question of Judas Thaddeus expressed the thought not only of other members of the Apostolic band, but also of many who have since believed in Christ. Our Lord's words have a message for all disciples whose impatience is an evidence of the influence of the spirit of the world. Well may St. Paul claim to 'have the mind of Christ' when he affirms that 'the natural man' is not only unable to 'receive' and to 'know' spiritual things, but is also incompetent to 'interpret' and to 'judge' them (cf. 1 Co 2:14).

Concerning the name of this Apostle, who is little more than a name to us, there has been much discussion. In Jn 14:22 Syr<sup>1</sup> has 'Thomas,' Syr<sup>2</sup> has 'Judas Thomas.' Plummer (op. cit.) is probably right in regarding the latter as 'a corrupt reading arising from the fact that the Syrian Christians called Thomas the Apostle, Judas.' Eusebius (HE i. 12:10) refers, in his narrative concerning Abgar, king of Edessa, to 'Judas who was also called Thomas.' McCliffert (Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, i. 62) suggests that 'it is possible that Eusebius, or the translator of the document, made a mistake, and applied to Thomas a name which in the original was given to Thaddeus.'

But Thomas is also called Judas Thomas in Acts of Thomas, c. 11 f., 31, 32, and in the Syriac Doctrina Apostolorum. Preuschen (Hennecke, Handbuch zu den NT Apokryphen, p. 562) says: 'In regard to the name Judas-Thomas, i.e. Judas the Twin, cf. Doctrina of Adam (p. 5, ed. Phillips), Bar-Hebraeus, Chronicon Eccl. iii. 2. The Syriac translation of Eusebius, Ch. Hist. i. 13. 10, renders the Gr. 'Ιούδας ὁ σὺν Θωμᾶς by ܘܕܝܢܐ ܘܬܘܡܐ which, according to the Nestorian pronunciation of the Syriac, must have been understood to mean Judas the Twin'. It is possible that these Syriac traditions preserve the personal name of Thomas 'the Twin'; it is impossible to believe that in the Fourth Gospel the Judas of 14th and the doubting Apostle are the same.

2. Judas the brother of James.—In two Gospels (Mt 13th, Mk 6th) 'James and Joseph and Simon and Judas' are named as brothers of Jesus. In Jude<sup>1</sup> the author of that Epistle is described as 'Judas . . . the brother of James' (RV). The AV has 'Jude'; and in Mk 6th 'Juda'. 'Judas the brother of James' is, therefore, a designation both Scriptural and simple, yet sufficient to distinguish the person so named from 'Judas the son of James,' who was an Apostle. The use of the full expression ἀδελφὸς Ἰακώβου in the Epistle of Jude, and the statement (Mt 13th) that Judas and James were of ἀδελφοί [ἑταίροι], justifies the limiting of the title 'the brother of James' to the Judas who was also a 'brother of Jesus.' Much confusion has been caused by the erroneous AV rendering of Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου (cf. No. 1 above).

Of 'Judas the brother of James' as an individual we know nothing; but account should be taken of what is said collectively of our Lord's brothers. He was probably a son of Joseph and Mary, and a younger brother of Jesus (cf. 'Brethren of the Lord' in Hastings' DB); he misunderstood the popularity of Jesus (Mt 12th), who was, in his estimation, a foolish enthusiast (Mk 3rd); before the resurrection of Jesus he did not acknowledge his Brother as the Messiah (Jn 7th), but after the resurrection he is found 'in prayer' in the upper room (Ac 1st); his doubts, like those of his brother James (1 Co 15th), may have vanished in the presence of the risen Lord. The distinct mention of the brothers of Jesus (Ac 1st) after the Eleven have been named, is another reason for rejecting the tradition which identifies 'Judas the brother of James' with Judas Thaddæus the Apostle.

The authorship of the Epistle of Jude is much disputed. Harnack regards the words 'brother of James' as an interpolation added towards the end of the 2nd cent. to enhance the value of the Epistle 'as a weapon against Gnosticism.' But 'the simplest interpretation of the salutation, which identifies the writer . . . with the brother of the Lord, is the best' (Chase, Hastings' DB II. 894<sup>a</sup>).

Eusebius (EE II. 19. 20<sup>a</sup>-8. 32) quotes from Hegesippus the account of an accusation brought against the grandchildren of Judas; they are described as 'descended from one of the so-called brothers of the Saviour, whose name was Judas'; it is further said that 'after they had borne testimony before Domitian in behalf of faith in Christ . . . they took the lead of every church as witnesses and as relatives of the Lord.' If 'Judas the brother of James' presided over the Church in the city where he lived, he may well have been the author of an Epistle. Mrs. Lewis conjectures that 'Thomas, the doubting disciple, is identical with Jude, the youngest brother of our Lord'; but this theory involves his exclusion from the statement in Jn 7th that our Lord's brothers did not believe that He was the Messiah (cf. Expt xiv. 308; also Rendel Harris, The Discours in the Christian Legends).

i. THE NT SOURCES.—The basis of any satisfactory solution of the fascinating and perplexing problem of the personality of Judas must be a comprehensive and careful study of the words of Jesus and the records of the Evangelists. Interest in his life and character may have been unduly sacrificed to dogmatic discussions of 'fix'd fate, free will, foreknowledge absolute,' but the reaction in favour of psychological methods of study may be carried to excess. Conclusions arrived at by the use of these methods are not always consistent with the historical data furnished by the Gospels. In psychological as well as theological investigations, speculation may prove an unsafe guide; at least it should always move in a path made by probing the lines laid down in the documents which are the main sources of our information. Theories framed by induction from a critical comparison of the narratives may claim to be attempts to untie the knot, but theories involving excisions from, and conjectural emendations of, the text of the Gospels and Acts are mere cuttings of the knot. A frank acknowledgment that there are difficulties at present inexplicable is preferable to the adoption of such violent methods of removing them. The NT material available for the investigation of the subject in its manifold aspects is found in the following passages:

1. The lists of the Apostles: Mk 3rd, Mt 10th, Lk 6th.
2. Early allusions to Judas: Jn 6th, 12th, 17th, Lk 22nd (cf. Mk 14th, Mt 26th).
3. The narratives of the Betrayal: Mk 14th, Mt 26th, Lk 22nd; Jn 13th; Mk 14th, Mt 26th, Lk 22nd, Jn 13th; Mk 14th, Mt 26th, Lk 22nd, Jn 13th.
4. The two accounts of the death of Judas: Mt 27th, Ac 1st.

From this classification it will be seen that, with the exception of Lk 22nd, the Synoptists say nothing about Judas before the Betrayal; their account of the Betrayal also differs in many details from that given in the Fourth Gospel. Some divergent traditions it is difficult, and perhaps impossible, to harmonize; assumptions that the one is an intentional modification of the other, or that they are contradictory, must be carefully examined; suggestions that they are supplementary, or mutually explanatory, must be fairly considered. Statements in the Fourth Gospel which are said to show John's bias against Judas will be investigated in due course.

ii. NAME AND DESIGNATIONS.—(a) Judas.—In all the lists of the Twelve this is the name of the Apostle mentioned last. Another Apostle (see preced. art. No. 1) bore this common Jewish name, but 'Judas' now means the Betrayer of Jesus. His sin has stamped the word with such evil significance that it has become the class-name of perfidious friends, who are 'no better than Judases' (cf. 'Judas-hole,' 'Judas-trap,' etc.).

'Ιούδας is the Gr. form of the Heb. Judah (יהודה), which in Gn 29th is derived from the verb 'to praise' (רָדַף), and is taken as meaning 'one who is the subject of praise' (cf. Gn 49th). The etymology is disputed, but in its popular sense it suggests a striking paradox, when used of one whose name became a synonym for shame.

(b) Iscariot: the usual surname of Judas. 'Ισκαριώθ, a transliteration from Heb., is the best attested reading in Mk 3rd 14th, Lk 6th; 'Ισκαριώτης, the Græcized form in Mt 26th, Lk 22nd, Jn 6th 13th; ὁ 'Ισκαριώτης in Mt 10th, Jn 12th 14th. Eight of these passages refer to Judas; in two (Jn 6th 13th) his father Simon is called Iscariot; once (Jn 14th) his fellow-Apostle is distinguished from his more famous namesake as 'not the Iscariot.' Only in Jn 12<sup>6</sup> does the full phrase occur—'Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon.' Nestle thinks that ἀπό Καριώτου, a reading of Codex Bezae, found four times in Jn instead of Ἰσκαριώτης, is a paraphrastic rendering of Iscariot by the author of the Fourth Gospel. Chase furnishes other evidence for this reading (The Syro-Latin Text of the Gospels, p. 102 f.), but argues that it cannot be part of the original text. His conclusion is that an early Syriac translator represented Ἰσκαριώτης by this paraphrase (cf. Expt ix, pp. 189, 240, 285).

Two facts already mentioned have an important bearing on the interpretation of Ἰσκαριώτης: (1) the true reading, 'Simon Iscariot,' shows that the epithet was equally applicable to the father and the son, and this twofold use of the word suggests that it is a local name; (2) the paraphrase ἀπό Καριώτου confirms the view that Judas is named after his place of abode (cf. Zahn, Das Evangelium des Matthäus, p. 393). Cheyne says 'we should have expected ἀπο κεριωθ,' yet admits that 'it is a plausible view' that Ἰσκαριώτης is derived from Ish-Kerioth (כרית כריות), 'a man of Kerioth' (Ency. Bibl. ii, 2624). Dalman (The Words of Jesus, p. 51 f.), thinks that Ἰσκαριώ was the original reading, and points back to the Hebrew, whilst ὁ ἀπό Καριώτου corresponds to the equivalent Aramaic כרית כריות. Hence the surname Iscariot probably means 'a Kariothite.'

It is impossible to say with certainty where the Kerioth was situated of which Judas was a native. (1) On account of this difficulty, Cheyne conjectures that Ἰερικώτης, 'a man of Jericho,' is the true reading. (2) The majority of scholars incline to the view that Kerioth is the Kerioth-Hezron or Hazor of Jos 15<sup>28</sup> (Vulg. Carioth); Buhl identifies the place with the modern Karjaten in South Judah (GAP p. 182). (3) Others suggest the Kerioth mentioned in Am 2<sup>2</sup>, Jer 48<sup>24</sup> (LXX Karad),—an important city, either Kir-Moab, or Ar, the capital of Moab. Harper ('Am. and Hos.,' Int. Crit. Com. p. 42) says that 'the reference in the Moabite stone (L. 13) favours Ewald's view that it is another name for Ar.' A less probable opinion is that the town referred to is Karfa or Kurawa (Jos. BJ i. vi. 5, iv. viii. 1; Ant. xiv. iii. 4) in North Judaea (Buhl, GAP p. 181). If any one of these towns was the birthplace of Judas, he was not a Galilean.

(c) 'One of the Twelve.'—In the Synoptic Gospels this phrase is found only in the narrative of the Betrayal, and it is applied only to Judas. It marks the mingled sorrow and indignation of the Evangelists, that within that select circle there could be a single treacherous heart. The simple formula is once changed by St. Luke (22<sup>3</sup>), who adds to his statement that 'Satan entered into Judas' these significant words: 'being of the number of the twelve'—i.e. counted among those whom Jesus called His friends, but about to become an ally of His foes, because in spirit he was 'none of his' (cf. Mt 23<sup>17</sup>, Mk 14<sup>20</sup>, Lk 22<sup>37</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel the phrase is used once of another than Judas; like a note of exclamation, it expresses surprise that Thomas, a member of the Apostolic band, was absent when the risen Saviour appeared to His disciples (Jn 20<sup>24</sup>). But St. John also applies the phrase to Judas, giving it a position in which its tragic and pathetic emphasis cannot be mistaken: 'You—the twelve, did not I choose? and of you one is a devil. Now he spake of Judas, the son of Simon Iscariot; for it was he that was about to betray him—one of the twelve' (6<sup>70</sup>, 71). St. John's phrase (εἰς ἐκ τῶν δώδεκα) differs slightly from that used by the Synoptists (εἰς τῶν δώδεκα); Westcott suggests that it marks 'the unity of the body to which the unfaithful member belonged' (Com. in loc.).

That Judas was 'one of the twelve' is an important factor in the problem presented by his history. It implies that Jesus saw in him the material out of which an Apostle might have been made,—the clay out of which a vessel unto honour might have been shaped; it implies that Judas, of free-will, chose to follow Jesus and to continue with Him; and it implies that Judas heard from the Master's lips words of gracious warning against the peril of his besetting sin. On the other hand, the fact that Judas was 'one of the twelve' does not imply that Jesus had the betrayal in view when He chose this Apostle and entrusted him with the common purse; it does not imply that even in that most holy environment Judas was exempted from the working of the spiritual law that such 'evil things' as 'thefts . . . covetings, . . . deceit . . . proceed from within, and defile the man' (Mk 7<sup>21</sup>); and it does not imply that there were no good impulses in the heart of Judas when he became a disciple of Jesus. Of Judas in his darkest hour the words of Lavater are true: he 'acted like Satan, but like a Satan who had it in him to be an Apostle.'

In Mk 14<sup>10</sup> the best supported reading (NBCLM) is ὁ εἰς τῶν δώδεκα, with a note in RVn—'Gr. the one of the twelve.' Wright (Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek, p. 31, cf. p. 147) is of opinion that Mk. distinctly calls Judas 'the chief of the twelve.' He takes ὁ εἰς as equal to ὁ πῶτος, as in τῆ ματ τῶν σαββᾶτων (Mk 16<sup>7</sup>). But the definite article is not found with this phrase in any other passage in the Gospels; moreover, it is almost impossible to believe that when the Gospels were written the assertion that Judas was 'the chief' or even primus inter pares had a place in the original text. On the other hand, Field (Notes on the Translation of the NT, in loc.) is scarcely justified in saying 'ὁ εἰς τῶν δ, can mean nothing but "the first (No. 1) of the twelve," which is absurd.' The unique reading may, however, preserve a genuine reminiscence of a time in the earlier ministry of Jesus when Judas, the treasurer of the Apostolic company, had a kind of priority. If this were so, there would come a time when, as Wright suggests, the supporters of Judas would become 'jealous of the honour bestowed on Peter.' Jealousy would account not only for the dispute about rival claims to be the greatest, but also for the respective positions of Judas and Peter at the supper-table. The most probable explanation of the details given (Mt 26<sup>6</sup>, Jn 12<sup>26-29</sup>) is that John was reclining on the right of Jesus; but Judas 'claimed and obtained the chief seat at the table' next Jesus, and was reclining on His left, whilst 'the lowest place was voluntarily taken by Peter, who felt keenly the Lord's rebuke of this strife for precedence' (cf. Andrews, The Life of our Lord, p. 486; Edersheim, Life and Times, ii. 493).

(d) 'A thief.'—The meaning of the statement that 'Judas was a thief' (Jn 12<sup>6</sup>) is quite plain, if the RV correctly renders the following sentence: 'and having the bag, took away (εἰσάραξεν) what was put therein.' Saraxō means (1) to bear, (2) to bear away, as in Jn 20<sup>12</sup> (cf. 'cattle-lifting'). Its use in the sense of bearing away secretly or pilfering is established (cf. Field, op. cit. in loc.). In this context the statement that Judas carried the money put into the bag which was in his possession seems singularly tame, if it is not mere repetition. On the other hand, to say that Judas had formed the habit of pilfering is a natural explanation of

† There is force in Edersheim's remark (Life and Times, ii. 586), that 'viewed in its primary elements (not in its development) Peter's character was, among the disciples, the likeliest to that of Judas.'

the assertion that he had been guilty of theft. Weiss (Leben Jesu, ii. 443) thinks that 'John had found out thefts committed by the greedy Judas'; this does not necessarily imply that the thefts were known to John at the time of Mary's anointing, for they may have come to light after that act, but before the narrative was shaped in this form.

The rendering of ἔδοραζεν by the neutral word 'bare' is adopted by some, who hold that John's words do not imply more than that Judas had a thievish disposition. Ainger adopts this interpretation in a finely-wrought study of the character of Judas (The Gospel and Human Life, p. 221). It is true in a sense that 'he may have been a thief long before he began to steal,' but this exposition involves the unlikely assumption that the betrayal of Jesus was the 'first act by which he converted his spirit of greed into actual money profit.' If Judas had not formed the habit of pilfering, it is more difficult to understand how the thirty pieces of silver could be a real temptation to him.

Cheyne gets rid of the difficulty by assuming that the text is corrupt. In his conjectural emendation the word 'thief' has no place; he reads 'because he was a harsh man, and used to carry the common purse' (ὅτι γὰρ ἠγέραις ἦν καὶ ἐν κοινῇ διακόνειον ἔδοραζεν). 'The statement about Judas' in this hypothetical text is then naively said to be 'worthy of more credit than it has sometimes received from advanced critics' (Exeg. 233. ii. 232).

(e) 'Betrayer' or 'traitor.'—In the list of the Apostles given in Lk 6<sup>16</sup> there is a variation from the phrase by which Judas is usually described. Instead of ὁ καὶ παρέδωκεν αὐτόν ('who also betrayed him'), ὁ ἰδί, 'delivered him up' St. Luke has ὁ ἐξέπερε προδοῦν, well rendered by Field—'who turned traitor' (cf. Amer. RV 'became a traitor'; Weymouth, 'proved to be a traitor'). The translation in the EV—'which was the traitor'—neither brings out the force of γίνομαι, nor the significance of the omission of the article.

The statement that Judas 'turned traitor' should be remembered in framing or estimating theories to account for his history; it confirms what has been said on this subject under (c). From this point of view the various phrases used in the Gospels will repay careful discrimination: most frequent is the simple statement of the tragic deed as a historic fact—'who betrayed him' (Mk 3<sup>19</sup> παρέδωκεν); but there is also the prophecy, 'The Son of Man is about to be betrayed' (Mt 17<sup>22</sup> παλεὶ παραδίδοσθαι), and the statement, when the time was drawing nigh, that the process had already begun, 'The Son of Man is being betrayed' (Mt 26<sup>2</sup> παραδίδοται). Similarly, Judas is described as 'he who would betray him' (Jn 6<sup>70</sup> ὁ παραδίδον), 'he who is betraying me' (Mt 26<sup>48</sup> ὁ παραδίδον), and as 'he who had betrayed him' (Mt 27<sup>3</sup> ὁ παραδίδον). In this connexion Jn 6<sup>70</sup> deserves special attention: 'Jesus knew from the beginning . . . who it was that should betray him.' Needless difficulties are occasioned when 'from the beginning' is regarded as referring to any period before the call of Judas; the thought seems to be that Jesus perceived 'from the beginning' of His intercourse with Judas the spirit that was in him. Hence the statement is wrongly interpreted in a fatalistic sense. The rendering, 'Jesus knew who it was that would betray him' has the advantage of suggesting that Jesus discerned the thoughts and intents of His unfaithful Apostle, and knew that 'the germ of the traitor-spirit was already in the heart of Judas' (cf. W. F. Moulton in Schaff's Popular Commentary, in loc.).

(f) 'A devil.'—In Jn 6<sup>70</sup> there is a contrast between the hopes of Jesus when He chose (ἐξελέ- ἐξέμυρ) the Twelve, and His present grief over the moral deterioration of one whose nature is now devilish (δαιμόλιός ἐστιν). Our Lord's spiritual discourse to the multitude brought all who heard it to the parting of the ways; it shattered the hopes of those who were eager to share in the glories of an earthly kingdom. On the inner circle of the Apostles that teaching also cast its searching light; to Jesus, though not to Peter (v. 80), it was plain that Judas was at heart a deserter,—in sympathy with those who 'went back and walked no more with him.' What Jesus detected in Judas was 'a sudden crystallization of evil, diabolic purpose, which made him a very adversary of the one whom he called friend' (Wright, op. cit. in loc.). But an adversary is not an irreconcilable foe; the assertion taken in its full strength of meaning is a message of conciliation as well as of warning. It involved no lowering of the position of Judas among the Twelve, for his name is not mentioned; and it assuredly involved no relaxing of our Lord's efforts to scatter with the light of love the gloom which was creeping into the heart of one whom He had chosen 'to be with him.' A strained interpretation of the saying underlies the statement that it 'appears to be inconsistent with the equal confidence in all the disciples shown by Jesus according to the Synoptic tradition' (Exeg. 233. ii. 2624). 'No man,' says Pressensé, 'could be more akin to a devil than a perverted apostle' (Jesus Christ, p. 324).

(g) 'Son of perdition.'—The Gr. word rendered 'perdition' in this phrase (Jn 17<sup>12</sup>) is ἀπώλεια, which signifies the state of being lost. It is the substantive derived from the same root as the main verb of the sentence (ἀπώλετο). The connexion of thought is not easy to reproduce in English. Ainger (op. cit. p. 227) brings out the sense of the passage in a paraphrase: 'None of them is lost, but he whose very nature it was to be lost—he (that is to say) whose insensibility to the Divine touch, whose irresponsiveness to the heavenly discipline, made it a certainty that he should fall away.' The apostasy of Judas is traced to the 'natural gravitation' of his character. By a well-known Hebraism Judas is described as the 'son of' that which stamps his nature; he is of such a character that his proper state is one of loss (cf. 2 Th 2<sup>10</sup>). The same word (ἀπώλεια) is rendered 'waste' in the Syriac accounts of Mary's anointing (Mt 26<sup>9</sup>; Mk 14<sup>4</sup>). 'To what purpose is this waste?' was the expression of indignation of some' (Mk.) of the disciples; perhaps it was originally the question of Judas, though St. John does not say so. It may well be, however, that he whose audible murmur, 'Why this loss or waste?' was echoed by the other disciples is himself described by Jesus as 'the son of loss'—'the wastor.'

This verse (Jn 17<sup>12</sup>) is often appealed to by rival champions of Calvinism and Arminianism. In Bishop Sanderson's Works (v. 324 f.) there is a letter to him from H. Hammond, who affirms that 'here it is expressly said that Judas, though by his apostasy now becomes the son of perdition, was by God given to Christ.' But the true reading is, 'I kept them in thy name which thou hast given me' (RV), and the thought (cf. v. 8) 'those whom thou hast given me' is rather that 'they in whom the Father's object is attained are those given to the Son; Judas, therefore, was not so given.' To suppose that Judas is now brought before us as one originally doomed to perdition, and that his character was but the evolving of his doom, would contradict not only the meaning of the Hebraic expression 'son of' (which always takes for granted moral choice), but the whole teaching of this Gospel. In no book of the NT is the idea of 'gift of choice on the part of man, brought forward so repeatedly and with so great an emphasis' (W. F. Moulton, op. cit. in loc.).

iii. OTHER NT REFERENCES TO JUDAS.—(a) Before the Betrayal.—The obscurity which rests upon the early history of Judas accounts to a large extent for the difficulty of estimating his character. But for occasional allusions in the Fourth Gospel, all that is related of him before the Betrayal is that he was one of the chosen Twelve, and that he turned traitor. There is, however, a statement peculiar to St. Luke among the Synoptists, which is obviously intended to furnish an explanation of the act of Betrayal—'Satan entered into Judas' (22<sup>3</sup>). It finds a fitting place in the introduction to the narrative of the Betrayal in the psychological Gospel which so often gives internal reasons; 'the Gospel of the physician is also the Gospel of the psychologist' (Alexander, Leading Ideas of the Gospels, p. 107). The same phrase, 'Satan entered into him' (εἰσῆλθεν εἰς αὐτὸν ὁ Σατανᾶς), is also found in Jn 13<sup>27</sup>, and it is preceded by the statement (13<sup>2</sup>) that the devil had 'already put into the heart (ἦδη βεβλημένος εἰς τὴν καρδίαν) of Judas' the thought of betrayal. It is true, as Cheyne says (Ency. Bibl. ii. 2625), that in Jn. we have 'a modification of the Synoptic tradition,' but that is not equivalent to 'quite a different account.' So far from asserting that 'it was at the Last Supper that the hateful idea occurred to Judas,' St. John prefaces his description of the proceedings at the Supper (βείβου γαρῶντο) by the emphatic assertion that 'already' (4th), i. e. at some time other than the Supper, the suggestion of the devil had been entertained by Judas. In St. Luke's brief account it is said, once for all, that 'Satan entered into Judas.' In the Fourth Gospel the genesis of the foul purpose is distinguished from its consummation; the Satanic influences were not irresistible; the devil had not full possession of the heart of Judas until, after the sop, he acted on the suggestion which had then become his own resolve.

The Fourth Gospel also makes the Anointing at Bethany (12<sup>4</sup>) a definite stage in the process which is sometimes called the 'demonizing' of Judas, but is better described as his 'giving place to the devil' (Eph 4<sup>7</sup>). St. Luke does not mention Mary's anointing. St. Matthew and St. Mark have full accounts of it, but Judas is not named; yet immediately after the narrative of the Anointing both Mk. and Mk. place Judas' offer to the chief priests to betray Jesus for money, thus clearly recognizing an intimate connexion between the two events. St. John explains this sequence by adding the significant detail that the murmuring against Mary's waste of ointment had its origin in the heart of Judas. Our Lord's defence of Mary's beautiful deed implied a rebuke to Judas, and unmasked his hypocrisy; moreover, our Lord's plain references to His coming death involved the disillusionment of His ambitious Apostle. The reproof would rankle; the disappointment would be acute. The angry spirit engendered by such emotions is closely akin to the spirit of treachery and revenge. On insufficient grounds, therefore, Gould speaks of 'John's evident attempt to belittle Judas' (Int. Crit. Com., note on Mk 14<sup>1</sup>). No more likely origin of the murmuring, which was not confined to Judas (Mk 14<sup>1</sup>, Mt 26<sup>7</sup>), is suggested. On the other hand, there seems to be no reason for belittling St. John; his addition to the Synoptic Gospels justifies their association of Mary's anointing with Judas' desertion of Christ; it also furnishes a link between the Anointing of which St. Luke gives no account and his statement 'Satan entered into Judas,'—that statement is the psychological explanation of the actions of Judas recorded in the narratives of the Anointing and the Last Supper.

(b) Describing the Betrayal.—In the Passion narratives all the Gospels refer to our Lord's consciousness of His approaching Betrayal; all record His announcement, at the beginning of the Supper, of the presence of the Betrayer; and all mention the consternation and self-questioning of the Apostles to which that statement gave rise (Mk 14<sup>28</sup>, Mt 26<sup>21</sup>, Lk 22<sup>21</sup>, Jn 13<sup>21</sup>). There is no reason to suppose (Weiss) that Judas was definitely indicated by our Lord's words, 'He that dipped his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me' (Mt 26<sup>23</sup>). Before the lamb was placed on the table, each guest dipped his own bread into the bitter sauce and ate the sop. The aorist participle (ἑμβάψας) refers to this act, but does not necessarily fix its time; as thus interpreted, the phrase is in harmony with the vague expression 'that man,' used twice in v. 26, with the passage quoted (Jn 13<sup>26</sup>) from Ps 41<sup>9</sup> 'He that eateth my bread'; cf. 'messmate', and with the parallel passage in Mk 14<sup>20</sup> where the present participle is used (ἑμβάπτόμενος). An addition to the Synoptic tradition is found in the Fourth Gospel, which describes Jesus as giving a sop to Judas (13<sup>26</sup>). At Eastern meals this was a mark of special attention (cf. Macmillan, 'A Mock Sacrament,' in ExpT iii. 107 f.); our Lord's action would indicate the traitor to the disciple who was 'leaning back' on His breast, though it left John, like the rest, in ignorance of the meaning of the words with which Jesus urged Judas to hasten the work he was already doing (v. 27). To the traitor himself the words of Jesus, gradually narrowing in their range and therefore increasing in intensity, were at once a tender appeal and a final warning. St. Matthew alone records the question of Judas, 'Is it I, Rabbi?' and our Lord's answer, 'Thou hast said' (26<sup>25</sup>). If Judas had the chief seat at the table next to Jesus (cf. above, ii. (c)), the assent conveyed, perhaps in a whisper and certainly not in the ordinary form (cf. Dalman, The Words of Jesus, 308 f.), must have had for him a tragic significance. As Zahn points out (op. cit. in loc.), the prefixed pronoun in εἶπας heightens the contrast between the questioner and the speaker, and conveys the meaning, 'What thou hast said, there is no need for me to say.' St. Matthew does not state that at this juncture Judas left the Supper-table, but the next allusion to Judas (v. 47) implies an absence of some duration. The probable solution of the much-discussed problem, 'Did Judas eat the Passover?' is that, although he ate the sop given to him by Jesus at the beginning of the Supper, he had gone out into the darkness (Jn 13<sup>30</sup>) before Jesus gave the bread and the wine to His disciples. It is true that in Lk 22 the narrative of the Supper precedes our Lord's announcement of the Betrayer's presence; but the 'order' (1st) characteristic of this Gospel does not imply chronological sequence in every detail; Wright (op. cit. p. 132) accounts for the variation from the parallel passages by the suggestion that St. Luke was influenced by the language of St. Paul in 1 Co 11<sup>23</sup>.

In their accounts of the actual Betrayal of our Lord the Synoptists state that the kiss of Judas was the prearranged signal for His arrest (Mk 14<sup>45</sup>, Mt 26<sup>48</sup>; cf. Lk 22<sup>47</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel nothing is said of the kiss, but a graphic account is given of our Lord's unexpected declaration to His foes that He was the Nazarene for whom they were seeking (18<sup>4</sup>). The silence of St. John is no proof that the kiss was not given; nor is the fact which he records any evidence that the kiss was superfluous. A sufficient motive for the self-manifestation of Jesus is mentioned: 'let these go their way' (v. 8); such a request is appropriate whether the kiss of Judas be placed before or after the question of Jesus, 'Whom seek ye?' If before, our Lord supplemented the Betrayer's signal owing to the hesitancy of the awestruck soldiers, who shrank from arresting Him. If after, Judas must have been disconcerted by our Lord's action; the kiss would not be given until later, when, as his courage returned, he did not scruple to kiss his Master with the unnecessary demonstration of a feigned affection (καρεφλῆσεν, Mk 14<sup>45</sup>, Mt 26<sup>49</sup>). Our Lord's discernment of the evil purpose underlying this emotional display is indicated by His question, 'Judas, betrayest thou the Son of Man with a kiss?' (Lk 22<sup>48</sup>). In Mt 26<sup>50</sup> Jesus is reported to have also said (RV), 'Friend, do that for which thou art come' (cf. AV 'Friend, wherefore art thou come?').

Bruce (Expos. Gr. Test. in loc.) takes the laconic phrase ἰδὲ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν as a 'question in effect, though not in form'; its probable meaning is 'Comrade, and as a comrade here?' (cf. Bengel, in loc. 'Hocine illud est cuius causa ades?'). Blass unnecessarily (cf. 22<sup>47</sup>) changes ἰδὲ into αἶψα, which yields the meaning 'take away that for which thou art come, or 'art here, according as τῶν is taken from ἁμαρτίας or ἁμαρτιῶν. Cheyne (Expos. Bibl. ii. 2626) conjectures that the true reading is ἰσκαριώ, 'thou actest a part,' or 'thou art no friend of mine'; αἶψα is got rid of as a dittograph.

(c) After the Betrayal.—In three of the Gospels (Mk., Lk., Jn.) there is no mention of the Betrayer after the arrest of Jesus; but Mt 27<sup>35</sup> relates the after-history and fate of Judas as the fulfilment of prophecy. The ascription to Jeremiah of Zec 11<sup>12</sup> is probably due to a failure of memory; the passage is freely quoted, and may include reminiscences of the language of Jeremiah (cf. 18<sup>2</sup>, 19<sup>10</sup>, 32<sup>26</sup>). The absence of ἰσκαριώ from some of the Old Lat. and ancient Syr. VSS shows that the name was a stumbling-block to early translators of the NT. Zahn (Gesch. des NT Kanons, ii. 696) says that the Nazarenes had a Hebrew MS ascribed to Jeremiah, in which the passage is found verbatim,—manifestly an Apocryphon invented to do the honour of Matthew. The variations from the Heb. and LXX are not consistent with the theory that the Evangelist's narrative is a legend evolved from the passage in Zechariah; they are explicable on the supposition that the facts suggested the prophecy. J. H. Bernard (Expositor, 6th series, ix. 422 ff.) shows that St. Matthew's account must be based upon 'a tradition independent of the prophecy cited.' The 'salient features' of this tradition are thus summarized—(a) Judas, stricken by remorse, returned the money paid him; (b) he hanged himself in despair; (c) the priests with the money bought a field called the "Potter's Field," which was henceforth called ἄγρος Αἰματός; (d) the field was used as a cemetery for foreigners. The point of connexion between the fact and the prophecy is the exact correspondence between the amount paid for the prophet's hire and for the prophet of Nazareth's betrayal. In both cases the paltry sum was the expression of the nation's ingratitude; the thirty pieces of silver was the price of a slave (Ex 21<sup>32</sup>). Meditating on the details of the Betrayal, the Evangelist called to mind the experience of Zechariah, and saw in it the foreshadowing of the treatment of Jesus in which the sin of a thankless people reached its climax.

In Ac 1<sup>18</sup> is a different account of the death of Judas is given. Plummer regards the tradition preserved in the Gospel as 'nearer in time to the event, and probably nearer to the truth' (Hastings' DB ii. 798). Bartlet holds that the Lukan tradition 'represents the actual facts most nearly' ('Acts' in Cent. Bible, Note A). The chief argument for the latter view is a saying of Papias which resembles the statement in Acts, though it adds repulsive details (Cramer, Catena on Mt.). Dr. Rendel Harris, AJTA iv. 490 ff., thinks that the Papias tradition is 'the fountainhead of the Judas legends, to which fountainhead Luke lies nearer than Matthew.' The difficulties involved in this supposition are, (1) that it treats the account in Matthew as 'a mere substitution'; (2) that it involves the conjecture of an original reading in Acts, 'he swelled up and burst asunder.' It is more probable that the Papias story contains later additions from folk-lore than that the present text of Acts omits essential details. Dr. Harris points out striking coincidences between the Judas narratives and the accounts of the death of Nadian, the traitorous nephew of Ahikar, Sennacherib's grand vizier; but the parallel does not prove that the Ahikar stories are 'the literary parent' of the Judas stories. Knowing (Expos. Gr. Test. in loc.) rightly says: 'Whatever may be alleged as to the growth of popular fancy and tradition in the later account in Acts of the death of Judas, it cannot be said to contrast unfavorably with the details given by Papias, Fragment 18, which Blass describes as "insulsissima et foedissima." See, further, AKELDAMA.

iv. THE CHARACTER OF JUDAS.—(a) The good motives theory.—Many have attempted to explain the action of Judas as arising not from treachery and avarice, but from an honest endeavour to arouse Jesus to action and to hasten His Messianic triumph. Modern writers reproduce, with slight modifications, the theory to which the charm of De Quincey's literary style has imparted a fascination out of all proportion to its probability (Works, vi. 21 ff.; Whately, Essays on Demerol to the Christian Faith, Discourse ii.). The theory assumes (1) that Jesus, like Hamlet, was 'sublimely over-gifted for purposes of speculation, . . . but not correspondingly endowed for the business of action'; (2) that Judas was alive to the danger resulting from this morbid feature in the temperament of Jesus, and acted not from perfidy, but with a genuine conviction that if Christ's kingdom was to be set up on earth, He 'must be compromised before doubts could have time to form.' This theory implies that the judgment of Judas was at fault, but that he had no evil intent; it finds no support in the Gospel history, and it is inconsistent with our Lord's stern words of condemnation.

(b) The Satan incarnate theory.—Dante (Inferno, xxxiv. 62) places Judas in the Giudicca, the lowest circle of the frozen deep of Hell, accounting him a sharer in the sin of Satan, inasmuch as his treachery was aggravated by ingratitude towards his benefactor. A similar tendency to set Judas apart as the arch-villain is manifest in works which reflect the popular imagination. Critics of the Ober-Ammergau Passion-play complain that the Betrayer is represented as a low, cunning rascal, and is often made to look ridiculous. But the comic personifications of Judas, as of Satan himself, in folk-lore are really tokens of popular abhorrence (cf. Buttner, Judas Ischarioth, p. 11 f.); they are the result of regarding him as an incarnation of Satanic wickedness. Daub, in the Introduction to a speculative work on the relation of good to evil (Judas Ischarioth, oder Betrachtungen über das Böse im Verhältnisse zum Guten), conceives Judas as the Satanic kingdom personified in contrast with Jesus who is the Divine kingdom personified; Judas is 'an incarnation of the devil.' Dr. Fairbairn, who gives (Studies in the Life of Christ, p. 264 f.) a succinct summary of Daub's 'gruesome book,' truly says that he is 'unjust to Judas, sacrificing his historical and moral significance to a speculative theory.' The practical effect of such exaggerations of the innate vice of Judas is to place him outside the pale of humanity; but they are as untrue to the Evangelists' delineation of his character as are the attempts to explain away his sin. The same objection may be urged against theories which portray Judas as a mere compound of malice and greed, uninfluenced by any high impulse or noble ambition. In the Gospels he appears as a man 'of like nature with ourselves'; he was both tempted of the devil and 'drawn away by his own lust'; Satan approached his soul along avenues by which he draws near to us; he was not 'twofold more a son of hell' than ourselves (Mt 23<sup>15</sup>); he went to 'his own place' in the 'outer darkness,' because he turned away from the 'light of life'; the darkness 'blinded his eyes' because he would not abide in the light, though 'the true light' was shining upon him (cf. 1 Jn 2<sup>9</sup>).

(c) The mingled motives theory.—The key to the complex problem of the character of Judas is not to be found in a single word. The desire to simplify his motives has led, on the one hand, to an attempt to exonerate him from guilt; and, on the other hand, to a description of him as the devil incarnate. The truth lies between the two extremes; in Judas, possibilities of good were unrealized because he 'gave place to the devil.' It is a mistake to set one motive over against another, as though a man of covetous disposition may not also be ambitious, and as though an ambitious man may not also be jealous. The references to Judas in the Gospels, to which attention has already been called in this article, furnish reasons, it is believed, for saying that Judas was swayed by all three motives, one being sometimes more prominent than another, and the one reacting upon the other. It may well be that ambition would, for a time, restrain covetousness, and yet revive it in the hour of disappointment; whilst, in turn, jealousy would embitter, and covetousness would degrade ambition.

(a) Violence is done to the statements of the Evangelists when covetousness is eliminated from the motives which influenced Judas. His covetous disposition is not incompatible either with the fact that he was a disciple of Jesus of his own free will, or with his position of trust, or with his remorse at the consequences of his perfidy. (1) The call of Jesus would arouse 'a new affection, powerful enough to expel for a time all selfish greed, even though Judas, like the rest of the disciples, cherished the hope of attaining to honour in the Messianic kingdom. (2) His appointment by Jesus to a position of trust scarcely 'proves that he was no lover of money' (Fairbairn, op. cit. p. 266); to entrust a man possessing more than ordinary business gifts with the common cash-box is to provide him with an opportunity of honourable service which may become the occasion of his downfall; it was along the line of his capacity to handle moneys that the temptation came to Judas to handle them to his own gain. (3) The objection that the remorse of Judas discredits the idea of his being actuated by greed of money has force only when covetousness is regarded as the sole motive of the betrayal. What we know of the conduct of Judas towards the close of his career suggests that covetousness—the sin against which Jesus had so earnestly warned His disciples—was once more gaining the upper hand.

(3) To say that Judas was ambitious is not to differentiate him from his fellow-Apostles. The contrast between him and them was gradually brought to light as together they listened to the spiritual teaching of Jesus; that contrast is definitely marked by St. John when he first mentions Judas (6<sup>7</sup>). It was a time of crisis; the Apostles had been severely tested (1) by the refusal of Jesus to accept the homage of the Galilean crowd, who had been impressed by His recent miracles and desired perforce to make Him king; (2) by the searching question, 'Would ye also go away?' (v. 2) put by Jesus to the Twelve, when Master and disciples were alike saddened by the desertion of the many. St. Peter thought he was speaking for all the Twelve when he made his confession of faith; but within that select circle there was one who had not found in Christ all that he was seeking. Jesus saw that already in spirit Judas was a deserter, and, as Westcott points out, a man who regards Christ 'in the light of his own selfish views' is 'turning good into evil' (διαβάλλειν), and is, therefore, a partaker of 'that which is essential to the devil's nature' (Speaker's Com. in loc.). It was in the light of the Betrayal that St. John came not only to recognize in Judas the disloyal Apostle to whom Christ referred without mentioning his name, but also to perceive the significance of the words of Jesus, 'One of you is a devil' (6<sup>7</sup>). The whole incident shows that the words and actions of Jesus had proved a disillusionment to Judas; when he joined the disciples of Christ, he hoped for more than 'words of eternal life'; baffled ambition was one of the motives which prompted him to do the devil's work of betrayal.

(c) Reasons for believing that jealousy was one of the motives which led Judas to turn traitor have been given above (cf. ii. (c)). An ambitious man is peculiarly susceptible to this temptation. It would embitter Judas to realize that he was in a false position owing to his misconception of the aims of Christ, that his chances of advancement in the coming kingdom were dwindling, and that some of the least of his brethren would be greater than he. In proportion as others gained a higher place than himself in the esteem of Christ, the expectations he had been cherishing would fade. 'Trifles light as air are to the jealous confirmation' of their fears. Fuller knowledge of the life of Judas would probably enable us to see this sin in germ. It may also be, as Ainger suggests (op. cit. p. 234), that the Evangelists are silent because 'there was so little to tell.' Judas is described as 'a sullen and silent person . . . dwelling ever on himself—how he should profit if the cause were victorious, how he might suffer if the cause should fail.' Such a man would be prone to jealousy and 'fit for treasons.'

Whether covetousness, ambition, or jealousy was the basal motive of Judas when he betrayed Jesus, it is difficult, perhaps impossible, to say. It is probable that the flame of resentment, kindled by baffled ambition, was fanned by malign jealousy and base desire to snatch at paltry gain when all seemed lost. That the thirty pieces of silver tormented Judas does not prove that they had never attracted him; that he keenly suffered from the pang of remorse makes neither his evil deed nor his evil motives good. All that we are warranted in saying is well expressed by Bruce (The Training of the Twelve, p. 367): 'He was bad enough to do the deed of infamy, and good enough to be unable to bear the burden of its guilt. Woe to such a man! Better for him, indeed, that he had never been born!'

V. REFERENCES TO JUDAS IN POST-BIBLICAL LITERATURE.—(a) Apocryphal works.—In the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles Judas Iscariot is mentioned (§ 2). In the Arabic Gospel of the Childhood (§ 35) Judas is represented as possessed by Satan at the birth of Jesus; he tried to bite Jesus, but could not; he did, however, strike Jesus, and immediately Satan went forth from him in the shape of a mad dog. In the Gospel of Judas (Iren. adv. Hær. i. 31; cf. Epiph. xxxviii. 1, 2) the Cainites—an important Gnostic sect—are said to have declared 'that Judas the traitor . . . knowing the truth as no others did, alone accomplished the mystery of the betrayal.' In the Acts of Peter (§ 8), Peter speaks of Judas as his 'fellow-disciple and fellow-apostle'; he also refers to his 'godless act of betrayal.' In the Acts of Thomas (§ 32) the dragon or serpent says, 'I am he who inflamed and bribed Judas to deliver the Messiah to death.' Later (§ 84), there is a warning against 'theft, which enticed Judas Iscariot and caused him to hang himself.' The account of the death of the serpent (§ 32) probably contains reminiscences of the story of the death of Judas; after sucking the poison the serpent 'began to swell, and ultimately burst.' Dr. Rendel Harris (op. cit. p. 508) quotes from Solomon of Bassora, The Book of the Bee, the interesting comparison: 'Judas Iscariot, the betrayer, . . . was like unto the serpent, because he dealt craftily with the Lord.'

(b) Early Christian writings.—Clement of Rome (1 Ep. ad Cor. xvi. 8) combines 'the words spoken by our Lord with regard to Judas' (Mt 26<sup>64</sup>—Mk 14<sup>21</sup>) with 'a saying recorded in another connexion in the three Synoptic Gospels' (cf. Mt 18<sup>35</sup> etc.). Hermas (Vis. iv. ii. 6) probably borrows the same saying from the Synoptists, 'the change being no greater than we may expect when there is no express quotation' (cf. The NT in the Apostolic Fathers, pp. 61, 121).

Papias refers to the horrible end of Judas (cf. above, iii. (c)) in the fourth book of his 'Expositions of the Oracles of the Lord' (Cramer, Catena in Mat. 27). From the same book Irenæus (adv. Hæc. v. 33<sup>2</sup>) quotes an 'unwritten' saying of Jesus, foretelling days when the earth shall be marvellously fruitful, and the animals shall be at peace. Papias further says that 'whenever the traitor Judas did not give credit to these things, and put the question, "How then can things about to bring forth so abundantly be wrought by the Lord?" the Lord declared, "They who shall come to these [times] shall see."

Tertullian, like Irenæus (cf. above, v. (a)), condemns the Cainites because they held the conduct of Judas to be meritorious; he represents them as saying (adv. omnes Hæreses, ii.): 'Judas, observing that Christ wished to subvert the truth, betrayed Him.' Tertullian also (adv. Marcionem, iv. 40) refers to the treachery of Judas as predetermined by prophecy.

Origen (contra Celsum, ii. 11 f.) replies to the 'childish objection that no good general was ever betrayed'; Celsus is reminded that he had learnt of the betrayal from the Gospels, and that he had called 'the one Judas many disciples,' thus unfairly stating his accusation (cf. also Tract. in Mat. 35).

(c) Folk-lore.—Some of the wild fables about Judas may be traced to the legend of the Wandering Jew (cf. Moncure D. Conway, art. 'Jew' in Encyc. Brit. xiii. 674). Another source of popular tradition is a 17th cent. work by Ulrich Megerle, a Vienna priest, generally known as Abraham a Santa Clara. His Judas der Erbschelm, oder eigentlicher Entwurf und Lebensbeschreibung des Ischariotschen Bösewichts was translated into several European languages; the English edition bears the title, The Arch-Knave, or the History of Judas from the cradle to the gallows. From the Polychronicon (14th cent.) and the Golden Legend (13th cent.) many stories of Judas, current as folk-lore, are supposed to be derived. Many curious allusions to Judas and quaint customs connected with his name are mentioned in Notes and Queries, ii. 5, 6, 7, iii. 7, iv. 1, v. 6. Cholevius, Geschichte der deutschen Poesie nach ihren antiken Elementen, compares the Judas legend with the Oedipus story.

LITERATURE.—It is superfluous to name Lives of Christ, Commentaries on the Gospels, and articles in Encyclopedias. Mention has already been made of the most important works which deal with the NT narratives of the life of Judas, to which may now be added Expositor iii. x. (1889) 161 ff.; Kor. Sermons, i. 222 ff.; Stalker, Trial and Death of Jesus Christ, 110 ff. Interesting studies of or references to Judas will be found in the following poems: Story, A Roman Lawyer in Jerusalem; Matthew Arnold, St. Brendon; Robert Buchanan, The Ballad of Judas Iscariot; Keble, Judas's Infancy ('Cradle Songs' 13 in Lyra Innocentium). Dr. A. B. Grosart mentions Gianni,

Sonnet on Judas; a few German poems may be added: Klopstock, Messias, 3rd Aufzug; Geibel, Judas Ischariath; Max Crone, Judasrätzel and Der Sohn des Verderbens. J. G. TASKER.

JUDGING (by men).—

In the NT 'to judge' is always a tr. of krainō or its compounds, although krainō is frequently rendered by other words than 'judge.' The primary meaning of krainō is to separate, put asunder. Through the derivative signification to search into, to investigate, it came to mean to choose, prefer, determine, to decide moral questions or disputes after examination, to judge. In this last sense it is used of the authoritative decisions Christ will declare as to conduct and destiny at the general judgment of the last day. When krainō is not rendered by 'judge' in the NT, it always involves the kindred meaning of reaching a decision, or of action consequent upon a decision. In a number of instances it means to determine to pursue the course decided upon as best. St. Paul had determined (εσκεψασα) to call past Ephesus as best; he determined (εσκεψατο) not to know anything among the Corinthians save Jesus Christ and Him crucified (1 Co 2<sup>9</sup>); not to come to them in sorrow (2 Co 2<sup>13</sup>). The Jews denied Jesus before Pilate when he was determined (εσκεψατο) to let Him go (Ac 3<sup>15</sup>, see also 24<sup>1</sup> 25<sup>22</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>37</sup>). In Mt 5<sup>40</sup> krainō is rendered 'go to law' in RV, and other forms are rendered 'condemn' (Ac 13<sup>27</sup> called in question' (24<sup>1</sup>), 'ordained' (104), 'esteemeth' (Ro 14<sup>10</sup>).

1. Judging by men permitted and commended.—

The right to pass judgment upon both the actions of men and their characters as manifested in their conduct is implied in the power of rational and moral discrimination which all possess. Its exercise is also made imperative by the very nature of things. Men must form an opinion of the quality of deeds, but also of those who do them, if there is to be the prudent and wise action in our necessary relations to others, which shall be best for us and for them. St. Paul recognizes this power of moral judgment in even the heathen (Ro 2<sup>14-15</sup>). To this, truth and right conduct may confidently appeal (2 Co 4<sup>7</sup>). He commends those who exercise it upon all moral questions, and hold fast the good it approves, and abstain from the evil it condemns (1 Th 5<sup>21-22</sup>). It is to this moral judgment that all true teaching and preaching appeal. Our Lord assumes that all have the power to know the quality of outward deeds of men, and lays down the principle that the quality of the man corresponds with that of his deeds (Mt 7<sup>18-19</sup>), and, therefore, that we can form a right judgment of men, when the fruitage of their lives matures, however much they may seek to hide under false pretences. To this great principle of judging our Lord made frequent appeal in His controversies with the Pharisees. The Satanic conduct of these leaders proved them the children of the devil,—as having his nature (Jn 8<sup>44</sup>),—while His own works made it plain He was from God (Jn 5<sup>38</sup> 10<sup>25</sup> etc.). Even in Mt 7<sup>1-5</sup>, in connexion with our Lord's strongest condemnation of judging, it is implied (vv. 2-5) that men may judge others guilty of faults and help to cure them of the failings discovered, if they but be free enough from faults themselves to have the clearest discernment. He also censures the Jews (Lk 12<sup>27</sup>) because they do not judge what is right as to the Messianic time of His preaching, as they do the signs of the sky, and are therefore in danger of arraignment and condemnation at the highest tribunal.

2. The judging which is condemned.—(a) That prompted by a wrong spirit. Of this kind is that forbidden by our Lord in Mt 7<sup>1-4</sup>. It is prompted by a critical and censorious spirit. The man possessed by this disposition subjects others to searching scrutiny to find out faults. Where even the smallest defects are discovered, he becomes so absorbed in them that he is oblivious alike of his own greater faults and the greater virtues which may be associated with the minor faults of others. Those who are critical of others in order to find something to blame, instead of being critical of themselves in order to become fitted to help them, will but bring upon themselves from God as well as from men the condemnation they are so ready to mete out to others (see also Lk 6<sup>27</sup>).

(b) Judging according to false or inadequate principles or standards. In Jn 7<sup>24-26</sup>, cf. 8<sup>15</sup>, our Lord condemns judging upon superficial principles—more literal conformity to outward rules. Had the Jews seen the deeper intent of the Sabbath law, they would not have condemned Him for apparently breaking it by healing a man on that day. It was this superficial standard of judging—on literal and mere legal grounds rather than upon the deeper underlying principles—which constituted judging after the flesh rather than after the spirit. It is only the judging after the spirit that is righteous and to be commended (Jn 8<sup>15</sup>). It is for this reason that the natural (ψυχικός) man receiveth not the things of the Spirit, but he that is spiritual (πνευματικός) judgeth (ἀποκριθεὶς) all things (1 Co 2<sup>14</sup>). The one has in his nature only that to which the mere outward and superficial appeals—the other has in him that in which the deepest inner principles of life and action find a response. The latter, through this sensitive response of his nature to the deepest truths, can give strict judgment as to their character.

C. GOODSPEED.

JUDGMENT—The Synoptic Gospels differ from the Gospel of John in their view of a judgment. The former set forth a multitude of external tests which furnish ground for continuous judgment in this life. The 'deeds' or 'works' of a man are a measure of his attitude toward Jesus Christ. The Gospel of John is more especially concerned with the inner and hidden judgment which is being pronounced continually in man's soul. The sensuous and external aspects are little emphasized. All the Gospels hint unmistakably at a final crisis or judgment.

Mt. is pre-eminently the Gospel of judgment, for, throughout, Jesus appears as the Judge of men, and is always discriminating and separating the good from the bad, the sheep from the goats, the wheat from the tares, the grain from the chaff, the sincere man from the hypocrite (13<sup>41-42</sup>, 25<sup>33-35</sup>, 39, 44, 46-9). The predominance of this special aspect of Jesus' teaching, selected from among His varied utterances, in this Gospel, may arise from Matthew's Hebrew predisposition to consider Israel as a people separated from the Gentile world. Almost every utterance carries within it an unmistakable voice of judgment which separates men into two classes. The judgment which eventuates in blessedness, as in the Beatitudes (Mt 5<sup>1-10</sup>), or as 'Come, ye blessed of my Father' (25<sup>34</sup>), is as notable as that which leads to separation from Christ and to eternal wretchedness (25<sup>46</sup>).

1. Jesus is the Judge.—This is the view of all the Gospels. The Father gives all judgment to the Son (Jn 5<sup>22-27</sup>). Jesus came into the world for judgment (9<sup>30</sup>). He separates men under moral tests (Mt 23<sup>31-35</sup>, cf. 7<sup>21</sup>). He pronounces judgment on the Pharisees (23<sup>29-36</sup>). He judges Satan (16<sup>20</sup>). He imparts the authority for judgment to men (16<sup>19</sup>). (Cf. Ac 10<sup>42</sup>, Ro 14<sup>10</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>). His judgment-seat is at the same time the throne of His glory (Mt 25<sup>31</sup>), as it marks the culmination of the work which He has mediated in creation and in redemption. The judgment will be glorious, because then will be the final enthronement of holiness among men, and the deposition of evil. It is to be noted that He associates with Himself the twelve disciples (like the Roman assessors of judgment) who are to judge the twelve tribes of Israel (Mt 19<sup>28</sup>, Lk 22<sup>29</sup>; cf. 1 Co 6<sup>2-3</sup>). This exhibits the vital union of righteous souls with Christ, for the new life which His disciples obtain through Him would dispose them to pronounce judgment upon the same principles of justice as does their Lord. It is fitting that He who has mediated creation, maintenance, and redemption, should pronounce judgment upon man with regard to his attitude and responsibility toward each of these sovereign acts and relations. All judgment is determined by the attitude which men hold towards Christ. He is set forth as a perpetual challenge to men to live a right thinking and right acting life.

2. The Judgment.—Jesus in the Gospels presents an almost numberless series of tests by which men may judge themselves in this present age. Their 'works' or 'deeds' are reviewed (Mt 16<sup>27</sup>, 25<sup>31</sup>; cf. Ro 2<sup>13</sup>, Rev 20<sup>12</sup>). Every kindness to a disciple will be rewarded (Mk 9<sup>41</sup>, Mt 10<sup>42</sup>). Every cause of stumbling to one of these little ones (Lk 17<sup>2</sup>) will be punished. Jesus presents Himself as the supreme and personal test. What is man's attitude towards Him as proved by 'his deeds and works'? This kind of judgment is continuous and cumulative here, and comes to a conclusion at the final crisis or judgment. These are some of the tests:

Following Him (Mt 4<sup>18-22</sup>, 10<sup>98</sup>, Mk 5<sup>24</sup>); confessing Him (Mt 10<sup>32</sup>, Lk 12<sup>9</sup>); failure to appreciate His presence and work (Mt 11<sup>24</sup>); failure to come to Him (Jn 5<sup>40</sup>); failure to believe Him (Jn 8<sup>18</sup>); failure to obey Him (Jn 8<sup>50</sup>); failure to honour Him (Jn 8<sup>50</sup>); failure to stand with Him (Mt 12<sup>30</sup>); failure of right fruitage (Mt 23<sup>31-35</sup>, Lk 6<sup>43</sup>); failure in outward conduct (Mt 23<sup>1-15</sup>); failure to help men (Mt 23<sup>37-38</sup>); failure to repent (Jn 5<sup>40</sup>); failure to use the gifts of God (Mt 25<sup>14-30</sup>); making light of His personal invitations (Mt 22<sup>7</sup>); unwillingness to bear His words (Mt 12<sup>41-42</sup>); unwillingness to forgive an injury (Mt 6<sup>15</sup>, 18<sup>35-36</sup>); being ashamed of Him (Mk 8<sup>38</sup>); breaking a commandment (Mt 5<sup>19</sup>); the spirit of our judgment on others (Mt 7<sup>1</sup>); faith or lack of it (Mt 6<sup>29</sup>, 23<sup>16-23</sup>, Mk 5<sup>34</sup>); heart unresponsive to His words (Mt 10<sup>14-15</sup>); hypocrisy (Mt 23<sup>13-36</sup>); idle words (Mt 12<sup>34</sup>); lip service without the heart (Mt 15<sup>7</sup>); selfish conceit (Mt 23<sup>12</sup>); wicked pride (Mk 10<sup>33</sup>); love of darkness (Jn 8<sup>12</sup>); rejection of His disciples (Lk 10<sup>10</sup>); adultery (Mt 19<sup>9</sup>); commercialism in worship (Mt 23<sup>23</sup>); blasphemy against the Spirit (Mt 12<sup>31-32</sup>); loving others more than God (Mt 10<sup>37</sup>); hearing, seeing the Son, with belief or with failure to believe (Mt 7<sup>28-29</sup>, Jn 5<sup>40</sup>); the cup of cold water given to a disciple (Mt 10<sup>42</sup>); mercifulness (Lk 6<sup>36</sup>); love to Christ (Lk 7<sup>47</sup>, Jn 21<sup>15</sup>); love to enemies (Lk 6<sup>27</sup>); humble-mindedness as a child (Mt 18<sup>17</sup>); fidelity of service (Mt 20<sup>15</sup>, 24<sup>45-51</sup>); endurance in well-doing (24<sup>13</sup>); doing will of God (12<sup>50</sup>); deeds in general (16<sup>27</sup>); inward thoughts and motives (Mk 7<sup>21</sup>, Lk 8<sup>21-22</sup>).

These are clear, varied, and concrete tests which men may apply daily to conduct and character, and which bring them into continual judgment. They cover almost every phase of human life, both inward and outward. The great first and second commandments in the law which our Lord enunciated to the lawyer (Mt 22<sup>37-39</sup>) are in the nature of a judgment, for men know whether or not they have been kept. Judgments are continuous in the sphere of moral life, as conscience persistently affirms. They are continuous in the religious life, and the principles upon which they are based are found in these teachings and in the character of Jesus. No man can plead ignorance of the grounds on which judgment is pronounced on him, because these varied tests cover clearly and openly so much of his life. Jesus always holds Himself forth ('I am the way and the truth and the life,' Jn 14<sup>6</sup>) as the supreme standard of life; and the invitation to come to Him leads to a comparison and judgment of likeness or unlikeness. The work of the Holy Spirit (whom Jesus sends, Jn 16<sup>7</sup>) is to convict men of sin, righteousness, and judgment (v. 8), and He accomplishes this by showing men their unlikeness to Christ. The character of Jesus is thus continually a challenge to men, and the measure of the judgment which they must pass on themselves. In all the Gospels, judgment is determined by the relation which a man holds to Jesus Christ. But the Gospels also teach that this continuous judgment will culminate in a crisis or Final Judgment. The inadequacy and inequalities of punishment here seem to demand a final adjusting of the accounts of all men on principles of eternal equity. The parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19-28</sup>) exhibits this final accounting and the equitable readjustment of their respective conditions. Lazarus had wretchedness. Dives had luxury. The continuous judgment in this life did not result in the proper rewards and penalties, hence the balances are struck after death. Final judgment and penalty are then reached.

3. The time of this Final Judgment is set forth in the Synoptics as at 'the end of the world' (Mt 13<sup>35</sup>). Some have held that this means at the end of each man's life, but the more obvious meaning is the end of this time-order of race, life, and things (cf. He 9<sup>26</sup>). The words 'the time' (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>), and 'then' (16<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>3</sup>), point to a time which follows the Lord's appearing in glory with His angels after the resurrection from the dead. 'That day and hour' (24<sup>36</sup>), 'the resurrection of life' and 'the resurrection of judgment' (Jn 5<sup>29</sup>), are the antithetical statements of what takes place after the resurrection, which to one class of men is entrance into life, and to the other entrance into judgment followed by spiritual death. The Gospels do not give information as to whether or not the Final Judgment follows immediately on the general resurrection. The weight of impression is that judgment does follow immediately, but it would be by no means an entire misinterpretation of the sayings of Jesus if one held that there was a considerable period of intervening time.

4. All mankind and all evil spirits are to be judged. 'All nations' (Mt 25<sup>32</sup>) and all men (12<sup>36</sup>, Jn 5<sup>29</sup>) shall be judged (cf. Ro 14<sup>10</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, Rev. 20<sup>12-13</sup>). It is implied in Mt 8<sup>23</sup> that evil spirits also are to stand in the judgment. But it is clear that the holy angels do not come into judgment, for they accompany and serve the holy Judge (Mt 16<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>31</sup>). Judgment would not be necessary for men if it were not for their sin. Wherever there has been need of a redemption, there will be need of a Final Judgment.

5. Some characteristics.—Jesus Christ the Judge in His glory (Mt 16<sup>27</sup> 19<sup>28</sup>, Mk 8<sup>38</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup>) [the glory of Jesus will be as manifest in His judgments as in His forgiveness]; 'the throne of his glory' (Mt 25<sup>31</sup>); the surrounding holy angels as His servants (cf. Mt 13<sup>41</sup>); mankind gathered before Him; evil spirits awaiting their final doom; the sharp separations; the openness of the facts upon which judgment proceeds; the uncovered moral life of every man; the irrevocableness of the decision (Mt 25<sup>34</sup>),—all these, together with the manifold diverse feelings of the righteous and the wicked, present a scene of surpassing grandeur, extent, and interest. Judgment stands in the Gospels as the natural terminus of an aeon in the life of the race which began with Creation, was continued under a purpose and revelation of Redemption, and demands a Judgment as its proper culmination. NATHAN E. WOOD.

JUST and 'righteous' in AV represent the same word, δικαιοσ, which, however, has usually the wider meaning of 'righteous, observing Divine and human laws, one who is such as he ought to be, prop. the Heb. צדק (Grimm-Thayer), and comprehends duty both to God and to man. The Vulg. had no word available except justus, which strictly means 'what is according to jus, the rights of man,' hence 'just' in many places in AV. In the Gospels it is used of Joseph (Mt 1<sup>19</sup>), Simeon (Lk 2<sup>28</sup>), John the Baptist (Mk 6<sup>30</sup>), Joseph of Arimathea (Lk 23<sup>50</sup>), and Christ (Mt 27<sup>18-24</sup>). In Ac 3<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>52</sup> 22<sup>14</sup> (cf. 1 P 3<sup>18</sup>, and possibly Ja 5<sup>8</sup>) 'the Just One' is a Messianic name corresponding to the prophecies of the Righteous Servant of Jehovah (Is 53<sup>11</sup>; cf. 11<sup>4</sup>, Jer 23<sup>5</sup>); its use 'affords in itself a marvellous proof of the impression made by the human life of Jesus upon those who knew Him best, or who, at all events, like St. Stephen, had ample opportunities of learning' (Expos. Gr. Test.). In nearly every case RV uniformly gives 'righteous,' exceptions being Mt 5<sup>45</sup> ('rain on the just and the unjust'), Lk 1<sup>17</sup> ('wisdom of the just') 14<sup>14</sup> ('resurrection of the just'). In Lk 25<sup>46</sup> 'just' might perhaps have been retained with advantage to bring out the difference in the same verse between δικαιοσ and εὐλαβή, which latter means 'reverencing God, devout' ('δικαιοσ, justus, in officii; εὐλαβή, Vulg. timoratus, in habitu animae erga Deum'—Bengel). For full discussion of δικαιοσ see art. RIGHTEOUS.

W. H. DUNDAS.

JUSTICE.—

In the AV of NT the word 'justice' does not occur, δικαιοσύνη being always translated 'righteousness.' For the adj. δικαιοσ we have 'just' and 'righteous' used interchangeably. God is just (1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>, Rev 15<sup>3</sup>), righteous (Jn 17<sup>25</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>8</sup>); Christ is the Just One (Ac 3<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>52</sup>), and righteous (1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup>). Men, both as individuals and collectively, are just or righteous (Mt 1<sup>19</sup> 6<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>41</sup> 13<sup>12</sup>, Ac 1<sup>19</sup> 24<sup>16</sup>). In Jn 8<sup>16</sup> we have just, and in Rev 16<sup>7</sup> righteous judgment. In Col 4<sup>1</sup> εὐδικαιοσ refers to what is due by masters to their slaves; and in Mt 20<sup>4</sup> to a money payment for work done. This haphazard rendering of δικαιοσ is partially rectified in the RV. In classical Greek the noun and the adj. are sometimes used in the wider sense of moral rectitude in general; but under the influence of the Platonic and Aristotelian philosophy its later usage inclines to the narrower sense of political and social justice. Aristotle (Nic. Eth. v. 1. 15) qualifies the general idea by making it refer to what is due to one's neighbour; and Plato (Republic, Bks. 1, 11, 12) deals with δικαιοσύνη at great length but almost exclusively in the sense of political and individual justice, though he does attempt to give a wider scope by connecting it with that of the Absolute Good. In Biblical Greek, both in the LXX and the NT, the wider meaning is restored, and is the common one. In Lk 1<sup>7</sup> Zacharias and Elizabeth are said to be δικαιοσ; and this is explained, if not defined, by the words πεποιησεν ἡ σκευὴ τῆς ἰσχυρίας καὶ δικαιοσύνης τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ. This is the general idea of righteousness; but our word 'justice' must be taken as signifying the recognition and fulfilment of what is due from one to another, righteous dealing between persons, each rendering to others what is their right and due. See also art. RIGHTEOUS.

1. The justice of God.—The justice of God is an aspect of His righteousness, and belongs, therefore, to His essential nature. It may be shown to have significance for the Divine life, even apart from His relation to others. God's attributes are not all of co-ordinate worth. His omnipotence, e.g., is subordinate to His ethical attributes; it does not use them as a means to accomplish its ends, but they use it. Omnipotence is not a power to do what it wills, but to do what God wills; and as His will is holy, it can be only ethically determined. If in God's nature mere power were supreme, and holiness and love subordinate, this would be as contrary to justice as when, in a kingdom, the rule of right has been overturned by irresponsible violence. As in the State, justice is the controlling principle which preserves the body politic for the discharge of its several functions, so, in the Divine justice, we have the regulative principle of order in the Divine nature and life.

(1) God's justice in His relations with men.—He shows favour to the righteous. He could not withhold His approval of that in them which is the object of complacency and delight in Himself. This does not mean that they have a claim on God for a happy earthly lot, and exemption from was the prevalent one during the early and non-reflective stage of Israel's religious progress; but it did not bear the strain put on it by the national calamities. In the teaching of Christ it is repudiated: Mt 5<sup>45</sup> 13<sup>33-35</sup>, Lk 16<sup>13</sup> 13<sup>34</sup>, Jn 6<sup>45</sup>; and in Ro 8<sup>13-17</sup> and He 12<sup>11</sup> an explanation of the sufferings of the righteous is given which goes far to remove their seeming variance with the justice of God. They are part of His fatherly discipline by which His children are prepared for their heavenly inheritance (2 Co 4<sup>16-17</sup>, He 5<sup>8</sup>). Even here they have their great reward in the favour and friendship of God (Mt 5<sup>12-13</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>12</sup>, 3<sup>12-14</sup>).

(2) God's justice in relation to sin.—God is just, and will therefore punish sin. This is one of the Christian certainties (Gal 6<sup>7</sup>). Different views, however, have been held as to the nature of the punishment and its object. Some think (and this is Ritschl's opinion) that the true punishment of sin consists in the sense of guilt and alienation from God which a persuasion of the Divine displeasure awakens; and that the outward evils which are regarded as punishments are really due to natural causes that have no relation to human guilt (Ritschl, Justification and Reconciliation, 47 ff., 257 ff.). Now, the sense of God's displeasure must always be a most important part of punishment, and might almost stand for the whole of it, if we could suppose the sinner as responsive to it as he ought to be, e.g., a saint made perfect in holiness would be. To such a saint the sense of alienation from God would be harder to bear than the most untoward outward calamity. But sin increasingly blunts the sinner's susceptibility to suffering from this source; and if no effective provision has been made to bring God's displeasure home to him, he would at last work out his term of punishment. There may be no link of causation between our sin and most of the outward evils of life. Maeterlinck may be right in saying that nature knows nothing of justice; but in that case we should have to believe with him that neither can nature be regarded as the creation of a Being in whom ethical attributes are supreme (Maeterlinck, Buried Temple, Essay on the 'Mystery of Justice').

God's justice in relation to sin is at once retributive, educative, and protective. It is retributive because it punishes sin simply as sin; it is educative or reformatory because the punishment is also intended for the moral improvement of the transgressor; it is protective because by the punishment others are restrained from wrong-doing, and are themselves guarded against the evils which would result from the prevalence of unpunished sin. That the Scripture view of God's justice implies retribution may be shown from many passages: Mt 16<sup>27</sup> 24, 25, Lk 12<sup>48-49</sup>, Ro 2<sup>6-12</sup> 6<sup>23</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, Col 3<sup>2</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>9</sup>, He 2<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>27</sup>. One could scarcely gather from these passages that God's sole aim in punishment is the reformation of the offender. Yet this is the popular view with many modern theologians. As a protest against the once prevalent opinion that God, in punishing, desires merely to exact vengeance without any regard to the sinner's repentance, it has its justification. But, like other reactionary views, it carries us too far in the opposite direction. The whole drift of Biblical teaching is that God punishes sinners because they deserve it. Punishment is the reaction of His holy nature against wrong-doing, and without it the moral order of the world could not be maintained. If sin did not arouse His displeasure, He would not be holy; and if He did not manifest His displeasure objectively by punishment, men could not know that He is holy. But it is said that God is love, and that what love inflicts is chastisement, not punishment in the retributive sense. Holy love, however, cannot accomplish its end unless the sinner is brought to feel that he deserves punishment. How could punishment benefit him if, while undergoing it, he believed that it had not been merited? Retribution does tend to the offender's improvement, and this is part of God's purpose in it; but its reformatory influence never takes effect until the sinner acknowledges its justice. His improvement begins only when he is brought into this state of mind and feeling. If, indeed, God's sole aim were reformation, it would follow that, if rewards carried with them the same benefits as punishments, as in many cases they do, then the offender would deserve them, and this because of his sin. In like manner it would be very difficult to persuade people that it is right that they should be protected from the spread of violence by the punishment of those to whom punishment was not justly due.

God's justice is also shown in the forgiveness of sins on condition of repentance. Repentance is a sign that the disciplinary purpose which accompanies retribution has not missed its mark; and if now God withheld forgiveness, it would imply a failure of justice. According to 1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>, 'God is faithful and just (dikaios) to forgive.' Forgiveness and punishment are alike connected with the justice of God. The justice of forgiveness further appears from this, that the man who repents is a different moral person from the man who had sinned. His relation to his sin has been reversed; for whereas formerly his will was identified with sin, it is now identified with the mind and will of God regarding it. In proportion to the depth and sincerity of his repentance, we feel that he is a changed man, and should no longer be treated as if sin still formed part of the texture of his being. He has separated from, and now unsparingly condemns, his past sinful self; and, having thus come over to the side of righteousness, he is no longer a fit object of the Divine displeasure. Theologians, who first make logical distinctions between the Divine attributes and then reason from these as if they were real distinctions, say that justice cannot, but love alone can, forgive; as if love and justice were two contending powers in God's nature. In reality, it is holy love that forgives; and this means that love and justice are joined hand in hand in forgiveness as they are in punishment. From a non-moral love gifts would come, but they might not be blessings; and justice without love never could be perfectly just, for love is part of the tribute which justice demands. The OT and NT writers never attempt to reconcile love and justice, because they were not conscious of any contrary between them (see Mt 6<sup>12-14</sup> 12<sup>21</sup>, 22 13<sup>12-17</sup>, 21-23, Lk 6<sup>27</sup> 7<sup>37-38</sup> 13<sup>3</sup>, 15<sup>11-32</sup> 17<sup>4</sup> 18<sup>10-14</sup> 22<sup>21</sup>, 22; cf. Jn 21<sup>15-17</sup>, Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 3<sup>19</sup> 5<sup>21</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>9</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>). Of course, imperfection clings to all human repentance, because past sin disqualifies even the sincerest penitent for that godly sorrow for sin 'which worketh repentance not to be repented of' (2 Co 7<sup>10</sup>). Hence the need for the work of Christ and the regenerating influence of the Spirit, by which imperfect repentance is atoned for and made perfect.

2. Justice in man.—If man has been created in the image of God, we should expect to find reflected in him the same supremacy of the ethical attributes as exists in God. Thus for him also justice or righteousness will be the supreme law of his being, obligatory, not through any human convention, but in virtue of man's Godlikeness. As supreme, it will be regulative of his whole life, determining his use of his freedom, the outflow of his emotions and thoughts, his activity in all human relations. Justice will regulate his life Godward, for God has definite claims on man for devotion and service; and as in Christ He has made Himself known as a Father and Saviour, these claims are, for the Christian, raised to a higher sphere of obligation. These are duties which man owes to God, and, when they are withheld, justice is violated. God is robbed when that which is His due is not rendered (Mal 3<sup>6</sup>). Hence the just or righteous (dikaios) man is represented as walking 'in all the commandments of the Lord blameless' (Lk 1<sup>1</sup>), and of these the first and greatest is, 'Thou shalt love the Lord with all thy heart' (Mt 22<sup>37</sup>). Not until we give God this whole-hearted love do we give Him His due. We are then 'just before God'; and from 1 Jn 3<sup>17</sup> 4<sup>20</sup>, 21 5<sup>1</sup> we learn that only when man responds to God's claim can he fulfil the obligations of love and justice to his fellow-men. That man can be just or unjust in relation to God appears also from passages in which sin is spoken of as a state of indebtedness—God being the creditor and man the debtor (Mt 5<sup>20</sup> 6<sup>12</sup> 18<sup>23-25</sup>, Lk 7<sup>41-43</sup>); and from those parables in which God and man are related as Master and servant, or King and subject (Mt 20<sup>1-16</sup> 21<sup>28-32</sup>, Mk 12<sup>1-12</sup>).

One characteristic of the NT doctrine of justice, as compared with the views current in the Jewish and classical worlds, is a noteworthy enlargement of its sphere. Justice to man as man was a subject of speculation among the Stoics, but in the popular morality its obligation was ignored and even repudiated. The Jew hated the Samaritan (Lk 9<sup>54</sup>) and despised the Gentile, with whom he would not share his privileges (Ac 21<sup>27-28</sup>). Why should they show favour to those whom God had not honoured? The Greek was bound by moral ties to his fellow-citizens, but between him and the barbarians there was no moral reciprocity; if he was conscious of any obligation, it was an obligation to do them all the injury he could. Then again there was the slave class, who were regarded as incapable of virtue, and, therefore, like the lower animals, outside the ethical sphere. Thus Jew and Gentile alike acknowledged no moral relationship between themselves and the vast majority of the race. It was, therefore, a great step in advance when Christ proclaimed a universal Kingdom of justice and love, and taught that, since God was the Father of all, they were due to all men, on the ground not of citizenship or nationality, but of humanity and of their common relationship to God (Mt 5<sup>44-48</sup> 23<sup>34</sup>, Lk 10<sup>29-37</sup>, Jn 3<sup>18</sup> 12<sup>32</sup>).

There was also a subjective enlargement of its sphere. Under the influence of Pharisaic teaching and example, the moral law had come to be regarded as merely an external rule of conduct; the inner world of thought and motive and feeling being overlooked or regarded as of only secondary importance. All the virtues had thus suffered deterioration, and justice among them. But in the Sermon on the Mount, Christ claimed this neglected sphere for the moral law. Its authority was extended so as to cover the entire life of men, for in the spiritual realm of being, thoughts and feelings are accounted as deeds, as acts of the moral self. And this was an infinite extension of the sway of justice. 'Out of the heart proceed adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts' (Mk 7<sup>21</sup>). Sin is not confined to outward acts; it begins the moment evil thoughts and desires arise in the heart; and a régime of justice is necessary there. To be angry with our brother without cause is to do him wrong (Mt 5<sup>21</sup>); and the man is accounted guilty who, while refraining from actual murder, yet thinks in his heart, 'I would, if I dared.' Our neighbour has a claim on us, that we should think and feel justly regarding him; and when this is withheld, we fail to give him his due. Again, the sin of adultery may be begun and completed by simply looking on a woman to lust after her (Mt 5<sup>27</sup>). Before the tribunal of the Kingdom, the man is adjudged to have wronged the woman. The Christian law of justice is embodied in the Golden Rule, 'All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them' (Mt 7<sup>12</sup>); and also in the second of the great commandments, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Mk 12<sup>31</sup>). According to the Golden Rule, we are to regard our fellow-man as an alter ego, to put ourselves in his place, and judge his claims or needs and our duties from his point of view (Ph 2<sup>3-8</sup>). Then the commandment tells us positively what our obligation is. 'Thou shalt love him as thyself,' not with a non-moral love, which seeks nothing higher than the happiness of its objects. We are to care for him with that holy love which attaches itself to that in him which in ourselves is the legitimate object of our self-love,—the moral self or soul which was created in, and can be restored to, the image of God. It is for His moral perfections that we love God; and the claims of Christian justice are met, only when our love for others has as its aim their restoration to Godlikeness (Mt 16<sup>26</sup>, Ja 5<sup>20</sup>, He 13<sup>17</sup>). The Christian law requires us not merely to refrain from doing our neighbour wrong, but to promote, even at the cost of self-sacrifice, his highest well-being as we would our own. For a Christian man to say, 'I have done my neighbour justice, and he has no claim on me for more,' is to prove false to the Christian ideal; for, in the Kingdom of righteousness, benevolence is not something that may be withheld, but is simply justice made perfect.

I. BIBLICAL DOCTRINE.—1. The OT and Pharisaic doctrines.—The doctrine of justification through faith in Christ owes its origin to St. Paul, and is the outcome of two factors, his Jewish training on the one hand, and his Christian experience on the other. The idea of justification itself was derived by the Apostle from the Rabbinic theology, whose doctrine of justification by the works of the Law is at once the antithesis and the necessary background of his own. The Rabbinic doctrine again developed the idea of righteousness before God in the prophets, who from the first judge Israel by the standard of the absolutely righteous demands of Jahweh. In the time of Jeremiah and Ezekiel the idea is brought into connexion with the individual (Jer 20<sup>12</sup>, Hab 1<sup>13</sup> 2<sup>2</sup>, Ezk 38<sup>21</sup> 39<sup>26</sup> 33<sup>12</sup>). Further, this age being also that of the development of the Law, whose authors aimed at embodying the demands of Jahweh in a practical form, we find the idea connected with the fulfilment either of the Law as a whole (Dt 6<sup>25</sup>), or of a single commandment contained in it (24<sup>13</sup>). Finally, in the post-exilic period the idea receives a great development. God is characterized as the righteous Judge (Ps 67<sup>2</sup> 50<sup>6</sup> 64<sup>2</sup> 96<sup>10</sup> 13<sup>2</sup> etc.), whose righteousness results in the punishment of sinners (1<sup>6</sup> 9<sup>11</sup> 11<sup>5</sup> etc.). The actual positive recognition of the righteousness of the righteous is said in Ps 62<sup>12</sup> to depend on the Divine grace; the latter term, however, is practically synonymous with righteousness in its beneficent aspect (33<sup>7</sup> 36<sup>7</sup> 48<sup>10</sup> 145<sup>7</sup>). Sinners God can justify so far as they are at bottom righteous (Job 33<sup>26</sup>). But the godless He may not justify (Ps 69<sup>27</sup>). The general idea is, further, that the recognition of righteousness by God is manifested by outward good fortune; just as His displeasure is shown by outward calamity (Is 63<sup>12-14</sup>, Mal 4<sup>2-3</sup>, Ps 37<sup>23-26</sup> etc.; cf. Wellhausen, JG p. 220, n. 1). In the later post-exilic literature, however, the idea that the righteous is always rewarded and the wicked always punished in this life, is abandoned, and there appears the conception that the final justification or condemnation takes place after death (Job 19<sup>22-26</sup>, Dn 12<sup>2-3</sup>). This conception is henceforth predominant, as in the Pharisaic theology, to which we now turn.

The Pharisaic conception of the relation of man to God was purely legal, and based upon the idea of the Law as a contract between God and man. The idea of grace which qualifies the legalism of the OT sinks altogether into the background. The Pharisaic doctrine implies that the Divine demands expressed in the Law can be satisfied, and that the fulfilment of them gives a claim to reward. It is the recognition of this claim that is now meant by 'justification.' The conception is further carried out into detail in that the Law is regarded atomically as the sum of the commandments it contains (cf. however, Dt 6<sup>2</sup>). Every act of obedience is entered by God in the heavenly books, as is also every act of transgression. The decision is according to the preponderance. If this is on the side of the good, the Divine sentence of justification follows, which consists in the declaration that the man is righteous. The account is finally made up at death (Weber, Jud. Theol. 1897, p. 277 ff.).

It will be apparent that the whole idea, both in the OT and still more distinctly in the Pharisaic theology, is forensic. With this, again, agrees the derivation of the group of technical terms used in the OT in connexion with the idea of justification (קָדַשׁ, קָדַשׁ 'righteousness,' צַדִּיק 'righteous,' צַדִּיק 'justify'). This group has almost universally a forensic sense. The words are so used secularly, and are therefore naturally applied with this meaning in religion (Smend, Allgem. Religionsgeschichte, 1892, p. 388 ff.). In the LXX the equivalents are δικαιοσύνη, δικαίος, δίκαιος. On the constant forensic use of δίκαιος in the LXX (OT and Apoc.), also in the pseudepigraphic books, see Sanday-Headlam, 'Romans' in Internat. Crit. Com. p. 31. In Talmudic theology קָדַשׁ is replaced by נָכוֹן 'innocence,' and קָדַשׁ by נָכוֹן; נָכוֹן also appears for צַדִּיק, but the latter is maintained in use along with it (Weber, p. 277 f.).

It is finally to be observed that, both in the OT and in the Rabbinic theology, righteousness before God and justification, whether looked for from the Divine grace or on the ground of human merit, are religious ideas. Righteousness is not sought for its own sake, as a moralist might seek it, but always as the condition of acceptance with God, and the blessings which flow from this, in this world or the next. It is at this point that the Pauline conception of justification by faith links itself on to the older theologies. What St. Paul has in view is always the question of acceptance with God, and his doctrine is the answer of his Christian experience to a problem set in the terms of the Pharisaic theology.

2. The Pauline doctrine.—There is no doubt that St. Paul's idea of justification is essentially the same as the Pharisaic, and, like it, forensic. In the fundamental passage Ro 3<sup>28</sup> the whole setting is forensic. Note the words ἐν τῷ νόμῳ φεραῖ, ἐν δίκαιῳ (v. 1); ἐξ ἔργων αἰσῶν (v. 2). Mankind is arraigned before the judgment-bar of God, and the justification which follows must be forensic. So in Ro 4<sup>5</sup> justification is connected with imputation, a distinctly legal conception: λογίζεσθαι = 'is reckoned,' i.e. in the heavenly account-books. See, further, Sanday-Headlam, l.c. p. 30, who decide on general philological grounds that δίκαιος means to pronounce righteous: 'It has relation to a verdict pronounced by a judge. . . It cannot mean to make righteous.' So far, then, St. Paul is in agreement with the Pharisees. But the deeper insight of his conscience will not allow him to suppose that God can be satisfied with a mere preponderance of performance over transgression. For him to attain righteousness by the works of the Law would involve the complete fulfilment of it. But this is impossible; for all are sinners (Ro 3<sup>23</sup>). Hence St. Paul concludes that 'by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified in God's sight' (3<sup>20</sup>).

Here is the point where St. Paul introduces his doctrine, based on his own personal experience, of a new method of justification (3<sup>20-22</sup>), of which the principle on God's side is grace (χάρις), i.e. the free unmerited love of God (3<sup>24</sup>), and on man's side faith (1<sup>17-18</sup>). As proceeding from the Divine grace, justification by faith is totally opposed to justification by works, which depends on merit (4<sup>4</sup>). Instead of attaining a righteousness by his own efforts, the believer submissively receives a righteousness which is wholly of God, and His gift (5<sup>17-18</sup> Ph 3<sup>9</sup>). This casts light upon the Pauline conception of faith. It is the method by which the grace of God is subjectively appropriated. In so far as the believer, instead of acting on his own initiative, allows himself to be determined by God (Ro 10<sup>16</sup>), faith is a species of obedience; thus St. Paul speaks of the obedience of faith (1<sup>3</sup>). But as correlative to grace, or the free love of God, faith is psychologically trust, a believing 'on God' (4<sup>24</sup>).

The revelation of the Divine grace which awakens faith takes place, according to St. Paul, in the Person of Christ (2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>) and in His work, more especially in His death, but also in His resurrection. Christ's death was the work of the Divine grace in that God ordained it as an expiatory sacrifice for sin, Christ dying instead of sinners, that in the act of justification He might not appear indulgent of sin (Ro 3<sup>25</sup>; cf. 2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>, Ro 5<sup>7</sup>). Christ's resurrection is also included in the revelation by which God's grace to sinners is made known (Ro 4<sup>25</sup> 8<sup>34</sup> 10<sup>9</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>17</sup>), but St. Paul does not define its exact place in it. In fact, Christ's resurrection, as the object of faith, is hardly separable from the Risen Christ. It is God's act by which He presents Christ alive, in spite of His death (Ro 4<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>9</sup>), as the object of faith.

It is to be observed, finally, that justification requires for its complete explanation both sides of the correlation, grace and faith, which in St. Paul's mind are associated in the closest possible manner. Thus he speaks of the revelation of the righteousness of God through faith (1<sup>17</sup> 3<sup>21</sup>); the whole is really one idea. Only thus can we explain the remarkable interchange of language which the Apostle uses with respect to the two sides of the correlation. Justification is generally associated more closely with faith, or the subjective side (3<sup>28</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>). But in 2 Co 5<sup>21</sup> St. Paul says that God was in Christ, not imputing to men their trespasses, which last phrase is synonymous with 'justifying men'; so that here justification is associated with the objective side, or the revelation of grace (cf. Ro 3<sup>24</sup>). So also in Ro 5<sup>1</sup>, if δικαιοσύνη be rightly translated 'sentence of justification' (so Sanday-Headlam, l.c. p. 141), then St. Paul here represents this sentence as falling once for all at the death of Christ. On the other hand, the sacrifice of Jesus Christ belongs to the objective side of the correlation; yet St. Paul speaks of Christ in Ro 3<sup>26</sup> as propitiatory through faith in His blood. Evidently, then, grace and faith are so organically related that the one implies the other, and is properly understood only through its correlative.

We must now return to the form in which St.

Paul has expressed his doctrine of justification. It is, as we have seen, determined by his Pharisaic training, and is that of a forensic judgment. But the form is all that the Apostle has in common with the Pharisaic idea. The judgment of justification in his conception is extra-judicial, i.e. God has regard in it to considerations outside the Law. The righteousness of faith is 'apart from law' (χωρίς νόμου, Ro 3<sup>21</sup>). The Law as such takes account only of merit, as St. Paul himself testifies: 'He that doeth them shall live in them' (Gal 3<sup>12</sup>). But the Divine sentence of justification takes account of faith, which is a consideration beyond the purview of the Law: 'The law is not of faith' (ib.). In fact in justification the Law is transcended by grace, which reckons faith for righteousness (Ro 4<sup>4-5</sup>). St. Paul does not mean that faith is a work, and that grace simply reckons the work of faith instead of the works of the Law. This would be, after all, half legalism. With the Apostle, as we have seen, faith is not a work, but a receiving; not a second principle of justification over against grace, but simply the reflex of Divine grace in man. Grace therefore sees in faith simply this reflex of itself, and in justifying the sinner by faith in reality justifies on the ground of itself (cf. Is 43<sup>29</sup>).

What, then, is the essential point in the Pauline presentation of justification as forensic? It is, to use philosophic language, that justification is a synthetic, not an analytic judgment. It is not based on anything in the believer—not even on his faith, which comes into view only so far as the Divine grace is reflected in it. In justification God 'justifies the ungodly' (Ro 4<sup>5</sup>): the words are evidently chosen by St. Paul with a clear sense of the paradox involved, as the deliberate opposition of language to the OT shows (cf. Ex 23<sup>7</sup>, Dt 25<sup>1</sup>, Pr 17<sup>15</sup>, Is 5<sup>23</sup>). God does not, in justification, recognize the presence of any attribute in the sinner; on the contrary, He adds to him an attribute while he is still a sinner, viz. that of righteousness. It is evident that the paradoxical character of this doctrine created misunderstanding even in St. Paul's time (Ro 3<sup>8</sup>, cf. 6<sup>1</sup>); and it has done so ever since. The paradox, however, resolves itself at once as soon as we remember that it is 'righteousness,' not in the ethical, but in the religious sense, as the condition of acceptance with God, which is meant. The OT taught that righteousness was the condition of acceptance with God; the Pharisees sharpened this into the doctrine that the performance of the Law was the condition. St. Paul's language is determined by this form in which he found the problem of acceptance with God stated; his meaning simply is that God accepts the sinner on the ground of His mere grace, apart from all question of merit. It is consequently only another, though less difficult, expression for the same act of the Divine judgment when St. Paul speaks of adoption (υιοθεσια, Gal 4<sup>4</sup>), or the reception of the sinner into the position of a child of God (Holtzmann, Newtest. Theol. ii. p. 134). Adoption is also formally a judicial act, and really a synthetic act of the Divine judgment. The possible objection to this identification of justification and adoption, viz. that justification is the act of God as Judge, but adoption His act as Father, falls to the ground as soon as it is remembered that justification is really an extra-judicial judgment, proceeding from the Divine grace (Ritschl, Justification and Reconciliation<sup>2</sup>, iii., Eng. tr. p. 86 ff.).

Finally, we get still further light on St. Paul's meaning as to justification from the fact that in Ro 4<sup>7</sup> he introduces, as synonymous with the imputation of righteousness or justification, the OT idea of the forgiveness of sins (cf. also Eph 1<sup>7</sup>), which links his teaching on at once to that of Christ Himself; and it appears that the Pauline conceptions of justification and adoption are simply the equivalent of the Fatherly forgiveness taught by Jesus (Kaftan, Dogmatik<sup>2</sup>, p. 523). The idea that forgiveness is something merely negative, while justification conveys a positive status, turns on an inadequate conception of the Biblical idea of forgiveness.

So far we have considered justification as a Divine operation; it now remains to consider its practical issues, when it takes effect in the admission of the sinner to fellowship with God. Faith now comes into view, not simply as the reflexion of grace, but in his psychological nature as trust, including the submission of the will to God; and the practical effects of justification appear as the unfolding of this trust in its various aspects. The first of these is the sense of present peace with God (Ro 5<sup>1</sup>), or the consciousness of acceptance with Him. Here appears a strong contrast with the Pharisaic theology, which, teaching not the justification of the sinner, but only of him who has kept the precepts, defers justification till the hour of death, and consequently demands in the present a condition of anxious fear lest in the end justification should not be attained (Weber, L.c. pp. 284, 334 ff.; cf. Ro 8<sup>13</sup>). Along with present peace goes patience in all present suffering (Ro 4<sup>18</sup>), in the belief that it is Divinely ordered for the best ends (8<sup>28</sup>), while there is at the same time a consciousness of the Divine love (5<sup>8-9</sup>). Here appears a contrast to the OT point of view, from which temporal sufferings appeared as signs of the Divine displeasure. This contrast is strikingly brought out by comparing St. Paul's triumphant use of the quotation in Ro 8<sup>36</sup> with its original despondent meaning in Ps 44<sup>22</sup>. While St. Paul finds it impossible that persecution should separate the believer from the love of God, the Psalmist sees in it a proof that God has cast off His people (cf. Ps 44<sup>9</sup>). Finally, there is no fear of final punishment (Ro 5<sup>9</sup>), but rather a joyful hope, nay certainty, of ultimate salvation (5<sup>9-10</sup>, 8<sup>38-39</sup>). The sum of all these things, in fact the whole consequence of justification, St. Paul expresses by saying that, for the believer, 'There is now no condemnation' (8<sup>1</sup>), or that he is not under law, but under grace (6<sup>15</sup>). From this point of view the work of Christ appears as a redemption from the curse of the Law. Christ, in His death, bore its curse, and its power is therefore at an end (Gal 3<sup>13</sup>). St. Paul refers in this passage to the Jewish Law, as the antithesis with v. 14 shows: 'Christ redeemed us [Jews] from the curse of the law . . . that upon the Gentiles might come the blessing of Abraham in Christ Jesus.' But his idea of freedom from the Law is not to be limited to freedom from the Jewish Law. Though, historically, this special case was of the greatest importance, St. Paul means that the Christian religion is a religion not of law, but of grace. He also expresses the same idea in terms of the parallel conception of adoption, by saying that the believer has received, in place of the spirit of bondage, leading to fear, the spirit of adoption, 'whereby we cry, Abba, Father' (Ro 8<sup>15</sup>).

The doctrine of the Epistle of James on justification, whether the author has the Pauline doctrine or abuses of it in view or not (on the critical question connected with the Epistle see Moffatt, Historical NT, p. 578, for a good statement of the alternatives; also Sanday-Headlam, 'Romans,' p. 104; and W. Patrick, James the Lord's Brother), raises an important problem in connexion with it. It is to be noted, first, that the idea of faith in the Epistle is quite different from St. Paul's. When the author teaches that justification is not by faith only, but by works also, the faith he has in view is a mere intellectual assent to Christian truth, especially to the doctrine of the Divine unity (Ja 2<sup>19</sup>). Further, his idea of works is not that of meritorious performance deserving reward, but of practical morality. He solves the problem of justification in reality by going back behind the legalism of the Pharisees, and behind the Law altogether, to the position of the OT prophets, in so far as they demanded practical righteousness as the condition of acceptance with God. His doctrine and St. Paul's, therefore, touch nowhere except in language; in thought they are altogether apart. At the same time, the Epistle of James serves forcibly to provoke, viz. what safeguard it offers, while satisfying the religious needs of man, for his moral interests. Reference has already been made to the passage in which St. Paul speaks of opposition to his teaching; it was its apparent antinomianism that provoked this opposition (Ro 3rd, of. 8th).

We have thus to return to St. Paul, and ask how he met this difficulty. He does it by opening a new line of argument, in which he presents a fresh view of the death and resurrection of Christ, where these acts appear in the ethical sense of a death to sin and a resurrection to a new life unto God (Ro 6th), and where, further, Christ in His death and resurrection appears as inclusive of all for whom He died (2 Co 5th). In correspondence with this view, faith also takes on a new significance. It is still a receptivity and an obedience; but so that which it receives is different, it appears with new powers, as establishing a mystic union with Christ in His death and resurrection, the outward symbol of which is baptism (Gal 2nd, Ro 6th, Col 2nd), from which union St. Paul draws the ethical consequence, that the believer being dead with Christ to sin, and alive with Him to God, should live accordingly (Ro 6th, Col 2nd). A parallel line of argument presents the view of the Risen Christ as the Spirit (2 Co 3rd), and faith correspondingly as involving the endowment of the Spirit (Gal 5th, of. Ro 8th-11), by which the believer is transformed into the likeness of Christ (2 Co 3rd). But again, the possession of the Spirit demands a life according to the Spirit (Gal 5th, Ro 8th, 12). Along these lines, then, St. Paul makes provision for Christian morality. He presents, as we see, his total thought on the salvation of the individual through the work of Christ in two hemispheres—the former doctrine of justification and this further doctrine which corresponds to the ecclesiastical doctrines of regeneration and sanctification. St. Paul passes continually from the one hemisphere to the other in a way that shows that he feels them to be vitally related; and there are not wanting points of contact between them, among which we may note especially the fact that the idea of faith is common to both hemispheres, as is also that of the Spirit, who appears in connexion with justification as diffusing the consciousness of the love of God (Ro 5th) and as witnessing to our adoption (8th), as well as in connexion with regeneration and sanctification as the potency of the new life. Further, there is a cycle of passages in which there appears a tendency to the unification of the two hemispheres of thought, by making justification conditional on regeneration and sanctification, and thus still future and the object of effort (Ro 2nd, Gal 2nd, 1 Co 4th 9th, Ph 3rd-4th). See on the whole subject Holtzmann, Neutest. Theol. ii, p. 137 ff. In the main, however, St. Paul keeps the two hemispheres apart. Holtzmann (p. 137, n. 1) quotes Pfeiderer, who, using another figure, speaks of 'the two streams which unite in Paulinism in one bed, without, however, inwardly blending.'

II. HISTORICAL.—1. The Catholic doctrine.—St. Paul's doctrine of justification remained after his death in practical abeyance, until it was revived at the Reformation. There is little trace of it in the NT outside of his own Epistles (i.e. of the specific Pauline form of the doctrine of forgiveness). Only uncertain echoes of it are found in the post-Apostolic age, and under the régime of Catholicism, both ancient and medieval, it remained practically a dead letter. Common Catholicism, in fact, returned substantially to the Pharisaic doctrine of salvation by merit, against which St. Paul had fought, with its accompanying atmosphere of fear of coming short at last. According to Gregory the Great, who is here typical, assurance is the mother of indolence, and the fear of Divine judgment is the only fit attitude for the Christian till his last day on earth (Harnack, Dogmengeschichte<sup>3</sup>, iii, p. 250, n. 1). In such an atmosphere the words of the Pauline vocabulary necessarily lost their original meaning, and took on a new significance. Faith came to mean, not trust, but intellectual assent to revealed truth; grace, not the unmerited love of God, but the Holy Spirit, as sacramentally communicated or infused (so Tertullian; see Loofs, Leitfaden, p. 104). It was the work of Augustine to create a new doctrine of justification by the combination of these ideas. First he interpreted the word 'justification' itself to mean not 'a declaring righteous,' but 'a making righteous'; what else is justificati than justi facti? (de Sp. et Litt. 26, 45). Then, further, he combined the idea of justification in this sense with that of 'infused' grace. Augustine teaches that it is this infused grace which justifies or makes righteous by renewing the nature. He is able thus, with St. Paul, to conceive righteousness as a gift; the gift, however, is not of forensic, but of inherent righteousness. This idea of justification by infused grace, it is to be noted, lacks that immediate and necessary connexion with the work of Christ which lies at the base of the Pauline doctrine. Augustine, indeed, regards the forgiveness of sins as an effect of grace, parallel with the renewal of the nature; but faith is not brought into the connexion. The idea of faith remains with Augustine simply the common Catholic idea of assent to revealed truth; so that faith is no more than a presupposition of salvation. Only as it is completed by hope and love through the infusion of grace, is it Christian and saving faith (Seeberg, Dogmengeschichte, i, 276). It is obvious how far Augustine is here from St. Paul, though he constantly uses the Apostle's formula 'justification by faith' (Seeberg, p. 277). The climax of his departure from Pauline doctrine, however, is reached when the idea of merit is drawn into the scheme. The combination is thus effected. Grace alone renders merit possible. God in His condescension accepts as meritorious the works which are really His own gifts: 'what are called our merits are His gifts' (de Trinitate, xiii, 10, 14).

In Western Catholicism the doctrine of justification remains substantially that of Augustine. The Roman Catholic doctrine was finally formulated in opposition to Protestantism at the Council of Trent. It is necessary to refer to two points only. The first is that, in the Middle Ages, Duns Scotus taught a modification of the Augustinian doctrine, which makes still wider room for the idea of merit. He avails himself of a distinction already found in Thomas Aquinas between merit of congruity (meritum de congruo) and condign merit (meritum de condigno). The former is based upon the idea of the Divine equity, to which it is congruous to reward every one who works according to his power after the excellency of the Divine power. The latter is based on the idea of strict justice, which rewards according to desert (Seeberg, l.c. ii, 105). According to Duns, the first grace itself can be merited de congruo by attrition, i.e. such repentance as is possible without grace. The second point to be observed is that the Council of Trent draws a natural consequence from the Augustinian idea of justification, by teaching that justification is progressive, and can and ought to receive continual increment (Sess. VI, cap. x.).

The great contrast between the Catholic doctrine and that of St. Paul is obvious at the first glance. A second look, however, might suggest that perhaps the contrast was not so great after all. For the Catholic doctrine of justification corresponds, though by no means exactly, to St. Paul's doctrine of regeneration and sanctification. It might, therefore, appear as if the difference were really one of language. Nevertheless, in the end the contrast remains unmitigated by this seeming possibility of reconciliation; as Ritschl has acutely observed (op. cit.<sup>3</sup> iii, 36). Catholicism still remains in opposition to St. Paul's idea of justification. What the Apostle calls 'justification,' viz. acceptance with God, including the assurance of eternal life (Ro 5th 6th 8th 33, 39), Catholic doctrine includes under the conception of hope. So Conc. Trid. Sess. VI, cap. xiii.: Christians 'ought to fear, knowing that they are regenerated unto the hope of glory, and not yet unto glory. . . . No one, indeed, can be absolutely certain even of present grace (cap. ix.). It is true that within Catholicism the practical attitude of trust for salvation to the Divine mercy alone, apart from all merits, and the consequent sense of assurance, are to be found, as to some extent in Augustine (Harnack, op. cit. iii. p. 85 f.), but pre-eminently in Bernard of Clairvaux. In this attitude is the true harbinger of the return to St. Paul at the Reformation (Ritschl, op. cit. 3 i. 109 ff.). But we are now concerned with the Catholic doctrine, not with an attitude maintained in spite of it.

2. The Protestant doctrine.—With the Reformation we have a return to the Pauline idea of justification. The absolutely fundamental character for the Christian religion of the Pauline conception is firmly seized. As is well known, Luther called justification by faith 'the article of a standing and falling Church.' The Protestant doctrine, however, assumes a special form, in antithesis to the interim Catholic development, and St. Paul's formula is sharpened into the still more definite shape 'justification by faith alone.'

We have to note, first of all, a reversion to the original Pauline ideas of grace, faith, and justification. Luther, indeed, especially in his earlier period, remained somewhat entangled with the Catholic conception of the last, making the term include both a forensic and a real justification. This, however, was merely a matter of terminology, and has only a historical significance. Practically Luther held the Pauline view: the emphasis with him falls on the forensic aspect of justification. Moreover, the somewhat confused terminology of Luther was corrected by Melancthon who says decidedly that justification with the Hebrews was a forensic word, and opposes the idea of a real justification (Loci Theologici: 'De gratia et justificatione').

The Protestant theology, further, like St. Paul, found the revelation of the Divine grace in Christ, and His work for sinners. Here, however, a considerable development takes place, based upon the medieval development of the doctrine of the Atonement due to Anselm. The latter had viewed the death of Christ in the first place as a satisfaction to God's honour, which liberated Him from the necessity of punishing sinners, and in the second place as a merit or work of supererogatory obedience, which could be made available for His followers. The Protestant theology accepted both these ideas, but with such modifications as made it possible to combine them with the forensic idea of justification. The death of Christ was viewed not as a satisfaction to God's honour, but to the penal sanctions of His Law. To this was added His active obedience to the Law in His life as a satisfaction to its positive requirements. The whole was summed up as Christ's active and passive obedience or merit, and regarded as a provision of the Divine grace with a view to the justification of sinners. Justification consists in the gracious imputation of this twofold merit or obedience to the sinner on the sole condition of faith, so that he becomes not only guiltless before the Law, but also totally free from its claims. This conception is common to both the Lutheran and the Reformed Churches. It did not grow up all at once; but the roots of it can be traced in the earlier Reformers, and it finally established itself firmly in both Churches. It is completely stated in the Formula of Concord (pars ii. Solida Declaratio, iii. 14, 15).

The change from the Pauline doctrine is marked by the alteration of his formula, the imputation of faith for righteousness, into that of the imputation of Christ's righteousness. It is not merely one of language. The conception of Christ's death as a satisfaction to the penal sanctions of the Divine law, on the ground of which God forgives sinners, may, indeed, be accepted as a natural interpretation of the Pauline conception of Christ's death as an expiatory sacrifice for sin, if this conception is to be translated into terms of law. Whether, however, such translation is desirable, is questionable; as we saw that the forensic point of view is only formally and not materially regulative for the Pauline conception of justification. Thus, instead of seeking to translate related conceptions into legal terminology, we ought rather to seek such an explanation (or, if need be, modification) of them as accords with the material element in St. Paul's idea of justification, viz. that it is entirely the work of grace, 'apart from law.' The Protestant theology, in fact, misinterprets Paul by taking his legal phraseology as essential, and seeking to systematize his whole view of justification and its presuppositions under legal ideas. The attempt of the Protestant doctors to conceive the whole process of salvation in legal forms, made them introduce into theology a number of axioms which are in no way part of the Christian view of the world. Such an axiom is that all sin must be punished; whereas the Christian religion teaches that it can be forgiven, and forgiveness and punishment are mutually exclusive (cf. W. N. Clarke, Christian Theology, p. 300). Another axiom is that the punishment of sin may be transferred from one person to another; whereas the very essence of the idea of punishment is its connection with guilt. The vicious suffering of the innocent for the guilty is not punishment. A third axiom is that merit may similarly be transferred from one person to another; whereas the moral result of a life, which is what is meant, is personal, and while it may result in the good of others, cannot possibly be separated from the person of its author, and treated as a commercial asset. That the Protestant doctors had to base their theology on axioms like these, plainly shows that they were on the wrong line in attempting to translate the doctrine of salvation into legal terms. We may no doubt recognize behind the forms of the Protestant theology the intention to show that the Divine grace itself is the grace of a Holy and a Righteous God. But the immediate identification of the Divine Righteousness with its expression in law is fatal to a full and complete view of grace. St. Paul might have taught a better conception of law as a temporary and preparatory manifestation of the Divine righteousness, whose end is fulfilled in a higher way by grace (Gal. 3rd).

This defect in the view of the revelation of the Divine grace in Christ does not, however, prevent the Protestant theology from being true in the main to the Pauline conception of justification. Over against Catholicism, Protestant theology teaches justification by God's grace appropriated by faith alone, and apart from all question of human merit. Moreover, in the total view the emphasis, at any rate with the earlier Reformers, does not fall on the supposed legal forms of the Divine revelation in Christ, but on the idea of grace itself. A remarkable proof of this is to be found in the fact that in Melancthon's Loci Theologici there is no locus devoted to the doctrine of Christ's satisfaction. Even so late as Gerhard in the early part of the 17th cent., the doctrine is treated by him simply as a part of the locus de justificatione.

After this critical excursus we return to the Protestant theology itself, in order next to describe the positions by which it further defined its conception of justification as over against Catholicism. As regards what the Catholics call 'justification,' but the Protestants 'regeneration,' it is taught that the latter is the necessary accompaniment and logical (the later Lutheran theology says, temporal) consequence of justification. Its objective principle is the gift of the Holy Spirit, its subjective manifestation the activity of faith in good works.

On some further points the two Evangelical Churches diverge not only from Catholicism, but from one another. The first of these has to do with the question of assurance. The Lutherans teach that the believer's consciousness of justification is in itself an immediate certainty of the reality of justification, operated by the Holy Ghost (fides divina). Where, however, doubt enters, recourse must be had to the Word and the Sacraments, that the Holy Ghost, who works through the Word, may rekindle faith. The Reformed theologians teach that the guarantee of the reality of justification is God's eternal predestination to salvation, which manifests itself subjectively in perseverance in the state of grace. Hence the assurance of justification cannot be gathered directly from faith itself, but by a reference to its evidence in its fruits (syllabus practicus). [See Lipsius, Dogmatik, p. 675 f.].

The second difference between the Protestant Churches is that the Lutherans make the moment of justification, alike in earth and heaven, the moment when saving faith comes into being. The Reformed, on the other hand, regard justification as accomplished in the resurrection of Christ for the whole Church as His mystical body (justificatio activa), but as regards individual believers based on the decree of justification, which accompanies their eternal election, and realized when saving faith arises (justificatio passiva). It is to be noted that the objective justification, which is accomplished for believers in Christ's resurrection, depends only upon their ideal incorporation in His mystical body. The Reformed doctrine does not therefore, as has sometimes been said, make justification dependent on regeneration. Christ's resurrection is regarded as the acceptance of His satisfaction, made for believers, and thus as ideally their justification in Him (cf. Lipsius, Dogmatik, p. 677 f.; Ritschl, op. cit.<sup>3</sup> i. 293 ff.).

The third difference is as to the doctrine of perseverance. The Lutherans teach that a man may fall from faith, and thus from grace, but that he may regain his position by renewed repentance and faith. On the contrary, the Reformed teach that the members of Christ's body cannot fall, but must persevere in faith to the end. A faith that does not endure, is not real faith; and the consciousness of justification it may bring is only self-deception (Lipsius, p. 679).

Reference must now be made to certain views within Protestantism which deviate from the orthodox conception. The first of these is that of Ostander, who, attaching himself to many expressions in the teaching of Luther, attempted once more to teach a real justification, and yet avoid introducing the Catholic conception of salvation by merit. In opposition to the idea of justification by the mere external imputation of Christ's righteousness, he taught that the essential ground of justification is Christ's righteousness as really communicated to us; though at the same time he regards this indwelling righteousness of Christ not as our own, but as an alien righteousness, and in so far as an imputed righteousness (Lipsius, p. 668).

Another line of thought is opened by the Socinian theology. A criticism of the legal forms of the ecclesiastical doctrine of reconciliation leads to the complete rejection of it. Socinus, however, retains a doctrine of justification by faith, regarded as including not only trust in God as revealed by Christ, but consequent obedience to His will. There is no justification by works without faith; but, on the other hand, works are not merely the fruit of faith, but its execution and perfection, and in so far the works which follow faith justify (Socinus, de Fide et Operibus, Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum, 1656, tom. i. p. 623). But as works done in faith are not perfect, justification is also said to be by faith in opposition to works, because the mercy of God imputes righteousness to the believer (de Jesu Christo Servatore, p. iv, c. 11). In other words, faith is here considered as the principle of active righteousness, and the doctrine of justification comes to mean that God judges not by the outward work, but by the inward disposition. This conclusion is distinctly drawn by the Rationalism of the German Illumination (Lipsius, p. 684).

3. Modern theories.—The most important forms in which the doctrine of justification has been stated in modern theology, so far as that does not simply repeat older points of view, owe their origin chiefly to Kant and Schleiermacher, particularly the latter. Kant took up the subject where it had been left by the Illumination, but in view of his deeper ethics stated it as an ethico-religious problem, viz. how a man conscious of guilt could obtain power to live a new life. The solution is to be found in the conception of faith in the ideal. On the one hand, this appears as the principle of a good life; on the other, it affords the principle of acceptance with God, in so far as God judges men by the ideal they follow, though their realization of it may be imperfect. The Kantian theologian Tieftrunk further pointed out that from a psychological point of view the operation of the Divine grace is absolutely necessary, if a man, in spite of his consciousness of guilt, is to be able joyfully to fulfil the moral law; so that it is required from the point of view of the law itself, in so far as it looks for fulfilment (Lipsius, p. 685; Ritschl<sup>3</sup>, i. p. 429 ff.).

The defect of the Kantian conception, from the point of view of the Christian religion, is its lack of organic connexion with the historical revelation of God in Jesus Christ. In the system of Schleiermacher, however, the fundamental character for Christianity of this revelation is fully recognized, while at the same time, instead of a return to the standpoint of the older Protestant dogmatics, there is introduced a new and fruitful theological principle. Schleiermacher demands that all conceptions concerning Divine operations shall be verified by their correspondence with Christian experience, not indeed the experience of an individual, but of the Christian community as a whole (Der christliche Glaube<sup>5</sup>, i. § 30, p. 162).

From this point of view Schleiermacher treats justification. He begins with the Christian consciousness of redemption and reconciliation through Christ. "The Redeemer receives believers into the power of His God-consciousness, and this is His redeeming activity" (ii. § 100, p. 94). "The Redeemer receives believers into the fellowship of His undisturbed happiness, and this is His reconciling activity" (ii. § 101, p. 102). Schleiermacher thus views the work of Christ through the total impression of His character and life. Only as a part of the latter do His sufferings come into question (ii. § 101, 4, p. 102). In accordance with this groundwork follows the doctrine of justification. Justification and conversion are the two inseparable parts of regeneration or assumption into union with Christ. Assumption into union with Christ is, viewed as an altered relation of man to God, his justification; viewed as an altered state of life, his conversion (ii. § 107, p. 105). Justification is by faith, and includes the forgiveness of sins and adoption into Divine sonship (ii. § 106, p. 100). All these things flow naturally and inseparably from union with Christ, which alters alike the will and the contemplative consciousness. In particular, the consciousness of forgiveness follows from the fact, that the new man in Christ has no relation to the sins of the old man or their penalties. Present suffering he regards simply as evil, not as punishment, and of future suffering he has no fear (ii. § 109, 2, p. 108). Finally, when passing over from our own consciousness we view justification as a Divine act, it is not to be separated from the effective working of Christ in conversion. The Divine act of justification, moreover, is one with the sending of Christ into the world. There is no "declaratory act" apart from this; only figuratively can such be spoken of. As regards the justification of the individual, the case is simply that the one Divine decree of justification in Christ is realized in successive points of time. Finally, faith is not to be described as the instrumental cause, or the ipsum instrumentum of justification. We bring nothing to the Divine grace in Christ but our mere receptivity (ii. § 109, 2, p. 108 f.). Faith is awakened wholly by the operation of Christ (ii. § 108, 6, p. 100).

The influence of the Reformed theology is plainly visible in the position of Schleiermacher, that justification is, as a Divine act, to be viewed as realized first of all in Christ, and then successively in believers. Compare what is said above, also Turretin (Inst. Theol. Elementar., Loc. xvi. Qu. ix. 12), who says that justification is one from the point of view of God, though from our point of view it appears in successive acts, viz. God's eternal decree of justification, the realization of it in Christ's work, the application of it in experience, and the declaration of it at the last day. But, further, the correspondence of this point of view with the tendency previously noted in St. Paul to bring the objective and subjective sides of justification into close and indeed inseparable relation, may also be remarked. Schleiermacher, however, brings the principle which underlies this tendency to clear consciousness, and bases on it his theological method, for which, as we saw, the continuity of Divine operation and human experience is fundamental.

Schleiermacher's doctrine of justification has been differently understood. Most theologians have considered that he means to make justification conditional on a real union with Christ (cf. Lipsius, p. 686 ff.). Ritschl, however, thinks that only an ideal union is referred to (iii.<sup>3</sup>, p. 559). Two different developments, therefore, have taken place, starting from either view of Schleiermacher's position.

In the first place, one of the commonest views in modern theology makes justification dependent on a real union with Christ, breaking down the sharp distinction between justification and regeneration, and treating them simply as aspects of the same process. Faith, on this view, is to be regarded in justification not simply as the reflex of Divine grace, but as comprehending the spiritual content of union with Christ, and of the gift of the Spirit, which is the basis of the ethical life of the Christian. Hence this view of justification is claimed to be 'ethical'; justification according to it being a recognition of what really is in the believer his new life, as well pleasing to God. A reconciliation with the forensic view is found in the Kantian thought that God judges by the ideal; so that justification appears as a prophetic judgment, which sees in the first germ of the new life its whole fruit.

This view is closely akin to Osiander's. It has undoubtedly points of contact with the broader use of the word 'faith' in St. Paul, who, as Fleiderer points out, often uses it as practically equivalent to the whole of Christianity (Urchristentum 1, p. 260; cf. 1 Co 12<sup>13</sup>). It is further along the line developed in the cycle of passages like Ro 8<sup>17</sup>, Gal 2<sup>17</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>9</sup>, 2<sup>20</sup>, Ph 3<sup>10-14</sup>, as previously explained. But it does not represent St. Paul's main line of thought with respect to justification, and the objection to it further is that in the end it bases justification either upon the imperfect realization of Christ in us, or, in so far as the imperfection is counterbalanced by a reference to the ideal, upon what is still future, thus resembling the Catholic view. This view does not, therefore, meet the religious need of a firm and unshakable ground of trust as to acceptance with God.

In opposition to it, therefore, Ritschl develops the doctrine of Schleiermacher along the other line which he takes to be its real meaning, giving in his theology also prominence to a conception which with Schleiermacher is in the background—that of revelation. The idea of justification is consequently construed directly through the idea of the Divine grace as revealed in Christ, and faith is thought of as of a piece with this revelation and the realization of it in human lives. Justification is thus in the first instance through grace, but by faith. Ritschl's way of expressing this is by saying that justification is the act of God as Father, and further that the sentence of justification falls in the first instance on the religious community founded by Christ as a whole, to which God imputes the position towards Him of Christ its Founder, and on individuals as by faith in the Gospel they attach themselves to this community; justification thus becoming effective for them. Faith is simply obedience to God and trust in the revelation of His grace in Christ. Its functions are religious, not moral (iii. p. 139; cf. also p. 70). As regards the effects of justification, the comprehensive description of them is that it is 'the acceptance of sinners into fellowship with God, in which their salvation is to be realized and carried out into eternal life.' In particular, the consciousness of guilt is removed, in so far as the element of mistrust of God, which is the essence of it, is removed (p. 35). Assurance of justification can be obtained only by the exercise of faith in patience or 'lordship over the world.' Finally, the course of moral action is conditioned by justification; but the direct aim of the latter is not the product of moral action, but the bestowal of eternal life, which is realized here and now in lordship over the world (pp. 192, 534 f., 670).

III. CONSTRUCTIVE TREATMENT.—It appears to the present writer that a correct modern interpretation of the Pauline conception of justification must move generally along the lines suggested by Ritschl. Perhaps it may be necessary to observe that such an interpretation is required, and that it is not sufficient simply to rest in the Pauline statement as it stands. In the first place, we have seen that St. Paul suggests more than one point of view, and we have to settle which is to be regarded as determinative. Then, again, there are gaps in the Pauline presentation which require to be filled up, especially in view of the points raised by later theological controversies. Finally, the Pauline theology is only one among the early Christian presentations of the Christian salvation, and it is necessary in some points to modify his conceptions in order to do justice to other NT points of view, especially those presented in the Gospels. We proceed, then, to present the doctrine of justification along the general lines of Ritschl, but with regard also to the treatment of other theologians, who have, as it seems to the writer, dealt more satisfactorily than Ritschl with particular points. Reference is made particularly to Ritschl's own followers, Kaftan and Häring, but also to Lipsius and Kähler, and finally to W. N. Clarke.

Instead of beginning with St. Paul's technical term 'justification,' we shall first make use of its material equivalent, the idea of forgiveness, having already established our right to do this. We thus, as Kaftan says (Dogmatik 3, 4, p. 523), present the issue in a simpler and less equivocal form, with the advantage also of keeping before the mind the connections of the subject in the teaching of Jesus. What Paul calls grace is to Jesus the Fatherly forgiving love of God.

We begin, then, with the analysis of forgiveness as a Divine act, and consider, after Paul, first the objective side of this act—revelation,—and then the subjective side—faith, by which the revelation is appropriated and forgiveness fully realized. The revelation of forgiveness is in Jesus Christ, His Person and Work; not merely, however, as St. Paul teaches, in His death and resurrection, but as the Gospels clearly show, and as Schleiermacher, after them, recognized, in His whole life, including these culminating acts. Forgiveness is revealed by the whole of Christ's activity as well as by His sufferings. In fact, His sufferings reveal forgiveness because of the activity expressed in the endurance of them. Jesus further makes this revelation as the unique and perfect representative of God in the world, absolutely one with the Father in thought and feeling; so that by every word and deed and by His whole attitude He incarnates God in the world, to do which is His earthly mission and vocation.

The Fatherly forgiveness of God, which Jesus reveals, is no mere good-natured indulgence; on the contrary, the Father is the Holy Father, the Righteous Father (Jn 17<sup>11-20</sup>), and His forgiveness is holy and righteous forgiveness. Jesus guarantees this by His revelation not only of the Divine forgiveness, but also of the Divine holiness in its stern condemnation of sin. A holy hatred of sin is evident in His whole attitude.

But, finally, Jesus reveals the holy forgiving love of God not only in these two separate moments, but in its entirety, by His bearing in love the sins of men upon His soul. We can explain His sorrow over Jerusalem only as the pain of One who, full of love to men, felt their sin as the heaviest burden. We can explain the agony in Gethsemane and the cry of desolation on the cross only along the same lines, as caused by the pressure of the sin of the world upon the loving heart of the Saviour. In this bearing of sin, however, Jesus was still revealing the attitude of God towards sinners. The fact that the burden of sin upon His soul broke in upon the peace and bliss of His personal communion with the Father, makes no difference as to this point. Christ's actual communion with the Father had to be maintained, indeed, by an act of supreme self-surrender (Mk 14<sup>26</sup>), or of faith, unaided by any evidence of the Divine presence (15<sup>24</sup>). It was necessary that the holy love of God should come to complete self-expression in the world, which could only be by the revelation of the depth of suffering caused to sinless love by sin; and this revelation could not be made except by the Revealer proceeding along a path which brought upon His human spirit the sense of separation from God. This path was, however, not a new one; it was but the continuation, to the end of the path, of Christ's vocation as Revealer of God. To reveal the holy love of God in a world of sin could have but one issue, that which it historically had, viz. to rouse up the opposition of sin, as much to the love as to the holiness (Lk 15<sup>2</sup>), to the uttermost. The final act of self-surrender and faith, therefore, by which Jesus gave Himself to the death at the hands of sinners, which was inevitable, if He persevered in His vocation, was simply the climax of the self-surrender and faith by which as man He gave Himself at every moment to the work of His vocation. The whole revelation of God made by Jesus being a revelation within humanity, was made at every point by the offering up of the human will of Jesus to the Father. His whole life and death together constituted a sacrifice, which He offered up to God as the necessary means of the revelation in the world of His holy love. And this He did for the sake of men, that they might come to know the holy forgiveness of the Father.

Such, then, would seem to be the necessary re-statement of the Pauline doctrine of the revelation of the grace of God in Christ in view of the historical statements of the Gospels. To complete it, however, it is necessary to add that the function of the resurrection is to make the historical revelation permanent and abiding, by presenting Christ as the perpetual object of faith. This leads to the next point, which is that of the doctrine of faith, or the subjective appropriation of the revelation. There St. Paul's conception of faith as in the first place, on the side of the will, a species of obedience or submission to God, remains fundamental. It is in essential agreement, it may be observed, with the teaching of Jesus Himself, in which πείθειν, or turning to God, is made the subjective principle of forgiveness. But in order that the subjective appropriation may correspond in all points with the objective revelation, faith must not be limited psychologically to trust, but must include penitence also, in this way appearing as the proper correlative of both the love and the holiness of forgiveness. When the revelation of forgiveness in Christ awakens this faith in the heart, then the Divine act of forgiveness is completed, and forgiveness is fully realized.

We turn next to forgiveness as an experience, where St. Paul gives ample guidance, and all that is necessary is to explain some points in reference to the problems raised by later theologians. The first practical effect of justification is peace with God, or the removal of the consciousness of guilt which separated the sinner from God. This is removed by the appropriation of the Divine forgiveness, which is realized as the removal of guilt. Nor does conscience offer any obstacle to the realization of the removal of guilt in the consciousness of the believer; since the holiness of the Divine forgiveness is assured by the very revelation which brings the knowledge of it. In fact, the penitence which accompanies trust in the Divine forgiveness as the result of the revelation in Christ, is an inward appropriation of the Divine condemnation of sin. Thus there is peace with God as the result of faith, and that upon the sure and certain basis of the knowledge of God's holy love, in which both the conscience and the heart find rest.

Forgiveness is also realized as the remission of the penalties of sin. The chief penalty of sin is eternal death, or separation from God. But further, of physical evils some are clearly the effects of sin; and the rest, to the sinner conscious of separation from God, also tend to appear as the tokens of His displeasure. Forgiveness removes the fear of eternal death by the establishment of communion with God; while, so far as physical evils are concerned, though the consequences of former sins may continue to abound, yet all these appear no longer as tokens of God's displeasure, but as fatherly chastisements, so that the believer's communion with God remains unbroken by them. Finally, the positive expression of the whole experience is that the believer enjoys the privilege of Divine sonship, and has, in his communion with God, here and now, the gift of eternal life; while his trust in God enables him confidently to leave to Him the maintenance of this privilege in the future. The negative statement of this experience is that the standing of the believer with God is not on terms of law or merit. In other words, to sum up the whole matter, the Christian religion is not a religion of law but a religion of grace. This is the real meaning of the article of justification by faith, which shows at once why it is so fundamental for Christianity, and why it is so necessary to maintain that justification is by faith alone.

We have now reached the end of the exposition of the subject-matter of the doctrine; some necessary questions, however, remain to be discussed. The first is formal. With what point in time is the Divine act of justification to be connected? If the exposition above has been followed, it will be seen that the question is one of definition. Forgiveness is revealed in Christ, and realized in faith. We may, therefore, connect the Divine act more particularly with the death of Christ as the climax of the revelation, as Kaftan does (Dogmatik<sup>2</sup>, p. 523), which is, perhaps, most logical; or we may, with Lipsius (Dogmatik, p. 696), connect it with the awakening of faith in the sense that then God by His Spirit speaks pardon to the soul. The one is the justificatio activa, the other the justificatio passiva of Reformed theology; each is simply an aspect of one process.

The next question is that of assurance. The view of Lipsius here seems most in accordance with the spirit of Paul, viz. that 'when faith becomes uncertain, there remains to us nothing but ever to return anew in believing trust to the objective message of grace, which meets us in the gospel or in the historical revelation in Christ, till the lost consciousness of salvation revives again.'

There remains the most difficult question of all, as Lipsius calls it, 'the master question of theology' (Dogmatik, p. 699), viz. the question of the relation of justification to regeneration and the Christian life. The Pauline answer to this question is, as we have seen, that the same Divine revelation in Christ by which forgiveness is revealed, is also the revelation of an ethical ideal as an energizing spirit; and that, as faith receives the revelation of grace in forgiveness, so it receives also at the same time the revelation of the ideal as a quickening influence upon the life. It is still an act of obedience or submission to God, but, in this latter aspect, the act of obedience or submission to the Christian ideal, or the reception of the Spirit of Christ as the principle of life. It is one and the same revelation in both cases, and one and the same faith or receptivity in both cases. Justification and regeneration are therefore vitally connected, and it is impossible to experience one without the other. Nevertheless Christian theology is compelled to treat them as separate articles, in order to do justice to each. In spite of the oneness of the revelation in Christ, and of the faith of the Christian, it remains true that justification has its ground simply in the Divine grace, and that faith comes into view in the matter, not in its general reference to the Christian life as a whole, but as it reflects the Divine revelation of God's holy forgiveness.

LITERATURE.—Only a representative selection can be given. It falls into three divisions, corresponding to those of the article. First, however, must be named a work covering all three divisions, viz. Ritschl's great work, Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, 3 vols. 1850 (Eng. tr. Justification and Reconciliation) of 1st vol. from 1st ed. 1872, of 2nd vol. from 2nd ed. 1902.

ROBERT S. FRANKS.

JUSTIFYING ONE'S SELF.—When our Lord

told the lawyer that loving God with all the heart and one's neighbour as one's self was the way to inherit eternal life, the man, 'willing to justify himself, said unto Jesus, And who is my neighbour?' (Lk 10<sup>9</sup>). And on a later occasion, in opposition to the Pharisees who derided Him, our Lord said to them, 'Ye are they which justify yourselves before men' (16<sup>5</sup>). The English word 'justify' always means 'to show to be just,' and in the different passages the idea of the Greek also is that of showing one's self to be just or righteous. In the first case the lawyer wished to justify either his past neglect of the command to love his neighbour, or else his having asked the question, by seeking to be told to whom the term 'neighbour' was to be applied. He would thereby suggest the impossibility of fulfilling the command until he knew for certain to whom the term was rightly applicable. In the case of the Pharisees in the latter passage, the emphasis is clearly laid upon the fact that they were endeavouring (with apparent success) to show themselves to be righteous persons in the judgment of men, though God's idea of them was entirely different. With reference to the lawyer's question, 'Who is my neighbour?' the precise form of the inquiry is noteworthy. Just as if a man could pick and choose after being told who and what constitutes a neighbour. The question really comes from a self-centred man who meant, 'Who is neighbour to me?' Bishop Lightfoot once preached a sermon on this subject, in which he pointed out that the true question is, 'Who my neighbour is,' that is, 'What is he like? what are his characteristics?' It does not call attention to this or that person as a possible neighbour, but concentrates thought on my getting to know all about the man who is 'nigh' me, my neighbour in every sense. Thus by his very question the man, so far from justifying himself, that is, showing himself to be just, really condemned himself. The character of the question reveals a selfish man whose one thought was about some one being neighbour to him instead of inquiring as to whom he could be a neighbour. Our Lord's parable of the Good Samaritan and its application, 'Which of these was neighbour unto him?' revealed the true aspect and attitude. This is but one instance of the great law that no man can justify himself before God. 'By the deeds of the law shall no flesh living be justified' (Ro 3<sup>20</sup>).

K

KEEPING.—The Eng. verb 'keep,' with its equivalents 'watch,' 'beware of,' 'preserve,' 'observe,' is a tr. of several Gr. words: τηρέω (and its compounds διατηρέω, συντηρέω), φύλασσω (and its compound διαφύλασσω), πύσσω, ἐγώ (and its compounds κατέγχε, συνέγχε), κρατέω, ἐγώ.

The most important of these words are τηρέω and φύλασσω with their respective compounds, and for a discussion of the difference in meaning between them the reader is referred to Grimm-Thayer's Gr. Lex., and Westcott's St. John (note on 8<sup>7</sup>).

1. Two common usages of the word have to be noticed first. (a) It is = exercise watchful care. The participle tr. in AV 'the keepers' (Mt 23<sup>4</sup>) is a part of the same verb (τηρέω) as is rendered 'watch' in Mt 27<sup>36</sup> 'and they sat and watched him there' (RV), and in v.<sup>44</sup> 'The centurion and they that were with him watching . . . feared exceedingly' (RV). It is a compound of that verb, too (συντηρέω), which is used to describe the action of putting 'new wine into new bottles'—'both are preserved,' i.e. properly cared for (Mt 9<sup>17</sup>). And the same compound occurs again in the passage in Mk. (6<sup>9</sup>), where it is said that Herod 'observed' (AV) John, or 'kept' him 'safe' (RV). (b) It is = guard, the direct implication being that this action is necessary in view of possible assaults. For instance, 'There were shepherds in the same country abiding in the field, and keeping watch (φύλασσαντες φύλακας) by night over their flocks' (Lk 2<sup>8</sup>); 'It is written, He shall give his angels charge over thee to keep (RV guard) thee' (Lk 4<sup>10</sup>, where the verb used is διαφύλασσω). Other instances of the same usage of the word are to be found in Lk 8<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>4</sup>.

2. Retain may be taken as another general synonym for 'keep' as it is used in the Gospels. For example, at the marriage in Cana the ruler of the feast is reported as having said to the bridegroom, 'Thou hast kept (τηρέω) the good wine until now' (Jn 2<sup>9</sup>).

Retention (κατέχω) is described as a stage in the process whereby 'an honest and good heart' brings to the fulfillment of fruitfulness the experience of 'hearing the word' (Lk 8<sup>15</sup>). It is opposed to 'hearing with joy, but having no root', and to 'hearing and going on one's way, and being choked with cares and riches and pleasures of this life.'

But, apart from Mk 9<sup>9</sup>, where the disciples are said to have 'kept (επαρέω) the saying' which Jesus spoke to them on their way down from the Mount of Transfiguration [Luke says, 9<sup>9</sup>, they 'held their peace' (ἐσιγησαν) about the things they had seen on the Mount], the two most striking contexts in which the word is used with this meaning are found in Luke's Gospel. When the shepherds made known concerning the saying which had been spoken to them about the child in Bethlehem, 'all that heard it wondered. . . . But Mary kept (συνετήρει) all these sayings (or things), poring them in her heart' (Lk 2<sup>19</sup>). She kept them to herself, and did not allow the impression of them to dissipate in mere astonishment. 'The wonder of the many was a transient emotion; this recollecting and brooding of Mary was an abiding habit' (Bruce, Evangel. Gr. Test.). Again, referring to what took place on the occasion of the visit to Jerusalem, the narrative goes on to say that Jesus went down with His parents 'and came to Nazareth; and he was subject unto them; and his mother kept (διετήρει) all these sayings (or things) in her heart' (Lk 2<sup>51</sup>). She kept them continually and carefully. They were never absent from her consciousness. They were always the subject of her thought. Motherhood, in all its pathos and beauty, in all its self-forgetfulness, and devoted intentness, and jealous vigilance, is revealed in these simple words — 'His mother kept all these sayings in her heart.'

3. Two further usages of the word may be grouped together here. (a) In certain contexts it means to celebrate. For example, we read that Herod 'exercised a watchful care' over the Baptist, 'but when his birthday was kept' (ἔγινε, AV), he was found off his guard (Mt 14<sup>6</sup>). Again, the verb used to describe the celebration of the Passover (28<sup>16</sup>) is 'keep' (ἑορτάζω—a most appropriate term to use in connexion with an ordinance which largely consisted in representing ancient events by means of symbolic actions). Once more, in the report given in John's Gospel of the anointing by Mary in Bethany, we read that Jesus said of Mary's action, 'Suffer her to keep (τηρέω) it against the day of my burying' (Jn 12<sup>7</sup> RV)—the meaning of 'keep it' evidently being to 'celebrate this as a rite.' (b) In several contexts it means generally to observe or conform to. For instance, we read that when the Pharisees and scribes asked Jesus why His disciples walked not according to the tradition of the elders, but ate their bread with defiled hands, He replied, 'Full well do ye reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep (τηρέω) your tradition' (Mk 7<sup>9</sup>). Again, the conclusion to which some of the Pharisees are reported to have come with regard to our Lord's action in healing a man blind from his birth on the Sabbath, was, 'This man is not from God, because he keepeth (τηρέω) not the Sabbath' (Jn 9<sup>16</sup>).

4. But 'keep' has the more precise meanings of: (a) believe, in such passages as 'Blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep (φωλάσσω) it' (Lk 11<sup>28</sup>), and 'If any man hear my sayings, and keep (φωλάσσω) them not, I judge him not' (Jn 12<sup>47</sup>); and (b) obey, in such passages as that in which the rich young ruler is reported as having said with reference to the commandments cited by Jesus, 'All these things have I kept (φωλάσσω) from my youth up' (Mt 19<sup>20</sup> AV, cf. Mk 10<sup>20</sup>, Lk 18<sup>21</sup>), and that in which Jesus is reported as having taxed the Jews with failure to 'keep' (AV) or 'do' (RV; ταῦτα) the Law of Moses (Jn 7<sup>19</sup>).

But the significant passages in this connexion are those which (with the exception of Mt 19<sup>17</sup> and 28<sup>20</sup>) occur in the Fourth Gospel, and in which the verb to 'keep' (τηρέω in every instance) is associated with the terms λόγος (sing. or plur. 'word' or 'words') and ἐντολάς (plur. 'commandments'). (i.) Westcott points out (note to Jn 8<sup>21</sup>) that the phrase 'keeping Christ's word' (or 'words') refers to 'the observance of the whole revelation in its organic completeness.' The opposite of 'to keep' in this connexion is 'to disregard or disobey.' He who 'keeps' Christ's word' (or 'words') is he who first attends to it, and lets the wonder and significance of the message it conveys sink into his mind, and who then appropriates and makes his own by faith the revelation it brings. 'To pay no heed to Christ's word' (or 'words'), to be at no pains to think out the purport of His appearance in history, and of the findings of salvation He proclaimed; or, the meaning and worth of the gospel having in some measure been realized, to set it aside, to neglect it, to occupy one's self seriously with other things only—that is the attitude to Himself which Christ describes when He speaks of a man not 'keeping His word.' To 'keep' Christ's word, in short, is to take Christ at His word—to believe in Him (cf. Jn 8<sup>21, 22</sup> 14<sup>23, 24</sup> 15<sup>20</sup> 17<sup>8</sup>). The word of Christ is the word of the Father (14<sup>24</sup> 17<sup>6</sup>), and it is the word which the disciples are to proclaim (15<sup>27</sup>). (ii.) The phrase 'keeping Christ's commandments' refers to 'the observance of definite precepts' (Westcott, ib.). The opposite of 'to keep' in this connexion is clearly 'to disobey.' He that 'keeps Christ's commandments' is he who recognizes their supremacy over his will, and seeks to regulate his inward and his outward life by them. To slight the obligations which Christ imposes, to look upon the principles of conduct which He enjoins on men as subject to qualification and as mere alternatives to other possible and perhaps more congenial maxims, or, their authority being acknowledged, to limit one's conformity to them to an external and superficial obedience, an obedience that is only a travesty of active Christian discipleship—that is the attitude to Christ which is described when it has to be said of a man that he 'keeps not' His commandments. 'To keep Christ's commandments' is to own Him as the sole sovereign of one's life, and to bring one's whole self—mind and will and heart—into captivity to the obedience of Christ (cf. 14<sup>23, 24</sup> 15<sup>10</sup>).

Love for Christ is described by Him as being the condition that ensures both belief in His word or words (14<sup>23, 24</sup>), and obedience to His commandments (v. 23); and obedience to His commandments, on the other hand (v. 23), is described by Him as being the evidence that bears witness to the reality of that love. Further, to believing in His word He attaches two promises. 'If a man love me, he will keep my word: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him' (v. 23), and 'If a man keep my word, he shall never see death' (8<sup>51</sup>)—a combination of passages which shows what 'death' involves. Similarly with obedience to His commandments Christ connects this promise, 'If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I . . . abide in my Father's love' (15<sup>10</sup>), and with the love to Him that is borne witness to by obedience to His commandments, this other: 'He that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself unto him' (14<sup>21</sup>).

Finally, Christ describes Himself as standing in this twofold relation to the Father, viz. of 'keeping-his word,' and 'keeping his commandments'; 'I know him, and keep his word' (8th); 'I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love' (15th).

5. The last usage of the word 'keep' refers to the Divine care of men, and occurs in our Lord's Intercessory Prayer (17). (a) V.<sup>11</sup> lets us see one aspect of the meaning of this 'keeping': 'Holy Father, keep (τηρω) them [i.e. 'those whom thou hast given me' (v.<sup>9</sup>)] in thy name which thou hast given me, that they may be one, even as we are.' This was the work which Christ had wrought for the disciples while He was with them. He had kept (τηρω) them in the Father's name, and guarded (φωλασσω) them (v.<sup>12</sup>). In these two phrases—the former of which suggests positive communication of truth and solicitude that the recipients might not be dispossessed of it, and the latter protection against the assaults of temptation—the 'educative care' which Christ spent on the disciples is summed up (see Expos. Gr. Test. ad loc.). And now that He is to be 'no more in the world,' He prays the Father to keep them in the name of Father. 'To be kept in the name' means not only 'to be kept in the knowledge,' but 'to be kept in the experience'—there being other modes of relation and sensibility to God on man's part besides that of knowledge. That the disciples' faith in God as Father might be characterized by assurance, is the burden of Christ's prayer (see Westcott, ad loc., on the title 'Holy Father'). (b) V.<sup>15</sup> shows us another aspect of the meaning of the Divine 'keeping': 'I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from (Gr. 'out of') the evil' (RV 'evil one'). Whether 'evil' should be interpreted as masculine or neuter need not be discussed here. The point to notice is that the experience, and the only experience, of Divine 'keeping' which Christ by His example encourages men to pray for and anticipate, consists not in immunity from adversity, injuries, suffering, sorrow, and death, but in maintenance in a condition of serenity with regard to the Father's love and of perseverance in the path and practice of goodness—freedom from evil. The man who does not lend himself and the man who does lend himself to this keeping are described in 12th: 'He that loveth his life loseth it; and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep (φωλασσω) it unto life eternal' RV.

KENOSIS.—The word kenosis is not itself found in the NT, but the verb kenōō to empty, to make empty, occurs in Ph 2nd, where AV renders 'made himself of no reputation,' but the RV correctly 'emptied himself' (see Lightfoot's Com. in loc., and Grimm-Thayer's Creek-English Lexicon). It is disputed among theologians as to the extent to which the Son of God stripped Himself of His Divine prerogatives, but it is not necessary here to discuss these differences, as the purpose of this article is only to collect the evidences the Gospels afford of the actual conditions of the Incarnation. But two questions may here be very briefly touched on before we pass to this subject.

(1) We may glance at the description of this Kenosis of the Son of God found in the Apostolic writings. The passage in Philippians (2nd) lays stress on the surrender, on the one hand, of the form of God ('the glories, the prerogatives of deity,' Lightfoot), of equality with God; and the assumption, on the other hand, of the form of a servant, the likeness of man, self-humiliation and obedience 'even unto death, yea, the death of the cross.' In 2 Co 8th St. Paul describes the Kenosis as the abandonment of wealth for poverty (the Divine for the human mode of existence). In four pregnant statements, in which the Christian salvation is brought into most intimate relation with the humiliation of the Son of God, this Kenosis is more fully defined: 'God, sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh [He shared the flesh, but not the sin], condemned sin in the flesh' (Ro 8th); 'God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law' (Gal 4th); 'Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf' [the penalty of sin was endured by the sinless for the sinful (2 Co 5th)]; 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us' [Christ as the sacrificial victim 'became in a certain sense the impersonation of the sin and of the curse,' Lightfoot on Gal 3rd]. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews lays emphasis on the participation of the Son of God in flesh and blood, in order that He might be capable of dying (2nd); on His experience of temptation as enabling Him 'to sympathize with and succour the tempted' (2nd 4th); on the obedience He learned by suffering (5th). The prologue to John's Gospel may be regarded as Apostolic interpretation; and there the Kenosis is described in the words 'and the Word became flesh' (1st, see Westcott in loco). It is the intention of all these statements to affirm the complete reality of the manhood of Jesus.

(2) We may glance at the attempts to define theologically the process of the Incarnation in the Kenotic theory, 'which seeks to make the manhood of Christ real by representing the Logos as contracting Himself within human dimensions and literally becoming man' (Bruce's The Humiliation of Christ, p. 136). This lecture contains the best account in English of the modern Kenotic theories. Bruce distinguishes four types, the absolute dualistic, the absolute metamorphic, the absolute semi-metamorphic, the real but relative. The differences in these theories concern two points, the degree in which the Logos laid aside the Divine attributes of omnipresence, omnipotence, and omniscience in order to become man, and the relation between the Logos and the human soul of Christ, as retaining distinctness, or as becoming identical. As regards the first point, the theories are absolute or relative; as regards the second, dualistic, metamorphic, semi-metamorphic). Of the speculative attempts to formulate the doctrine of the Incarnation, Ritschl says that 'what is taught under the head of the Kenosis of the Divine Logos is pure mythology' (Justification and Reconciliation, pp. 409-411). Without endorsing the terms of this condemnation, the present writer may repeat what he has elsewhere written on this matter. 'The Kenotic theories are commendable as attempts to do justice to the historical personality of Jesus, while assuming the ecclesiastical dogma; but are unsatisfactory in putting an undue strain on the passages in the New Testament which are supposed to teach the doctrine, and in venturing on bold assertions about the constitution of deity, which go far beyond the compass of our intelligence in these high matters' (The Ritschlian Theology, p. 271 note). The study of the facts of the life of Jesus proves undoubtedly the Kenosis, of which none of these theories offers a satisfactory explanation, as partly the data—the inner life of the Godhead—lie beyond our reach. We now confine ourselves to the data offered in the Gospels. (A useful summary of the data, although by no means exhaustive, will be found in Gore's Dissertations, 'The Consciousness of our Lord in His Mortal Life.' Adamson in The Mind in Christ deals very thoroughly with all the data bearing on the knowledge of Christ).

The Kenotic theories concern themselves specially with the three metaphysical attributes of God, manifest in His transcendent, yet immanent, relation to the world—omnipresence, omnipotence, omniscience. The Gospels show that Jesus possessed none of these. He was localized in a body (Jn 14 'tabernacled among us'), and moved from place to place as His mission required. The cure of the nobleman's son (Jn 4<sup>46</sup>) does not prove omnipresence, but is explicable as an act of faith in God. In the absence of their Master the disciples become faithless (Mk 9<sup>24</sup>), and He has to return to them to restore their confidence. In His farewell discourse He promises His constant presence as a future gift (Jn 14<sup>18-19</sup>), and fulfils His promise after the Resurrection (Mt 28<sup>20</sup>). His miracles do not prove omnipotence, as they were wrought in dependence on, with prayer to, God (Mk 9<sup>29</sup>, Jn 11<sup>41-42</sup>), were restrained by unbelief (Mt 13<sup>28</sup>), seemingly involved physical strain (Mk 5<sup>26</sup>), and sometimes were accompanied by means of cure (Mk 7<sup>32-34</sup>; see The Expositor, 6th series, vol. vi, 'The Function of the Miracles'). Jesus never claimed omniscience. He claimed to know the Father as no other knew Him (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>), but, on the other hand, He confessed that His knowledge as Son was limited in so important a matter as the time of His Return (Mt 24<sup>36</sup> RV, Mk 13<sup>32</sup>). The express distinction between the knowledge of the Son and of the Father made in this utterance disproves the view sometimes advanced, that the Son's perfect knowledge of the Father must include a knowledge of all the Father knows. It is the character, purpose, and activity of God as Father that the Son knows and reveals. When Jesus Himself thus confesses ignorance in a matter affecting Himself so closely, it is not reverence to claim for Him universal knowledge regarding such matters as the date and authorship of Old Testament writings, the causes of disease, the course of events in the remote future; nor is it any lack of homage and devotion to acknowledge the other evidences of limitation of knowledge the Gospels offer. He made a mistake regarding the barren fig-tree (Mk 11<sup>13</sup>); He was sometimes surprised and disappointed [see art. SURPRISE] (Mt 8<sup>10</sup> 23<sup>30</sup>, Mk 14<sup>21</sup> 7 6<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>24</sup> 25 28 8<sup>12</sup>, Lk 24<sup>20</sup>); information came to Him by the ordinary channels of hearing and seeing (Mt 4<sup>12-17</sup> 14<sup>12-13</sup>, Mk 1<sup>37</sup> 28 29<sup>17</sup>, Jn 4<sup>38</sup>), and He sought it in this way (Jn 18<sup>20</sup> 24<sup>29</sup>, Mk 5<sup>20-22</sup>, Lk 4<sup>3</sup>). He asked questions not rhetorically, but because He desired an answer (Mt 16<sup>12-15</sup>, Lk 8<sup>9</sup>, Jn 11<sup>34</sup>). He developed mentally (Lk 2<sup>22</sup>), and during His ministry learned by experience (Jn 2<sup>24</sup>; the verb used is γινώσκω, see Westcott in loco). He sought guidance from God in prayer (Lk 5<sup>16</sup> 6<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>18</sup> 10<sup>17</sup>). The necessity of the cup offered by His Father's will was not at first evident to Him (Mt 26<sup>29</sup>), and, when convinced that His Father's will required it, He was not sure that His strength to drink it would endure (v. 42; cf. He 5<sup>7</sup>). His cry of desolation (Mt 27<sup>46</sup>) on the cross was not only the culmination of His Passion, but in being this it was also the temporary obscuration of His knowledge of the Father, who in that moment had not forsaken Him. Instances of supernatural knowledge are found in the Gospels. Some of these: the getting of the ass (Mt 21<sup>5</sup>), and of the upper room (23<sup>27-28</sup>), the finding of the money in the fish's mouth (17<sup>27</sup>), are only apparent, and allow another explanation. The statement to the woman of Samaria about the number of her husbands (Jn 4<sup>17-18</sup>) is very perplexing; and possibly, as the conversation was probably reported by the woman, may have been made more definite by her guilty conscience than it actually was, even as she exaggerates in her account of what Christ had told her (v. 29). The command to the disciples about casting their net (Lk 5<sup>8</sup>) was probably an act of faith in God, even as the command to the storm (Mk 4<sup>39</sup>). The other cases fall into two classes: prophetic anticipations (His own death and resurrection, the doom of Jerusalem), or exercises of an exceptional moral insight and spiritual discernment. We may admit occasionally, for the fulfilment of His vocation, miraculous knowledge as well as power, without the constant possession of omniscience or omnipotence.

We cannot dissect the intellectual from the moral life; and the development of the latter involves necessarily some limitations in the former. Omniscience cannot be 'tempted in all points even as we are,' nor can it exercise a childlike faith in God such as Jesus calls us to exercise along with Him. Moral and religious reality is excluded from the history of Jesus by the denial of the limitation of His knowledge. He was tempted (see articles on TEMPTATION and STRUGGLES OF SOUL). In the Wilderness the temptation was possible, because He had to learn by experience the uses to which His miraculous powers might legitimately be put, and the proper means for the fulfilment of His vocation. Without taint or flaw in His own nature, the expectations of the people regarding the Messiah, and the desires they pressed upon Him, afforded the occasions of temptation to Him. The necessity of His own sacrifice was not so certain to Him as to exclude the possibility of the temptation to escape it. That Jesus was Himself conscious of being still the subject of a moral discipline is suggested by His refusal of the epithet 'good' (Mk 10<sup>18</sup>). Although morally tempted and developing, Jesus betrays no sign of penitence for sin or failure, and we are warranted in affirming that He was tempted without sin, and in His development knew no sin. But that perfection would have been only a moral semblance had there been no liability to temptation and no limitation of knowledge. As Son of God, He lived in dependence on God (Mt 11<sup>27c</sup>) and submission to Him (v. 28, Mt 26<sup>39</sup>). It is the Fourth Gospel that throws into special prominence this feature (Jn 3<sup>34</sup> 5<sup>19</sup> 29 8<sup>29</sup> 15<sup>19</sup> 17<sup>1-3</sup>). The Son delivers the words and performs the deeds given by the Father. There are a few utterances given in this Gospel which express a sense of loss for Himself and His disciples in the separation from the Father that His earthly life involves (Jn 14<sup>20</sup>), a desire for the recovery of the former conditions of communion (17<sup>9</sup>), and an expectation of gain in His return to the Father (14<sup>19-20</sup>). Jesus was subject to human emotion: He groaned (Jn 11<sup>38</sup> 38), sighed (Mk 7<sup>34</sup> 34), wept at the grave of Lazarus (Jn 11<sup>35</sup>) and over Jerusalem (Lk 13<sup>34</sup> 34, Mt 23<sup>37</sup>). He endured poverty (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>, Lk 9<sup>58</sup>), labour (Mk 6<sup>6</sup>), weariness (Jn 4<sup>6</sup>, Mt 21<sup>7</sup>), weakness (Mt 27<sup>32</sup>), hunger (Mt 4<sup>2</sup> 21<sup>19</sup>), thirst (Jn 4<sup>7</sup> 19<sup>28</sup>), pain (Mt 27<sup>34-35</sup>), and death (Mt 27<sup>50</sup>, Jn 19<sup>30</sup>). Some have conjectured from the evidence of Jn 19<sup>34</sup> that He died literally of a broken heart (see Farrar's Life of Christ, note at the end of chap. 1x.). This Kenosis did not obscure His moral insight and spiritual discernment; did not involve any moral defect or failure, any religious distrust; did not weaken or narrow His love, mercy, or grace; did not lower His authority, or lessen His efficiency as Revealer of God and Redeemer of men; but, on the contrary, it was necessary, for only under such human conditions and limitations could He fulfil His mission, deliver His message, present His sacrifice, and effect His salvation. That He might receive the name of Saviour and Lord, which is above every other name, He must empty Himself.

KERIOTH

KERIOTH.—See JUDAS ISCARIOT.

KEYS.—The word (κλεις) occurs 6 times in the New Testament, twice in the Synoptic Gospels, and 4 times in Revelation. In Lk 11<sup>8</sup> Jesus upbraids the lawyers on the ground that they have 'taken away the key of knowledge,' the instrument by which entrance into knowledge could be obtained, and thereby hindered the people from the privilege which should have been theirs. This they had done by substituting a false confidence in the wrong kind of knowledge, with the result that the right kind was ignored and forgotten. The knowledge from which the people are thus excluded is 'that of the way of salvation' (Plummer), or, more profoundly, that knowledge of the Lord, for lack of which the 'people perish' (Hos 4<sup>6</sup>), to seek which they had been urged by the prophets (cf. Jn 17<sup>3</sup>).

In Mt 16<sup>19</sup> the word is used again metaphorically, in the address to Peter: 'I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven.' The apparent limitation of the promise to one Apostle is to be controlled by the repetition of the following and interpretive clause addressed to the Apostles in general in Mt 18<sup>18</sup>. The keys are to be intrusted to Peter as to a steward of the house (and in like manner to the Apostles in general), to whom might be given the power of locking and unlocking, but not of deciding who did or did not belong to the household (Weiss). The significance of this promise would be fully met if it announced the effectual proclamation, through the Apostles, of the gospel by means of which the believer obtains entrance into the kingdom. On the passage as a whole see art. CÆSAREA PHILIPPI, p. 249, and PETER.

In Rev 1<sup>8</sup> the Son of Man in John's vision says: 'I have the keys of death and of Hades,' i.e. control over the entrance to the realm of the dead. The figure of death as a realm with portals comes down from Ps 9<sup>13</sup>, and was freely developed in the Rabbinic writings. The 'key of death' was one of the three (four) keys which were said to be in the hand of God alone. Thus in Sanhedrin, 113, 'Elijah desired that there should be given to him the key of rain; he desired that there should be given to him the key of resurrection of the dead: they said to him, "Three keys are not given into the hand of a representative, the key of birth, the key of rain, and the key of resurrection of the dead." There is therefore strong significance in the claim here made by the Risen Messiah.

In like manner a claim to at least Messianic dignity is involved in the phrase in Rev 3<sup>7</sup> 'he that hath the key of David.' The allusion is clearly to the promise in Is 22<sup>22</sup> 'I will give to him (Eliakim) the key of the house of David upon his shoulder,' a passage which, according to Züllich, was commonly referred by Jewish commentators to the Messiah.

In the two remaining passages (Rev 9<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>1</sup>) the use of the word ('the key of the pit of the abyss,' 'the key of the abyss') depends on the idea familiar in Jewish cosmogony, viz. that there was a communication between the upper world and the under world or abyss by means of a pit or shaft, the opening to which might be conceived as covered and locked. According to Rabbinic tradition, this opening was placed beneath the foundations of the Temple, as the Moslems hold to this day that it is to be found beneath the Dome of the Rock, or Mosque of Omar (see Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos, pp. 91-98).

KINDNESS

KIN, KINDRED, KINSHIP.—'The antique conception of kinship is participation in one blood, which passes from parent to child, and circulates in the veins of every member of the family. The unity of family or clan is viewed as a physical unity; for the blood is the life,—an idea familiar to us from the OT,—and it is shared by every descendant of the common ancestor. The idea that the race has a life of its own, of which individual lives are only parts, is expressed even more clearly by picturing the race as a tree, of which the ancestor is the root or stem and the descendants the branches' (W. R. Smith, ES<sup>2</sup> 40 f.). This conception underlies the words 'kin' (γενετή, Mk 6<sup>3</sup>) and 'kindred' (γενεῖα, Lk 1<sup>16</sup>). But it was Christ's purpose to organize society according to another conception of the basis of unity. He made kinship depend not upon physical but spiritual affinities (Mt 12<sup>49</sup> etc.). 'Already, in the spiritual religion of the Hebrews, the idea of Divine fatherhood is entirely dissociated from the basis of natural fatherhood. Man was created in the image of God, but he was not begotten; God-sonship is not a thing of nature, but of grace' (ES<sup>2</sup> 41). There, however, the sonship of the nation is emphasized: in Christ's teaching the personal relationship is brought into prominence. Sonship depends on personal faith (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>), and its evidence is individual submission to the will of God (Mt 10<sup>24</sup>). In His allegory of the Vine (Jn 15<sup>1</sup>), Jesus practically adopts the old figure. He Himself takes the place of stem or root, but the branches share the common life only on condition of an abiding faith (cf. St. Paul's figure of the olive-tree, Ro 11<sup>17</sup> etc.). The ancient kindred of blood, with its narrow physical limits, gives place in the NT to a fellowship of faith which is open to all mankind. See also art. FAMILY.

W. EWING.

KINDNESS.—The NT term χρηστότης, which is rendered in the EV both by 'kindness' and by 'goodness' (once in Ro 3<sup>10</sup> as 'good,' following the LXX of Ps 13 (14)<sup>1-3</sup>, there quoted, in which χρηστότης = ἡ), nowhere occurs in the Gospels. The quality it denotes, however, is an evangelical virtue. Like its OT counterpart ḥesed, it is attributable both to God (as in Ro 2<sup>4</sup> et al.) and to man (as in 2 Co 6<sup>6</sup> et al.). The adj. χρηστός, EV 'kind,' is found once in the Gospels as referring to God (Lk 6<sup>35</sup>). The other instances of its use in very different connexions, as applied to a yoke (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>) and to wine (Lk 5<sup>39</sup>), though such use is a natural outgrowth of its root-meaning, need only be mentioned.

1. The Kindness of God in the Teaching of Jesus.—The passage in which God is explicitly represented as 'kind' occurs in Lk.'s version of the logion of Jesus concerning love of friends and hatred of foes (Lk 6<sup>27-36</sup> || Mt 5<sup>43-48</sup>). The highest reward attendant upon a love that extends to both friends and foes and is ready to show kindness to all men without distinction, is that thereby men become 'sons of the Most High.' 'Sons of your Father which is in heaven,' as it runs in Mt 5<sup>44</sup>, would appear to be the primitive phrase, but 'the Most High' (ὑψίστος) is quite a favourite name for God with Lk., and its substitution here is probably due to this preference (see Dalman, The Words of Jesus, Eng. tr. p. 199). God is kind to the ungrateful and wicked. In the Mt. parallel this benign goodness is expressed in the concrete picture of sunshine and rain bestowed equally upon the evil and the good, the just and the unjust. Clearly the expression of an all-embracing benignity can go no further so far as extent is concerned. The only enhancing possible is in connexion with the gift which betokens that be-nignity, and this we have in the great saying of Jn 3<sup>35</sup>, along with the same sweep of reference, 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son.' That fountal love is manifested in the kindness (cf. Tit 3) on which Jesus lays so much stress in His presentment of God as our Father, a kindness going far beyond the providential bounties and mercies of this life, and concerning itself with the profoundest needs of sinful men.

If explicit statements of the character of that now considered are not multiplied in our Lord's teaching, it is to be pointed out that the same conception of God is necessarily implied in a considerable group of the parables—those, in particular, that illustrate the Divine grace. The great trilogy of Lk 15, exhibiting the Divine concern for man as τὸ ἀπολλόμενον; the parables which show how royally and wonderfully God pities and forgives, whether that forgiveness is gratefully realized (the Two Debtors, Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup>) or is strangely disregarded (the Unmerciful Servant, Mt 18<sup>23-35</sup>); the parable of the Great Supper (Lk 14<sup>15-24</sup>), with its comprehensive 'welcome for the sinner'—these and other such are full of the wide-reaching kindness of God.

An OT basis for this conspicuous feature in Jesus' representation of God undoubtedly exists. Whilst God was supremely known in Israel as King, His fatherly relation to Israel is not obscurely dwelt upon in OT writings, particularly in the prophets (e.g. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Hosea). God's goodness and graciousness are gratefully celebrated in the Psalms; witness the refrain of Ps 107, 'Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness (יִשְׁבְּחוּ)!'. Stress on this Divine quality is the great characteristic of Hosea. Ḥesed is the bond uniting Jahweh and Israel in one covenant relation: the Ḥesed of J<sup>h</sup> to Israel being His grace, of Israel to J<sup>h</sup>, piety; and of Israelite to Israelite, love and mutual consideration. Love to J<sup>h</sup> and love to one's brethren are identical (cf. Hos 4 and 6-9), and both are made imperative by a right sense of J<sup>h</sup>'s fatherly affection and kindness towards His people (see W. R. Smith, The Prophets of Israel, p. 160 ff.). This line of thought, however, regarding God was arrested in later Judaism; God's transcendent kingly greatness was emphasized in Jewish thought in our Lord's time, and His grace and loving-kindness had fallen into the background. Jesus deliberately chose this conception of fatherly kindness as the one predominant characteristic in His revelation of God, and, what is more, proclaimed this gracious God as the Father of all mankind.

No difficulty need be raised as to the reconciliation of such a conception of God with His character as 'Rex tremendæ majestatis,' or as the holy God who cannot regard wickedness with indifference. That God is gracious does not mean that He is an easy-going God. Moral distinctions cannot be obliterated. Though in Christ's simple language God sends sunshine and rain upon the unjust, though He is kind to the ungrateful and wicked and they enjoy great prosperity, it cannot be other than an evil thing to be unjust, ungrateful, and wicked. And even though such blessings should appear to be withheld from the just and good, it still must be an altogether good thing to be just and good. Is it not significant that Jesus declares God's kindness without any qualification whatever, and shows Himself all unconscious that any difficulties are thereby occasioned, that there is anything requiring to be explained and adjusted? The parable of the Unmerciful Servant displays God's benignity; but the truculence which shows itself unaffected by an amazing experience of forgiving mercy must needs lose the boon which that benignity bestowed. The conclusion of the parable (Mt 18<sup>35</sup>) expresses what must needs be; and Jesus presents the doom of the 'wicked servant' as a picture of God's dealings with men just as directly and simply as He sets forth the kindness of our Father in heaven. The one presentation is perfectly consistent with the other.

Similarly, the problem of suffering and misery, which times without number has evoked the cry 'Is God good?', is not allowed by Jesus to qualify in any way His declaration of the kindness of God. It is not because He ignored the problem; He is Himself conspicuous as the Sufferer. And with our Lord the Divine kindness is not involved in doubt, because, as we say, God permits so much suffering amongst men, but rather that kindness is represented by Him as specially called forth by human misery. God is particularly set forth as viewing the sufferings and sorrows of men with compassion and pity; and pity is simply kindness brought into relation to suffering, and distress. God declares Himself 'most chiefly in shewing mercy and pity' (Collect for 11th Sunday after Trinity). So also it is significant that in enforcing the lesson of Lk 6<sup>35</sup>, Christ does not say, 'Be ye kind, as your Father is kind,' but (v. 36), 'Be ye compassionate, as your Father is compassionate' (ἐλεητικός). And what a vast deduction from the sum of human misery would result, and how the problem would be simplified, if everywhere 'man's inhumanity to man' gave place to such a spirit!

2. Kindness as the Law of Human Life.—'Love one another' is the new commandment of Jesus (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>); and kindness is love in its practical manifestation. From what has been said above, we see that this great law of life is directly enforced by the exhibition of the loving-kindness of God our Father. This is the case notably in the comment of our Lord on the dictum, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thine enemy' (Mt 5<sup>43-48</sup>).

The ideal of a relation of kindness between man and man is, however, not altogether an original and peculiar feature in our Lord's teaching. In the OT (as, e.g., in Hosea) Ḥesed is presented as the right characteristic of human relationships, even as it notes God's graciousness to men; and as a term belonging to common life it indicates that 'those who are linked together by the bonds of personal affection, or of social unity, owe to one another more than can be expressed in the terms of legal obligation' (W. R. Smith, op. cit. p. 161). And Jesus quotes Hos 6 with approval, 'I desire mercy (Ḥesed) and not sacrifice' (Mt 12)—a passage which makes that quality of kindness of greater importance than worship, and worship vain without it. In heathen religions and philosophies, too, ideas are found corresponding more or less to such a conception of the social bond.

Further, it is true that our Lord very emphatically insisted on the application of the principle of kindness as a law of life to relations of men with men in general, and not merely those of co-religionists and people of the same tribe or country. What can equal the parable of the Good Samaritan as helping to a definition of the 'neighbour' to whom the service of kindness is due?

Yet the OT and other forms of teaching are not without traces of a wider view than the scribes of Christ's day would allow. The duty of kindness to the stranger in the land (as in Lv 19<sup>34</sup>, Dt 10<sup>19</sup> et al.), and of kindness to enemies, with readiness in forgiving injuries (as in Ex 23<sup>4</sup>, Pr 24<sup>29</sup> et al.), is explicitly set forth in the OT. We get one glimpse (among many) of this wider humane feeling, from a very different quarter, in the Indian saying, 'I met a hundred men going to Delhi, and every one of them was my brother.'

Our Lord's exposition of this law of kindness is pre-eminent and sui generis. And the newness of His teaching in this respect appears in His having established this duty on a firm religious basis and given it 'an essential place in the moral consciousness of men' (Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, i. p. 332). It is significant that the judgment of men in Mt 25<sup>31-46</sup> is made to turn on the performance or neglect of the acts of mercy or kindness. The kindness inculcated, also, extends to all creatures; and it is to express itself in the little courtesies of life (Mt 12<sup>10</sup>).

A view of Christ's ethical teaching as a whole makes it clear that the stress thus laid on the duty of kindness favours no loosening of obligation to justice and fidelity in the manifold relationships of men, nor does it do away with the duty and need of punishment when that obligation is violated. The maintenance of just and faithful dealing does not necessarily involve severity and harshness; rather it is itself part of the law of kindness rightly considered. Love of neighbour and of enemy is as truly reconcilable with the claims of justice on the human plane as is God's benignity with His righteous government. And Christ makes us see once for all that love is the only satisfactory basis for human relationships, and indeed the only possible bond in the perfected social state. See also art. LOVE, NEIGHBOUR.

3. The Kindness of Jesus.—The perfect embodiment of this kindness in human life is seen in Jesus Himself. 'As I have loved you' is the Johannine counterpart (Jn 13<sup>34</sup> 15<sup>12</sup>) of the Synoptic 'as your Father is compassionate' in the enforcement of the Law of Love. The whole Gospel portraiture shows us that in Jesus the kindness and pity of God fully dwelt. His dealing with sickness and suffering in all forms, His attitude towards sin, His sense of social disorder, His regard for men as men and indifference to class distinctions, His whole demeanour, His gracious speech (Lk 4<sup>22</sup>)—all proclaimed the Divine kindness. His fiery denunciation of scribes and Pharisees (see Mt 23) presents no exception; for His wrath is the wrath of love, and the denunciation must be read in the light of the yearning lament over Jerusalem (Mt 23<sup>37</sup>).—Jerusalem in which Pharisaism and scribism were specially entrenched. The key to this perfect life of kindness and love is found in His own words:—'The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many' (Mk 10<sup>45</sup>). The declaration of vivid and loving remembrance is that He 'went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil' (Ac 10<sup>38</sup>).

J. S. CLEMENS.

KING.—The primitive Christian Church regarded herself as the vassal of Jesus Christ, her exalted Lord and King, under whose regal sway she had been brought by Divine grace (Col 1<sup>13</sup>). The current belief was that Jesus had been installed in His royal office by the Resurrection; in that event God had made Him both Lord and Christ (Ac 2<sup>36</sup>), and in it had been fulfilled the prophecy regarding the Messianic King, 'Thou art my son; this day have I begotten thee' (Ps 2<sup>7</sup>, cf. Ac 13<sup>33</sup>), as also another prophetic utterance, 'Sit thou at my right hand' (Ps 110<sup>1</sup>; cf. Ac 2<sup>34</sup>, Rev 3<sup>21</sup>). This sovereignty is indeed temporary; it will come to an end with the final overthrow of the enemies of God; 'Then shall he deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father' (1 Co 15<sup>24-28</sup>). It was the conviction of the primitive community that the idea of a Messianic kingdom upon earth—whether eternal (Lk 1<sup>33</sup>) or of limited duration (Rev 20<sup>6</sup>)—as it gleams through the Jewish Apocalyptic and in the earlier Messianic hope, had at last been realized in the Kingdom of Christ, i.e., the Church as subject to her exalted King.

Now the question which we seek to answer in the present article is this:—Did Jesus Himself in His lifetime put forward a claim to be the Messianic King? Here we light upon a problem which is vigorously canvassed among theologians, particularly at the present day. While there are scholars of high repute, such as Wellhausen and Wrede,* who deny that Jesus thought of Himself as the Messiah at all, there are others who are convinced that He was in possession of some kind of 'Messianic consciousness'; and among the latter the controversy turns upon the peculiar significance and the specific colouring of the implied claims and expectations. It is impossible in the space at our disposal to discuss the problem in all its bearings; for the details reference must be made to other works of the present writer.† The task of determining the sense in which Jesus assumed the title of King is all that meanwhile concerns us.

The prophecy regarding Jesus uttered by the angel Gabriel, 'The Lord shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end' (Lk 1<sup>32</sup>), was not brought to fulfilment in the lifetime of Jesus. But the writer of the Gospel of the Infancy in Lk. would hardly have recorded the prediction, had he not entertained the hope that its fulfilment was but a matter of time. It is beyond question that the earliest Jewish-Christian communities believed that Jesus would come again in kingly glory, as is acknowledged by the repentant thief upon the cross (Lk 23<sup>42</sup>, reading ὄραν ἔλθεις ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ σου as preferable to εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν σου). This belief appears also in the emphasis which the early churches laid upon the descent of Jesus from David (Ro 1<sup>3</sup>), and in the endeavours which were made to substantiate it by the construction of genealogical tables (Mt 1<sup>1-16</sup>, Lk 3<sup>23-38</sup>). These tables were not constructed for merely academic or theological purposes; they were designed to support the contention with which the Jewish Christians confronted their unbelieving compatriots, viz. that Jesus was the King of Israel. It is true, indeed, that in the primitive tradition of the life of Jesus, His Kingship is not explicitly asserted. The acclamations of the multitude on the occasion of the Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem, 'Hosanna to the son of David' (Mt 21<sup>9</sup>), 'Blessed is the kingdom that the kingdom of our father David' (Mk 11<sup>10</sup>), cannot have been more than a bold anticipation of the future. The crown of thorns (15<sup>17</sup>) was an act of derision, to the true significance of which the soldiers were blind; while the inscription on the cross (15<sup>26</sup>) was a prediction which Pilate, in opposition to the wishes of the Jews and in ignorance of what he was doing (Jn 19<sup>24</sup>), was constrained to set forth in all the great languages of the world. In point of fact the primitive tradition makes it perfectly clear that Jesus deprecated and even disclaimed the ascription of royalty, or at all events that He thought of the dignity as something to become His only in the future.

To the question of Pilate, 'Art thou the King of the Jews?' Jesus answers, according to Mk 15<sup>2</sup>, neither yea nor naï, but replies only in the words 'Thou sayest it.' Is this an affirmative? St. Mark certainly regarded it as such (cf. 14<sup>62</sup>), but St. Luke shows unmistakably that the words were not so understood by Pilate, since, if he had regarded them as equivalent to yea, he could not have said, 'I find no fault in this man' (23<sup>4</sup>): a claimant to the throne must necessarily have been convicted of sedition. St. John also indicates that Jesus at first replied evasively to the question (18<sup>34</sup>), but that afterwards He frankly avowed His claim to the title of King, though with the reservation that His Kingdom was 'not of this world' (18<sup>36</sup>). Even more clearly than in the Synoptists we see in St. John's account a definite purpose: he aims at showing that Jesus was no political usurper, no pretender to the crown, who designed by force of arms to deliver His people from the thraldom of Rome, and to reinstall the dynasty of David. Notwithstanding the obvious tendency of the writer of the Fourth Gospel, we must grant that in this instance his narrative, equally with those of the earlier Evangelists, is essentially faithful to fact.

That Jesus harboured no design of restoring the Davidic monarchy may be asserted without misgiving. To the policy of the violent, who would take the Kingdom by force (Mt 11<sup>12</sup>), He lent no countenance, and when, after the feeding of the multitude, they wanted to make Him a King, he betook Himself elsewhere (Jn 6<sup>15</sup>). We shall be asked, however, if He did not, on the occasion of His Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem, carefully organise and carry through a demonstration designed to further His royal claims. In answer to this it is to be said that St. Mark's account of the episode (11<sup>f</sup>) cannot be taken as historical; and we must either accept the narrative of Jn. (12<sup>12b</sup>), according to which the demonstration emanated from His supporters among the people and was only permitted by Him, and which weakens the impression of the incident by its quotation from Zec 9<sup>9</sup>;* or else we must abandon the hope of winning from the event any light for our theme at all. Had the Triumphal Entry been of such capital importance and of such a striking character as St. Mark represents, the authorities would certainly have intervened, and the matter would have figured in the trial of Jesus as a count in the indictment (but see ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM).

In the discourses of Jesus we find telling arguments, both positive and negative, in favour of the view that He either made no claim whatever to the title of Messianic King, or that He did so in a most unobtrusive way. To His descent from David, if He gave it credence at all, He did not attach the slightest importance; indeed, He even sought to convince the scribes that in regarding the coming Messiah as the Son of David they fell far short of the truth. To all appearance He desired to eradicate from the minds of His hearers the prevailing idea of a Davidic ruler, and to substitute for it another Messianic figure, viz. the 'Son of Man,' the 'Man' who, as Daniel (7<sup>13b</sup>) had prophesied, was to come in the clouds of heaven at the end of the age. This 'Son of Man' is no earthly monarch, but a Being of Divine and heavenly nature; not one who by means of a revolution rises from his native obscurity to a throne, but one who descends from heaven to earth. With such a figure dominating the outlook of Jesus, there is no place for a Messianic King. It is thus quite in keeping with these facts that He announces, not that God is about to send forth the Messiah, the Son of David, not that the kingdom of David is at hand, but that 'the kingdom of God is at hand.' The purport of this message has been dealt with elsewhere: † suffices it to say here, that the announcement of a cosmical catastrophe, of a new æon, in which the existing way of Satan shall be destroyed, and God shall be all in all, is intrinsically incompatible with the idea of a Messianic King standing side by side with the Most High. Nor do the prophecies of Daniel, when rightly interpreted, present us with the figure of a Messiah. Hence it is by no mere accident that in the utterances of Jesus the title 'King' is applied to God alone: cf. Jerusalem 'the city of the great king' (Mt 5<sup>35</sup>), the parable of the Unmerciful Servant (18<sup>23</sup>); and in particular, the parable of the Marriage Feast (22<sup>2f</sup>), where the Messiah appears as the King's son. It is only in the description of the Last Judgment (25<sup>31</sup>) that the 'Son of Man' appears as King—note the abrupt change vv. 34-40; probably, however, we have in this passage reminiscences of some older parable, which had to do with a king and not with the Messiah at all. Only on one recorded occasion (Lk 22<sup>29</sup>) does Jesus invest Himself with the βασιλεία, but that is for the future. This occurred, according to Lk., during the Last Supper,—a circumstance which leads us to infer that Jesus did not in any sense regard Himself as being a king in the days of His flesh. What He has in prospect here is simply a participation in the Divine Sovereignty, a prerogative guaranteed also to those who accept Him.

He believes, indeed, that He will occupy the chief place among them that are His; that He will take the seat of honour at table, having them on His right hand and on His left (Mt 20<sup>21</sup>); but of a Messianic Kingship in the ordinary sense of the word there is no suggestion at all. If Jesus deemed Himself to be the predestined Messiah in any sense whatsoever, He certainly thought of the Messianic office as being different from that of a king. See, further, art. MESSIAH. KING OF THE JEWS.—See preceding art., DIVINITY OF CHRIST (p. 477<sup>b</sup>), NAMES AND TITLES OF CHRIST.

KINGDOM OF GOD (or HEAVEN).—To learn what Jesus meant by the term 'kingdom of heaven,' or 'kingdom of God,' we must go first and chiefly to His own words. The simple fact that He employed a term which was in common use, and which had parallels also in the Jewish Scriptures (e.g. 1 Ch 28<sup>5</sup>, Dn 2<sup>44</sup>), does not justify one in assuming that His conception can be defined by the current view of His day, or by a study of the OT. It is plain that He might make use of the familiar term, but might put into it a new and higher meaning. Indeed, it is quite certain that Jesus, as a wise teacher, started from the beliefs and longings of those whom He sought to help, and that He aimed at fulfilling rather than destroying. We should expect, then, to find Him using old terms, but pouring into them new meanings. Moreover, the thought of Jesus in regard to the kingdom of heaven is presented to us more fully and clearly than is that of His Jewish contemporaries. Hence there is no occasion for approaching our topic indirectly, either by the way of the OT or that of the Rabbinic usage. It will be best to go at once to the main source of information, and seek the thought of Jesus from His own words, though availing ourselves of any light that can be found in other quarters.

A. Survey of the data.—According to Mk. and Mt., the memorable word in the first preaching of Jesus in Galilee was the announcement of the nearness of the kingdom of God [or of heaven] (ἤγγικεν ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ [or τῶν οὐρανῶν], Mk 1<sup>15</sup>, Mt 4<sup>17</sup>); and in the last interview with His disciples, on the evening before His death, He still spoke of the kingdom, anticipating a union with them there (Mk 14<sup>25</sup>). In all the interval between these events the term was frequently on His lips both in public and in private. St. Mark records 13 instances of its use by Jesus, St. Luke 34, and St. Matthew 48. Its central importance in the teaching of Jesus is frequently apparent. Thus the gospel itself is spoken of as the gospel of the kingdom (Mt 9<sup>35</sup>); the Twelve and the Seventy are sent out to announce that the kingdom is at hand (Mt 10<sup>7</sup>, Lk 10<sup>9</sup>); more than a third of the parables are explicitly said to be an unfolding of the truth of the kingdom; * the disciples are taught to pray for the coming of the kingdom (Mt 6<sup>10</sup>); it is the preaching of the kingdom of heaven that terminates the period of the Law and the Prophets (Mt 11<sup>13</sup>, Lk 16<sup>16</sup>); the kingdom is presented as the summum bonum (Mt 13<sup>43</sup>); and the kingdom is the great fact of the future (e.g. Mt 25<sup>34</sup>).

But while the kingdom is thus seen to be of great significance in the teaching of Jesus, it is equally obvious that its meaning varies widely in different passages. Thus Jesus says that the kingdom is to be entered at once by those to whom He is speaking (7<sup>13-14</sup>), and again, that the righteous are to enter it when the Son of Man shall have come in His glory (26<sup>24</sup>). At one time Jesus says to the Pharisees, 'The kingdom of heaven is among you' (ἐντὸς ὑμῶν),* and at another He teaches that it is the place where Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with all the prophets, rest and are blessed (Lk 17<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>28</sup>). Now the kingdom is thought of as something that can be taken away from the Jews and be given to the Gentiles (Mt 21<sup>43</sup>), and again, it is that for whose coming the disciples are instructed to pray (6<sup>10</sup>). The kingdom is thought of at one time as a good that can be obtained by seeking (6<sup>2</sup>), and as something to be slowly developed from within the soul (Mk 4<sup>23</sup>); at another time, as an event of the future, realized suddenly and by Divine power (8<sup>38</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>).

From this survey it is readily seen that the term 'kingdom of God (or heaven)' in the usage of Jesus is not easy to be defined; that it appears to be an elastic, poetic symbol rather than the vehicle of a single sharply-bounded conception.

2. The original form of the expression.—With the exception of two passages in Mt. which speak of the kingdom without any qualifying word (Mt 8<sup>12</sup> 13<sup>28</sup>), and three passages in which the kingdom (always thought of as future) is spoken of by Jesus as 'His' (or 'My') kingdom (Mt 13<sup>44</sup> 16<sup>28</sup> Lk 22<sup>29</sup>), His usage fluctuates between 'kingdom of heaven' and 'kingdom of God,' the former greatly predominating in Matthew, and the latter being the exclusive term in Mark and Luke. It seems probable that the term ordinarily used by Jesus was 'kingdom of heaven,' and that for the following reasons.

(1) It is the prevailing term in the Logia of Matthew, and the Logia, unlike the Gospels of Mark and Luke, are regarded as directly Apostolic. (2) The presumption is that Jesus used a current Jewish term, and 'kingdom of heaven' has a distinctly Jewish colouring, which does not belong to the term 'kingdom of God.' For the Greek word for 'heaven' in this phrase is a plural (οὐρανῶν) in accordance with the Hebrew usage (שָׁמַיִם), but contrary to the Greek. And, further, the expression 'kingdom of heaven' accords better with the popular Jewish belief that the kingdom of the Messiah was to come from above. (3) The originality of the term 'kingdom of heaven' is favoured by the consideration that the Second and Third Evangelists, since they wrote for Gentile readers, may more readily be thought to have modified a Jewish expression than that the author of the Logia, who wrote for Jews, modified the term used by Jesus.†

But, while there is therefore every reason to conclude that Jesus ordinarily used the term 'kingdom of heaven,' we certainly are not justified in saying that He did this to avoid speaking the Divine name (cf. O. Holtzmann, The Life of Jesus, pp. 163, 164; Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, p. 92, Eng. tr.). It is impossible to suppose that the man who called God His Father, and who felt that God was always with Him, the man who brought God near to His disciples and convinced them that He numbered the hairs of their heads, that they could approach Him at any time without priest or outward sacrifice,—that such a man shared the superstitious regard for the Holy Name. If Jesus habitually used the term 'kingdom of heaven,' which we believe to have been the case, He probably did so because that was the name in common use among His hearers.

3. Fundamental thought of the term.—To ascertain the central idea of the term 'kingdom of heaven,' as used by Jesus, we may well begin with a passage in which He seems to give a general interpretation of it, viz. the second and third petitions of the Lord's Prayer, 'Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth' (Mt 6<sup>10</sup>). The second of these petitions appears to explain the first. It seems to imply that, where the will of God is done, there the kingdom of God has come. That will is thought of as being done perfectly in heaven; and when it is done thus on earth, then the kingdom of heaven is realized. Accordingly this passage suggests that the fundamental idea of 'kingdom of heaven' is the rule of God.

Another passage which, though not using the word 'kingdom,' seems to throw light on the conception of Jesus, is that which records His answer to those who, while He was teaching on a certain occasion, told Him that His mother and brothers desired to see Him (Mk 3<sup>31-35</sup>). He said, 'Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother.' But if these people who sat around Him, listening to His word, were owned as His kindred, it is reasonable to think that what made them His kindred made them also members of His kingdom. And that which brought them near to Him was the doing of God's will—the very thing which in the Lord's Prayer seems to explain the term 'kingdom.'

In line with the thought of these two passages which have been considered, is the conception of a considerable number of important sayings of Jesus concerning the kingdom. Thus, in the Sermon on the Mount, He told His hearers to seek the kingdom and the righteousness of their heavenly Father (Mt 6<sup>33</sup>). Here, as in the Lord's Prayer, the kingdom is something to be desired and sought. It is contrasted with food and drink and clothing,—things that the Gentiles seek,—and is thus characterized as an inward and spiritual good. We may then regard the word 'righteousness' as giving here the dominant thought of that kingdom which is to be sought. Not otherwise are we to understand the word in that passage which deals with the young scribe who answered Jesus discreetly (Mk 12<sup>34</sup>). The Master told him that he was not far from the kingdom of God. Now, in these words He was obviously characterizing the moral and spiritual state of the young man; and thus the content of the term 'kingdom' is here moral and spiritual. So in the parable of the Automatic Earth. As it is the function of the earth to carry forward the development of the seed lodged in it, so by analogy it is the function of the heart to develop the kingdom of heaven (4<sup>26-29</sup>). Manifestly, then, the kingdom is here thought of as a spiritual principle to be received into the heart.

Another passage in which the content of the term is virtually indicated by Jesus is the reply which He gave to the question of certain Pharisees. They asked Him when the kingdom of God should come, and He replied: 'The kingdom of God is in the midst of you' (Lk 17<sup>21</sup>). That is to say, the kingdom is already present, already an accomplished fact. It had not come with outward show and noise, but quietly and naturally. There seems to be only one way of understanding this remarkable utterance, for the view that it refers to the future, and means that the kingdom will come as a surprise, rests on the identification of the coming of the kingdom with the Parousia of the Son of Man (see Wernle, The Beginnings of Christianity, I, 62). But this identification cannot be made, for the Parousia will have the very characteristic which Jesus here denies to the coming of the kingdom. It will be 'with observation' (μετὰ παρατηρήσεως; see, e.g., Mk 13<sup>24-26</sup>). We must hold, then, that the utterance of Jesus had a present force, and must find the justification of it in His own experience. He was conscious that the kingdom was realized in His own heart, and was begunning to be realized in His disciples. Thus this passage falls into line with those in which Jesus suggests that He meant by the term 'kingdom of heaven' an inner spiritual fact, viz. the rule of God in the heart.*

Now these passages which have been considered present a conception of the kingdom of heaven which Jesus unquestionably entertained. That this conception was central in His usage, and must be called the fundamental content of the term 'kingdom of heaven,' is seen from the following considerations. (a) It is the only explanation of a number of most important passages which is suggested by Jesus Himself. (b) It is an explanation in perfect harmony with the other teaching of Jesus. For that teaching, as seen, for instance, in the Sermon on the Mount, is inward and spiritual; and such is the thought of the 'kingdom of heaven' as the rule of God in the heart of man. (c) The Fourth Gospel, with the exception of two passages (2<sup>3-8</sup> 18<sup>36</sup>), does not employ the term 'kingdom of heaven'; but the term which it does employ, where the Synoptics have 'kingdom of heaven,' is the equivalent of 'kingdom' in the sense of God's rule. This term is 'eternal life.' That is the summum bonum in John, as the kingdom of heaven is in the early Gospels (Jn 4<sup>14</sup> 5<sup>24</sup> 6<sup>40</sup> 10<sup>28</sup>). This eternal life, like the kingdom of heaven, is bound up with the personality and mission of Jesus (4<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>27</sup>). Again, like the rule of God in the Synoptics, the gift of eternal life in John is both for the present and for the future (4<sup>18</sup> 12<sup>25</sup>). Therefore we say that this early interpretation of the Gospel which we have in John helps to confirm the view that the fundamental conception of the term 'kingdom of heaven' in the mind of Jesus was the rule of God. (d) And, finally, the correctness of this view is established by the fact that, while the Synoptics use the term 'kingdom of heaven' in various other senses, these are all secondary to the thought of God's rule, and are derived from it. This will be shown in the next section.

4. Special uses of the term.—(a) There is a group of passages in which the term 'kingdom of heaven' evidently denotes a company of men. This is the prominent thought of the expression when Jesus says that he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than John the Baptist (Mt 11<sup>11</sup>); also in the parables of the Tares and the Drag-net (13<sup>24-30</sup> 47<sup>25</sup>). The tares are the sons of the evil one, and at the end of the present age they are to be gathered out of the kingdom. They are therefore in the kingdom up to that time. To be gathered out of the kingdom means to be separated from the sons of the kingdom. The interest of the parable centres in the teaching that these two classes—the sons of the kingdom and the sons of the evil one—must remain intermingled until the end of the age. Hence it is obvious that the kingdom out of which the 'stumbling-blocks' are to be taken is the company of those who inwardly belong to God.

Now, while the foremost thought in these passages is that of a certain company of persons, these persons cannot be defined without the aid of the thought of God's rule. They are the persons who are under that rule, or at least claim to be under it.

(b) A second special use of the term 'kingdom of heaven' is presented in the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard (21<sup>45</sup>). Jesus said to the Jews at the close of the parable, 'The kingdom of God shall be taken away from you, and shall be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof.' In this case 'kingdom' cannot mean the rule of God, for these Jews were hostile to this, and obviously it cannot mean those who are under the Divine rule. We take it in the sense of the high privilege and blessing which the Jews had enjoyed as God's peculiar people. It was these things which were actually taken from the Jews when the gospel of Jesus was freely proclaimed to the Gentiles. Another passage which may well be assigned to the same category is the first Beatitude (5<sup>3</sup>). The poor in spirit are blessed because 'theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' It is now theirs. They experience its blessing by virtue of the fact that they are poor in spirit. They will doubtless experience it in much larger measure in the future, but they have a foretaste of the experience now. In like manner they who hungered after righteousness began to be 'filled' by Jesus at once: the satisfaction of their longing was not deferred to a distant future. Again, as purity of heart brought a vision of God to Jesus, even in His earthly life, we cannot doubt that the promise of His beatitude for the pure in heart was a promise not merely of a future good, but of a good to be enjoyed in some measure here and now.

* The AV and RV rendering of ἐν τῷ καρδίᾳ, viz. 'within you,' is sanctioned by general usage and by the context (see Godet, Com. in loc.) equally with the marginal 'among you,' in the midst of you, and possibly receives some confirmation from the 2nd of Grenfell and Hunt's 'New Sayings of Jesus' (see art. INRA [Lazarus], p. 770). But, if adopted, it falls even more readily than the other into line with Christ's teaching as to the spirituality of the kingdom.

(c) Another special use of the term 'kingdom of heaven,' and yet one that is easily derived from its fundamental idea, is found in a considerable number of passages. Thus Jesus said, 'It is better to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes to be cast into Gehenna' (Mk 9<sup>47</sup>). Since Gehenna stands here in contrast to the kingdom of God, it is obvious that the latter term denotes the place to which the righteous go at death. Again we read, 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven' (Mt 7<sup>21</sup>). It is plain from the following verse that Jesus is thinking of the end of the present age, and therefore the kingdom of heaven is here a synonym for heaven as the abode of the blessed. It is used in the same sense when Jesus says that many shall come from the east and the west, and sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven (8<sup>11</sup>); and again, in the parable of the Tares, when it is said that the righteous, after the judgment of the wicked, shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father (13<sup>43</sup>).

The prominent thought in these passages is the place to be occupied by those who are under the rule of God, rather than that rule itself. The kingdom of heaven in this sense alone is wholly eschatological. It belongs entirely to the future. Yet it is, by no means the Jewish apocalyptic kingdom even in these passages. It is open to Gentiles as well as Jews (8<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>29</sup>), and it is not a kingdom for this earth. It is where the spirits of the patriarchs are now.

Such are the special uses of the term 'kingdom of heaven' in the words of Jesus. No one of them furnishes a conception that binds the various uses together as does the idea of the rule of God.

5. The ideal of Jesus and that of the scribes.—Jesus' conception of the kingdom of heaven was not developed out of that of the scribes. It was the antithesis of that. The story of the Temptation marks the definite rejection of the popular idea. For there would have been no ground for the temptation of Jesus, in regard to the Messianic office, if that ideal which He put away as fundamentally evil had not been the ideal of His people. His ideal was born out of His own inner experience of the rule of God. Hence for Him the kingdom in its fundamental idea was something to be realized from within, quietly and gradually, by spiritual means. The scribes, on the contrary, looked for a kingdom to be realized from without, in a spectacular and supernatural manner. This is plain from certain references in the Gospel itself. Thus, when Jesus entered Jerusalem riding on an ass, and all the crowds shouted Hosanna, His disciples thought that He was now at last to set up a visible Messianic banner, and they hailed the coming kingdom of their father David (Mk 11<sup>33</sup>). Thus the establishment of the kingdom was associated in their minds with outward pomp. The disciples of Jesus, even after the resurrection, seem to have thought that the kingdom was to be set up in some miraculous manner, at any rate it was not to come through them (Ac 1<sup>6</sup>).

This idea of the kingdom is common also in other Jewish writings. Thus, e.g., in the Psalms of Solomon we read that the Messiah will destroy the ungodly nations by the breath of His mouth, and He alone will establish the kingdom (17<sup>23-26</sup>). Of the same purport is the teaching of the Talmud. Deliverance by the Messiah, like the deliverance of Israel by Moses, is to come from without, miraculously, and not at all from within. The Jews who are alive at the coming of the Messiah seem to have no more to do with the establishment of the kingdom than the Jews who are dead, and who at the beginning of the Messianic age are raised up to enjoy the kingdom (see Weber, Jüd. Theol.<sup>3</sup> pp. 347-354; Hilgenfeld, Die jüd. Apokalyphtik, p. 86).

Again, the popular conception of the kingdom of heaven in the time of Jesus was thoroughly political and national. This is made plain by the Gospel. Thus, e.g., the third temptation of Jesus presupposes that people thought of the kingdom as a political organism. For the suggestion that Jesus might secure all the kingdoms of the world and their glory—He a carpenter from the little town of Nazareth, poor and as yet without a follower—would have been psychologically impossible, had not the popular view associated world-wide political dominion with Messiahship; and it would not have been a temptation of any power to the mind of Jesus, had it not been deeply rooted in the Jewish heart, and had it not seemed to have strong support in the OT itself.

The Fourth Evangelist tells us that after the miracle of feeding the five thousand, Jesus perceived that the people were about to make Him king (Jn 6<sup>15</sup>). This word is capable only of a political meaning in this place, and therefore shows that the Galilean idea of the kingdom was political. The character and strength of the popular view are seen in the request of Salome, seconded by James and John (Mk 10<sup>37</sup>), and in the question of the disciples who, after the resurrection, asked the Lord if He would now restore the kingdom to Israel (Ac 1<sup>6</sup>).

In utter contrast to this view, the fundamental conception of Jesus was, from the first, non-political and universal. The rule which He contemplated was, primarily, the rule of God in the heart, a rule which He doubtless thought of as transforming the entire outward life, social and political, and as bringing it into harmony with the Divine rule, though on this consequence of the inner rule of God He gave no explicit teaching. He dwelt on the fundamental spiritual fact of God's rule in the heart. If at times He used the word 'kingdom' in the sense of the company of men who were under the rule of God, He did so without a suggestion of any political organization. And when by the 'kingdom of heaven' Jesus meant the full realization of His ideal in the future age, it is manifest that His conception is wholly religious in character and universal in its scope. Men enter the kingdom from the east and the west—all who have shown the spirit of Jesus; and what they inherit is eternal life (Mt 8<sup>11-12</sup> 25<sup>34</sup>).

We conclude, then, that just as Jesus derived His conception of God from His own experience, so it was from His experience of the rule of God that He developed His teaching about the kingdom of heaven. This teaching was akin to the spiritual views of the great prophets, but was wholly unlike that of the scribes of His day. See also art. ESCHATOLOGY, p. 528 ff.

KISS.—Originally a token of affection belonging to the intimate conditions of family life, but extended to more general relationships.

1. To kiss the hands is the expression of respect towards seniority and higher rank. Children in Oriental homes are taught to rise at the entrance of visitors and salute in this way. It is also their first form of greeting to parents and adult relatives before being kissed on the lips and cheek by them. When two sheikhs meet they kiss each other's hands in recognition of the rank held by each. Kissing the hand, or making an attempt to do so, often occurs when one person receives a commission from another or undertakes to do some work for him. The feeling of respect originating in the relationship of child to parent is extended to that of employed and employer.

With regard to the salutation of Judas Iscariot (Lk 22<sup>47-48</sup>), to have kissed the hand of Christ after the interval of absence caused by his conference with the chief priests would have been but an ordinary tribute of respect, and as such would have escaped the notice of the disciples, while giving the required information to those who had come with him. If, on the other hand, the kiss was on the face, it was an act of presumption for an Oriental disciple to take the initiative in offering to his master the salutation of equal friendship. The prodigal son, in meeting his father, would be described as kissing his hands before being embraced and kissed by the latter (Lk 15<sup>20</sup>).

2. Among those of the same age, and where the relationships of life permitted it, the salutation is given sometimes on the lips, but more frequently on the cheek or neck. For intimate relatives or acquaintances of the same sex to part for a time, or to meet after a period of separation without such salutation, would seem strained and unnatural (Lk 15<sup>20</sup>). In this form of greeting all thought of superior and inferior is lost in the equality of affection and identity of interest (Ac 20<sup>37</sup>). Such was the kiss of peace or salutation of good-will that prevailed for a time in the congregations of the early Church. It testified to the new bond of fellowship in the family of the firstborn, and was called a holy kiss (Ro 16<sup>16</sup>) as a reminder of Christian sainthood, and also a kiss of love (1 P 5<sup>14</sup>) made possible by the love that had given them such discipleship and communion.

KNEELING.—A comparison of the passages that refer to bodily posture seems to prove that kneeling is nowhere intended unless the word 'knee' (γόνυ) forms part of the expression. The word προσκύνειν, usually tr. 'worship,' always denotes prostration, not kneeling. Kneeling is referred to as—(a) A posture of homage. In this sense it was rendered to Christ in awe of His person (Mk 10<sup>37</sup>, Lk 6<sup>8</sup>), and in mockery of His claims (Mt 27<sup>29</sup>). There is no instance of Christ Himself paying this homage to any man. (b) The posture of a suppliant (Mt 17<sup>14</sup>, Mk 1<sup>40</sup>). In classical literature the suppliant kneels and touches the knees, or beard, of the person applied to. (c) A posture of prayer. Lk 22<sup>31</sup> is the only instance of this in the Gospels. Among the Jews the usual custom (and in the Temple and synagogues at ordinary times the invariable custom) was to stand at prayer (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>, Mk 11<sup>23</sup>, Lk 9<sup>28-29</sup>, 18<sup>13-15</sup>, 22<sup>28</sup> etc.). The prayers of Solomon (1 K 8<sup>54</sup>—2 Ch 6<sup>12</sup>) and Ezra (Ezr 9<sup>8</sup>), both offered kneeling in the Temple, are altogether exceptional. Beyond general (and ambiguous) expressions, e.g. Ps 95<sup>7</sup>, Is 45<sup>2</sup>, any references to particular cases of kneeling are very rare in the OT (cf. Dn 6<sup>10</sup>). In the Jewish Church, Solomon's prayer is the only instance prior to the Captivity. In the Christian Church, instances multiply after Pentecost (Ac 7<sup>90</sup>, 9<sup>20</sup>, 20<sup>38</sup>, 21<sup>5</sup>). This may have been due in some measure to Hellenistic and Gentile influences. In 1 Ch 29<sup>30</sup> LXX there is an alteration of 'heads' to 'knees' bowed. The description given in Lk 22<sup>31</sup> (not supported by ll) occurs in a Gospel of Gentile authorship; and Gentile connexions are found in all except one (Ac 9<sup>40</sup>) of the NT passages already quoted. If this supposition is correct, the spread of kneeling as a posture of prayer has an interesting association with the change from a national to a universal religion.

KNOCKING.—The guarding of the Oriental house-door led to the more elaborate precautions with regard to entrance by the city gate.

1. During the daytime any unannounced approach is felt to be unneighbourly, and open to suspicion. It is regarded as an act of thoughtlessness or implied contempt to ride up to a Bedawi tent from behind. The privacy of domestic life forbids a visitor from entering even the walled enclosure round the house, without first knocking and asking permission. He must wait until his call is heard, and the bar of the door or gate, if closed, has been removed by a member or servant who can conduct him into the house.

2. It is, however, at night that the difficulty is greatest. The family have retired together into a room with closed doors, and on account of the habit of sleeping with the coverlet drawn over the head they usually are unable for a time to hear the sound of knocking at the door. In the still, elastic air it is also difficult to localize the sound. In this way one is often disturbed by the loud persistent knocking and summoning by name resorted to by a neighbour who has returned late at night to his house (Lk 12<sup>36</sup>). The large wooden key of ancient times was too cumbersome to carry about, so that even one who had the right to enter, or was sure of being welcome, had to wait outside until the door was opened (Ac 12<sup>10</sup>). It was to those already familiar with such obstacles and the way of overcoming them that Christ said with regard to a higher entrance, 'Knock, and it shall be opened unto you' (Mt 7<sup>7-8</sup>); cf. Rev 3<sup>20</sup> 'Behold, I stand at the door, and knock.'
