BUSHEL (β μέτρον, Mt 5<sup>9</sup>, Mk 4<sup>2</sup>, Lk 11<sup>38</sup>—a Lat. word with a Gr. form).—The Roman modius, equal to 16 sextarii, or approximately one English peck, was not a measure in common use in Jewish households. Although the definite article is probably generic ('the bushel,' so RV), the measure which would lend itself naturally to our Lord's illustration, and that to which He actually referred, was the Hebrew seah measure used by the housewife in preparing the daily bread. While the seah measure varied in size according to locality, it is generally regarded as being equal to one modius and a quarter, though Josephus (Ant. ix. iv. 5) states: 'A seah is equal to an Italian modius and a half.'

To the influence of Roman customs was no doubt due the substitution of modius for seah in the report of the saying (Mt 5<sup>19</sup> etc.); and in like manner, since no importance was attached by our Lord to exactness of measure, the familiar 'bushel' of earlier English versions has been retained by the RV, although 'peck' would be a more accurate rendering.

The saying of our Lord is as picturesque as it is forcible. It gives us a glimpse into a Galilean home, where the commonest articles of furniture would be the lamp, the lampstand, the seah measure, and the couch. And who could fail to apprehend the force of the metaphor? 'When the word has been proclaimed, its purpose is defeated if it be concealed by the hearers; when the lamp comes in, who would put it under the modius or the couch of the triclīnium?' (Swete on Mk 4<sup>21</sup>).

BUSINESS.—1. The first recorded words of Jesus stand in the AV, 'Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?' (Lk 2<sup>9</sup>). This is the only passage in the Gospels where the word 'business' occurs, and it is not without some sort of regret that we are obliged to acknowledge the greater accuracy of the RV, 'Wist ye not that I must be in my Father's house?' The familiar rendering, however, finds a place in the margin; and indeed in this case, as in so many others, the AV well represents the inner meaning of the original words. Translated quite literally, the phrase (ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρὸς μου) means 'in the things of my Father': it denotes a person's property or estate, and is equivalent to our colloquialism 'at my father's,'—the whole stress falling on the idea of ownership,—and in this way it is fairly frequently used in Greek authors. The closest parallel in Biblical Greek occurs in the Septuagint translation of Est 7<sup>9</sup>, where 'in the house of Haman' of the RV is represented by the phrase ἐν τοῖς Ἀμάν, and it is clear that the gallows, fifty cubits high, must have stood in the precincts of the house, or on the estate, of Haman. (For other instances, see Excursus I. in Farrar's St. Luke in the Cambridge Bible for Schools, where a summary is given of the essential points from an important monograph on the passage by Dr. Field of Norwich: this monograph has been reprinted in Notes on the Translation of the NT, by the late Frederick Field, Cambridge, 1899).

The Latin Versions render the Greek phrase as literally as the language allows, and throw no light on the interpretation. The Sinaitic Syriac has the suggestive paraphrase, 'Wist ye not that I must be with my Father?' The idea of a sympathetic relation with God is indeed of the essence of the passage; perhaps we can best render it by borrowing from the symbolical language of the parables, 'Wist ye not that I must work in my Father's vineyard?'

A passage of Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv. xxiii. 148) affords an interesting parallel to the translation of the Sinaitic Syriac just quoted: 'For the dispensation of creation indeed is good, and all things are well arranged, nothing happens without a reason; in the things that are Thine must I be (ἐν τοῖς τοῖς ἐλαί με θεῖ), O Almighty, and if I am there I am with Thee.' In another passage (Strom. vi. vi. 45) the phrase is used with an even wider application of the souls in Hades, Clement says that they are in the things (i.e. within the domain) of God. With this compare the teaching of the 'Elders' referred to by Irenaeus (v. xxxvi. 1): 'For this cause they say that the Lord said that in the things of My Father are many mansions. For all things are God's, who gives to all men the habitation that befits them.' Thus what in Jn 14<sup>2</sup> is called 'the house of my Father,' is by the substitution of the phrase τὰ τοῦ πατρὸς μου extended to mean the whole Universe, including, as the context shows, heaven, paradise, and the 'city' of the re-created earth. In Protrepticus, ix. 82, Clement seems to have the incident of Lk 2<sup>9</sup> in his mind as implying the complete consecration of life: 'But I suppose that when a man is enrolled and lives as a citizen and receives the Father, then he will be in the things of the Father.'

Godet (in his Commentary on St. Luke, ad loc.) points out that the phrase 'I must be' (δεῖ ἐλαί με) conveys the idea of an absolute and morally irresistible consecration to the service of God on earth. To the awakening consciousness of the child Jesus the Temple at Jerusalem was the symbol of the Father's dominion over all things; He said in effect to His parents, 'Ye ought to have sought me in the place where men are occupied with the things of God.'

These first recorded words of Jesus then set a standard by which must be tested every manner of life. How far is it possible for a life spent in business, with which a linguistic accident connects these words for English readers of the Bible, to be lived in the things of the Father, according to the teaching of His Son? As an aid towards reaching an answer to this vital question, let us see what we can learn, from our Lord's acts and words, of the attitude He adopted towards the business life of the time of His Incarnation.

2. At the next recorded visit of Jesus to the Temple, we find Him in conflict with men who conducted business improperly: those who bore rule there did not understand that they were ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρὸς. It is well known that St. John (2<sup>13-16</sup>) narrates a 'Cleansing of the Temple' as taking place quite early in the Lord's public ministry, while the Synoptists (Mt 21<sup>12</sup>, Mk 11<sup>15-17</sup>, Lk 19<sup>45-46</sup>) describe a similar event as occurring in Holy Week. It is at least possible that the holy zeal of Jesus was twice displayed in this manner; but if a choice had to be made, there would be strong reasons for preferring the chronological arrangement of St. John. Without entering into this question, however, we can simply study the attitude of Jesus towards those who conducted the Temple market. The traffic was of two sorts, the sale of sacrificial animals, and the exchange of money: in both cases it may well have been legitimate in itself, and even necessary: the sin was connected with its being carried on within the sacred precincts. It seems obvious that the Sadducean rulers of the Temple, whose cupidity was notorious, must have made money out of the business carried on there; no doubt the sites for stalls within the Temple precincts would command a good rent; and, further, if the animals sold there were certified officially as being unblemished and fit for sacrifice, while those bought outside were liable to a scrutiny on being brought into the Temple, it is easy to see how the privileged tradesmen may have gained an almost complete monopoly, for which they would willingly pay a high price. If the conjecture (see Edersheim, Life and Times, 1887, p. 367 ff.) that this Temple market was identical with the unpopular 'Bazaars of the Sons of Annas' is right, then the notorious Annas and his son-in-law Caiaphas had probably a direct interest in the trade carried on. It seems probable that the 'changers of money' (κεφαλαρια, Jn 24; κομιστρια, Jn 24; Mt 21<sup>12</sup>; Mk 11<sup>15</sup>) were the official Staltheim (Lightfoot, Holy Heb., on Mt 21<sup>12</sup>; Edersheim, The Temple, p. 70 ff.) who sat to collect the half-shekel for a fortnight before the Passover: they were allowed to make a charge on each half-shekel whether change was given or not, and Edersheim places their probable annual gain from this source at 25000. Very likely the ordinary business of exchange of money was carried on, as obviously no coins bearing images or idolatrous symbols could be offered in the Temple. Moreover, the mention by Josephus (J. VI. v. 2) of treasure-chambers in the Temple belonging to private individuals suggests that ordinary banking business, including the receipt of money on deposit, may have been made a source of profit, which would be enhanced by the security afforded by the sanctity of the place. These considerations have been put forward to show that it is likely that the ruling priestly faction turned to financial account the consecrated character of the buildings committed to their charge. Probably it was this making money out of holy things, rather than the ceremonial violation of the sanctity of the Temple, that caused the severity of our Lord's condemnation of the whole system which made His Father's house into 'a house of merchandise,' according to St. John's account, or in the stronger words of the Synoptists, into 'a den of robbers.' It is clear that Jesus would not suffer business to be carried on in a manner that interfered with the honour due to God: doubtless He would have applied this principle to the Day, no less than to the House, of His Father. The same lesson is taught in the parable of the Royal Marriage Feast (Mt 22<sup>1-10</sup>; cf. Lk 14<sup>16-24</sup>).

3. But the Son of Man, to whom nothing human was void of interest, in no way stood aloof from business. Himself a carpenter by trade (Mk 6<sup>3</sup>), He did not hesitate to tell the 'fishermen' Apostles that there was a likeness between their former worldly and their future spiritual vocation (Mt 4<sup>19</sup>; Mk 1<sup>17</sup>); the would-be disciple, who wished first to bid farewell to those at his house, was told that he might have learned behind the plough the need of concentrating his whole interest and attention on the task he had in hand (Lk 9<sup>62</sup>). Both before and after the resurrection (Lk 5<sup>27</sup>, Jn 21<sup>15</sup>) Jesus granted special revelations of Himself to the disciples while engaged in their usual occupations. In the command to render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's (Mt 22<sup>21</sup>, and parallels), we are struck by the business-like recognition of actually existing circumstances. Several of the parables prove how fully Jesus understood and entered into the business spirit, and show that, when consecrated by devotion to God, it is necessary to those who seek the kingdom of heaven. The merchantman who sold all that he had in order to buy one pearl of great price, gave proof of that confidence in his own judgment, joined with willingness to stake all upon it, which is indispensable to success in great mercantile ventures, and is said to be even now characteristic of the Jewish nation (Mt 13<sup>45</sup>, cf. 13<sup>44</sup> 'the hidden treasure'). In the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard the fulfilment of a contract is sharply opposed to the voluntary gift of money to those who had presumably been willing but unable to earn it (Mt 20<sup>1-16</sup>). A proper return is rightly expected from the ownership of land (Mk 12<sup>1-12</sup>, and parallels) and of money (Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>, Lk 19<sup>12</sup>). It is worthy of notice that the case just referred to of the 'unprofitable servant' follows in St. Matthew's Gospel directly after that parable which shows how unbusiness-like neglect to buy oil on the part of the foolish virgins led to their exclusion from the marriage-feast. The man who failed to make correct calculations as to the cost of building a tower is regarded as a fit object for mockery (Lk 14<sup>28-30</sup>). On the other hand, the unjust steward, who took advantage of his position of authority to make friends of his master's debtors, showed a business-like shrewdness which would have been of value if employed honestly in a good cause (Lk 16<sup>1-13</sup>).

4. A terrible warning of the danger of misusing business capacity is afforded, not in the imaginary story of a parable, but in the actual life of Judas Iscariot. St. Matthew (26<sup>14-16</sup>) and St. Mark (14<sup>10-11</sup>) connect the determination of Judas to betray Christ with the anointing of His feet at the feast in the house at Bethany. St. John, in narrating the same incident (13<sup>29</sup>), tells us that it was Judas who gave expression to the false idea that the giving of money to the poor was of greater value than personal devotion: 'Now this he said, not because he cared for the poor; but because he was a thief, and having the bag used to take away (επιστραφη, see Westcott in Speaker's Commentary, ad loc.) what was put therein.' Judas, no doubt on account of natural aptitude, had been made treasurer to Jesus and His disciples; he was vexed that so large a sum of money as three hundred pence had been wasted in the pouring out of the ointment instead of passing through his hands for the supposed benefit of the poor. Comparing together these different passages, it seems clear that St. John traced the fall of Judas, culminating in the betrayal, to the misuse through covetousness of his business faculties.

5. It can be, and often is, argued that the morality taught by Christ cannot be strictly and literally applied in the conduct of business. Probably the impossibility is no greater in the life of the business man than it is in the life of any one who tries to live as a consistent Christian. The main difference seems to be that in business practical morality is daily, and often many times a day, put to a test the extent of which can be estimated in money, and failure to conform to a high standard is easily detected. The business man is obliged to have a definite standard of practical morality, high or low according to his own character and the exigencies of his trade, and according to that standard he must act. Self-deception in his case is practically limited to one particular form,—which, however, is extremely prevalent,—that of attempting to separate personal from business morality. The ordinary non-business man, on the contrary, generally has a curiously vague and more or less ideal standard, and it is a very difficult thing even for a man of honest thought to settle how nearly he lives up to it. Business morality in a measure analyses itself, while the morality of ordinary life almost defies analysis: a comparison between the two is thus extremely dangerous, as they are practically incommensurable quantities.

Jesus Christ evidently believed that the moral and religious truths which He taught were capable of being applied in business. We have seen above that He severely condemned the Sadducean hierarchy, who may be taken to represent the capitalist class of those days at Jerusalem, because their business was conducted on wrong principles: they maintained merely ceremonial purity, and would not put the 'price of blood' in the treasury (Mt 27), but they did not shrink from making gain of holy things. This shows the uncompromising attitude of Christ towards what was morally bad. But there was a great difference in His manner of dealing with another typical class of business men, the Publicans. He did not follow popular opinion regarding their occupation as absolutely unjustifiable; He looked on their calling as a legitimate one, while demanding honesty in carrying it out. The Baptist had taken the same line, 'Exact no more than that which is appointed you' (Lk 3<sup>12</sup>). Zaccheus, for his charity and earnest desire to avoid extortion, is declared to be truly a son of Abraham (Lk 19<sup>9</sup>).

It is worthy of note that St. Luke places the parable of the Pounds in close connexion with the Zaccheus incident, as if to teach us that lessons of eternal value can be learned in business. The slaves are rewarded with ten or five cities, according to the capacity which each had shown in trading with his pound.

This brings us to the centre of the whole matter: the life of business is a legitimate one for followers of Christ so far as it can be lived 'in the things of the Father'; then it is a means of imparting training and of teaching lessons which can be used now and hereafter in the service of God. 'God has set you,' writes the Rev. Wilfrid Richmond (Christian Economics, 1888, p. 159), 'in the world with other men to learn, by mutual interchange of the means of life, the laws of love. Your wealth, whatever it may be, little or great,—the wealth you make, the wealth you spend,—is treasure, corruptible or incorruptible, treasure on earth or treasure in heaven, according as it is or is not, in the making and in the spending, the instrument of love.'

CÆSAR (Καῖσαρ).—In the Gospel record this name occurs 18 times, in 16 of which it answers to 'reigning emperor,' who in each case was Tiberius Cæsar; in the remaining two the more individual name is found,—in the one case Augustus (Lk 2<sup>1</sup>), and in the other Tiberius (3<sup>1</sup>).

The name 'Cæsar' was assumed by Augustus in 44 B.C., immediately after the tragic death of his grand-uncle, Julius Cæsar, being considered by him part of the inheritance left to him. We have Cicero's authority (ad Att. xiv. 5, 10, 11, 12) for saying that the friends of Octavius began to address him as 'Cæsar' within a week or two of the Dictator's assassination. Augustus himself soon gave evidence that he meant to gather up and concentrate on himself all the fame that was associated with 'Cæsar.' Not many years passed till he came to exercise a world-wide sway, such as the great Julius had never known. He handed on the title to his successors very much as we find it used by the writers of the NT, in the sense of the great ruler or Kaiser. His own name (Gr. Σεβαστός, Lat. Augustus) was quite familiar to them as applied to the reigning emperor (Ac 25<sup>21</sup>, 25, Nero). The fame of the first Cæsar had come to be overshadowed by the remarkable career of the founder of the Empire. The way was thus prepared for the still later development, when the title of 'Cæsar' was given to the junior partner of the two joint-emperors, and 'Augustus' remained the distinguishing name of the supreme ruler. In the Gospel record there is clear confirmation of the first part of this historical development, and there is at the same time no contradiction of the second.

In the majority of the cases of the use of the title 'Cæsar' in the Gospel writings, the question of paying the tribute has come up. This reveals the great change that had taken place from the time of the 'census' under Augustus, when 'everyone went to enrol himself in his own city' (Lk 2<sup>3</sup>), to that of the trial before Pilate, when the chief charge against Jesus was said to be 'the forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar' (23<sup>2</sup>). In those thirty-three years of interval the relation between the Roman power, as represented by 'Cæsar,' and the Jewish people, had undergone a radical change. Judæa had become a Roman province, and was under obligation to 'pay tribute' as well as submit to an enrolment of its heads of households. In perfect accord with this historical fact, St. Luke wrote (3<sup>1</sup>): 'Pontius Pilate being governor of Judæa,' with the tetrarchs for Galilee, Iturea, and Abilene, desiring to mark the period in the reign of Tiberius Cæsar when 'the word of God came to John in the wilderness.' The change came with the death of Herod the Great in 4 B.C. While Varus, the governor of Syria, was engaged in quelling serious outbreaks of rebellion in Jerusalem, the sons of Herod were in Rome waiting the decision of Augustus as to their conflicting claims. At length all parties were heard by the emperor in an assembly that met in the celebrated temple of Apollo, behind his own house on the Palatine. The imperial verdict, announced after a few days, upheld substantially the will of Herod. To Archelaus were assigned Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa—not as king, but as ethnarch; to Antipas, Galilee and Peræa as tetrarch; Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, Gaulanitis, and Paneas to Philip, also as tetrarch (Jos. Ant. xvii. viii. 1, xi. 4). The kingdom of Herod was thus divided into three separate territories after his death. As it was in Jerusalem that the question as to the tribute money was raised, our subject in this article has to do only with Archelaus. After some nine years of rule over Judæa, Archelaus was summoned to Rome to answer charges brought against him by a deputation of leading men from Judæa and Samaria. He was deposed and banished by Augustus to Vienne in Gaul in A.D. 6. His territory was put under direct Roman rule, becoming a part of the province of Syria, with a Roman of equestrian rank for its governor. An end was thus put to the uniform consideration for Jewish traditions and national prejudices shown by Herod and his sons. The first notable instance of this in history is met with in the rebellion of A.D. 6, on the occasion of the great census, while Quirinius was governor of Syria, which is referred to in Ac 5th. The tumult, with its accompanying bloodshed, must have been of no slight moment, when a quarter of a century thereafter Gamaliel could effectually use it in restraining the Council from slaying the Apostles. Between A.D. 6 and A.D. 30, whichever length of cycle for the imperial census be taken, there must have been at least another 'enrolment' for purposes of taxation. We do not read of a serious revolt having taken place then as in 6 A.D. The Roman authorities, no doubt, were better prepared for what might happen, and the Jewish people also had learned the fruitlessness of rebellion. As the time of Christ's public ministry approached, their spirit nevertheless became more and more embittered. It was inevitable that at some point or other in that ministry the question should be pressed upon Him, 'Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar or not?' (Mt. 22nd). It was one of the burning questions of His time. A distinction must here be drawn between the 'customs' or duties upon goods and the land tax with poll tax. The latter only passed into the 'Fiscus' or imperial treasury. With perfect accuracy, therefore, it could be described as 'tribute to Cæsar.' This tax was exacted annually, and as the Jews were not yet subject to military conscription, it formed the chief sign of their subjection to the Roman yoke. Officers of state collected it, the procurator for the tax in the case of Judæa being also the governor, Pilate. It was different with the 'customs,' which were farmed out to the highest bidder, thus creating that intense antipathy which is revealed in the phrase 'publicans and sinners.'

The tribute payment after all was based on the fact of the kingship of Cæsar. The combination of 'Cæsar' with 'king' sounds entirely unhistorical to one familiar with the rise and growth of the Roman Empire. 'King' was a term which Augustus was most careful to avoid from the time that it may be said to have cost the first 'Cæsar' his life. Among Eastern peoples, however, it was the most usual title for their ruler. During the long reign of Herod no name was more familiar to the Jews than 'king.' It was most natural for them to transfer it to 'Cæsar.' Any one claiming to be a 'king' within the wide dominion of Cæsar was seeking to establish a rival authority. This was the charge which they found it so easy to frame against Jesus when He and they were in the presence of Pilate: 'forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, and saying that he himself is Christ, a king' (Lk 23rd). No more powerful appeal could they have made to Pilate's fears, as they thought, than when they cried out, 'If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend: whosoever maketh himself a king, speaketh against Cæsar' (Jn 19th). The title on the cross, 'Jesus of Nazareth, the king of the Jews' (Jn 19th), as Pilate actually wrote it, served him better than their proposed modification, 'He said, I am king of the Jews' (v. 21). Should he ever be called in question by Cæsar for giving Jesus up to death, that title, written out by his own hand, would form an ample justification. The greater probability lies in the supposition that Pilate so named Him to spite the Jews, in accordance with those other words, 'Shall I crucify your king?' (v. 21). The whole attitude of Jesus towards Cæsar, not only in the question of the tribute, but throughout the trial before Pilate, must have entirely disarmed the Roman governor of any fear that He was, or ever had been, a rival of Cæsar's.

CÆSAREA PHILIPPI.—The town called Cæsarea Philippi in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 16th, Mk 8th, cf. Jos. Ant. xx. ix. 4, BJ III. ix. 7, VII. ii. 1) bore at one time, certainly as early as B.C. 198 (Polybius, Hist. xvi. 18, xxviii. 1), the name Panias (Πανιάς or Πανιάς), which is still preserved in the modern Banias. Situated to the north of the Sea of Galilee on a plateau at the southern foothills of Mount Hermon, it lay in the territory that Philip received from his father, Herod the Great. The place, as well as the surrounding country, received its original name from a cave or grotto in a hill near by, which was called τὸ Πάνειον, because sacred to Pan and the Nymphs. In the face of the cliff there are still several niches with inscriptions in which Pan is mentioned. From the cave (Mugharet Ras en-Nebâ), now partly filled with fallen stone, issues a strong stream of water which has long been reckoned one of the chief sources of the Jordan (Jos. Ant. xv. x. 3). On the hill above, Herod built a white marble temple in honour of Augustus (Jos. Ant. xv. x. 3, BJ I. xxi. 3), and here the Crusaders built a castle, the ruins of which still stand some fifteen hundred feet above the town, and about a mile and a quarter to the east (Kalât Subeibeh). Philip enlarged and beautified Panias, and called it Cæsarea (Καῖσάρεια) in honour of Augustus. The statement of Eusebius (Chron. ed. Schoene, pp. 146-147) that Philip built Panias, and called it Cæsarea, in the reign of Tiberius, is rendered improbable by coins which show that Cæsarea had an era dating from B.C. 3 or 2. To distinguish it from Cæsarea on the seacoast (Καῖσάρεια Σεράβωνος or Καῖσάρεια τῆς Παλαιστίνης), it was commonly called Cæsarea Philippi (Καῖσάρεια ἡ Φιλιπποῦ). Under Agrippa II. it received and bore for a short time the name Neronias (Νερωιάς, Jos. Ant. xx. ix. 4). The place has probably no part in OT history, since its identification with Dan (Smith, HGHL pp. 473, 480) is not certain (Buhl, GAP p. 238).

Into this region Jesus came with His disciples during one of His tours of retirement from the common scenes of His Galilean activity; but He does not seem to have entered Cæsarea itself. St. Matthew (16th, cf. 15th) tells us that Jesus came into the region (εἰς τὰ μέρη); St. Mark (8th) mentions more specifically and vividly the villages of Cæsarea (εἰς τὰς κώμας). In the territory of which Cæsarea was the chief city there were smaller towns, and it was through these that Jesus moved with His disciples and others who followed Him. St. Luke alone (9th) of the Synoptists seems to have lost the touch of local colour fixed so indelibly upon the narratives of Mt. and Mk.—an authenticating element whose force even those who question the Synoptic tradition at this point find it difficult to escape (cf. Wrede, Messiasgheimnis, p. 239). The narrative in Lk. lends itself, however, to the setting of Mt. and Mk., both by the way in which it is introduced without definite localization (καὶ ἔβητε ἐν τῷ ἄνω ἀβυθὸν προσενθύνασθε), and by the fact that in Lk.'s order it follows the feeding of the five thousand in the neighbourhood of Bethsaida. According to Mk 8th, it was from Bethsaida that Jesus went into the villages of Cæsarea, and in Jn 6th we read of a confession of Peter immediately after the discourse of Jesus in Capernaum, occasioned by the feeding of the five thousand. St. Luke's material may have come to him in the form of a group centring around a saying of Jesus, but without definite localization. By inserting it after the feeding of the five thousand he has preserved the historical order without, however, giving us the exact local setting. For this we must look to St. Matthew and St. Mark.

By our First and Second Evangelists the same group of events is not only connected with a place which lends peculiar significance to them, but set in a larger context which extends to the feeding of the five thousand. Mt. and Mk. alike represent Jesus' arrival in the region of Cæsarea Philippi as part of a course decided upon shortly after that event. The decision which led to the retirement into the region of Tyre and Sidon must have been confirmed by His experience on returning to Galilee. For Jesus withdrew again, this time going north into the region of Cæsarea Philippi. Located at Cæsarea and standing in the period of retirement, this group of events points back to the beginning of the period for the explanation of its characteristic features. The Gospels do not enumerate the causes which led to such a change in the scene of Jesus' activity, but their narratives do indicate a situation which will in a measure account for it.

But, besides change of scene, this group of events reveals, as do the earlier events of the period of retirement, a change in the method of Jesus' work. His retirement from Galilee is from the people and their religious leaders into more intimate companionship with His disciples, from His popular instruction of the multitudes and beneficent activity in their midst to teach His faithful followers in more secluded intercourse the significance of His own person for the Kingdom. He had been proclaiming, and to prepare them for His Passion. The period has fittingly been called, from its chief characteristic, the Training of the Twelve, and in no incident does this characteristic more clearly appear than in the events of Cæsarea Philippi.

The immediate occasion of Jesus' retirement from Galilee and the change in His method of work are indicated in Mt. and Mk. by their account of His attitude towards the traditions of the elders (Mt 15<sup>1-9</sup>, Mk 7<sup>1-23</sup>). The fundamental opposition between Jesus and the legalism of the Pharisees which had appeared in His attitude towards the Sabbath customs, and in the Sermon on the Mount, came now to sharp expression in His attack on the whole system of external formalism in religion. The people, moreover, had shown themselves unprepared to receive and unable to appreciate His teaching, even after the work of John the Baptist and His own labours in their behalf. And so the form of His teaching had changed from the gnomic to the parabolic, causing a separation between the mass and those who had ears to hear. How utterly the people had failed to comprehend Him is revealed by their attempt after the feeding of the five thousand to take Him and make Him king (Jn 6<sup>15</sup>). After His discourse in Capernaum (Jn 6<sup>26-27</sup>), St. John tells us that many of His disciples walked no more with Him (Jn 6<sup>66</sup>). Finally, the mission of the Twelve had widely extended His work, and shortly thereafter we are told that Herod (Antipas) heard of Jesus (Mk 6<sup>14</sup>, Mt 14<sup>1</sup>, Lk 9<sup>7-10</sup>). Bitter hostility from the religious leaders, failure on the part of the people to understand the character of His work, interested attention from the murderer of John the Baptist,—in the midst of such conditions Jesus withdrew from Galilee, and from His popular preaching activity, to devote Himself to His disciples.

Jesus' first retirement is into the region of Tyre and Sidon, part of the Roman province of Syria. Returning to Galilee, He feeds the four thousand, refuses the request of the Pharisees and Sadducees for a sign from heaven, with its evident Messianic implication, warns His disciples against the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees (so Mt 16<sup>6</sup>, Mk 8<sup>15</sup> has, 'Pharisees and Herod'), heals a blind man near Bethsaida (Mk 9<sup>32</sup>), and retires from Galilee for the second time, coming with His disciples into the region of Cæsarea Philippi.

The key to the situation at Cæsarea, its controlling idea, is to be sought neither in the confession of Peter nor in the promise to Peter, but in Jesus' announcement of His approaching Passion. To this Peter's confession leads up; around it Jesus' instruction of the disciples regarding Himself and the conditions of discipleship centres. The theme, moreover, becomes characteristic of His subsequent teaching (Mk 9<sup>21-23</sup>, 10<sup>32</sup>, 12<sup>7</sup>, 14<sup>8</sup> etc.).

St. Luke tells us that Jesus had been praying alone (9<sup>18</sup> cf. 32<sup>1</sup>), and that His disciples were with Him. St. Mark vividly locates the question that Jesus put to His disciples, as 'in the way' (8<sup>27</sup>). St. Mark and St. Luke agree in the form of the question, 'Who do men (Mk. oi άνθρωποι, Lk. oi ὄντες) say that I am?' St. Matthew, however, gives it in the third person, and introduces the title 'Son of Man'—'Who do men say that the Son of man is?'*. In either form the question is a striking one, by reason of the prominence it gives to Jesus' person. Emphasis until now had been placed by Him on His message and on His works of mercy, though both had stood in intimate relation to His person. He desires to know now what men think of the messenger.

The form given to Jesus' question in Mt. has been regarded as secondary, on the ground that by calling Himself the Son of Man, Jesus suggested the answer to His question in asking it. As a matter of fact, however, the answer is not given in terms of this title. In the Synoptic Gospels the title 'Son of Man' is always a self-designation of Jesus. Even where it appears in the Fourth Gospel in the mouth of others, this is in evident dependence on its use by Jesus (Jn 12<sup>37</sup>). St. Stephen's use of it also looks back to Jesus' words (Ac 7<sup>56</sup>, cf. Lk 22<sup>69</sup>), and the usage of the Apocalypse is probably to be explained by the influence of Dt 7<sup>18</sup> (cf. Rev 1<sup>13</sup> 14<sup>14</sup>). There can, moreover, be no doubt that Jesus so designated Himself during the conversation with the disciples at Cæsarea Philippi. The phrase occurs in Mk 8<sup>31</sup> and Lk 9<sup>22</sup>, but it is neither more adequately motivated than in Mt., nor is it explained. The disciples must have been familiar with it as a self-designation of Jesus, even if they did not understand its full significance. The way in which it is introduced both in Mt. and Mk.—Lk. makes it difficult for us to think that it was now used for the first time; and the Synoptic Gospels do indeed give earlier instances of its use (Mt 20<sup>13</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, 9<sup>12</sup>, 10<sup>32</sup>, 11<sup>19</sup>, 12<sup>32</sup>, 13<sup>32</sup>, 14<sup>21</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22</sup>, 10<sup>22</sup>, 11<sup>30</sup>). Dalman questions this order, regarding it as improbable that Jesus called Himself Son of Man at an earlier time (Worte Jesu, p. 216), and Holtzmann holds that if Jesus did so it was in a different sense (NT Theol. 1, pp. 257, 263). The Synoptic representation is self-consistent, however, in presupposing its earlier use, and this we must accept even while admitting that the meaning of the term cannot be fully determined apart from its usage here and subsequently, where it is associated with Jesus' suffering, resurrection, exaltation, and coming again in judgment. See, further, art. Son of MAN.

In answer to Jesus' question, the disciples report the opinions current among the people concerning Him. The report must have been discouraging. Not only was there variety of opinion, some thinking that He was John the Baptist (cf. Mk 8<sup>34</sup>), others Elijah, and still others Jeremiah (Mt 16<sup>14</sup>) or one of the prophets; but in the midst of this variety there was general agreement that Jesus, whoever else He might be, was not the Messiah. A forerunner of the Messianic Kingdom He might be, but not the Messianic King. His activity in proclaiming the Kingdom, whatever Messianic expectations it may have aroused, had resulted only in the popular recognition of His prophetic character, and in His association with the Messianic Kingdom in some preparatory sense. Manifestly Jesus was not the popular Messiah. His work, directed as it was towards spiritual ends, did not accord with the popular conception of the Messianic Kingdom. Moreover, Jesus had not spoken plainly in Galilee of His Messiahship. He had not assumed a popular Messianic title, and when individuals had recognized in Him the Messiah, He had commanded silence. His work, however, like that of John the Baptist, had excited interest, and called forth opinions which associated Him with the coming Messianic Kingdom. The report of the disciples so accurately describes the situation and so faithfully represents the tenor of popular opinion, that it cannot be regarded merely as the background sketched by the Evangelists for the purpose of bringing into sharp relief the confession of Peter.

In the Synoptic narratives the question of Jesus about the opinion of the people leads up to a similar question addressed to the disciples about their own, and the answer in the one case stands in sharp contrast to the report given in the other,—a contrast which is vivid and real because true to the historical situation. To the question addressed to the disciples, 'But who say ye that I am?' Peter answers, 'Thou art the Christ' (so Mk.; Lk. gives simply 'the Christ of God,' and Mt. 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God'). Unlike the people, the disciples had recognized in Jesus the Messiah, and to this conviction Peter gave brief expression. However inadequate may have been the content which Peter and his companions gave to this formal statement of their faith, it was a matter of great importance that they were able to affirm clearly, and in opposition to the opinion of the people, their belief that in Jesus the Messianic King had come. The readiness and decision with which Peter formulated the faith of the disciples are an indication that their faith, though now expressed in this form for the first time, did not originate here (cf. J. Weiss, Das altteste Evang. p. 51). Their very presence with Jesus at this time gave evidence of such a conviction (cf. Jn 6<sup>68f</sup>). In this faith they had answered His call to discipleship; in it they had associated with Him, heard His teaching, and seen His wonderful works; their appointment as Apostles implied it, as did their subsequent mission to Israel. They had seen opposition arise and develop into bitter hostility; but when Jesus withdrew into the region of Tyre and Sidon, and again into the region of Caesarea Philippi, they still accompanied with Him. They knew the popular opinion, but they still adhered to their own conviction.

The significance of Peter's confession, however, lies not simply in the fact that it gave expression to a deep and long-cherished conviction, thus evidencing the permanent, unchanging character of his faith; it had reference also to the future. It was made in answer to a question of Jesus which had as its occasion His intention to reveal to the disciples the necessity of His suffering. The faith of the disciples had stood all the tests to which it had been subjected in the past. Jesus, however, clearly foresaw a still greater test in the near future. In order to prepare them for it, there was need that definite expression be given to their faith. The revelation which was to be made to them would thus serve the purpose of clarifying the content of their faith. In Mk. and Lk. the confession of Peter is accordingly brought into close connexion with the announcement of the Passion. Mt. alone gives the words of Jesus to Peter (16<sup>17-19</sup>), not only confirming what we may infer from Jesus' reception of the confession (Mk.-Lk.), its essential correspondence with His own consciousness, but going further and giving us positive knowledge of Jesus' estimate and appreciation of Peter's faith.

Addressing Peter as Simon Bar-Jona,* Jesus declares him to be blessed in the possession of a faith which, transcending the human sphere of flesh and blood, has its origin in the heavenly sphere and from His Father. In thus describing the revelation-character of Peter's faith, Jesus does not define more nearly the process or time of origin, the psychological moment, but treats his faith simply as a definite fact of the past. Continuing with the emphatic 'But I,' Jesus makes Peter's confession the occasion of revealing His plan for the future, and the part that Peter is to fulfil in it. With the words 'Thou art Peter,' Jesus recalls the name He had given to His disciple and apostle (cf. Jn 1<sup>42</sup>, Mk 3<sup>16</sup>, Mt 10<sup>2</sup>, Lk 6<sup>14</sup>). The Greek Πέτρος, like the Aramaic כִּפְתָּא, means a rock, and suggests the idea of firmness or strength. In giving such a name to Simon, Jesus had looked beneath the surface and read the character of Peter in terms of motive and underlying disposition. A man of decision, he was full of energy and strength, a man of action rather than of contemplation, a natural leader; and if at times impulsive, rebuking his Master and even denying Him, he was in the one case loyal to his faith, however unwisely so, and in the other was following Jesus to be near Him when he fell. In maintaining and confessing his faith in Jesus, Peter had shown himself true to the character which Jesus recognized when He named him Peter. Upon this rock Jesus now affirms His intention of founding His Church: not upon any rock, and therefore not simply upon a strong and firm foundation, but upon this rock indicated by the name Peter. In the Greek the word for Peter (Πέτρος) and the word for rock (πέτρα) differ in form, but in Aramaic the same form was probably used. The Pesh. has kiphā in both instances (cf. also Mt 27<sup>10</sup>; in Mt. 7<sup>34</sup> šāā is used). The rock intended by Jesus to be the future foundation of His Church is Peter, realizing the character indicated in his name. The function thus assigned to Peter is indeed not apart from his confession, nor is the fact that he evidently spoke in a representative capacity to be overlooked. The address of Jesus, however, is distinctly to Peter, and it is his name that is interpreted. The confession which precedes is indeed closely related to the words of Jesus, but it cannot be understood as the rock-foundation intended by Jesus. In itself it furnishes the occasion rather than the ground of Jesus' promise. It cannot therefore be treated abstractedly as something separate from Peter, but must be regarded as a manifestation and, in its measure, a realization of the character which Jesus saw in Peter when He gave him his name. The content of Peter's faith, moreover, was entirely inadequate when measured by Jesus' conception of what His Messiahship involved. Much had still to be learned in the school of experience (Mk 8<sup>31f</sup>, 14<sup>68f</sup>, Lk 22<sup>31</sup>, Jn 21<sup>18f</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>9</sup>), but the character was fixed in principle. Jesus saw its strength, and chose the man for the work He had for him to do. The opening chapters of the Acts of the Apostles give some account of the way in which he accomplished his charge.

The figure of a rock-foundation, used to describe Peter's future function in the Church, suggests naturally a single rock underlying a whole structure, and not one stone among a number built together into a foundation (cf. Mt 7<sup>24c</sup>). Neither the figure nor the function thus assigned to Peter excludes the work of the other Apostles (Eph 2<sup>20</sup>), much less the work of Jesus (1 Co 3<sup>10c</sup>), which is clearly indicated in οικοδομησα. The figure describes simply what Peter, by reason of his strong, energetic character, and in view of Jesus' intention, is to be for the Church which Jesus will build. The idea of building a community or Church was familiar from the OT (cf. Ps 28<sup>5</sup>, Jer 18<sup>2</sup> 31<sup>4</sup> 33<sup>7</sup>), and recurs in the NT (cf. Mt 21<sup>42</sup>, Ac 4<sup>11</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>12c</sup>, Ro 15<sup>20</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>10c</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>20c</sup>, He 3<sup>10c</sup>). By the use of the future tense and the choice of the word meaning to build rather than to rebuild (δοκεδομησα, cf. Ac 15<sup>16</sup>), Jesus not only points to the future for the origin of His Church, but declares that it will be His own creation. It was expected that the Messiah would have a people and would rule over them in an organized community. The idea of such a community cannot have been strange to the disciples who had just confessed their faith in Him. It would have been strange had Jesus made no reference to His Church. By speaking of it He made plain to them that the idea was included in His purpose, and thus formed an element in His Messianic consciousness. The future founding of the Church is set by Him in evident contrast to present conditions, but the fact that this is included in Jesus' present purpose and thus made part of His Messianic work brings it into vital and organic relation with the present. His work had, indeed, not yet taken on its Church-form, but this was not due to the fact that the idea of such a Messianic community was foreign to His purpose. He thus encourages His disciples in the midst of popular disaffection and unbelief, by giving them assurance with regard to His intention.

The disciples had confessed their faith in Him, and He now tells them that however little promise present conditions may give of such a future, He will found His Church. And He will do this in the face of conditions which may seem to them to make such a future impossible. Instead of improving, the conditions will become worse. With His conception of the spiritual nature of His work and the consequent character of His Church, Jesus saw the necessity of His completed work and final exaltation in order to the full realization of His Messianic functions in such a Messianic community, and hence speaks of its building as a future event (Ac 2<sup>26</sup>, Ro 1<sup>4</sup>). It is not strange, therefore, that He speaks but seldom of His Church, and dwells on the ideas of the Kingdom, faith and discipleship, in which its spiritual character and principles are set forth.

The word ισχυρισα, regularly used in the LXX to translate ἰσχυρῶς (isachurōs), occurs frequently in the writings of St. Paul, but only here and in Mt 18<sup>18</sup> in the words of Jesus. Its authenticity has been questioned (cf. Holtzmann, Hdcom.; but, on the other hand, Kistlin in ZfKf s. 378), but its use has an adequate basis in the teaching of Jesus, and is naturally motivated here not simply by the confession of Peter, but also by Jesus' thought of the future, controlled as it is by the revelation of His Passion which He is about to make to His disciples.

So permanent and strong will be the structure built by Jesus on Peter, the rock-foundation, that the gates of Hades—a figurative expression used to suggest the idea of the very greatest strength, since they withstand all effort to force them open (Is 38<sup>10</sup>, Wis 16<sup>14</sup>, 3 Mac 6<sup>24</sup>)—shall not surpass (κατασχυρισει) it in strength.* Changing the figure and having the superstructure in mind, Jesus declares that He will give to Peter the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven. What he binds upon earth shall be bound in Heaven; what he looses upon earth shall be loosed in Heaven. The phrase 'Kingdom of Heaven' frequently takes the place in Mt. of the corresponding phrase 'Kingdom of God' in Mk. and Lk. Here it is to be understood not of the Kingdom which is in Heaven, but of that Kingdom which has its origin and centre in the Heavenly sphere, whence it receives its character as the rule of God and its determinative principles as moral and spiritual. This is the Kingdom which Jesus preached, whose coming He declared to be at hand, whose character and principles He expounded, and whose blessings He mediated. But while having its centre in Heaven, this Kingdom was to be realized upon earth, and, in its future manifestation at least, is associated closely with the Church. The authority which Peter is to exercise has reference to the Church, but the reciprocal relation between the Kingdom and its Heavenly centre is to continue in its future manifestation as Jesus had known it in His own experience and had declared it in His teaching. What Peter does as His representative in the Church which Jesus will build shall be ratified in Heaven. The keys of the Kingdom of Heaven symbolize administrative authority (cf. Is 22<sup>22</sup>, Rev 3<sup>7</sup>), and the phrase 'bind and loose' is another figurative expression in which the idea of regulating seems to be fundamental: in Aramaic the words 'aqar and shēra' mean to allow and to disallow (cf. also Mt 18<sup>18</sup>, Jn 20<sup>23</sup>). Both figures seem to have reference to the internal affairs of the Church, and are therefore not to be understood as descriptive of Peter's proclamation of the gospel, as if by means of it those who accepted the gospel message were to be received into the Church (keys) and loosed from their sins, and those who rejected it were to be excluded and so bound in their sins. The description of Peter's role in the proclamation of the gospel is given in the figure which represents him as the foundation-rock of the Church. The power of the keys and that of binding and loosing, however, are not only closely associated together, but they are separated from the figure of the rock, and together describe Peter's function in the Church and his relation to its internal management as that of an οικονομος. See also art. KEYS below, and 'Power of the Keys' in Hastings' DB, vol. iv.

In the command of Jesus to His disciples that they should tell no one that He is the Christ, Mt. not only joins again the narrative of Mk.-Lk., but rightly interprets the briefer form, in which they gave the command, by the words ὅτι ἀπὸς ἐστὶν ὁ Χριστός. The authenticity of this and similar commands, especially in the Gospel of Mk., has, indeed, been called in question (Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimnis); but the command is quite natural here, and cannot be regarded as having its origin solely in the general apologetic purpose of St. Mark. It has reference to the form in which Peter's confession was made, and to deny its authenticity would necessitate a complete reconstruction of the account which the Gospels give us of Jesus' life and work.

The climax of the scene at Cæsarea is reached in Jesus' announcement of His Passion. Both Mt. and Mk. signalize His words as the beginning of instruction on this subject (Mk. καὶ ἤρξατο, Mt. more specifically ἀπὸ τότε ἤρξατο, Lk. connecting the announcement directly with the command to silence, εἰπὼν ὅτι δεῖ τ. ὅ. τ. ἄ. πολλὰ παθεῖν). When Jesus became aware of the necessity of which He here for the first time speaks explicitly to His disciples does not appear clearly from the Synoptic Gospels. The Fourth Gospel indicates that He was not unaware of it from the beginning of His public ministry (Jn 2<sup>19</sup>, cf. 2<sup>22</sup>, Mt 26<sup>61</sup>). The Synoptic Gospels, however, give evidence that Jesus looked forward at an early period in the Galilean ministry to the time when He would be removed from His disciples (Mk 2<sup>20</sup>). Certainly the narrative here does not justify the inference that He now for the first time became conscious of the necessity of His suffering, any more than the question to Peter and Peter's confession justify the inference that Jesus or His disciples now for the first time became conscious of His Messiahship. The conditions of His ministry may well have influenced Jesus to speak of the subject to His disciples at this particular time. Foreseeing not merely the necessity of His suffering, but His near realization, He spoke to the disciples of it for the purpose of preparing them for the issue of His work and of clarifying the content of their faith. The necessity of which Jesus speaks is to be understood as moral rather than physical, since it sprang out of the nature of His Messianic work by which He was brought into conflict with existing conditions. But if faithfulness to His work involved suffering, the necessity of which He speaks becomes voluntarily conditioned by a willingness to suffer, and this finds its ultimate explanation only in the Messianic consciousness of Jesus. A necessity springing out of faithfulness to His work, and thus to Himself, is, however, not only moral, but falls within the Divine purpose; and Jesus evidently so conceived it, since in rebuking Peter He speaks of it as τὰ τοῦ θεοῦ. The idea of a suffering Messiah, if current at all at the time of Jesus, was certainly not a prominent feature of the popular Messianic hope. The traces of it which are found, moreover, do not explain the form in which it appears in the Synoptic Gospels. For here we find it closely associated with a resurrection and a glorious coming of the Son of Man in His kingdom.

However clearly Jesus may have foreseen His suffering, and however calmly He may have announced its necessity, the care with which He prepared for, as well as the actual result of, His statement, reveal plainly the fact that the idea was foreign and repugnant to the thought of the disciples. A Messiah, though in retirement, opposed by the leaders and unrecognized by the people, they could believe Him; but that He should suffer, and that in Jerusalem where as Messiah He should rather establish His kingdom, seemed to them incredible. Peter's action in rebuking Jesus sprang naturally and spontaneously from the limitation of his outlook into the Messianic future. The view which would exclude suffering from His future, Jesus, however, rejects not only as human in character and origin, but as opposed to the Divine purpose; so that Peter in urging it, however conscientiously, became for Jesus a tempter, a hindrance in His way.

In the words which follow Peter's rebuke, Jesus sets forth the conditions of discipleship, and points out that the way of the disciple in following Him, like His way in going to Jerusalem to suffer, involved not only suffering, but willingness to suffer for His sake—the voluntary taking up of the cross and following Him in the pathway of self-sacrifice. Emphasis is placed by Jesus on personal relationship to Him, revealing a consciousness on His part of His own supreme significance for the world of spiritual realities made accessible through Him and His message (cf. also Mt 10<sup>26f.</sup>). The fate of the soul, with its possibilities of spiritual life, is made dependent not on a denial of the will to live, but on a denial of the will to live for self and earthly gain. He who would be Jesus' disciple must seek his true and highest life-principle in self-sacrifice for Jesus' sake (cf. Gal 2<sup>20</sup>). Self-surrender to Jesus is made the principle of spiritual life, and as such it must be absolute, superseding even the desire for life itself. In stating such conditions of discipleship, Jesus reveals a consciousness of His own significance for men which transcends the present and partakes of the character of the truth which He proclaimed. Discipleship is thus drawn into and made part of that future in which He Himself was conscious of holding a place of highest authority. His words set the present in closest relation with the future, since its true worth will then be revealed. The relation which men sustain to Him now will then have its intrinsic value made manifest by His attitude towards them. 'For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, and with his angels; and then shall he render to every man according to his deeds.' This prophetic description of the future closes with these words: 'Verily I say unto you, There be some here of them that stand by, which shall in no wise taste of death, till they see the kingdom of God come with power' (so Mk; Lk. has simply 'till they see the kingdom of God'; Mt. more fully, 'till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom'). The words are prophetic, and describe an experience in which some of those then in Jesus' company shall share. The object of this experience is in Lk.-Mk. the Kingdom, or the Kingdom (having) come (Mk. uses the perf. part. ἐπαυξήσαν) in power. It seems thus to be conceived as a future but actually existing state or fact rather than event. In Mt. the same experience is described, but the fact of the Kingdom's presence is associated with or described in terms of the Son of Man's coming (ἐρχόμενος) in His kingdom. In their context the words seem to refer to the Messianic kingdom, and to describe it in one of its eschatological aspects. The disciples had just confessed Jesus, who called Himself the Son of Man, to be the Messiah, and He had declared that the Son of Man would come in glory. He now declares that some of those present will live to witness the coming of the Son of Man, the Messiah, in His kingdom; by which we may understand the establishment of His kingdom in power. This, however, was to be realized in the Church; for Jesus, in speaking of His intention with reference to the future founding of His Church, had not only indicated the close relation of the Church to the Kingdom of Heaven, the one being the future manifestation-form of the other, but also stated that He Himself would build the Church, thus directly revealing His power in it. It is therefore not unnatural to understand the 'coming of the Son of Man in his kingdom' or 'the kingdom (having) come in power' as referring to the establishment of His Church, its equipment with power through the gift of the Spirit at Pentecost, and its activity in realizing the Kingdom under His direction. Others seek the fulfilment of Jesus' prophecy in the Transfiguration, His appearances to the disciples after the resurrection, or specifically in the gift of the Spirit at Pentecost, or in the fall of Jerusalem, or still more generally 'in some convincing proof that the Messianic kingdom had been actually set up, as predicted by prophets and by Christ Himself' (Alexander, Matthew, p. 446).

WILLIAM P. ARMSTRONG.

CAIAPHAS (Καϊάφας; according to Josephus, 'Joseph Caiaphas') was appointed high priest of the Jews in or soon after A.D. 18, and held office until he was deposed by Vitellius about A.D. 36 (Jos. Ant. XVIII. ii. 2, iv. 3). He is referred to as the high priest in Lk 3<sup>2</sup> (with Annas), Mt 26<sup>3-7</sup>, and is mentioned along with Annas, John, and Alexander among the heads of the Sanhedrin in Ac 4<sup>5</sup>. The length of his rule, compared with the short periods allowed to his immediate predecessors, suggests that he proved a satisfactory and submissive agent of the Roman policy. By two of the Evangelists, St. Matthew and St. John, Caiaphas is specially connected by name with the procedure which led to the condemnation and death of Jesus. When, after the raising of Lazarus, the 'high priests and Pharisees' held a meeting of the Sanhedrin (informal, as Caiaphas does not appear to have presided), it was Caiaphas who gave the ironically prophetic advice that it was expedient that one man should die for the people (Jn 11<sup>9</sup>). St. John, contemplating that sentence years after, could not but feel that there was something in those words deeper than met the ear, a truth almost inspired, which he did not hesitate to call prophetic (F. W. Robertson, Sermons, i. 134). In saying that 'being high priest that same year he prophesied,' the Evangelist does no more than claim for the theocratic head of the nation the function which might be supposed to be latent in his office (cf. the remark of Philo quoted by Westcott: 'the true priest is a prophet'; see also the remarks of Dale, The Atonement, p. 169 ff.), and had, as a matter of fact, been exercised by some of his predecessors in the office (Nu 27<sup>14</sup>). The threefold repetition by St. John of the statement that Caiaphas was high priest 'that same year' (AV; RV 'that year') has been made the ground of charging the Fourth Evangelist with ignorance of the fact that the high priest might hold office for more than one year. But this criticism rests on a misapprehension of the phrase (τοῦ ἐνιαυτοῦ ἐκεῖνου), which emphasizes not the date, but the character of the year='that fateful year' (cf. Jn 20<sup>19</sup> Mk 4<sup>25</sup>).

The resolution thus prompted took effect in the arrest of Jesus; but, as son-in-law to Annas, Caiaphas permitted the prisoner to be taken first before him (Jn 18<sup>13</sup>) for a private examination. Whether this took place in the 'palace' of Caiaphas, where Annas was living, or elsewhere, is not clear. It is also uncertain whether the Fourth Gospel contains any record of an examination of Jesus by Caiaphas. According to the reading and interpretation of Jn 18<sup>24</sup> in RV, it does not; but it is held by some (e.g. Meyer and Edersheim, against Westcott) that AV may be correct, and that the high priest referred to in vv. 15, 19 and 22 was Caiaphas. According to the narrative of the Synoptists, it was to Caiaphas the 'high priest,' or the 'house of Caiaphas,' that Jesus was led, and there, at the (irregular) meeting of the Sanhedrin at daybreak (Mt 26<sup>3</sup> Mk 14<sup>55</sup>, Lk 22<sup>66</sup>), Caiaphas presided; and it was he who brought the trial to a conclusion by declaring Jesus guilty of blasphemy, and demanding sentence upon Him.

Caiaphas appears again in Ac 4<sup>5</sup> in company with Annas and others, as initiating the persecution of the Apostles, and in the later proceedings is probably the 'high priest' referred to in Ac 5<sup>17, 21, 27</sup> 7<sup>1</sup> and 9<sup>1</sup>.

Recapitulation of festal cycles. Literature.

The Christian Calendar in its origin appears to have been based mainly on the desire to commemorate, by festival or by fast, the events of our Lord's life upon earth. These commemorations were either weekly or annual. But while the weekly observances were developed early—almost, or in part quite, from Apostolic times—the annual celebrations were of very slow growth, and for some three hundred years were confined to two seasons when the Jews and Christians in common observed a commemoration, Easter and Pentecost. It is noteworthy, as showing that the main desire was to commemorate the events in the life of Jesus, that one of the very earliest books which exhibit any considerable development of the festal cycle is the so-called Pilgrimage of Silecia, otherwise of Ethiopia (about A.D. 385), in which the customs at Jerusalem are described. It was natural that those who lived in the land where the events narrated by the sacred history took place, should wish to commemorate them on the spot by annual observances. But this development took place only in the 4th century.

I. THE CHRISTIAN WEEK.—1. The Lord's Day.—

It is significant that the first meeting of the disciples after the evening when they saw their newly-risen Master was, as far as the Gospel tells us, on the immediately succeeding 'first day of the week' (Jn 20<sup>19</sup> μεθ' ἡμέρας δευτέρας: note how emphatically the Evangelist says of the preceding week, τῆ μετὰ τῶν σαββάτων, 20<sup>1</sup>, and τῆ ἡμέρας δευτέρας τῆ μετὰ τῶν σαββάτων, 20<sup>19</sup>). It was more than an accidental coincidence if, as is very generally assumed, the birthday of the Church (Ac 2) was also on the first day of the week. At Troas the Christians met together, or held a synaxis (συντηγμένον ἡμῶν), on the first day of the week for worship and the Eucharist (Ac 20<sup>6</sup>), where ἐν τῇ μετὰ τῶν σαββάτων appears to be more than a mere chronological reference, and to indicate a custom, and also probably for the Agape (cf. 20<sup>7</sup> with 20<sup>11</sup>). In this and other passages it is necessary to remember that the 'first day of the week' began, from the point of view of a Jew, with what we should call Saturday night; and this consideration is against Prof. Ramsay's view that the service at Troas began on what we should call Sunday night (St. Paul the Traveller, ch. xiii. § 3). That it was the custom for Christians to meet together for worship on the first day of the week appears also from 1 Co 16<sup>2</sup> (κατὰ μίαν σαββάρου), where the Corinthians are bidden each to 'lay by him in store,' that there might be no collection when the Apostle came. This would point probably to a weekly assembly at which alms were collected. Otherwise there is no reason why any one day of the week should be specially mentioned.

The first mention of the 'Lord's Day' by name is Rev 1<sup>9</sup>, if indeed this is the right interpretation (ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ἐν πρώτῳ ἐν τῇ κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ). This phrase has been variously interpreted of the first day of the week, or of the Day of Judgment, or of the Sabbath, or of Easter Day. The last two interpretations may be dismissed as having no support from the earliest ecclesiastical writings. The identification of ἡ κυριακῇ ἡμέρᾳ with the Last Day has more probability; it would then be equivalent to ἡ ἡμέρα τοῦ Κυρίου (2 Th 2<sup>2</sup>; cf. 1 Th 5<sup>2</sup> ἡμέρα Κυρίου, Ac 2<sup>20</sup> from 31 2<sup>3</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>8</sup> ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμέρᾳ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, and 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>4</sup>, Ph 1<sup>6</sup>), and would mean that the Apocalypticist is carried forward in vision to the day of the end of the world. It is a valid objection to this view that it would practically make the Apocalypse deal only with the future, and that almost the earliest ecclesiastical authors after the canonical writers use κυριακῇ in the sense of the first day of the week (see below). The more probable interpretation of the phrase in question is therefore the first mentioned above.

The NT evidence does not compel the belief that the Lord's Day was of universal observance in the earliest ages of the Church, but it at least makes it probable (especially when we find it so generally established in the next age) that it was of Apostolic precept. And there is nothing to forbid the supposition that it was a following of the spirit of the teaching of the great Forty Days (Ac 1<sup>3</sup>). But we may gather, with the historian Socrates (HE v. 22), that the 'Saviour and His Apostles' did not make fixed rules as to the observance of days, and 'enjoined us by no law to keep this feast [he is speaking of Easter, but his argument applies equally to Sunday], nor do the Gospels and Apostles threaten us with any penalty, punishment, or curse for the neglect of it, as the Mosaic Law does the Jews. . . . The aim of the Apostles was not to appoint festival days, but to teach a righteous life and piety.'

To pass to the post-Apostolic age, Barnabas (xv. 9) says: 'We keep the eighth day for rejoicing, in the which also Jesus rose from the dead, and, having been manifested, ascended into the heavens,' a passage which throws some light on the occasional observance in later times of Ascension Day and Pentecost together. Barnabas purposely names the 'eighth day' rather than the First, as he has just spoken of it as following the Jewish Sabbath, the seventh day. 'I will make the beginning of the eighth day, which is the beginning of another world.' The Didache speaks of the synaxis on the Lord's Day, and uses the pleonastic phrase κατὰ κυριακῆν Κυρίου συναχθῆντες; the purpose of the synaxis was that the Christians might break bread and celebrate the Eucharist, having confessed their sins that their sacrifice might be pure (§ 14).—Ignatius (Magn. § 9) speaks of Christians no longer observing Sabbaths, but fashioning their lives after the Lord's Day (μυκτήρι σαββατίζοντες, ἀλλὰ κατὰ κυριακῆν ὄντες), which at least involves a general observance of the first day of the week.—Pliny (Ep. 96) says only that the Christians met on a fixed day, and does not say which ('soliti stato die ante lucem convenire carmenque Christo quasi deo dicere secum invicem . . .'). He apparently, as Lightfoot observes (Ignatius<sup>2</sup>, i. p. 52), confuses Baptism and the Eucharist; but we may probably gather from his account that the Christians of Bithynia met before dawn on a fixed day to celebrate the Eucharist, and later in the day met for the Agape. This inference is disputed by some.—Justin Martyr describes the assembling 'on the day called Sunday' (τῇ τοῦ θείου λειτουργη ἡμέρᾳ) for the Eucharist by 'all who live in cities or in the country' (Apol. i. § 67). He also explicitly mentions the Sunday collection of alms, as in 1 Co 16<sup>2</sup>. In the Dialogus also Justin extols the 'eighth day' (cf. Barnabas, l.c.) as possessing a 'mysterious import,' which the seventh day had not; he is referring to the Jewish circumcision as a type of 'the true circumcision by which we are circumcised from deceit and iniquity, through Him who rose from the dead on the first day after the Sabbath' (Dial. 24, 41).

That κυριακῇ became a common name in the 2nd cent. for the first day of the week is further clear from the fact, which Eusebius tells us (HE iv. 26), that Melito, bishop of Sardis about A.D. 170, wrote a book περὶ κυριακῆς (ὁ π. κ. λόγος). Dionysius of Corinth (A.D. 171) in his Epistle to Soter calls Sunday 'the Lord's Day' (Eusebius, HE iv. 23: τῆσδε σήμερον κυριακῆσδε ἁγίαν ἡμέραν ἀναγνώσκοντες). After this the name becomes very common, and we find it both in Greek (e.g. Clement of Alexandria, Strom. vii. 12) and in Latin, dies dominica (e.g. Tertullian, de Cor. 3).

There is little evidence as to the way in which the Lord's Day was observed in the earliest ages. The Eucharist and probably the Agape were celebrated; but perhaps to a great extent other occupations went on much as usual. It would not be easy for Christian working men to absent themselves from their avocations on a day when everyone around them was working; and this may have been the reason why the synaxis took place at night or before dawn, as in the examples in Acts and in Pliny. St. Paul apparently began his journey from Tross (Ac 20) on Sunday. There is no evidence in the earliest ages of any attempt to transfer the obligations of Sabbath observance to the Lord's Day. The Jewish Christians already had their day of rest on the Saturday. But, as Zahn observes (Skizzen aus dem Leben der Alten Kirche, p. 214), the Gentile Christians must have very quickly learnt all over the world to keep the Lord's Day; they were never compelled to keep the Sabbath, which was not one of the four observances enjoined in Ac 15<sup>20</sup>.

Tertullian, however, is the first to mention a Sunday rest (Apologet. 16, de Orat. 25), saying that the Christians postponed ordinary duties and business only on that day, the day of the Lord's resurrection, and that they gave up 'the day of the sun' to joy. He contrasts the Christian with the Jewish rest by implication. He says that the Christians did not kneel on the Lord's Day (de Orat. 23, de Cor. 3). This custom we already find in Irenaeus (Fragm. 7), who traces it to Apostolic times; and it was afterwards laid down in the 20th canon of Nicaea.

For the 3rd and 4th cents., the Church Orders, some of which have only lately come to light, and the early Didascalia (i.e. the work as it was before it was incorporated in the Apostolic Constitutions, and as we have it, for example, in the Verona Latin Fragments, edited by Dr. Hauler) throw some light on the question of the Lord's Day. The Christians are bidden 'on the Lord's Day (dies dominica), putting aside everything, to assemble at church (Hauler, p. 44). The fragment breaks off in the middle of a sentence explaining the object of Sunday churchgoing ('audire salutare verbum et nutrirī ab . . .'); but we can fill the gap from other forms of the Didascalia, such as the Syriac edited by Mrs. Gibson, from which we see that the Eucharist is being spoken of ('be nourished with the divine food which endureth for ever, Gibson, ch. xiii.). This appears to come from the original Didascalia, and it is emphatically said that the Lord's Day is the great time for the Christian assembly, for prayer, Eucharist, and instruction; and this emphasis is all the greater as it was not yet customary to have public daily prayers for all men. But about A.D. 375 the writer of the Apostolic Constitutions, in adapting the Didascalia, alters this direction for Sunday worship to a command to assemble twice daily, morning and evening (ii. 59). In the Testament of our Lord (c. 350?), the way is being felt towards public daily service by providing daily forms for the clergy and the presbyteresses, with whom the devout might be invited to join [see, further, on daily service, Wordsworth's Ministry of Grace, ch. vi.; and Cooper and Maclean's Testament of our Lord, p. 189]. We may then say that until the latter part of the 4th cent. Sunday was the only regular and universal day for Christian assemblies. There is a possible local and temporary exception in the Hippolytean Canons (§ 217, ed. Achelis), which command daily service; but some have concluded that this is an interpolation, as it is thought to be in contradiction to § 226. These Canons allow a bishop to celebrate the Eucharist when he pleases. And again, a daily celebration of the Eucharist is perhaps found in Cyprian (de Orat. Dom. 18). But no further trace of this is found till the latter part of the 4th century. The result arrived at does not mean, however, that the Christians were not bidden to pray daily; from a very early period, certainly from about A.D. 200 onwards, regular daily hours of prayer were prescribed (e.g. Can. Hippol. § 222 f.). But private prayers are here meant, even though sometimes they were said in church. For other synaxes in the week, see below (§§ 2, 3).

The Lord's Day was the usual day for the ordination or consecration of a bishop; so the older Didascalia in Mrs. Gibson's form, § iii, (but this is an interpolation from one of the following books), the Egyptian Church Order (ed. Tattam, § 81), the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 4), and the Testament of our Lord (i. 21); also in the Ethiopic Church Order (§ 21), according to Achelis, though Ludolf (ad suam Hist. Ethiop. Comment. p. 323) has 'in die sabbati.' The Canons of Hippolytus perhaps mention Saturday, though Achelis gives 'in ea hebdomade'; but the Arabic for 'Saturday' and 'week' are pronounced alike (see Rahmani, Test. D. N. Jesu Christi, p. xxxvi).

The rest on the Lord's day appears (especially until the time of Constantine) to have been mainly to allow of church-going. But in the edict of Constantine in 321, the magistrates and people in cities are bidden to rest, and all workshops are directed to be closed 'on the venerable day of the sun'; while no such obligation is laid on those engaged in agricultural pursuits. Whatever the motive of the emperor in making this decree may have been (and this is disputed), it doubtless did much to bring about a weekly holiday on the Lord's Day.

2. Wednesday and Friday fasts.—Almost from the beginning we can trace an observance of these two days for the purpose of fasting. In this way the early Christians interpreted our Lord's words in Mt 9<sup>18</sup>, that they should fast when the bridegroom should be taken away from them; though, as we shall see, some found a more particular fulfilment of these words in the fast before Easter. The reason why Wednesday and Friday were chosen is not entirely obvious. The stricter Jews had made a practice of fasting 'twice in the week' (Lk 18<sup>12</sup>), and, as we learn from the Didache (§ 8), the Christians took over the practice, but changed the days. Probably ever since the Return from the Captivity, Monday and Thursday had been the Jewish fasts, though we read of Judith fasting daily save on Sabbaths and New Moons and the eves of both and 'the feasts and solemn days of the house of Israel' (Jth 8<sup>9</sup>). Monday and Thursday were chosen, or were afterwards accounted for, because there was a tradition that Moses went up into the Mount on the latter day and came down on the former. But these were not matters of law, for the Mosaic Code prescribes only the Day of Atonement as a fast; and though occasional fasts were ordered in times of trouble, these were never permanent nor of universal obligation. Thus the Pharisee's boast in Lk 18<sup>12</sup> was that he did more than he was obliged by law to do (see, further, in Plummer's St. Luke, in loc.). In the sub-Apostolic age the Christians went a step further and seem to have tried to make the Wednesday and Friday fasts universal. The Didache (§ 8) says: 'Let not your fastings be with the hypocrites [the Jews], for they fast on the second and the fifth day of the week; but do ye keep your fast on the fourth day and on the preparation' (there is a change of construction: ὑποκριταὶ . . . δευτέρῃ σαββάτῳ . . . ἡμεῖς δὲ ὑποκρίσασθε τερτάρῃ καὶ παρασκευῇ). For the latter, ὑποκρίσασθε with dative accusative, see the parallel Apost. Const. vii. 23 and v. 15; and Cyprianus Logia, 2: εἰς μὴ ὑποκρίσασθε τὸν κύριον, and Testament of our Lord, ii. 6 and 12 [apparently]. A reason was found for the choice of Wednesday and Friday in the fact that on the former day the Jews made a conspiracy against our Lord, and that He was crucified on the latter. But this first appears in Peter of Alexandria († 31), who gives this explanation in his Canonical Epistle (canon xv.). It reappears elsewhere, e.g. in Apost. Const. v. 15. Another explanation is given by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vii. 12). He says that the fourth and sixth days are named from Hermes and Aphrodite respectively. The true Christian or 'Gnostic' fasts in his life in respect of covetousness and voluptuousness, from which all the vices grow. Considering, then, that the symbolical explanations differ, and that they are not found until a somewhat later date than the first mention of these days, it is reasonable to suppose that they are afterthoughts. Yet it is probable that, when the Jewish fast days had to be changed, Friday was not accidentally fixed upon, but that our Lord's death on that day would make it appropriate as a fast; and when once Friday was chosen, Wednesday would follow from mere considerations of convenience.

Other early authorities for week-day fasts are Hermas, Tertullian, Hippolytus, the Hippolytean Canons, and Origen. Hermas (Sim. v. 1) does not mention the days on which it was usual to fast; but he says that he was fasting and seated on a certain mountain, giving thanks to the Lord, when he met the Shepherd, who asked him why he was there. He replies that he is keeping a 'station' (στασιωνεῖς ἕως), which he explains as being a fast. Tertullian expressly mentions Wednesday and Friday (de Sejun. 2 and 14: 'stationibus quartam et sextam sabbati dicamus, et jejuniis parasceuen'—a difficult phrase, since the sixth day and 'parasceue' are one; perhaps the meaning is that Wednesday was a 'half-fast' [de Sejun. 13] in Tertullian's time, and Friday a whole one, or perhaps Tertullian means Good Friday here by 'parasceue'). He says that the Eucharist was celebrated on those days (de Orat. 19). For Hippolytus, see below (§ 3) on the Saturday fast. The Hippolytean Canons, which, whether they represent Roman usage or Alexandrian, probably date from the first half of the 3rd cent., prescribe fasts 'feria quarta et sexta [et quadragesima], though it approves of individuals adding other fasts to these (§ 154; the bracketed words seem to be an interpolation). Origen speaks of Wednesday and Friday as days 'quibus solemniter jejunamus' (in Lev. Hom. x., but see II. 1, 6, below).

But hereafter there is a break, except that Peter of Alexandria gives evidence for Egypt, and that in the Edessene Canons of the first half of the 4th cent. there are directions for the Eucharist on Sundays, for service 'on the fourth day,' and for service 'on the eve' [of the Sabbath] at the ninth hour (canons 2, 3). Apparently the observance of these two days was not universal, at any rate in the East, till towards the end of the 4th century. There is no mention of them in the Testament of our Lord (c. 330 A.D.?), which alludes to the possibility of a fast day falling in the week (l. 22), but does not prescribe one. There is in this curious Church Order a regulation for bishops and presbyters to fast three days a week, perhaps only for one year from their ordination, but they are not tied down to any fixed days, and the rule is expressly said to be 'for the priests only.' The Arabic Didascalia (§ 38, c. 380 A.D.?), which is probably based on the Testament, mentions explicitly Wednesday and Friday as the two fast days of the week, and says that when a festival falls on these days they shall pray and not receive the holy mysteries, and shall not interrupt the fasting till the ninth hour [see a German translation of these later chapters in Funk's Apostol. Konstitutionen; the rest is not published]. There is abundant evidence towards the end of the 4th cent. for these days: Apost. Const. v. 15, vii. 23; Apost. Can. 99 (68); pseudo-Ignat. ad Phil. 13; Epiphanius, Har. lxx. 8 (ed. Dionysius Petrus, lib. iii. 6, p. 910), and Expos. Fid. 21. The Apostolic Constitutions are here (vii. 23) based on the Didache, and repeat its language about the change of day from those of the 'hypocrites.' The Apostolic Canon makes it incumbent on all, under penalty, to keep these days, unless in sickness. Pseudo-Ignatius, who is probably the same as the author of the Apost. Constitutions (so Harnack, Brightman; but Lightfoot (*Ignatius*², i. 265 f.) thinks otherwise) re-echoes their language. Epiphanius says that these two days were observed everywhere (ἐν παντί αἰμασι τῆς αἰωνότητος); he calls them ρηρίαι and προσάββαροι. Bp. J. Wordsworth conjectures that the restoration of these days in the East was largely due to Epiphanius (Min. of Grace, ch. vi. ii.). Probably in Egypt and in many parts of the West their observance was continuous.

Usually the Eucharist was celebrated on Wednesdays and Fridays; perhaps often (as the Arabic Didascalia may suggest) at a late hour, so that the fast might be preserved, though Tertullian speaks (de Orat. 19) of the service being during the hours of fasting on these days, and of scrupulous communicants reserving the elements in private so as not to break the fast. In 'Silvia' (iv. 3, in Duchesne's Origines, Appendix) the observance of Wednesdays and Fridays in Lent is spoken of: 'Diebus vero quadragesimarum . . . quarta feria ad nona in Syon [the traditional scene of the descent of the Holy Spirit, possibly the site of St. Mark's house, called by Epiphanius and St. Cyril of Jerusalem the Church of the Apostles] proceditur juxta consuetudinem totius anni, et omnia aguntur quae consuetudo est ad nonam agi preter oblatio. . . . Sexta feria autem similiter omnia aguntur sicut quarta feria,' which must mean that the Eucharist was usually celebrated on Mount Zion after none at 3 p.m. except in Lent, though Duchesne seems to invert this conclusion (p. 130 n. 4, Eng. ed.). 'Silvia' says that on these days, unless a festival of the martyrs fell on one of them, even the catechumens fasted. In the 5th cent. an exception to the Wednesday and Friday Eucharist is mentioned by Socrates (HE v. 22) in the case of the Wednesday and Friday before Easter.

These days were called 'half-fasts,' semi-jejunia (Tertull. de Jejun. 13), because on them Christians broke their fast at 3 p.m. or even at noon; or more frequently 'station days' as in Hermas (l.c., though he does not specify the days) and in Tertullian (de Jejun. 14). This is a military metaphor. Tertullian (de Orat. 19) says: 'If the Station has received its name from the example of military life—for we are God's military [cf. 2 Co 10¹, 1 Ti 1¹⁸]—certainly no gladness or sadness chancing to the camp abolishes the Stations of the soldiers; for gladness will carry out discipline more willingly, sadness more carefully.' And St. Ambrose says: 'Our fasts are our encampments which protect us from the devil's attack; in short, they are called Stations, because standing and staying in them we repel our plotting foes' (Serm. 25, ed. of 1549, p. 716c).

3. Saturday.—There was a considerable divergence of custom with regard to the observance of Saturday. In the East it was commonly regarded as a feast, while in many parts of the West it was a fast, that of Friday being continued to the Saturday, and the added fast being called a 'superposition' (superpositio, στρεψθεαι). Tertullian (de Jejun. 14) mentions and condemns the custom of fasting on Saturday: 'You [psychic Christians] sometimes continue your station even over the Sabbath, a day never to be kept as a fast except at the Passover season.' St. Jerome writing to Lucianus in A.D. 398 (Ep. 71) discusses the question, and says that it had been 'treated by the eloquent Hippolytus' and others; but he does not tell us what their opinions were. The Council of Elvira in Spain (c. 305 A.D.) ordered superpositions each month except in July and August (canon 23); and in canon 26 says that the error is to be corrected 'ut omni sabbati die superpositiones celebremus,' which may mean that superpositions were to be held every Saturday (Hefele), or that this weekly fast was henceforward forbidden (Bp. J. Wordsworth). The latter meaning would suit canon 23 better, but Hefele's construction suits canon 43. St. Augustine says that in his time they did not fast at Milan on Saturday (Ep. liv. ad Januar. § 3). Writing in the 5th cent., Socrates (HE v. 22) says that in his day almost all Churches celebrated the sacred mysteries on the Sabbath of every week (Saturday), yet the Christians of Alexandria and Rome, on account of some ancient tradition, had ceased to do this. This 'ancient tradition' may probably go back before the 4th century. Socrates goes on to say that the Egyptians near Alexandria and those of the Thebaid held synaxes on the Sabbath, but, unlike other Christians, 'after having eaten and satisfied themselves with food of all kinds [the Agape?], in the evening make the Offering (πρεπὶ ἐπιπέραν προσέφορτες) and partake of the mysteries.' Sozomen (HE vii. 19) repeats Socrates' statements.*

The Testament of our Lord (i. 23), according to our present Syriac text, prescribes Eucharists on Saturday or Sunday; but we must probably correct 'or' into 'and,' by the omission of one Syriac letter (Ⲑ into Ⲑ), and the rule will then agree with the Arabic Didascalia, § 38. In the Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 59) Saturday and Sunday are specially appointed for Divine service; and we note that in this passage Saturday is the author's interpolation into his source, the old Didascalia mentioning only Sunday (Hanler, Verona Fragments, p. 44). Pseudo-Ignatius forbids a Christian to fast on Sunday, save on Easter Even [the reading of the last words is doubtful, but the sense is clear], lest he be a 'Christ-slayer' (χριστοκτόνος). And so the same author in Apost. Const. vii. 23 bids his hearers feast on the Sabbath and the Lord's Day, except on Easter Even; and in v. 13, 15, he bids them leave off fasting on the seventh day, save on that Sabbath when the Creator was under the ground. The Apostolic Canons strongly make the same prohibition as to fasting on ordinary Saturdays (Canon 66 [65]).

* Dom Leclercq (Dict. d'Archéol. Chrét. s.v. 'Agape', col. 822) thinks that in Socrates and Sozomen there is no trace of an Agape, but only of a Eucharist. But it appears clear to the present writer that the words 'eating and satisfying themselves' point to the Agape, and that the whole purpose of the custom described is to keep up the example of the Last Supper. For a full discussion of the origin and date of introduction of the Agape, see Hastings' (forthcoming) Dict. of Religion, s.v.

As we saw above, Alexandria did not celebrate the Eucharist on Saturday for some time before Socrates. St. Athanasius (Apol. con. Arian. 11) implies that it was celebrated on Sunday only. He replies to a charge against Macarius of breaking a chalice, and shows that the place alleged was not a church, that there was no one there to perform the 'sacred office,' and that the day was not the Lord's Day, and did not require the use of it [the sacred office]. This at least shows that there was no fixed day except Sunday for the Eucharist. And Brightman (Journ. of Theol. Stud. i. 92) thinks that the same is implied in the Sacramentary of Serapion (c. 350 A.D.), which gives 'The first prayer of the Lord's day' (κυριακή), without arranging for any other day. But this is hardly conclusive; especially Thinnis was not Alexandria, and Socrates says that the 'neighbours of Alexandria' did have a Saturday Eucharist. By A.D. 380 the latter was already established in Alexandria (Timothy of Alex. Respons. Canon. 13, see Brightman, l.c.). Cassian says that in his time there were no public services in the day among the Egyptians except on Saturday and Sunday, when they met at the third hour for Holy Communion (Inst. iii. 2). St. Augustine sums up the matter by saying that in some places no day passed without the sacrifice being offered; in others it was only on Saturday and the Lord's Day, or, it may be, only on the Lord's Day (Ep. iv. ad Januar. § 2).

For Phrygia and Cappadocia we have no satisfactory evidence with regard to the observance of Saturday in the 4th century. The 49th canon of Laodicea in Phrygia (c. 380?) says that during Lent the bread shall not be offered except on Saturday and Sunday, from which it may perhaps be inferred that these two days were 'liturgical' all through the year. St. Basil in his 93rd Epistle, ad Cassarium (v.l. Cesarium; in the Paris ed. of 1618, Ep. 289), says that he communicated four times a week, on the Lord's Day, Wednesday, Friday, and the Sabbath, and on other days if there were a commemoration of any saint (v.l. martyr); he refers to and defends the practice of private reservation, and says that in Egypt each layman kept the Eucharistic elements in his own house and partook when he liked. Thus the fact that Basil communicated on the days mentioned does not necessarily imply a Eucharist on those days.

It is noteworthy that Saturday and Sunday have remained in the Greek Church as the only 'liturgical' days in Lent, as provided in the Laodicean canon; whereas the Nestorians provide Eucharistic lections for every day in certain selected weeks in Lent (called the 'weeks of the mysteries') with the one exception of Saturday.

II. THE CHRISTIAN YEAR.—In addition to the weekly observances, there were annual commemorations of events in our Lord's life, although their development was slow. Two of these, Easter and Pentecost, passed to the Church from the Jews; while others, such as Good Friday, Lent, Ascension, Christmas, Epiphany, Advent, are of purely Christian origin.

1. Easter.—(a) The name.—'Pascha' (πάσχα) was the common name for Easter at least from the 2nd cent. onwards in Greek and Latin Christianity; and it is of some importance to gather from the earlier writers the reasons for its use, as they will show us the exact meaning of the commemoration. πάσχα is taken from the Aramaic פִּישְׁחָ (pishā), the equivalent of Heb. פֶּסַח (pesah) 'the passover.' Syrian Christians, however, have usually written the word in the form ܦܫܗܐ

(peshā) as if from ܦܫܗܐ 'to rejoice' (see Payne-Smith, Thesaurus Syriacus, in loc.); though, in translating into Syriac from Greek, James of Edessa and others use the form ܦܫܗܐ (as in the Testament of our Lord, passion); and the Lexicons give a verb ܦܫܗܐ 'to celebrate Easter.' The meaning in Syriac literature is usually 'Easter,' though the Nestorian writers, like their descendants to this day, use it in the sense of 'Maundy Thursday.' The older Greek and Latin writers commonly derive it from πάσχειν, 'to suffer,' and draw analogies from etymology between the passion of the suffering Christ. Thus, perhaps, Justin Martyr (Dial. 40); he is showing how the lamb sacrificed as the passover is a type of the Passion; and most probably Irenæus (Hæc. iv. x. 1: 'Moses foretold Him after a figurative manner by the name given to the passover, and at that very festival did our Lord suffer, thus fulfilling the passover'). And so perhaps Tertullian (adv. Jud. 19, Migne, vol. ii. col. 670): 'It is the Lord's passover, that is, the Passion of Christ.' Lactantius expressly adopts this etymology (Div. Inst. iv. 26, Migne, vol. i. col. 531): 'Pascha nominatur à τὸ ὑποπάσχειν, quia passionis figura est.' Augustine, on the other hand (Ep. iv. 1, ad Januar., A.D. 400) denies this interpretation, while he proposes a scarcely better one: 'The word Pascha itself is not, as is commonly thought, a Greek word; those who are acquainted with both languages affirm it to be a Hebrew word. It is not derived, therefore, from the Passion because of the Greek word πάσχειν, signifying to suffer, but it takes its name from the transition of which I have spoken, from death to life; the meaning of the Hebrew word Pascha being, as those who are acquainted with it assure us, a passing over or transition. To this the Lord Himself designed to allude when He said: "He that believeth in me is passed from death to life."

The question then arises, What did these earlier writers mean by Pascha? Was it the commemoration of the Passion, or of the Resurrection? Irenæus wrote a work, περὶ τοῦ πάσχα (quoted by pseudo-Justin, Quæst. et resp. ad Orthodoxos), which is probably the letter to Victor from which Eusebius gives extracts (HE v. 24). In this he speaks of a festival preceded by a fast of varying duration (see below, c); and he may use the word πάσχα of the festival or of the festival and fast combined. Bp. J. Wordsworth (Ministry of Grace, iii. § 1) says that the Christian πάσχα always in the first three centuries and often in the fourth means the celebration of the fast of Good Friday, extended no doubt by ἀνέσθησεν or superposition in most cases over Easter; and he adduces Tertullian, adv. Jud. 10, as above (but this hardly shows it), and de Bapt. 19 ('Pascha affords a more solemn day for baptism, when all the passion of the Lord, in which we are baptized [ingenuit], was completed'). We may add de Orat. 18, where he says that they did not give the kiss of peace 'die paschæ' when there was a general fast. But in de Cor. 3 he seems to use the word of Easter Day; he says that the Christians did not kneel 'a die Paschæ in Pentecosten usque'; and in de Jejun. 14 he speaks of celebrating Pascha, and of the fifty ensuing (sexidæ) days being spent in exultation, which is suitable language if Pascha means Easter Day, but hardly if it means Good Friday. It may, however, in these passages, mean Easter and the preceding fast, and this would suit the remark which follows in de Jejun. 14, that Saturday was never a fast 'nisi in Pascha.' Origen (c. Cel. viii. 22) distinguishes παρεσκευθ from πάσχα, and doubtless means Easter by the latter. He mentions the observance of the Lord's Day, of the Preparation, of Pascha, and of Pentecost; and cannot here mean every Friday by the 'Preparation,' for then he would also have mentioned Wednesday, as in Hom. in Lev. x. (see above, I. § 2).

One may conjecture that there was some divergence in the first three centuries both as to the name and as to the actual observance of this commemoration. It seems likely that in many cases the Resurrection and the Passion were observed on the same day. This must usually have been the case with the Quartodecimans, who observed the fourteenth day of the lunar month; but it was also apparently often the case with those who kept the Sunday, for, as we shall see below, the fast observed before the Sunday was often only of one day's duration, and did not always include the Friday. Even well on in the 4th cent. we find a relic of this in the Testament of our Lord, where the Friday before Easter is not mentioned as the day of commemorating the Passion but as a preparation for the festival, and the Passion and Resurrection are apparently commemorated together, just as the Ascension and Pentecost were often joined (see below, § 2 b). There is nothing a priori incongruous in commemorating and giving thanks for the Redemption of mankind on a day of rejoicing, especially when a severe fast of a day or two had just preceded. The probable conclusion, then, is that Pascha usually meant, before the 4th cent., the commemoration both of the Death and of the Resurrection of Christ, the festival with its preceding fast, and that the erroneous derivation from πάσχω favoured a certain indefiniteness in the use of the word. This derivation, it may be observed, as well as the equally false Syrian one, probably explains why a name with such a very Jewish association became so popular. When, somewhat later, a distinction had to be made between Good Friday and Easter Day, the names πάσχα σταυρόμια and πάσχα ἀναστάμια were invented (Ducange, s.v. 'Pascha').

Another use of the name Pascha is to be noted. In the Testament of our Lord (i. 28, 42, ii. 8, 11, 12, 18) it means the forty days before Easter, though of these forty days only the last two were fasts. Holy Week is called 'the last week of Pascha.' The end of Pascha is to be after the Saturday at midnight. The 'forty days of Pascha' are specially mentioned. Similarly in Apost. Can. 69 (68) we find τῆν ἄγιαν τεσσαρακοστὴν τοῦ πάσχα. But in the Testament, Pascha is used absolutely in this sense. In this work, however, we also read of 'the feast of Pascha' (i. 42), when widows (presbyteresses) are to give alms and bathe. The bathing was on the Thursday before Easter. 'Pascha' was sometimes used for Holy Week.

Thus in Apost. Const. v. 18 we read: 'Fast in the days of Pascha beginning from the second till the Preparation and the Sabbath, for they are days of sorrow, not of feasting.' And so perhaps Can. Hipp. § 195 ff. (below, b).

Other names for Easter were: among the Latins, 'Dominica gaudii' (Bingham, Ant. xx. v. 5); among the Greeks, μεγάλη κυριακή; while the common Syrian name was and is ܩܕܝܫܐ ܕܡܫܝܚܐ 'the feast of the Resurrection.'

(b) Early observance of Easter.—The Apostles, no doubt, continued to keep the Jewish Passover (Ac 20<sup>9</sup>); but it is uncertain if the first Gentile Christians observed it in any way, or whether they were content with the weekly commemoration. It is not even certain if the Jewish Christians kept it in any way as a Christian festival. Yet the phrases τὸ πάσχα ἡμῶν . . . Χριστός and ἐορταζόμενος (1 Co 5<sup>7c</sup>) would be specially appropriate if the Christians at Corinth were at the time when St. Paul wrote from Ephesus, namely, before Pentecost (1 Co 16<sup>9</sup>), observing an Easter festival. But it is significant that there is no mention of Easter in the Apostolic Fathers or in Justin Martyr; and its absence in the Didache is specially noteworthy, since that Church Order mentions the Lord's Day, the fast before baptism, and the Wednesday and Friday fasts. We can, however, trace the observance of Easter at Rome back to the time of Pope Xystus, c. 120 A.D., for Irenæus tells us (ap. Eusebius, HE v. 24) that Xystus and his immediate successors, while not observing the Quartodeciman practice themselves, yet were at peace with those who did; and from what follows it is clear that Irenæus means that Xystus observed the Sunday as Easter Day. In Asia Minor the observance can be traced back still further; for Polycarp, as Irenæus says (ib.), traced his custom of keeping Easter to St. John. The conclusion may probably be, either that Easter was not universally observed as an annual commemoration early in the 2nd cent., or, more probably, that it had not then the great importance which it acquired later in the century, from the disputes as to the day when it should be kept.

(c) The Quartodeciman Controversy.—A brief summary only of this question is necessary for the purposes of this Dictionary; for more detailed accounts of it, reference may be made to the works mentioned at the end of this article. The controversy arose in the 2nd cent. and came to a head in the last decade of it; it was concerned with the question whether the Paschal commemoration should follow the day of the week or the day of the lunar month on which the events commemorated originally occurred. Those who upheld the former practice no doubt laid chief stress on the Resurrection of our Lord, since they fixed on Sunday for their commemoration; while the latter, who were called Quartodecimans or τεσσαρακιδεκαίτηροι (Socrates, HE v. 22, Sozomen, HE vii. 19), probably at first emphasized our Lord's death, as they adhered to 14th Nisan, the day on which He died, or was thought by them to have died; whereas, on no calculation did He rise on that day. The theory has, indeed, been advanced by the Tübingen school that the Quartodecimans commemorated the Last Supper rather than the Passion or Resurrection. According to the Synoptists, the Last Supper appears to have taken place on the evening of 14th Nisan, and the Crucifixion to have been on the 15th; while, according to the Fourth Gospel, the Death of our Lord would appear to have been at the time of the killing of the Paschal lambs, and the Last Supper therefore to have taken place at the end of 13th Nisan. We are not here concerned with the seeming contradiction between the Gospels except in so far as the Tübingen school deduced from the known facts that the Quartodecimans could not have accepted the Fourth Gospel, because their practice rather agreed with the Synoptists. Western readers need, however, to be reminded that in the ordinary Eastern reckoning, at any rate the ecclesiastical reckoning, then as now, the Last Supper and the Crucifixion fell on the same day; for the day began at sunset. Thus, if the Quartodecimans observed 14th Nisan, it must have been because they thought that our Lord both celebrated the Last Supper and also died on that day. It is a pure assumption that their Paschal commemoration began at the moment when the lambs were killed. In that case they would have been rather Quintodecimans. It is generally agreed that the lambs were killed, at any rate in ancient Jewish times, in the afternoon of 14th Nisan, i.e. when that day was drawing to a close. The inference, then, is that the Quartodecimans made their Paschal commemoration coincide with the day which began at the Last Supper and ended soon after our Lord's death, and that they thought that that occurred at the time of the killing of the lambs. The deduction is the exact opposite of that drawn by the Tübingen school, and is that the Quartodecimans followed the Fourth Gospel (as they, perhaps rightly, interpreted it) rather than the Synoptists. The supposition that they commemorated the Last Supper in particular has, moreover, no basis of fact. And the view given above is further supported by the fact that in the time of Melito (A.D. 170) the Quartodecimans clearly accepted the Fourth Gospel. Melito, in one of his fragments, speaks of our Lord's three years' ministry, which he could never have gathered from the Synoptists ('de Incarn. Christi,' in Routh's Reliquiae sacrae, vol. 1.).

It has been thought by some (as by Hefele) that the Quartodecimans kept their commemoration of the Resurrection on the third day after 14th Nisan, i.e. on 16th Nisan, or even on the Sunday after. But this is very improbable. If it were so, why should they have broken off their fast on 14th Nisan? It is much more likely that they commemorated the Passion and the Resurrection together.

The history of the controversy is given by Eusebius (HE v. 23, 24), who takes up the question at its third and most acute stage, namely, at the dispute between Victor and Polycrates at the very end of the 2nd century. He tells us that synods held in that century unanimously decided that 'the mystery of the resurrection of the Lord should be celebrated on no other but the Lord's day, and that we should observe the close of the paschal fast on this day only.' These synods were held in Palestine, Rome (under Victor), Pontus, Gaul (under Irenaeus), and Osrhoëne in N.W. Mesopotamia. Perhaps the last-named synod was held at the famous Edessa, or Ur-hai, which is in that district. There were also personal (i.e. not synodical) letters of Bacchylus, bishop of Corinth, and many others, all of whom concurred in the decision mentioned above. On the other side 'Asia' (i.e. probably the Roman province, though the Quartodeciman practice extended to other provinces also—even to Antioch), led by Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, maintained that the paschal commemoration should take place on 14th Nisan, on whatever day of the week it should fall. Polycrates, who is very highly praised by St. Jerome (de Viris Illust. 45) and by implication by Eusebius, who preserves his letter (i.e.), alleges the example of 'Philip, one of the twelve Apostles, who fell asleep in Hierapolis, and his two aged virgin daughters, and another daughter who lived in the Holy Spirit and now rests at Ephesus'; also of John 'who was both a witness and a teacher, who reclined upon the bosom of the Lord, and being a priest wore the [sacerdotal] plate (τὸ πέπλον). He fell asleep at Ephesus. He also adduces Polycarp, Melito, the martyr Sagaris, and others, who all agreed with his practice.

Victor attempted to excommunicate all 'Asia'; ἀποτίμειν ὡς ἑρεποδοξίας . . . περὶ αὐτῶν are Eusebius' exact words. But Socrates (HE v. 22) declares that he did actually excommunicate them. He probably issued a letter of excommunication, but it was not effective. For Eusebius goes on to say that Irenaeus, bishop of 'Gaul,' intervened in the dispute in the interests of peace, and he who 'was truly well named became a peacemaker in the matter.' Part of Irenaeus' letter is preserved by Eusebius, and is specially interesting as mentioning that 'the presbyters before Soter who presided over the Church which thou [Victor] now rulest, Anicetus and Pius and Hyginus and Telesphorus and Xystus, neither themselves observed [the fourteenth day] nor permitted those after them to do so; and yet they were at peace with those who did observe it; and also that when Polycarp went to Rome in the time of Anicetus (bishop of Rome), the two bishops 'disagreed a little about certain other things,' but immediately made peace, 'not caring to quarrel over this matter'; nor did it interfere with their remaining in communion with one another, or with Anicetus allowing Polycarp to celebrate the Eucharist in his church at Rome, 'manifestly as a mark of respect' (ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ παρεχώρησεν ὁ Ἀνικητός τὴν εὐχαριστίαν τῷ Πολυκάρπῳ κατ' ἑντροπὴν θεοῦ). It has been suggested that these words mean only that the two bishops communicated together; but in that case they are mere repetitions of what had just been said, and there would be no special mark of respect.

Eusebius here does not mention the intervening dispute in which Melito, bishop of Sardis, figures. But in iv. 26 he speaks of him, and from the account we gather that he was a prolific writer; a list of his books is given. In the quotation from Polycrates in v. 24 we find the name of Melito appearing as a Quartodeciman, but it is not said that he was a writer. From the earlier passage we learn that he wrote a book περὶ τοῦ πάσχα, from which a quotation is given: 'While Servilius [Rufinus gives 'Sergius'] Paulus was proconsul of Asia, at the time when Sagaris suffered martyrdom, there arose in Laodicea [in Phrygia] a great strife concerning Pascha, which fell according to rule in those days (ἡμετέρας κατὰ κανὸν ἐπίσταται ταῖς ἡμέρας), and these things were written [sc. because of the dispute].' So McGiffert [Eusebius in Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers] renders these words, though it is not obvious what they mean; for when did not Pascha fall according to rule? For other explanations see Salmon in Smith-Wace, Dict. of Chr. Biog. s.v. 'Melito.' Eusebius goes on to say that Clement of Alexandria refers to Melito's work, and himself wrote one with the same title, 'on occasion' (ἐξ αἰτίας) of Melito's treatise, i.e., probably, in opposition to it, though Hefele thinks that Clement's book was meant to supplement Melito's.

The Paschal Chronicle mentions that Apollinarius, bishop of Hierapolis, of whom Serapion, bishop of Antioch (c. 200 A.D.), is the first to speak—but he was then dead—wrote a book περὶ τοῦ πάσχα, and preserves two fragments of it. It is disputed whether Apollinarius was a Quartodeciman. If so, he was not an extreme partisan; he certainly wrote before the discussion became acute, as in the time of Polycrates. He held (the Paschal Chronicle states) that our Lord, being the true Paschal Lamb, was slain on the day of the Pass-over feast. Some have asserted that there were two parties of Quartodecimans, the one Judaizing and the other not. But it is perhaps unnecessary to divide them, with Hefele, into 'Ehionites' and 'Johanneans.' Eusebius (iv. 27) mentions Apollinaris' writings, but not the work in question.

There were thus three stages in the controversy: (1) the discussion between Polycarp and Anicetus, c. 150 A.D., when they agreed to differ, and parted amicably; (2) the dispute at Laodicea about A.D. 170; (3) the bitter contest between Victor and Polycrates about A.D. 190.

The other Churches, as a rule,—those outside Asia,—agreed with Victor in his practice, but disapproved of his excommunicating the Quartodecimans. The Roman Pascha gradually prevailed, and was affirmed by the Council of Nicea in 325, in whose decision the bishop of Asia acquiesced. Thenceforward the Quartodeciman practice was confined to a few communities which were considered heretical. It lasted till the 6th cent., and Sozomen (HE vii. 19) speaks of it as still going on in his day, c. 443 A.D.

(d) Determination of Easter: Paschal cycles.—The defeat of the Quartodecimans did not ensure that all should keep Easter on the same day, for different calculations were in use for determining the paschal full moon. This had long been the case. For a time the Christians were dependent on the Jews for the date of their festival. The Hippolytean Canons (§ 195, ed. Achelis) say that the week when the Jews celebrate Pascha is to be observed by all with the utmost zeal as a fast. And the older Didascalia, according to Colesander-Sangermanensis (Gibson's Didasc. 1903, p. 97), bids the Christians 'keep your fast with all care, but commence when your brethren of the Nation keep Pascha'; the Verona Fragments are wanting here. And in the 4th cent. pseudo-Pionius, in his Life of Polycarp (§ 2; for the date see Lightfoot's Ignatius, iii. 429), says that 'the Apostle [Paul] plainly teaches that we ought neither to keep it outside the season of unleavened bread, as the heretics do, especially the Phrygians, nor yet, on the other hand, of necessity on the fourteenth day; for he said nothing about the fourteenth day, but named the days of unleavened bread, the Passover, and the Pentecost, thus ratifying the Gospel.'

On the other hand, the Apostolic Constitutions (v. 17) expressly say: 'Be no longer careful to keep the feast with the Jews, for we have now no communion with them'; and the Jews are said to have erred in their calculations. [The passage inserted before this in Dr. Donaldson's translation in the Ante-Nicene Christian Library, taken from Epiphanius, belongs to the older Didascalia, and is not part of the Apostolic Constitutions at all.]

And long before this Hippolytus had made an elaborate calculation, so that it might be no longer necessary for the Christians to follow the Jews, who had gone wrong in their computation through lax calculations of the lunar year. Hippolytus follows the system adopted by the Greek astronomers to harmonize the lunar and solar years. He makes the lunar year to be 354 days of twelve months, which alternately have 30 and 29 days. To supply the difference of 11½ days between the lunar and solar years, he interpolates three months of 30 days each in every eight years (8 × 11½ = 90). He also puts two eight-year periods together, for convenience of determining the day of the week as well as the day of the year, and he thus makes a cycle of 16 years. But, as a matter of fact, the lunar year is longer by nearly nine hours than Hippolytus reckoned it, and this error made the cycle very soon to be obviously wrong. Calculating backwards on this cycle, he fixed on Friday 25th March A.D. 29 as the day of the Crucifixion, and this computation, though quite erroneous, has ever since been the basis of a large part of the Church Calendar (see on Christmas below, § 3). The same date, March 25, is also found in the Acts of Pilate, which probably was written after Hippolytus, and was indebted to him. Epiphanius (Her. l. 1, contra Quartodecimanos, lib. ii. tom. 1) says that some, following the Acts of Pilate, always kept Pascha on March 25. These Christians, who thus anticipated a reform much desired in modern times, were not strictly Quartodecimans, for they abandoned 14th Nisan, although they observed Pascha on any day of the week, and so were separated from the Catholics. A slight modification on Hippolytus' system was made (c. 243) by pseudo-Cyprian in his de Pascha Computus (see Dr. Salmon's article, 'Chronicon Cyprianicum,' in Smith-Wace, Diet. of Chr. Biography).

The Alexandrian Church is thought by Dr. Salmon to have used the Metonic cycle of nineteen years, which, somewhat modified, is still in use. Anyhow, the Alexandrians and Romans frequently kept Easter on different days. Another source of error was the determining of the vernal equinox, which at Rome in the 3rd cent. was thought to fall on 18th March, at Alexandria from c. 277 A.D. onwards on 19th March (the calculation was made by Anatolius of Laodicea). The date was changed to 21st March (as it is now) in the reign of Diocletian.

The later disputes in Britain between the Columban and Augustinian missionaries were due to the former using a cycle which had been employed at Rome itself about A.D. 300, but had long been given up. The Columban missionaries were in no real sense Quartodecimans, though they professed to follow St. John.

(e) The fast before Easter.—In the ancient literature we find two aspects of this fast. In the first it is a preparation, whether for the paschal commemoration itself or for baptism, whether (moreover) the former emphasized the Death or the Resurrection of our Lord. In the second it is designed to mark the sadness of Christians in the days when 'the Bridegroom is taken away'—namely, the days when our Lord's body was in the tomb. In this case it must be looked upon as a Good Friday fast, extended by 'superposition' to the Saturday. As the normal time for baptism was Easter, usually early on Easter morning,—a fact which the discovery of so many Church Orders has lately made abundantly clear,—it follows that the resultant fast would be the same, whichever account of its origin is the more primitive.

For the first aspect we have the Didache. This Church Order, as has been said, does not mention Easter. But it gives what seems to be an exhaustive list of the fasts known to the writer at the beginning of the 2nd cent., and says (§ 7): 'Before the baptism let him that baptizeth and him that is baptized fast, and any others also who are able; and thou shalt order him that is baptized to fast a day or two before.' It then prescribes the Wednesday and Friday fasts. We thus have the curious result that a fast of one or two days is mentioned earlier than the festival which at that time, or at any rate soon after, followed it; and the fast is connected not with the death of our Lord, but with baptism. It is significant that in the Didache not only the baptized and the baptizer fast, but also 'any others who are able.' And the silence of the Apostolic Fathers and Justin Martyr about Easter makes it not impossible that early in the 2nd cent. the pre-baptismal fast was emphasized more than the paschal festival. Irenaeus also speaks of the fast before Easter Sunday in a way which seems to exclude the idea of a Good Friday fast extended to Saturday. His words are thus given by Eusebius (HE v. 24): 'Some think that they ought to fast for one day, others for two days, others even for several, while others reckon forty hours both of day and night to their day. And this variety in its observance has not originated in our time but long before, in that of our ancestors' ( . . . οὐδὲ καὶ πλεονάζει οἱ ἑτεροτάτοι ἀπὸ τῆς ἡμετέρας ἀνάξιν κτ.λ.). Some have put a stop after τετραδάκαιον (among others Rufinus, who translated Irenaeus into Latin), making the writer say that some fasted forty days. But a forty days' fast, as we shall see, was an invention of the 4th cent., and Rufinus is interpreting Irenaeus by the practice of his own day. Moreover, this punctuation makes no sense of the words that follow, for no one can suppose that there was an absolute fast, night and day, for forty days, and, if not, the reference to 'night and day' has no point. Irenaeus seems clearly to mean that the fast lasted, variously, for one day, for two days, for several days, while some made a continuous fast of forty hours. The words, especially 'several days', seem definitely to determine his point of view, that the fast was a preparation for the festival rather than an extension of Good Friday. The Church Orders definitely speak in the same sense. Baptism is described as taking place before the Easter Eucharist, and the directions for the paschal fast and solemnities generally follow immediately after the directions for baptism. The arrangement suggests that in the mind of the author of the lost ancestor of so many of these manuals,—for most of them are of one family and follow the same outline,—the preparation for baptism was the original object of the Lenten fast. The Canons of Hippolytus (§§ 150-152) but these are bracketed by Achelis as probable interpolations) speak of a baptismal fast of the newly baptized, and those who fast with them. In § 106 a fast of the candidates on the Fridays is mentioned; on the Saturday they are exorcized (§ 108) and keep vigil all night, and are baptized at cock-crow (§ 112). The Egyptian Church Order (Sahidic Eccles. Canons, § 45) prescribes a Good Friday fast. The Verona Latin Fragments are wanting in the parallel passage, but make the fast a two days' one in a later chapter (Hauler, p. 116). The Testament of our Lord (ii. 6) says definitely: 'Let them fast both on the Friday and on the Saturday'; and this is not improbably also the meaning of both the Hippolytean Canons and the Egyptian Church Order. The latter, at least, in a later section (§ 55) speaks of the fast as a two days' one. Now the Egyptian Church Order and the Verona Fragments say that if a sick person cannot fast on the two days, he is to fast on the Saturday. The Testament of our Lord (ii. 20) implies the same thing. But this puts the idea of a Good Friday fast extended over the Saturday out of the question. Even the Apostolic Constitutions, which exhibit a later stage and a longer fast, speak of the two days' absolute fast, and say that if any one cannot fast on the two days he is at least to observe the Saturday (v. 18). It is a characteristic of this last named Church Order to retain ancient features even when somewhat inconsistent with its own later point of view. The other aspect, namely, of a Good Friday fast extended, is found in Tertullian. He speaks of the 'Psychics,'—i.e. the Church at large, from which he had now separated,—thinking that those days were definitely appointed for fasts in which the Bridegroom was taken away. The same language is found in the chapter of Apost. Const. just quoted, which thus combines the two ideas. It may not improbably be gathered from the evidence that the former point of view is the original one, and that the Lenten fast originated in the preparation for baptism, and that the second point of view was an afterthought.

The length of the fast was originally, as we have seen, one day, or two days, or forty hours. But it was an absolute fast. Another custom grew up in some countries in the 3rd cent. of observing the whole week before Easter, not as an absolute fast, but as a time of severe abstinence from food. It was called 'the week of zerophagy' (for the name cf. Tertullian, de Jejun. 2, 9). This is mentioned in the Hippolytean Canons (§ 197), which allow bread and salt and water only, and by Dionysius of Alexandria in his Epistle to Basilides (can. 1). He says that 'all do not carry out the six days of fasting either equally or alike; but some pass even all the days as a fast, remaining without food through the whole; while others take but two, and others three, and others four, and others not even one.' It is possible, as many think, that Dionysius is the author of the Hippolytean Canons, and that they represent Alexandrian usage, not Roman. The Montanists observed a two weeks' fast, a custom which they kept up till the 5th cent., when, as Sozomen tells us (HE vii. 19), they were distinguished by fasting less than their neighbours; formerly they had fasted longer, when Holy Week had been the maximum (cf. Tertullian, de Jejun. 15, when he says that the Montanists offered to God two weeks of zerophagy in the year, Saturday and Sunday being excepted). Epiphanius says that the Catholic Church observed a whole week, as opposed to the Quartodecimans, who observed only one day (Har. 1. 3, lib. ii. tom. 1).

Fasting for forty days was unknown till the 4th century. To maintain this proposition we must, with Achelis, eliminate 'et quadragesima' from Can. Hippol. 154 (the canon having obviously suffered interpolations), unless these words could refer to the 'forty hours' absolute fast mentioned by Irenaeus; and similarly we must, with almost all scholars, reject the words in Origen's tenth Homily on Leviticus: 'Habemus enim quadraginta dies jejuniis consecratos,' which come just before he speaks of the Wednesday and Friday fasts. We have the homily in Rufinus' translation only, and Rufinus was notoriously lax in interpolating and altering Origen's words. These eliminations will be generally agreed to, for we can see the forty days' fast growing before our eyes in the 4th century. We find zerophagy mentioned in the fifth canon of Nicea, A.D. 325, but as a season only (the holding of synods is the subject), doubtless as a solemn time, but without any reference to fasting. Duchesne seems to have overlooked this point, which adds to his argument (Origines, viii. § 4). In the Testament of our Lord (ii. 8) the 'forty days of Pascha' are spoken of as a time of vigil and prayer, specially used for the preparation of catechumens for baptism, but it is not a fast. On the other hand, in the Apostolic Canons (69 or 68), c. 400 A.D., we read of τὸ ἅγιον τετρακαισάκοντα ἡμέρας as a compulsory fast. This is one of the indications of a comparatively early date for the Testament. Duchesne (l.c.) has traced in Athanasius' 'Festal Letters' the growth of the fast. At first we read of the time of Lent and of the week of the fast, but later on of the fast of Lent and the Holy Week of Pascha.

In the Edessene Canons (can. 7; see 'Syriac Documents' in the Ante-Nicene Christ. Libr. p. 39) a forty days' fast is prescribed: 'and then celebrate the day of the Passion and the day of the Resurrection; because our Lord . . . fasted forty days, and likewise Moses and Elijah. . . . Can this be a relic of the observance of the Passion and the Resurrection on the same day?'

In Apost. Const. v. 13 the forty days are exclusive of Holy Week, and so in pseudo-Ignatius (Philipp. 13), and in St. Chrysostom (Hom. 39 in Gen. § 1). In the Testament of our Lord they include Holy Week.

Socrates (HE v. 22) says that the fasts before Easter differed in his day. At Rome they fasted for three continuous (contiguous) weeks, save on Saturday and Sunday; in Illyricum and Greece and Alexandria for six weeks, which they called τετρακαισάκοντα; others, beginning their fast seven weeks before Easter, fasted three periods of five days only, but still called it τετρακαισάκοντα. A difficulty is seen in this passage because Socrates had just said that every Saturday was a fast at Rome. Duchesne proposes to amend Socrates as far as the word 'contiguous' is concerned, and supposes that the three weeks were the first, fourth, and sixth weeks of Lent. He justly remarks that the divergence of fasting, while the same name εὐχέλαιος was kept, points to the fact that the 'forty days' were introduced for another purpose than that of fasting. In fact, the prevalence of forty days is due largely to the fact that catechumens were under instruction for that time. The catechumens were indeed often longer, though St. Jerome (Ep. 61) says that in his time forty days was the usual period. We find two years at Elvira, three years in the Egyptian Church Order and the Testament of our Lord, though a good deal of discretion was allowed. But in any case, at the beginning of the forty days the selected candidates for baptism (competentes) were put apart and went through special instruction, with prayers, benedictions, and exorcisms, as is described at length in the Church Order.

(f) Palm Sunday appears for the first time in the Pilgrimage of 'Silvia.' Formerly we had only known of it as being kept at the end of the 5th cent., a hundred years later; it is mentioned in the life of Euthymius († 472). The appearance of the festival at Jerusalem is significant. It was doubtless due to the desire to commemorate our Lord's entry into Jerusalem on the spot where it happened. 'Silvia' says: 'On this day, at the seventh hour (1 p.m.) all go to the church on the Mount of Olives, where service is held; and at 5 p.m. they read the Gospel story of the events of the day, and all proceed on foot to Jerusalem, the people crying, Blessed is he who cometh in the name of the Lord; some bearing palm branches, some olives; and so the bishop, after the type of our Lord, is conducted to the Holy City very slowly.' The palms and olives are an instructive comment on the Gospel account.

(g) Maunder Thursday is not in early times mentioned as being observed in commemoration of the Last Supper. Duchesne (Orig. viii. § 3) seems to think that it was so observed at Rome at least, in the primitive ages, but there is no evidence for it. The earliest authority for an Eucharist on this day is the Testament of our Lord (c. 350), which in a very difficult and apparently corrupt passage prescribes it (ii. 11); probably, as a comparison of the Copto-Arabic tr. of the work with James of Edessa's Syriac shows, in the evening (see Cooper-Maclean's note, p. 226). On this day also the deacon offered 'a lamp in the temple' (ib.). 'Silvia,' at the end of the same century, describes the Eucharist in the church called 'The Martyrium' or Golgotha, in the afternoon; it was over by 4 p.m., and then there was—on this occasion alone in all the year—a celebration of the Eucharist in the little chapel of the Cross, to the east of Golgotha. The bishop celebrated, and all communicated. In Africa at the same time there was an evening Eucharist on this day, and the people were exempted from the customary fast before Holy Communion on this occasion by the Third Council of Carthage, A.D. 397 (can. 29: 'excepto uno die anniversario quo comae domini celebratur'; Mansi-Labbé, iii. col. 885). It will be seen that, strictly speaking, these Eucharists, if celebrated after sunset, were at the beginning of Good Friday rather than on the Thursday. St. Augustine (Ep. liv., see below) says that there were in his time two Eucharists on the Thursday, one for the sake of those who could not fast till evening, and would not receive the Eucharist otherwise.

In the preparation for baptism this Thursday played an important part. The candidates were bidden to bathe on this day, apparently as a ceremonial washing (Hippol. Can. 106; Egyptian Church Order, 45 [so Lagarde rightly]; Test. of our Lord, ii. 6; Augustine, Epp. liv. 10, lv. 33 ad Januarius). Bathing at Pascha was not confined to the competentes; in the Testament the widows (presbytereesses) are bidden to bathe on that day (i. 42). There appears also to have been on that day the custom in some places of washing the feet of the competentes in memory of the pedilavium of Jn 13<sup>4a</sup>—a custom which afterwards gave the name to Maundy Thursday (from the 'new commandment,' mandatum, Jn 13<sup>4a</sup>). Elsewhere the pedilavium took place after baptism. The council of Elvira (can. 48) forbade priests or clergy to wash the feet of the newly baptized. Pseudo-Ambrose (de Sacramentis, iii. 1) says that this was the custom at the place where he wrote (not Milan?), but that it did not obtain at Rome. In the Gallican Church also it was common (Hefele, Councils, i. 188, Eng. tr.).

(h) Easter Week.—The observance of the days after Easter is mentioned in the Apostolic Constitutions ('the great week [Holy Week] and that which follows it,' viii. 32). This fortnight was to be a time of rest for slaves, that they might be instructed. St. Chrysostom (Hom. 34 de Res. Chr.) also mentions Easter Week. In 'Silvia,' Easter, as well as Epiphany [Christmas] and the Dedication, has an octave during which 'stations' are held at the various churches in and near Jerusalem. But, with this exception, octaves outside Easter Week are Western and not Eastern.

2. Pentecost and Ascension.—(a) The name 'Pentecost' had in the first four centuries two meanings, the fiftieth day after Easter, and the whole season of fifty days after that festival.

(α) It is used as a day in NT: Ac 2<sup>1</sup> ('the day of Pentecost'), 20<sup>16</sup> (id.), I Co 16<sup>8</sup> ('until Pentecost'); the Jewish nomenclature was continued in the Apostolic age. We find the same sense in succeeding ages, though perhaps not so frequently as the other. A fragment of Irenæus, quoted by pseudo-Justin (Quæst. et Respons. ad Orthodoxos, 115) seems to speak of the day: 'Irenæus . . . in his treatise περὶ τοῦ πάσχα . . . makes mention of Pentecost also, on which (ἐν ᾧ) we do not bend the knee because it is of equal significance with the Lord's Day.' Pseudo-Justin in the corresponding question has ἀπὸ τοῦ πάσχα ἕως τῆς πενήκοστῆς. The 43rd canon of Elvira (c. 305 A.D.) has: 'ut cuncti diem Pentecostes celebremus.' 'Silvia' (vi. § 1) has 'a Pascha usque ad Quinquagesima, id est Pentecosten,' and (§ 3) 'Quinquagesimarum die, id est dominica.'

(β) On the other hand, the use of the name for the whole season is also common. Tertullian (de Bapt. 19) says that 'after Pascha, Pentecost is a very extensive (latissimum; v. l. latissimum) space for conferring baptisms, wherein, too, the Resurrection of the Lord was repeatedly proved among the disciples, and the hope of the Advent of the Lord indirectly pointed to, in that at that time, when He had been received back into the heavens, the angels told the Apostles that He would so come as He had withal ascended into the heavens, of course at Pentecost.' But he goes on to say that Jeremiah signified 'the day of the Passover and of Pentecost, which is properly a feast day.' In de Cor. 3 he has 'from Pascha to Pentecost.' In de Idol. 14 he says that the Jews would not have shared with Christians the Lord's Day, nor yet Pentecost. Thus he uses the word in both senses. Origen talks of 'living in the season of Pentecost' in the same passage (c. Cels. viii. 22) in which he talks of observing certain days, as, for example, the Lord's Day, the Preparation, the Passover, or Pentecost. He refers to the Descent of the Spirit. The 20th canon of Nicea forbids kneeling in the 'days of Pentecost,' as on the Lord's day. This is unlike St. Paul's usage; he knelt at this season (Ac 20<sup>36</sup> 21<sup>5</sup>). The Testament of our Lord speaks of 'the days of Pentecost' (i. 28, 42, ii. 12); it forbids any one to fast or kneel then, for these are 'the days of rest and joy.' St. Basil speaks of the 'seven weeks of the holy Pentecost' (On the Spirit, ch. 27, alter § 66).

The quotations given above show that Pentecost as a Christian festival goes back at least to Irenæus. It is rather curious that there is no reference to it between the NT and that Father; and with this fact we may compare the silence of the earlier writers about Easter; but, as Duchesne remarks (Orig. viii. § 4), Pentecost is implied rather than explicitly mentioned in early Christian writings.

(b) The Ascension.—The fortieth day after Easter was not, so far as we know, observed as a commemoration of our Lord's going up to heaven until at least the middle of the 4th century. In the Edessene Canons (can. 9) the Ascension is observed with Pentecost: 'At the completion of fifty (i.e. 'forty,' but this is clearly a later correction) days after His Resurrection, make ye a commemoration of His Ascension.' And so in 'Silvia' on the day of Pentecost there is a 'station' at the Mount of Olives, at the church called Imbomon, 'that is in that place whence the Lord ascended into heaven,' where the lection of the Ascension is read. This 'station' is held after another 'in Syon,' where the lection of the Descent of the Holy Ghost is read. Thus in this account both events are commemorated on the same day. The curious thing is that in 'Silvia' there is also an observance of the fortieth day after Easter; but then the 'station' is at Bethlehem, and there is no mention of the Ascension. The coupling together of the two events, which has its parallel in the joining together of Good Friday and Easter, as mentioned already, is illustrated by the curious thing in the Epistle of Barnabas cited above (I. § 4); the writer thought that the Ascension fell on a Sunday. Compare also Tertullian, de Bapt. 19 (see above, § 2 a).

Ascension Day is not found in the Testament of our Lord (c. 350 A.D.?) or in any of the earlier Church Orders, but it is found in the Apostolic Constitutions, the author of which made it his aim to increase the festal cycle (v. 19, viii. 82). Sermons preached on this occasion are found in the 4th cent., by Eusebius of Emesa (c. 350 A.D.), Epiphanius, Gregory of Nyssa, and Chrysostom. The title of Gregory's sermon calls the festival ἑξήκοντα, which apparently means 'an extra festival.' It does not appear certain, however, that these Fathers kept it on the fortieth day after Easter. St. Augustine (Ep. liv. § 1, ad Januar.) treats it as universal in A.D. 400: 'They are held as approved and instituted either by the Apostles themselves or by plenary councils... for example, the annual commemoration by special solemnities of the Lord's Passion, Resurrection, and Ascension, and of the Descent of the Holy Spirit from heaven.'

3. Christmas and Epiphany.—(a) Their origin.—These festivals are of much later date than Easter and Pentecost, and were probably unknown till nearly A.D. 300. They were both, in their origin, one festival, and both were meant to commemorate the Nativity of our Lord; but the East fixed on one day and the West on another as the date of the birth of Christ, and so in course of time two separate festivals emerged.

Before we consider the evidence for the observance of 25th December and 6th January as festivals, it will be desirable to investigate the reason why these two days were chosen. The most probable solution of the matter, in the light of our present knowledge, is that of Duchesne (Origines, ch. viii. § 5), whose theory is followed here. The date 25th December was first arrived at apparently by Hippolytus. Other calculations had fixed on 18th or 19th April or 29th May (Clement of Alexandria, Strom. i. 147, ed. Potter, Oxford, 1715, p. 407: 'on the 25th day of the month Pachon'; see the whole passage); and about A.D. 243 the treatise de Pascha Computus of pseudo-Cyprian (see above, II. § 1 d) named 28th March. The calculations of Hippolytus, which were his mature results (for he had formerly fixed on 2nd January), prevailed all over the West. They are found in his Commentary on Daniel (iv. 23, p. 244, ed. Bonwetsch; aliter iv. 9). They depend on the assumption that the earthly life of our Lord, from His conception to His death, lasted an exact number of years. The upholders of symbolical systems of numbers treated all fractions as imperfections. Acting on this idea, Hippolytus fixed on 25th March for the Annunciation, because he had, as he thought, discovered that the Crucifixion took place on that day (see above, § 1 d); he reckoned the Saviour's life as thirty-two years, from B.C. 3 to A.D. 29. Adding nine months, he arrived at 25th December as the day of the Nativity.*

The other date, 6th January, is not so easily accounted for. But Duchesne mentions a coincidence which increases the probability of his theory as to 25th December being correct. Sozomen (HE vii. 18) says that 'the Montanists who are called Popuzites and Phrygians' celebrated the Passover on 6th April. They reckoned that the world had been created on 'the ninth day before the kalends of April,' the vernal equinox, and that the sun was created 'on the fourteenth day of the moon occurring after the ninth day before the kalends of April'; and they always celebrated the Passover 'on this day, when it falls on the day of the Resurrection,' otherwise they celebrated it on the following Lord's day. They probably, then, thought that our Lord died on 6th April; and, as Duchesne remarks, that 'the Passover of Christ, being the true Passover, must fall due at typical maturity reckoned from the origin of all things.' But reckoning nine months from 6th April, on the same reasoning as that of Hippolytus, we arrive at 6th January.

We do not read of either of these days being observed as festivals in the 3rd century. The first mention of such a commemoration on 25th December is in the Philocalian Calendar (see below, § 8), which was copied in 354 A.D., but represents the official observances at Rome in A.D. 336. We find the entry: 'vij kal. Jan. Natus Christus in Bethleem Juda.' It is not indeed absolutely certain that 25th December was at that date observed as a feast; but it is highly probable that this was so, as the other days, commemorations of bishops of Rome and martyrs, seem to be noted in order that they might be observed. This was more than a century after Hippolytus.

It will be observed that the theory given above of the choice of 25th December takes no account of the heathen festival of the sun held on the same day. But it is quite possible that when, in the 4th cent., the Christians began to observe the Nativity as a festival, they seized on the coincidence between the day as calculated by Hippolytus and the heathen feast-day, and Christianizing the latter as the Birth of the true Sun of Righteousness, showed a good example to the pagan world by making the day a true holy day.

The Eastern festival of 6th January may be traced to about A.D. 300 among the orthodox. Clement of Alexandria, indeed (Strom. l.c.), says that the followers of Basilides celebrated the day of Jesus' baptism, 'spending the whole preceding night in lectures.' But the earliest orthodox mention of the day is in the Passion of Philip of Hieraclea, in the Diocletian persecution, A.D. 304. Philip says: 'Epiphania dies sanctus incumbit' (Ruinart, Act. Mart. Sic. p. 410). That it was of recent introduction when the Testament of our Lord was written (c. 350?), appears from there being no regulations for it as there are for Pascha and Pentecost. It is only just mentioned in that work

(* Epiphany; Syr. ܩܕܝܫܐ). And during the greater

* Other Patriotic assumptions were that the ministry of our Lord lasted one year only; the 'acceptable year of the Lord' (Lk. 4:19; see, ed., Clem. Alex. l.c., 'It was right for Him to preach for one year only'), and that Jesus was baptized on His thirtieth birthday (Lk. 3:21 etiam in epiphania). This last idea accounts for the baptism of Christ being commemorated on 6th January.

part of the 4th cent., and in some countries even later, 6th January was the only day observed in the East. The sixth Edessene canon prescribes 'the Epiphany of our Saviour, which is the chief of the festivals of the Church [this is significant], on the sixth day of the latter Kanun,' i.e. 6th January. Epiphanius knew of no other day. In Her. li. ('the Alogi,' lib. ii. tom. 1) he speaks of 'A.D. vi Id. Nov.' as being 60 days before the feast 'of the Epiphany,' when Christ was born according to the flesh (§ 18), and of 'the day in which He was born, that is, of the Epiphany, which is the sixth of January.' Cassian, at the end of the 4th cent., speaks of 'Epiphany, which the priests of that province [Egypt] regard as the time both of our Lord's baptism and also of his birth in the flesh, and so celebrate the commemoration of either mystery not separately as in the Western provinces, but in the single festival of this day' (Conferences, x. 2). Even later, Genadius (de Vir. Illustr. 59) says that 'Timothy the bishop wrote on the Nativity,' and that this work was thought to have been composed at Epiphany. Only 6th January was observed at Jerusalem in the time of 'Silvia,' when there was a 'station' at Bethlehem at night. As the manuscript is defective, we do not know whether there was a celebration of the Eucharist there, but it is probable that there was one, and this nocturnal 'station' may have been the origin of the Christmas midnight Eucharist of later days. The name of the Eastern festival was the 'Epiphany' or 'Theophany.' Traces of the older custom in the East of observing 6th January only are found in the 6th cent. at Jerusalem, where Cosmas Indicopleustes mentions it. He says that the Nativity and the Baptism were observed on the same day (Migne, Patr. Gr., vol. lxxviii. 197). The Armenians still observe only that day.

The Easterns, however, even at the end of the 4th cent., began to adopt the Western day in addition to their own; and probably soon afterwards the Westerns adopted the Eastern day as a separate festival. And thereafter on 25th December the Church commemorated the Nativity, and on 6th January other manifestations of our Lord's Divinity and glory. In the East the Baptism, with its manifestations, was and is alone emphasized on 6th January. In the West, as St. Augustine says early in the 5th cent. (see below), the coming of the Wise Men was the great commemoration. The Calendar of Polemius Silvius (A.D. 448) combines it with our Lord's baptism and the miracle at Cana (Wordsworth, Min. of Grace, viii. § 1; Migne, Patr. Lat. xiii. 676). In the present day all three events are commemorated.

St. Chrysostom in A.D. 386 tells us that Christmas, as distinct from Epiphany, had been only lately introduced at Antioch, less than ten years before (in Diem Natalem, ed. Montfaucon, Paris, 1718, ii. 355 A). In de Beato Philogonio (l. 497 C) he speaks of Epiphany, Easter, and the other festivals taking their origin from Christmas; for, if Christ had not been born, He would in no wise have been baptized, for that is the feast of the Theophany. In the Apostolic Constitutions both Christmas and Epiphany are mentioned (v. 13), and this is one of the chief factors in determining the date of that Syrian document. At Alexandria both festivals were observed before the year 432; for Paul, bishop of Emesa, preached there on his mission of peace after the Council of Ephesus on the Sunday before Christmas, on Christmas Day, and on the following Sunday, New Year's Day 433 (Smith-Wace, Dict. Chr. Biog. iv. 261, s.v. 'Paulus 30').

In the West, St. Augustine tells us that both days were observed in his time; he says that the Epiphany was kept 'per universam mundam,' but that the Donatists would not accept it. He implies that it had been introduced from the East, and says that the Donatists did not love unity, and did not communicate with the Eastern Church where that star [of the Magi] appeared (Sermon 202 in Epiphania Domini, iv.; see also Sermons 199-204. The six Sermons are almost entirely taken up with the coming of the Wise Men).

(b) Advent.—The first trace of this season is in the canons of Saragossa in Spain (Concilium Caserugustanum), c. 380 A.D. (Mansi-Labbé, iii. 633), which provide that from xvi kal. Jan. to the 'day of Epiphany, which is viij Id. Jan.', all are sedulously to attend church (can. 4). We notice here that 25th December is apparently unknown to this council, and that the preparatory season before 6th January is a solemn season of prayer and churchgoing, but not of fasting; much as the 'forty days of Pascha' are in the Treatment of our Lord. The latter work speaks of the 'days of Epiphany,' which may mean the days after Epiphany, or possibly the days before it, just as the 'days of Pascha' mean in this work the forty days before Easter, and the 'days of Pentecost' mean the fifty days before Whitsunday. But the reference to Advent is too uncertain to be built on.

4. The Presentation of Christ in the Temple.—For this commemoration 'Silvia' is our earliest authority. On this day, she says, all the presbyters preached, and last the bishop himself, 'on the events of the day, when Joseph says Mary bore the Lord into the temple, and Simeon saw Him, and Anna the prophetess, the daughter of Samuel' (sic). Then the Eucharist was celebrated. 'Silvia' calls this day 'Quadragesima de Epiphania,' i.e. 14th February. The assembly was at the Church of the Anasiasis. Here we have a clear indication of the way in which festivals at Jerusalem increased out of a desire to commemorate Gospel events in the holy places. From Jerusalem this festival spread elsewhere; but we do not hear of it, except in 'Silvia,' till the 6th century. Its name then was traxanti or the Meeting [of our Lord and Simeon]—a name still retained by the Greeks.

Although Hippolytus had fixed 25th March as the date of the Annunciation, no trace of any observance of the day as a festival is found in the first four centuries, nor indeed for long after. Possibly its frequent concurrence with the Paschal solemnities or the Lenten fast prevented this. The Nestorians keep neither the Presentation nor the Annunciation.

5. Commemorations of Saints, etc.—These can be glanced at only briefly in a Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels. They were originally of local origin, and did not at once become popular except in the places where they began. The earliest known collection of local saints' days is the Philocalian Calendar of A.D. 354, which may be conveniently seen in Ruinart's Acta Martyrum Sinera et selecta, p. 617, and in Migne's Patrologia Latina, vol. xlii.; reference may also be made to Bishop Lightfoot's essay in his Clement (i. 246, on 'The Liberian Catalogue'). It is the only extant calendar which is certainly older than A.D. 400, though portions of a Gothic calendar remain which may be dated shortly before that year. The so-called Hieronymian Martyrology is much later than St. Jerome. The Christian section of the Philocalian Calendar (for it has also a heathen section) is a Roman list. It has two parts: the Depositio (burial) episcoporum, and the Depositio martyrum. Under the first head it contains twelve names: Dionysius, Felix, Sylvester, Miltiades, Marcellinus, Lucius, Caius, Stephen, Eusebius, Marcus, Eutichianus, Julius. Julius and Marcus come out of their calendrical order (not Marcus in Ruinart), and are probably later additions (Lightfoot). The second part begins with Christmas (as above, § 3), and contains no other festival of Christ. It is, no doubt, the official list of martyrs commemorated at Rome at the time. Its names are all local, except Cyprian and Perpetua and Felicitas, which are African. In all there are 37 entries, as given by Ruinart; but some have more than one name. The first part begins at vi kal. Jan., and its latest date is vi Id. Dec. Of the second part viii kal. Jan. is the beginning and Id. Dec. is the end. The beginning of the year must therefore have been reckoned as Christmas Day (25th December), or at least some day between 13th and 25th December. It is interesting to note in this early calendar 'iii kal. Jul. [i.e. June 29] Petri in Catacumbas et Pauli Ostiense Tusco et Basso Coss.,' that is the translation of the bodies of these Apostles.

A Syriac Martyrology published in 1866 by Professor Wright must also be mentioned, as, though the copy in the British Museum dates from 411, it gives (if careful examination be applied to it) earlier lists still. It is an Eastern Martyrology translated into Syriac and abridged at Edessa about 400 A.D. from a collection made in Greek out of local calendars. It has two Roman entries, one African, and the rest are Eastern; it must have been originally Arian, as it does not contain the name of Athanasius, but has that of Arius ('at Alexandria, Arius the presbyter'). Analysis shows it to have been made up of the local lists of Nicomedia, Antioch, and Alexandria. The two latter appear to have contained, at about A.D. 350, 24 and 26 entries respectively. This shows the limited numbers of commemorations in the 4th century. The lists, however, speedily grew to large dimensions. For other early calendars reference may be made to the works mentioned below.

The observance of the death-days (natales) or burial days (depositiones) of martyrs may be traced back to the 2nd cent., c. 155 A.D.; the letter of the Smyrnaeans on the martyrdom of St. Polycarp speaks (§ 18) of his burial-place 'where the Lord will permit us to gather ourselves together . . . to celebrate the birthday of his martyrdom for the commemoration of those that have already fought in the contest, and for the training and preparation of those that shall do so hereafter.' This letter was written soon after the martyrdom (see Lightfoot's Ignatius and Polycarp, iii. 353 ff.). St. Cyprian says that the death-days of the martyrs were to be carefully noted, that they might observe such commemorations with Eucharist (Ep. 12, to his presbyters and deacons). The 18th Edessene Canon orders commemorations of the martyrs. And such commemorations are mentioned by St. Basil (Ep. 93, as above, I. § 3).

For the purposes of this Dictionary, the observances of the days following 25th December are of interest, as being closely connected with the Nativity of our Lord. These observances date from the 4th century. St. Gregory of Nyssa, preaching the funeral oration of his brother St. Basil (who died 1st January 379), says that they were then celebrating these saints' days, which were convenient (he remarks) because Apostles and Prophets were first constituted and ordained, and after that pastors and teachers. He first mentions the commemoration of the Apostles and Prophets after Christmas, namely, Stephen, Peter, James, John, Paul; and then Basil (in Laudem Fratris Basilii, ad init., ed. Paris of 1638, p. 479). It does not necessarily follow that the saints mentioned were commemorated on different days. The Apostolic Constitutions mention a commemoration of the martyrs and 'blessed James the bishop [the Lord's brother], and 'the holy Stephen our fellow-servant' (v. 8; so viii. 32). The Syriac Martyrology mentioned above gives St. Stephen on 26th December, St. James and St. John on 27th December, St. Peter and St. Paul on 28th December. With this we may compare two later usages, the Armenian and the Nestorian (East Syrian), as these separated Christians have retained many early customs which others have dropped. The Armenians, who do not observe 25th December as Christmas, commemorate St. David and St. James the Lord's brother on that date, but follow the Syriac Martyrology for the other days, save that they transpose 27th and 28th December (Duchesne, Orig. viii. § 5. 2). The Nestorian usage is somewhat different. That Church keeps its saints' days according to the movable Christian year rather than according to the month, and most of them fall on Fridays. The Fridays after Christmas (25th December), if there are sufficient before Lent, are (1) St. James the Lord's brother, (2) St. Mary, (3) St. John Baptist, (4) St. Peter and St. Paul, (5) Four Evangelists, (6) St. Stephen; and other festivals of later origin follow (Maclean, East Syrian Daily Offices, p. 264 ff.). Duchesne conjectures that the 'Four Evangelists' is a transformation of St. James and St. John, the latter having attracted to him the three other Evangelists, and the former being omitted. The Orthodox Easterns now commemorate St. James the Lord's brother on the Sunday after Christmas.

'Silvia' has not, like the Apostolic Constitutions, a general martyrs' festival; nor yet have the other Church Orders. But considering the great development of festivals in 'Silvia,' it is not improbable that she did describe such a general commemoration; only the manuscript breaks off suddenly in the middle of the account of the Dedication festival, and we cannot be sure of what was in the lacuna.

Speaking generally, we note a difference between these commemorations and the festivals of our Lord. The former were at first local only, and of inferior importance. The Nestorians to this day keep up a sharp distinction between the two, calling the former ܕܘܚܘܢܐ commemorations, the latter ܕܘܚܘܢܐ festivals, or ܕܘܚܘܢܐ festivals of our Lord; and the distinction is ancient.

Dedication festivals were common in the 4th cent., though they are not mentioned in the Church Orders, even in those, like the Testament of our Lord, which describe the church buildings minutely. These festivals concern us here only as contributing to the calendar Holy Cross Day, which was the commemoration of the dedication in 335 of the churches built by Constantine on the site of the Holy Sepulchre and Calvary, and of the alleged discovery of the true cross by St. Helena, Constantine's mother. 'Silvia' says that the anniversary was observed with great ceremony in her time, many pilgrims from distant lands attending, and the churches being adorned as at Easter and Christmas. This day (14th September, but among the Nestorians 13th September) passed from Jerusalem to Constantinople; at Rome it was not introduced till the 7th century.

Of the other days of Apostles, Martyrs, or Confessors, most of which are of later introduction than the 4th cent., it may be observed that the majority, at least, are due to the local dedication of a church named after the saint at Rome, Constantinople, or elsewhere. See Duchesne, Orig. ch. viii. passim.

RECAPITULATION OF FESTAL CYCLES.—
Fathers of the first three centuries: Pascha and Pentecost.

Testament of our Lord: Pascha, Pentecost, and Epiphany.
Apostolic Constitutions: Ascension, Pentecost, Pascha, Christmas, Epiphany, Apostles' days (plural), St. Stephen and All Martyrs' day (singular)—viii. 32 Lagarde (aliter 33). Add St. James the Lord's brother, v. 8. [The sections of the Apost. Const. mentioned in this article are all Lagarde's].
Pilgrimage of Silvia: Epiphany with octave, Presentation, Palm Sunday, Easter with octave, Fortieth day after Easter, Pentecost (including Ascension), Dedication (Holy Cross Day).
Cappadocian Fathers and Syriac Martyrology: Add St. Stephen, St. Peter and St. Paul, St. James and St. John.

The account of the Christian calendar is thus brought down to about A.D. 400. For festivals introduced after that date reference may be made to the various works on Christian history and antiquities.

CALL, CALLING.—

1. Terms.
  - (a) OT.
  - (b) Gospels.
  - (c) Epistles.
2. Secular calling.
  - (a) Our Lord's Messianic vocation.
  - (b) The Apostolic calling.
  - (c) Other calls to service.
  - (d) The Gospel call in Christ's own teaching.
3. Spiritual calling.

1. THE TERMS.—(a) The OT.—The substantive 'call' is not found in the English Bible. If used of an animal's call, it tends to imply a significant note—e.g. a mother's call to her brood (Bunyan, PF ii. 62)—not a mere emotional cry. The English verb 'call' has for its primary meaning 'to speak loudly.' In Hebrew we note the same implication in קָרָא, e.g. Pr 8<sup>1</sup>; but in Hebrew the word still more strongly suggests articulate human speech, even perhaps in Ps 147<sup>7</sup> (although the partridge probably derives its name קָרָא from its calling). It is indeed the technical word for reading (e.g. Is 29<sup>13</sup>); the Hebrews read aloud and prayed aloud. Eli suspected Hannah (1 S 1<sup>13</sup>) not because her lips moved in private prayer—rather because in the intensity and modesty of her desire she prayed without sound. Loudness may express authority; or it may be a simple effort to attract notice. Anyway, a 'call,' Hebrew or English, is a loud and definite communication from one person to another. Either language may use the verb intransitively, but always with a sort of latent transitivity. In Greek, on the other hand, καλεω is transitive. What is implied in the other languages is explicit in this one. Definiteness (and perhaps authority) receives reinforcement when the calling is by name. We are probably not to confuse this with the mere giving of a name; though, according to the ideas of the ancient world, so much power is wrapped up in names that there may be a certain infiltration of that thought in the Biblical usage of calling by name. But, more simply, one's name arrests one's attention, and assures one that the call is addressed to him. In Deutero-Isaiah it is said that Jehovah has a name for every star (Is 40<sup>26</sup> [we need not discuss whether the stars are here conceived as alive], imitated in Ps 147<sup>4</sup>). That signifies His power; it is rather His condescension that is shown when He calls the prophetic servant, Israel, by name (Is 43<sup>3</sup>). Again, He calls Cyrus 'by name' to his historic functions (Is 45<sup>4</sup>, cf. also Ex 31<sup>2</sup> [P]). If our text is to be trusted, Jehovah even 'surnames' Cyrus (Is 45<sup>4</sup>). It is a mark of kindness when a servant is not simply 'waiter' or 'guard' to his rich employer, but has a name and a recognized personality of his own. (Here cf. Ex 33<sup>12-17</sup>). To 'surname,' at least in the strict sense, is a still stronger proof of friendly interest; surnames are a token of some new destiny, or else imply knowledge of idiosyncrasies. (Acc. to P, Jehovah renames 'Abram' and 'Sarai,' Gn 17<sup>1, 15</sup>, while Moses renames 'Hoshea,' Nu 13<sup>16</sup>; cf. also the surnames given by our Lord to the three leading Apostles, Mk 3<sup>16, 17</sup>). It is also in Deutero-Isaiah that we find the emergence of 'call' in a sort of theological sense; the 'call' of Abraham (51<sup>2</sup> 'I called him').

Another important section of the OT for our terminology is the 'Praise of Wisdom,' Pr 1-9. Several things are noticeable here; the loud call—Divine Wisdom as a street preacher (8<sup>1</sup>, cf. 1<sup>20</sup>); the solemn religious conception of the call rejected (1<sup>24</sup>); the call as an invitation to a feast (ch. 9). This last usage ('call' = 'invite'), while obsolete in modern English, is found in its literal sense both in OT and NT of our version; e.g. 1 K 1<sup>8</sup>, Jn 2<sup>2</sup> AV.

Still another group of OT passages may seem to require notice—those describing the 'call' of various prophets. The term is not so used in OT (unless Is 61<sup>1</sup>—see above—Abraham is a 'prophet' in Gn 20<sup>7</sup> [E]). But there is a passage which would lend itself excellently to this interpretation—the tale of the call of the young Samuel, where we have three interesting parallel usages: Jehovah 'called to Samuel' (1 S 3<sup>10</sup> literally), 'called Samuel' (v. 8), 'called . . . Samuel, Samuel' (v. 10).

There are therefore several usages of the word 'to call' in OT which we ought to keep in mind as we approach the Gospels. It means command, or it means invitation. It means a summons to a special function, or it means (along with that) a peculiar mark of gracious condescension. (b) In the Gospels, the verb may occur in the literal sense (Mt 20<sup>9</sup>). But in general a compound form is preferred for such sense; e.g. when Jesus calls (προσκαλεσάμενος) His disciples near Him for a short talk (Mk 10<sup>22</sup>). We have the simple form in one important passage when James and John are 'called' (Mk 1<sup>2</sup> || Mt 4<sup>22</sup> ἐκλέξας), though the compound (προσκαλεῖται) is found in Mark's record of the selection of the Twelve (3<sup>12</sup>), while in the parallel in Luke (6<sup>13</sup>) προσεφώνησεν is employed. It might be argued that, even here, the mere word 'called' means no more than 'called to Himself.' Still, in view of OT antecedents, that is questionable. Anyway, as a matter of fact, those 'calls' were commands and invitations, to 'leave all' (Mk 10<sup>28</sup>) and follow Jesus—to take up solemn functions in His service. When compounds of καλεω are used, or when φωνεω is used, we need not suspect deep religious or theological significance in the word. Yet here again the fact has to be dealt with. Jesus may simply 'call to' (φωρεῖν) Bartimæus (Mk 10<sup>46</sup>); but the result of the conversation (and miracle) is that he who had been blind 'follows Jesus in the way' (10<sup>47</sup>). In two other passages the group of meanings associated with Pr 1-9—privilege rather than authority; invitation, rather than command—come to the front: 'I came not to call (καλέω) the righteous, but sinners' (Mk 2<sup>17</sup>; Mt 9<sup>13</sup>; Lk 5<sup>28</sup> adds 'to repentance'), and 'many are called (καλεῖται), but few chosen' (Mt 22<sup>14</sup>); in 20<sup>16</sup> these words are rightly dropped by RV as not belonging to the original text.

(c) Though our concern is with the Gospels, we cannot refuse to consult the Epistles for the light they may throw on Gospel usage. They give us a cognate substantive; not 'call' but 'calling.' 'Call' as a substantive occurs in English much earlier than our AV, but presumably the purely physical idea—the audible call—was too strongly marked in it to allow of its standing for God's address to the conscience. 'Calling,' which was preferred, reproduces the form of the Greek substantive καλῶν. This term is mainly Pauline (e.g. 1 Co 1<sup>26</sup>), though it extends into Hebrews (3<sup>1</sup>) and (at least so far as the verb is concerned) into 1 Peter (1<sup>15</sup> 2<sup>21</sup>). As moulded by St. Paul, there is no doubt that the 'call' is primarily one to salvation (Ro 8<sup>30-30</sup>), though it may also signify special (Apostolic) function (Ro 1<sup>1</sup>). The Epistle to the Hebrews reserves the same twofold reference. All believers 'partake of a heavenly calling' (3<sup>1</sup>), but none may take high honour or office upon himself except when 'called' by God thereto (5<sup>4</sup>). Later in the history of English speech, the physical implications of the noun 'call' having been in some measure rubbed off, its use in religious use, so as generally to displace 'calling.' We say the 'call' not 'calling' of Abraham; but if Scripture had used a substantive, 'calling' would have been installed by our translators in this phrase. The NT 'calling' is a single definite act in the past, whether personal conversion [sometimes acceptance of Divinely imposed duty] or the historic mission of Christ. He who 'called' us is holy (1 P 1<sup>15</sup>). In our modern use of 'calling,' something seems borrowed from the idea of a worldly calling, viz. habitualness. Acc. to Murray's Dictionary, 1 Co 7<sup>20</sup> introduced—almost by an accident—the use of 'calling' for worldly rank, station, external surroundings. 'Hence,' it adds, "'calling" came to be applied to the various means of bread-winning.' [The exegesis of the verse is disputed, but the view the Dictionary proceeds on seems to be right. It is not, of course, pretended that 'calling' in 1 Co 7<sup>20</sup> means exactly trade or profession. St. Paul would never make it matter of conscience that a Christian should refrain from changing his trade]. Both these senses—viz. (1) station, and (2) trade—are often (unwarrantably, the Dictionary seems to think, as far as etymology goes) regarded as Divine vocations. This is surely obscure. If 1 Co 7<sup>20</sup> taught so little, can we hold it responsible for a twofold set of meanings? May not professional 'calling' rather mean, in the first instance, 'what I am called'—William [the] Smith, John [the] Taylor? a still humbler etymology. However that may be, the idea of Divine vocation in daily concerns could not be ruled out from Christian thought. Thus inevitably Christians have been led to formulate the idea of a lifelong Divine vocation, covering all externals, but centring in the heart. It may be repeated that 'calling' (the substantive) is not found in the Gospels; of course the word is not found anywhere in the EV in the sense of 'trade.'

2. SECULAR CALLING.—It is unnecessary to pass under review the occupations followed by our Lord in youth and by His Apostles. See art. TRADES, CARPENTER, FISHING, etc.

3. SPIRITUAL CALLING.—(a) Our Lord Himself, who calls all others, was 'called of God' (He 5<sup>4</sup>) to the Messiahship. It is an irrelevant sentimentality that dwells too much on the 'carpenter of Nazareth.' Jesus was full of the consciousness of His calling, its requirements, its limitations. (Not to cite the Fourth Gospel—abundant signs of this, but in the usual golden haze blurring all sharp outlines—we have Mk 1<sup>38</sup> (?) 2<sup>17</sup> 10<sup>45</sup>, Mt 5<sup>17</sup> 15<sup>24</sup> etc. etc. It is one of the services of Ritschl to recent theology—with anticipations in von Hofmann—that he has made prominent the thought of Christ's vocation, displacing the less worthy and less ethical category of Christ's merit. In the Gospels this vocation is expressed by the word 'sent' or I 'came' (as above; or 'him that sent me,' Jn 4<sup>34</sup> etc.), not by 'call.' If there is any one point in our Lord's life where it may be held that the 'call' definitely reached Him,—where He became conscious of Messiahship,—we must seek it at His baptism (Mk 1<sup>9-11</sup>; three parallels).

(b) In dealing with the call addressed by Christ to His disciples, we begin with the Apostles. Taking the different Gospels together, we seem to recognize three stages. (1) According to St. John, Christ's first disciples were Galileans who, like Himself, had visited the Jordan in order to be baptized by John: Andrew, John, Simon Peter, Philip, Nathanael (presumably = Bartholomew; see art. BARTHOLOMEW, above), and presumably James the brother of John (Jn 1<sup>38-51</sup>). The only one mentioned as called with a 'follow me' is Philip (1<sup>38</sup>); and it is possible that this is rather an invitation to follow on the journey to Galilee than through life (and death). For the rest, we have acquaintanceships and attachments apparently forming themselves—elective affinities displayed, rather than the Master's will exercised ad hoc; but the result, according to St. John, is the formation of a small yet definite circle, who are disciples (2<sup>12-17</sup> etc. etc.) of Jesus now, as before (and as they themselves previously were) of John the Baptist. (2) The Synoptists tell us of the call in Galilee ('Come ye after me,' Mk 1<sup>17</sup>; Mt 4<sup>19</sup>; 'He called them,' Mk 1<sup>20</sup>; Mt 4<sup>21</sup>) of Peter, Andrew, James, John. The first two are called with a sort of pleasantry; they are to be 'fishers of men,' in allusion to their former occupation. St. Luke has the same narrative (5<sup>1-11</sup>) in a more picturesque form; the borrowing of Peter's boat, in order to teach from it as a pulpit; payment after sermon in the form of a miraculous draught of fishes; Peter's fear as a sinner at the near presence of the supernatural; the same kindly bon mot; all four fishermen [i.v.] on the spot; all four becoming disciples. Here the call (see art. DISCIPLE below) involves leaving everything to follow Christ (Lk 5<sup>11</sup>, Mk 10<sup>28</sup> cf. Lk. 20, Mt 19<sup>27</sup> cf. 4<sup>20-22</sup>). Previous acquaintance with these men may have induced Jesus to begin His teaching by the Sea of Galilee [an 'undesigned coincidence'?). Other members of the disciple circle in Galilee must have been added one by one; some by elective affinity! Not all volunteers might be repelled like the scribe of Mt 8<sup>19</sup>; Lk 9<sup>56</sup>. Matthew the publican, however (Mt 9<sup>9</sup>, Lk 5<sup>27</sup> Levi, Mk 2<sup>14</sup> Levi the son of Alphæus), is called straight from his place of toll to 'follow,' and instantly obeys; a memorable incident. (3) The final 'call' in this series appears when Jesus 'calls to him whom he himself will,' and appoints twelve, that they may be with him, and that he may send them forth to preach and . . . cast out devils' (Mk 3<sup>13</sup> etc.; so too, though less clearly, Lk 6<sup>13</sup>; not in Mt.; 10<sup>1</sup> 'his twelve disciples,' v. 2 'the twelve apostles'). (4) Or, if there is another stage still, it is marked when they are 'sent out' for the first time (Mt 10<sup>5</sup>, Mk 6<sup>7</sup>, Lk 9<sup>1</sup>), or when in consequence of this the name 'apostles' (see art. APOSTLE) is attached to them. Thus, in the case of at least twelve men, the call has issued in a very definite calling; permanent, and in a sense official.

(c) Another group possesses a varied interest. It includes volunteers; it relates 'calls' to service addressed to those who were not destined to be Apostles; it offers examples of the call rejected. There are four cases; the rich young ruler (Mk 10<sup>17</sup> etc. and parallels), and a group of three found together (Lk 9<sup>57-62</sup>; partial parallel Mt 8<sup>19-22</sup>). The scribe (see Mt.) who volunteers means, or professes to mean, discipleship in the intense sense. He will follow 'wherever the Master goes'; he will 'leave all' like the Twelve; the stumbling-block of property, which was too much for the young ruler, is no stumbling-block to him. This volunteer meets not with welcome but rebuff; and, so far as we know, there is an end of his gospel service. Again, the man whose father is just dead—that seems the inexorable sense of the words—is needed immediately as a herald of the 'Kingdom of God' (so Luke). And the other volunteer, who, with less urgency (so far as we are told) is anxious 'first' to bid farewell to his home circle, is 'looking back' from the plough. St. Luke seems well justified in making these narratives introduce a wider mission (that of the 'Seventy'). And here we get important light on the demand that the rich young ruler should give away his property. This may have seemed to our Lord's discernment necessary for the man's own safety—does not the sequel point in that direction? But, even independently of that, though a Christian might be a man of means (see below), a wandering preacher could hardly be. These were calls to service, which met, temporarily or finally, with tragic refusal. Whatever else the refusal may have implied is God's secret.

(d) So far we have dealt chiefly with authority; when we consider the few cases in the Gospels where the call is generalized—not the righteous but sinners' (Mk 2<sup>17</sup> || Mt 9<sup>13</sup> || Lk 5<sup>29</sup>); 'many called, few chosen' (Mt 22<sup>14</sup>)—invitation comes to the front. The parable depicting the Kingdom of God as a Feast (Mt 22<sup>2-10</sup>; Lk 14<sup>15-24</sup>), while, of course, a parable and not to be pressed too far, emphasizes this. Its language recalls Pr 9. And it has been remarked that the well-known lovely 'gospel invitation' (Mt 11<sup>28-30</sup>) strongly suggests Divine Wisdom speaking. More questionable is the idea started by Bruce in the Expos. Gr. Test. that Jesus literally invited outcasts to a free meal at a public hall in the name of Levi (Matthew)—a sort of Free Breakfast or Midnight Supper. On the other hand, the very earliest form of the general call is pure authority; 'Repent' (Mt 4<sup>17</sup>, Mk 1<sup>15</sup>).

In all these cases, language itself helps us to vindicate the great truth, that the call of Christ is not merely a call to some external form of service under rapidly vanishing conditions, but a call addressed to heart and conscience; in other words, that Christianity is essentially a religion. Of course, this truth becomes clearer in the Epistles, or in the Fourth Gospel, than in the earlier and less reflective Gospels; but, in regard to our 'calling,' as in all respects, the teaching of Christ Himself traces the plain outlines within which His Apostles afterwards work. Perhaps we ought to note here a difference at least in language between Christ and St. Paul. To the latter, the 'called' are eo ipso the 'elect' or 'predestinated' (Ro 8<sup>28-30, 33</sup>); to Christ, 'calling' (inviting) comes first (Mt 22<sup>14</sup>), and selection follows; 'after trial,' as it has been expressed. Our Lord's words, therefore, mark our Christian calling as a calling to service and as a probation. Though we are admitted to His friendship and love, all is not assured. According to His language in the Fourth Gospel, one 'given' to Christ may 'perish' (Jn 17<sup>12</sup>). The 'unfruitful' branch is 'taken away,' 'cast forth,' 'burned' (Jn 15<sup>6</sup>). All must stand before His judgment-seat; a thought which the parables spoken in view of separation, parables addressed to His own, particularly emphasize (Mt 25; some parallels). All must 'take up the cross' and 'follow Christ' to the uttermost (Mk 8<sup>34</sup> etc. etc.). The last command addressed to a friend by Christ, like the first, is 'follow me' (Jn 21<sup>19, 22</sup>).

The question has been raised whether Jesus' call did not imply a sort of fanaticism based on a mistaken expectation of the near end of the world. This is at least suggested by the purely eschatological view of the Kingdom of God (see art. KINGDOM OF GOD, below) in the Gospels, as taught by Bousset, J. Weiss, and others. If the imputation of fanaticism were historically warranted, all Christians must have been required to live in a fashion possible only to the first few; the call to repent must have been swallowed up in the call to share the Master's wandering life; our 'high calling' (Ph 3<sup>14</sup>), as declared by Christ, must have been deeply tinged with delusion. It is enough to point in reply to women friends of Jesus; to homes whose hospitality He consented to share; to a convert under exceptional circumstances not called nor even permitted to be with Christ, but sent home to be a witness there (Mk 5<sup>19</sup> || Lk 8<sup>30</sup>). The grain of truth in this heap of error has been indicated above. Our Christian calling is not merely to salvation, it is to service. One may add, that the principles of the Master's own teaching are likely to reveal lessons of severity for the Christian conscience which have been neglected in the past—to the great loss of both Church and world.

CALVARY.—See GOLGOTHA.

CAMEL, CAMEL'S HAIR.—The camel is by far the most useful of all animals in the East. There are two kinds of camels—the Turkish or Bactrian camel and the dromedary. The first is larger, has a double hump, and is capable of sustaining greater burdens; the latter is swifter, has a single hump, and is far less affected by extreme heat. The camel has been domesticated from time immemorial; it is now at least nowhere found in its aboriginal wild state, and nature has adapted it to its specific environment. Its nostrils are close and flat, to exclude the dust of the desert; its feet are heavily padded, and its anatomy shows provision for the enduring of great privation. It mocks hunger and thirst alike; it can go without water from sixteen to forty days.

The camel forms the staple wealth of the Arab of the desert, who utilizes every part of the animal, even to the dung, which is used as fuel. Its flesh was forbidden to the Jew (Lv 11<sup>4</sup>, Dt 14<sup>7</sup>). Its milk is extremely nutritious, and on fermentation becomes an intoxicant. A thick mat of fine hair protects the animal against the extremes alike of heat and cold.

The camel is mentioned three times in the Gospels, on two occasions as a synonym for size or bulkiness; Mt 19<sup>24</sup> (= Mk 10<sup>25</sup>, Lk 18<sup>25</sup>), 'It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God'; and 23<sup>34</sup> 'Ye blind guides, which strain out the gnat, and swallow the camel.' In the former of these passages two attempts have been made to evade the Oriental hyperbole, firstly, by reading κάμλος, 'a rope,' for κάμηλος; and, again, by explaining the 'eye of the needle' as the small door for foot-passengers which is generally made in the frame of the large entrance-door of an Eastern house. The expression 'eye of the needle,' however, is only the English equivalent of the Greek words denoting a 'hole.' The eye of a needle stands for something narrow and hard to pass, as in the Egyptian proverb, 'Straiter than the eye of a needle' (Burchardt, 396). A similar proverb is given by Freytag (ii. p. 19), 'Narrower than the shadow of a lance and than the hole of a needle.' And in the Koran we have (vii. 38), 'As for those who declare our signs to be lies, and who scorn them, the doors of heaven will not be open to them, nor will they enter Paradise, until a camel shall penetrate into the eye of a needle'—that is, never.

In the second of the two passages above, the camel is contrasted with the gnat, 'Ye blind guides, which strain out a gnat, and drink down a camel.' The gnat stands for an emblem of smallness in the Koran (ii. 24, 'God is not ashamed to strike a proverb out of a gnat'). In Arabic the elephant rather than the camel is chosen to designate hugeness, as in the song of Kaab ibn Zuhair—

If there stood in the place which I stand in an elephant, and the camel is an emblem of patience and silent endurance, and goes by the name of 'the father of Job.' The elephant must have been a not unfamiliar object in Palestine in the first century, but would naturally be thought of in connexion with Hellenism and idolatry.
Hearing and seeing what I see and hear,
His shoulder muscles with dread would be twitching';

Camel's hair or wool, as it is called, is woven by the Arabs into tent-covers, and also into rough outer garments for the peasantry. In Israel this coarse mantle was the badge of the prophet (Zec 13<sup>4</sup>). 'The prophets shall be ashamed each one of his vision, when he prophesieth; and they will no more wear a hairy garment in order to deceive'; and in 2 K 1<sup>8</sup> Elijah is described as being an 'owner of hair' (ἄνθρωπος τριχῶν, that is, wearing this garment of the prophets; AV, 'an hairy man'), and girt with leather. As the successor of Elijah and of the prophets, John the Baptist adopted the same dress (Mt. 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>6</sup>). It is generally supposed that the Oriental mystic or sufi is so named from his dress of wool (suḥ); cf. Rev 11<sup>3</sup>.

CANA (Κανά τῆς Γαλιλαίας) is mentioned four times in the Fourth Gospel. It was the scene of our Lord's first miracle (Jn 2<sup>1-11</sup>); the place to which 'a certain king's officer (βασιλευσῆς), whose son was sick at Capernaum,' came to find Jesus (4<sup>46</sup>); and the native place of the disciple Nathanael (21<sup>2</sup>). After the miracle, Jesus 'went down' (κατέβη) to Capernaum; and the king's officer besought him to 'come down' (καταβῆναι) to heal his son. Those references place Cana of Galilee on higher ground than Capernaum. There is no other direct evidence as to its position.

Josephus states (Vita, 16) that he resided for a time 'in a village of Galilee which is named Cana.' From this village he made a descent during the night upon Tiberias (17). Later (41) he speaks of residing in the great plain, the name of which was Asochis. If these residences are one and the same place, the Cana of Josephus may well be Khirbet Kāna or Kānat el-Jelū, on the N. slopes of the plain of Buṭṭān, and about 8 miles N. of Nazareth. This, however, would not decide the site of St. John's Cana. (The Keas of Ant. xv. v. 1 should be, according to BJ i. xix. 1, Kavaṣā.)

Etymology and tradition are divided between the above mentioned site on the plain of Buṭṭān and Kefr Kennā, a hamlet on the direct road to the lake, and about 3½ miles N.E. of Nazareth, where there is a fine spring. Etymology certainly favours Khirbet Kāna, the doubling of the medial 'nun' being against Kefr Kennā. Tradition is indecisive. The references in Placentinus (Itin. 4), Phocas, John of Würzburg, Quaresimus (Elucidationes, ii. 852 f.), etc., favour Kefr Kennā, where the monks of the Greek and Latin Churches have considerable ecclesiastical properties. On the other hand, the notices of Theodosius (A.D. 530), Saewulf, Brocardus, Petellus, Marinus, Sanutus (p. 253), and others, suit the northern site.

In later times, Robinson (BRP ii. 348 f., iii. 108) supports the claims of Khirbet Kāna, and is followed by Ritter, Thomson, Ewald, Socin, Keim, and others. Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. s.v. Kana) identify Cana with Kanah in Asher (Jos 19<sup>28</sup>). This could not be Kefr Kennā, which is not in Asher, but might be Khirbet Kāna (Encyc. Bibl. i. 638). Other recent writers contend for Kefr Kennā, among whom are Guérin, de Sauley, Porter, Tristram, etc. The balance of evidence is perhaps on the side of the northern site (Hastings' DB i. 346<sup>9</sup>). Conder (PEF Mem. i. 288) suggests as a possible site a spot nearer to Nazareth than Kefr Kennā, called Ain Kāna, and not far from Reineh. Dr. Sanday appears to support this, and claims Guthe as agreeing (Sacred Sites, 24 n.).

CANAANITE.—See CANANÆAN.

CANAANITISH.—The RV rendering of Kanaana (AV 'of Canaan') in Mt 15<sup>2</sup> (only here in NT). The word is used to describe the woman who came out of the borders of Tyre and Sidon, desiring to have her daughter healed who was grievously vexed with a devil. St. Mark (7<sup>26</sup>) calls her a Greek (Ἑλληνίς), a Syro-phenician (Συροφονικισσα) by race. A Canaanite, signifying properly 'dweller in the lowland,' is used in a wider or a narrower meaning in the OT, Canaan being a name applied either to the strip of seacoast from Gaza to Sidon, or, more loosely, to the whole possession of Israel, or that part which lay west of Jordan (Gn 10<sup>10</sup>; cf. Jos 5<sup>1</sup>, Nu 13<sup>29</sup>, Gn 11<sup>31</sup>). The LXX renders Canaanite (322) indifferently by Φοινίξ and Χαναανίος (Ex 6<sup>35</sup>, Jos 5<sup>1</sup>, Nu 13<sup>29</sup>, Jg 1<sup>28</sup>), while in Ex 16<sup>9</sup> and Jos 5<sup>1</sup> we find ἄνθρωπος τριχῶν or ἄνθρωπος τριχῶν and χόρα τῶν Φοινικίων. These coast inhabitants being the great traders of the old world, 'Canaanite' or 'Phœnician' was often used simply to mean 'a merchant' (Is 23<sup>8</sup> [LXX ἐμποροί], and cf. Hos 12<sup>7</sup>, Zeph 1<sup>11</sup>).

The woman who came to our Lord was a 'Canaanite' in the sense that she belonged to the stock of the old Phœnicians of Syria termed 'Syro-phenician' to distinguish them from those of Africa. These were heathen, and between them and the Jews existed the bitterest hostility; see Jos. c. Apion, i. 13 (who mentions the Phœnicians, especially of Tyre, with the Egyptians as bearing the greatest ill-will towards the Jews). This fact makes instructive a comparison between our Lord's treatment of this woman and His dealing with the woman of Samaria; cf. especially Jn 4th with Mt 15th. The Clementines (Hom. ii. 19, iii. 73) mention her by the name of Justa, and maintain that the Lord first won her from heathendom, and after that was able to heal her daughter, whose name is given as Bernice.*

CANANÆAN.—'Cananean' (RV, following the reading Kananaios adopted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, WH, and modern scholars generally) or CANAANITE (AV, following the TR reading Kananaites) is a description applied by St. Matthew (10th) and St. Mark (6th) in their lists of the Twelve to the second of the two Apostolic Simons, who is thus distinguished from Simon Peter. There can be no doubt that 'Canaanite,' which means an inhabitant of Canaan, is a false rendering. The Gr. for Canaan is Kanaan (Ac 7th 13th), and for Canaanite, Kananaios (Mt 15th) not Kananaites. Transliterating the Kananaites of the TR, the AV should have spelled the word 'Canaanite,' as indeed was done in the Geneva Version, and in some editions of the AV, though not in that of 1611. But it is practically certain that Kananaios (which in the text of Mk. especially is very strongly supported, e.g. by ABCDLA) is the correct reading. The word seems to be a construction from the plural form Kananaïm of the late Heb. kananai, corresponding to the Biblical קנני, 'jealous' (see Schürer, HJP, i. ii. 80 f.; and note that the noun קנני, which in the Heb. text of the OT is used in the sense of 'zeal' as well as of 'jealousy,' is sometimes rendered in the LXX by ἐπιλος [Is 9th 26th]). This is borne out by the fact that St. Luke, on two occasions on which he gives a list of the Apostles (Lk 6th, Ac 1st), employs ὁ Ζηλωτής, instead of ὁ Καναναίος, to describe Simon—which seems to show that the two epithets are synonymous.

Jerome, who in the Vulg. adopts the form 'Cananean,' in his Com. in Matt. interprets it 'de vicio Chana Galilee'; and he has been followed by many scholars in modern times, who have taken the name to be a corruption of Kanaos, and to mean 'a man of Cana,' probably Cana in Galilee. This view, however, now obtains little support, though Cheyne (Encyc. Bibl. ii. col. 2824, iv. col. 4535) appears to favour it. Meyer (Com. on Matt., in loc.), while holding that the form of the word makes the derivation from Cana impossible, maintains that it is nevertheless 'derived from the name of some place or other'; and would explain its use in Mt. and Mk. from the fact that Simon, as a quandam zealot, 'bore the surname קנני, ἐπιλωτής, a name which was correctly interpreted by Luke; but, according to another tradition, was erroneously derived from the name of a place, and accordingly came to be rendered ὁ Καναναίος.' This is ingenious, but seems needlessly far-fetched. It is quite arbitrary, too, to say that the form Kananaios must be derived from the name of a place. The termination -aios is common in the Grecized rendering of names of sects (e.g. Φαρασαίος, Σαδδουκαίος, Εβραῖος; see Grimm-Thayer, Mt 10th), which means a Zealot, and is the designation of the Apostle Simon. See CANANÆAN.

Lexicon, s.v. Kananaios. And Kananaios from קנני is as natural as Φαρασαίος from פָּרָשִׁי, stat. emphat. of Aramaic פָּרָשִׁי for Heb. פָּרָשִׁי (see Schürer, HJP ii. ii. 19). J. C. LAMBERT.

CANDLE.—Candles were not much in use in an oil-bearing country like Palestine, and are not referred to in the Bible. But the word occurs in the AV 8 times as the translation of λύχνος ('lamp'); and λυχνία ('lampstand') is always translated 'candlestick.' [On the other hand, λαμπάς, which is generally translated by its derivative 'lamp,' should be rendered either 'torch' or 'lantern'; for it generally refers to a lamp which could be carried out of doors (Mt 25th, Jn 18th, and even Ac 20th, where the λαμπάδες ικανάι may have been torches that had been brought in by those who had assembled by night), thus corresponding to Heb. נֵר.]

The λύχνος (Heb. נֵר, ner, the latter used only in a figurative sense) was, as a rule, an earthenware vessel, like a tiny flat teapot, with a flaxen wick (Mt 12th) in the spout, and supplied with oil (mostly from olives, but also from sesame, nuts, radishes, or fish), through a hole in the centre, from an ἀγγεῖον (Mt 25th) or other vessel. It could either be carried about (Lk 15th) or set on a stand (Mk 4th etc.). For illustrations of lamps see Hastings' DB, vol. iii. p. 34.

In the teaching of the Son of Man the illuminating sign of God's presence in the world is human example and personal witness, as, e.g., in the ministry of John the Baptist (Jn 5th). The Christian life is to be one that lightens and kindles others (Mk 4th), and points men to the 'Father of lights' (Mt 5th). It must, therefore, first be itself lit. That is the key to the difficult passage in Mt 6th, Lk 11th. Light may be everywhere, yet it is of no use unless received by the eye, which is the lamp of the body. Sin makes a man see dimly or double, and must be renounced with an undivided mind if the life is to be illumined with Divine truth and love (Expos., 2nd ser. i. [1881] 262 ff.; cf. 180 ff., 372 ff.).

But one other important quality Christ illustrated by the use of the lamp, viz. watchfulness. It was the custom in private houses, as well as in the temple, to keep lamps burning through the night (Pr 31st). So, in view of the subtlety and suddenness of temptation and trial, the disciple must have his loins girded and his lamp lit (Lk 12th). The parable of the Ten Virgins with their λαμπάδες teaches a similar lesson. Of Christ as the Lamb it is said that He is Himself the lamp (λύχνος) of the Holy City (Rev 21st).

A. NORMAN ROWLAND.

CANDLESTICK.—In RV of the Gospels this word is without exception correctly changed into 'stand,' λυχνία being the stand which held the little oil-fed lamp. It might mean anything from a luxurious candelabrum, generally of wood covered with metal, to a bit of stonework projecting from a cottage wall. It was to the lampstand in lowly domestic use (cf. 2 K 4th) that Christ referred in Mk 4th as being necessary to complete the value of the lamp for those in the house (Mt 5th) and those who enter it (Lk 8th 11th). And the lesson is that if we have received a truth or a joy through Christ, who is the Light of the World, it is common sense and common justice not to hide it in fear or selfishness, but to use it as a means of illustrating our Father God and illumining those around us (Mt 5th). Practical illustrations of this parable are found in Mk 5th 22, Mt 10th 22, Lk 10th 17th (cf. Lk 19th 4, 5).

Literature.

The question as to the position of Capernaum is of great importance for the Gospel story. It is the pivot on which hinges the determination of the scene of the greater part of our Lord's active ministry. The three places, Capernaum, Chorazin and Bethsaida, must all be taken together, and they must in any case be not far from the Plain of Gennesaret. This plain is undoubtedly the modern el-Ghuweir (i.e. 'the little Ghôr' or 'hollow'); there is also no doubt that Chorazin is the modern Kerdzeh. The present article is written in the belief that Capernaum is Tell Hâm (which is the view of the majority of scholars), and that Bethsaida was the port (now called et-Araj), on the Lake, of Bethsaida Julias (et-Tell).

1. The Name.—The correct form of the name is undoubtedly Καπαρναούμ. This is found in all the oldest authorities to the end of the 4th cent. (Evv. codd. opt.; Voss. antiq. Lat. Syr. Ægypt. Goth.; Jos. B. J. Onomast. Euseb. Hieron.). The spelling Καπερναούμ begins to appear in the 5th cent., but after that date rapidly covered the ground. In Josephus (Vita, § 72), mention is made of a village the name of which Niese prints as Κεφαρναούμ, but there are many various readings, and the text is pretty certainly corrupt. The exact relation of the ancient name to the modern is not clear, but very clearly. It is easy to understand how Caphar (mod. Kefr = 'village'), as a habitation of living men, might become Tell in the sense of 'a heap of ruins' (strictly = 'mound,' but there is no mound on the site). But there are difficulties in the way of regarding Hâm as a contraction for 'Nahum'; and some good philologists (Buhl, op. cit. inf.; cf. Socin, Guthe, ib.) prefer to regard Tell Hâm as a corruption of Tenhâm or Tanhâm, which occurs in Jewish authorities.

2. Description of the localities.—The beautiful Plain of Gennesaret is closed on the north-east by a spur of the hills which slopes down gradually to the Lake. In the hollow formed by this, on the rising ground where the caravan-route begins to ascend the ridge, is the ruined khân of Khân Mînyeh. On the low ground beneath, and also on the ridge above, there are a few more inconspicuous remains; and between the khân and the Lake is a fountain (Ain et-Tîn). Rounding the little promontory, on which is a German hospice, we come to a bay, on the further side of which is a group of springs. One of these is described by Sir Charles Wilson as 'by far the largest spring in Galilee, and estimated to be more than half the size of the celebrated source of the Jordan at Banias' (Recovery, etc. ii. 348). The waters of this spring come to the surface with great force, and, after being collected in a strongly-built reservoir, they were carried by an aqueduct, in part cut through the rock, round the promontory and to the rear of Khân Mînyeh; from thence they were used to irrigate the plain. The modern name of this fountain is Ain et-Tâbigha. The ancient name was 'Seven Fountains' (Itin Hieros. ed. Vindob. p. 138) or Heptapegon (of which et-Tâbigha is an echo). A full mile and a half, or two Roman miles farther, are the ruins of Tell Hâm. These cover a considerable extent of ground, half a mile in length by a quarter in breadth. The houses generally were built of blocks of black basalt. A single public building of larger size (74 ft. 9 in. × 38 ft. 9 in.) was of white limestone. This is commonly identified with the synagogue.

'Seen alone there might have been some doubt as to its character, but compared with the number of ruins of the same character which have lately been brought to notice in Galilee, there can be none. Two of those buildings have inscriptions in Hebrew over their main entrances; one in connexion with a seven-branched candlestick, the other with figures of the paschal lamb, and all without exception are constructed after a fixed plan, which is totally different from that of any church, temple, or mosque in Palestine' (Wilson, Recovery, etc. ii. 344).

Two Roman miles up the course of a stream which enters the Lake just beyond Tell Hâm, are ruins which bear the name of Kerdzeh; but between Tell Hâm and the mouth of the Jordan there are no more ruins and no special features. Across the Jordan a little way back from its mouth, is et-Tell, which is now generally held to mark the site of Bethsaida Julias. This was in ancient times connected by a paved causeway with a cluster of ruins on the shore of the Lake, now known as et-Araj.

3. Identification.—It will be seen that there is really not very much choice. Chorazin is certainly Kerdzeh, and Bethsaida Julias, built by the tetrarch Philip, is pretty certainly et-Tell. The alternatives for Capernaum are thus practically reduced to Khân Mînyeh and Tell Hâm. And the broad presumption must be in favour of the latter, as Capernaum was no doubt the most important place at this end of the Lake, and the ruins are here far more extensive than those at Khân Mînyeh, as well as demonstrably ancient. The khân at Khân Mînyeh appears to have been built in the 16th cent. (Sepp, op. cit. inf. p. 165), though the place name first occurs in the time of Saladin.

Is this broad presumption overruled by any decisive consideration? A few minor arguments have been adduced against it. Capernaum was a place where tolls were collected (Mk 2<sup>14</sup> ||), and it is thought that this would be more natural on the main caravan road; but a place of the size of Tell Hâm must in any case have had its tolls, and there was certainly a road along the north end of the Lake leading to Bethsaida Julias (Guthe). The bay of et-Tâbigha is much frequented by fish, and the beach is suitable for mooring boats. But there is little, if any, trace of ruins that are not quite modern. The ruins about Khân Mînyeh are also inconsiderable, though further excavation is needed to bring out their real character.

The point that seemed for a time to outweigh all the rest turned upon the position of the fountain. Josephus, who is our earliest and best authority, expressly says that the Plain of Gennesaret was watered by the fountain of Capernaum (B. J. iii. x. 8). The only fountain to which this statement can apply is that of et-Tâbigha. There are other fountains, but none of them could be said in any sense to irrigate the plain as in ancient times this fountain certainly did. This indication might seem prima facie to support the claims of Khân Mînyeh. The fountain is a short mile from this site, and two short (Roman) miles from Tell Hâm. But it has to be remembered that these large villages or towns on the Sea of Galilee had each its 'territory.' Thus Josephus speaks of the 'territory' of Hippos (Παρπηθ, B. J. iii. iii. 1); and the 'Gerasene' demoniac (in Mk 5<sup>17</sup> ||) is a case of the same kind—the swine were not feeding in the town itself but in its territory. In like manner the fountain was situated within the territory of Capernaum, whether it was at Khân Mînyeh or at Tell Hâm.

This leaves room for the natural presumption to tell in favour of Tell Hâm. And the identification is confirmed by the fact that the pilgrim Theodosius (c. 530 A.D.), coming from the West, arrived at Heptapegon before he came to Capernaum: this he would have done if it were at Tell Hâm, but not if it had been at Khân Mînyeh (Itin).

Hieros. p. 138; cf. JThSt v. 44). Other indications, whether Biblical or derived from the narratives of the pilgrims, are all indecisive.

Just for a time there was a certain swing of the pendulum (which may be said to have reached its height in the last decade of the last century) in favour of Khân Minyeh. But the balance of the criticism of the last fifty years is pretty clearly on the side of Tell Hâm. But absolutely decisive results can only be obtained, if at all, by thorough and systematic excavation.

4. Capernaum and Bethsaida.—The two questions of Capernaum and Bethsaida are so closely connected, that a word should be added upon the latter. The only Bethsaida in these parts known to general history is that of which we have just spoken as located at et-Tell to the east of the Jordan. It has often been thought necessary to postulate a second Bethsaida, which is most commonly placed at the bay of et-Tâbigha. The main reasons for this are two. (a) In Jn 1:21, the Bethsaida of the Gospels is described as 'Bethsaida of Galilee,' whereas Bethsaida-Julias was, strictly speaking, in Gaulanitis (EJ II. ix. 1). (b) The phrase eis tō pérag in Mk 6:45 seems to imply that Bethsaida was on the opposite side of the Lake to the scene of the Feeding of the Five Thousand. These reasons are, however, insufficient to warrant the invention of a second Bethsaida so near to the first, and itself so wholly hypothetical. In the bay of et-Tâbigha there are no ruins to prove its existence. On the other hand, (a) there is evidence enough to show that 'Galilee' was often loosely used for the country east of Jordan and of the Lake (EJ II. xx. 4, iii. iii. 1; Ant. xviii. i. 1, 6); and the geographer Ptolemaeus speaks of Bethsaida-Julias as 'in Galilee,' just as St. John does (Buhl, G.A.P. p. 242). Political boundaries were so shifting, and the adjustments of territory in these little principalities were so constantly changed, that a loose use of terms grew up, and the more familiar names were apt to displace the less familiar. (b) The phrase eis tō pérag cannot be pressed; it might be used of an oblique course from any one point on the shore of the Lake to any other; Josephus (Vita, § 59) uses ἀναρπαζόμενος of taking ship from Tiberias to Taricheae, which are on the same side of the Lake, and very little farther from each other than Bethsaida from the scene of the miracle.

5. References in the Gospels.—So far as our Lord had any fixed headquarters during His Galilean ministry, they were in Capernaum. It is called His 'own city' (ἡ πόλις αὐτοῦ) in Mt 9:1. The same close connexion is implied by the special reproach addressed to the city in Mt 11:23 (= Lk 10:29). The public ministry, in the more formal sense, was opened here by the call of the four leading Apostles (Mk 1:16-20); and here, too, were the labours of which we have a graphic and typical description on the Sabbath that followed (Mk 1:21-28). We have repeated mention of a particular house to which our Lord resorted, which was probably St. Peter's. During the early part of His ministry He must have spent much time here, but during the latter part His visits can have been only occasional.

Perhaps we should be right in inferring from the presence of the 'centurion' (Mt 8:5, Lk 7:2) that Herod Antipas had a small garrison here. St. Luke tells us that this centurion, though a Gentile, had built the synagogue of the place. Is it too sanguine to believe that this was the very building the remains of which are still most conspicuous among the ruins? There appears to be good reason for the view that they are really the remains of a synagogue. A comparison with similar buildings elsewhere in Galilee brings out the distinctive features of the ground plan, and the presence of religious emblems seems to render this probable. The richness of the architecture (cf. pl. xvii, in the present writer's Sacred Sites of the Gospels) may seem to suggest that the ruins date from the palmy days of Galilean Judaism (A.D. 140-300), and Schürer refers them to this period. But there is one argument that perhaps points in a different direction. There was a synagogue at Chorazin hardly less elaborate than that at Capernaum, though with its ornaments cut in the black basalt, and not in limestone (Wilson, Recovery, ii. 3, 4, 7). Now, we know that when Eusebius wrote his Onomasticon, the site of Chorazin was already 'deserted' (Onomast., ed. Klostermann, p. 174). This desertion is not likely to have been very recent. And it is perhaps after all more probable that elaborate building took place at a time when Galilee had a prince of its own with architectural ambitions, who must have gathered around him a number of skilled artificers at Tiberias. The Herods were all builders; and the period of their rule was probably that in which Galilee enjoyed the greatest material prosperity.

6. Later history.—From A.D. 150 onwards the shores of the Sea of Galilee became a stronghold of Rabbinical Judaism. The fanaticism of this district would not tolerate the presence of Christians; it is expressly stated by Epiphanius (Hæc. xxx. 11; cf. Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, ii. 261) that down to the time of Constantine no one had ever dared to erect a church either at Nazareth or Capernaum, or at other places mentioned in the neighbourhood. That means that there must have been a complete break in the Christian tradition; so that, when we read later that a church was built on the supposed site of Peter's house, it is not likely that the guess had any real authority (Hin. Hieros. pp. 112f., 163, 197). Still Capernaum was one of the sacred places, and from the 4th cent. onwards it was frequented by Christian pilgrims. Eusebius (and Jerome after him) mentions the place as on the Sea of Genesaret, but throws no further light upon it beyond fixing its distance as two Roman miles from Chorazin (Onomast. pp. 120, 174). We have seen that Theodosius came to it from Tiberias after passing through Magdala and Seven Fountains (Hin. Hieros. p. 137f.). Arculfus (c. 670 A.D.) did not enter Capernaum, but saw it from a neighbouring height stretching along the Lake, and observed that it had no wall (ib. p. 273f.). The nun who tells the story of St. Willibald (c. 723 A.D.) makes him first come to Capernaum, then to Bethsaida, then to Corazaim, ubi Dominus demoniacos curavit, where there is an evident confusion between Chorazin and Gerasa (mod. Kersa), the scene of the healing of the demoniac. The same blunder occurs in the anonymous Life, so that it probably goes back to St. Willibald himself (see Tobler, Descript. Terr. Sanct. pp. 28, 63). We have seen that the history of Khân Minyeh, so far as we can trace it, belongs to the Saracenic and Turkish periods. Saladin halted at al-Munajja in 1189, but the building of the khân is referred by Sepp to Sinan Pasha under Suleiman the Magnificent (1496-1566).

CAPTAIN.—I. This word is the AV rendering of two Greek terms in the Gospels:—(1) χιλαρχος, properly 'leader of a thousand' (Jn 18<sup>12</sup>, RV 'chief captain,' RvM 'military tribune'; see also Mk 6<sup>21</sup>, Ac 21<sup>31</sup>, 22, 23, 27, 28, 29, 23<sup>10</sup>, 15, 17, 18, 19, 22, 24<sup>1</sup>, 22, 23, Rev 6<sup>16</sup> 19<sup>16</sup>). (2) στρατηγός, properly 'leader of an army,' 'general' (Lk 22<sup>4</sup>, 52; see also Ac 4<sup>1</sup> 27<sup>1</sup>).

4. χιλαρχος is used (a) in a vague general sense of a superior military officer, and (b) technically as the Greek equivalent of the Roman praefectus or tribunus militum. The Roman garrison in the citadel at Jerusalem, consisting of a cohort (τάγμα = NT στρεῖρα, 'band' [καθ' ἑσπερον γὰρ ἔειπεν αὐτῆς τάγμα Ῥωμαίων, Jos. BJ v. v. 8]) of provincial troops, Syrian Greeks, and Samaritans, whose commandant would be a civis Romanus (Ac 22<sup>28</sup>), while they would be presented with the Imperial franchise on their discharge, was reinforced during the Passover by additional troops which were stationed in one of the Temple buildings (Mommsen, Prov. Rom. Emp., Eng. tr. ii. 186). The χιλαρχος is also called φρούραρχος by Josephus (Ant. xv. xi. 4, xviii. iv. 3); see Schürer, HJP i. ii. 55. The legion consisted normally of 6000 men, the six tribuni took command for two months in turn. Palestine, however, being a Roman province of the second rank, did not possess a full legionary garrison. Mommsen gives its strength, at a subsequent period, as consisting of a detachment (ala) of cavalry and five cohorts of infantry, or about 5000 men.

2. στρατηγός τῶν ἱερῶν, the commandant of the Temple Levites. Josephus mentions the 'captain' (στρατηγός) of the Levitical guard in the time of Claudius (Ant. xx. vi. 2), and in that of Trajan (BJ vi. v. 3). Possibly the officers (ἀρχιερεῖς) who assisted in the arrest of Jesus (Jn 18<sup>3</sup>, cf. 7<sup>22-24</sup>) belonged to this body. This 'captain' of the Temple (2 Mac 8<sup>4</sup> ἡ προεδρία τῶν ἱερῶν) is mentioned in Jer 20<sup>1</sup> LXX as ἡγεμόνος and in Neh 11<sup>11</sup> as ἀνέστην τῶν οἴκων τῶν θεῶν, 'the ruler of the house of God' (Vulg. princeps domus Dei = הכהן הראש Mishna, Middoth i. § 2). The duty of this 'captain of the mount of the Temple' was to keep order in the Temple, visit the stations of the guard during the night, and see that the sentries were duly posted and alert. He and his immediate subalterns are supposed to be intended by the 'rulers' (ἀρχιερεῖς) mentioned in Ezr 9<sup>2</sup> and Neh. passim (στρατηγῶν or ἀρχιερεῖς). See Schürer, HJP ii. i. 258. The chief constable of this priestly corps of Temple police was naturally himself a Levite.

LITERATURE.—Josephus, Ant. x. viii. 5, xv. xi. 4, xviii. iv. 3, xx. vi. 2, BJ v. v. 8, vi. v. 3; Schürer, HJP i. ii. 55, ii. i. 258; Hastings' DB, article 'Captain.'

P. HENDERSON AITKEN.

II. Besides these two military or semi-military uses of 'captain' in the Gospels, we have to notice the employment of the term as a title for Christ in He 2<sup>9</sup> (AV and RvM) and 12<sup>2</sup> (RvM). In both cases the corresponding word in the Greek text is ἀρχηγός, a word which otherwise is found in the NT only in Ac 3<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>21</sup> (both times in Acts applied to Christ, and in each case rendered 'Prince,' with 'Author' as a marginal alternative in 3<sup>18</sup>).

In accordance with its derivation (ἀρχή and ἡγεμονία), ἀρχηγός originally meant a leader, and so naturally came to be applied to a prince or chief. From this the transition was easy to the further meaning of a first cause or author, which is not infrequent in the philosophical writers. For the 'Captain' of AV in He 2<sup>9</sup>, RV substitutes 'author,' giving 'captain' in the margin; and in 12<sup>2</sup> both VSS have 'author,' though RV again gives 'captain' as a marginal rendering.

But when Jesus is called ἀρχηγός τῆς σωτηρίας (2<sup>9</sup>), the meaning is not merely that He is the Author of our salvation. The context suggests that the idea of a leader going before his saved ones (cf. 8<sup>20</sup>) ought to be adhered to (see Davidson, Hebrews, ad loc.). Similarly when He is called τῆς πίστεως ἀρχηγός (12<sup>2</sup>), the idea is that of one who has led the way along the path of faith. In both cases the term 'Captain' may be unsuitable, since it is apt to suggest military images which had no place in the writer's mind; but 'leader,' at all events, should be retained, since the idea of leadership and not of authorship seems best to express his purpose (see Bruce, Expositor, 3rd ser. viii. [1885] p. 451). For a full treatment of the subject in its apologetic and homiletic aspects, Bruce's chapter on 'The Captain of Salvation' (op. cit. pp. 447-461) should be read in whole.

CARE (μέριμνα, μεριμνάω, μέλος, ἐπιμελέωμαι).—The teaching of Jesus on care has been slightly obscured for English readers of the NT by the change in meaning through which this word and the word 'thought' have passed. Properly meaning trouble or sorrow, 'care' was from an early period confounded with Lat. cura, and from the idea of attention thus obtained was held to express the particular trouble of the mind due to over-attention, viz. anxiety (see Hastings' DB i. 353), while in modern language care, and especially its compounds 'careful' and 'carefulness,' are often used in a sense which indicates no trouble, but the well-directed effort of the mind in relation to present affairs and future prospects. The AV rendering 'take no thought' (Mt 6<sup>25-34</sup>) is still more misleading. As used by the translators, it meant 'distressing anxiety' (see Trench On the AV p. 39; Hastings' DB iv. 754). That the phrase μη μεριμνᾶτε is not 'take no thought,' but 'be not anxious' (RV), seems clear by the derivation of μέριμνα from μερῖν, with its sense of dividing and, as applied to the mind, of distraction; and is rendered certain by comparison with the word ἀσπυβήτω or τυρβήτω coupled with it in Lk 10<sup>4</sup>, and with the expressive phrase μη μεριμνήσθε used in Lk 12<sup>22</sup>, which expresses the metaphor of a ship tossed and helpless on the waves (see Cox in Expositor, 1st ser. i. [1875] p. 249).

The warning of Jesus against care is therefore in no sense applicable to reasonable forethought (επινοία). Man cannot live his life like the birds and the flowers, without a sense of the present necessity and the impending future. He can and must think, plan, and toil. The forethought and work necessary to provide food and raiment for himself and for those dependent upon him, are part of the Divine discipline of character. A careless life would be essentially a godless life. But Christ's reproofs are directed against all feverishness and distraction of mind. Whatever is the exciting cause of the distress—how food is to be obtained (Mt 6<sup>25-26</sup>, Lk 12<sup>22-24</sup>) or clothing (Mt 6<sup>28-29</sup>, Lk 12<sup>27-28</sup>), how the unknown future is to be met (Mt 6<sup>34</sup>) though there seems no obvious source of supply (Mt 10<sup>2</sup>; cf. Mk 6<sup>8</sup>, Lk 9<sup>10-11</sup>), though the duties of life press hardly (Lk 10<sup>4</sup>), and though there is impending and certain peril (Mt 10<sup>19</sup> 12<sup>21</sup>), He says, 'Be not anxious.'

The argument of Jesus against care is clothed in language of rare geniality and felicitousness. 'Which of you by being anxious can add a cubit to his stature' [rather, 'a span to his age']? 'Worry does not help forward the great designs of life. It cannot even accomplish 'that which is least.' It may take a span from one's age; it cannot prolong life. It is futile, and it is needless as well. Nature reads to man the lesson of trust. The wild flowers, though their life is so brief, are decked with loveliness by the great God. God takes care for the flowers. And He is your Heavenly Father. The argument is a minor's ad majus. God's care for the flowers is a constant rebuke of His children's feverish anxiety concerning their own wants. The Providence, unforgetful of 'that which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven,' is, in relation to His children, an all-wise and all-loving Fatherhood.

But the geniality of the argument does not disguise the seriousness with which Jesus regarded care. The context of the locus classicus (Mt 6<sup>25-34</sup>, Lk 12<sup>22-34</sup>) is not the same in the two Evangelists. St. Matthew attaches the warning against care to the saying, 'No man can serve two masters . . . ye cannot serve God and mammon.' In Lk. it follows as a deduction from the parable spoken against covetousness and the closing saying, 'So is every one that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God.' There is no need to decide the question of the priority of the two accounts, for the moral context of both is practically the same. Care arises from a division at the very centre of life, an attempt to serve both God and mammon, to 'worship the Lord and serve other gods,' or it arises from the radically false idea that 'a man's life consisteth in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.' Such a false estimate of values, involving the desire for and the pursuit of material goods for their own sake, inevitably produces the fever and distraction of mind called care, and it is the moral condition out of which it arises, as well as the consequences which it engenders, that makes it so serious a fault in the eyes of Christ. 'The cares of this life' are part of the hostile influences which choke the good seed of the kingdom, so that it bringeth forth no fruit to perfection (Mt 13<sup>22</sup>; cf. Lk 8<sup>14</sup>). In a mind so preoccupied by worldly interests and anxieties the word of Christ may survive, but it never comes to maturity, or produces its potential harvest in life and service. Hence the severity which underlies the gentleness of Christ's rebuke of Martha (Lk 10<sup>41-42</sup>). She was distracted about much serving, anxious and troubled about many things, and her worry spoiled her temper, and the service of Christ to which her love for Him impelled her. So serious indeed may be the consequences of this distress of soul, that Jesus, in His warning against the evil things which may overcharge the heart, and make men utterly unprepared for the coming of the Son of Man, combined with surfeiting and the drunkenness 'the cares of this life' (Lk 21<sup>34</sup>).

In opposition to care Jesus sets trust in the Heavenly Father. The assurance of His intimate knowledge of life and all its needs, and of His loving care, ought to exclude all anxiety concerning the wants of the present, and all fear of the future. But trust in God's love must be continually subordinate to the doing of God's will. The assurance of His Fatherly love and providential care is mediated to loving obedience. Thus in sending forth the Twelve (Mt 10<sup>9</sup>; cf. Mk 6<sup>8</sup>, Lk 9<sup>3</sup>), and in the case of the Seventy (Lk 10<sup>4-5</sup>), Jesus bids them make no elaborate provision for their physical needs. God takes care of His servants when they are in the path of obedience to His will. And similarly, when He warns His disciples that they shall be brought before the ecclesiastical and civil authorities because of their allegiance to Him, He calls upon them to have no anxiety as to the reply they shall give (Mt 10<sup>19</sup>, Mk 13<sup>11</sup>, Lk 12<sup>11</sup>). Jesus would have them believe that the moral order and the providential order of the world are essentially one, and are both controlled by the love of the Heavenly Father, so that they who seek His Kingdom and do His will shall not want any good thing.

Christ's own life is the supreme example of perfect peace, conditioned by absolute trust in the Heavenly Father, and loving obedience to His will. The pressing necessity gave Him no anxiety, and the impending peril no fear. 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee' (Is 26<sup>3</sup>).

CARPENTER.—Mt 13<sup>20</sup> 'Is not this the carpenter's son?' The question of Christ's own countrymen, when they were offended at the lowly station of the Teacher at whose wisdom they marvelled, tells us the exact conditions under which Jesus passed His early years. The parallel Mk 6<sup>3</sup> 'Is not this the carpenter?' is still more interesting, for it tells us how Jesus Himself was occupied in His youth and early manhood. This flashlight photograph of the artisan in the workshop is all we know of the eighteen years between the visit to Jerusalem in His boyhood and the baptism which marked the entry on public life. The passage Mt 13<sup>20-21</sup> || Mk 6<sup>3-4</sup> presents a curious and quite undesigned antithesis to Sir 38<sup>28-29</sup>, specially these words, 'How can he get wisdom that holdeth the plough? . . . so every carpenter [Heb. נָגַז, Gr. τέκτων, RV 'artificer'] and workmaster that laboureth night and day. . . . They shall not sit high in the congregation. . . . and they shall not be found where parables are spoken.' Possibly this reference explains why the people were specially offended at Jesus the carpenter for presuming to speak in the synagogue and in parables. The passage of Sirach quoted is from the chapter describing the honour of a physician, with which may be compared the proverb, 'Physician, heal thyself,' quoted by Christ in similar circumstances at Nazareth, when they said, 'Is not this Joseph's son?'

An attempt to make Mk 6<sup>3</sup> conform to Mt 13<sup>20</sup> is seen in some old MSS (including the good cursives 83-69) as well as in Eth. and Arm. versions, where we find 'carpenter's son' in place of 'carpenter.' This reading must represent a very old text, for Origen (c. Cels. vi. 36) says, 'Nowhere in the Gospels current in the Churches is Jesus Himself called a carpenter,' alluding apparently to other Gospels in which this trade was ascribed to Christ. It is also clear that the TR reading must be as old, for Celsus founded on it. One may gather that the change in MSS and versions was not merely accidental or harmonistic but deliberate, and due to those who considered that Jesus was dishonoured by being described as a carpenter. Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph. 88) supports TR in an interesting manner when he says that Jesus, 'when amongst men, worked as a carpenter, making ploughs and yokes, thus teaching the marks of righteousness, and commending an active life.' Such making of ploughs and yokes is precisely the kind of work expected of a country carpenter like one at Nazareth, though possibly Justin's words are a rhetorical expansion of Mk 6<sup>3</sup>. A curious anecdote is recorded by Farrar, to the effect that Libanius, a pagan sophist and devoted admirer of Julian the Apostate, inquired of a Christian, 'What is the carpenter doing now?' The answer was, 'He is making a coffin.' Very soon afterwards came the news of Julian's death. (Strangely enough, in relating this anecdote, Farrar himself quotes in Life of Christ 'carpenter's son,' but in Life of Jesus he has 'carpenter'.)

Whichever of the above readings be adopted, however (and in Mk 6<sup>3</sup> the TR is supported by all the chief MSS), the probability is that Joseph by this time was dead, and that Jesus as his reputed son had carried on the business. Nor are we to reckon this as anything derogatory to the Lord. On the contrary, it is another proof of His condescension, when, though He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor (2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>). By His toil at the bench He has dignified and consecrated manual labour. We may derive the practical lesson expressed in Faber's hymn, 'Labour is sweet, for Thou hast toiled.' Even more to us than St. Paul the tent-maker is Jesus the carpenter. He was not an Essene, holding Himself aloof from temporal affairs, but a true Son of Man, taking His part in the business of life. Before He preached the good tidings of the kingdom, He preached the gospel of work. The work that His Father had given Him to do was not the exceptional duty of the teacher, but the ordinary industry of the artisan. His first pulpit was the carpenter's bench, and His first sermons were the implements and utensils He made for the country folk of Galilee.

Attempts have been made to find in Christ's parables and other utterances some reference to the trade in which for so many years He was actively engaged. The metaphor of the green wood and the dry (Lk 23<sup>31</sup>), and the similitude of the splinter and the beam (Mt 7<sup>3-5</sup>), are the nearest approaches to such reminiscences (cf. also one of the recently discovered 'Sayings of Jesus': 'Cleave the wood, and there you will find me'), but are too slight to found on them any inference. Yet may He not have often sighed in the workshop of Nazareth as He handled the nails and the hammer, and thought of the day when the Son of Man must be lifted up? As in Holman Hunt's famous symbolical picture, the figure of the young carpenter with outstretched arms released from toil as the sun went down, would make the awful shadow of the Cross.

CAVE (קוֹבָה, קוֹבָה, σπηλαιον).—Caves, both natural and artificial, abound in Palestine; the soft chalky soil of Syria readily lends itself to both. Caves were used in Palestine for a variety of purposes; originally as dwelling-places* (cf. the 'Horites' or 'cave-dwellers,' Gn 14<sup>6</sup> 36<sup>20ff</sup>, Dt 2<sup>22</sup>, see also Gn 19<sup>10</sup>). In the Hauran there must have been many of these; sometimes regular underground towns, such as the ancient Edrei, existed † even at the present day there may be seen in Gilead (Wady Ezrak), a village, named Anab, of Troglodyte dwellers; in this village there are about a hundred families. ‡ Caves were used, further, as places of refuge (Jg 6<sup>2</sup>, 1 S 13<sup>3</sup> 14<sup>1</sup>, 1 K 18<sup>4</sup>, He 11<sup>38</sup>, Rev 6<sup>12</sup>), as hiding-places for robbers (Jer 7<sup>1</sup>, cf. Mt 21<sup>13</sup>, Mk 11<sup>7</sup>, Lk 19<sup>47</sup>), as stables, § as cisterns, ¶ as folds for flocks, ¶ and, above all, as burying-places (Gn 23<sup>19</sup> 49<sup>29</sup> Jn 11<sup>38</sup>); the accounts of the burial caves discovered in the lower strata of the site of ancient Gezer are of the highest interest.**

It is, however, in reference to the place of birth and the place of burial of Christ that the chief interest in caves centres here. Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph. lxxviii.), in recounting the story of the birth of Christ, says that it took place in a cave (ἐν σπηλαίῳ τῶν) near the village of Bethlehem. †† That cave-stables, both ancient and modern, are to be found in Palestine, admits of no doubt. Conder ‡‡ says that there are 'innumerable instances of stables cut in rock, resembling the Bethlehem grotto. Such stables I have planned and measured at Tekoa, 'Aziz, and other places south of Bethlehem, and the mangers existing in them leave no doubt as to their use and character.' It seems, therefore, not unreasonable to accept the ancient tradition that Christ was born in a cave. See art. BETHLEHEM.

Rock-hewn tombs, or caves for burial, were of four distinct kinds: (1) tombs which were cut down into the rock, in the same way in which graves are dug at the present time in European countries; the body was let down into these; (2) tombs cut into the face of the rock, into which the bodies were pushed; (3) tombs, somewhat like the last class, excepting that within, against the wall, there was a kind of step, about two feet high, upon which the body was laid; (4) tombs which were little more than a shelf cut into the rock, just long enough and high enough to hold the body. The first three of these classes varied very much in size; in the case of the first, the top, which was level with the ground, was covered with a stone slab; the others were closed by means of a stone slab which could be pushed aside (Mt 27<sup>60</sup>), or else a small door was fixed at the entrance. Tombs were not infrequently furnished with an antechamber, from which one entered into an inner space, the tomb proper, through a low doorway. As a rule, a raised shelf ran round the burial-chamber, and upon this the body was laid; that part on which the head rested was slightly higher.* See BURIAL, TOMB.

CELIBACY.—According to the ordinary Jewish view, marriage was of universal obligation (cf. for instance, Yebamoth vi. 6; Kethuboth v. 6, 7; Gittin iv. 5). There does not appear to be evidence whether exceptions were recognized as possible because of some special vocation, as that to particular forms of the prophetic office. In the time of Christ the Essenes in general eschewed marriage, though one section of them practised it (Josephus, Ant. xviii. i. 5; JJ ii. viii. 2). The teaching of Christ does not contain any explicit reference to this difference between the Essene practice and the ordinary Jewish view. His teaching about divorce and His reassertion of the primitive law of marriage (Mt 5<sup>31-32</sup> 19<sup>2-9</sup>, Mk 10<sup>1-12</sup>, Lk 16<sup>18</sup>) imply not only that He was dealing with marriage as an existing Jewish institution, but also that He contemplated it as a permanent element in Christian life. It is not unnatural to draw a similar inference from His presence at the marriage at Cana (Jn 2<sup>1-11</sup>).

St. Matthew records a saying of Christ in which it is contemplated that by a special vocation some are called to celibacy. Christ's prohibition of divorce led the disciples to say that, without freedom to divorce, 'it is not expedient to marry.' Our Lord in His reply recognized that there are some for whom this 'saying' of the disciples is true, but only those 'to whom it is given.' He explained that there were three classes who might be regarded as having the vocation to celibacy:—(1) 'Eunuchs which were so born from their mother's womb, i.e. those whose physical constitution unfitted them for marriage; (2) 'eunuchs which were made eunuchs by men, i.e. those 'who by actual physical deprivation or compulsion from men are prevented from marrying' (Alford); (3) 'eunuchs which made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake, i.e. those who by voluntary self-sacrifice abstained from marriage in order that they might be (a) more faithful citizens of the kingdom of heaven in their own personal life, or (b) more effective instruments for the strengthening or expansion of the kingdom of heaven. He then repeated in a different form, 'He that is able to receive it, let him receive it' (Mt 19<sup>12</sup>), the previous statement that the 'saying' of the disciples, to which He had thus given a higher and deeper meaning, was not a maxim for all His followers, but only for those who, having the Divine call to the celibate life, had with it the Divine gift of power to obey the call. This particular saying is not recorded by any of the Evangelists except St. Matthew. There is a connected line of thought, however, in words recorded by St. Luke; for in Lk 18<sup>28, 30</sup> (also in TR and RV of Mt 19<sup>29</sup> and in TR of Mk 10<sup>29</sup>) a wife is mentioned among those relatives whom Christ contemplates His disciples as leaving for the sake of the kingdom of God (Lk), or for His name's sake (Mt), or for His sake and the sake of the gospel (Mk.); and it is promised that those who make such acts of self-sacrifice shall receive great rewards in the present time and shall hereafter inherit eternal life. In Mt 19<sup>29</sup> and Mk 10<sup>29</sup> the warning that 'many that are first shall be last; and the last first' is associated with this promise; and in Mt 20<sup>1-16</sup> the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard is added to illustrate that maxim.

It is a mistake to interpret Mt 5<sup>28</sup> ('Every one that looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart') as a condemnation of marriage; the context shows the meaning to be that to cherish the desire for fornication or adultery is the same thing as committing those sins in the heart. Nor is there any disparagement of marriage in the words, 'They that are accounted worthy to attain to that world and the resurrection from the dead neither marry nor are given in marriage' (Lk 20<sup>35</sup>); the meaning is shown by the context to be that the physical accompaniments of marriage belong to the present world, not to the future life, which, as it has not death, has not birth. Lk 14<sup>38</sup> ('If any man cometh unto me, and hateth not his own . . . wife, . . . yes, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple') refers not to celibacy, but to the general law that a Christian must be prepared to surrender everything human for the sake of Christ, if called by God to do so, or if such surrender be necessitated by faithfulness to the obligations of the Christian religion.

On the whole, then, the teaching of Christ may be summarized to the effect that (1) marriage is a good state, contemplated as the usual lot, in ordinary Christian life, of those who have not received some special call; (2) celibacy is the subject of a distinct vocation involving dangers and having attached to it high promises. It is probable that the regard paid to celibacy in the Christian Church was based partly on the references to it in the teaching of Christ, and partly on inferences connected with the fact of His birth from a virgin. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. III. xv. 97) quotes as a saying of Christ, with the introduction 'The Lord says, the following: 'He who is married, let him not put away his wife; and he who is not married, let him not marry; he who with purpose of chastity has agreed not to marry, let him remain unmarried.' Some have thought this saying to be a reminiscence of 1 Co 7<sup>8-11, 27</sup> ascribed to Christ because of the words 'not I, but the Lord' in 7<sup>12</sup>; but Clement apparently has our Lord's words in Mt 19<sup>12</sup> in view, for a little later in the same chapter he says, 'They who have made themselves eunuchs from all sin for the kingdom of heaven's sake, these are blessed, they who fast from the world.'

Clement of Alexandria also refers to a conversation between our Lord and Salome mentioned in the lost Gospel according to the Egyptians (Strom. III. vi. 45, ix. 63, 64, 66, xiii. 92; See Theod. 67). Our Lord is there reported to have said that death would have power 'as long as ye women bear children'; that He 'came to destroy the works of the female'; and that the kingdom of God would come 'when ye shall have trodden down the garment of shame, and when the two shall be one, and the male with the female, neither male nor female.' Part of this last quotation is also in pseudo-Clement of Rome, 12: 'The Lord Himself, being asked by one when His kingdom should come, said, When the two shall be one, and the outside as the inside, and the male with the female, neither male nor female.' In interpreting these sayings, notice must be taken of Clement of Alexandria's comment that our Lord spoke in condemnation not of marriage, but of sin of the flesh and the mind, and to show the natural connexion between death and birth; and of the further words of Salome, 'Then I did well in not bearing children,' with our Lord's reply, 'Eat every herb, but that which hath bitterness do not eat.' It is possible that in these passages the 'Gospel according to the Egyptians' preserved an echo of Mt 19<sup>12</sup>, or some saying of our Lord unrecorded in the NT. It is not likely that the actual words were spoken by Him, since, as Lightfoot (Apostolic Fathers, I. ii. 237) pointed out, they differ in character from the utterances recorded in the authentic Gospels, and the reference to Salome as childless contradicts facts, though, as regards this last point, 'Then I did well in not bearing' might easily be a copyist's mistake for 'Then I should have done well if I had not borne' (καλὸν εἰς ἑσπέραν τοῦ σαλῶς εἶναι ἢ ἰσχυρῶς).

DARWELL STONE.
CELLAR.—Used only once in the Gospels, in Lk 11<sup>33</sup>, where RV gives 'cellar' for AV 'secret place,' following the correct reading κρύπτη, 'a vault,' 'crypt,' or 'cellar,' not κρητὴν, 'hidden.' Josephus uses the same word, κρητὴν, in a way to make its meaning very clear: 'They set a tower on fire, and leapt into the cellar beneath' (J.W., VI. vii. 4).

Abundant proof is forthcoming from the examination of the ruins of many ancient Eastern houses, from allusions in the Bible (cf. 1 Ch 27<sup>37, 28</sup>) and in other writings of the times, as well as from modern dwellings in the East which are typically Oriental, that many ancient houses were provided with 'cellars beneath,' and that ordinarily these 'cellars' were used as store-houses rather than as dwelling-places.

Looking at the passage Lk 11<sup>33</sup> in the light of the connexion in which we find it in Mt 5<sup>14-16</sup> and Mk 4<sup>21</sup>, the idea is that a course of concealment on the part of Christians is unreasonable, and contrary to the Divine design. Christians are 'the light of the world,' the light by which the mass of mankind may see the things of religion. As such they cannot escape observation if they would, and they should not wish to escape it if they could, for this would be contrary to the very purpose of God in making them sources of light. The unreasonableness of such a course, from cowardice or any other motive, is what is set forth in this and the other significant figures used by our Lord: 'No man, when he hath lighted a lamp, putteth it in a cellar, neither under a bushel, or a bed (Mk.), but on a lamp-stand, that they which come in may see the light.' The very purpose in lighting the lamp is that men may see it, or see by it. Is it, then, to be put in the cellar, where people do not live, or under a bushel or a bed, where it would be obscured? Is it not rather to be put on the lamp-stand, where all comers may see it, and see by it?

CENSUS.—This English word does not occur in the NT, the Greek term ἀπογραφὴ being rendered taxing in AV and enrolment in RV both in Lk 2<sup>d</sup> and in Ac 5th. In the former case, with which we are mainly concerned, 'enrolment' is certainly the better word; for the purpose of the enumeration was apparently not fiscal. That mentioned by Gamaliel, however, was a valuation as well as an enumeration, and it was called 'the taxing' with some reason. It was also better known than the other; par excellence it was 'the census' because a great tumult arose under Judas of Galilee in connexion with it, which made the occasion famous. That which took place at the time stated by St. Luke was so little known by the period when his Gospel was written, that he thinks it needful to insert a note about its date, lest it should be mistaken for the other. 'This was the first enrolment made when Quirinius was governor of Syria.' This note, however, has been itself a matter of great perplexity, because the date thus indicated does not apparently tally with the ascertain facts of secular history. For the discussion of this intricate question see articles BIRTH OF CHRIST, DATES, and QUIRINIUS.

The nature of the census of Lk 2<sup>d-3</sup> is a topic of some interest, on which light has been shed by Ramsay in Was Christ born at Bethlehem? (1898). It seems to have been an enrolment by households, such as Kenyon (Classical Exam., March 1893), Wilcken, and Viereck have shown was the practice in Egypt. Augustus had a great belief in the proper and systematic enumeration of his subjects, and the reckoning of them by households was a method which was carefully followed every fourteen years in Egypt. Many of the actual census papers have been found in that land in recent times, the earliest as yet discovered referring to the year 20 A.D. (Ramsay, op. cit., Preface, p. x note). This was quite different from the fiscal statistics compiled annually under the direction of the provincial governors of the Roman Empire, papers dealing with which have also been found. The household enrolments took place in cycles of fourteen years, and were dated according to the emperor in whose reign they were carried out. No mention was made in them of the value of property and stock, as in the annual returns, and the only financial purpose they served was to determine who were liable for the poll-tax exacted from all subjects between the ages of fourteen and sixty.

This poll-tax was the tribute (τίσιμος) referred to by the Pharisees in the question to Christ as to the lawfulness of payment (Mt 22nd; see art. TRIBUTE). It would seem that in Syria women as well as men were required to pay this tax (Ramsay, op. cit., 147 note); and if that was the case also in Palestine, this fact may possibly explain why, on the first occasion when the enrolment that was the basis of the poll-tax was made, Mary accompanied Joseph to Bethlehem despite her critical condition.

The discovery of the household-enrolment papers in Egypt throws light on the statement of Lk 2<sup>d</sup> 'there went out a decree from Caesar Augustus that all the world should be enrolled.' 'All the world' (πᾶσαν τὴν οἰκουμένην) was formerly supposed by some scholars, such as Kitto (Cycl. of Bib. Lit., art. 'Cyrenius'), to mean merely the whole land of Palestine, so as to escape the difficulty that secular history, so far as then known, was silent as to any general census. The meaning of the phrase cannot be so restricted. It means certainly the whole of the Roman Empire, which in the days of Augustus meant for all practical purposes 'the inhabited earth.' Not only was Rome itself included, with all the provinces, whether in Italy or elsewhere, but also those lands which, though having kings of their own, were really under the Roman suzerainty. Such was that portion of Syria under the dominion of Herod the Great.

The silence of history as to such an enumeration as was now to be made is no proof that it did not take place; for of other enumerations to which casual allusion is made by historians, Augustus himself in his record of his achievements makes no mention, except in so far as Roman citizens were concerned. The counting of alien subjects was probably not deemed of sufficient importance to be chronicled. Moreover, the household enrolments which have been traced back in Egypt by extant papers to A.D. 20 suggest at least that there may have been earlier ones in A.D. 6 and B.C. 8, which brings us back to the approximate period to which St. Luke refers. It may here be observed that the Evangelist does not actually say (Lk 2<sup>d</sup>), and very likely does not mean, that the intention of Augustus was that one single enumeration should be made of the whole Roman world. The tense of ἀπογράφειν rather signifies that a census of this nature on the household-enrolment principle was to be the practice, this being the first occasion of its being ordered; which precisely tallies with the following verse when rightly rendered, 'This was the first enrolment made at the time when Quirinius was governor of Syria.' A fuller discussion of this latter statement is reserved for the article QUIRINIUS.

The enrolment with which we are particularly concerned, then, would be appointed for B.C. 8; but in the case of Herod's kingdom it was not achieved till about a couple of years later, apparently for reasons which Ramsay has indicated, but which need not here be reproduced. They refer to the strained relations which then existed between Augustus and Herod. When it was made, the usual Roman method of enrolment at the residence of those enumerated was not followed, but one more in consonance with Jewish ideas. The people had often before been numbered by their tribes, and Herod probably judged that, especially on this first occasion of such an enrolment, the use and wont would be more acceptable to his subjects than a method new to them, and would be less likely to arouse resentment or even tumult. The Roman practice was to interfere as little as possible with the usages of the nations which had been subjugated; and therefore we may reckon that the particular method of taking the census would be left to the decision of the ruler of the district. Accordingly it was arranged that the tribal method should be followed, and that in subordination thereto the enrolment should be by persons registering themselves at the place from which the head of the family had sprung. Hence we read that 'all went to enrol themselves, every one to his own city. And Joseph also went up from Galilee, out of the city of Nazareth, into Judaea, to the city of David, because he was of the house and family of David, to enrol himself with Mary who was betrothed to him' (Lk 2<sup>d-3</sup>). If, as Mt 1st leads us to believe, Mary was actually recognized at this period as Joseph's wife, she would be enumerated as one of his household, whatever her own lineage was; but if St. Luke's expression 'betrothed' is to be pressed, would indicate not merely that the marriage was not publicly known or officially recognized, but that she herself must also have been of the family of David, and as such was enrolled in her own right. It may also be observed that the great gathering of those who claimed to be of 'the stock of Jesse' would help to explain how, when Joseph and Mary arrived, 'there was no room for them in the inn' (Lk 22).

ARTHUR POLLAK SYM.

CENTURION (Lat. centurio; in Mark always κεντυριων [15<sup>30</sup>, 44, 45]; in Matt. and Luke and Acts εκατονταρχος acc. to N', or εκατονταρχος in other uncials; the latter form being more Attic, the former more frequent in Hellenistic [cf. Blass, Gram., Eng. tr. p. 28, on fluctuation between first and second declensions]; in Polybius the centurion is called καταρχος).—As the name denotes, a centurion was an officer in the Roman army who had command of a centuria containing 100 men. The legion at its full strength consisted of about 6000 foot-soldiers, consequently it included 60 centurions. These were of different ranks or degrees of promotion and importance, according to the position occupied in battle by their special company or maniple. Though laughed at for their hob-nailed shoes and thick calves (Juv. Sat. xvi. 14, 24) and for their general unkempt roughness (ib. xiv. 184), these officers were the very 'backbone of the army.' Their badge of office was the vine-rod (vitis), which they freely used on the men, even without the authorization of the tribune (cf. Tacitus Annal. i. 23). Polybius describes the ideal centurion as 'not so much overventuresome and fond of danger as possessing the faculty for command, steady and serious (βαδεις και ψυχροι); not prone to rush into battle nor eager to strike the first blow, but ready to die in defence of their posts if their men are overborne by numbers and hard pressed' (vi. 24; cf. Vegetius, ii. 14).

The centurions mentioned in the NT are attractive specimens of the manly, serious-minded, generous Roman. In the Gospel narrative two centurions find a place. The one (Mt 8<sup>5-13</sup> || Lk 7<sup>1-10</sup>) resident in Capernaum may probably have been in Herod's service; but in any case he was a Gentile, for in his humble faith Jesus sees the first-fruits of a world redeemed, and recognizes that even if 'the children of the kingdom' prefer the outer darkness to the light and joy within, the provided feast will still be furnished with guests. The distinctive characteristic of this centurion's faith was his persuasion that a word of command uttered by Jesus could set in motion forces sufficient for the emergency, even as the ελευσηρα of the Roman officer at once accomplished his will. The μισος ερει λεγειν is the key to the incident, and absolutely differentiates this centurion from the βασιλειδης of Jn 4<sup>46</sup>, who insisted that Jesus should 'go down' and heal his son.

The centurion charged with superintending the crucifixion of Jesus (Mk 15<sup>39</sup> || Mt 27<sup>54</sup> || Lk 23<sup>47</sup>) paid so striking and unexpected a tribute to His greatness, that it finds a place in each of the Synoptic Gospels. The terms of the tribute are best understood from the account of St. Luke, who frequently preserves what is evidently the original form of a saying. Certainly 'son of God' in the mouth of a Roman could mean little more than St. Luke's 'just man.' But the expression 'son of God' might be suggested by the 'Father' in our Lord's last cry.

CEREMONIAL LAW.—See LAW.

CERTAINTY.—The ways in which 'certainty' is expressed in the Gospels are frequently indirect. So far, however, as certainty is expressed by direct terms, various phrases are employed for the purpose. Of these the most frequent are ασφαλεις and its derivatives ασφαλεια, ασφαλεις, ασφαλως. These always express objective security; the certainty which is or might be verified, and which consists in an accurate correspondence with facts.

Thus in his speech St. Luke (19) says he has 'traced the course of all things accurately . . . that thou mightest know the certainty . . .' (ασφαλεις, cf. Ac 6<sup>3</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>9</sup>); the traitor says, 'Take him and lead him away safely' (Mk 14<sup>44</sup> ασφαλεις, cf. Ac 26<sup>53</sup> 53<sup>16</sup>); Pilate says, 'Command that the sepulchre be made sure' (Mt 27<sup>66</sup> ασφαλεις, cf. Ac 16<sup>34</sup>). With these passages may be compared the use of ασφαλεις elsewhere in NT. viz. Ac 21<sup>34</sup> 22<sup>28</sup> 25<sup>25</sup>, Ph 3<sup>1</sup>, He 6<sup>19</sup>. The derivatives of βεβαιος are also employed, but with a force more or less distinctly moral or subjective. Thus the disciples are said to have 'preached everywhere, the Lord working with them and confirming the word' (Mk 16<sup>7</sup> βεβαιος, cf. Ro 15<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 13<sup>8</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>1</sup>, Col 2<sup>7</sup>, He 2<sup>12</sup>). Sometimes it is the disciples themselves who are 'confirmed' or 'established.' Outside the Gospels βεβαιος and βεβαιωνομαι occur with some frequency, being specially characteristic of the Ep. to Heb. (cf. 2 P 1<sup>19</sup> 19, Ro 4<sup>16</sup>, 5 Co 1<sup>7</sup>, He 2<sup>13</sup> 26 19 20<sup>7</sup>, Ph 1<sup>7</sup>). In Lk 23<sup>47</sup> επιγειν occurs. Certainly this was a righteous man'; and in Lk 24<sup>51</sup> επιγειν. Doubtless ye will say to me . . . (cf. Ac 21<sup>32</sup> 284, 1 Co 9<sup>10</sup>); but these are adverbial qualifications of no great importance. [It is hardly necessary to remark that in the great majority of the passages in which the word 'certain' occurs in the English versions, it renders the indefinite pronoun τις, where it has nothing to do with certainty, but is merely an idiomatic phrase equivalent to 'some' in a quite indefinite sense].

With this use of language it is instructive to compare the opposite 'uncertainty' which is expressed by αμφιβολια, αμφιβολως, commonly translated 'perplexed,' though the meaning is rather that of hesitancy than of perplexity, as one finds no way out of a difficulty, and so is brought to pause. These words occur in Lk 21<sup>26</sup> and Jn 13<sup>22</sup> 'doubting of whom he spake' (cf. Ac 23<sup>29</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>8</sup>, Gal 4<sup>9</sup>). It is also worth while to compare such occasional use of ασηρα as 'given assurance unto all men' (Ac 17<sup>24</sup>); and that of πληροθυρια, 'full assurance' (Col 2<sup>5</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>5</sup>, He 6<sup>15</sup>).

But apart from special terms expressing certainty, the broad fact itself has, of course, a large place in the Gospels and in the mind of the Lord Jesus. This is usually represented by saying that a person or a thing is 'known,' where οιδα is the verb employed. This verb is a 'perfect-present,' and by its very form indicates the possession of knowledge, not its acquirement. In a number of passages the sense is accordingly best rendered not by 'I know,' but by 'I am sure of.'

The following are instances from the Gospels of this way of expressing certainty:—'Fear ye not, for I am certain that ye are seeking Jesus who was crucified' (Mk 29<sup>9</sup>). 'Master, we are certain that thou speakest and teachest straightforwardly' (Lk 20<sup>42</sup>). 'We speak what we are certain of, and bear evidence of what we have seen' (Jn 8<sup>21</sup>). 'No longer do we believe through thy report, for we ourselves have heard and are certain' (4<sup>49</sup>). 'What sign dost thou that we may feel certainty, and may trust thee?' (6<sup>30</sup>). 'This is Jesus the son of Joseph; we are certain of his father and mother' (6<sup>38</sup>, cf. 7<sup>27</sup>). 'Give glory to God; we are certain this man is a sinner. He therefore answered, If he is a sinner I am not so certain; of one thing I am certain, that, being blind, henceforth I see' (9<sup>24</sup>, 26). 'Even now I am certain that whatsoever thou unyest ask of God, God will give thee' (11<sup>20</sup>). 'He that hath seen heareth witness, and his witness is true (αληθης), and he is certain that he speaketh true (αληθως), that ye also may believe' (16<sup>30</sup>, cf. 21<sup>24</sup>). Sometimes οιδα is used of God's knowledge with its unerring certainty; and at other times of man's knowledge of God which springs from personal trust and love.

It is characteristic that the grounds on which certainty is shown in the Gospels to rest are moral grounds rather than intellectual; for commonly it is moral certitude, not scientific security, which is in view. On the one hand, the foundation of certainty is the faithfulness of God; this is well illustrated in the case of Zacharias (Lk 1<sup>8</sup>-10), and in that of Mary (vv. 27-38). On the other hand, certainty is won through men's trust (πιστις) in God or in Christ. So the Lord said, 'Whosoever shall say unto this mountain . . . and shall not doubt (διακωπειν) in his heart, but shall believe . . . he shall have it' (Mk 11<sup>23</sup> || Mt 21<sup>24</sup>). To Peter as he began to fear and sink He said, 'O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?' (διερτα, Mt 14<sup>21</sup>). And when it is recorded of the disciples to whom the Lord appeared after His resurrection, that 'they saw him, and worshipped, but some doubted' (Mark, 28<sup>7</sup>). He met this mixed regard by a great personal affirmation, and a great charge laid on them, which formed in point of fact the strongest appeal to their most certain trust. See, further, art. ASSURANCE.

CHAFF.—The term used in English to denote the protective coverings and appendages of the growing corn—the glumes, scales, and awns—after they have been dried in the ripening of the plant and in the wind and sun, and separated from the grain and straw. The Greek word is ἀχυρον (Lat. palca), 'mostly used in plural for chaff, bran, husks' (Liddell and Scott); perhaps derived from αχ, indicating its pointed nature. But the older authorities, and most writers on the Greek of the NT, incline to regard the ἀχυρον as including the cut or broken-up straw which mingles with the chaff proper.

Schleusner, controverting the opinion of previous lexicographers, says that the word for the outer integuments (palca) is ἀχυρον, and that ἀχυρον includes totum calanum frumenti inde a radice usque ad epicam que grana continent, and that it is equivalent to the Heb. תבן and Foss (art. 'Straw' in Hastings' DB) suggests the use of the Arab. word tān, which denotes the mingled chaff and cut or broken straw.

In reaping it was often the practice to leave all the straw, except an inch or two cut off with the ear. The dust of the chaff is in the LXX χρῶς (Ps 1<sup>a</sup> 35<sup>a</sup>, Is 29<sup>a</sup>, Hos 13<sup>a</sup>), and once χρῶς ἀχρόου (Is 17<sup>b</sup>), and once κοιλοπρός (Job 21<sup>18</sup>).

The combination of broken straw with the chaff is explained by the process of harvesting, threshing, and winnowing in Palestinian agriculture. The threshing-machine, or threshing-waggon (see art. 'Agriculture' in Hastings' DB), which, by repeatedly passing over the sheaves, broke up the short straw into fragments, separated the grain from its dried envelopes. The threshing-floor was so placed, usually in an elevated and breezy position, that the wind could be utilized to separate the lighter, heavier, and heaviest materials from one another, and the method of winnowing secured that the grain should fall in the centre, the heavier straw at a small distance from the grain heap, while the broken straw and chaff (ἀχυρον) were carried away by the wind, either out of the threshing-floor, or so that it could be swept together for burning. The complete separation of the chaff, which included fragments of the awns and straw, from the corn was effected by means of the winnowing-fan (πρόον), the broad shallow shovel with which corn after threshing was thrown up against the wind, and so finally cleansed of the chaff. See art. 'Shovel' in Hastings' DB. This final stage of the winnowing process is referred to by John the Baptist in the only occurrences of the word 'chaff' in the NT (Mt 3<sup>12</sup>, Lk 3<sup>17</sup>).

The imagery of the threshing-floor was finely adapted to express the sweeping reform of the national life which the ardent soul of the Baptist expected to characterize the coming of the Jewish Messiah. The chaff well represented (1) the insincerity and hypocrisy of the national religious leaders, profession without substance, looking at a distance like grain, but proving on near inspection to be chaff; and (2) the light irresponsibility, the absence of true principle, in the people who accepted this formalism and pretence as genuine grain of goldness. And the winnowing represented the readiness with which such unsubstantial elements of national character would be carried away by the first wind of trial, or burnt up by the divinely authorized Messiah, whose coming John expected to be with swift discrimination and judgment. John looked for the immediate separation of the false from the true, the bad from the good. The Christ would come as Malachi (3<sup>1-2</sup>) predicted, with searching and striking condemnation of all that was worthless and injurious; and the comparative slowness and indirectness of our Lord's method was the moving cause of his perplexed question, when he heard in the prison the works of Christ, and sent his disciples to ask, 'Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?' (Mt 11<sup>3</sup>, Lk 7<sup>19</sup>).

CHAINS.—The usual NT word for 'chain' is ἀλυσίς. πέδας (Mk 5<sup>a</sup> AV and RV fetters) are for binding the feet. δεσμός is a more general term, meaning anything to tie or fasten. AV renders δεσμοί, 'chains,' in Jude 6, but RV substitutes 'bonds.' For critical reasons 'chains' disappears from 2 P 2.

In NT chains invariably denote instruments for binding, or restraining the liberty of the person, e.g. the demoniac (Mk 5<sup>b</sup>), St. Peter (Ac 12<sup>a</sup>), the dragon (Rev. 20<sup>1</sup>). Imbeciles appear always to have received consideration, if not even reverence, in the East; but demoniacs, and persons suffering from certain forms of delirium, have been treated with horrible cruelty. Often they are loaded with chains and bound to a staple firmly fixed in the ground. The tortures applied are ostensibly for the purpose of driving out the evil spirit that possesses them.

Under the Roman law, vincula was a form of punishment, or of safe custody. The prisoner was chained to a soldier, who was responsible for his safe keeping. The chain was fastened round the right wrist of the prisoner and the left wrist of his guard. To this chain St. Paul refers (Ac 28<sup>16</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>). For greater safety two soldiers might be assigned as guards to one prisoner, a hand of each being chained to one of his. Thus St. Peter was confined in the stormy days of the persecution (Ac 12<sup>a</sup>); and St. Paul, when Lysias thought him a dangerous person (Ac 21<sup>33</sup>). The use of πέδας in their modern form may be seen to-day at Acre, in the groups of Turkish prisoners chained together by the ankles. W. EWING.

CHAMBER.—See CLOSET, and GUEST-CHAMBER.

CHANCE.—The word occurs only once in EV of the Gospels, viz. in Lk 10<sup>31</sup>, where in the parable of the Good Samaritan the priest is said to have been going down that way 'by chance.' In the original the phrase is κατά συντυχίαν, Vulg. accidit ut. The word συντυχία is found nowhere else in NT, and rarely in the Gr. authors. The idea of 'chance' is ordinarily expressed in Gr. by the nouns τύχη, συντυχία, or by the verb τυγχάνω. Neither of these nouns occurs in NT, and the verb, in its intransitive sense of 'chancing' or 'happening,' but rarely. Examples are 1 Co 13<sup>7</sup> εἰ τύχοι εἶρος, which EV translates 'it may chance of wheat' (the only other occasion on which the word 'chance' is found in EV of NT), and 14<sup>10</sup> εἰ τύχοι, EV 'it may be.'

In the Gospels τυγχάνω is used in its intransitive sense, with the idea, viz. of 'happening,' only once, and that is, curiously enough, in TR reading of Lk 10<sup>31</sup>, the verse immediately preceding the one under consideration, where the robbers are said to have left their victim καὶ τὸν κεραιόντα. The κέραιοντα here, as Meyer and others have pointed out, is not simply equivalent to δρα, though the AV translators appear to have so regarded it. The expression properly means 'half dead as he chanced to be.' The shade of suggestion is that the robbers left him in complete indifference to his fate, to live or die just as it might happen. The fact, however, that κέραιοντα is lacking in NBDLE, at justifies its omission from the text by WH and other critical editors.

Unlike τύχη and τυχεύω, εὐτυχία does not denote 'chance' in the proper sense of the word, i.e. something which 'falls out' independently of the ordinary laws of causation ('chance' comes from the Low Lat. cadentia, 'a falling,' and may have been suggested by the falling of the dice from a dice-box). Derived as it is from εὖ and τύχη ('fall in with'), it corresponds almost exactly to our word 'coincidence.' All that our Lord's use of the phrase κατὰ εὐτυχίαν accordingly suggests is, that by a coincidence of events a certain priest came by just as the wounded traveller lay helpless on the road. And, as Godet remarks, He may even have used the expression with a kind of irony, since 'it is certainly not by accident that the narrator brings those two personages on the scene' (Com. on Lk. in loc.).

Apart from any further occurrence of the word 'chance' in EV of the Gospels, the idea of hap or chance may seem to be conveyed by the use of 'haply' in Mk 11<sup>13</sup> where Jesus is said to have come to the fig-tree, 'if haply he might find anything thereon,' and in Lk 14<sup>29</sup> where He Himself says of the builder who could not finish his tower, 'lest haply when he hath laid a foundation, and is not able to finish it.' But in both cases we have to do in the original simply with conjunctions and particles, εἰ ἄρα in the one passage and μή ποτε in the other.

As a matter of fact, the idea of chance was as foreign to the ancient Jewish as to the modern scientific mind; for while the scientist holds that the universal reign of law renders the operation of chance impossible, the Hebrew may be said to have believed (cf. Pr 16<sup>33</sup>) of every so-called chance that 'Eternal God that chance did guide.' In popular language the idea of things happening by chance appears to be admitted in both OT and NT (cf. 1 S 6<sup>7</sup>, Ec 9<sup>11</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>27</sup>), as it constantly is among ourselves. But in the case of the Scripture writers, at all events, it denoted only human ignorance of proximate causes, not the occurrence of events independently of the Divine will (with 1 S 6<sup>7</sup> cf. v. 12, with Ec 9<sup>11</sup> cf. v. 1, with 1 Co 15<sup>27</sup> cf. 3<sup>7</sup>, Gal 6<sup>10</sup>).

As bearing upon the subject of chance, reference may be made to the casting of lots by the Roman soldiers for the garments of Jesus. The incident is mentioned by every one of the Evangelists, and is explained by John as referring only to His seamless tunic (Mt 27<sup>35</sup>, Mk 15<sup>24</sup>, Lk 23<sup>34</sup>, Jn 19<sup>23-24</sup>). Among the Jews the casting of lots was regarded not as a reference of a question to the fickleness of chance, but as a solemn appeal to the Divine judgment (cf. Pr 16<sup>33</sup>). And though by the time of Christ such a game of chance as dice-playing (κυβεία) had been introduced into Palestine (cf. St. Paul's ἐν τῷ κυβείᾳ τῶν ἀσποδόντων, 'by the sleight of men,' lit. 'by the dice-playing,' because of the trickery and cheating which had come to be associated with the game), it was repudiated by those who adhered strictly to the Jewish law (see Schröter, HJF II. i. 36). With the Roman soldiers it was otherwise. Dice are thought by some to have been an invention of the Romans, and certainly dicing was very common among them. In his famous 'Crucifixion' in the Church of Sta. Maria degli Angioli at Lugano, Luini represents the four soldiers as rising from a game of dice to dispute with one another the possession of the seamless robe. And more than one writer who has sought to describe the awful scene of Calvary has considered it natural to suppose that the soldiers would amuse themselves during the hours of waiting by playing their favourite game (see Farrar, Life of Christ, ad loc.). No information is given us by the Evangelists as to the manner in which the lots were cast. But it may be that a cast of the dice-box was the plan which suggested itself most readily to those rude men, and that they actually gambled for the Saviour's coat while He hung above them on the cross, dying for the sins of the world. See, further, art. LOTS (CASTING OF).

CHARACTER may be defined as the result of the interaction between a personality and its environment; or, if the word is used in its special and favourable sense, as the advantage gained by personality over its environment, especially by the exercise of the will. In the terms of Aristotle (Nic. Eth. I. vii. 15), it is 'an energy of the inner life on the lines of virtue.' The question to be answered is, How have the life and gospel of Christ made this more possible? First, He diminished the moral weight and dread of life's environment. Secondly, He enlarged the resources and opportunities of personality.

4. The following are some of the powers which the soul has to meet in conflict:—

(1) Suffering.—'If a perfectly good man foreknew what was going to happen to him, he would cooperate with nature in both falling sick and dying and being maimed, being conscious that this is the particular portion assigned to him in the arrangement of the Universe' (Epictetus). Christ inspired men to put their foot on disease as an evil (Mt 10<sup>8</sup>, Mk 16<sup>18</sup>), and won His first fame by His own powers of healing (Mt 4<sup>23-25</sup> 11<sup>4-6</sup> etc.). Such deeds were good on the Sabbath day (Lk 6<sup>9</sup>), for it was a breaking of Satan's tyranny (Lk 13<sup>16</sup>).

(2) Death.—He died to 'deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage' (He 2<sup>15</sup>). Jesus not only so faced death as to convince a Roman centurion and a dying criminal that He was more than man (Mt 27<sup>44</sup>, Lk 23<sup>46</sup>), but did not in His teaching allow it to have a decisive place in life, except to the fool (Lk 12<sup>29</sup>). He spoke of it as a sleep (Jn 11<sup>11,12</sup>), which the good man need not fear (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>), and as a going to the Father and His many abiding-places (Jn 14<sup>1-3</sup>).

(3) The world.—

'If but the Vine and Love-abjuring hand
Are in the Prophet's Paradise to stand, Alack, I doubt the Prophet's Paradise
Were empty as the hollow of one's hand' (Omar).

Jesus was in complete independence of all that the world offers, accepting poverty (Lk 9<sup>55</sup>), repudiating popularity (Jn 6<sup>15</sup>), not expecting to be waited on (Mk 10<sup>45</sup>). 'Be of good courage,' He said, 'I have overcome the world' (Jn 16<sup>33</sup>); and on account of the promise of His presence His disciples were built up in the same ἀνάρπικτα (Ph 4<sup>1</sup>).

(4) Racial barriers.—'It is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to join himself or come unto one of another nation' (Ac 10<sup>28</sup>). Jesus struck at the limitations of race prejudice and enmity in the parables of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>29,30</sup>) and the Last Judgment (Mt 25<sup>12,13</sup>). Though He sought first the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Mt 10<sup>6</sup>), He 'opened the Kingdom of Heaven to all believers' (Mt 8<sup>10-12</sup>, cf. Mk 7<sup>28</sup>), and thereby achieved on moral lines what the status of Roman citizenship created on legal lines. His short career was an encounter with the dead hand and narrowing force of nationalism (Mk 12<sup>9</sup>, Mt 21<sup>42-44</sup>), and it was in the name of Son of Man that He lived and died.

(5) Caste distinctions.—'It was the hereditary disability the Aryans had succeeded in imposing upon races they despised, which, reacting within their own circle and strengthened by the very intolerance that gave it birth, has borne such bitter fruit through so many centuries' (Rhys Davids, Hibbert Lectures). 'A workshop is incompatible with anything noble' (Cicero). Jesus kept the same way open to all without regard to social or religious status; did not reject the rich (Mt 8<sup>19</sup>, Lk 7<sup>9</sup>), but counted their wealth a disadvantage (Mk 10<sup>21-23</sup>, Lk 6<sup>20</sup>). He chose His companions from men who were mostly of no class (Mk 1<sup>29</sup>), was known as the friend of publicans and sinners (Mt 9<sup>11</sup>, Lk 15<sup>1-2</sup>), and threw away His own triumph to give Zaccheus a moral chance, 'forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham' (Lk 19<sup>9-10</sup>).

(6) Family control.—'To every individual,' says Sir Henry Maine, referring to the Roman civilization, 'the rule of conduct is the law of his home, of which his parent is the legislator.' Though Jesus maintained the sanctity of the marriage tie (Mt 19<sup>6</sup>), and illustrated as well as taught filial obedience and honour (Lk 2<sup>21</sup>, Jn 19<sup>26-27</sup>, Mk 7<sup>11</sup>), He broke the decisive control of the family for the sake of the individual personality (Mt 10<sup>35-37</sup>, Lk 9<sup>59-62</sup>, 11<sup>27-28</sup>, Mk 10<sup>38-40</sup>).

2. In the second place, Christ enlarged the resources and opportunities of personality, by making the soul conscious and confident of a new environment, in which it could find release and reinforcement. The secret of this spiritual environment which awakens and sustains the soul's faculties of faith, hope, and love is grace, in which alone they can move and have their being. The essential fact of grace is illustrated in the teaching of Christ chiefly in the following doctrines: the Divine Fatherhood, the Divine Forgiveness, the Divine Indwelling, and the Divine Reappearing. All that was dim or distorted in the human views of these truths, which mean so much to personality and character, He rectified and made authoritative.

(1) The clear revelation of the Divine Fatherhood had this immense bearing on character, that it brought out the worth of the individual soul. It is not necessary here to argue the question whether we are really God's sons, apart from faith in Christ. It is enough for the purpose that Christ undoubtedly used the truth of the Divine Fatherhood as the chief motive to the new ethic. The first and most important effect on character is that the starting-point is trust. Trust in God is illustrated in contentment with circumstances, courage in regard to human opposition. Whatever be the straits of life and however menacing the future, there may well be trust in One who cares for the individual with more than the purpose and solicitude of an earthly father (Mt 6<sup>3-7</sup>, Lk 12<sup>7-28</sup>). And as for hostility, it is well worth standing firm for truth and righteousness, for thus the approval of the Father is gained (Mt 5<sup>11-12</sup>, 16<sup>24-27</sup>, Lk 12<sup>46</sup>, Jn 15<sup>20</sup>, 16<sup>1-3</sup>). The natural vehicle of such trust is prayer, which Jesus Himself used for the solution of His perplexities and the bearing of His burdens (Lk 10<sup>2</sup>, Mk 14<sup>8</sup> etc.), and which the disciples were also to use freely and urgently (Lk 11<sup>2-13</sup>, 18<sup>1</sup>).

This leads to the second characteristic of a life that acts on the teaching of the Divine Fatherhood—its religion will be in spirit and truth (Jn 4<sup>23</sup>). Prayer is no mere performance, but secret and real (Mt 6<sup>6-9</sup>), in faith (Mk 11<sup>22-23</sup>), with a softened heart (Mk 11<sup>9</sup>), and looking for the highest things (Jn 15<sup>16</sup>, 16<sup>26</sup>). Religion is not a matter of external or traditional compulsion, but rests upon a gospel of Divine love (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>, 23<sup>37</sup>, Jn 6<sup>44-45</sup>). The Father can care for nothing that is not spontaneous and sincere like childhood (Mk 10<sup>13-15</sup>, 14<sup>9</sup>, Mt 18<sup>21-22</sup>), and the fruit of real growth (Jn 15<sup>5</sup>). The consummation of life is to be so sanctified by the truth as to enjoy God as Christ the Son Himself did (Jn 17<sup>20-29</sup>).

And the bearing of the Divine Fatherhood on our relations to our fellows produces a wise tolerance. The disciples of Christ are to imitate the character of Him who 'maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust,' and refuse to treat any man as an enemy (Mt 5<sup>43-45</sup>). Indeed, the truth of the Fatherhood is the great inspiration to kindness and charity. The positive character of the 'Golden Rule,' which is its Christian distinction, is directly drawn from the ways of the 'Father in heaven' (Mt 7<sup>11-12</sup>), and the blessedness of peacemakers is in being called sons of God (Mt 5<sup>9</sup>). The parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>25-37</sup>) illustrates in particular what the parable of the Great Assize (Mt 25<sup>31-46</sup>) sets forth with ideal completeness, that there is no real love to God which is not expressed in spontaneous and appropriate help to every human being that requires it. Thus in the teaching of Christ went forth 'an edict of Universal Love'; 'humanity was changed from a restraint to a motive' (Eccle Homo, ch. 16). And that this was the secret of the Christian message, is indicated in the parting commission, 'Go ye and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost' (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>).

(2) The gospel of Divine Forgiveness has had a distinctive and powerful effect upon the characters of those who have accepted it. Indeed, it has produced a new type of character, which can be described only as being born again (Jn 3<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>17-18</sup>). Forgiveness was by no means a new idea, for it had never been set forth with more beauty and completeness than in the Prophets and the Psalmists of the Old Testament. But Jesus was the first to apply it to the individual soul with the view of producing the character of a child of the Kingdom; and it was this which made His teaching seem revolutionary and even blasphemous to the guardians of the Old Covenant (Mk 2<sup>7-12</sup>, Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup>). The average good person is now as much as ever inclined to resent the 'opening of the Kingdom of heaven to all believers' through the remission of sins. It contradicts the view accepted by all average moralists that it is by the maintenance of virtue that heaven must be won, and that any contradictory doctrine must loosen the bands of character. Their view is necessary as a caution, not only against the Antinomians, who treat the fact of forgiveness as a term of logic, and argue 'let us sin that grace may abound,' but also against all who preach faith as something apart from ethical enthusiasm. But St. Paul had learned the secret of his Master when he flung himself into the advanced position of 'justification by faith.' It was Jesus Himself who had the daring originality to base character on a new foundation without fearing to debase it (Lk 7<sup>47-50</sup>, Mt 23<sup>27, 28</sup>).

It must, however, be remembered that it was not so much the intention of Jesus to set up a rival type of character, as to restore the character of those who had lost it; to give a new chance to the personality that was overborne and fettered by its environment. He was essentially a physician of the sick (Lk 5<sup>27-28</sup>), a seeker of the lost (Lk 15, 19<sup>9</sup>, Mt 18<sup>12</sup>), a giver of rest to the heavy laden (Mt 11<sup>28-29</sup>), fulfilling the words, 'He shall be called Jesus: for he shall save his people from their sins' (Mt 1<sup>21</sup>, cf. Jn 3<sup>7</sup>). The great contribution, then, to the forming of character in the gospel of Forgiveness is not that it adds anything to the ideal of virtue, but that it unseals the great motive of humble and adoring gratitude, and opens the way for that tide of love which is itself the fulfilling of the Law (Lk 7<sup>47</sup>, 19<sup>8-9</sup>). The business of Jesus was not the chiselling and polishing of character, but primarily its creation among the multitudes who would be shut out by the Pharisees from the kingdom of righteousness. The gospel does not so much teach how to be good as why to be good. Yet it must be admitted that in this teaching of grace as a redeeming power, Jesus did not simply profess to level sinners up to the virtuous. Rather He made the beatitude of the forgiven appear in comparison with the self-complacency of the virtuous as sunshine to moonlight (Lk 6:22-23; 18:14). The result of thus opening the fountains of a great deep was to be seen in a new humility and tenderness, an unexampled moral scrupulousness and solicitude, for the pride of the natural man is overwhelmed by the sense of what he owes (Mt 18:12-13; John 21:15-17; Gal 2:20; Col 3:12-13).

(3) The third illustration of grace through which the scattered forces of character can be regathered is the Divine Indwelling, which, although not made conspicuous in the Synoptists, is essential to the Christian conception of character. The remarkable transformation which came over the chief Apostles after the events of Calvary and the Garden, was expressly attributed by them to the fulfillment of Christ's promise to return and dwell in them through the Spirit (Ac 1:9-6; 2:38; Jn 14:17-19). The character that has learned its worth from the Divine Fatherhood, and found its release in the Divine Forgiveness, gains its strength and means of independence from the Divine Indwelling. The real strength of character from the Christian point of view lies in the sense of weakness and the dependence on grace. Its ideal is not self-possession and self-complacency, but a possession by Christ (Gal 2:20), and a pleasing of Christ (Ph 1:6). And because its standard is so high, namely, the perfection of God Himself (Mt 5:48), the only chance of attaining it is to realize that the sufficient power comes from the imparted life (Jn 20:21-22), to take the yoke of Christ (Mt 11:29), or to abide in Him (Jn 15). If we can rely on God's Fatherhood, we can be sure He will give the best gift, the Holy Spirit (Lk 11:13), which is to enable the disciples to do greater things even than Jesus Himself (Jn 14:12), because thus His own power will be multiplied in and through them (1 Jn 4:12-13).

From the Christian point of view, then, character depends for its final strength and beauty on the measure of its surrender and receptivity. Its turning-point is found in that decisive acceptance of Christ which is called 'conversion,' and which is not mere acquiescence, but allegiance as well, not only requiring an attitude of the soul, but also its adventure with and for the Lord it has recognized. When room has been made for the Divine indwelling in immediate sequence to the Divine forgiveness, there may be an assurance that through grace and with much patience the fruits of Christian character will come (Mk 4:23; 9:29). Christian character depends on Christ's indwelling; for its virtues, which are more appropriately termed graces, are called 'fruits of the Spirit,' indicating that they are not the attainment of the old nature, but the growth of the new, according to the 'law of the Spirit of life which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.' In Gal 5:22-23 they are thus given: 'love, joy, peace, long-suffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, temperance'; and in 2 P 1:5-7: 'faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and love.' From which it will be seen that there is no ordered system of ethics in the New Testament; but the sum and substance of it is that life is primarily to be the gradual demonstration of the Divine indwelling, that the world may see that Christians are alike possessed and controlled by a power and spirit not their own.

(4) There is one further contribution to the making of character in the name of grace which belongs to the Christian revelation, viz. the Divine Reappearing. However erroneously it was conceived, there can be no doubt that it exercised a powerful effect upon the moral qualities of the early Christian community (1 Th 1:10), and its essential truth is still responsible for much that is unique in Christian ethics. It was sufficient to slay worldly ambitions outright, so that men sold their possessions (Ac 4:34), and at a later age secluded themselves in hermit or monastic dwellings. The journey of Israel to the Promised Land became the framework of the Christian conception of life—a pilgrimage through a wilderness. The result of this view has been the withdrawal of much imagination and energy from the problems of the present world in the name of an expected heaven—whereas the real watching is in right employment here and now (Lk 17:20, 21; 19:11-27). But it would be a mistake to miss the great contribution made by the doctrine of Christ's reappearing to the improvement of character (Lk 12:35-37; 1 Th 5:23). When it is understood in the light of the words and example of Jesus Himself rather than of Messianic expectations, which again and again He disappointed in favour of spiritual interests (Lk 9:54-55; Jn 6:14; 15:25-26; 16:28-29; Ac 1:6), its effect is purifying and searching to the last degree, and arms the personality with the weapon of a new hope in the conflict with its environment (Ph 3:13-14). The reappearing of the Saviour, whether it be when physical disabilities fall from us at death, or in some other way, is essentially a final judgment (Mt 7:21-23; 13:29-30; cf. 2 Co 5:10) in which hidden things will be brought to light (Lk 8:17; 12:2; Mt 25:35-40).

Firstly, it gives a motive to purity of life which no other religion has been able to supply (1 Jn 3:2, 2 P 3:11-14), and to a consecrated use of every natural faculty (Ro 12). The promise of the resurrection rescues the body from the contempt with which philosophers were inclined to regard it, for as companion of the soul it is both sacred and serviceable (1 Co 6:19-20). It is to be changed from a body of humiliation to the likeness of the body of His glory (Ph 3:21), and meantime its members are to be disciplined as instruments of righteousness (Ro 6:13), every ability being turned to good account (1 P 4:10, 11; Col 3:16, 17).

Next, it gives a deeper sanction to the social relationships of life. The spiritual side of marriage has been greatly developed by the revelation of the issues of life (Mt 19:4; Eph 5:22-33). The relations of parent and children, of master and servant, were likewise dignified by being seen sub specie eternitatis (Col 3:20-25; 4:1), and in the remembrance that for responsibility we must give account (Lk 12:48-49). It was this truth which gave its special meaning to Church membership, so that the Christian community was knit together with bonds unknown in any contemporary clubs or guilds (Mt 18:14-20; Eph 1:10-23; 2:19-22; 1 Co 12:12-20). Though there was discontent and division in the Church, and even an occasional subsidence to the vicious levels of pagan society, the ideal could be steadily built up again in the sure hope of a radiant future, when the secret working of the absent Bridegroom in His own should be accomplished (Eph 5:27; Col 3:4; 1 P 1:8). And this hope was a continual summons to every Christian to rise and be worthy of his calling (Ro 13:1, 1 Co 3:16-19; 6:14).

Finally, the hope of a Divine reappearing exercises its influence upon the common toil and appointed duty of every day. It is as if the owner of an estate went away entrusting to each man his work, and bidding the porter to watch (Mk 13<sup>34</sup>). It is required that a steward be found faithful (1 Co 4<sup>1-2</sup>); and it is well for the Christian if he has used to advantage the talents given (Mt 25<sup>14-23</sup>), and the opportunities offered on every hand for the wider human service (Mt 25<sup>34-40</sup>), for there is an appropriate reward (1 Co 3<sup>12-14</sup>). Lowly service is the path to ennoblement and the seats of influence (Mk 10<sup>43-45</sup>, Lk 12<sup>43-44</sup>).

The promise of the Divine Reappearing thus supplements, as it were, the promise of the Divine Indwelling; for whereas the latter brings out the need for the Christian's faith in a power not his own, the former requires that he be faithful with the powers that are his own. And taking all four aspects of the revelation of grace through Jesus Christ together, we see that they equip His followers for that conflict with environment out of which character emerges, by giving the soul a new worth, freedom, power, and motive.

This revelation is above all in the Cross, in which Christ was most fully manifested (Lk 9<sup>22</sup>, Jn 10<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>23</sup>). There we see convincingly the love of the Father (Ro 8<sup>2</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>10</sup>), who counted men of such value (Mt 18<sup>31-34</sup>, Lk 15<sup>10</sup>) that He would have all to be saved though at infinite cost (Jn 3<sup>16-17</sup>). There is the place of the breaking forth of forgiveness (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>), the supreme illustration of that redeeming love by which men's freedom is purchased (1 P 1<sup>18-19</sup>, Ro 14<sup>7-9</sup>, Rev 1<sup>5</sup>). There the life was surrendered to the Father (Jn 10<sup>17, 18</sup>), to be bestowed as an enabling power (Jn 14<sup>12-14</sup>, Ac 4<sup>10</sup>) by an indwelling Spirit (Jn 1<sup>13</sup>, Ro 8<sup>9-10</sup>), wherewith He might bring many sons to glory (He 2<sup>10</sup>). And there, finally, the eternal future was clasped to the tragic present (Jn 12<sup>24-25</sup>) as the ever-living Son submitted to taste of death (He 2<sup>14</sup>), that neither earthly trouble nor spiritual principality might ever separate His people from Him (Ro 8<sup>31-35</sup>, Ph 1<sup>21-23</sup>).

In another summary, it may be said that the Christian ethic revolves between two poles which are discovered in the light of Christ's teaching, the inwardness of religion, and its practical nature. The first had been neglected by the Jew and the second by the Greek. And one-sidedness is still only too possible, when, for instance, in the name of Christianity the ascetic visionary holds to the first alone, or the social revolutionary to the second. But all ethical deductions can and must be rectified by reference to the work and word of Christ, who started from inward character and aimed at social regeneration.

And in a final analysis of what Christ has distinctively done for character, it may be said that (a) He treated the personality as a whole. All ethical systems are based on one or other element of our threefold nature. The pivot of the good life was, according to Socrates, knowledge; according to Epicurus, feeling; according to Zeno, the will. Christ gave a due and natural place to each of these; for character with Him was not a system, as it was with Greek, Jew, or Roman, or as it is with Confucian or Mohammedan, but a growth from within, deeper even than our own nature, rooted in the ever-living grace of God. (b) He treated it as free. This also is crucial to Christian character, and depends on the truth that the ultimate fact of life is not Fate, but a God of grace, a Father. Jesus looked for repentance as the first consequence of His good tidings (Mk 1<sup>15</sup>). Whatever a man's past had been, he could be released and renewed, if out of the darkness and bondage he put forth the hand of faith. And so in the last resort life is self-determined. These two essential truths for the making of character, viz. the integrity and the freedom of personality, have been recognized and realized in the light of the four great truths enumerated above. Thus Christ has enlarged the resources and opportunity of personality, and enabled it to be victorious over its material and moral environment.

Literature.

Introduction.—(a) The aim of this article is to make a purely ethical study of the character of Christ. In such a study there must be no dogmatic presuppositions regarding the constitution of His person, whether favourable or hostile to the statements of Nicene orthodoxy. There must be no abstract separation of His humanity from His Divinity, and no attempt to relegate certain acts or phases to one side and others to the other side. We must proceed in the case of Jesus Christ as we do in that of the great men who have forced succeeding ages to the task of understanding them, though it may well be that in the end we shall be constrained to set Him, with reasoned conviction, in a class apart, high above the greatest of men.

(b) The sources for such a study are, of course, the four Gospels. It is obviously impossible to appeal to the Epistles, save for any reminiscences they may contain of the historic Christ. Their conceptions of the risen Christ cannot come here into view. In thus restricting ourselves to the earthly life of Christ, we are not excluding any view which faith might take of His present existence. If Christ be alive now, He must be the same, morally, as He was when on earth. There is no other Christ than the Christ of the Gospels.

As soon as we turn to the Gospels, we are met by various critical problems. The solution of these must be sought in the various works which are devoted to their discussion. For the study in which we are to be engaged two positions are essential, which may be stated here as assumptions, though they are in reality conclusions of the study itself. (1) The first is the trustworthiness of the Gospels as portrayures of Christ. Grant the ordinary critical results, that the Gospels were written late in the 1st cent., that contemporary ideas and experiences have influenced their authors or editors, that in some cases the Evangelists have misunderstood or misreported their Master; yet the fact remains, that the character of Christ, as presented in these documents, was not, and could not have been, an invention or a fiction, a product of progressive meditation, or a creation of enthusiastic feeling. Do justice to the portrait of Christ, let its harmony and its uniqueness, its profound naturalness and its transcendent loveliness, make their due impression, and the conclusion presses, that the Christ of the Gospels is not a construction but a memory, an actual Figure, once beheld by eyes of flesh, and now discerned through a medium upon which contemporary influences have had no distorting effect, and which, accordingly, permits Him to be known as He was.

It may be said that, while these remarks are true of the Synoptic Gospels, they cannot fairly be applied to the Fourth Gospel. A distinction, however, must be observed. The Synoptic Gospels are mainly ethical in their aim and method. Ontological and theological conclusions are certainly suggested; but they are not explicitly stated. In the Fourth Gospel these results are avowed in the Prologue, referred to again and again in the body of the work, and summarized in the conclusion.

While thus frankly theological, however, it presents its doctrinal positions as the result of an ethical study, which it also gives. With the correctness of these doctrinal inferences we are not concerned. Our sole interest lies in the portrait of Christ; and with respect to it two things are certain: it is in complete harmony with that given by the Synoptists, it is another picture of the same person; and it can be regarded, as little as that of the Synoptists, as an invention or fiction. For our present purpose, accordingly, which is ethical and not theological, we shall use the materials presented in the Fourth Gospel, for a study of the character of Christ, with the same freedom and confidence with which we turn to the Synoptic narratives.

(2) The second assumption follows naturally upon the first, and maintains the sufficiency of the Gospels for knowledge of Christ. It is obvious that they do not aim at extensive completeness. They are not chronicles; nor are they biographies in the modern sense. A shorthand report of the sayings of Jesus, a minute record of His life, during even the short period covered by the narratives, would have swelled their brief outlines to portentous volumes. It is certain that they do aim at intensive or central completeness. We do not need to know everything about a man in order to know him. For the purpose of character study, much that is interesting, that affectionate curiosity would like to know, is needless and irrelevant. The materials of our study must be, and need only be, such words and deeds as express the whole man, and are the organic utterance and outcome of his very self. This is one aspect of the uniqueness of the Gospels, one element in the proof that they are memorials, not inventions, that the Christ they represent is a unity. There is not the faintest trace of artificiality, of an ingenious synthesis of heterogeneous elements. No portrait painter, no artist in words, ever invented a figure of such perfect harmony. There are many things about Christ which we should like to know; but such things have been told as enable us to know Christ. From the Gospels we learn enough to know what manner of man He was. And if He be alive now, and able to influence persons now living on this earth, it is certain that His communications will be simply the unfolding and the application of the character which was expressed in such words and deeds as the Gospels record.

(c) The relation of a purely ethical study of the character of Christ to the theological consideration of His person is obvious. The one presents the problem with which the other deals. However high we may place Christ as a moral teacher, or even as the founder of a religion, nevertheless, if His moral type remain the same as that recognizable in other pure and lofty souls, if His moral achievement is generically the same as theirs, there can be no problem of His person. Christology is not merely an impossibility, it is a huge irrelevancy. Only if a study of the character of Christ raise from within the question of His relation to men on the one side and to God on the other, can there be a theological problem of the constitution of His person. Only in that case are the Christological elements in the NT warranted, and the long controversies of subsequent theological development justified. If the Divinity of Christ is not to be a dead dogma, soon to be abandoned by the minds which it perplexes and the religious instincts which it depresses; if it is to be a living conviction, sustaining faith and unifying thought, it must not be treated as though it hung, gaunt and naked, in a metaphysical vacuum; it must be regarded and expounded in its organic connexion with the character of which it is the necessary presupposition, and from which it derives its intellectual cogency. The only pathway to faith is that trodden by the first disciples. Belief in the Godhead of Christ, if it is to be more than a mere theologoumenon, must be rooted in acquaintance with Him; and that acquaintance is informed and enriched, made close, luminous, and full, through the medium of the portraits in which the character of Christ is disclosed to our reverent gaze.

1. FORMATIVE INFLUENCES.—In the making of men, three factors are to be distinguished—influences operating from without, the reaction of personality, and the agency of the Divine Spirit. It would be a mistake, in the case of Christ, to concentrate attention wholly upon the second of these, as though He were a mere apparition in the moral universe, standing in no vital or intelligible relation to His visible or invisible surroundings. The other factors are amply recognized in the Gospel narrative. The first of them alone comes into view in our present study. The operations of the Spirit of God belong to the theological interpretation of the character of Christ, and can be understood only from the point of view of a definite conception of His person, to which our present effort is introductory. We approach our subject, accordingly, by briefly indicating the influences which operated on the youth of Jesus.

1. Parentage.—Pre-natal influence, whose mode of operation is beneath observation, is an undoubted fact. Parentage affords the conditions, physical and psychological, under which that recapitulation of the ancestral past, which gives to human character its richest and most interesting elements, takes place in the individual. If we conclude (anticipating our judgment) that in Jesus there is reproduced and perfected the highest type of OT spiritual life, the conditio sine qua non of this most lovely product is to be found in His parentage. This thought does not even suggest a supernatural birth. The question of the Virgin-birth is part of the wider and profounder problem, which we are not now facing, whether His person is to be regarded as an evolution from beneath or an incarnation from above, the entrance of God, at the crisis of human need, for the redemption and perfecting of men. It remains true, however, that whether we assume or deny the Virgin-birth, it is to His mother we are directed in our view of His parentage. The idea of her sinlessness is certainly not even suggested in any record of her life; it is merely the logical result of the blunder of making the sinlessness of Jesus depend on physical conditions. Yet it is beyond all doubt that she belonged to the inner circle of those who, in Israel, best preserved the spiritual heritage of the race; and it is beyond cavil that of this deeply exercised generation of waiting souls she was herself a choice and lovely representative. With a fitness which suggests, in its tenderly human and deeply religious quality, a Divine selection, she filled the office of living personal medium, through which the stream of spiritual energy, which flows through the whole history of Israel, poured in upon her Son, to well up within His soul in the finest features and characteristics of the national religion. In part, at least, we understand Jesus through His mother. Most assuredly, He was more than a Hebrew; but He was a Hebrew born. What He came to be is determined, in His case as in others, by the dark and mystic tabernacle wherein His physical frame was formed, by the bosom whereon He lay, and the life-force whereby His own was nourished. Preparation is thus made in birth for a character which shall be true to the national type, and, at the same time, deeply and broadly human.

2. Home.—Of all the characters who have risen to eminence from the lowliest surroundings, Jesus Christ is the most remarkable. What attracts attention to His home, however, is not the contrast between His early circumstances and His later attainments, but the harmony between the setting of His childhood's years and the noblest of His manhood's virtues and achievements. The chief quality of His home was its pure humanity. None but the simplest elements of human life are here. The home at Nazareth is as far removed from luxury and artificiality on the one hand as it is from squalor or depravity on the other. The inward features of the home correspond with its outward conditions. The father and mother belong to what we know as 'the special seedplot of Christianity.' They were 'poor in spirit'; they 'waited for the consolation of Israel.' Lofly aspirations, prayers and songs inspired and moulded by OT conceptions and forms, conversation enriched by the ideas of the profoundest thinkers on religion whom the world has ever known, lives instinct with pure and passionate devotion to God: amid such benign and holy influences the plastic soul of Jesus grew to its maturity. Such a home provides a perfect environment for One whose personal secret is His communion with God, whose message is God's fellowship with men.

Without mere fancifulness we can conceive what the childhood of Jesus really was—contented, happy, trustful. Certain features of His manhood, His freedom from extremes of feeling, His openness of mind, His wide and deep charity, find the conditions of their growth in His childhood's home, with its thorough naturalness and its nearness to central truth regarding God and man.

The words which record that 'Jesus advanced in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and men' (Lk 2<sup>2</sup>), describe a perfectly normal human growth, a development without breach or strain or crisis, conducted by the Spirit of God, toward the realization of the Divine ideal of humanity. It is impossible to reconcile them with an abstract conception of His Godhead; impossible also to reconcile them with an equally abstract conception of His 'mere humanity' (whatever that may be). But it is certain they present a unique fact, which must have full weight given to it in any estimate of the character and the person of Christ. It might be suggested, indeed, that the complete normality of His growth may have been imperilled by communications made to Him by His mother regarding the mystery of His birth or the greatness of His vocation. Such communications, however, were not made before His twelfth year. Mary's words in the temple (Lk 2<sup>48</sup>) make that certain. Even on the supposition that certain communications were made at a later date, they may have aided Him in the discovery of His relation to God and His mission to men; but the thoughts they may have awakened in His mind would not then act injuriously upon the growth of a perfectly proportioned human character. The greatness which was coming upon Him was leading Him nearer to men, not farther away from them. We must always look for what is unique in Christ within and not beyond His normal human character.

3. Education.—Hellenic or Roman culture might be brilliant, but it was narrow, limited to the conditions of life in a Greek city, or to the uses of a ruling race. Its faults are plain: intellectual pride, superficial cleverness, abundance of ideas together with dearth of ideals. Conceive now the training of a Hebrew boy. Ignorant of much that a Greek lad knew, he was thoroughly instructed in the books of the OT. These constituted a national literature, which, on any fair comparison, vastly excels the utmost that the Hellenic spirit could produce, in its power to quicken and direct the activities of the soul, to deepen it, and to enrich it with noblest conceptions of human life and destiny. Such a literature is the most splendid instrument of education the world has ever seen; and such was the education even of a carpenter's son in an obscure village. No doubt even a system so excellent might be perverted; but always in education the result is determined not by the perfection of the instrument, but by the reaction of the pupil. From school Jesus might have gone on to be a Rabbi of the common dogmatic and narrow type. If He did not, if His thought is wide, His insight deep, His spirit noble and gentle; if He moves on the plane of the greatest prophets of the OT, and sees beyond their highest vision; we must trace this result to His education, and to the response made to it by His quick and intelligent sympathy. It is because He is moulded by the influences of the OT that His character is at once more spiritual and more universal than it would have been, had He been steeped to the lips in Hellenic culture. The measure of His acquaintance with the apocalyptic literature which many of His contemporaries were studying, cannot accurately be determined. But we shall make a profound mistake, if we imagine that we can explain His teaching or understand Himself by any such reference. We can come within sight of Him only by retracing the steps of His own education, and approaching Him from the point of view of the OT. The groundwork of His character and the spring of His thinking are to be found in the OT. What He came to be or to reveal, beyond that stage of moral and religious attainment, stands in organic connexion with it. Other educational influences must be remembered and their power duly estimated: the historic scenes which were within His view, with the splendid and tragic memories they were fitted to awaken; the highways of the world's business which were visible from the hills behind which Nazareth lay; the pleasant country which was spread all around His home. Such aspects of His character as His intense patriotism, His wide humanitarian sympathies, and His feeling for nature, find their antecedents in the physical surroundings of His early years.

At this point we pause to note an incident which enables us, as efficiently as a score of haphazard remembrances would have done, to discern the fruition of His life's preparation, so far as it had gone. Here it is well to remind ourselves of the reverence which is due to all childhood in our endeavour to analyse its utterances. 'How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?' (Lk 2<sup>9</sup>).* No platitudes as to moral paternalism, no pedantic references to the Trinity, help us to understand this wondering question. The words have no doctrinal meaning. They ought not to be used as proof of a dogma. Did Mary ask her Son what He meant? If she had asked, could He have made her understand? The words, however, while thus far removed from ontological problems, do reveal most surely what manner of child He must have been who uttered them. He must have lived till that hour in a fellowship with God which had known no interruption, which had been so deep and holy and tender, that Mary's word, applied to an earthly parent, provides its secret. 'Thy father and I,' said His mother; and He replied, surely not in any self-conscious, didactic mood, but in glad and confident adoption of her word, 'my Father's business.' It is certain that one who uttered this phrase out of the fulness of a child's unreflective experience, had never passed through the agonies of a violated conscience. His experience is not the abnormal type to be seen in St. Paul, Augustine, Luther, Bunyan, but the profoundly normal type of the human relation to God, as God designed it to be. Operating upon Him, through parentage and home and education, operating within Him in ways beneath consciousness and beyond observation, the Divine Spirit had led Him into, and enabled Him to abide within, a continuous, loving fellowship with God, of which the earthly relationship of father and son is the reflexion and the symbol. It is certain that Jesus never knew any inward dislocation of spirit, never passed through agonies of conviction, or emerged into the rapture of an experience which overwhelmed the judgment with surges of emotion. His character is not created by the healing of some deep breach of soul. It bears none of the marks of manufacture. It is a steadfast growth, the uninterrupted unfolding of the wealth of ethical meaning that lay, from the beginning, within His soul. From the village street He passes to the temple courts, to find Himself there at home, and to occupy Himself with His Father's concerns. From the temple He returns to His village home, without surprise and without disappointment, still to be in His Father's presence, and to be about His Father's business. 'He went down with them, and came to Nazareth; and he was subject unto them' (Lk 2<sup>51</sup>).

4. The years of silence.—For eighteen years we lose sight of Jesus. When they are past, not His physical frame only but His moral stature also has reached its fulness. The years themselves, apart from the incidents which must have filled them, are the most potent of the formative influences which are our guide to the understanding of Jesus. There are certain deeply marked features of His character, which are the imprint upon Him of the passage of these silent years.

(1) Quietness and confidence.—In His manhood there is no restlessness as of one who is uncertain of his goal, none of the strained eagerness of one who is still in pursuit of undiscovered truth. Plato's image of the aviary in no way resembles the mind of Jesus. No distinction is to be found in Him between possessing and having. He possesses, or rather he possesses by, fundamental and universal principles. His life and teaching are their exposition and illustration. We may debate their validity, but we cannot dispute the absolute certainty with which He grasped them. Eighteen years of silence had breathed their restfulness into Him, and conferred on Him the precious gifts of a quiet mind and an assured heart.

(2) Foresight.—Jesus had no magical acquaintance with future events. Yet it is most noteworthy that He moved amid the circumstances of His life with no hesitating step. It is not merely that, as a religious man, He knows that God has a plan for Him, and will submit to it, whatever it brings Him, however grievous or disappointing; but also that He knew what the plan was. He was in the secret of His Father. In His speaking and acting there is no trace of hesitation or doubt. He never acts on a mere balance of judgment, never wastes a moment on conjecture, not one moment on regret. He acts with instant perception of what is wanted, and goes forward with confident step and calm foreseeing eye. He marvels (twice it is recorded of Him, Mt 8<sup>10</sup>, Mk 6<sup>7</sup>); but it is the wonder which is at once the parent and the child of knowledge, not the stupid astonishment of mere ignorance. Events which threatened destruction to Himself and His mission were met by Him with solemn recognition as the issue of a purpose which He served with full intelligence. Such calm wisdom, such quiet faithfulness, such undisturbed peace, had a history; and it lies in these eighteen years of silent waiting.

(3) Serenity and self-possession.—He was haunted by misconception, beset by malice, harassed by malignity. Yet He preserved an austere reserve, which permitted no rash action, no unguarded speech. He met His enemies with a silence which was no dumb resentment, but was on some occasions a most moving appeal, on others a most solemn judgment. No man can be thus silent who is driven ignorantly toward an unknown destiny. The silence of Jesus is proof that His life lay within both His purview and His command. Only in solitude and obscurity can such qualities be developed. Eighteen silent years are not too much to make a soul like that of Jesus Christ, strong, deep, calm, and wise. Not dogmatic prejudice, but respect for the unity of Christ's character, and for the self-evidencing truth of the portrait presented in the Gospels, condemns, as an outrage upon all psychological probability, the practice of packing into the three recorded years alternations of thought and purpose, and tracing supposed distinctions between the hopes with which He began His career and the convictions which were forced upon Him toward its close. Naturalism of this sort is simply unnatural and foolish. There is nothing too great to be the outcome of years so sublimely silent. What He is to be was then formed within His soul. What He has to say was then laid up for utterance. What He has to do and endure was then foreseen and then accepted.

II. THE VOCATION OF CHRIST.—The unity of Christ's character stands out impressively in the Gospel portrait. The allowances we make, and the averages we strike, in estimating the conduct of other men, are not needed in His case. Woven of the strands of common life, it is yet 'without seam throughout.' When we seek to explain this unity, it is not enough to refer to the will of Christ, as though it were a power operating in an ethical vacuum. His is the normal human will, which realizes its freedom by identifying itself with some all-determining principle. When we ask, further, what this principle is, which thus determines His will and unifies His life, we shall be in error if we regard it as an absolutely new idea, to be ascribed to His inventive genius. He is not with complete appropriateness to be designated a religious genius. He has nothing to reveal which is new, if by that epithet we mean to indicate a conception which has no organic relations with the past. Jesus, as believer, thinker, preacher, starts from the OT. His originality consists in perfectly understanding it, in carrying out into concrete reality its ruling conceptions. When, therefore, we seek for the determining principle of the life and character of Christ, we must turn to the OT. From childhood to manhood He lived the life of the ideal Israel, in communion with God and consecration to His service. What is unique in Him is not some idea, derived we know not whence, but His actual adoption of the purpose of God toward Israel as the purpose of His own life. When we endeavour to enter sympathetically into the experience of the Prophetic authors of the OT, and when we compare with their writings the character and career of Jesus, we are led to the conclusion: First, that the core of the OT religion is God's redeeming purpose toward Israel; and, second, that the vocation of Christ, as understood and accepted by Himself, was to fulfil that purpose. In the nature of the case we cannot have from Jesus a narrative of the experiences which culminated in this great resolve, or an abstract statement of His ideas upon the topic of redemption. Yet, as we follow the occasions of His life, we overhear pregnant sayings, and we observe significant incidents, which corroborate and illustrate the impression which His whole career makes upon us. These we may thus arrange—

1. His Designation of His vocation.—When we inquire how Jesus designated His life's aim, we are met early in the narrative with one general, yet most definite statement. He is addressing an audience composed of His own disciples, together with a wider range of auditors for whom also His words are meant. We have, indeed, no verbatim report of what is usually called the Sermon on the Mount. Its theme, however, is unmistakable. It is the Kingdom of God as it exists at the stage which, in the person of the Speaker, it has now reached. Plainly, the Kingdom, as Jesus proclaims it, is a new thing. Its righteousness is new. Its blessings are new. At once the question arises, and was thrown at the Preacher with bitter controversial animus, How does this new Kingdom stand related to that which had endured through the centuries of Israel's history, which was now indeed obscured by political oppression, but which was destined one day to receive a glorious vindication? How do its new views of God and man and duty compare with the venerable system of law, of which the Scribes and Pharisees were the acknowledged defenders?

Then Jesus pronounces words which place Him in the central stream of the Divine purpose, and designate Him as its goal and its complete realization: 'I came not to destroy, but to fulfil' (Mt 5:17). It is noteworthy that to 'the Law' Jesus adds 'the Prophets,' thus emphasizing that element of the OT religion which the legalists of His day were most apt to neglect. He grasps the OT as a spiritual whole, and this totality of Divine meaning He declares it to be His vocation to fulfil. He has come into the world to carry forward all that had been signified by Law and Prophets to an end foreseen, or at least felt, by OT believers, but not attained in their experience. In Him the OT religion is at once perfected, and accomplished as an abiding reality.

Such a consciousness as this may well suggest thoughts as to the person of Him who thus asserts Himself. What is important for us now, however, is the fact that it was His consciousness, that the vocation thus announced was the end for which Jesus lived, and constituted the organizing principle to which is due the perfect unity of His character.

The same impression of the loftiness and the definiteness of His vocation, as Jesus conceived it, is deepened by a consideration of other sayings in which He condensed the purpose of His life. While, of course, critical conclusions are manifold, it is not reasonably open to doubt (a) that Jesus claimed to possess authority to forgive sins, and so dispense the characteristic blessing of the New Covenant (Lk 3:14, Mt 9:1); (b) that He claimed to possess a knowledge of God which, in its immediacy and fullness, was generically distinct from that enjoyed by the most advanced OT saint, and to be empowered to reveal God, thus known, to men (Mt 11:27); (c) that He regarded His death as laying the basis of the New Covenant, and being, therefore, the medium of its blessings (Mt 26:28 and parallels).

Again, we cannot fail to feel, in connexion with such words, the drawing on of a mystery in the person of Him who uttered them. Turning aside, however, from all such suggestions, and refraining from all doctrinal construction, we are, nevertheless, not merely permitted, but constrained, to observe that they described the commission under which He acted. They disclose the root of conviction from which His character grew. Take this away, and His character falls to pieces, and becomes no more an ethical unity, but a congeries of inconsistencies. The belief that He was commissioned of God to execute the Divine purpose towards Israel, and, through Israel, towards the world, moved Him from beginning to end of His career, and made Him the character which He was, which we come to know in the Gospels, and which has put its spell upon all subsequent generations.

2. His Dedication to His vocation.—The determining purpose of His life was not made known to Jesus for the first time in the experiences of His baptism. The consciousness which He then manifests had certainly a history. The experiences through which He then passed imply a perfectly prepared soul. In His whole bearing, from the moment of His approach to John, there is not a trace of hesitation or bewilderment. A new thing, no doubt, came to Him; but it did not take Him by surprise or usher Him into a calling which He had not foreseen, or from which He had shrunk. By the discipline of the silent years in Nazareth, by the operation of the Divine Spirit, acting along with all external instrumentalities and beneath the conscious movements of His own spirit, His mind had been informed of the task which awaited Him, His faculties had been exercised in the appropriation of so great a destiny, His soul had been fed at sources of Divine strength, and thus enabled to accept in deep surrender the Divine appointment. His character, when first we see Him pass out of obscurity into the light of history, is not like an unfinished building, with scaffolding to be cleared away, and much still to be done before it be beautiful or habitable. It is like a living organism, rooted in the discipline of past years, perfected by adequate preparation, and now ready for its destined uses and its full fruition. His thirtieth year found Him well aware of His vocation, and waiting only for the summons to take it up. The cry of the Baptist reached Him in Nazareth, and He knew that His hour was come. 'Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to the Jordan, unto John, to be baptized of him' (Mt 3:13). His baptism is at once Christ's dedication of Himself to His vocation, and the first step in its accomplishment. His experiences at such an hour are too intimate and profound to be comprehended even by the most reverent study. But their meaning must gather round three points—(1) First, the word 'thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness' (v. 10). In this pregnant saying we are conveyed back to the heart of the OT. God is righteous when He fulfils the obligations which He imposed on Himself when He instituted His covenant with Israel. It is still His righteousness which moves Him, when, after Israel has sinned itself out of the covenant relationship, He promises a New Covenant, and brings near a better salvation. This is the righteousness which Jesus has full in view on the verge of Baptism. If this righteousness is to be fulfilled, He who is the executor of the Divine purpose must not shrink from His task, whatever it may bring Him, and he who has a lesser function in the Kingdom must not withstand or hinder Him through any mistaken reverence.

(2) Second, the symbolic deed of baptism. Here also the only possible clue is to be found in the OT. There we see the godly in Israel, themselves right with God, bearing in their own souls the load of the people's transgressions. What is thus, through successive generations, done and suffered by exercised believers, is assigned in Deutero-Isaiah to the Servant of the Lord, who is in that writing the ideal Israel making atonement for the sins of the actual Israel. In descending to baptism, Jesus is certainly not acknowledging personal unworthiness. It is not even enough to say that He is vicariously confessing the sins of others. He is definitely assuming the place and office of the Servant of the Lord. Himself righteous, He assumes in His deepest soul the load of human sin, and thus at once fulfils the righteousness of God and 'makes many righteous.' The Baptism of Christ, accordingly, is at once the culmination of a life's experiences, the product of long years of thought and prayer, and the inauguration of a career whose movement and whose goal were already plainly before His inward eye.

(3) Third, the Divine response (v. 16). A decision, whose issues we cannot calculate, was accompanied by a pain which we cannot fathom. The doctrine of the two natures, even supposing it to be proved, throws no light on the experiences of that hour. Jesus never found relief in His Divinity from His human suffering. He took refuge in prayer (Lk 3<sup>21</sup>). The Father answered with an endowment ample enough even for the task, an assurance strong enough to raise Him above all doubt. The terms in which the assurance is given form a synthesis of the two great figures through whom in the OT the consummation of the Kingdom is achieved, the Messianic King and the Servant of the Lord (Mk 1<sup>1</sup>), and afford additional proof of the consciousness with which Jesus began His ministry. What we observe in lesser men, we see in Jesus—a great purpose determining the life, creating the character. In His case, as in others, to miss the purpose leaves the character a hopeless enigma, the life a meaningless puzzle.

3. His Confirmation in His vocation.—Jesus does not sweep forward in emotional enthusiasm from Baptism to the announcement of His claims. The tide of His endowment 'drove' Him (St. Mark's phrase) not to cities and throngs, but into desert solitudes, there to win through conflict what was His by right. Jesus certainly did not describe to His disciples in full detail the strife by which He won His soul. Something He did tell, and told it, as alone it could be told, in symbols. The point at issue in the conflict is the vocation to which Jesus has just dedicated Himself. That vocation is the synthesis of all the lines of action by which, in the OT, God's purpose was being gradually fulfilled; and specially the synthesis of sovereignty and service. The strain of the Temptation is directed to the rending asunder of these two. The effort to which Jesus is summoned is to hold them together in indissoluble connexion, and not, under whatever subtle seductive influences, to snatch at the one and renounce the other. Any breach between them will mean the defeat of the Divine righteousness. Failure here will make Jesus not the Servant of the Lord but His adversary, servant of His enemy. The stages of the Temptation, accordingly, turn upon the humiliations which the element of service will bring into His career, and their supposed incompatibility with the sovereignty, which is His goal. Surely hunger and toil and poverty are insuperable barriers in the way of reaching that supremacy which Jesus would exercise with such benignant grace! The alternative lay clear before Him, the pathway of supernatural power, leading away from normal human experience, or the pathway of service and suffering, leading nearer and nearer to the throbbing heart of humanity. Jesus made His choice, and in that great decision gained His vantage ground. As for Him, He would be man, and would stand so close to men that He could assume their responsibilities and bear their burdens. Thus Jesus won His victory, a solitary man, in death grips with evil, with no strength save the Spirit of God, no weapon save the Word of God. It was a complete victory. Within a character, thus welded by trial, there was no room hereafter for breach with God or with itself. Though other assaults will be made, though they be made by His dearest (Jn 2<sup>1-4</sup>), His most loyal (Mt 16<sup>22-23</sup>), though in one final onslaught they wring from the Victor sweat of blood, the certainty of their overwhelming defeat is already guaranteed. In studying the character of Christ, we are led from one surprise of loveliness to another; but we are never in any uncertainty as to its permanence, never haunted by any dread of its failure. From the beginning there is the note of finality and absoluteness.

III. CHARACTERISTICS OF CHRIST.—All character study is necessarily incomplete. A character which could be exhaustively analysed would not be worth the pains taken in making the necessary investigations. The quality of mystery certainly belongs to the character of Christ to a degree that suggests a source of power, deeper and less restricted than that which would suffice to explain shallower and more intelligible personalities. No biography has ever comprehended Him; the intent meditation of nineteen centuries has not exhausted His fulness. It would, accordingly, be both pedantic and unreal to attempt a logical articulation of the elements of His character or a classified list of His virtues. It seems best, therefore, in this article to move from the more general to the more particular, without too great rigidity of treatment. We begin, then, with those impressions of His character which are at once the broadest and the deepest.

1. Spiritual-mindedness.—St. Paul's great phrase in Ro 8<sup>6</sup> φρόνημα τοῦ πνεύματος, 'the general bent of thought and motive' (Sanday-Headlam) directed toward Divine things, which is applied even to the best men we know, with reserves and limitations, exactly expresses the prevailing direction of Christ's life and character. He possesses the spiritual mind to a degree which stamps Him as being at once unique among men, and also true and normal man, realizing the ideal and fulfilling the duty of man as such. He moves habitually in the realm of heavenly realities. He does not visit it at intervals. He dwells there, even while He walks on earth, and is found amid the throngs and haunts of men. He carries with Him the aroma of its holiness and peace and blessedness. That His disciples were 'with him' (Mk 3<sup>14</sup>) was the secret of their preparation, the source of any wisdom they manifested, any success they achieved. The most mature experience of the power of Christ, and the most lofty conception of His person, find their ultimate warrant in this, that the unseen world becomes visible in His character. Apart from this, they are composed of things so unreal as feelings and opinions. Illustration and proof of the spiritual-mindedness of Christ are too abundant to be specified in detail. The following points will suffice to indicate its quality and significance.

(1) His knowledge.—He Himself, on one occasion, distinguished the objects of His knowledge as heavenly things (επουράνια), and earthly things (ἐπίγεια, Jn 3<sup>22</sup>). The former are the mysteries of the Kingdom, the counsels of Jehovah, which in the OT He makes known by the medium of the prophets. The latter are the facts of human nature, as that is essentially related to the being and character of God, and is capable of receiving and experiencing the powers and truths belonging to the Kingdom of God. There is no doubt as to the kind of knowledge He evinced, and believed Himself to possess, regarding heavenly things. He is not inquiring like Socrates, nor reasoning like Plato, nor commenting like a scribe. He knows with absoluteness and fulness (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>). He beholds with immediate direct vision (Jn 1<sup>38</sup> 6<sup>46</sup>). He reports what He sees and hears (Jn 3<sup>11</sup> 8<sup>26</sup> 15<sup>37</sup>). He does not in any formal way teach the religion which lives in Him. . . . The thing itself He merely expresses, nay, still more presupposes than expresses (Beyschlag).

Christ's knowledge of earthly things, i.e. His insight into the subjective experiences of men and the moral condition of their souls, has the same note of absoluteness; and His judgments upon them and His dealings with them have an authority and finality which would be unwarrantable did they not rest on perfect discernment (Mk 10<sup>41</sup>, Lk 7<sup>38</sup>, Jn 1<sup>46</sup> 4<sup>22</sup>). Of this He Himself could not but be aware; and, indeed, He expressly made it His claim (Jn 13<sup>30</sup>). Peter's heart-broken appeal (Jn 21<sup>17</sup>) belongs to the incidents of the Forty Days, and so cannot be used directly as proof; but no doubt it reflects the impression which the historic Christ made upon those who knew Him, viz. that He saw into their inmost souls with a discernment as intimate and deep as God's, which, like God's, could neither be evaded nor hindered.

Whether Christ possessed supernatural knowledge of facts in the order of external nature has been much discussed, but does not now concern us. We are not even concerned at present with any explanation of His knowledge of Divine things. But we are bound to note, and to give full weight to the fact, that in the Gospel portraiture the world of heavenly realities, both in themselves and in their earthly manifestations and applications, is open to Jesus, that He is in complete spiritual affinity with it, and speaks upon all matters that belong to it with definite and self-conscious authority. Even if His Divinity be denied, it must be allowed that He is a man possessed of undimmed spiritual vision.

(2) His teaching.—Jesus is not a lecturer, making statements, however brilliant and luminous, of the results of investigation. He is a revealer, disclosing in 'the mother-speech of religion' the heavenly realities which were open to His inward eye. His teaching, therefore, is inexhaustible, begetting, in the process of studying it, the faculty of ethical insight, and continuously raising, in the effort to practise it, the standard of the moral judgment. Yet it retains the quality of spiritual delight which enchained its first listeners. It is gracious in its unfoldings of the Divine compassions; in its disclosure not merely of the fatherliness, but of the fatherhood of God; in its invitations, pleadings, promises; and, most of all, in its astounding declaration, which pride deemed blasphemous and humility never questioned, of the Divine forgiveness, deep, and free, and fearless. It is holy and spiritual, rejecting conventional piety, emphasizing, as even the OT had not done, the inward state of a man's heart; Godward, describing the type of character required in citizens of the Kingdom in terms of such unearthly purity and loveliness, as would produce despair were any other than Himself the speaker. It is universal, perfecting the Law and the Prophets, in this respect also, that it declared the height of spiritual privilege to be attainable, not merely by Israel, but by man as such, irrespective of merit or privilege.

Such a voice had never been heard in Israel; not Hosea's, with its tears of Divine compassion; not Isaiah's, with its royal amplitude; not his who in pure and lofty song heralded the return from Babylon; not John's as it rang out from hill to hill his summons to repentance. Astonished by its novelty, wooed by its charm, bowed by its authority, the multitudes followed a little way as it called them heavenward; and some elect souls rested not till they too entered the universe of truth whence Jesus uttered His voice. The greatest foe to faith is the haste with which to construct dogmas about Christ, before Christ is known. To some souls the time for dogma comes late, or not at all. In any case, dogma, however accurate, must rest on the trustworthiness of Jesus in His disclosure of spiritual fact.

(3) The effect of His presence.—A spiritual mind produces upon those who come under its influence a twofold impression, that of remoteness and that of nearness and sympathy. This is conspicuously the case with Jesus. We have abundant evidence of His having a dignity of presence, which smote with awe those who had but occasional glimpses of Him, and filled at times His most familiar friends with fear, and also of His being the kindest, gentlest, and most sympathetic of souls. It could not be otherwise. To have discerned the end which created His career, to make choice of it with such full intelligence of all that it involved, to live for it in such entire consistency with its scope and requirements, means a moral grandeur unapproached by sage or prophet. Separated from the mass of men, removed from their pursuits, He must have been. Yet the very greatness of His vocation, the very depth of His insight both into the purpose of God and the need of man, produced in Him, along with that deep distinctiveness, the kindest appreciation of the little things which make up the life of man, the most sympathetic interest in ordinary human concerns, and an entire approachableness to the humblest applicant for counsel or comfort. This combination of a majesty which smites to the ground the instruments of prostituted justice, with a manner so tender that babes smile in His arms and women tell Him the secret of their care, must have its source deep in the heavenly region which was His habitual abode.

2. Love to God.—The heavenly region which Jesus inhabited was not an abyss of being where the finite loses itself in the absolute. It was a realm of persons, Divine and human, who dwelt together in intelligent, spiritual fellowship. The doctrine of 'the One,' which is found in every climate and revives in every century, is not the clue to Jesus' thought of God. The key to His theology is the doctrine of the Father; His love to the Father is the motive of His life. He proclaimed love to God, absorbing all energies, comprehending all activities, as the first, the great commandment, of which the second, love to man, is the direct corollary. But when we compare His own obedience to the first commandment with that of other men, a very significant distinction is to be observed. The most devout souls in their nearest approach to God are conscious that their love is not perfect. This defect is due in part to sin, and the chastened soul rebukes the coldness of its affection; and in part to finitude, and the adoring soul continually aspires after higher attainments. In the case of Jesus, the note, either of compunction or of aspiration, is never heard. The explanation of this is not that in later recensions of the tradition such notes were struck out, in deference to a mistaken sense of reverence, or to support a novel view of His person; but that the impression of complete spiritual attainment belongs to the very essence of the character as set forth in the Gospels. We may dispute whether such a character ever existed; but we cannot question the fact that such a character has been portrayed, with a verisimilitude which makes the portraiture a greater miracle than the actual reality of the character depicted would have been. Jesus loved God perfectly; this is the only fair interpretation of the record. There is no trace of moral disparity, no failure of mutual understanding, no sign of effort on the part of Jesus to cross a chasm, however inconsiderable, between Himself and God. He receives the communications of the Father's love without perturbation or amazement, as of one overwhelmed by the Divine condescension; and He responds without extravagance of emotion, in words which do not labour with overweight of meaning, but are easy, natural, simple, and glad, the very language of One who is the Son of such a Father. He and the Father are one. The Synoptic picture, as well as that of the Fourth Gospel, makes this feature plain. There can be no doubt that this fact raises the Christological problem in its profoundest form. What man is He who thus receives and returns the love of God? Two of love's characteristic manifestations, moreover, are found in Christ in perfect exercise. (1) Obedience. We have seen that the character of Christ is created by the vocation to which He dedicated Himself. We now observe that this vocation is, in the view of Jesus, nothing impersonal, but is the personal will of the Father. This is the Father's 'business,' and to it He, as the Son, is entirely devoted. The will of the Father does not mean for Jesus a series of commands. It is rather to His deep conviction a purpose, moving throughout His whole life, and comprehending every detail of His activity. The obedience of the Son, accordingly, is not a series of events. It is the identification of His will with the will of the Father, and a complete reproduction of that will in the whole conduct of His life. Sayings in the Fourth Gospel, such as 4th 6th 8th 29, bring into clear utterance the impression conveyed by the whole career of Jesus, and express an obedience which has lost the last trace of distance between the will of the Son and the will of the Father. Again, we must postpone all discussion of the possibility of such obedience, and must emphasize the actuality of the representation. Two things are plain: first, Jesus was conscious of being in complete and constant harmony with God, and profoundly unconscious of even the slightest failure to fulfil the whole will of God; and, second, those who knew Him best believed that in Him they had witnessed a unique moral achievement, viz., an obedience absolutely perfect, both in its extent and in its inward quality. (2) Trust. 'Perfect love casteth out fear' (1 Jn 4th). Jesus' trust in God was, like His obedience, complete. It amounted to an entire and unflinching dependence upon God, so that whatever He did, God wrought in Him. In other servants of God we observe, even in their deepest experiences, a certain dualism of self and God, a self assisted to a greater or less degree by God. This account would not be adequate to the experiences observable in the record regarding Christ. He is, without doubt, a person, not will-less, but acting in complete self-determination, and yet His deeds are the Father's. No process of analysis can distinguish in any word or deed of His an element which comes from Himself and another which comes from God. In Christ we find a perfect spiritual organism—a man so completely inhabited by God that His words and deeds are the words and deeds of God. Follow Him in His career, as it passes with unbroken steadfastness from stage to stage of an unfolding purpose, study Him in His dealing with men, and note the sureness of His touch, penetrate the secret of His consciousness as He from time to time lifts the veil (Jn 5th, 20, 7th, 12th, 14th, 24); and the result to which we are forced is, that here is a human life rooted in the Divine, filled and environed by it. This is, of course, no ontological explanation; but it states the ethical and spiritual phenomenon which demands an explanation; and this explanation must reach to the sphere of personal being. Precisely at this point, however, when the facts we are describing seem to pass beyond the limits of normal human experience, we are summoned to observe that the trust and obedience of Jesus were not maintained without strenuous solicitude, or the use of those means which aid the human spirit in its adherence to God. His obedience was not easy. His will, in its ceaseless surrender, was subjected to increasing strain. He learned obedience by the things which He suffered (He 5th). The 'disposition of obedience' was always present. 'But the disposition had to maintain itself in the face of greater and greater demands upon it. And as He had to meet these demands, rising with the rising tide of the things which He suffered, He entered ever more deeply into the experience of what obedience was' (A. B. Davidson on He 5th). His ability to bear the strain to which He was thus subjected is due to a trust in God which was continually revived by His habit of prayer, to which there is such frequent and significant reference in the narrative (Lk 3rd, 22, Mk 1st, Lk 5th, 6th, 12, Mt 14th, Lk 9th, 22, Mt 23rd, 4, Lk 23rd). An increasing revelation of the Divine will, an unceasing advance in obedience, a continuous exercise of trust, are the strands woven together in the character of Christ. The product is that perfect thing, a life which is His own, and is entirely human, which is also, at the same time, the coming of God to man. 3. Love to men.—The source of this characteristic, which shines resplendent from every page of the narrative, is to be found in that which we have just been considering, Christ's love to God. Here we must do justice to the facts brought before us in the portrait. The noblest servants of God in the field of humanity have done their work out of a sense of obligation. They have received so much from God, that they have felt themselves bound, by constraint of the love of which they are recipients, to serve their fellow-men; and in this service their love for men has grown, till it has become no unworthy reflexion of the love of God. It would be, however, a miserably inadequate account of the facts of Christ's ministry among men to say that He loved them out of a sense of duty, and served them in discharge of a debt which He owed to God. The vocation which formed His character was not bare will. It was love, seeking the redemption of men. Jesus' acceptance of this vocation meant that His love to God entered into, and blended with, the love of God to men. He loved God, and the love of God to Him became in Him the motive-power of His love to men. His love to God and His love to men constitute one energy of His soul. He turns toward the Father with the deep intelligence and the full sympathy of the Son; and straightway He turns toward the world with the widest and tenderest charity (Mt 11<sup>27, 28</sup>, cf. Jn 10<sup>10</sup>). Those, accordingly, upon whom Jesus poured His love, never sought to distinguish between it and the love of God. Enfolded by the love of Christ, they knew themselves to be received into the redeeming love of God; and their grateful love to Jesus was the proof and seal of the Divine forgiveness. 'Her sins, which are many, are forgiven: for she loved much' (Lk 7<sup>47</sup>). Long before the doctrine of His Divinity was framed, the love of Christ was regarded by its recipients as the spiritual medium in which the Divine compassion reached them. Hebrew thought did not work with categories of being and substance. The human heart never works with categories at all. But it can identify love when it receives it; and therefore it makes an experimental synthesis of the love of Christ and the love of God, and sets Christ in a relation toward God occupied by no other man.

The love of God to man being such as He extends to no lesser creature, implies that man has a value for God which no other creature possesses; and to Jesus man has the same supreme value. Of this value there are no earthly measurements, not any created thing (Mt 10<sup>26, 12<sup>29</sup></sup>), not any institution, however sacred (Mk 2<sup>27</sup>), not even the whole world (Mk 8<sup>36</sup>). Even the moral ruin, in which sin has involved human nature, does not diminish its value, but rather accentuates its preciousness, and adds to the love of God, and therefore also of Jesus, a note of inexhaustible passion (Mt 18<sup>10, 12-14</sup>). Christ's doctrine of man does not breathe the spirit of 18th cent. individualism. Not for man as a spiritual atom, self-contained and all-exclusive, does Jesus have respect. But for man akin to God, capable of Divine sonship, He has deep and loving admiration. Not for man, harassed with passions for whose might he is not responsible, guilty of acts which to comprehend is to pardon, does Jesus have regard. But for man, meant for so much and missing so much, framed for perfection, destroyed by his own deed, He has love and pity, throbbing in every word, passing through action and through suffering to the ultimate agony, the final victory of the Cross.

iv. SOCIAL RELATIONS.—We have now to follow the character of Christ, which we have been studying in its origin, its development, and its leading features, as it manifests itself in the relations in which He stood to His fellow-men. The narratives attempt no enumeration of incidents. They present us with typical instances, in which the true self of Jesus is disclosed. From these we are able to conceive the figure of Christ as He moved amid the circles where human life is ordinarily spent.

1. Family.—It is difficult, from the very scanty materials before us, to trace the relations of Jesus towards the members of His family circle, and to distinguish clearly their attitude towards Him. Yet the following points may be regarded as certain: (1) The life of Jesus, prior to His baptism, was spent within the family circle, and was characterized by two features. First, a loyal and affectionate discharge of the duties of a son, presumably as breadwinner for His mother. The very astonishment of His fellow-villagers at His subsequent career is sufficient evidence that during the period prior to His public ministry He fulfilled the ordinary obligations of family life. Second, a deepening sense of His vocation, which, while it did not render Him less dutiful as a son and brother, could not fail to give Him a distinctiveness which would inevitably excite adverse criticism on the part of His kindred, should they prove unsympathetic or unintelligent.

(2) The attitude of His mother towards Him, both before and after His baptism, was twofold. (a) Belief in His unique mission and extraordinary powers. Her words to Him in Cana of Galilee (Jn 2<sup>9</sup>) are pointless, unless they express a persuasion, born of long pondering, and revived by the recent events connected with His baptism, that He has a mission which could be nothing less than Messianic, and that the time has come for the display of powers with which necessarily He must be endowed for the fulfilment of His task. (b) A profound misconception of the nature of His mission, and of the means by which it should be inaugurated and carried on, together with a critical attitude towards Him, in regard to what she evidently considered an inexplicable, and even blameworthy, negligence on His part to seize the opportunity presented in the circumstances of the feast. For this misunderstanding we need not greatly blame her, for it was shared by His disciples even after the Resurrection; unless, indeed, we conceive, what is most probable, commingling between mother and son during those long silent years, which might lead us to marvel that she, who surely might have understood, failed as completely as others to discern His purpose.

(3) The attitude of His 'brethren' is still less intelligent. There is no suggestion in the narrative of any sympathy with Him whatsoever. After thirty years together, they could find no other explanation for His behaviour than temporary insanity, and could conceive no other plan than to put Him under temporary restraint. If His mother joined in this estimate and this proposal (Mk 3<sup>31</sup>), it must have been with the conviction that she had the right and duty of intervening to save Him from Himself, and rescuing Him from a course which would prove fatal to His mission as she conceived it. It is certain that she joined His 'brethren' in making an approach to Him, with the obvious intention of inducing Him to change His plan of action (Mk 3<sup>31</sup>). At a later stage His brethren offered Him a final challenge (Jn 7<sup>7-8</sup>). They did not believe in Him (v. 3), and therefore their suggestion to Him has not quite the sense of Mary's at Cana of Galilee. It expresses their demand to have this matter of His Messiahship (about which they had no doubts) settled once for all by open demonstration: 'Manifest thyself to the world.'

Here, then, is the situation of Jesus with respect to His family. He loves His kindred as son and brother; but He knows that His vocation demands the sacrifice of family life, and this sacrifice, with its deep pain, He is prepared to make. He is called upon, however, to endure a yet deeper pain. Not only has He to leave the dear fellowship of the home, and face a world which will prove in the end bitterly hostile, but among the members of the home He can find no understanding hearts to cheer Him and comfort Him on His lonely way. Worse still, when His nearest and dearest withstand Him, or seek to divert Him from His appointed path, He has to repel them in words which He knows must keenly wound them. To be tempted by His very love for His mother and His brethren to deviate from the line of obedience to His mission, must have put a peculiar strain upon His spirit, and brought Him most exquisite pain. In each of the incidents alluded to above we feel this note of pain: when He declines the intervention of His mother (Jn 2<sup>9</sup>); when He turns from His mother and His brethren to His disciples (Mk 3<sup>31-35</sup>); and when He has, in plain words, to state to His brethren that they and He belong to two different worlds of thought and action (Jn 7<sup>14</sup>, cf. 15<sup>26</sup>). That between Him and His mother there was a bond of love deeper than all misunderstanding, gains pathetic proof when from the cross He commends her to His beloved disciple: 'Woman (the very word, γυναίκα, He had used in Cana of Galilee, courteous and affectionate, and yet suggestive of a cessation of the old relationship of mother and child), behold thy son.' 'Behold thy mother' (Jn 19<sup>26</sup>).

2. Friends.—The vocation of Christ was one which could be executed by Himself alone. Necessarily He lived in a deep spiritual solitude, to which no human being could have access. Yet no sooner did He take up the burden of His mission than He proceeded to surround Himself with companions, and to cultivate human friendships. In the relations of Jesus to His friends three points are to be noted.

(1) His dependence upon them.—It will be a profound mistake if we conceive the end for which Jesus lived in any barely historical or formal manner. The end was the Kingdom of God, or the New Covenant; but these titles do not, in the mind or language of Christ, stand for a political or ecclesiastical institution. They mean, fundamentally, an experience of God generically identical with that enjoyed in Israel, but perfected, and therefore also universalized. This experience is destined, in the counsels of God, for humanity. To secure it for mankind, so that under fit spiritual conditions all men may enter into it, is the task which Jesus in clear consciousness definitely assumed. Suppose Him, however, to have fulfilled His task as the Servant of the Lord, He will lose His labour, unless He secure representatives and witnesses, who shall declare to all whom it concerns the accomplishment of God's gracious purpose. This testimony, moreover, cannot be borne by mere officials. Suppose, for instance, that the Resurrection was a fact. Suppose, further, that it had been verified by the investigations of experts drawn from the chief seats of learning of the ancient world. Nothing is more certain than that this testimony, taken alone, would not have advanced by a hairbreadth the purpose to which Jesus devoted Himself. Testimony to certain facts, there is no doubt He required; but this testimony would be valueless, did it not presuppose, and rest on, personal acquaintance with Himself, and participation in His own fellowship with God. His representatives must be His friends, bound to Him by personal ties of close and intelligent sympathy; capable of bearing witness, not merely to a series of His acts, but to His character and to His influence; having an understanding not merely of His doctrine, but of Himself. It was essential, therefore, that from the outset He should have friends about Him, to whom He should fulfil all the sacred obligations of a friend. When, accordingly, He comes to give them their commission, He makes it plain to them that His vocation is their vocation, having the same Divine origin, and carrying with it His own spiritual presence (Lk 4<sup>18-21-22</sup>, Mt 15<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>40-42</sup>, Jn 20<sup>21</sup>, Mt 28<sup>18-20</sup>).

How much the friendship of His disciples was to Jesus, the whole narrative bears witness. Their faith in Him was the greatest encouragement, apart from immediate Divine assurances, that He could receive as He faced the appalling difficulties of His task. There is an unmistakable note of pathos in His clinging to His disciples, when the natural support of family loyalty is denied Him. They were to Him brother, sister, mother. There can be no doubt that, had His three most intimate friends watched unto prayer, His last agony would have been alleviated. It is the pathos of His position that His friends never knew how much He depended on them. To them He was the Strong One upon whom they leaned, from whom they took everything, to whom, in unconscious selfishness, they gave but little. Love must have been to Jesus a constant hunger. Never in all His life did He get it satisfied; and yet it never failed, but remained the master passion of His soul. 'Having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end.'

(2) His self-communications to them.—The chief thing a friend can give to a friend is himself; and Jesus poured out on His friends the wealth of His personality: His love (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>), His knowledge (15<sup>19</sup>), His example (13<sup>34</sup>); so that, when He reviews His life, He can plead with His Father His own perfect fulfilment of love's obligations (17<sup>8-12</sup>). The riches of Christ, thus bestowed upon them, vivified their imagination, quickened their emotion, enlightened their understanding, subdued and renewed their wills, till they came to be not wholly unfit representatives of Him on whose errand they went. This influence, which Jesus exerted, had none of the aspect of an impersonal force. It consisted in the touch of spirit upon spirit in the mystic depths of fellowship; and this touch is not to be conceived as having the equal pressure of the atmosphere. Under certain conditions, which are necessarily too deep and delicate for analysis, the love of Christ gathered an intensity which made His friendship in these instances special and emphatic (Jn 11<sup>3</sup> 13<sup>30</sup>). Yet so exquisite was His tact, so evident His goodwill, that those about Him, though they might quarrel among themselves for pre-eminence, never brought against Him the charge of favoritism. They knew He loved them according to the measure of their receptivity, and with a reserve of tenderness and power for ever at their disposal. They assented as in a dream to His own word, 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends' (Jn 15<sup>13</sup>). Afterwards they awoke, and remembered, and understood.

(3) Their response to Him.—It is impossible to miss the brighter aspect of their attitude towards Him. They were glad in His company, happier than the disciples of the Pharisees or of John, happy as sons of the bride-chamber (Mk 2<sup>19</sup>). This joy of theirs in His presence throws a very lovely light upon His character. He knew the goal toward which His steps were taking Him, and was standing within sight of the cross. Yet no shadow from His spirit clouded theirs. They rejoiced in Him, and in the new world of religious experience to which He introduced them. They knew themselves to be possessed of privileges, which from the point of view of the OT had been no more than an aspiration. In the fellowship of their Master and Friend they stood nearer to God than the ripest saint of the OT, immeasurably nearer than any legalist of their own day. This joy of theirs in Him is, besides, reflection and proof of His joy in them. It is strange, when we consider the spiritual elevation at which He lived, but it is certain, that He had a very real joy in their presence. He delighted to stimulate their minds by questioning, to enrich their conceptions by definite teaching. He welcomed every indication of their growing intelligence; and when He discerned that they were awake to His meaning, 'He rejoiced in the Holy Spirit' (Lk 10<sup>21</sup>).

They trusted Him.—The result at which Jesus aimed in all His dealings with them was the production in them of faith; and by faith He meant a trust in Himself as complete as that which men ought to repose in God. Without doubt, this raises far-reaching questions regarding His personal relation to God. But the fact itself remains, as an element in the portrait of Christ, whether presented by the Synoptics or by the Fourth Gospel, that Jesus directed men to Himself as the source of all good, whether lower or higher (Mt 8<sup>10-12</sup>, and many instances connected with the healing of the body; Lk 7<sup>30</sup>, and other instances where spiritual effects are secured by faith, which are to be found in the Synoptics, and more copiously in the Fourth Gospel). His 'training of the Twelve' was not wholly fruitless. They gave Him what He sought, though not with the largeness and simplicity for which He longed.

It is noteworthy that their faith in Him is not to be gauged by its verbal expression. That might be surprisingly full, while the faith might be most rudimentary; or the expression of faith might well-nigh be silent, while yet the trust itself remained, scarce distinguishable from despair, and yet a root whence life might come. From the beginning Jesus produced an impression upon those admitted to His company, for which they felt there was only one possible interpretation; and this, even at that early stage, they stated with great fulness (Jn 1<sup>41-42</sup>). Jesus, however, did not consider that His end was gained, but proceeded with His education of these men, and allowed all factors in the case, especially such as seemed to exclude the possibility of Messianic glory, to make their due impress. Then, at the proper psychological moment, He put the supreme question—'Who say ye that I am?' and received from Peter's lips the confession of His Messiahship (Mt 16<sup>16</sup>). Even in respect to the faith which had received such emphatic expression. He made allowances for an eclipse of faith which might seem total; but still, in spite of all appearances, He believed in His disciples' faith in Him, not indeed in their intellectual or emotional utterances, but in the surrender of their wills to Him, and their personal loyalty.

We are thus recalled to the darker side of their relations with Him. Indeed, readers of the narrative are apt to be more severe in their judgment upon the disciples than was the Master Himself. Certainly their defects and shortcomings are patent enough, and the contrast between their Master and them can scarcely be exaggerated. He has not where to lay His head; their minds are occupied with the question of rewards (Mt 19<sup>27</sup>). He is meek and lowly in heart; they dispute about pre-eminence (Mt 18<sup>1-8</sup>, Lk 22<sup>24</sup>). His kingdom is for the poor in spirit; they lay plans for private advantage (Mt 20<sup>1</sup>). It is not of this world; to the end they are thinking of physical force (Lk 22<sup>28</sup>). He invites all to His fellowship; they are narrow and exclusive (Mk 9<sup>32-49</sup>). Fury is not in Him; they would invoke judgment upon adversaries (Lk 9<sup>54-56</sup>). They boasted their courage; but in the hour of His uttermost peril 'they all forsook Him, and fled' (Mt 26<sup>56</sup>). There can be no doubt that these things greatly moved Him, but the note of personal offence is entirely lacking. There is astonishment at their slowness, but no bitterness or petulance: 'Do ye not remember?' (Mk 8<sup>18</sup>); 'Are ye also even yet without understanding?' (15<sup>10</sup>); 'Have ye not yet faith?' (Mk 4<sup>40</sup>). Sometimes silence is His severest answer: 'Lord, here are two swords! It is enough!' (Lk 22<sup>38</sup>). He makes His very censures the occasion of further instruction: 'It is not so among you. . . . The Son of Man came to minister' (Mk 10<sup>43-45</sup>). Even when His spirit was most grieved, there was no flash of resentment, but only the most poignant tenderness: 'Simon, sleepest thou? couldest thou not watch one hour?' (Mk 14<sup>37</sup>); 'The Lord turned, and looked upon Peter' (Lk 22<sup>31</sup>).

This ignorance and waywardness on the part of His disciples, combined with their genuine love for Him and His abounding love for them, constituted a very severe trial of Jesus' fidelity to His vocation. 'The greatest temptation,' says a keen analyst of character, 'is the temptation to love evil in those we love, or to be lowered into the colder moral atmosphere of intense human affection, or to shrink from what is required of us that would pain it.' Jesus loved His friends. He knew that His course of conduct would inflict upon them unspeakable disappointment and distress; and this knowledge must have filled His own heart with keenest pain. When, accordingly, the disciple who most clearly confessed His Messiahship denounced the path He had chosen, the path of suffering, as inconsistent with the rank He had led His friends to believe was His, He felt Himself assailed in what the author above quoted ventures to call His 'weakest point.' It was the Temptation repeated; and as such He repelled it with hot anger.

In the case of one of the Twelve, it is to be noted that his criticism was not a temptation, because it was not the result of uncomprehending love, but of intelligent and bitter hate. Judas discerned the inevitable issue of Jesus' line of action; perceived that it involved all his own secret ambitions in utter ruin; and in revenge determined to be the instrument of the destruction which he foresaw. Again and again Jesus interposed to save him by warnings, which Judas alone could comprehend in their dread significance: 'One of you shall betray me' (Jn 13<sup>21</sup>, cf. 6<sup>70</sup>). 'One of you [the Twelve] is a devil.' In the end He had to let him go: 'That thou doest, do quickly' (v. 27). The depth of Jesus' acquaintance with God, the honour He put on human nature, may be measured by His dealing with Judas. There are some things God cannot do. This Divine inability Jesus recognized, and made it the norm of His own dealing with souls. We need not apologize for Jesus' choice of Judas. He chose him for the very qualities which led Him to the others, and which were, perhaps, present in Judas in a conspicuous degree. He loved him as He loved the others, and with a yet deeper yearning. But there came a time when, in imitation of the Father, He felt bound to stand aside. To have saved Judas by force would have violated the conditions under which the redemption of man is possible.

Even the briefest review of Christ's relations to His friends constrains the inference that, in the essential qualities of friendship, He is perfect; and the supposition becomes altogether reasonable, that, if He were alive now and accessible, the possession of His friendship would be salvation, and the loss of it would be the worst fate that could befall any human being.

3. Mankind.—The attitude of Jesus toward His fellow-men is determined by the function which He had been led, through His deep sympathy with God, to assume on their behalf. He believes Himself called to 'fulfil,' i.e. to perfect, and so to accomplish as permanent spiritual fact, the religion of the OT. We must not raise premature questions, but we must not evade plain facts. Jesus springs from the OT. He transcended it in this, that He believed the privileges of the New Covenant were to be verified, consummated, and bestowed upon men, through His mission. This mission He accepted, in clear prevision of what it involved, and in deep love to God and to men. It is plain that such a position carries with it unique authority, and warrants claims of extraordinary magnitude. He who knows Himself to be the mediator of the highest good to men knows Himself to be supreme among men. This consciousness is clear and unmistakable in the utterances of Jesus. He presents Himself to men as the object of a trust and a reverence that are nothing less than religious (Mk 27, Lk 19<sup>10</sup>, Mt 10<sup>21</sup> 18<sup>20</sup>). He passes verdicts upon their inner state that are not less than Divine in their insight and their absoluteness (Lk 9<sup>47-49</sup>, Mt 9<sup>2-6</sup>). He makes demands which no one has a right to make who does not know Himself to be completely the organ of the Divine authority (Mt 4<sup>19</sup> 9<sup>13</sup> 10<sup>27</sup>). He claims to be the arbiter of the final destinies of men (Mk 8<sup>38</sup>, Mt 7<sup>21-23</sup> 13<sup>41</sup> 16<sup>27</sup>, together with the undoubted teaching of the so-called eschatological discourses Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>), a function which in the OT belongs not even to Messiah, but to Jehovah alone (Jl 3<sup>1</sup>, Mal 3<sup>4</sup>). Such a consciousness, whose intensity suggests, if it does not prove, a unique constitution of the person of Christ, throws into high relief aspects of the character of Christ which seem at a cursory glance incongruous with it.

(1) Lowliness.—The self-assertion of Jesus is not the assertion of a self independent in its power and dignity, but of a self which has no interest save the cause of God, no glory that is not His. At the heart of the self-assertion of Jesus there is profound self-renunciation. It would be a mistake to describe Jesus as selfless. He has a self, which He might have made independent of God, which, however, in perfect freedom of act, He surrendered wholly to God. The lowliness of Christ, accordingly, is not mere modesty or diffidence. It is the quality of a self, at once asserted and denied. This paradox is carried out during His whole career. In youth, when the purpose of His life is being formed, there is no irritable self-consciousness. In manhood, when the knowledge of His mission is clear and full, and the spiritual distance which separated Him from other men is obvious to His inward eye, there is no outward separateness of manner. The life of the common people was His life, without any trace of condescension or hint of masquerade. His acceptance of the lowly conditions of His life is so complete, that there is no sense of incongruity on His part between what He was and the world He lived in. In His teaching He is able to attack pride without any risk of having imputed to Him a pride more subtle and more offensive. More remarkable still, He offers Himself as a pattern of the very humility He is inculcating, without raising any suspicion of unreality. The words, 'I am meek and lowly in heart' (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>), on the lips of any other man, would refute the claim they make. In His case it is not so. They mean that the self which lays its yoke on men is already crucified, and has no claim to make on its own behalf. Toward the close of His life its open secret is given, when, at the Last Supper, in full consciousness of His personal dignity, He washed the feet of those who, He knew, would fail Him in the end, and of one by whose impending treachery His own would soon be nailed to the cross.

(2) Considerateness.—With His idea of man and His conception of His vocation, it was impossible for Jesus to regard human personality as other than sacred. All the dues of humanity, accordingly, He paid with scrupulous exactitude. It would be superfluous to search in the narratives for instances of His justice, honesty, and truth. The distinctiveness of His calling kept Him apart from the ecclesiastical and political institutions of His country; but He was careful not to disturb them, even when He felt most critical of them (Mt 17<sup>24-27</sup>, Mk 12<sup>17</sup>), and the charge of rebellion was readily seen by Pilate to be baseless. The same distinctiveness deprived Him of a business career, and, therefore, of the sphere wherein many virtues are most severely tried; but it is noteworthy that the disciple company had a treasurer, whose duty it was to take care of the money intrusted to him, and whose dishonesty became a step toward Calvary (Jn 12<sup>6</sup>). Towards individuals His attitude was wholly without respect of persons. He paid men the honour of being perfectly frank and fearless in all His dealings with them. He did them the justice of letting them know the judgment He passed upon them. Herod, Pilate, the Pharisees, stood before His bar and heard their sentence. His fairness is never more conspicuous than in His dealing with Judas, whom He would not permit to suppose that he was undetected, Jesus fully recognizing that a man's probation can be carried on only in the light.

But there is due to human nature more than the strictest honesty or truth. Jesus' authority over men, instead of leading Him to be careless in the handling of a soul, impelled Him to an exquisite carefulness which extended from the needs of the body to the more delicate concerns of the mind. If He imposes heavy tasks, He remembers the frailty of the human frame: 'Come ye apart, and rest awhile' (Mk 6<sup>31</sup>). If the coming grief saddens His companions, He turns from His own far deeper sorrow to still their tumultuous distress: 'Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid' (Jn 14<sup>1</sup>). If He must rebuke, His reproaches pass into excuses: 'The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak' (Mt 26<sup>41</sup>). Most lovely of all is His treatment of those who might seem to have forfeited all claim to respect. He laboured by a more emphatic courtesy, a more tender chivalry, to bind up the broken self-respect, and to rebuke that insolent contempt of the sinful and degraded which so deeply dishonours God. Before the ideal in publican and harlot He bowed in reverence, and constituted Himself its resolute defender.

(3) Compassion.—The respect which Jesus has for human nature becomes, in presence of human need, a very passion for helping, healing, saving. The qualities which most deeply impressed the men and women of His day, and which shine most clearly in His portrait, are not His supernatural gifts, but His unwearied goodness, His sincere kindness, His great gentleness, His deep and tender pity. By these He has captivated the imagination, and won the reverence of humanity. The narratives have felt the throbbing compassion of Jesus' heart, and have used the very phrase with a sweet monotony (Mk 1<sup>41</sup>, Mt 20<sup>34</sup> 9<sup>36</sup>, Lk 7<sup>13</sup>, Mt 14<sup>14</sup> 15<sup>20</sup>).

The compassion of Jesus is manifest in the wonderful works which are ascribed to Him. All of them, with the exception of 'the coin in the fish's mouth' and 'the withering of the fruitless fig-tree,' which have a special didactic aim, are works of mercy. They are, no doubt, proofs of power; but they are essentially instances of the sympathy of Jesus, in virtue of which He enters into the fulness of human need. The instinct of one Evangelist has no doubt directed subsequent thought toward the truth. When Jesus wrought His healing miracles, He was fulfilling a prophecy which had special reference to sin (Mt 8<sup>17</sup>). By no easy exercise of power did He relieve the distresses of men, but by a real assumption of their sorrow. Every such act stands in organic connexion with the deed of the Cross, in which He bare the sin which is the root of all human infirmities.

Yet more conspicuously the compassion of Jesus is to be seen in the method of His ministry, which led Him to seek the company of sinners, not because their sin was not abhorrent to His nature, but because He loved His vocation, and loved those who were its objects. The disinterestedness which Plato ascribes to the true physician deepens, in the case of this Healer of men, to a pure and burning passion. Twice His compassion found vent in tears: once in presence of man's mortality, once in sight of the city whose abuse of privilege had earned extremity of woe. There are depths here we cannot fathom, since there is mercifully denied us perfect knowledge of the evil which Jesus' knowledge of God fully disclosed to His view. Knowing God, living in unbroken fellowship with Him, Jesus knew, as none other could, what sin and death were. He lived and died with the spectacle of their power ever before Him. His knowledge is the measure of His compassion, and both are immeasurable.

(4) Forgiveness.—Without doubt, Jesus believed Himself to be the agent of the Divine love, the mediator of the Divine forgiveness. He had power on earth to forgive sins (Mt 9<sup>1</sup>). This forgiveness He announced as the prerogative of His office; but the actual experience of forgiveness, as the redeeming act of God, came through the love which Jesus Himself manifested. His welcome of sinners was their reception into the fellowship of God. This is a fact which no prejudice against doctrine ought to invalidate, which, probably, no doctrine can adequately explain. Hence follow two features of the portrait of Christ, each most significant and suggestive. He accepted the gratitude of forgiven sinners as though He were God's own representative (Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup>); and He regarded sins committed against Himself as committed against God, who in His mission was seeking to save men. His forgiveness of such offences, accordingly, is not measurable in terms of quantity—unto seven times or seventy times seven; but has the very qualities of boundlessness and inexhaustibility which He attributes to the forgiveness of God. There is only one limitation, and that does not belong to the character of God, but to the constitution of human nature. There is a sin which hath never forgiveness (Mt 12<sup>31-32</sup>, Mk 3<sup>28-29</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup>). It does not consist, however, in a definite offence against God or His Christ, but in a frame of mind, an habitude of soul, which is psychologically beyond reach of forgiveness. Apart from this limit, which on God's side is none, forgiveness is infinite.

When, accordingly, we proceed to examine the sins committed against Jesus, we perceive that they form an ascending scale of guilt, according to the advancing measure of light and privilege against which they were committed, and so also of pain to Him and of peril to the transgressors. First, there is the sin of those who were directly responsible for His death. Dark and dreadful though this was, compounded of the vilest qualities of polluted human nature, it was, nevertheless, even in its deadliest guilt, not a sin against absolutely clear conviction. Hence the victim of so much wrong prays even while the nails rend His flesh: 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do' (Lk 23<sup>34</sup>). It is impossible to narrow the scope of this petition to the unconscious instruments, the Roman soldiers; it must extend also to the Jews themselves, to the mob, and even to their more guilty rulers. Peter (Ac 3<sup>17</sup>) and Paul (1 Co 2<sup>2</sup>) cannot have been mistaken in their interpretation of the crime which slew their Lord.

Second, there is the sin of those who deserted Him in His need, and especially of him who denied his Master with oaths and curses. They were bound to Jesus by every tie of affection and of loyalty. He trusted them, and they failed Him. Yet it could not be said of them that they knew what they did. Their action was without premeditation, without real sense of its meaning. A spasm of overpowering fear confounded their intelligence and destroyed their resolution. Shameful it was, and must have wrung the heart of Jesus with anguish; yet at its worst it was committed against the Son of Man, not against the Holy Spirit. They knew not what they were about to do, but He knew (Mk 14<sup>27</sup>), and broke their hearts with His free forgiveness (v. 72).

Third, the sin of Judas. Of all the crimes of which guilty man is capable, treachery is, in the judgment of all men, the most dreadful; and therefore Dante (Inferno, xxxi. 134) has placed Judas in the jaws of Lucifer. Did Judas, then, commit the sin against the Holy Spirit? It is profitless to discuss the question. No absolute verdict is possible. It is certain that Jesus dealt with Judas, in clear light of truth, with the utmost consideration, and with far-reaching forbearance. Appeal after appeal He made to him, seeking to reveal him to himself, while scrupulously shielding him from the suspicions of his fellows, and retaining him to the last possible moment within the sphere of loving influence. Finally, He gave him that permission to do wrong which human freedom wrings from Divine omnipotence, and which is, at the same time, God's severest judgment upon the sinner (Jn 13<sup>7</sup>, Mt 26<sup>26</sup> RV). Who can tell if it be not also God's last offer of mercy? In the end (perhaps not too late), the goodness of Jesus smote with overwhelming force upon the conscience of Judas. He 'repented himself' (Mt 27<sup>3</sup>). Whatever value may be attached to such repentance, whatever destiny may have awaited Judas beyond the veil of flesh, which he so violently tore aside, there can at least be no more impressive testimony to the forbearance, the love, and the wisdom of Jesus, than this overwhelming remorse.

v. THE VIRTUES OF HIS VOCATION.—The end for which Jesus lived determined all His actions, and called into exercise all the virtues of His character, as well the more general characteristics of spiritual-mindedness, love to God, and love to men, as the specific virtues of His social relations. The vocation of Jesus, however, as Servant of the Lord was definite; and with respect to it He had a definite work to do. Questions as to the conceptions which it implies with respect to the constitution of Christ's person do not now concern us. But we are concerned to observe that, in His discharge of His duty, certain aspects of His character shine forth with special beauty. They are such as these—

1. Faithfulness.—There is an unmistakable note of compulsion in His life. He has received a precise charge, and He will carry it out with absolute precision and unswerving fidelity. This is the mind of the boy, when as yet the nature of His mission cannot have been fully before Him (Lk 2<sup>49</sup>). This is the conviction of the man, who has come to know what office He holds, and what is the thing He has to do or endure (Mt 16<sup>27</sup>, Mk 8<sup>34</sup>). Many specific expressions (e.g., Jn 4<sup>34</sup> 9<sup>3</sup> 11<sup>4-10</sup>) and the whole tenor of His life convey the same impression of a man looking forward to a goal, in itself most terrible, yet pressing toward it with unwavering determination. The imperative of duty, and the burden of inexorable necessity, are laid upon His conscience; and He responds with complete obedience.

The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, who displays a singular insight into the ethical conditions of Christ's work, mentions the virtues of fidelity as being conspicuous in 'the Apostle and High Priest of our confession' (He 3<sup>1-2</sup>), and draws a far-reaching parallel and contrast between Him and Moses, as between a son and a servant. In filial faithfulness there are three aspects: (a) perfect identification with the Father's will, (b) entire absorption in the Father's concerns, (c) free access to the Father's resources; and these are plainly seen in Christ's discharge of His duty. There is not the slightest trace of servility. The will to which He yielded absolute devotion is that of One whom He perfectly loved and trusted, to whom He could freely come for everything He required. The absolute control of the Divine resources, which is attributed to Him in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 13<sup>3</sup>), is borne out by every trait of the Synoptic portrait. He was not toiling with inadequate resources at an uncomprehended task. Even when the strain upon His will is heaviest, and His whole soul shrinks from what lies before Him, there is one word which delivers His faithfulness from any suspicion of bondage: 'Father, if it be possible' . . . (Mt 26<sup>39, 42</sup>, Mk 14<sup>36</sup>, Lk 22<sup>42</sup>).

2. Courage.—The courage of Jesus Christ is the crown of His faithfulness. It was not tested by such occasions as the sinking ship or the stricken field, but by conditions yet more severe. Outraged prejudice, wounded pride of caste, threatened privilege, were banded together to destroy Him. They disguised themselves in zeal for the honour of God. They, no doubt, attracted to their side sincere, though unenlightened, loyalty to His cause; and Jesus must have known the reformer's keenest pain, the sense of wounding good and true men. They sought alliances with powers most alien to their professed aims. They found support in the ignorant enthusiasm of the multitude, who mistook the aims of Jesus, and in the more culpable mis- understanding of His disciples and friends. The Fourth Gospel is surely historic in representing the breach between Jesus and the leaders of the religious world of His day as having taken place in the opening weeks of His ministry. It is inconceivable that the wide divergence of His views from those of the Pharisees and Sadducees should not have been manifest in the very first announcement of them. He certainly was not, and His adversaries could not have been, blind to the issues of the controversy. It had not proceeded far, when it became apparent to them that it could be terminated only by their defeat or by His destruction. With unscrupulous plans and bitter hate they laboured to compass His ruin. With sublime courage He persevered in His vocation, though He was well aware that every step He took only made the end more certain. When the end comes, it finds Him spiritually prepared. He moves with firm and equal tread. From the loving fellowship of the Supper He passes, without bewilderment, to the conflict of Gethsemane. From the shadow of the trees and the darker shade of His unknown agony, He goes to face the traitor, with no other tremor than that of amazement at such consummate wickedness (Lk 22<sup>6</sup>); and sur- renders Himself to the instruments of injustice, less their captive than their conqueror. Amid the worst tortures men can inflict, we hear no murmur. We do not merely observe, with what of admiration it might have deserved, a stoical fortitude, which proudly repels every assault on the self-sufficiency of the human spirit. We observe a more moving spectacle, the Servant of the Lord accepting unfathomed pain as the crown of His vocation, thus rendering to the Father a perfect obedience, and finishing the work given Him to do.

3. Patience.—It is an error to describe patience as a 'passive' virtue, if by that epithet is indicated the spirit which makes no resistance, because resistance is seen to be futile. Patience is rather the associate of courage, and springs from the same root, namely, identification of will with a great and enduring purpose. Jesus has made the eternal purpose of God for the redemption of man the controlling principle of His life; and therefore He is enabled to be patient, in the widest and deepest meanings of the term. He patiently waits for God. This lesson He learned from the OT;

this gift He acquired in that deep communion with God, which was the privilege of the OT believer, and is the heart of all true religion. Nothing is more remarkable in a man so intense, endowed, moreover, with supernatural powers, than His reserve. He is eager for the achievement of His task, straitened till His baptism be accomplished (Lk 12<sup>50</sup>). Yet He is never betrayed into rashness of speech or action. He maintains His attitude of intent expectancy. The idea of an 'hour' for Himself, and for His work, and for His great victory, known to the Father, and made known at His discretion, lies deep in the heart of Jesus (Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, 14<sup>41</sup>, Lk 10<sup>4</sup>, Jn 2<sup>4</sup>, 5<sup>25, 28</sup>, 7<sup>29</sup>, 8<sup>20</sup>, 12<sup>34</sup>, 13<sup>7</sup>, 17). To Him time was the measure of God's purpose; death, 'God's instant.' He κατα- θυμει, suffers long with wayward or injurious persons. God hides Him in His pavilion from the strife of tongues, and from that sense of personal injury which enkindles temper and provokes unadvised speech. So identified is He with God, that offences against Himself lose themselves in Divine forgive- ness. His meekness is not weakness, but that amazing strength which can take up a personal wrong, and carry it into the Divine presence with vicarious suffering. He ὑπομένει, endures in undying hope the severest trial (He 12<sup>2-3</sup>). The idea that His death was unexpected by Jesus, and felt by Him to demand an explanation which He attempted to provide in obscure suggestions and laboured analogies, is most false to the profound unity of His character. The Cross is the key to His char- acter. This was the climax of His mission, the introduction to the victory which lay beyond; and this, when it came, He endured with a 'brave patience' which was rooted in His assurance that His vocation was from God and could not fail. This was His victory, even His patience (Rev 1<sup>9</sup>).

4. Calmness.—The patience of Jesus has for its inner correlative deep serenity of soul. He lived in God; and, therefore, He was completely master of Himself. We observe in Him, as a matter of course, that control of the so-called lower desires of our nature which was the Greek conception of sober-mindedness or temperance. We see, beyond this, a more remarkable proof of self-possession in His control over the very motives and desires which impelled Him to devote His life to the service of God and man. There is no feeling of strain in the utterances of His soul as He speaks of or to His Father. The phenomena of excite- ment or rapture, which disfigure so many religious biographies, are wholly absent from the record of His deepest experiences. In His attitude toward men, whom He regarded it as His mission to save, there is perfect sanity. The harsh or strident note, which is scarcely ever absent in the speeches of reformers, is never audible in His words. His love for men is not a mountain torrent, but a deep, calm current, flowing through all His activities. We cannot, with verbal exactness, attribute to Him the 'enthusiasm of humanity,' which the author of Ecce Homo regards as the essential quality of a Christian in relation to his fellow-men, if, at least, the phrase suggest even the slightest want of balance, or any ignorance of the issues of action, or any carelessness with respect to them. He is the minister of the Divine purposes, never of His own emotions, however pure and lofty these may be. Yet we are not to impute to Him any un- emotional callousness. He never lost His calm- ness; but He was not always calm. He repelled temptation with deep indignation (Mk 8<sup>3</sup>). Hypo- crisy roused Him to a flame of judgment (Mk 3<sup>29</sup>, 11<sup>18-17</sup>, Mt 23<sup>28</sup>). Treachery shook Him to the very centre of His being (Jn 13<sup>21</sup>). The waves of human sorrow broke over Him with a greater grief than wrung the bereaved sisters (Jn 11<sup>35-37</sup>).

CHARACTER OF CHRIST 295

There were times when He bore an unknown agony, which could be shared by none, though He sought for human sympathy up to the very gates of the sanctuary of pain (Jn 12<sup>27</sup>, Mk 14<sup>32-34</sup>). Yet, whatever His soul's discipline might be, He never lost His self-control, was never distracted or afraid, but remained true to His mission and to His Father. He feels anger, or sorrow, or trouble, but these emotions are under the control of a will that is one with the Divine will, and therefore are comprehended within the perfect peace of a mind stayed on God.

5. Self-sacrifice.—'Christ pleased not Himself' (Ro 15<sup>3</sup>). These words, brief though they be, sum up the character of Christ as St. Paul conceived it. They convey, without doubt, the impression made by the record of His life. If this estimate is just, if Christ was an absolutely unselfish man, if He made a full sacrifice of Himself, His character stands alone, unique in the moral universe. We cannot make this statement without raising problems of immense difficulty, which is the business of theology to face. But no mystery beyond ought to restrict our acknowledgment of ethical fact. Christ had a self, like other men, and might have made it, in its intense individuality, His end, laying a tax upon the whole universe in order to satisfy it. The ideal of self-satisfaction was necessarily present to His mind, inasmuch as it is inevitably suggested in all self-consciousness. It was definitely presented to Him in His temptation in the wilderness. But once for all in that initial conflict, and again and again in life, He beat back the temptation, rejected that ideal, surrendered Himself to His vocation, and sought no other satisfaction than His fulfilment. His life is a sacrifice. He set the world behind His back, and had no place or portion in it (Lk 9<sup>58</sup>). The way He went was the path of self-denial and cross-bearing (Mk 8<sup>34</sup>, Jn 12<sup>25-26</sup>). His death was a sacrifice. The death of one whose life was a sacrifice must have had sacrificial significance for God and man. It could not be a fate to be explained by an after-thought. It must have been essentially an action, a voluntary offering made to God, laid on the altar of human need. The story of the Passion, read from the point where He steadfastly set His face to go to Jerusalem to the point where He went, as He was wont, to the Mount of Olives, and so through every detail of suffering, portrays, indeed, one led as a lamb to the slaughter, but as certainly one who, having power to keep His life, laid it down, in free surrender, in deep love to the Father (Jn 10<sup>17, 18</sup>). He was endowed with powers which He might have exerted to deliver Himself from the hand of His enemies; He did not so exert them. He did not even employ them to win one slightest alleviation of His sufferings. He might have saved Himself; yet, with deeper truth, Himself He could not save. The self-sacrifice of Christ is the foundation of the Kingdom of God, the purchase of man's redemption, the basis of that morality which finds in Him its standard and its example.

Concluding estimate.—When we have studied the character of Christ from the points of view suggested in the foregoing scheme, we are conscious that we are only on the threshold of a great subject, to whose wealth of meaning no formal study can do justice. The character of Christ presents 'unsearchable riches' to every sympathetic student. Every generation, since His bodily presence was withdrawn, has been pursuing that investigation; none has comprehended His fulness, or been forced to look elsewhere for information and inspiration. He has laid upon us the necessity of continuously seeking to understand Him, and of applying, in the manifold occasions and circumstances of life, the fulness of the moral ideal presented in Himself.

1. When, however, we pause in our detailed study—to whatever length we may have carried it—or in our application of His precept and example—however successfully, or with whatever wistful consciousness of failure, we may have pursued it; when we lift our gaze afresh to the portrait presented in the Gospels, the impression deepens upon us with new and overwhelming conviction, that in Christ there is achieved, as a fact of the moral universe, goodness, not merely comparative, but absolute. It is not merely that among the choice spirits of our race He occupies the front rank, but that He stands alone. Jesus Christ is the Master of all who seek to know God, in the sense that His character is supreme and final in the moral progress of humanity. He is completely human. Like men, He pursued the pathway of development. Like men, He was assailed by temptation, and waged incessant warfare with evil suggestions. Yet He is absolutely unique. He is not merely better than other men. He is what all men ought to be. It is not merely that we see in Him an approximation to the moral ideal, nearer and more successful than is to be discerned in any other man; but that we find in Him the moral ideal, once for all realized and incarnated, so that no man can go beyond Him, while all men in all ages will find in His strength and joy to grow up toward the measure of His stature. Again and again we are made to feel, when we contemplate such virtues as have been adverted to in the preceding pages, e.g. love to God, love to men, consecration, unselfishness, and the like, that there is the note of absoluteness in His attainment. Between Him and the ideal there is no hairbreadth of disparity. His fulfilment of the will of God is complete. What God meant man to be is at once disclosed and finished.

2. The positive conception of the absolute goodness of Jesus carries with it the negative conception of His sinlessness. As we stand before the figure in the Gospels, our sense of His perfection reaches special solemnity and tenderness in the impression of His stainless and lovely purity. Attempts, no doubt, have been made to fasten some charge of sin on Jesus, e.g. that of a hasty or imperious temper; or even to extract from Himself some acknowledgment of imperfection (Mk 10<sup>14</sup>). These attempts have totally failed, and have exhibited nothing so clearly as the fact that they are after-thoughts, designed to establish the a priori dogma that sinlessness is an impossibility. Such procedure is, of course, wholly unscientific. If a record, otherwise trustworthy, presents us with the portrait of a sinless man, we are not entitled to reject its testimony because, if we accept it, we shall have to abandon a dogma or revise an induction. When, accordingly, we study the NT with unprejudiced mind, two great certainties are established beyond question.

(1) The impression of His sinlessness made upon His disciples.—Some of these men had been in close contact with Him, a fellowship so intimate that it was impossible that they could be mistaken in Him. Through this intimacy their moral ideas were enlarged and enriched; their spiritual insight was made delicate and true. The men who created the ethic of the NT are the spiritual leaders of the human race, and they owed their inspiration to their Master. They knew all the facts. They were spiritually competent to form a sound estimate. Without a tinge of hesitation they ascribe to Him complete separation from the very principle of evil (1 P 2<sup>22</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>5</sup>, He 4<sup>15</sup> 7<sup>26</sup>). They assign to Him an office which required absolute sinlessness, knowing that any proof of deviation from the holiness of God would have reduced the claim they made on behalf of their Master to utter confusion (Ac 3<sup>4</sup> 7<sup>5</sup> 22<sup>4</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup>). A group of men, who knew Christ thoroughly, believed Him to be sinless. A generation, which had the facts fully before them, accepted this as the truth regarding Jesus of Nazareth. Add to this the mysterious effect the personality of Jesus had upon those whose contact with Him was brief, even momentary — Pilate (Lk 23<sup>8</sup>), Pilate's wife (Mt 27<sup>9</sup>), the centurion who superintended the judicial murder (Mk 15<sup>39</sup>, Lk 23<sup>47</sup>), the malefactor who died beside Him (Lk 23<sup>40c</sup>). Among all the witnesses the traitor himself is the clearest and fullest (Mt 27<sup>4</sup>).

The knowledge which spirit has of spirit, the insight of our moral nature, the verdict of conscience, are all confounded if the taint of sin lay on the soul of Jesus.

(2) His own self-knowledge and His own self-witness, which establish the fact of a conscience at once perfectly true and absolutely void of any sense of sin.

(a) He taught His disciples to pray for forgiveness; but He never set them the example of asking it on His own behalf. He was their example in prayer as in all else; but that which is a constituent element in the prayers of all sinful men, the confession of sin and the supplication of forgiveness, does not appear in any prayer of His. There is even a scrupulous avoidance of any phrase which would seem to include Himself in the class of those whose prayers must contain this element, e.g. Mt 6<sup>9</sup> 14<sup>7</sup>, where 'ye' is emphatic and significant.

(b) He is absolutely intolerant of evil. He counsels the extreme of loss in preference to its presence (Mk 9<sup>42-43</sup>). He traces it to its source in heart and will, and demands cleansing and renewal there (Mk 7<sup>18-23</sup>). Yet nowhere does He bewail His own pollution, or seek for cleansing. He lives a life of strenuous devotion; but there is not a hint of any process of mortifying sin in His members. Such unconsciousness of sin is a psychological impossibility, if His was simply the goodness of an aspiring, struggling, human soul, striving after the ideal, and ever drawing nearer it. By the very height of His ideal He would be convicted of shortcoming. But nothing in His language or bearing suggests, even remotely, such a conviction. We know this Man, and we know that in His own consciousness there was no gulf between Him and perfection, and that to His own deepest feeling there was between Him and the Father perfect moral identity. If this Man be a sinner, the competence of the moral judgment is destroyed for ever.

(c) He required moral renewal on the part of all men (Mt 18<sup>3</sup>, Jn 3<sup>3</sup>). But there is no record of the conversion of Jesus, and there is no hint of a belief on His part that He needed it. True, He accepted, or rather demanded, baptism of John; but His action, as interpreted by Himself, plainly implies that in uniting Himself with the sinful people, He was under constraint of love, and not under the compulsion of an alarmed and awakened conscience. That there was anything in His experience analogous to a death to sin of His own, and a rising into a life of new obedience, is contradicted by every line of the Gospel portrait.

(d) He loved and pitied sinners. His sympathetic treatment of them stands in lovely contrast with the cruelty of the Pharisaic method. Yet, in all His dealing with sinners, He preserves the note of ethical distinction. He unites Himself with sinners. His sin-bearing is a fact, even before Calvary. Yet at the point of closest and most sympathetic union with sinners there is complete inward aloofness from their sin. The contention that only a sinner can properly understand a sinner and fully sympathize with him, is purely a priori, and absolutely refuted by the ministry of Jesus. Did any philanthropist, any lover of souls, ever sympathize as Jesus did with sinners? Long before Christ, Plato had noted and disposed of the fallacy that a man needs to be tainted with sin before he can effectively deal with it. 'Vice can never know both itself and virtue; but virtue in a well-instructed nature will in time acquire a knowledge at once of itself and of vice.' The virtuous man, therefore, and not the vicious man, will make the wise judge' (Republic, 409). Let us add, not a wise judge merely, but a loving friend and helper. Sin is a hindrance, not a help, in loving. The crowning help which Jesus bestowed on sinners was the forgiveness of sins. This was beyond doubt a Divine prerogative, both in the minds of those who observed His conduct and in His own. If He exercised it, therefore, while aware of His own sinfulness, He was uttering blasphemy, and the worst verdict of His critics was justifiable. His forgiving sin is absolute proof that to His own consciousness He was sinless.

(e) He died for sinners. What has just been said of His forgiving sinners applies with yet mightier force to His deed in dying. He believed it to be of such unique value for God that, on the ground of it, He could forgive the sins of men. Without trenching on the discussions that gather round the death of Christ, and without attempting any dogmatic statement, we are safe in asserting that to Jesus His blood was covenant blood, ratifying the New Covenant which had been the profound anticipation of OT prophecy (Jer 31<sup>31-34</sup>). No man, conscious of being himself a sinner, could have supposed that his death would create the Covenant and procure the forgiveness of sins. Since Jesus certainly believed that His death would have this stupendous effect, it is certain also that He believed Himself to be utterly removed from the need of forgiveness.

What is thus to be traced, as the implication of our Lord's dealing with sinners, becomes in the Fourth Gospel His explicit self-assertion. It may be that, had these utterances stood alone, they might have been discounted as due to dogmatic preconceptions on the part of the writer. Since, however, they are in complete psychological harmony with the whole Synoptic portraiture, they cannot be thus explained away. They are, besides, precisely what might be looked for, and carry with them strong internal evidence of their genuineness. Innocence may be unconscious of itself, but not that sinlessness which is the correlate of perfection. Self-knowledge must accompany that goodness which grows toward maturity, and maintains its integrity against temptation. Jesus did not live in a golden mist. He may be trusted in His self-witness; and the occasions mentioned in the Fourth Gospel on which He bore such witness are precisely those of great trial or deep experience, when a man is permitted, may required, to state the truth regarding Himself. He bears witness: (a) before His enemies, as part of His self-defence (Jn 8<sup>10</sup>), arguing from His purity of heart to His undimmed vision of things unseen; (b) to His own, as example and encouragement (Jn 15<sup>3</sup>), revealing the secret of a serene and joyful life, as part of His last charge and message; (c) to His Father, in an hour of sacred communion (Jn 17<sup>4</sup>), as the review and estimate of His life; (d) on the cross (Jn 19<sup>10</sup>), as the summary of His long warfare, the note of final achievement of the whole will of God.

If Jesus were in any degree sinful, He must have known it, and had He known it He would have told us. If He knew it and did not tell us, we should have just cause of complaint against Him, since, in that case, He must have allowed a false impression to grow up regarding Him. If He was sinful and did not know it, He must fall out of the rank of the best men, because in that case He lacks the noblest and most moving element in the character of those who have agonized heavenward,—a deep sense of demerit and an adoring sense of the grace of God. But, in truth, the mere statement of these alternatives and inferences is intolerable. The conscience of the race has been created by Jesus Christ. His character is at once the rebuke and the inspiration of every age. He is the moral ideal realized once for all. There is no other, no higher goodness than that which is incarnated in Him; and, as has been said, 'the difference between the highest morality that exists and a perfect one is a difference not of degree, but of kind' (Davidson, Theol. of O.T.).

To this affirmation regarding Jesus we are constrained to come. Nothing less is a fair interpretation of the record. He stands alone. Man though He be, He is distinguished from all men by a unique moral and spiritual excellence. Between Him and God there is a relationship to which there is no parallel in the case of any other man. The absolute distinctiveness of the character of Christ is not a dogma, constructed under philosophical or theological influences. It is a fact to which every line of the portrait bears unanswerable evidence. Stated as a fact, however, it becomes at once a problem which cannot be evaded. 'Whence hast thou this man these things?' How the answer shall be framed,—whether the Nicene formula is adequate, or, if not, how it is to be corrected and supplemented, is the task laid upon the intellect and conscience of the Church of to-day. It is certain that upon the earnestness and honesty with which she takes up that task will depend her vitality and her permanence. It is certain also that intellectual progress in apprehending the mystery of the Person of Christ will be conditioned by moral progress in apprehending, appropriating, and reproducing the perfection of His character.

LITERATURE.—The main source for any character study of Christ must be sought in the Gospels themselves. The Lives of Christ will, of course, give abundant information and help: Neander, Ederstein, Didon, Weiss, Boyschlag, Keim. Works dealing directly with the character of Christ as an ethical study seem to be rare. All Dr. Bruce's works are penetrated by the ethical spirit; Training of the Twelve, Kingdom of God, Galilean Gospel, Apologetic, Humiliation of Christ. Soley's Ecce Homo, and Abbott's Philochristus are helpful. An anonymous work, The Gospel for the Nineteenth Century (Longmans, Green, & Co., 1900), Ullmann's Sinlessness of Jesus, Forrest's Christ of History and Experience, and Prof. Garvie's recent papers in the Expositor on 'The Inner Life of Christ,' Godet's Defense of the Christian Faith, Mackintosh's Primer of Apologetics, Nicol's The Church's One Foundation, all deal with aspects of the subject. References also are to be found in works on Systematic Theology, by such writers as Dörner, Martensen, Oosterzee, and in last-named author's Imago of Christ, as well as in treatises on Christian Ethics; cf. also Staiker's Imago Christi; Fairbairn's Studies in the Life of Christ, ch. iii.; Herrmann's Communion with God, p. 70 ff.; Liddon's EL, Lect. iv.

CHARGER.—The utensil referred to (Mt 14<sup>13-11</sup>, Mk 6<sup>20-23</sup>) was a flat tray or salver (Gr. πῖρα) with a narrow rim, and was usually made of brass, the surface being plain or ornamented with engraved or embossed designs, and varying in size from one to three feet in diameter. At an Oriental meal the tray is laid upon a low stool, the dishes being placed upon it, while those who partake sit or recline around it. The tray is also carried around by an attendant when presenting wine or drinks composed of water flavoured with lemon, rose, or violet essences.

In the two passages that describe Salome's request at Herod's birthday feast, the charger is mentioned as an essential part of the stipulation.

In both narratives the demand is for the head of John the Baptist in a charger. In explanation of this it has to be noted that the daughter of Herodias had demeaned herself to play the part of a hired Oriental dancer, with the usual accompaniments of paint and jewellery, loose and showy costume, and gestures of indelicate suggestion. The appearance and dancing of the young princess had captivated the guests already exhilarated by the royal banquet, and prepared them to applaud anything clever and audacious from the same person. The king entered into the spirit of the occasion, and treating her as a paid performer, offered her for her services anything she might desire. And so when she requested that the head of John the Baptist might be served up to her on one of the trays from which the guests were being regaled, the unfeeling jest implied that this would be to her both her professional fee and her portion of the feast.

It was John the Baptist's last testimony against the artificial and insincere spirit of the age. When such a crime could be so lightly committed, the day of the Lord upon the nation could not be far off. Afterwards, when Herod addressed his questions to Christ, it was to find Him absolutely silent (Lk 23<sup>9</sup>). The atrophy of moral feeling may be gradual, and be relieved by intervals of wrestling and regret, but at last unwillingness to feel becomes inability to feel.

A touch of witty caricature or grotesque exaggeration has often since then given mass and plausibility to something essentially wrong and in itself repulsive. When society is made selfish and artificial by luxury and the love of pleasure, it will keep its oaths of personal vanity although the gratification should stifle the voice of sincerity and truth.

CHIEF PRIESTS (ἀρχιερεῖς).—In the Gospels ἀρχιερεῖς properly denotes the individual who for the time being held the office of Jewish high priest; and when the word occurs in its singular form, 'high priest' is the almost invariable rendering it receives throughout the NT, both in AV and RV (in Lk 3<sup>2</sup> ἐστὶ ἀρχιερεὺς Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Καϊάφα is rendered in AV 'Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests,' and in RV 'in the high priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas.' In Ac 19<sup>34</sup> ἀρχιερεῖς, as applied to 'one Sceva, a Jew,' is rendered 'chief of the priests' in AV, 'a chief priest' in RV). For a general treatment of the office of the ἀρχιερεῖς in NT times, and also of the use of the word as a title of Christ by the author of Hebrews, reference must be made to art. HIGH PRIEST. But in the Gospels and Acts the word occurs very frequently in the plural form (cf. Jos. Vita, 38, BJ iv. iii. 7, 9, 10; and passim), and on all such occasions, both in AV and RV, it is translated 'chief priests.' It is these ἀρχιερεῖς, not the ἀρχιερεῖς proper, with whom we are concerned in the present article.

The precise meaning of ἀρχιερεῖς, as we meet it in the Gospels and Josephus, is not easily determined. A common explanation used to be that these 'chief priests' were the heads or presidents of the twenty-four courses into which the Jewish priesthood was divided (1 Ch 24<sup>4</sup>, 2 Ch 8<sup>14</sup>, Lk 1<sup>5-8</sup>; Jos. Ant. vii. xiv. 7), or at least that these heads of the priestly courses were included under the term (see, e.g., the Lexicons of Cremer and Grimm-Thayer, s.v. ἀρχιερεῖς; Alford on Mt 2<sup>4</sup>). It is true that some support for this view may be found in the expressions 'all the chief (RV 'chiefs') of the priests' (2 Ch 36<sup>14</sup>, Neh 12<sup>7</sup>), 'the chief priests' (RV 'the chiefs of the priests,' Ezr 10<sup>3</sup>). But it is noticeable, as Schürer pointed out ('Die ἀρχιερεῖς im NT' in SK for 1872), that in the LXX the word ἀρχιερεῖς is never used of the heads of the priestly courses, and that the nearest approximations to this term are such phrases as ἀρχιερεῖς τῶν πατριῶν τῶν λεβίων (1 Ch 24<sup>9</sup>), ἀρχιερεῖς τῶν λεβίων (Neh 12<sup>7</sup>). And most scholars now take the view that the ἀρχιερεῖς were high priests rather than 'chief priests,' not leading representatives from the general body of the priesthood, but members of an exclusive high priestly caste.*

As applied to this high priestly class, the word ἀρχιερεῖς would seem to denote primarily the official high priest together with a group of ex-high priests. For by NT times the high priestly office had sunk far from its former greatness. It was no longer hereditary, and no longer held for life. Both Herod and the Roman legates deposed and set up high priests at their pleasure (Jos. Ant. xx. x. 1), as the Seleucidae appear to have done at an earlier period (2 Mac 4<sup>34</sup>; Jos. Ant. xii. v. 1). Thus there were usually several ex-high priests alive at the same time, and these men, though deprived of office, still retained the title of ἀρχιερεῖς and still exercised considerable power in the Jewish State (cf. Jos. Vita, 38, BJ II. xii. 6, IV. iii. 7, 9, 10, IV. iv. 3). In the notable case of Annas, we even have an ex-high priest whose influence was plainly greater than that of the ἀρχιερεῖς proper (cf. Lk 3<sup>2</sup>, Jn 18<sup>23, 24</sup>, Ac 4<sup>5</sup>).

But Schürer further maintains that, in addition to the ex-high priests, the title was applied to the members of those families from which the high priests were usually chosen—the γένος ἀρχιερατικόν of Ac 4<sup>7</sup>. It appears from a statement of Josephus that the dignity of the high priesthood was confined to a few select families (BJ IV. iii. 6); and that this was really the case becomes clear upon an examination of the list which Schürer has compiled, from the various references given by the Jewish historian, of the twenty-eight holders of the office during the Romano-Herodian period (HJP II. i. 196 ff., 204). Above all, in one passage (BJ VI. ii. 2) Josephus, after distinguishing the εἰδὸς τῶν ἀρχιερέων from the ἀρχιερεῖς themselves, apparently combines both classes under the general designation of ἀρχιερεῖς. Schürer accordingly comes to the conclusion, which has been widely adopted, that the ἀρχιερεῖς of the NT and Josephus 'consist, in the first instance, of the high priests properly so called, i.e. the one actually in office and those who had previously been so, and then of the members of those privileged families from which the high priests were taken' (op. cit., p. 206). These, then, were in all probability the 'chief priests' of the EV. They belonged to the party of the Sadducees (Ac 5<sup>17</sup>; Jos. Ant. xx. ix. 1), and were, formally at least, the leading personages in the Sanhedrin.†

But in NT times their influence, even in the Sanhedrin, was inferior to that of the scribes and Pharisees, who commanded the popular sympathies as the high priestly party did not (Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 6, XVIII. i. 4; cf. Ac 5<sup>34</sup>, 23<sup>8</sup>).

J. C. LAMBERT.

CHILDHOOD.—I. THE CHILDHOOD OF JESUS.—In the Lukan narratives of the Infancy and Childhood our Lord is described both as τὸ παιδίον Ἰησοῦς

in His earliest years (Lk 2<sup>40</sup>; so also in Mt 2 throughout), and as Ἰησοῦς ἑτάς when twelve years old. Beyond, however, the brief stories of Mt 2 and Lk 2 we seek in vain for any information having any authority whatever concerning the early years of Jesus, or, for that matter, any part of His life prior to the Ministry. And what small fragments these beautiful stories are! This dearth of information for which so great a craving has been felt has repeatedly been remarked on: yet, after all, need we wonder very much at the silence of the Evangelical narratives concerning these matters? The early life of Jesus appears not to have come within their scope; for the purpose of the Evangelical compilation was not to furnish a 'Life' in the modern sense, but to set forth a gospel. Their interest in Jesus in this respect begins pre-eminently with His baptism, as the simple exordium of St. Mark's Gospel indicates.—The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Even in the case of St. Luke's Gospel, with its peculiar stock of early narratives in chs. 1, 2, the preface to the Acts indicates that its great concern was with the things that Jesus did and taught (Ac 1<sup>3</sup>). Whatever may be our views as to the source and authority of what is recorded in Mt 1, 2, and whether we care to use the term 'envelope' (see Bacon, Introd., p. 198) or not in speaking of this portion of the Gospel, it is clear that these two chapters are something superadded to the main body of the Synoptic tradition; and it is the same with Lk 1, 2. The main narrative begins in the case of each of these Gospels at ch. 3, where parallels with St. Mark also begin to be furnished.

All that we have in the Canonical Gospels concerning the childhood of Jesus, strictly speaking, is found in Lk 2<sup>40-52</sup>. The first twelve years are covered by v. 40, whilst v. 52 has to suffice for all the remaining years up to the commencement of the Ministry. The writer has nothing to tell save the story of the Visit to the Temple, and contents himself for the rest with simple general statements in Hebraic phraseology that irresistibly reminds us of what is said of 'the child Samuel' (1 S 2<sup>11, 20</sup>). He has used practically the same formula to cover years of John the Baptist's history (1<sup>8</sup>). As for the story of the Visit to the Temple, there is that about it which carries conviction that we have here a genuine and delightful glimpse of our Lord in His childhood—one only glimpse, which, however, suffices to show us what manner of child He was, on the principle of ex uno disco omnes. It is to be noted that there is no hint that He was regarded as a prodigy by His parents and the neighbours with whom He travelled up to Jerusalem. The element of the merely marvellous is at a minimum. The wonder that does show itself is in the region of the spirit, and appears in the beautiful intelligence and rare spiritual gleams (vv. 47-50) which the Boy displayed, astonishing alike to the Rabbis and to His bewildered parents.

The silence and restraint of the Canonical Gospels on this subject are best appreciated when viewed against the background which the Apocryphal Gospels supply. Perhaps the most valuable service that the latter writings render is that comparison with them so strongly brings out the intrinsic value and superiority of our Canonical Gospels. They show us conclusively what men with a free hand could and would do. This is conspicuously the case with reference to the early years of Jesus. The extravagant and miraculous stories told concerning His infancy and childhood, taken by themselves, would suffice to crush out the historicity of Jesus and consign Him to the region of the mythical. We seek in vain in these writings for anything like a sober account of our Lord's growth and general history during this period: we find nothing but a congeries of grotesque wonder-tales concerning the doings of the Boy. His miraculous powers prove to be of singular advantage to Joseph, for when a beam or plank has been cut too short Jesus rectifies the mistake by merely pulling it out to the required length. He changes boys into kids, and anon restores them to their former condition. He carries both fire and water quite easily in His cloak. When playing with other boys and making figures of various beasts and birds, Jesus makes those He had formed walk and fly, and eat and drink. Wonderful works of healing are also ascribed to the Child; and some of them take strange forms, in curious contrast to the stories of the works of Jesus found in our Gospels. E.g. Simon the Cananean as a boy is nigh to death through having been bitten by a serpent. Jesus makes the serpent itself come and suck out all the poison from the wound; then He curses it, and immediately the creature bursts asunder. The cure of demoniacs, of lepers, of the blind and maimed and sick, and the raising of the dead, are all ascribed to the Child Jesus, and always with more or less grotesqueness of circumstance. Strangest thing of all, a whole series of vindictive and destructive miracles are given which offer the most flagrant contrast to all that we know of our Lord, and which, if true, would have made Him a veritable terror to all with whom He came into contact. Boys who thwart Him in play are immediately struck dead; others who take action against Him are blinded. It is true the mischief is usually repaired by Him in response to earnest entreaty; but the vengeful malevolence is conspicuous throughout. In the stories, again, relating to His early education, Jesus is represented as being an enfant terrible to more than one master to whom He was sent to learn His letters. But a comparison of the story of the Visit to the Temple, as told in the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy and other such writings, with the narrative as we have it in Lk 2, serves as well as possible to show the untrustworthy character of the Apocryphal Gospels, whatever curious interest may attach to them. For the simple and natural statement of St. Luke, that 'all that heard Him were amazed at His understanding and His answers,' we find Him represented as not only getting the upper hand of the great Rabbis in relation to the knowledge of the Torah, but as giving profound instruction to philosophers in astronomy, natural science, and medicine, explaining to them 'physics and metaphysics, hyperphysics and hypophysics,' and many other things.

* In accordance with this view, Dr. Moffatt, in his Historical New Testament, renders ἀρχιερεῖς 'high priests,' a plan which has also been adopted by the editor of The Corrected English New Testament (1905).
† When ἀρχιερεῖς are mentioned in the NT along with γραμματεῖς and φarisαιοί, they almost invariably occupy the first place.
‡ For the Greek terms relating to the period of childhood, see following article.

The Apocryphal writings which, in particular, abound in these tales of the childhood of Jesus, are the Gospel of pseudo-Matthew, the Protogospelium of James, the Arabic Gospel of the Infancy, and the Gospel of Thomas in its various forms. The Thomas Gospel is mainly answerable for the stories of vindictive miracles referred to above. The Syriac form of this Gospel is entitled in the MS (6th cent.) the 'Boyhood of Our Lord Jesus.'

With every allowance for whatever scanty touches of beauty and elements of value may here and there be found, a survey of this Apocryphal literature gives fresh force to Edersheim's remark (Jesus the Messiah, bk. II, ch. 10): 'We dread gathering around our thoughts of Him the artificial flowers of legend.' In default, however, of authentic records there remains one expedient for meeting the deep silence of our Gospels which modern writers who essay the construction of a 'Life of Christ' are full ready to make use of. All available knowledge regarding the times in which our Lord lived, the surroundings and conditions in which He grew up, and the manner in which Jewish boys were educated (see artt. BOYHOOD and EDUCATION), can be employed to help us to form a sober and reverent conception of Him in the days of His childhood. Perhaps, indeed, such matters in their general treatment enter into some Lives of Christ even to prolixity. It is a true instinct, however, which bids us set aside early and mediaeval legends, with all their naïveté, and frame a conception of Him as living the life of a normal Jewish boy of His own time and station, distinguished only by a rare personal charm of goodness and grace. The unfolding of a human life in growing beauty and nobility of character more truly proclaims 'God with us' than could such miraculous accompaniments as would tend to make the Child an object of mingled wonder and fear. Painters who have represented the Holy Child in simple human grace, without the encircling nimbus, have not on that account fallen behind others in suggesting His true Divinity.

'He came to Nazareth, where He had been brought up' (Lk 4<sup>16</sup>)—how much that phrase covers! The great factors entering into His education were home training, the synagogue both as a place of worship and as a school, the many-coloured life of the district in which He spent His youth, the natural features of the locality, and all the scenery round about Nazareth, so full of beauty and stirring historical associations. Later on, after He had attained 'years of discretion,' in our phrase, becoming a bar-mitsvâh (i.e. a son of commandment—one responsible for compliance with legal requirements as the Jews express it, His repeated visits to Jerusalem to attend the feasts would also count for much. If we are to understand the visit mentioned in Lk 2 to be the first that Jesus paid to Jerusalem (though the narrative does not explicitly say it was), we may take it that at the age of twelve (Lk 2<sup>41</sup>) He was regarded as having reached that important stage in a boy's life, although the usual age for such recognition was somewhat later.

Jesus belonged to a people unsurpassed for the care bestowed upon the education of children. His earliest teacher would be His mother; and we cannot doubt that of all Jewish mothers none could excel Mary ('blessed among women') in all such work. Among other things He would probably learn from her the Shema (Dt 6<sup>4</sup>)—that sacred formula which attends the devout Jew from his earliest years to his latest moment. This is quite consistent with the fact that education was one of the things for which the father was held responsible as regards his son. At an early age Jesus would be sent to school at the synagogue, there to be taught by the hazzan, or schoolmaster, to read and recite the Jewish Scriptures. The instruction given did not go beyond this, with writing and possibly a little arithmetic as additional and subordinate subjects. It was in a supreme degree a religious education, designed to fit children for the practical duties of life. The education of Jesus was just that of the great mass of the people: unlike Saul of Tarsus, no beth ha-Midrâsh, or college of Scribes, received Him as a student ('Whence hath this man these things?' Mk 6<sup>2</sup>; cf. Jn 7<sup>19</sup>). As a schoolboy, too, Jesus would have His recreations. School hours were not excessive, amounting to no more than four or five hours a day. Truly Jewish games, however, were but few. They had little or nothing corresponding to our school sports; and the cult of athletics was looked upon as something alien. Little children, like those of other times and races, found amusement in playing at doing as grown-up people did; and the words of our Lord in Mt 11<sup>16-17</sup> very likely contain not merely the result of His observation, but a memory of His own childhood. For the rest, as a boy He would find abundant means of recreation in rambling round about Nazareth amidst the sights and sounds of nature. The open-air atmosphere of His preaching, with its abundant allusions to the life of the field and to the varied aspects of nature, betokens an early-formed and loving familiarity.

On His visit to Nazareth, described in Lk 4, 'He entered, as His custom was, into the synagogue on the Sabbath day' (v. 16), and that custom, we may be sure, was a growth from His earliest years. Children, in those days, were admitted to religious celebrations in the Temple at an early age. A boy's religious life was considered to begin at the age of four. Both boys and girls accompanied their mothers to the synagogue when very young. And Sabbath by Sabbath, throughout His early peaceful years, Jesus was found in the synagogue with His mother Mary; and a benediction and a joy it must have been to all the frequenters of that synagogue at Nazareth to look upon the fair, winsome, earnest face of the Child. When we read, as we do, of boys playing in the synagogue during worship and causing annoyance to their elders, it interests us to recognize the counterpart of a familiar experience in modern times; but without taking anything from the naturalness of our Lord's boyhood, it is impossible to think of Him in any such association. We can only think of Him as showing forth a spirit of wondrous grace, a growing responsiveness towards the prayers and praises, becoming more and more familiar and dear, a deepening love of the noble words in which He heard the laws, the hopes and the faith of Israel set forth. The whole unfolding of His life in all the religious discipline and education of the home, the synagogue and the whole round of the Jewish year of feasts and fasts, must have been beautiful to those to whose care He was entrusted. When a boy became bar-mizvah, there was a lightening of the paternal responsibility regarding him, and a sense of relief surely found expression in the benediction pronounced by the father on that occasion—'Blessed be He for having freed me from this punishment.' There could have been no room for such an utterance when Jesus left His mother's side, henceforth to take His place among the men in the congregation.

Our most profitable reflections on the childhood of our Lord, however, are best summarized in the saying of Irenaeus, to the effect that, in completely participating in the conditions of human life, He became a child for the sake of children, and by His own experience of childhood He has sanctified it (adv. Haer. II. xxii. 4).

ii. CHILDHOOD IN THE TEACHING OF JESUS.—It was only to be expected that Jesus would exhibit an unquestionable love for children; and it is in complete accord with the whole tenor of His teaching that He should specially emphasize the importance and value of the child. The well-known words of Juvenal, 'Maxima debetur puero reverentia' (Sat. xiv. 47), gain their profoundest significance when the attitude assumed by our Lord towards children is considered. The story of Jairus' daughter (τὸ θυγάτριον αὐτοῦ is the father's appealing expression in Mk 5<sup>34</sup>) suggests a special tenderness in Jesus towards children for whom His healing was sought; He could not resist such an appeal as, 'Sir, come down ere my child (τὸ παιδίον μου) die' (Jn 4<sup>5</sup>); and it was anything but indifference to the woes of a little heathen girl (θυγάτριον, Mk 7<sup>24</sup>) which made Him apparently reluctant to yield to the entreaties of the Syrophenician woman. Such cases, we may be sure, are only representative of many more. And that our Lord Himself had a singular attraction for children admits of no doubt. His triumphal Entry into Jerusalem and the Temple cannot have been the only time when He had child-friends to greet and attend Him (Mt 21<sup>15</sup>). It was no new thing for parents to seek a Rabbi's blessing for their children, but it was a unique charm in Jesus which led mothers—surely mothers were at least among 'those that brought them'—to desire His blessing for their little ones (Mk 10<sup>13-16</sup> and parallels). St. Mark's special touch in describing how He welcomed them (εὐχαιροῦσάς τας) is entirely true to the spirit of the Master. His benediction was as remote from the perfunctory as it could be.

The teaching of Jesus concerning children and childhood gathers round two occasions—when He blessed the little ones (as above), and when He rebuked the ambition of the disciples.—see Mk 9<sup>33-37</sup>, Lk 9<sup>47-48</sup>, and Mt 18<sup>1-4</sup>, with notable amplifications.

(a) In the former instance the untimely interposition of the disciples leads to the saying, 'Of such is the kingdom of God.' In Mark and Luke this is followed by a further solemn saying—'Whoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall in no wise enter therein.' Though Matthew lacks this in this connexion, he has a corresponding utterance in 18<sup>3-4</sup>. Wendt (Lehre Jesus, Eng. tr. ii. pp. 49, 50) considers that all the stress of these words lies on the receptivity demanded by Jesus on the part of those who would enter the kingdom. 'Not the reception of the kingdom of God at a childlike age (sic), but in a childlike character, He declares to be the indispensable condition of entering the kingdom of God; and under this childlike character He does not understand any virtue of childlike blamelessness, but only the receptivity itself. . . . And no doubt in the second of these sayings the manner in which men are to receive the kingdom is set forth with emphasis. Those who find themselves for one reason and another outside the kingdom, can obtain admission thereto only when the offer of its gracious blessings is received, not with 'blamelessness' indeed (which is out of the question here), but, with the simple trust, the unpretentiousness, the earnest desire and the reality which are characteristic of a child. But there is something more than this in the words of Jesus. The first saying has hardly its due weight given to it if we stop here. 'Of such is the kingdom of God.' The kingdom belongs to such. And we cannot accept 'the childlike' as the complete equivalent of 'such.' Wendt, it is true, acknowledges children to be 'susceptible subjects for the preaching of the kingdom of God' (as above, p. 50); but are we to understand that they are to be invited to receive it as having been outside from the first? We verge here on controversies that have loomed large on the troubled way of the diversified development of Christian thought and opinion. But the saying of Jesus, as it stands, surely implies that the kingdom comprises not only the childlike, but little children qua children as well. They are its inheritors. They may forfeit its blessings subsequently by their own act, or others may be specially responsible for their failing to retain their inheritance (Mt 18<sup>3</sup>); but that is another matter. As Bengel says (on Mt 19<sup>14</sup>), 'ταῦτ' οὐκ ἐστὶν ἁπλῶς ἡ ἀποδοχὴ τῆς βασιλείας, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἡ ἀποδοχὴ τῆς ἀποδοχῆς.' And the relation of our Lord to humanity at large makes this but the natural interpretation of His words. 'If they who are like little children belong to the kingdom of heaven, why should we for a moment doubt that the little children themselves belong to the kingdom?' So Morison, who is altogether admirable on this point (see especially Conn. on Mt 19<sup>14</sup>).

(b) The way in which Jesus dealt with the disciples' dispute concerning precedence (Mk 9<sup>33-37</sup> and parallels) further brings out the qualities of childhood which were most precious in His eyes, and the value and importance He attached to little children themselves. The little one He called to Him and so lovingly embraced (St. Mark's special touch again), was held up to the disciples as an example and guide to greatness. To be great in the kingdom of heaven (Mt 18<sup>4</sup>) it was necessary to have a spirit of simplicity and humility such as was seen in the child in whom self-regard and self-seeking had as yet no place. It is one of our Lord's great paradoxes. To be childlike is to be truly great. The same truth is emphasized in a saying which in varying form is found twice over in each of the Synoptics—the man who wishes to be first shall be last; the man willing to be least shall be great. We here learn further how Jesus regards little children as in a real sense belonging to Him. To receive a little child as belonging to Him, bestowing loving care upon it, is a high service rendered to Him and to God by whom He was sent. In Mt 10<sup>42</sup> the importance attached to such service is strikingly expressed in the progressive series in which Jesus promises a reward to those who thus receive His messengers—a prophet, a good man, 'one of these little ones.' It is most natural to understand that in using such an expression as the last our Lord actually referred to some children who were hard by when He was speaking. And as here, so in the more extended sayings in Mt 18, whatever the reference to children and lowly-minded disciples in general, the words of Jesus must apply to children themselves. The terrible warning of Mt 18<sup>6</sup> applies to those who hinder such little ones in relation to the kingdom. Though it is not expressly so stated, what is said about receiving children suggests that such a wrong done to any child is as a wrong done to Christ Himself. The preciousness of a little child in the sight of 'our Father in heaven' is emphatically asserted by Jesus in Mt 18<sup>10-14</sup>. The children's angels, He says, are ever in the presence of God (v. 10). Whether this remarkable saying be understood as referring to guardian angels or to representative angels (in some way corresponding to the Zoroastrian fravashis or 'spiritual counterparts'—see art. by Dr. J. H. Moulton in Journal of Theol. Studies, July 1902), it clearly declares that no little one is an object of indifference with God, no wrong inflicted upon a child can escape His notice. The closing saying of this group (vv. 12-14) embodies the illustration of the one stray sheep, found in another connexion in Lk 15, and teaches that, whatever ruin may befall 'one of these little ones,' it is not a matter of the Divine pleasure and ordination that even one such should be 'cast as rubbish to the void.' See also art. CHILDREN, which is written from a different standpoint.

CHILDREN.—In the regeneration of society which has been wrought by the forces brought into the world by Christianity, the family, of course, has had its part. Or rather, since to Jesus also the family was the social unit, this regeneration began with the family and spread outwards from it. The emphasis laid by our Lord on the institution of the family deserves even to be called extraordinary. Not only did He habitually exhibit sympathy with domestic life in all its phases, and particularly reverence for women and tenderness for children; and not only did He adopt the vocabulary of the family to express the relations subsisting between Himself and His followers, and even as His choicest vehicle for conveying to them a vitalizing conception of their relations to God, 'from whom,' as that one of His servants who best represents His teaching in this aspect of it declares, 'every family in heaven and on earth is named' (Eph 3<sup>2</sup>); but, deserting His customary reserve in dealing with social institutions, in the case of this one alone did He advance beyond general principles to specific legislation. (Cf. F. G. Peabody, Jesus Christ and the Social Question, p. 145 ff.)

This specific legislation does not directly concern children. It is true that childhood owes as much to the gospel as womanhood itself (cf. e.g. Uhlhorn, Conflict of Christianity with Heathenism, p. 182). And the causes of the great revolution which was wrought by the gospel in the condition of children and the estimate placed on childhood, are undoubtedly rooted in the life and teaching of our Lord, and are spread on the pages of the Gospels. But we shall search in vain in the recorded teaching of Jesus for either direct legislation, or even enunciation of general principles regulating the relations of parents and children, or establishing the position of children in the social organism. He has left us no commandments, no declarations, not even exhortations on the subject. He simply moves onward in His course, touching in life, act, word on the domestic relations that were prevalent about Him, and elevating and glorifying everything that He touched. Thus He has handed down to us a new ideal of the family, and lifted to a new plane our whole conception of childhood. (Cf. Shailer Mathews, The Social Teaching of Jesus, p. 101 ff.)

The domestic economy which forms the background of Jesus' life, and is assumed in all His dealings with children and in all His allusions to them and their ways, is, of course, the wholesome home-life which had grown up in Israel under the moulding influence of the revelation of the Old Covenant. Its basis was the passionately affectionate Semitic nature, and no doubt certain modifications had come to it from contact with other civilizations; but its form was determined by the tutelage which Jehovah had granted His people. (Cf. Edersheim, Sketches of Jewish Social Life in the Days of Christ, chs. vi.-ix., and The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, bk. II, chs. ix. and x.; also Hastings' DB, articles 'Child,' 'Family.' For later Jewish child-life see Schechter, Studies in Judaism, xii.; and, above all, L. Löw, Die Lebensalter. Cf. also Ploss, Das Kind in Brauch und Sitte der Völker.)

The tender love which the Hebrew parent bore to his child, and the absorbing interest with which he watched and guided its development, doubtless find partial expression in the multiplicity of designations by which the several stages of childhood are marked in that pictorial language. Besides the general terms for 'son' (ben) and 'daughter' (bat), eight of these have been noted tracing the child from its birth to its maturity: yeled (em. yaldāh), the 'birthling'; yônâh, the 'suckling'; 'ôlâ, the suckling of a larger growth, perhaps the 'worrer'; gâmil, the 'weanling'; yaqûh, the 'todder'; 'elem, the 'fat one'; na'ar, the 'free one'; bâbôr, the 'ripe one.' (So Hamburger, RE i. 642, after whom Edersheim, Opp. crit. p. 103 f. and i. p. 221, note 3.)

This series of designations may, of course, be more than matched out of the richness of Greek speech. Here the general term of relation, 'child' (**τεῖνον*, dimin. **τενίον*), parts into the more specific 'son' (**υἱός*, dimin. υἱάκιον, υἱόν) and 'daughter' (**θυγάτηρ*, dimin. **θυγατήριον*); while the multitude of terms describing stages of growth quite baffles discrimination. The grammarians have handed down to us such his several list, among which that of Alexion (Etym. 1788, 22), for instance, enumerates ten stages between the newborn infant and the mature young man: **σπίρος*; **παιδίον*; **παιδάριον*; **παιδίον*; **παιδὶν*; **παιδὶν*; **παιδὶν*; **παιδὶν*; **παιδὶν*; **παιδὶν*. Needless to say, the sequences of such lists cannot be taken too strictly. And equally needless to say, they by no means exhaust the synonymy.

Alexion's list, for example, does not contain even all the terms of this class that occur in the Gospel narratives. The series afforded by them would run something like this: βρέφος, νήπιος, βολβύλιον, παιδίον, παιδάριον, παῖς, νεανίσκος, to which would need to be added the distinctively feminine βουβύλιον, κωκυλλίον (μαθήσκου), παθήσκου.

It is not difficult to recognize the general distinctions between these terms. (For the detailed synonymy see especially Schmidt, D. Synonymik d. griech. Sprache, c. 60, for the terms belonging distinctively to childhood; c. 162 for those describing the stages between childhood and maturity; and c. 47 for some terms denoting youthfulness; cf. Thayer, Lex. NT, s.v. παις.) Τρέφω (with its diminutive τρέφω, Jn 13<sup>35</sup> only) is, like αἰε and βουβύλιον, used in the Gospels only of relationship, literal or figurative, never of age (for the synonymy of τρέφω, αἰε, and παις, see an interesting discussion by Hübner in Luthardt's ZfW, 1882, p. 57 ff., and cf. Gremer and Thayer, s.v.). For the rest, βρέφος is here, as in post-Homeric Greek in general, distinctively the 'newborn baby' (I P 22), the 'child in the arms' (in Homer it is the unborn child, the embryo, as also often in later Greek, e.g. Lk 14: 49); and νήπιος and βολβύλιον (the NT substitute for βουβύλιον, βουβύλιον) range with it as descriptive of early infancy. Παιδίον is equally distinctively the 'little child,' although its application is somewhat broad; now it is entirely synonymous with βρέφος (Lk 19: 9 etc., Mt 23 etc., Lk 18: 15), and again it designates a little maiden of twelve years of age (Mk 54: 42). Its companion diminutive παιδάριον is ordinarily employed of a somewhat older 'lad,' and may very well be so used in the only passage where it occurs in the Gospels (Jn 6). The simple παῖς has a range sufficiently wide to cover all these stages, from infancy itself (e.g. Mt 21: 16) to youthful maturity (Hippocrates says up to the age of 21). It designates, says Schmidt (p. 429), 'the child of all ages up to complete young manhood; νεανίσκος, the child up to his first school years; παιδίον, exclusively the little child.' Νεανίσκος is the appropriate designation of every stage of youthful maturity from so early an age that νεανίσκος or παις might be interchanged with it up to so late a period—about 40—that it is on the point of giving way to old age. Of the distinctively feminine terms that occur in the Gospels, μαθήσκου is a term of condition rather than of age, and occurs only in connexion with Mary (Mt 12: 46, Lk 12) and in the parable of the Ten Virgins (Mt 25: 7-11), and κωκυλλίον is employed only in the secondary sense of 'maid-servant' (Mt 26: 69 and parallels, Lk 12: 56). The diminutive βουβύλιον and μαθήσκου, though capable of employment with quite a wide range, yet naturally imply tenderness of years where tenderness of affection is not obviously conveyed by them (e.g. Mk 7: 25, Mt 26: 1). Thus it appears that in the narratives of the Gospels there is brought into contact with our Lord every stage of childhood and youth from the cradle to maturity—the baby on its mother's bosom (Lk 12: 51), the little child, boy (Mk 9: 24) and girl (Mk 7: 25) alike, children of a larger growth (Jn 4: 27, Lk 8: 53), and the maturing youth (Lk 7: 14, Mt 19: 20).

What Jesus did for children, we may perhaps sum up as follows. He illustrated the ideal of childhood in His own life as a child. He manifested the tenderness of His affection for children by conferring blessings upon them in every stage of their development as He was occasionally brought into contact with them. He asserted for children a recognized place in His kingdom, and dealt faithfully and lovingly with each age as it presented itself to Him in the course of His work. He chose the condition of childhood as a type of the fundamental character of the recipients of the kingdom of God. He adopted the relation of childhood as the most vivid earthly image of the relation of God's people to Him who was not ashamed to be called their Father which is in heaven, and thus reflected back upon this relation a glory by which it has been transfigured ever since. The history of the ideal childhood which Jesus Himself lived on the earth is set down for us in the opening chapters of Matthew and Luke, especially of Luke, whose distinction among the Evangelists is that he has given us a narrative founded on an investigation which traced the course of all things accurately from the first' (Lk 1<sup>1</sup>). Accordingly, not only does he with careful exactitude record the performance by our Lord's parents in His behalf, during His infancy, of 'all things that were according to the law of the Lord' (Lk 2<sup>2</sup>), but he marks for us the stages of our Lord's growth in His progress to man's estate, and thus brings Him before us successively as 'baby' (2<sup>12</sup> βρέφος), 'child' (2<sup>40</sup> παιδίον), and 'boy' (2<sup>42</sup> παῖς), until in His glorious young-manhood, when He was about 30 years of age, He at last manifested Himself to Israel (3<sup>2</sup>). The second chapter of Luke is thus in effect an express history of the development of Jesus; and sums up in two comprehensive verses His entire growth from childhood to boyhood and from boyhood to manhood (2<sup>52-53</sup>). The language of these succinct descriptions is charged with suggestions that this was an extraordinary child, whose development was an extraordinary development. Attention is called alike to His physical, intellectual, and spiritual progress; and of each it is suggested that He was constant, rapid, and remarkable. Those who looked upon Him in the cradle would perceive that even beyond the infant Moses (Heb. 11<sup>22</sup>) this was 'a goodly child'; and day by day as He grew and waxed strong, He became more and more filled not only with knowledge but with wisdom, and not only with wisdom but with grace, and so steadily advanced 'not alone in power and knowledge, but by year and hour in reverence and in charity.' Man and God alike looked upon His growing powers and developing character with ever increasing favour. The promise of the goodly child passed without jar or break into the fruition of the perfect man; and those who gazed on the babe with admiration (2<sup>34-35, 38</sup>), could not but gaze on the boy with astonishment (2<sup>47</sup>) and on the man with reverence.

It is therefore no ordinary human development which is here described for us. But it is none the less, or rather it is all the more, a normal human development, the only strictly normal human development the world has ever seen. This is the only child who has ever been born into the world without the fatal entail of sin, and the only child who has ever grown to manhood free from the deterioration of sin. This is how men ought to grow up; how, were they not sinners, men would grow up. It is a great thing for the world to have seen one such instance. As an example it is indeed set beyond our reach. As the ideal childhood realized in life, it has ever since stood before the world as an incitement and inspiration of quite incalculable power. In this perfect development of Jesus there has been given to the world a model for every age, whose allurement has revolutionized life. He did not, as Irenæus (adv. Hær. ii. xxiii. 4, cf. iii. xviii. 4) reminds us, despise or evade the humanity He had assumed; or set aside in His own person the law that governs it; on the contrary, He sanctified every age in turn by Himself living His perfect life in its conditions. 'He came to save all by means of Himself,' continues Irenæus, 'all, I say, who through Him are born again unto God,—infants and children, and boys, and youths.'

He therefore passed through every age, becoming an infant for infants, thus sanctifying infants; a child for children, thus sanctifying those who are of this age, being at the same time made to them an example of piety, righteousness, and submission; a youth for youths, becoming an example to youths, and thus sanctifying them for the Lord.' . . . On the few details given us of the childhood of our Lord see artt. BOYHOOD OF JESUS and CHILDHOOD.

During the course of His life begun with this ideal childhood, Jesus came into contact with every stage of youthful development, and manifested the tenderness of His feeling for each and His power and willingness to confer blessings upon all. A lurid light is thrown upon the nature of the world and the character of the times into which He was born by the slaughter of the Innocents, which marked His advent (Mt 21: 16-17). But one function which the record of this incident performs is to serve as a black background upon which His own beneficence to childhood may be thrown up. Mothers instinctively brought their babies to Him for benediction; and when they did so, He was not content until He had taken them in His arms (Mk 10<sup>14</sup>, cf. 9<sup>35</sup>). His allusions to children in His teaching reflect the closeness of His observation of them. He celebrates the delight of the mother in her baby, obliterating even the pangs of birth (Jn 16<sup>21</sup>); the fostering love of the father who cuddles his children up with him in bed (Lk 11<sup>7</sup>); the parental affection which listens eagerly to the child's every request, and knows how to grant it only things that are good (Mt 7<sup>9</sup>, Lk 11<sup>11-13</sup>). He notes the wayward impulses of children at play (Mt 11<sup>16</sup>, Lk 7<sup>32</sup>). He feels the weight of woe that is added to calamities in which the children also are involved (Mt 18<sup>22</sup>); and places among the supremest tests of loyalty to Him, the preference of Him even to one's children (Mt 19<sup>29</sup>, Lk 14<sup>26</sup> 18<sup>29</sup>; cf. Mk 10<sup>29</sup>).

A number of His miracles, worked for the benefit of the young, illustrate His compassion for their sufferings and ills. The nobleman's son at Capernaum, whose healing Jesus wrought as a second sign when He came out of Judaea into Galilee (Jn 4<sup>46-48</sup>), was at least a 'child' (παις, 4<sup>50</sup>), for so the servants call him in cold sobriety; and probably was a 'little child' (4<sup>49</sup>), although it is, of course, possible that on the lips of the father the diminutive expresses tenderness of affection rather than of age. The possessed 'boy' (παις, Mt 17<sup>15</sup>, Lk 9<sup>42</sup>)—the only son of his father (Lk 9<sup>38</sup>)—whom Jesus healed as He came down from the Mount of Transfiguration (Mt 17<sup>14</sup>, Mk 9<sup>17</sup>, Lk 9<sup>37</sup>), and whose affliction had dated from his earliest infancy (ἐκ παιθόθεν, Mk 9<sup>21</sup>), was more certainly distinctively a 'little child' (Mk 9<sup>24</sup>). Jairus' 'little daughter' (θυγάτριον, Mk 5<sup>22</sup>)—also an only one—whom Jesus raised from the dead in such dramatic circumstances (Mt 9<sup>23-25</sup>, Mk 5<sup>22-24</sup>, Lk 8<sup>49-56</sup>), and who is spoken of in the narratives indifferently as 'child' (παις, Lk 8<sup>51-54</sup>), 'little child' (παιδίον, Mk 5<sup>36, 40, 41</sup>) and 'maiden' or 'girl' (κορδαίον, Mt 9<sup>24, 25</sup>, Mk 5<sup>41</sup>; παρθένη, Mk 5<sup>41</sup>), we know to have been about twelve years old (Lk 8<sup>42</sup>). We are not told the exact age of the 'little daughter' (θυγάτριον, Mk 7<sup>25</sup>)—here probably the word is the diminutive of age, not of affection, as it occurs in the narrative, not the conversation) of the Syrochonan woman; but we note that St. Mark calls her also distinctively a 'little child' (παιδίον, 7<sup>30</sup>). The only son of the widow of Nain (Lk 7<sup>11-15</sup>), the desolate state of whose bereft mother roused so deeply the pity of our Lord (7<sup>13</sup>), is addressed indeed as a 'young man' (νεανίσκος, 7<sup>14</sup>), a term so broad that it need imply no more than that he was in his prime; but the suggestion of the narrative certainly seems to be that he was in his youthful prime (7<sup>12</sup>). Thus is rounded out a series of miracles in which our Lord shows His pity to the growing youth of every stage of development.

When on that great day on the shores of Genesareth Jesus appeared to His disciples and gave to His repentant Apostle His last exhortation, He commanded him not merely 'Feed my sheep,' but also 'Feed my lambs.' Though the language, doubtless, rather expresses His love for His flock than distributes it into constituent classes, we may be permitted to see in it also the richness of our Lord's sympathy for the literal lambs of His fold. Certainly He provided in His kingdom a place for every age, and met the spiritual needs of each. Touching illustrations of this are offered us at the two end stages of youthful development (Lk 18<sup>15</sup> βρέφος; Mt 19<sup>13</sup> νεανίσκος), in the blessing of little children and the probing of the rich young ruler's heart, which are brought into immediate contiguity in all three of the Synoptics as if they were intended to be taken together as a picture of our Lord's dealing with youth as a whole, perhaps even as together illustrating the great truth that in the kingdom of God the question is not of the hour of entrance,—first or eleventh,—but of the will of the Master, who doeth what He will with His own (Mt 20<sup>13</sup>).

What is particularly to be borne in mind with respect to the blessing of the little children (Mt 19<sup>13-15</sup>, Mk 10<sup>13-16</sup>, Lk 18<sup>15-17</sup>), is that these 'little children' (παιδιά, Mt 19<sup>13-14</sup>, Mk 10<sup>13-14</sup>, Lk 18<sup>15</sup>) were distinctively 'babies' (βρέφη, Lk 18<sup>15</sup>). Therefore they needed to be received by Jesus 'in his arms' (Mk 10<sup>16</sup>); and only from this circumstance, indeed, can all the details of the narrative be understood. It is from this, for example, that the interference of the disciples, which called out the Master's rebuke, 'Let the little children come to me; forbid them not,' receives its explanation. The disciples, to speak briefly, had misapprehended the nature of the Lord's mission: they were regarding Him fundamentally as a teacher sent from God, who also healed the afflicted; and they conceived it to be their duty in the overstrain to which He was subjected to protect Him from needless drafts on His time and strength by the intrusion of those needing no healing and incapable of instruction. It seemed to them out of the question that 'even the babies' (Lk 18<sup>15</sup>) should be thrust upon His jaded attention. They should have known better; and Jesus was indignant that they did not know better (Mk 10<sup>14</sup>), and took this occasion to manifest Himself as the Saviour of infants also. Taking them in His arms and distinctly invoking a blessing upon them (Mk 10<sup>16</sup> κατενέγκετε), He not only asserted for them a part in His mission, but even constituted them the type of the children of the kingdom. 'Let the little children come unto me,' He says; 'forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God.' And then proceeding with the solemn 'Verily'—'Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein' (Mk 10<sup>14, 15</sup>, Lk 18<sup>15, 17</sup>; cf. Mt 19<sup>14</sup>).

Wherein this childlikeness, in which alone the kingdom of God can be received, consists, lies on the face of the narrative. Certainly not in the innocence of childhood, as if the purpose were to announce that only the specially innocent can enter the kingdom of God. Our Lord was accustomed to declare, on the contrary, that He came to call not the righteous but sinners, to seek and save that which was lost; and the contradiction with the lesson of the publican and the Pharisee praying in the temple, which immediately precedes this narrative in Luke, would be too glaring. But neither can it consist in the humility of childhood, if, indeed, we can venture to speak of the most egoistic age of human life as characteristically humble; nor yet in its simplicity, its artlessness, ingenuousness, directness, as beautiful as these qualities are, and as highly esteemed as they certainly must be in the kingdom of God. We cannot even suppose it to consist in the trustfulness of childhood, although we assuredly come much nearer to it in this, and no image of the children of the kingdom could be truer than that afforded by the infant lying trustfully upon its mother's breast. But, in truth, it is in no disposition of mind, but rather in a condition of nature, that we must seek the characterizing peculiarity of these infants whom Jesus sets forth as types of the children of the kingdom. Infants of days (βρέφη, Lk 18<sup>15</sup>) have no characteristic disposition of mind; and we must accordingly leave the subjective sphere and find the childlikeness which Jesus presents as the condition of the reception (not acquisition) of the kingdom in an objective state; in a word, in the helplessness, or, if you will, the absolute dependence of infancy. What our Lord would seem to say, therefore, when He declares, 'Of such is the kingdom of God,' is, briefly, that those of whom the kingdom of God is made up are, relatively to it, as helplessly dependent as babies are in their mothers' arms. The children of the kingdom enter it as children enter the world, stripped and naked,—infants, for whom all must be done, not who are capable of doing.

There was another occasion on which even more formally Jesus proclaimed to His disciples childlikeness as the essential characteristic of the children of the kingdom (Mt 18<sup>1-4</sup>, Mk 9<sup>33-37</sup>, Lk 9<sup>47-48</sup>). The disciples had been disputing among themselves who of them should be greatest. Jesus, calling to Him a little child, placed it in their midst and said, 'Verily I say unto you, Except ye turn and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven.' There could not have been uttered a more pointed intimation that the kingdom of heaven is given, not acquired; that men receive it, not deserve it. As children enter the world, so men enter the kingdom, with no contributions in their hands. We are not, indeed, told in this narrative, in express words, that the child thus made the type of the children of God was a newborn baby (βρέφος); it is called only a 'little child' (παιδίον). But its extreme infancy is implied; Jesus took it in His arms (Mk 9<sup>36</sup>) when He presented it to the observation of His disciples; and we must accordingly think of it as a baby in a baby's helplessness and dependence.

We do, to be sure, find in our Lord's further words a requisition of humility (Mt 18<sup>4</sup>). 'Whoever then shall humble himself like this little child, the same is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven.' To become like a little child may certainly involve humility in one who is not a child; and it is very comprehensible that our Lord should therefore tell those whom He was exhorting to approach the kingdom of heaven like little children, that they could do so only by humbling themselves. But this is not the same as declaring humility to be the characteristic virtue of childhood, or as intimating that humility may ground a claim upon the kingdom of heaven. What our Lord seems to tell His followers is that they cannot enter the kingdom He came to found except they turn and become like little children; and that they can become like little children only by humbling themselves; and that therefore when they were quarrelling about their relative greatness, they were far from the disposition which belongs to children of the kingdom. Humility seems to be represented, in a word, not as the characterizing quality of childhood or of childlikeness, but rather as the attitude of heart in which alone we can realize in our consciousness that quality which characterizes childhood. That quality is conceived here also as helplessness, while childlikeness consists in the reproduction in the consciousness of the objective state of utter dependence on God which is the real condition of every sinner.

From the point of view thus revealed in object-lesson and discourse, it was natural for our Lord to speak of His disciples as 'babes.' 'I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth,' He cries on one momentous occasion (Mt 11<sup>25</sup>, Lk 10<sup>21</sup>), 'that thou didst hide these things from the wise and understanding, and didst reveal them unto babes' (παισίν, the implication of which is precisely weakness and neediness). And then He proceeds with a great declaration the very point of which is to contrast His sovereign power with the neediness of those whom He calls to His service. Similarly as the end approached and the children (παιδες) in the temple were greeting Him with hosannas, He met the indignant challenge of the Jews with the words of the Psalmist: 'Yea, did ye never read, Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast ordained praise?' (Mt 21<sup>16</sup>). The meaning is that these childish hosannas were typical of the praises rising from the hearts of those childlike ones from whose helplessness (because they owed much to Him) His true praise should spring.

From the more general view-point of affection our Lord derived the terms by which He expressed His personal relations to His followers, and a large part of the vocabulary of His proclamation of the kingdom of God is drawn from the relationships of the family. His disciples are His 'children' (τέκνα, Mk 10<sup>24</sup>), or with increasing tenderness of expression, His 'little children' (τεκνία, Jn 13<sup>33</sup>), His 'babies' (παιδιά, Jn 21<sup>5</sup>), and perhaps with even more tenderness still, simply His 'little ones' (οἱ μικροί, Mt 10<sup>42</sup> etc., but see art. LITTLE ONES). Similarly the great King, whose kingdom He came to establish, is the Father of His people; and they may therefore be free from all fear, because, naturally, it is the good pleasure of their Father to give the kingdom to them (Lk 12<sup>32</sup>). Every turn of expression is freely employed to carry home to the hearts of His followers the sense of the Fatherly love for them by Him who is their King indeed, but also their Father which is in heaven (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>, 6<sup>9</sup>, 4<sup>6</sup>, 8<sup>9</sup>, 14<sup>15</sup>, 18<sup>6</sup>, 22<sup>7</sup>, 23<sup>11</sup>, 10<sup>20</sup>, 29<sup>13</sup>, 23<sup>35</sup>, Mk 11<sup>33</sup>, Lk 6<sup>35</sup>, 11<sup>13</sup>, 12<sup>30</sup>, 32<sup>2</sup>, Jn 20<sup>17</sup>); and they accordingly His sons (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>, Lk 20<sup>36</sup>), His children (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>, 11<sup>22</sup>), and therefore heirs of His kingdom. In this representation, which finds its most striking expression in such parables as that of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15<sup>11</sup>), it is, to be sure, rather the relationship of father and child that is emphasized than the tenderness of the age of childhood. Neither is it a novelty introduced by our Lord; it finds its root in Old Testament usage. But it is so characteristic of our Lord's teaching that it may fairly be said that the family was to His mind the nearest of human analogues to the order that obtains in the kingdom of God, and the picture which He draws of the relations that exist between God and His people is largely only a 'transfiguration of the family.'

Such an employment of the relationships in the family to figure forth those that exist between God and His people could not fail to react on the conceptions which men formed of the family relationships themselves. By His constant emphasis on the Fatherhood of God, and by His employment of the helplessness of infancy and the dependence of childhood as the most vivid emblems provided by human society to image the dependence of God's people on His loving protection and fostering care, our Lord has thrown a halo over the condition of childhood which has communicated to it an emotional value and a preciousness, in the strictest sense, new in the world. In the ancient world, children, though by their innocence eliciting the sympathy, and by their weakness appealing to the sympathy, of their elders, were thought of chiefly as types of immaturity and unripeness. The Christian world, taught by its Lord, reverences their very helplessness as the emblem of its own condition in the presence of God, and recognizes in their dependence an appeal to its unselfish devotion, that it may be an imitator of God. This salutary respect and consideration for childhood has no doubt been exaggerated at times to something very much like worship of the childlike; and this tendency has been powerfully fostered by the prevalence in sections of Christendom, since the 14th cent., of an actual cult of the infant Saviour (cf. E. Martinego-Carresco in The Contemporary Review, lxxvii. 117, etc.), and the early rise and immense development in the same quarters of a cult of the Madonna, to the tender sentiments underlying which all the resources of the most passionate devotion, the most elevated literature, and the most perfect art have been invoked to give widespread influence (see especially Zuckler, art. Maria die Mutter des Herrn in PEE 3, xii, 309, etc., who gives an extensive classified bibliography. Cf. in general H. E. Scudder, Childhood in Art, also in The Atlantic Monthly, lv. and lvi.). Such exaggerations cannot, however, obscure the main fact that it is only from Jesus that the world has learned properly to appreciate and wholesomely to deal with childhood and all that childhood stands for. Cf. art. CHILDHOOD.

BENJAMIN B. WARFIELD.

CHILDREN OF GOD.—The teaching of Jesus Christ about the children of God cannot be understood apart from His teaching about the Fatherhood of God: indeed, it is from the latter standpoint that it must be approached. In such an approach the main positions seem to be as follows:—

(1) Jesus asserts absolutely the fatherly nature of God. His use of the name 'Father' implies that the fatherly nature is eternal in God. God does not become Father; He is the Father. All knowledge of God is deficient which does not 'know the Father' (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, Jn 14<sup>8-11</sup>). This fatherly nature of God necessarily manifests itself in all God's dealings. He cannot be other than Father, and 'he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and the unjust' (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>).

(2) This eternal Fatherhood in God is complemented by an eternal Sonship in God. Jesus used habitually the name 'My Father.' It implied a special relationship between the Father and Himself, which is summed up by John, 'The only begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father' (Jn 1<sup>18</sup>).

(3) The fatherly heart of God does not rest satisfied in the eternal Sonship in God. He desires the response of filial love from all who are capable of giving it (cf. esp. Lk 15<sup>11-32</sup>, Jn 4<sup>23</sup>). Jesus assumed that the filial attitude is expected from all men. This is implied in His method of teaching. The Divine Fatherhood is woven into its texture. Therefore the picture of God the Father is offered to everybody, with its necessary appeal to the hearer to enjoy the filial relationship. Since the outlook of the gospel is universal, the sonship may be universal. Even 'publicans and sinners' may enjoy the filial feeling.

(4) But Jesus taught plainly that this filial attitude is not general amongst men. He told the Jews that they were of their father the devil (Jn 8<sup>44</sup>), and distinguished 'the good seed, the sons of the kingdom,' from 'the tares, the sons of the evil one' (Mt 13<sup>38</sup>); cf. also Mt 23<sup>12-33</sup>.

(5) Certain conditions are laid down as essential to the enjoyment of the filial relationship to God. These conditions are usually described by Jesus in terms of character. The children of God are 'peacemakers,' are those who love their enemies, and who do the will of the Father (cf. Mt 5<sup>44</sup> 12<sup>50</sup>); they 'do good and lend, never despairing,' and are 'merciful' (Lk 6<sup>35</sup>, 36). But in the discourses in John's Gospel, Jesus Himself is offered as a touchstone for the filial relationship (cf. Jn 8<sup>50-57</sup>). In this connexion the demand for the new birth must be noticed. Jesus connected entrance into that Kingdom which He came to found, with being 'born anew' (Jn 3<sup>3</sup>); He demanded that His disciples should be converted and become as little children if they would enter the Kingdom (Mt 18<sup>3</sup> ||). It may fairly be said that in the mind of Jesus there is an intimate connexion between these two modes of teaching. The moral character befitting the children of God is secured by the new birth 'of water and of the Spirit' (Jn 3<sup>5</sup>). From these propositions we can gather the teaching of Jesus about the children of God. The relationship is apprehended by Jesus ethically, not physically. To identify Divine sonship with human birth brings the relationship down to the physical sphere. Jesus kept it in the religious attitude eternally present in the Godhead; man's Divine sonship is his ethical response to this Divine Fatherhood. God is ever waiting to welcome men as sons, and to give them the position of sons at home (Lk 15). But their assumption of this filial position depends upon their adoption of the filial attitude, 'I will arise and go to my father.' As Wendt says, 'God does not become the Father, but is the heavenly Father, even of those who become His sons. . . . Man is a true son of God . . . from the fact of his comporting himself as a son of God' (Teaching of Jesus, i, p. 193).

This religious attitude which betokens Divine sonship, includes four elements. (a) Children of God love their heavenly Father. Love is the golden bond in all home relationships. Jesus declares it to be the sovereign law in the true relationship between man and God. For He taught that the greatest commandment is to love the Lord our God with all our heart and soul and mind and strength (Mt 22<sup>37</sup>, Lk 10<sup>27</sup>). When claiming to have come forth from God, He said to the Jews: 'If God were your father ye would love me,' where love of Himself is identified with love of the Father whom He revealed.

(b) Children of God obey their heavenly Father. This is implied in all Jesus' exhortations to men to do the will of God. It is clearly stated in these sentences: 'Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother' (Mt 12<sup>50</sup>); 'Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven' (Mt 7<sup>21</sup>); cf. also Mt 21<sup>31</sup> 24<sup>45</sup> ||.

(c) Children of God trust their heavenly Father. This mark of Divine sonship is emphasized in the Sermon on the Mount. Jesus exhorts His disciples not to be as the Gentiles, but to rely upon their heavenly Father's knowledge of their needs and His desire to help them. Anxiety must be banished from the hearts of God's children, who are fed and clothed by their Father (Mt 6<sup>23-34</sup>, Lk 6<sup>23-34</sup>).

(d) Children of God try to be like their heavenly Father. They are to be perfect, even as their heavenly Father is perfect (Mt 5<sup>48</sup>). This must not be interpreted, as it often is, 'Be as perfect as your Father.' His exhortation is to take the fatherly character of God as the standard of perfection. 'Be ye perfect, even as He is perfect.' The Father loves all men: let His children do likewise. By thus taking the fatherly character of God as the standard, His children will fulfil the second great law, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Mt 22<sup>39</sup>). The natural man adopts other ideals of perfection; but the children of God try to be like their Father.

Jesus gave immortal expression to the desires characteristic of the children of God, in 'the Lord's Prayer.' That prayer is put into the lips of those who can say 'Our Father which art in heaven.' It includes all the marks of God's children that have been found elsewhere in the teaching of Jesus. The hallowing of the Father's name implies the sanctification of His children after His likeness. The prayer 'Thy will be done' lifts us to the loftiest level of obedience. Only those who trust God can pray 'Give us our daily bread,' and can limit their desires for material good to such humble bounds. The prayer breathes throughout the spirit of love: that spirit is the warp into which the weft of the petition is woven.

The blessings enjoyed by the children of God are all the good that Jesus Christ came on earth to offer to men. This good is summed up in the phrase 'the kingdom of God' or 'the kingdom of heaven.' All the children of God are members of that Kingdom; cf. Mt 13<sup>38</sup> 18<sup>2-10</sup>. The Kingdom is God's proffered blessing: 'It is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom' (Lk 12<sup>32</sup>). The Kingdom includes the blessings of forgiveness (Mt 6<sup>14</sup>); of guardian care (Mt 6<sup>23</sup>); of the Holy Spirit (Lk 11<sup>13</sup>); of eternal life (Jn 6<sup>27-28</sup> 17<sup>7</sup>); and finally, the enjoyment of the Father's house (Mt 25<sup>34</sup>, Jn 14<sup>2-3</sup>).

This identification of the blessings enjoyed by the children of God with the good of the Kingdom, leads naturally to the statement that the ethical attitude characteristic of the children of God can be secured by faith in Jesus Christ. He not only spoke of Himself as the Son of God; He also declared that His revelation of Sonship made sonship possible to men. Considerable importance attaches to the solemn words in Mt 11<sup>27</sup> 'All things have been delivered unto me of my Father: and no one knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him.' They declare that the knowledge of the Father must be experimental. Only one who has lived as a son can know the Father. Men do not know God primarily as Father. They think of Him as King, as Judge, as Law-giver; and because they are sinners they cannot know Him purely as Father. The shadow of the broken Law falls across God's face, making it appear the face of a judge, and falls upon the attitude of men, chilling it into that of servants. But 'the Son' knows God as Father. He has no fear of Him as Judge; He claims to be Himself the King in the kingdom of God (Mt 25<sup>34</sup>); He is conscious that He has never broken God's law. Therefore He can know God as the Father; and He is able to reveal God to men as Father. Jesus does this by ransoming captive spirits from the bondage of sin and death (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>), by persuading them to trust the fatherly love of God, and by strengthening them to break away from the self-life in favour of the life of surrender (Mt 16<sup>24-27</sup>).

The close connexion between this great word and the gracious invitation which follows it (Mt 11<sup>28-30</sup>), must not be overlooked. That invitation shows the universality of Christ's outlook. The Son is willing to reveal the Father to all. But the connexion explains the personal note in the invitation. Jesus does not say 'Go to the Father'; He says 'Come unto me, and I will give you rest.' This is because He is the revealer of the Father; and the rest He offers is rest in the Fatherhood of God. The chapter describes the discouragements that darkened the noon of His ministry. He found rest to His own soul in the Father: 'I thank thee, O Father . . . Even so, Father' (vv. 26, 29). This rest He desires to give to others. The only way in which men can come to the Father is by coming to Himself.

Two things are implied. One is that the Fatherhood of God is made accessible to men in Jesus Christ. He is the appointed trysting-place where men are sure to meet their heavenly Father. He was lifted up as an ensign (Is 110<sup>1-3</sup>); when the nations see Him they know where to seek God. The children of God are scattered on the dark mountains of ignorance. Jesus is the trysting-place where they are gathered at the feet of their heavenly Father (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>). If men come to Him, they see the Father. The other fact is that Jesus gives men knowledge of the Father by teaching them to live as God's children must live. They must be meek and lowly in heart (cf. Mt 5<sup>4</sup>); He can make them so. They must also learn obedience to the Father's will. He offers to teach them this, saying with marvellous condescension, 'Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me.' He is wearing the yoke of obedience to the Father, and He finds it 'easy.' A yoke is made for two. Jesus invites each man desiring to be a son of God to put his shoulder under the other end of His own yoke. Then he will walk in step with the great Elder Brother. Thus learning from Jesus, he will become a worthy child of God.

This great word has special significance because it forms a link between the Synoptic teaching and the teaching of Jesus in John's Gospel. There the enjoyment of filial privileges is made to depend upon man's relation to the Son (see especially Jn 5<sup>18-27</sup> 6<sup>28-30</sup> 8<sup>19, 22-30</sup>). The words declaratory of the love of God in sending the Son to save men are variously assigned to Jesus and to the Evangelist. But even if they are the Evangelist's reflexion upon the words of Jesus, they do no more than sum up the teaching of the Lord in the chapters quoted above.

In particular, it may be noted that Jesus claimed kinship with the Father because 'I do always the things that are pleasing to him' (Jn 8<sup>29</sup>). This is in harmony with His reference to men who do the Father's will, as His 'brethren' (Mt 12<sup>50</sup>). Men who accept His revelation of God and duty become His brethren; all these 'brethren' are related to God as His children. They comport themselves in a befitting manner, which is essentially different from the self-centred conduct of unregenerate men. This filial demeanour is gained by faith in Jesus as the Saviour. He offers Himself to men as the Redeemer, through whom they can break away from sin and adopt the filial attitude toward God (Mt 23<sup>17</sup>, Jn 10<sup>16, 43-45</sup>).

This conception of the teaching of Jesus on this subject is expressed by the Evangelist John in the striking sentence, 'As many as received him, to them gave he the right to become children of God, even to them that believe on his name: which were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God' (Jn 1<sup>12, 13</sup>). Here men are described as becoming children of God by believing on the name of Jesus. They attain the dignity by a new birth that is from above. Their natural birth does not make them children of God. Before they stand in this relationship they must receive a Divine energy. This energy is brought to them by the Word made flesh, who offers Himself to the world. Moreover, this reception of Christ is a continuous exercise of faith (οὐκ ἀπολείπει), implying an attitude toward that is maintained from day to day.

If an illustration may be permitted, it would seem that Jesus represents men as like Robinson Crusoe's first canoe. It was designed to float in the water and was capable of doing so: but it could not get into the sea. So it lay on the shore like a log. Man is designed for fellowship with God, and is capable of living in filial relationship with Him. But before he can realize this destiny, he must be carried away from his native selfishness and be launched on the sea of Divine love. Jesus Christ is the mighty deliverer who can lift men out of death in sin and bring them to the Father. When men believe on Him, this purpose is fulfilled. They realize their destiny and become children of God. Then they spread their sails to the wind of heaven, and have 'life that is life indeed.'

The scope of this article does not include the general teaching of the Epistles on this topic. But a brief reference must be made to that teaching in so far as it involves a distinct reference to Jesus Christ. In general it may be said that the teaching of the Epistles reproduces all the main features of the teaching of Jesus. The children of God are possessors of a new life that has come to them by faith in Jesus Christ: Ro 8<sup>1-14</sup>, Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>22</sup> 5<sup>12</sup>. This new life manifests itself in a new moral state befitting God's children and due to the power of Christ: Gal 5<sup>22-26</sup>, Eph 2<sup>1-10</sup>, Col 3<sup>9-10</sup>. In this connexion it may be noted that Christians are called 'children of light,' who before becoming Christians were 'children of disobedience,' suffering 'the wrath of God' (Eph 2<sup>3</sup>, Col 3<sup>6</sup>). Thus Christ is the Saviour through whom the children of God are reborn and morally renewed.

In particular, three descriptions of God's children are connected with aspects of Christ's work. (a) As Redeemer, He secures man's adoption into the family of God (Ro 8<sup>14-16</sup>, Gal 3<sup>26-40</sup>). This 'adoption' has been interpreted, in connexion with the antithesis between sonship and servitude, to denote the emancipation of sons enslaved by sin. This is the shade of meaning prominent in Galatians. In Romans the idea of adoption of those not previously sons is emphasized. In both cases, however, the adoption is due to the redeeming work of Jesus Christ, ministered to men by the Holy Spirit. The word 'adoption' is not used in Hebrews. But the idea is found there in the figure of the Author of salvation leading many sons to glory (2<sup>10</sup>). (b) As High Priest, Jesus secures access to the Father for all who come unto God by Him (Eph 2<sup>18</sup>, He 7<sup>24-25</sup>). This priesthood is exercised by Him as our 'Brother,' and was granted to Him in view of His experience of our temptations (He 2<sup>17</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>). (c) As King, Jesus Christ bestows a rich inheritance upon all His brethren. The children of God are 'joint-heirs with Christ' (Ro 8<sup>17</sup>).

In regard to this whole question, it should be remembered that in all probability our human speech cannot describe adequately relations that reach into the eternal, and concern God. The figure of 'children' is an analogy rather than an exact parallel. Therefore we should be misunderstanding the teaching of Jesus if we pressed the analogy too far and sought to discover the exact counterpart of each element of the human relation in that which we bear to God. Also it is important to recall that Jesus was not concerned with abstract relations. His purpose was practical and religious, and He used terms just so far as they served that purpose. His terminology was consistent; it may not seem conclusive on all points that suggest themselves to abstract reasoning.

CHILARCH (χιλιάρχος).—The title of this military officer is twice used in the Gospels: Jn 18<sup>12</sup> and Mk 6<sup>21</sup> (AV 'captain,' 'high captains'; RV 'chief captain,' 'high captains'; RVM 'military tribune(s), Gr. chiliarch(s)'). It is the Greek equivalent for the Roman office of tribunus militum, an office of great historical antiquity, from the analogy of which the famous tribuni plebis took their name. The tribunus militum is called by Mommsen 'the pillar of the Roman military system'; he was an officer commanding a cohort. See, further, LEGION.

A chiliarch with his 'hand' (σπεῖρα) is represented by St. John as coming with Judas to take our Lord in the Garden of Gethsemane. If this is to be understood strictly as standing for a tribunus militum and his cohort, the use of so large a force would point to a great (real or assumed) fear of popular disturbance on the part of the authorities. The words may, however, be used in a general sense for a body of troops under an officer (see Westcott, ad loc.).

In St. Mark's account of the martyrdom of John the Baptist, Herod the tetrarch of Galilee is represented as making a feast to his μεγαρῶνες (highest civil officials), χιλιάρχοι (highest military officers), and πρώτοι τῆς Παλαιάς (leading provincials). These 'chiliarchs' were officers of the army of the tetrarch, which would be organized on Roman models. For the association of μεγαρῶνες and χιλιάρχοι cf. Rev 6<sup>15</sup>. (See Swete's St Mark, ad loc.).

M. R. NEWBOLT.
CHOICE.—In the Gospels, choice is always expressed by one small group of closely connected words, viz. ἐκλέγεσθαι, ἐκλεκτός, ἐκλογή. And these at once define the nature of the choice, which is not that of 'decision,' but that of 'selection.' Perhaps the English term which more precisely than any other answers to ἐκλέγεσθαι is to 'cull,' to choose here and there one, that is to say, out of a larger number laid out in view. And this force of the word is rather emphasized by the fact that in the NT the active voice of the verb is not employed, but only the middle or passive, with derivatives which are passive in character. It is not, then, the action of choosing which is prominent, but its result; or else the status or nature of that which is chosen. And this point is of some importance in view of the use to which some passages of the NT have been put by those who have attempted to elaborate from them doctrines of election or predestination. Stress is never laid chiefly on the election or predestination of the Almighty, but on the fact that such and such are actually found among those whom God has culled for Himself, and who constitute His own people. It would be an advantage to accurate Christian thought if the rendering 'elect' were eliminated from the NT, and were replaced by 'chosen' or 'select,' although it is a direct derivative of the original.

The central meaning of the terms employed is well shown in the following cases.—He marked how they chose out the chief seats (Lk 14<sup>7</sup>); 'Mary hath chosen the good part' (10<sup>42</sup>); 'He called his disciples, and chose from them twelve, whom also he named apostles' (21<sup>13</sup>), with which other passages relating to the choice of the Twelve should be compared, viz. Jn 6<sup>70</sup> 15<sup>16-19</sup> 13<sup>28</sup>, Ac 1<sup>25</sup>, and, as essentially the same, Ac 19<sup>1</sup>; cf. also 1 Co 12<sup>7</sup>, Ja 2<sup>4</sup>. A further selection for some special service is indicated in such passages as—'God made choice among you that by my mouth . . . ' (Ac 15<sup>2</sup>, cf. 13<sup>2</sup> 29); 'Many are called, but few chosen' (Mt 22<sup>14</sup>). And by an almost insensible gradation the use of the word passes on to such instances as the choice of Saul 'a chosen vessel' (Ac 9<sup>15</sup>), 'the Christ of God, his chosen' (Lk 23<sup>8</sup>, cf. 9<sup>35</sup>), and the chosen people of God (Ac 13<sup>17</sup>, Eph 1<sup>4</sup> 1 P 2<sup>4-5</sup>). The last named appear in a group of passages in the Gospels (on the lips of Christ Himself) which are of apocalyptic character, and in all which the English rendering is unfortunately 'elect'; e.g. 'Shall not God avenge his chosen?' (Lk 18<sup>7</sup>); 'For the sake of his chosen whom he chose, he shortened the days' (Mk 13<sup>20</sup> 22 27 || Mt 24<sup>22</sup> 24 31). To these there are many similar instances in the Epistles (Ro 8<sup>28</sup> 11<sup>7-28</sup>, Col 3<sup>12</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>10</sup>, Tit 1<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>11</sup>; cf. Rev 17<sup>14</sup>). Individuals are spoken of as chosen (Ro 16<sup>13</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>13</sup>, 2 Jn 1<sup>10</sup>), and also angels (1 Ti 2<sup>10</sup>); while God's purpose of selection is mentioned (Ro 9<sup>11</sup>), and the status of those selected (1 Th 1<sup>4</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>10</sup>).

From the foregoing it is clear that in the Gospels, and in the NT generally, 'choice' expresses a selection of some among other alternatives, and commonly selection for some special service; God's people being selected that they may become His servants who serve Him and so serve all in the furtherance of His purposes of love, rather than on their own account alone. Moreover, God's choice is always viewed as an actual fact seen in its results, and never as an intention in advance; except perhaps in reference to St. Paul's apostolate and Jacob's destiny, both of which are, however, so referred to only when seen in retrospect. CHORAZIN.—Mentioned once only in the Gospels, Mt 11<sup>21</sup>=Lk 10<sup>18</sup>, along with Bethsaida, as one of the 'cities' (πόλεις) where most of Jesus' mighty deeds were done. The name is not found in the OT nor in Josephus; and it is not certain whether it be the same place as כּוּרַזִין or כּוּרַיִן mentioned once in the Talmud (Menahoth, 85a), where the superior quality of its wheat is praised. Jastrow's Dictionary gives 'Karazim near Jerusalem,' Dalman's 'עַרְזַר name of place.' One MS has כּוּרַיִן, two '2; see Rabinowicz, Varia Lectiones; Neubauer, Géographie du Talmud, p. 220. Most MSS of the NT spell Χορ(α)ζ(ε)ιν, others, especially in Luke, Χορ(α)ζίν; so Stephen in Luke, but not Elzevir, Mill; D both times Χορ(α)ζ(ε)ιν, and the same form prevails in the Latin texts: Chorazain. Why the editions of the Peshitta, even Gwilliams', spell כּוּרַזִין Kōrazin, we fail to see. Barhebraeus gives expressly כּוּרַזִין Kurzin as the vocalization of the Peshitta, and Chorazin as that of the Greek.

Neither the grammatical form of the name (on which see Schwöbel, ZDPV xxvii. 134) nor its etymology is sufficiently clear. The place has been identified with Kherza on the eastern shore of the Lake of Galilee, but more probably with Khirbet Kerazeh, 4 kilometres N. of Tell Hām, first discovered by Thomson in 1857. Eusebius calls it κάρυζα (oppidum), 12 Roman miles from Capernaum, in his time deserted; but 12 seems to be a misspelling of the MS for 2, as given by the Latin translation of Jerome (Eusebius, Onomasticon, ed. Klostermann, 174, 25, 175, 25).* On the ruins of Kerazeh, especially its synagogue, see the literature quoted by Schürer, GJV 3 § 27, n. 59. Cheyne's list of Proper Names (in the Queen's Printers' Aids to the Student of the Holy Bible) recommends the pronunciation Chorazain; this is supported by the modern form Kerazeh, if it be the same name; the accentuation of the first syllable, common in German, has the support of Kurzin in the Peshitta; in Latin Chorazain. The medieval explanation of the name 'hoc mysterium meum' = 'מֵי מֵי', goes back to Jerome (OS 61, 8). There was once a tradition that the Antichrist was to be born in Chorazin, and that its inhabitants were proud of this, and therefore the place was cursed by Jesus; see Expos. Times, xv. [1904] p. 524. The name Chorazin is, like that of Nazareth, an interesting illustration of the sanctiness of our literary tradition.†

CHOSEN ONE.—This, like 'Beloved' (wh. see), seems to have been a pre-Christian designation of the Messiah. ὁ ἐλεκτός μου occurs in the LXX of Is 42<sup>1</sup>, and is there defined as Ἰσραήλ. But in the Book of Enoch 'the Elect one' is a common title of the Messiah (cf. 40<sup>2</sup> 49<sup>2</sup> 51<sup>2</sup>. 5 52<sup>2</sup>. 9 61<sup>2</sup>. 8. 10 62<sup>1</sup>). Traces of it still survive in the Gospels, but there seems to have been a tendency to avoid its use, perhaps on the ground that it might seem to favour so-called 'Adoptionist' views of the nature of Christ's relation to God. Lk 9<sup>35</sup> substitutes ὁ ἐλεγεμένος (NBLZ (1), 274<sup>ms</sup> Syr Sin a ff. l. vg.

* In the Latin text (OS 114, 7) the name is spelt 'Chorazin,' not 'Chorazain,' as stated in Encyc. Bibl., where also the modern name Kerazeh is once spelt with κ, as if it were κ.

† Among the mighty works done in Bethsaida the feeding of the 5000 is certainly to be reckoned (Lk 9<sup>10</sup>), where ἰσχυροῦς of v. 12 is to be explained from Βηθσαϊδά = ἰσχυροῦς (OS 174, 7, 188, 75). Hence it is tempting to find one of the mighty works done at Chorazin in the healing of the demoniac in the land of the Gerasenes (Mk), and to combine this name with Chorazin. In his Philologica Sacra (1896, p. 21) the present writer suggested that the prominent part played by the swine in that story may be derived from a local name like Ras el-chinzir or Tell abu-l-chinzir. The plural of chinzir (swine) is chinzazir, of which Chorazin might be a transposition.

codd. aeg. aeth. <sup>cod.</sup> arm) for Mk.'s ὁ ἀγαπητός, and in Lk 22<sup>67</sup> we have 'the Messiah of God, the Elect.' Elsewhere the evidence is more doubtful. ὁ ἐλεκτός μου occurs in Jn 12<sup>34</sup> in Mt 7<sup>7</sup>, 218, Syr Sin Cur e, and is adopted by Burkill, Evangelion Da-Mepharreshe, ii. 509. Lastly, 'approved Son' is given by Syr Sin in Jn 3<sup>18</sup> for τοῦ μονογενοῦς υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ. St. Mark and the editor of the First Gospel after him seem to have avoided the ὁ ἐλεκτός μου of the LXX (Is 42<sup>1</sup>) in their accounts of the Baptism and Transfiguration, and to have fallen back on a Christianized version of Is 42<sup>1</sup> preserved for us in Mt 12<sup>18-21</sup>, in which ὁ ἀγαπητός μου had taken the place of ὁ ἐλεκτός μου of the LXX.

Connected with the use of this title of the Messiah in the Gospels is the question as to the meaning of the aorist ἐλέξα in Mk 11<sup>21</sup>—Mt 3<sup>12</sup>—Lk 3<sup>22</sup>. Bacon (Journ. Theol. Lit. xvi. 136-139) urges that this means '(on whom) I fixed my choice,' i.e. 'whom I elected,' and refers in the thought of the Evangelist to the Divine election of Christ by God (cf. Act ix. 451 ff.). So far as the First Gospel goes, there is much to be said for this. We might bring together the following passages 3<sup>17</sup> 17<sup>5</sup> ἐν ᾧ ἐδόξασα, 11<sup>27</sup> πάντα μοι παρέδόθη ὑπὸ τοῦ πατρὸς μου, 23<sup>35</sup> ἐδόθη μοι πάντα ἐξουσία ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς, and possibly the ἤλθον of 5<sup>11</sup> 9<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>4</sup> and the 'sending' of 10<sup>4</sup> 15<sup>24</sup>, as all in the mind of the Evangelist referring to the Divine choice, endowment, and mission of the eternally existing 'Son' (cf. 11<sup>27</sup>) into the world. To these should be added the citation in 12<sup>18</sup> 'Behold my son (servant?) whom I adopted, my beloved in whom my soul was well pleased,' where the aorist is most easily explained as expressing the Divine election and appointment of the Messiah in a pre-temporal period. In the thought of the Evangelist, Jesus, born of the Virgin by the Holy Spirit, was the pre-existent Messiah (= Beloved) or Son (11<sup>27</sup>) who had been forechosen by God (3<sup>17</sup> 17<sup>5</sup>), and who, when born into the world as Jesus, was 'God-with-us' (12<sup>1</sup>). In this respect the writer of the First Gospel shows himself to be under the influence of the same conception of the Person of Christ that dominates the Johannine theology, though this conception under the categories of the Logos and the Divine Son is worked out much more fully in the Fourth than in the First Gospel. On the other hand, terms such as 'choice,' 'adoption,' which at an early period seem to have been borrowed from the Jewish Messianic doctrine to express it, and which survive here and there in the Synoptic Gospels and in the Acts (cf. 9<sup>10</sup> [Pl. Gig.] and 2 P 1<sup>17</sup>) are absent from St. John. Such terms were probably gradually dropped out of use because they could be used to support the view of the adoption of the man Jesus to be the Son of God, which they certainly did not originally express. CHRIST IN ART.—i. SYMBOLS.—The representation of Christ by means of symbols is not earlier than that by means of pictures. There are found in the Catacombs at Rome at the commencement of Christian art not only the Fish symbol, but also pictures of the Good Shepherd, and of our Lord in certain Gospel scenes, all before the middle of the 2nd cent.; and of these the Good Shepherd carrying a sheep occurs in the Catacomb of Domitilla before the end of the 1st century. It will be, however, convenient to begin with the Symbols, proceeding thence through the Types to more direct representations of Christ.

1. The Fish was the most popular symbol of our Lord in the middle of the 2nd cent., and continued so till the end of the 4th, when it suddenly went out of use. More than one cause made it so general. Originating as an acrostic (the Greek word for 'fish,' ΙΧΘΥΣ, standing for 'Ιησοῦς Χριστός, Θεοῦ Υἱός, Σωτήρ'), it formed a most convenient secret sign among the Christians, being readily understood by the initiated as representing Christ in the fulness of His divinity. It carried with it also the thought of the sacramental feeding upon the Son of God, which is so prominent in early Christian art: e.g. the two paintings in the crypt of Lucina, which belong to the middle of the 2nd cent., and represent two baskets of bread, each containing a glass cup of wine and resting upon a fish. The earliest known representation of this symbol is even more significant: it occurs in the Praxiteles fresco, recently discovered by Wilpert in the Catacomb of Priscilla, which belongs to the beginning of the 2nd cent., and is a picture of a primitive celebration of the Communion,—seven people are seated at a table on which lie five loaves, two fishes, and a two-handled mug, while the bishop or president at the end of the table is in the act of breaking a loaf. In this deeply interesting picture of the Eucharist we see a further reason why the Fish symbol was felt to be appropriate; it carried the mind to the miracle of the loaves and fishes, which was an early type of the Eucharist because of Jn 6<sup>9-10</sup>. The Fish symbolizes not only the Eucharist, but the sacrament of Baptism as well; this is brought out by the common representation of a fish as swimming in the water (see below under 'Symbolic Scenes'). 'We little fishes,' says Tertullian (de Bapt. i.), 'after the example of our Ichthus Jesus Christ, are born in water.' Cf. St. Clement below, under 'Other Symbols.' This double symbolism is tersely expressed in the 2nd cent. inscription of Abercius recently discovered by Ramsay at Hierapolis:—'. . . everywhere was faith my guide, and gave me everywhere for food the Ichthus from the spring.'

2. Other Symbols.—The Fish was early combined with other symbols, such as the Dove, the Cross, the Ship, the Shepherd, and especially with the Anchor, the combination of the Fish and the Anchor (first found on the sarcophagus of Livia Primitiva about the middle of the 2nd cent.) being a hieroglyph for the common epitaph 'Spes in Christo.'

There is an early mention of Christian symbols in St. Clement of Alexandria (Paed. iii. 11): 'Let the engraving upon the gem of your ring be either a dove, or a fish, or a ship running before the wind, or a musical lyre, the device used by Polyocrates, or a ship's anchor, which Seleucus had carved upon his signet. And if the device represent a man fishing, it will remind us of an apostle, and of children drawn out of water.'

All these symbols, it will be noticed, are common ones, such as would not excite comment among pagans. However, the Dove (at first a symbol of peace) and the Ship (which represented the Church), the Lyre (a symbol of Orpheus, see below) and the Anchor of hope (see also under 'Cross') are not direct symbols of Christ; nor, except by way of the Eucharist, are they representations of bread, wine, or the grape. The Agnus Dei, a post-Constantinian symbol, may more conveniently be considered under the head of 'NT types.'

In medieval art a trace of the Fish symbol survived—as indeed it survives to-day—in the vesica piscis, a figure which is still customarily restricted to the seals of ecclesiastical persons and corporations. The Dove, at first used as an emblem of peace, sometimes with an olive branch in its mouth (though it occurs in pictures of the Baptism of Christ in the Catacomb), was the recognized symbol of the Holy Spirit in the apsidal mosaics of the 4th and 5th centuries, and thus has continued ever since: the Lamb, the Hand of God, and the Cross (see below), found in connexion with the Dove in these mosaics, also continued as common symbols in the Middle Ages, when interlaced triangles and circles further represented the Trinity.

Two emblems of immortality, the Peacock (from the fabled indestructibility of its flesh) and the Phoenix, rising from its ashes, were early used as types of Christ. The Star (Rev 22<sup>19</sup>) and the Sun (Mal 4<sup>2</sup>) were also used; the Rose and Lily (Ca 2<sup>1</sup>) were very favourite subjects of decorative art after the 13th cent., but they came to be used rather as emblems of Christ's Mother than of our Lord Himself, and often as badges of the royal houses in England and France: the Pomegranate, split open, originally a type of Divine grace, became similarly common as a Tudor badge. In the Middle Ages, when great emphasis was laid upon the Eucharistic sacrifice, symbols of the Passion were much in vogue, in addition to the Vine and Corn, the Chalice and the Host. Hence the use of the Pelican, the great prevalence of the Agnus Dei and the Crucifix, and the constant use of the Instruments of the Passion, in addition to the almost infinite varieties of the Cross. The Instruments of the Passion, so common still in decorative art, are the Crown of Thorns, the Nails, the Coat and Dice, the Scourges, Pillar, Ladder and Sponge, the Five Wounds, Hammer, Pincers; to which are sometimes added the Sword and Staff, Lantern, Thirty Pieces and Cock, the Pierced Heart, and the Vernicle or Napkin of Veronica, and the Super-scription INRI. The Passion-flower, a popular emblem at the present day, was introduced by the Jesuit missionaries from Mexico, as containing symbols of the Twelve Apostles, the Five Wounds, the Three Nails, and the Crown of Thorns.

3. Sacred Monograms.—The Alpha and Omega naturally appear early (though not in monogrammatic or interwoven form) because of Rev 1<sup>8</sup>; the first instance in the Catacomb of St. Priscilla, 2nd cent.—'Modestina AG,' which means 'Modestina live in Christ.' Some of the sacred monograms are really contractions; for instance, the familiar IHC and XPC are the first two and the last letters of IHCOTC and XPICTOC, just as MR stands for MARTYR, or DO for DÓMINO; contractions of this sort were extremely common in sepulchral inscriptions (e.g. 'Lucretia pax tecum in DO'), but there was no fixed method; the abbreviations IH and XP alone are sometimes found, and also the initials IX, which, combined, formed the earliest or pre-Constantinian monogram ✕ (the first instance being in a 3rd cent. fresco in the Catacomb of SS. Peter and Marcellinus). None of these, however, are found by themselves, but only as abbreviations in the course of an inscription. The Constantinian monogram Ɱ (for XP) is the first to stand alone, though it does also occur in inscriptions (e.g. 'Roges pro nobis quia scimus te in Ɱ'); this monogram was considered a form of the Cross (see below); it is characteristic of the conversion of the Empire, and is rarely found subsequent to the Sack of Rome by Alaric in 410. It is often surrounded by a wreath, and often has the A and Ω on either side to mark the divinity of our Lord; in a 4th cent. lead coffin from Saïda in Phœnicia, the letters of the old symbol IXCOTC lie between the arms of the monogram. Three main variations of it appear in which the Cross is made more apparent Ɱ, Ɱ, and ✕, but these are later and less common.

The contraction IHC, as subsequently latinized into IHS, is now called the Sacred Monogram par excellence, and is as popular as it was in the Middle Ages and in the 17th and 18th centuries, when it was almost the only symbol of the kind; this was owing mainly to its being misunderstood as the initials of 'Jesus Hominum Salvator' (or even of 'In Hoc Signo'); in medieval times the confusion may not have arisen, in spite of the ambiguity of the Greek Η in Gothic character, for the letter J was often replaced by IH or HI, and 'Ihesus' was a common way of spelling the holy name. Meanwhile the contraction of the title XPS has been almost forgotten; its use in such an inscription as IHS XPS NIKA would seem strange to our eyes; but IHS XPS occur on a portrait of Christ in the Codex Egberti (c. 1000), and are not unknown in late mediæval art, e.g. both are found among the tiles of Malvern Abbey.

The initials of the Superscription INRI ('Iesus Nazareus Rex Judæorum'), which now rank next to the IHS in popular estimation, do not seem to have appeared till the 13th cent., after which they became the favourite abbreviation of painters (cf. below under 'Crucifixion').

4. The symbol of the Cross eventually supplanted altogether that of the Fish. But in early Christian art representations of it are very rare, and at first only given in a disguised form, although the sign of the Cross was already so greatly revered towards the end of the 2nd cent. as to be used by Christians before almost every act of daily life,—dressing, eating, bathing, going to bed, etc.—'quæcumque nos conversato exeret, frontem crucis signaculo terminus,' etc. (Tert. de Coron. Mil. iii.). This great reserve was due partly to the natural shrinking from the portrayal of an instrument which was still in use for the most degraded form of execution, partly also to the fact that all Christian symbolism was necessarily of a hidden nature in the ages previous to the Peace of the Church. Thus the first representations of the Cross are very indirect; the cross-marks on the round Eucharistic loaves, which are found as early as the 2nd cent. (on a sarcophagus in the Catacomb of Priscilla), merely represent the folding up of the corners of the bread to make it round. The Anchor (a symbol which is rare after the 3rd cent.) often has a crossbar so marked as to be clearly symbolic; it was, in fact, according to Marucchi, a hidden form of the Cross, a symbolized hope in the Cross.

The earliest representation of the Cross by itself—the svastica or 'fylfot' —which is found in the Catacombs in the 3rd cent., and is not uncommon in the earliest Christian textiles—was a form so 'dissimulated' as to pass unnoticed among pagans who were accustomed to its use as a conventional ornament. Only one undisguised Cross occurs in the Catacombs during the ages of sepulture (i.e. before the Sack of Rome in 410), and this is the so-called Greek or equilateral Cross '+', which has no special connexion with the Eastern Church; a small 4th cent. example of this Cross has been found in the nameless hypogeum near St. Callistus. There is a Cross, still dissimulated, in a 4th cent. fresco in the Catacomb of Callistus, a green tree with two branches, under which are two doves; for the rest, in the Catacombs the earliest 'true and proper Cross,' as Wilpert calls it, the earliest, that is, which is not a bare symbol, is in the Catacomb of Ponziano—a gemmed Latin Cross of the end of the 5th cent.; another similar example in the same place is attributed to the 6th or 7th. In a late 4th cent. mosaic in the church of St. Pudenziana, Rome, is one of the few undisguised Crosses that have been discovered of an earlier date than the 5th cent.; it stands in the midst of the half dome of the apse, and is of the so-called Latin shape (crux immissa), and gemmed; but the use of the Latin Cross did not become common till the 6th century.

The crux commissa, or Tau Cross, appears earlier; for, though a more exact representation of the actual instrument of death, it would pass unnoticed as the letter T. Of this form Tertullian says (adv. Marc. iii. 22), 'Ipsa est enim litera Græcorum Tau, nostra autem T, species crucis.' The Cross was probably recognized as hidden in the pre-Constantinian form of the Monogram ; and though it is still disguised in the 'Constantinian Monogram,' yet this symbol  was considered as a Cross in the 4th cent., and it must have been the 'Cross' which Constantine saw in the sky, since the Cross is always represented by this Monogram in contemporary art. In the later varieties of the Monogram, as we have seen, the Cross was more plainly introduced, e.g. .

Later ages increased the number of forms till there were about fifty, not counting subdivisions, which are duly named by the mediæval heralds, e.g. the Cross Potent, Fleurie, Fleurdelys, Patonce, Moline, Botonnée, Pommee, Urdée, Fourchée, Patenoster, Tripartite, Crescented, Interlaced, etc., in addition to the familiar Maltese Cross worn by the Knights Templars and the Knights of St. John, the Cross of St. James borne by the Knights of St. Iago, the Saltire of Scotland and Ireland, etc. It may be added that the use of small Crosses carried about the person dates from the 5th cent., when also processional Crosses came into use (e.g. a Cross is carried, and candles, in a 5th cent. Ivory, at Trèves); it was not till later that the processional Cross came to be taken from its staff and placed on the altar during service time; indeed, the use of an altar-Cross continued to be far from universal throughout the Middle Ages.

5. The Crucifix, which became the principal feature of mediæval churches, is naturally of still later date than the Cross, for the motives which caused the early Church to shrink from an open representation of the latter would apply still more to the realism of the Crucifix. In addition to this, the blithe spirit of Christian art in the first four centuries was certainly against the portrayal of scenes of suffering and sorrow; representations of scenes from the Passion are very rare (see below), and pictures of death or martyrdom do not occur.

That the death upon the Cross was 'toolsness' to pagans as well as a stumbling-block to the Jews (1 Co 1:23-29), is curiously illustrated by the caricature of the Crucifixion which was scratched on the wall of the pagan quarter at the Palatine in the latter part of the 2nd cent., and was discovered in 1851; the figure on the Cross has an ass's head, and by it stands a worshipper with the acrostich inscription AAEMAMNOZ ZEBETE ETON (Alexamenos adores his god.). This caricature is, as a matter of fact, the only picture of a crucifixion that has been found within the first four centuries.

The earliest Christian example of any kind is on a panel of the 5th cent. doors of St. Sabina at Rome, about a century and a half after Constantine had abolished the penalty of crucifixion. The next is in a 5th cent. Ivory in the British Museum. The third is in a Syrian MS of the year 586, and is the earliest dated example. But all these three belong to the category of 'Scenes from the Gospels.' The earliest actual Crucifix that is extant is a small amulet at Monza, which was given by Gregory the Great to Adalwald the son of Queen Theodolind, and belongs therefore to the end of the 6th century. Early Christian literature (the reliability of which is illustrated by every fresh discovery in the realm of archaeology) is markedly silent on the subject, the first mention of a picture of the Crucifixion being in the middle of the 6th century. At the close of that century Gregory of Tours supplies the earliest mention of an actual Crucifix, when he tells us that there was one in a church at Narbonne, and that Christ appeared in a vision to rebuke this representation because of its nakedness. About the time of Charlemagne (800) the use of Crucifixes became very general, and they gradually ceased to be of the ideal type; but as this development belongs rather to the representation of Christ in 'Scenes from the Gospels,' the details are given below under that head.

ii. TYPES.—1. Pagan.—Early Christian art is classical not only in its reserve about the Cross, not only in its use of the ordinary classical decorative subjects, but also in its use of certain pagan myths as symbolizing aspects of the Christian faith. It is remarkable that the moral value of the better elements of mythology should have been thus recognized at the very tombs of martyrs who had suffered at the hands of paganism. The figure of Orpheus was familiar as a funeral symbol among the ancients because of his fabled rescue of Eurydice from Hades; in the Catacombs it was adopted by the Christians as a symbol of the attractive power of the Master. There are five instances of Orpheus with his lyre in the Catacombs, the earliest being of the 2nd century.

Sometimes Orpheus is represented in his conventional Phrygian costume playing upon the lyre, while various beasts, birds, and reptiles listen to him; sometimes it is sheep that gather round, for Orpheus was a shepherd, and thus his story was interwoven with the Good Shepherd theme; sometimes the figure of Orpheus is even painted in the centre of a vault—in the place usually reserved for the Good Shepherd.

The story of Psyche was similarly used, typifying here the love of God for the soul. Ulysses and the Sirens occurs several times on Christian sarcophagi, and Hercules feeding the dragon with poppy-seed is also found. The peacock and the phoenix, symbols of immortality, and thus of Christ triumphing over death, as well as the dolphin, carrier of souls to the Isles of the Blessed, were other pagan types that continued in use among the Christians. In this connexion may also be mentioned the ancient Egyptian symbol of the so-called Nile key  $\Omega$ ,\* which was used in textiles by the Christians in Egypt for several centuries after the conversion of that country.

2. OT types.—OT subjects are common in the Catacombs, and in some the principal figure is identified with Christ. This is the case with Moses striking the Rock, where Moses becomes the type of Christ and the water a type of Baptism, the point being sometimes emphasized by the conjunction of Christ drawing a fish out of the water, or in the sarcophagi by the raising of Lazarus. The Sacrifice of Isaac was also a favourite subject as typical of the Sacrifice of Christ. The story of Jonah was the most popular of all (there are 57 examples), as a type of the Resurrection which had been established by Christ Himself (Mt 12<sup>9</sup>). In the story of The Three Children the figure of the Son of Man is sometimes introduced. Although such OT subjects as Adam and Eve do not readily admit of the same typical treatment, yet in some 4th cent. sarcophagi Christ is introduced as the Logos standing between them. Representations of Noah appear as early as the end of the 1st cent., but the ark is a symbol both of deliverance and of Baptism (1 P 3<sup>21</sup>), so that Noah represents the saved rather than the Saviour. From the 4th cent., when mosaics came into use, OT subjects were largely employed in the great apsidal decorations of the succeeding centuries; but all that need here be mentioned are the 6th cent. mosaic of St. Vitale at Ravenna, where Abel with a lamb and Melchizedek with a loaf stand as types of Christ on either side of the Christian altar,—which is draped and has on it a two-handled chalice and two loaves,—and the 7th cent. mosaic at St. Apollinare in Classe, where Abel, Melchizedek, and Abraham leading Isaac stand round a similar altar.

3. NT types.—The earliest manner of representing our Lord as a solitary figure was under the type which He Himself had given—that of the Good Shepherd. In its reserve, its tenderness, its gracious beauty, the figure of the Good Shepherd was characteristic of the first Christian art, and its subsequent disappearance was also characteristic of much.

This figure, which appears first in the Catacomb of Lucina in the early part of the 2nd cent. and became thereafter exceedingly common, was in no sense an attempt at portraiture. The Shepherd is always a typical shepherd of the Campagna, a beardless youth, bareheaded, clad in the tunic of the peasant; the tunic is generally sleeveless, with sometimes a small cape over the shoulders, while leggings complete the realism of the attire. There are two distinct classes of Good Shepherd pictures in the Catacombs:—(a) 21 represent him feeding his flock (in one case he protects it against a pig and an ass); these belong to the 3rd and 4th cents.; (b) 88 pictures represent him carrying a sheep (very rarely a kid—there is probably no foundation for the beautiful idea in M. Arnold's famous sonnet); in these the sheep, according to Wilpert, represents the soul of the departed person. Class b begins very early, 3 examples of the end of the 1st cent. occurring in the Catacomb of St. Domitilla. In spite of the realism of the Good Shepherd pictures, there is a certain hieratic grace and dignity about the figure that marks it at once as a Christian subject, though the figure of a shepherd was common enough in pagan art (e.g. the Hermes Kriophoros bearing a ram, or the Apollo Nonios) to make it both a safe and an accessible model for Christians. The theme is varied in many ways: occasionally the Good Shepherd carries a kid, sometimes other sheep or goats stand near him; in a fresco in the Catacomb of St. Callistus he is surrounded by the Four Seasons; sometimes he sits and plays upon a syrinx; sometimes he carries a crook, and sometimes a milk-pail, a symbol of the gift of life,—indeed, the sheep and the milk-pail are occasionally represented by themselves, e.g. in the crypt of St. Lucina two sheep stand by an altar on which lie a milk-pail and a crook. Tertullian (c. 200) mentions the painting of the Good Shepherd on chalices as a common custom (de Pudic. vii.). Statues were probably not introduced before the time of Constantine, but an exception was made in the case of the Good Shepherd; and the most lovely example of all is the statue of the 3rd cent. which was found in the Catacomb of St. Callistus, and now stands in the Lateran Museum. Pictures of the Good Shepherd have become popular again in our own time, but they are attempts at portraiture and very far from the idealistic type—it may almost be called a symbol—of the early ages, which represents a shepherd as Christ, and does not attempt to portray Christ as a shepherd.

The symbolism of the Good Shepherd, which had held so prominent a place in the affections of the Church, disappeared rapidly after the 4th cent., and was replaced by another NT type, very different in its meaning, the Agnus Dei, the mystic Lamb of St. John the Baptist and of St. John the Divine. Apparently it was not possible for men's minds to keep in view the two ideas at once of Christ the Shepherd and Christ the Lamb, though this is attempted in the Catacomb of St. Domitilla (2nd cent.), where the Lamb bears the crook and milk-pail of the pastor. The earliest known instance of the identification of Christ with the Lamb is on the spandrels of the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus, who died in 350: Christ is represented among the Three Children, striking water from the Rock, raising Lazarus, multiplying the Loaves, baptized by John, while another spandrel represents the giving of the Law; and in each case all the characters (with the exception of Lazarus) are represented as lambs. In the Catacomb of SS. Peter and Marcellinus there is a fresco (c. 400) of the Lamb, haloed but with no Cross, standing on a hillock from which four streams issue. Apocalyptic scenes were the favourite subject of the great apsidal mosaics of the 6th and 7th cents., and naturally the 'Lamb, standing as though it had been slain,' became more and more the favourite type of Christ. Often the Lamb was accompanied by twelve other lambs issuing from Bethlehem and Jerusalem, to represent the Apostles, as in the apse of SS. Cosmas and Damianus at Rome, A.D. 530.

There is something significant in this identification of the Lord with humanity, paralleled as it is by the earlier tendency to represent under the Fish symbol not only Christ Himself, but also the Christian convert. Established as the type was before the end of the 4th cent., it was not till the 6th that the Lamb was pictured with the nimbus and the cross. By 692 this method of representing Christ had so superseded all others, that the Council in Trullo (Quinisext) decreed 'that henceforth Christ shall be publicly exhibited in the figure of a Man and not of a Lamb, in order that we may be led to remember Christ's conversation in the flesh, and His passion, and saving death, and the redemption which He wrought for the world.' None the less, although the positive object of the decree was attained, the representation of the Agnus Dei was one of the most common symbols of the Middle Ages, in sculpture, in glass, in metal work and embroidery, and sometimes in painting, as in the culminating example of the Van Eyck's great picture at Ghent (c. 1430), where the Lamb stands wounded upon an altar, the blood flowing into a chalice, surrounded by a great company of angels and saints. Thus, this type has proved a most enduring one, in spite of the growing use of actual representations of our Lord after the Quinisext Council.

iii. PORTRAITS OF CHRIST.—4. Scenes from the Gospels.—The earliest pictures of Christ are not attempts at portraiture, but represent His figure only as occurring in scenes from the Gospels: the figure is needed to explain the subject, but it is the figure of a man of varying type, and, as in all early Christian art, without attributes; the character is determined only by its position and by the fact that Christ, like the Apostles and generally other Scripture characters, is always represented as wearing the pallium of the philosopher (not the toga), a convention which has survived down to our own time, though realists like Tissot have begun its destruction. It was not till after the Peace of the Church that the head of Christ was distinguished by a nimbus: this custom began in the Catacombs c. 340, and the nimbus was reserved for the figure of Christ till the end of the 5th cent., when it was given to the Saints as well, and the nimbus of Christ began to be distinguished by a cross within the circle. Among the earliest instances in which the figure of Christ appears are those which represent Him in the same guise as that which was so common in later ages, viz. as an infant in His Mother's arms; but it was for a different reason, since the Mother and Child are but parts of a complete scene, such as that of the Visit of the Magi.

The earliest of all is in the Capella Greca in the Catacomb of St. Priscilla, and belongs to the beginning of the 2nd cent., where three Magi approach the Mother and Child with their offerings: this subject was a very common one, fifteen instances being mentioned by Wilpert in the Catacombs, and it continued so in the succeeding ages of sculpture and mosaic. In the Catacomb of St. Priscilla there is another fresco (of the first half of the 2nd cent.), representing the Virgin and Child sitting, while the figure (the prophet Isaiah) points to a star. The picture of the Virgin and Child in this well-known fresco is very beautiful, recalling in stateliness and grace as well as in design Raphael's treatment of the subject; nothing could be more unlike the hieratic stiffness of the intervening Byzantine and Gothic types. The figure of the Child is naked in this instance, though in some it is draped; but in all, the treatment is that which we are accustomed to associate with the Renaissance. A fine 3rd cent. fresco in the same catacomb has the figure of a female ovans (representing a consecrated virgin) in the midst, while a bishop on one side sits in his cathedra, accompanied by his deacon, and in the act of dedicating a virgin; he points to the figure on the other side of the picture, which is that of the Virgin Mary holding the Child Christ in her lap. There is also one instance of the Child lying alone in a manger (now much decayed) given by de Rossi. To carry the subject a step further, the important 6th cent. mosaic of St. Apollinare Nuovo at Ravenna must be mentioned: along one wall of the nave a procession of male martyrs approaches Christ enthroned between the Virgin and Child similarly enthroned between angels; the Virgin has a plain nimbus and that of the Child contains the cross, while both figures are of the lofty hieratic type that endured for so many subsequent centuries; but it is remarkable that (while the figure of the enthroned Christ on the other wall is approached directly) the procession of female martyrs is led by the Magi, and thus the common tradition is still preserved by which the Mother and Child appear as part of this Gospel scene. This may be taken as a transitional instance, leading on to the later manner of representing the Virgin and Child, which has been the chief theme of Christian art since that age, and the occasion of so many masterpieces, from Cimabue, Giotto, Filippo Lippi, Botticelli, Della Robbia, and the great company of Christian sculptors, Raphael, Michael Angelo, Murillo, and countless others down to our own time.

In the 2nd and 3rd cent. frescoes of the Catacombs the adult figure of Christ appears in many pictures of Gospel events; and it is remarkable that there is in the Catacomb of St. Pretestato a scene from the Passion which is almost as early as the first Virgin and Child,—viz. of the first half of the 2nd cent.,—and yet occurs once only: the Crowning with Thorns is the subject represented, and other scenes from the Passion may have occupied the now vacant spaces which form part of the scheme; yet no other picture of any Holy Week event occurs in the Catacombs. It is remarkable also that the subject most referred to by indirect type—the Resurrection of our Lord—is never once illustrated until the 4th cent.; while the figure of Christ raising Lazarus appears as early as the beginning of the 2nd cent., and occurs in no less than 53 extant examples. It must always be borne in mind that the Catacombs were not, as is popularly supposed, the ordinary churches or hiding-places of the Christians, but were designed and used for burials and services in connexion with the departed, and their art is entirely confined to subjects within this purpose. Thus, the Gospel events are all chosen with reference to two themes—the deliverance and blessedness of the departed, and the sacraments of Baptism and Holy Communion, which were closely bound up with the thought of the faithful departed, as is shown by the reference to baptism in 1 Co 15<sup>20</sup>, and by the many chapels for and pictures of the Eucharist in the Catacombs. Thus, the Raising of Lazarus, the scenes of Healing, the Conversation about the Living Water with the Samaritan woman (as well as the pictures in which our Lord does not appear, such as Jonah and Daniel), all refer to deliverance from the powers of death; while the Baptism of Christ, the Multiplication of the Loaves and Fishes, and the Miracle at Cana, are chosen for their reference to the Sacraments. There is a good deal of convention in the treatment of these subjects—e.g. Lazarus is represented as a mummy erect in a classical doorway, while Christ—youthful and beardless—touches him with a rod. The same scenes are carried on in the sculptures of the sarcophagi—Lazarus, the Miracles of Healing, of the Loaves of Cana, the Epiphany, as well as the Good Shepherd; while in the 4th cent. sarcophagi are found the Entry into Jerusalem, and Christ before Pilate; the limited funeral cycle of subjects is widened out, and in the 5th cent. ivories and the carved doors of St. Sabina there are added Christ Preaching, the Agony in the Garden, the Betrayal, Christ bearing His Cross, Christ and St. Thomas, the Resurrection, and the Ascension.

But the number of events illustrated did not increase rapidly; even in modern times it has continued to be limited, as we are reminded by a comparison with Tissot's illustrated Life of our Lord. The following list of the subjects from the life of Christ which are illustrated in ancient and medieval art is given by Detzel; those which occur in the Catacombs we have italicized:—

Nativity, Virgin and Child, Circumcision, Presentation, Visit of Magi and Shepherds, Flight into Egypt, Christ among the Doctors—Baptism, Temptation, Miracle at Cana, Samaritan Woman, Healing of the Paralysed, of the Woman with the Issue, of the Blind, of the Man with Dropsy, Lepers, Raising of Lazarus, of the Man at Nain, of Jairus' Daughter, Feeding of the Multitude, Casting out Devils, Stilling of the Storm, the Transfiguration,—Entry into Jerusalem, Jesus taking leave of His Mother, by Durer), Washing the Disciples' Feet, Last Supper, Agony in the Garden, Betrayal, Trial, Scourging, Crowning with Thorns, Carrying the Cross, Crucifixion, Descent from Cross ('Pieta' pictures), Burial, (Idealizations of the Passion or 'Misericordienbilder,' as, e.g., in the legend of the Mass of St. Gregory), Christ in Hades, Resurrection, and the subsequent events—Christ greeting the Women, 'Noli me tangere—Journey to Emmaus, Christ appearing to the Apostles, Christ and St. Thomas, Drought of Fishes at the Sea of Tiberias, Ascension, (Last Judgment).

The set of fourteen pictures found in Roman Catholic churches and called the 'Stations of the Cross,' some of which are legendary, are of post-Reformation origin. One scene from the Gospels, the Crucifixion, must be taken separately.

The Crucifixion as a scene from the Gospels (not in isolation) first appears in the 5th cent. on the wooden doors of St. Sabina at Rome. In this earliest example the primitive feeling is shown by the fact that no actual cross appears; Christ and the two thieves stand, almost completely naked, with the elbows near the body and the hands stretched out and nailed to little blocks of wood; the Christ is bearded and with long hair, and his eyes are open; the sculptor has filled up the background with a suggestion of the walls of Jerusalem.—The second example is also of the 5th century. It occurs on an ivory box in the British Museum: the cross is shown, and the Christ is nailed to it with arms stretched out horizontally; His face is youthful and beardless, His eyes open, and His body naked but for the loin-cloth; on one side stands a reviling Jew, on the other Mary and John, while near them Judas hangs from a tree: in this sculpture the title appears REX IVD. It is on another panel of the same box that the earliest representation of Christ bearing the cross appears.—The third Crucifixion is a miniature in a Syrian book of the Gospels, now at Florence, by Rabulas, a monk of Mesopotamia, and is dated 586: the Christ is bearded, and wears a long tunic; as in the former example, the feet are separate and the arms horizontal; the two thieves, St. John and the women, and the two soldiers with the spear and sponge, are included in the picture.

The history of the development of the Crucifix may be thus summarized. Appearing first as a scene of Gospel history in the 5th cent., it continued infrequent for another century, after which, in the 6th cent., the Crucifix in isolation begins also to appear. During the 5th, 6th, and 7th centuries it has the following characteristics: the Christ wears either a loin-cloth or a long tunic reaching to the ankles, there are nails in the hands and generally in the feet also, the feet are always separate, either with or without the block or 'suppedaneum'; the Christ is always living, He wears neither the royal crown nor the crown of thorns, the title, when there is one, consists generally of the letters IC XC, the cross is either commissa (†) or immissa (‡); certain adjuncts also appear, the sun and moon generally, the thieves often, Mary and John generally, the two soldiers sometimes, sometimes also the soldiers dicing, and sometimes Adam and Eve.

About the time of Charlemagne (800) there was a great increase in the use of the Crucifix; and in addition to the early or Ideal type, a second type, the Realistic, began to appear. The Ideal type continued till the end of the 13th cent. (e.g. in the Codex Egberti at Trèves, c.1000, where the Christ is represented with a youthful, almost girlish face, and living, though without the royal crown, which is often added at this period to emphasize the triumphant aspect of the Crucifixion). The Realistic type, in which the Christ is represented dying, as in modern crucifixes, had become in the 11th cent. a distinctive mark of the Eastern Church, and figures in the disputes which ended in the great schism of 1054: Cardinal Humbert accused the Greeks of putting a dying Christ upon their crosses, and thus setting up a kind of Antichrist; the Patriarch Michael Cerularius retorted, in the discussion at Constantinople, that the Western custom was against nature, while the East was according to nature. None the less, the Eastern type had already found its way into Italy itself through the influence of the Byzantine craftsmen who worked there, and it spread steadily throughout the West, till by the 13th cent. it was the dominant type all over Christendom. There was sometimes in the transitional period a mingling of the types, as, e.g., in the Crucifix over the gate of St. John's Church at Gmünd, where the figure is youthful, with open eyes and in a tranquil posture, without the crown of thorns, but the wounds and head are shown, and the arms are bent and the head drooping. The complete Realistic type is well illustrated in the altar-cross at the Klosternburg, Vienna, A.D. 1181, where the body is collapsed, the knees bent, the arms wrung, and the head sunk. In the 13th cent. the Crown of Thorns appears, and the feet are laid one over the other, so that the figure is held by three nails instead of four. The Realistic tendency of the Middle Ages entirely ousted the earlier triumphant type, and in the 14th cent. only the dead Christ is found upon the Cross in art. The revival of painting at this period led to a further increase of Realism, and the artists who pioneered the Renaissance delighted in the display of their anatomical knowledge: none the less there is much majesty of quiet reserve in such Crucifixions as those of Angelico in the 15th or that of Luini at Lugano in the 16th century. Among the famous examples may be mentioned those of Giotto (at Padua), Mantegna, Perugino (at Florence), Antonello da Messina, Martin Schongauer, Hans Memling, Raphael, Pintoreti, Veronese, Rubens, and Vandyke,—the later being the more painful. The great Crucifixion by Velasquez, in the 17th cent. at Madrid, illustrates the furthest point which was reached. Westcott truly says that it 'presents the thought of hopeless defeat. No early Christian would have dared to look upon it.' The same type—a tortured figure hanging low from the hands—continues in the Crucifixes of the 18th cent., though the mediæval type was revived in the 19th, and at the present day there is a tendency to revert to the earliest Ideal type which showed Christ 'reigning from the tree.' There can be little dispute as to the fact that the mediæval Crucifix did tend to over-emphasize one aspect of our Lord's life, though its constant use in Lutheran churches forbids us to connect it specially with one set of opinions. There would perhaps have been less feeling on the subject among English people if the Ideal type had been used—the benedictory figure, draped and crowned, which embodies the idea but does not attempt to represent the appearance of our Lord's death.

2. Symbolical Scenes.—As we have seen, the earliest of any representations of Christ is under the form of the Good Shepherd, and occurs before the end of the 1st cent., while close upon this come pictures of Him in His Mother's arms, and a picture of His Baptism and of the Crowning with Thorns in the first half of the 2nd century. Before the close of the 2nd cent. there appear representations of Him in scenes that are symbolical of Christian doctrine; and the earliest of these are in connexion with the Sacraments, while in the 3rd and 4th centuries the pictures of Him surrounded by Saints in glory begin to appear.

(a) Sacrament Pictures.—In addition to the Gospel scenes of the Feeding of the Multitude, the Miracle of Cana, and the Baptism of Christ, in the Catacombs, there are Sacrament pictures that are purely symbolical.

In the Sacrament Chapels of St. Callistus, whose decorations belong to the second half of the 2nd cent., there is a figure of our Lord, beardless and wearing the pallium as usual, stretching out His hands in the gesture of consecration over a tripod on which lie loaves and the mystic fish, while an orans, typical figure of the soul of the person buried in the tomb, stands by. Among other pictures in the same place is one supposed to represent the Seven Disciples at the Sea of Tiberias after the Resurrection; Christ is giving them bread and fish, while further along in the same picture a fisherman is represented drawing a fish out of the water, to symbolize union with Christ in baptism, and further still is Moses striking the rock: thus Baptism and the Eucharist are symbolized together. This connexion of the two Sacraments is very common, and often it is done by the juxtaposition of the Feeding of the Multitude, of which there are in the Catacombs 28 examples in all, and Moses Striking the Rock, of which there are no less than 68 examples. In the same chamber is a picture of the baptism of a catechumen, and near it the Baptism of Christ in the river, out of which a fisherman is drawing a fish. In other places the idea is abbreviated into a mere hieroglyph of loaves or loaves and fishes.

In the Middle Ages there was a very popular form of Sacrament picture, which had reference, however, to the sacrifice and not to Communion, viz. the 'Mass of St. Gregory,' referred to above, where Christ appears upon the altar with the attributes of His Passion, wounded, and crowned with thorns. The modern Eucharistic pictures of our Lord, which are common among both Catholics and Protestants, need only the bare mention here.

(b) Pictures of Christ in Majesty.—There are no pictures of our Lord alone, or of Him as the central dominating figure of a formal group, till the 3rd century. Up till then—from as early a period as the end of the 1st cent.—the artists, when they wished to represent Him alone (as often in the centre of a decorated vault), were content to do so under the type of the Good Shepherd. At the beginning of the 3rd cent. there appears in the Catacomb of St. Praxetato the earliest picture of Christ as a solitary figure; He sits reading the Law; the face is young and beardless, and the hair is so ample as to give almost a feminine aspect. In the same century pictures occur of our Lord sitting in judgment, surrounded by saints, as, e.g., in the Ninziatella cemetery, where the Christ, beardless as usual, but with hair falling over the forehead, holds a scroll of the Law, and in the panels round the vault are four saints alternating with four orantes. There are seven examples in the Catacombs of Christ seated in the midst of the Twelve Apostles, and one of Him with the Four Evangelists, and also nine busts, all painted in the 4th cent., i.e. the Constantinian era, besides one of Christ giving crowns to saints, which is not earlier than the beginning of the 4th century. There is a sculpture of Christ enthroned on the sarcophagus of Junius Bassus († 350); and the same subject is often beautifully carved on the ivories of the 4th, 5th, and 6th centuries. By the end of the 4th cent. the great mosaic pictures of Christ in glory begin, the earliest being in the church of St. Pudenziana in Rome, c. 390. These became thenceforward the leading feature of the apsidal decoration of the basilicas in the 5th and 6th centuries; and they are by far the greatest and most imposing of the early pictures of our Lord. He is represented in these mosaics as enthroned in the glory of the Apocalypse, among the angels, the Apostles, and other saints and martyrs. The last great mosaic of our Lord occurs over the central door within the nave of St. Sofia, Constantinople: in this famous picture Christ sits upon a throne, while an emperor prostrates himself at His feet, and on either side are medallions of the Virgin and St. Michael.

Pictures and statues of our Lord in Majesty are common in the Middle Ages, when other symbolical representations occur. A favourite one (which is often found in the uppermost light of stained glass windows, and in other forms of art) is the Coronation of the Virgin by our Lord, which, like the Mass of St. Gregory, is characteristic of the change that had come over Christendom at that time. There should be mentioned also, as illustrating the lowest depths of materialism in religious art, the anthropomorphic representations of the Holy Trinity, which appear as early as the 9th cent.; in some the Son bears a cross, while the Father is distinguished by a tiara, and the Holy Spirit by a dove over His head; in others there are two human figures with a dove between them; in others the Father holds a Crucifix upon which a dove descends; there are even examples of a human figure with three faces.

A new type of symbolical Portrait—the 'Sacred Heart'—has been popular among Roman Catholics since Margaret Mary Alcouque started that cultus in 1674. As a symbol by itself the Heart is already to be found in the 16th cent.—often with the Crown of Thorns, or the Nails, and the monogram IHS. In the Sacred Heart pictures and statues which appeared after the new cultus had been started, the heart of the Saviour is, by a violent symbolism, disclosed within His breast; it is marked with a wound, surmounted by a Cross, and often surrounded by flames and the Crown of Thorns.

3. Types of Portraiture.—In the first five centuries three distinct types appear in the portraiture of Christ. They are thus classified by Detzel:

First type.—A youthful beardless figure of purely ideal character, such as is found in the usual classical subjects, thus representing the perfect and eternal humanity of our Lord. Kraus calculates that there are 104 examples of this type in the Catacombs, 97 in the sarcophagi, 14 in the mosaics, 45 in gold glasses, 50 in other arts, and 3 in MSS. Although the earliest representations are of this kind (indeed the 3rd and 4th cent. pictures of Christ in Majesty are as purely ideal as are the 1st and 2nd cent. pictures of the Good Shepherd), there are instances also of the beardless Christ in the mosaics (e.g. in the Raising of Lazarus at St. Apollinare Nuova, and the Throned Christ at St. Vitale, both of the 6th cent.), in the time of Charlemagne, and as late as the 13th cent., e.g. in the golden altar at Aix-la-Chapelle, where the Christ is of youthful aspect and enthroned.

Second type.—Christ is represented bearded, in the fulness of manly strength; thus there is still the conception of an ideal humanity, immortal and unmortified, without harshness and without sorrow. Examples occur frequently in the mosaics of the 4th to 6th cents., as at St. Pudenziana, St. Maria Maggiore at Rome, St. Apollinare in Classe, and St. Vitale at Ravenna; and also in the late 7th or 8th cent. fresco of the Catacombs of St. Genesio.

Third type.—The Byzantine type, which appears thrice in the Roman mosaics of the 5th and 6th cents. (e.g. at St. Paolo fuori le Mura), and embodies the growing monastic asceticism of the time. Christ in this type appears older and more severe, with longer hair and beard, deep-set eyes and hard features. This developed into the still harder and stiffer 'debased Byzantine' type.

To these may be added the Modern type, in which artists innumerable have striven to embody their highest conceptions of human perfection and Divine goodness. After the long sleep of pictorial art, the revival of sculpture and painting gave us such statues as the Beau Dieu of Amiens, and all the famous pictures of such artists as Oragna, Fra Angelico, Masaccio, Perugino, Raphael, Leonardo, Luini, Michael Angelo, Titian, Dürer, Guido, Murillo, Rubens,—to mention only some typical instances,—and the many works of our own times. All have followed in the main the type which the mediæval and Renaissance artists obtained from the legendary descriptions which are mentioned below.

iv. THE QUESTION OF THE LIKENESS OF CHRIST.—It is obvious from what has been already stated, that no true portraits of Christ have come down to us, and that no attempt was made at reproducing His likeness in the first centuries. The earliest portraits varied much in type, and had only this in common—that they were all idealistic, representing the countenance of a man unmarred by faults or peculiarities; while, in particular, the art of the Catacombs and of the earliest sculpture, with entire disregard of historic actuality, represented the Lord under the type of a beautiful youth. The early controversy as to the appearance of Christ shows how entirely all tradition of His actual appearance was lost.

Influenced by certain OT passages (e.g. Is 53), Justin Martyr had already said, in the earliest extant reference to the aspect of Jesus, that He appeared 'without beauty' (Tryph. 14, 36, 85, 88); later, Clement of Alexandria had also argued in favour of Christ being 'unlovely in the flesh' (Strom. iii. 17); Tertullian went so far as to say, He was 'not even in His aspect comely' (c. Jud. 14). So we find that Celsus taunted the Christians for worshipping one of mean appearance, to which Origen replied (c. Cels. vi. 74, 75) that Christ's person must have had about it something noble and Divine, and quoted the Transfiguration to show that His aspect depended upon the capacity of the spectator. St. Jerome, on the other hand, appealed to Ps 44 as a proof of Christ's beauty; and thus there arose two schools—those who held that He was 'fairer than the children of men,' among whom were St. Augustine, St. Ambrose, and St. Chrysostom, and those who, in their ascetic reaction against the vices of pagan beauty-worship, declared that He had 'no form nor comeliness' and 'no beauty that we should desire him,' among whom were St. Basil and St. Cyril of Alexandria.

If we turn from these disputations to the Gospels, we find, indeed, no descriptions of our Lord, but we discover on every page One whose personality had a wonderfully attractive power, and whose dignity impressed friends and foes alike. And we may conclude that the instinct of the Church as a whole was right in attributing beauty to the Son of Man, since the Incarnation was the taking on of the perfection and fullness of humanity. At the time of the controversy, those on the extreme ascetic side went so far as to make hideous pictures of the Redeemer; but the idealism of early art had an easy triumph in the end, because Christ is indeed the Ideal of humanity, and the outward form of man is ultimately the expression of the soul within.

The fact that the early portraits of Christ are purely ideal is the more remarkable, because there are strongly characterized portraits of St. Peter and St. Paul of the 2nd and 3rd centuries. The representations of Christ in the Gospel scenes of the 2nd and 3rd cents. are, as has been stated above, merely figures of the classical type necessary for the determination of the incident depicted, and only to be distinguished by the situation in which He is represented, and partly by the pallium in which He and the Apostles are always portrayed.

It is hardly necessary to dwell on the portrait of Himself which Christ was fabled to have sent to Abgar, king of Edessa, by the hand of Thaddæus; or on the various legends of Veronica and her napkin. St. Peter's at Rome is claimed to possess the true handkerchief of Veronica; but of this relic Bartier de Montaut, who saw it in 1854, says that 'the place of the impression exhibits only a blackish surface, not giving any evidence of human features,' and he adds that the supposed copies of it have no iconographic value whatever (Ann. Archéol. xxiii. 223).

The emperor Alexander Severus (acc. 222) placed in his laurarium the image of Christ, as well as those of Abraham and Orpheus; a sect of Gnostics also venerated images of Christ, Pythagoras, Plato, and Aristotle; but in neither case is it claimed that actual portraits were used. Eusebius (c. 325) tells us that a bronze statue of Christ stretching out His hands to a kneeling woman had stood till the time of the emperor Maximin Dala (acc. 308) at Caesarea Philippi, and that he himself had seen it at Paneas (HE vii. 18); in his time it was regarded as a representation of Christ, erected in gratitude by the woman whom He had healed of the issue (also called Veronica). Most historians hold with Gibbon, that it was really the statue of an emperor receiving the submission of a province, and that this accounts for the inscription, 'To the Saviour the Benefactor'; but, on the other hand, it is urged as improbable that Eusebius should have mistaken so familiar a subject, or that it should have been removed by Maximin from its public position and ultimately destroyed by Julian the Apostate (acc. 361) if a pagan character could have been proved for it. There is thus a chance that one supposed actual portrait of Christ did exist before the 4th century.

Eusebius himself, however, in his well-known letter to Constantia (Migne, Patr. Gr. xx. 1515), says plainly that images of Christ are 'nowhere to be found in churches, and it is notorious that with us alone they are forbidden,' and mentions that he took away from a woman two painted figures like philosophers which the owner took for representations of Paul and the Saviour, 'not thinking it right in any case that she should exhibit them further, that we may not seem like idolaters to carry our God about in an image.' Here both the dislike of anything like portraits of Christ and the reason for that dislike are plainly stated. However, the establishment of Christianity in the Empire rapidly caused a change of feeling, and images were soon common. With the half-pagan people this led to idolatry, and the Iconoclastic Controversy in the East (716-842) was the result: one of the earliest incidents in that long struggle was the removal by Leo the Isaurian of the statue of Christ which stood over the bronze gateway of his palace at Constantinople; in its place he set up a plain cross. The second Council of Nicaea (787) vindicated the use of images; but they were not finally restored till 842. The West was untouched by the controversy, and the use of all kinds of images went on unchecked; but in the East statues are not allowed within the churches—but only pictures—to this day. The pictures of the East have retained their rigidly conservative character; but in the West the greatest artists have striven from age to age to represent our Lord in the utmost majesty and beauty.

The type which they ultimately settled upon was doubtless influenced by the supposed descriptions of Christ's appearance, though none of these have any historical value.

The most famous is the letter of 'Lentulus, president of the people of Jerusalem,' to the Roman Senate, a forgery of about the 12th century. 'There has appeared in our times,' writes the supposed Lentulus, 'a man of tall stature, beautiful with a venerable countenance, which they who look on it can both love and fear. His hair is waving and crisp, somewhat wine-coloured, and glittering as it flows down over his shoulders, with a parting in the middle, after the manner of the Nazarenes. His brow is smooth and most serene; his face is without any spot or wrinkle, and glows with a delicate flush. His nose and mouth are of faultless contour; the beard is abundant, and hazel coloured like his hair, not long but forked. His eyes are prominent, brilliant, and change their colour. In denunciation he is terrible; in admonition, calm and loving, cheerful, but with unimpaired dignity. He has never been seen to laugh, but oftentimes to weep. His hands and his limbs are beautiful to look upon. In speech he is grave, reserved, modest; and he is fair among the children of men.' This beautiful description was doubtless influenced by earlier works of art and embodied earlier traditions, as that, for instance, of St. John Damascene, the champion of images against Leo the Isaurian (c. 730) and the last of the Greek Fathers; he described our Lord as beautiful and tall, with fair and slightly curling locks, dark eyebrows which met in the middle, an oval countenance, a pale complexion, olive-tinted, and of the colour of wheat, with eyes bright like His Mother's, a slightly stooping attitude, with a sweet and sonorous voice and a look expressive of patience, nobleness, and wisdom (J. Dan. Opp. i. 340). In another place (ib. 680) he indignantly reproaches the Manichees with the view once held by earlier Fathers, that the Lord was lacking in beauty.

Thus we may safely conclude that there is no authentic portrait or description of Christ, while admitting that the type accepted for more than a thousand years is all that a Christian can desire, since it is that of a perfect humanity in which, so far as men could portray it, the fullness of God dwells bodily.

LITERATURE.—Wilpert's Roma Sotterranea (1903) gives for the first time accurate reproductions of the frescoes in the Catacombs, with an exhaustive study carrying on the work of de Rossi (Roma Sotterranea, 1854-1867, tr. by Northcote and Brownlow). Garrucci's Storia dell'Arte cristiana (1873-1881) is being supplanted by the accuracy of mechanical reproductions. Also by Wilpert are Principienfragen der christlichen Archäologie (1899), Ein Cyclus christologischer Gemälde (1901), Die Gottgeweihten Jungfrauen in den ersten Jahrhunderten (1892), Fractio Panis (1896), Die Malereien der Sacraments-Kapellen (1897). The Catacombs are also described by O. Marocchi, Le Catacombe Romane (1905). See also A. Venturi, Storia dell'Arte Italiana (1901), an exhaustive illustrated history, in progress; H. Detzel, Christliche Ikonographie (1896); V. Schultze, Archäologie der altchristlichen Kunst (1895);

F. X. Kraus, Geschichte der christlichen Kunst (1896); O. Marouchi, Éléments d'Archéologie Chrétienne (1900). Among earlier works are Rohault de Fleury, L'Évangile (1874), La Messe (1885-1889); Grimonard et de Saint-Laurent, Iconographie de la Croix in Didron's Annales (1869). W. Lowrie's admirable illustrated handbook on Christian Art and Archaeology gives a bibliography of special works on early painting, sculpture, ivories, mosaics, etc. Westcott, in his Epistles of St. John, Appendix III, cites the Patristic authorities. The dictionaries by Smith-Cheestman (D.C.A., 1876-1893), Kraus (A.E., 1886), and Martigny (Dict. des antiquités chrétiennes, 1877 and 1889) are all somewhat out of date, but the first is the best. Slighter books are A. Parat, L'Archéologie chrétienne (1902); F. W. Farrar, The Life of Christ in Art (1894), which is useful but not always accurate; E. L. Curtis' handbook on Early Christian Art (1898). Wyke Baylis' Bez. Repts (1898) is a quite uncritical attempt to prove the existence of authentic portraits, based partly on Heaphy, Likeness of Christ (1880). Mrs. Jameson's History of Our Lord (1864), Lepus of the Madonna (1867), Poetry of Sacred and Legendary Art (1849), are naturally in need of some revision. Later works are J. Hoppenot, Le Christ dans l'Histoire (1899); M. Engels, Die Christen im Christ (1899); J. Cartwright, Christ and His Mother in Italian Art (1897); J. L. French, Christ in Sacred Art (1900); A. Venturi, La Madonna (1900), and many general books on art and artists.

PERCY DEARMER.

CHRISTIAN (The Name).—The word 'Christian' occurs in the NT only in Ac 11<sup>26</sup> 26<sup>38</sup> (about 20 years later), and 1 P 4<sup>16</sup>. The author of Acts alludes to it once in his earlier treatise (Lk 6<sup>22</sup>), however, putting into the mouth of Jesus a sentiment whose linguistic form, at least, is coloured by the experiences and terminology of the Apostolic age. In some other passages where it is apparently mentioned (e.g. Ac 5<sup>41</sup>, Ja 2<sup>7</sup>), the 'name' is not 'Christian' but 'Christ,' while the references in Josephus (Ant. xviii. iii. 3) and the Pompeii inscription (C.I.L. i. 675), it may be noted in passing, are too uncertain to be used as evidence for the title. Other and later inscriptions, however, are accessible.

For the origin and primitive usage of the term we are thus thrown back upon the three first-named passages. Of these, the fontal reference in Ac 11<sup>26</sup> explains that the name by which the religion of Jesus has been known for nineteen centuries was coined by the pagan slang of Antioch on the Orontes, a city which, like Alexandria, was noted for its nicknames. Yet the title is not a rough sobriquet. It expresses a certain contempt, but not derision, though St. Luke does not inform us whether it was coined by the mob or by government officials. 'Christian' (Χριστιανός) simply means 'a follower of Christ,' just as Pompeianus or Herodianus denotes 'a follower or partisan of Pompey' or 'of Herod.' 'Christ' was thus taken as a proper name. It meant no more to these Syrian pagans than some leader of revolt or obscure religious fanatic in Palestine. His name was ever on the lips of a certain set of people, and it was but natural that these should, for the sake of convenience, be distinguished as 'Christ's adherents' or 'Christians.' Unconsciously, in giving the title—which there is no evidence to show was applied previously to Jews—these citizens of Antioch were emphasizing one deep truth of the new religion, viz. that it rested not on a dogma or upon an institution, but on a person; and that its simple and ultimate definition was to be found in a relationship to Jesus Christ, whether 'Christos' to these Syrian Antiochians was some strange god (Ac 17<sup>23</sup>) or a Jewish agitator. An outstanding trait in the Christians whom Pliny found in Bithynia was that they 'sang a hymn to Christ as to a god' (Plin. Ep. x. 96, ad Trigan.) at worship. From the impression made by facts and features like this, it was but a step to designate the new sect as 'Christ's folk or party.'

It was neither the original nor the chosen name of believers in Jesus Christ. Their inner titles (see Weizsäcker's Apost. Age, i. p. 43 f.) were 'brethren,' 'disciples,' and 'saints,' all of which preceded, and for some time survived alongside of,

'Christians.' Nor could the title have been coined by the Jews, who would never have admitted that Jesus of Nazareth was the 'Christ.' To them believers in Jesus were 'Nazarenes' or 'Galileans.' It was the pagan community of Antioch alone that would invent and apply this title. Now a name implies life. Titles are not required unless and until a definite, energetic fact emerges. And the need evidently felt for some such designation as 'Christian' arose from two causes: (a) from the conspicuous extension of the new movement throughout the country and the city, and (b) more particularly from the predominance of Gentile Christians, who could not be provisionally grouped, like most of their Jewish fellow-believers, with the community and worship of Judaism. There was a Jewish ghetto at Antioch. But the local, heterogeneous paganism yielded an incomparably richer harvest to the efforts of the Christian age, so that the general success of the movement produced, for the first time, a noticeable alteration in the proportions of Jewish and Gentile Christians—so noticeable, indeed, that, as the historian points out, it necessitated an attempt on the part of the outside public to verbally classify the adherents of the new faith. The significance of this step is patent to the historian. He signals the crisis. The Christianity he knew was overwhelmingly a Gentile Christianity, and in Ac 11<sup>26</sup> he is keen to mark its début, as well as to suggest that the name 'Christian' was primarily and principally applied to Gentile Christians. 'Truly,' as Renan observes, 'it is remarkable to think that, ten years after Jesus died, His religion already possessed, in the capital of Syria, a name in the Greek and Latin languages. Christianity speaks Greek, and is now finally launched into that great vortex of the Greek and Roman world which it will never leave.' Its weaning from the breast of Judaism had commenced. And this was due to that increasing sense of Christ's personal authority which has been already noted (cf. Amiel's Journal Intime, Eng. tr. p. 3 f.). The more the significance of this came to be grasped, as the new faith expanded beyond the precincts of Judaism, the more did the distinctive universalism of the Gospel assume its true place.

For, while the basal conception of 'Christian' is Semitic ('Christ'), the linguistic termination (-ianus) is either Latin or (more probably) Greek. Even were it Latin, it would be hasty to attribute (with Baur) the origin of the term to Rome, where Tacitus is our first pagan witness for its currency about A.D. 110. Early designations in -αἰῶς (cf. Mk 9<sup>37</sup>, Justin's Dial. 35) were not infrequent among the Greeks of Asia Minor, and it is arbitrary scepticism to hold that St. Luke in Ac 11<sup>26</sup> must have antedated and misplaced the origin of the name, or that Tacitus has done the same. The latter (Annal. xv. 44) describes Nero's victims as 'men whom the common people loathed for their secret crimes, calling them Christians. The name was derived from Christ, who had been put to death by Pontius Pilate, the procurator, during the reign of Tiberius.' Long before that period it must have been the interest of the Jews and Christians alike to differentiate themselves to some degree, one from the other. And the circumstances of the Neronian éméute, which was probably instigated by the Jews, must have made the distinction plain, once and for all, to the local authorities. The inherent probabilities of the case, therefore, seem to preclude any reasonable suspicion of a hysteron-proteron upon the part of the Roman historian; nor is it unnatural, even for rigid historical criticism, to admit that the distinctive name of 'Christian' may have been coined and current nearly twenty years earlier upon the banks of the Orontes. In short, both passages in Acts give one the impression of being historically authentic reminiscences; had the author been more anxious to emphasize the new name, he would not have employed it so sparingly and incidentally.

It is curious to notice that, outside the Church, Epictetus, slightly later than Paul, used 'Galileans,' while Marcus Aurelius employed 'Christians.'

In 1 P 4<sup>18</sup> (cf. Lk 6<sup>22</sup>, Jn 16<sup>2</sup>), together with Pliny's letters (Epp. x. 96, 97) less than fifty years later, we catch one glimpse of the connexion between the name 'Christian' and the civil or social penalties in which it involved believers (cf. Mommsen and Ramsay in Expositor, 4th series [1893], vol. viii.). To 'suffer as a Christian' i.e. (for being a Christian) covers a wide range of experience, from molestation to official and even capital punishment. The latter extreme, however, is not prominent in this passage, although the term ἀποκρίβη certainly suggests it. But the vague outline of 1 P 4<sup>18</sup> is filled out and vividly coloured by the later evidence of Pliny and of the 2nd cent. martyrs' literature, which shows how Christianity was treated as a forbidden or illicit religion, hostile to the national cult, and therefore exposing any of its adherents, without further question, to the punishment of death.

How soon and how far the mere name of 'Christian' was thus a capital offence, it is not easy to determine, but by the 2nd cent. the ordinary formula of confession before a magistrate was, 'I am a Christian.' This was put forward as the natural and sufficient reason for refusing to swear by the genius of the Emperor, and it was usually accepted by the authorities as final. Polycarp's martyrdom at Smyrna is our earliest case in point. But the story of the martyr Socrates is told long afterwards, shows how widespread was this habit. When tortured by the authorities, 'he steeled himself so firmly against them, that he would not so much as tell his name or nation or city. All his answer to their inquiries was, "I am a Christian" (Eus. HE v. 1). Pliny's account of his own judicial proceedings is equally blunt and plain. When people were accused of Christianity, he writes, "I asked them personally whether they were Christians; if they confessed it, I asked them a second and a third time, threatening them with punishment. Then, if they adhered to their confession, I ordered them off to execution." The test applied to doubtful cases was that of offering worship to the Emperor's statue. "No real Christian," says the governor, "can be made to do that." Nor could the name of Christian be legally borne by any one who added sacrifice to high treason, in refusing to worship the ancestral gods of the State. Christianity, ipso facto, was a challenge to these deities. Hence to avow the name of 'Christian' was to expose oneself to pains and penalties, either voluntarily or involuntarily incurred.

Both 1 P 4<sup>18</sup> and Ac 26<sup>28</sup> denote the use of the title by outsiders (Ja 2<sup>7</sup> referring probably to 'Christ,' not 'Christian'), and this is corroborated by the evidence of Christian writings in the 2nd cent., where we find that its comparatively rare occurrence is confined mainly to the Christian apologists, i.e. to writers who were principally concerned with the outward relations of the faith to society and to the State. Traces of its use among Christians themselves are to be found, however, in Asia Minor during the first quarter of the 2nd cent. (Ignatius—himself a native of Antioch—and the Didache, cf. Mart. Polyc. 3, 'the God-beloved and God-fearing people of the Christians'), in Gaul by the middle of the 2nd cent. (Eus. HE v. 1), and elsewhere (cf. Ep. ad Diogn. 'Christians are in the world as the soul is in the body,' etc. etc.). Gradually, as time went on, the title came to assume the position of authority which it has occupied for centuries, though it does not seem to occur on a tomb till the close of the 3rd cent. (Asia Minor). And this process was marked, if not accelerated, by a double play upon the word. (i.) It was often pronounced or mispronounced Chrestians, as if derived from the familiar proper name Chrestus (cf. Suet. Claud. 25), the vernacular adjective χρηστός being equivalent to 'kindly,' 'excellent,' 'worthy' (cf.

1 P 2<sup>9</sup>, perhaps a slight play on the word). Such is the reading of 8 in the NT passages, of most of the inscriptions, of Tacitus (apparently), and of Suetonius (Claud. 25, 'Chresto') certainly. Writers like Justin, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria catch at this idea. On the principle of nomen et omen, they retort upon their critics and opponents, 'If our name has this meaning, why hold it up to opprobrium? Does it not suit our characters?' Perhaps, too, as Harnack conjectures, the very choice of the imperfect appellabat, instead of the present appellat, indicates that Tacitus seeks to draw a distinction between the popular mistake in A.D. 64 and the more correct usage of his own day (c. 110). 'The common people used to call them Chrestians (while nowadays, of course, we know that their proper name is Christians).' (ii.) The other play upon the word was more private, though it also may have originated in some popular etymology. It was connected with Christos as 'the anointed.' 'We are called Christians,' says Theophilus (ad Autol. i. 12), 'because we are anointed with the oil of God' (χρίσμα ελαίου Θεοῦ, cf. Tert. Apol. 3, and Justin's Dial.).—These and other motives contributed to render the term so popular, that there are traces, as early as Tertullian (loc. cit.) and Eusebius (HE ii. 11. 3), of a disposition to ignore or deny its pagan origin and to represent it as a creation of the Apostolic or early Christian consciousness. So holy and catholic a title, it was felt, must have arisen inside the Church. Ignatius twice employs it in order to plead for Christians who are Christians in deed as well as in name (Magn. 4, Rom. 3)—a significant allusion. And he usually employs 'Christianity' (which first occurs in his Epistles, cf. Magn. 10, Phil. 6) as the antithesis to Judaism.

Two and a half centuries later came Julian's reaction against the title. It was dictated, as Gibbon admits, partly from a superstitious fear of the sacred name, and partly from contempt for it and for its bearers. "As he was sensible that the Christians gloried in the name of their Redeemer, he countenanced, and perhaps enjoined, the use of the less honourable appellation of Galileans" (Decline and Fall, ii. 540, Bell's ed.). Naturally this restriction had but a limited and transient effect. 'Christian' became more and more the watchword of the Church, despite the rise of 'catholic' within and the use of 'Nazarene' (in the East) without.

In the modern usage of the term, three points are of especial interest. One is the frank denial, by Strauss and others, of any right, upon the part of modern Christians, to the title in question (see an uncompromising article in the Fortnightly Review, March 1873, entitled 'Are we yet Christians?'), presupposing that the Apostles' Creed is the norm of Christianity. The opposite view is well put by Rathbone Greg (Creed of Christendom, vol. i. p. xlix f.). The second point is the deliberate repudiation of the name, as savouring of sectarianism, by certain Unitarians (cf. the first volume of Dr. Martineau's Life, by Drummond and Upton). And, thirdly, it is interesting to notice that an American sect, dating from the revival of 1801, called themselves by the name of 'Christians' (pronouncing the first 'long'), in order to bring out their unsectarian principles.

Bunyan made 'Christian' the antithesis to 'graceless,' and various other definitions, practical and philosophical, have been essayed. For Mr. Samuel Laing's, see his Problems of the Future (ch. viii.), and cf. Mr. Le Gallienne's Religion of a Literary Man (ch. vii.), and Sir John Seeley's Natural Religion (pt. ii. ch. iii.). 'He who can pray the Lord's Prayer sincerely must surely be a Christian,' says Rothe; while Martineau's definition, in reference to a church, runs thus: 'inbued with Christ's spirit, teaching His religion, worshipping His God and Father, and accepting His law of self-sacrifice.' Perhaps the data of the NT would be covered adequately by the declaration that the name 'Christian' belongs to any one who can call Jesus 'Lord' in the sense of 1 Co 12<sup>9</sup>. See, further, the following article.

JAMES MOFFATT.

CHRISTIANITY is the name given to the religion founded by Jesus of Nazareth, which is professed by more than one-fourth of the human race, including the foremost nations of the world. As an abstract name for a fully developed religion, it was not, and could not be, in use from the beginning. Only gradually, as the Christian community reached self-consciousness, and more especially as need arose from without of distinguishing its adherents from those of other religions, was a distinctive name adopted.

It is not the object of this article to sketch in outline the history of Christianity, to rehearse its doctrines, describe its triumphs, or vindicate its claims. But in a Dictionary of this kind it seems desirable to inquire into (1) the history of the name itself; (2) the proper connotation of the name and the best mode of ascertaining it; hence (3) the significance of the changes which have passed over Christianity in the process of its development; and (4) the essential character of the religion named after Christ and portrayed in the Gospels.

i. HISTORY OF THE NAME.—This is fully discussed in the preceding article.

ii. CONNOTATION OF THE NAME.—The difficulties which arise when we attempt to mark out the correct connotation of the word are obvious, and the reason why some of them are insuperable is not far to seek. A definition should be simple, comprehensive, accurate; whereas Christianity is a complex multiform phenomenon, one which it is impossible to survey from all sides at the same time, and accuracy cannot be attained when a word is employed in many different senses, and when that which is to be defined is regarded from so many subjective, diversified, and sometimes incompatible points of view. The essence of a great historical religion—with a record extending over some two thousand years, taking different shapes in many diverse nationalities, itself developing and altering its hue and character, if not its substance, in successive generations—cannot easily be summed up in a sentence. Whilst, if an attempt be made to describe that element of permanent vitality and validity in the religion which has remained the same through ages of growth, unaltered amidst the widest external and internal modifications and changes, the character of such a description obviously depends upon the viewpoint of the observer.

A religion may be viewed from without or from within, and an estimate made accordingly either of its institutions and formularies and ceremonies, or of its dominant ideas and prevailing principles. To the Roman Catholic—who represents the most widely spread and influential of the sections of modern Christianity—its essence consists in submission to the authority of a supernaturally endowed Church, to which, with the Pope at its head, the power has been committed by Christ of infallibly determining the Christian creed, and of finally directing Christian life and worship in all its details. The Catholic Church, according to Möhler and the modern school, is a prolongation of the Incarnation. To the Orthodox Church of the East, the paramount claim of the community on the allegiance of the faithful depends on its having preserved with purity and precision the formal creed, fixed more than a thousand years ago, from which, it is alleged, all other Christians have more or less seriously departed. The Protestant regards his religion from an entirely different standpoint. He may be of the 'evangelical' type, in which case he will probably define Christianity as the religion of those who have accepted the authority of an inspired and infallible Bible, and who trust for salvation to the merits of the death of Christ as their atoning Saviour. If he claims to be a 'liberal' Protestant, he will describe Christianity as a life, not a creed, and declare that all attempts to define belief concerning the Person of Christ and other details of Christian doctrine are so many mischievous restrictions, which only fetter the free thought and action of the truly emancipated followers of Jesus.

Under such circumstances, can any considerable measure of agreement as to the real essence of Christianity be reached, or a truly scientific definition be attained? The acceptance of the supernatural authority of a single community would put an end to all discussion, but those who appeal to such authority are not agreed amongst themselves. As an alternative, it has been usual of late to fall back on history as the sole possible arbiter. The historian can only recount with as much impartiality as possible the sequence of events in a long and chequered career, and leave the warring sects and parties to settle their differences as to what true Christianity is, without making any attempt to judge between them.

Both these methods—the purely dogmatic and the purely historical—virtually give up the problem. A better course than either may be adopted. The historical method must be employed at the outset; a careful induction must lay the basis for subsequent deduction and generalization. Christianity is an organism possessing a long and complex history, not yet finished. That life-history is better known and understood now than ever, from the upspringing of the earliest germ onwards, and the laws which have regulated its growth and the principles operating in its development, can be determined in broad outline by the scientific historian without much fear of contradiction. But the analogy between the growth of the Christian religion and that of an animal or vegetable organism in physical nature, fails in certain important respects. On the one hand, the growth of Christianity is not yet complete, the great consummation is as yet invisible. On the other, the origin of the religion of Christ cannot be compared with the deposit of a tiny and indeterminate and almost invisible germ. Before the period covered by the NT writings had passed, what may be called the formative and normative stage of the religion was complete. Sufficient advance had been made to enable any critical student to arrive at a standard by which the true character of subsequent developments may be judged. Criticism, for the purpose of determining the facts of history, must not be excluded from any scientific inquiry, as it virtually is by those who invoke the infallible authority of a Church or a Book. But, on the other hand, criticism must not be merely subjective and arbitrary, else religious truth is simply that which every man troweth, and Christianity nothing more than what individual Christians choose to think it. By a candid and careful comparison of the religion in its simplicity and purity with the various forms it has assumed in the course of centuries amongst various nations and races, an answer may be obtained to the question, What is Christianity? which is neither purely dogmatic on the one hand, nor purely empirical on the other. As Dr. Hort said of the Church, 'The lesson-book of the Ecclesia is not a law-book but a history,' so the history of Christianity becomes a lesson-book for all who would understand its real essence.

The question thus opened up is emphatically modern. As the name 'Christian' was not given till those outside the pale of the Church found it necessary to differentiate the believer in Christ from the adherent of other religions, so the need of a scientific definition of Christianity was never felt by faith, nor could one be formed, till the standpoint was occupied from which the young science of Comparative Religion has taken its rise. We have therefore to ask, What was precisely the nature of the religion founded by Christ as recorded in the Gospels and Epistles? Has it remained in substance the same without fundamental change? If, as is obvious, it has markedly altered during a long period of growth and expansion, has its development been legitimate or illegitimate? That is, has the original type been steadfastly maintained, or has it been seriously perverted? Is a norm fairly ascertainable and a return to type from time to time possible?

iii. CHANGES IN CHRISTIANITY IN THE COURSE OF ITS DEVELOPMENT. — During the lifetime of Jesus, discipleship was largely of the nature of personal attachment; it implied confidence created by the teaching, the character, and the works of the Master. Even during this period, however, not only was there room for reflexion and inquiry to arise, but eager inquiry was inevitable. The appearance of a unique personality who spoke as no other man spake and wrought works such as none other man did, irresistibly suggested the question, 'Who art thou, what sayest thou of thyself?' Jesus Himself occasionally prompted such inquiry, and was not satisfied with an undefined loyalty. Once, at least, He pointedly asked His disciples, 'Who say ye that I am?' (Mt 16<sup>13</sup>). Again and again in the course of His ministry a sifting took place, as the Master made more exacting demands upon the allegiance of His followers, and showed that a cleavage must take place between those who really understood the drift of His teaching and were prepared at all costs to obey it, and those who did not. The tests which were applied were for the most part practical in their character, 'Whoever doth not bear his own cross and come after me, cannot be my disciple' (Lk 14<sup>27</sup>). But the 'offences' which caused many to forsake Him as a teacher were often occasioned by His departure from traditional and familiar teaching, His assertion of superiority to the highest Jewish law (Mt 5<sup>17-19</sup>), and His claims to a unique knowledge of the Father (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>) and such a relation to Him, that His disciples were called on to believe not only the words that He spoke, but in Himself. Christ's ministry ended, however,—and, considering its brief and tragic character, it was bound to end,—without any clearly formulated answer to the question as to what constituted true discipleship, and how His followers were to be permanently distinguished from the rest of their nation and the world.

The question now arises, whether the normative period of the religion ends with the death of Christ.

May it be said that when His life is over, the work of the prophet of Nazareth is complete, His words have all been spoken, His religion propounded—it remains that His followers obey His teaching? This position has often been taken, and is usually adopted by those who reject the supernatural element in Christianity. Lessing is the father of those who in modern times think it desirable to return from 'the Christian religion' to 'the religion of Jesus.' Harnack on the whole favours this view, as when he urges that 'the Gospel, as Jesus proclaimed it, has to do with the Father only, and not with the Son'; or again, that it is 'the Fatherhood of God applied to the whole of life—an inner union with God's will and God's kingdom, and a joyous certainty of the possession of eternal blessings and protection from evil.' But he elsewhere rightly admits that 'a complete answer to the question, What is Christianity? is impossible so long as we are restricted to Jesus Christ's teaching alone.' The more powerful a personality is, the less can the sum-total of what he is known only by what he himself says and does'; we must therefore include in our estimate the effects produced in his followers and the views taken by men of his work. See art. BACK TO CHRIST.

Further, if the miracles of Christ, and especially the great miracle of His Resurrection, be accepted, the whole point of view is changed. The disciples, during the short period of His ministry, were slow and dull scholars; only after the outpouring of the Spirit were they able to understand who their Master was and what He had done. Hence the Church with a true instinct included the Acts and the Epistles in the Canon, as well as the Gospels, and to the whole of these documents we must turn if we would understand what 'Christianity' meant to the Apostles and the first generation or two of those who followed Christ. Without entering into controversy such as would arise over exact definitions, we may say broadly that Christ became in thought, as He had always been in practice, the centre of His own religion. It circled round the Person, not so much of the Father as of the Son, yet the Son as revealing the Father. Personal relation to Christ continued to be—what it had been in the days of His flesh, but more consciously and completely—the all-important feature in the new religion. Significance attached not so much to what Christ said—though the authority of His words was supreme and absolute—as to what He was and what He did. His death and resurrection were seen to possess a special significance for the religious life of the individual and the community, and thus from the time of St. Paul and the Apostles onwards, but not till then, the Christian religion was fairly complete in its outline and ready for promulgation in the world.

But it is clear that the real significance of some features in the new religion could be brought out only in the course of history. The first great crisis which tested the infant Church arose over the question whether Christianity was to be a reformed and spiritualized Judaism or a universal religion, for the whole world and for all time. The controversy recorded in Ac 15, aspects of which emerge so frequently in St. Paul's letters, was fundamental and vital; the very existence of Christianity was at stake. It was chiefly to the Apostle Paul that the Church owed her hardly won freedom from the bonds of Jewish ceremonial law and the national and religious limitations identified with it. Henceforward in Christ was to be neither Jew nor Greek, barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, but He Himself was all and in all.

The next two changes are not so clearly definable, though they are hardly less important and far-reaching. They were never brought to a definite issue before a council or assembly, and they do not come within the limits of the NT period. None the less they were fundamental in their character. They concern respectively creed and practice, doctrine and organization. In the first flush of enthusiasm which belongs to the earliest stage of a religious movement, the emotional—which means very largely the motive or dynamical—element is both pure and powerful. Belief, worship, spontaneous fulfilment of a high ethical standard, religious assurance and confident triumph over the world—all seem to flow forth easily and naturally from the fresh springs of a new life. But, as man is now constituted, this happy condition cannot last very long. A stage succeeds in which the white-hot metal cools and must take hard and definite shape. Faith passes into a formulated creed, the spirit of free, spontaneous worship shrinks within the limits of reverently ordered forms, the general sense of brotherhood narrows down into the ordered relationships of a constituted society, charismatic gifts are exchanged for the privileges which belong to certain defined ranks and orders of clergy; and, when the whole process is over, whilst the religion may remain the same in appearance, and to a great extent in character, it is nevertheless seriously changed. In Christianity such processes of development were proceeding, gradually but on the whole rapidly, during the latter half of the 2nd and the opening of the 3rd century. By the middle of the 3rd century the transmutation was well-nigh complete.

If at this stage the question, What is Christianity? were asked, a twofold answer would be returned. So far as its intellectual aspects are concerned, the substance of the Christian faith is summed up in certain forms of words accepted and accounted orthodox by the Church. So far as external position and status are concerned, the test of a man's Christianity lies in his association with a definitely constituted community known as the Church, possessing an organization of its own, which, with every decade, becomes more fixed and formal, less elastic in its constitution, and more exacting in its demands upon those who claim to be regarded as true Christians.

Such changes as these are in themselves not to be regarded as marking either an essential advance or a necessary retrogression. All depends on the way in which they are carried out. In human life, as we know it, they are inevitable. The mollusc must secrete its own shell if it is to live in the midst of a given environment. At the same time, in the history of a religion, such a process is critical in the extreme. The loss of enthusiasm and elasticity may be counterbalanced by increased consolidation, by the gain of a greater power of resisting attacks and retaining adherents. If the complaint is made that the expression of belief has become stiff and formal, the reply is obvious that genuine faith cannot long remain vague and indeterminate. The Christian must know what is implied in worshipping Christ as Lord, must learn the meaning of the baptismal formula, and must belong to a specific community, which for the sake of self-preservation must impose conditions of membership and translate abstract principles into definite codes and prescriptions. If a community is to exist in the presence of a hostile world, or to do its own work well as its numbers multiply, it must organize; and thus ecclesiastical orders, rules, and formulae inevitably arise.

But the mode in which such processes are carried out varies considerably. The formulation and consolidation may be inefficiently done, in which case the young community is in danger of falling to pieces like a rope of sand. Or the organization may be excessive, in which case formalism and fossilization set in. One of the chief dangers arises from the influx of unworthy or half-hearted members, those with whom religion is a tradition, not a living personal energy. 'When those who have laid hold upon the faith as great spoil are joined by crowds of others who wrap it round them like an outer garment, a revolution always occurs.' And especially when at such an epoch it is sought to define the essentials of a religion, there is the utmost danger lest secondary elements should be confused with the primary, lest an orthodox creed should be substituted for a living faith, and outward conformity with human prescriptions take the place of personal allegiance to a Divine and living Lord.

Whatever be thought of the way in which this all-important change was effected in the first instance,—that is to say, the transition from Christianity viewed as a life to Christianity viewed as a system of dogmatic belief and ecclesiastical organization,—few will deny that before long the alteration was so great that it may be said the religion itself was transformed. By the orthodox Roman Catholic this transformation is considered to be Divinely ordered; the process is regarded as one of steady advance and improvement—as a perfect child might pass into an equally admirable youth and man. According to Newman's theory, the original germs of doctrine and worship were developed normally and legitimately, as determined by the criteria he specifies—Preservation of type, Continuity of Principle, Power of assimilation, Logical sequence, and the rest. Loisy, who is severely critical of the documents of the NT, holds the same view of the development of an infallible Church. To the eyes of others the change effected between the 2nd and the 6th centuries appears to be one of gradual but steady degeneration. In their view a living religion has hardened into a technical theology, vital union with Christ has passed into submission to the ordinances of a fast deteriorating Church, and the happy fellowship of believers in a common salvation and the enjoyment of a new life has almost disappeared under the heavy bondage of ceremonial observances and ecclesiastical absolutism.

The substitution of the worship of the Virgin Mary as an intercessor with her Divine Son for reverent intercourse with Christ Himself; the offering of the sacrifice of the Mass by an officiating priest for the benefit of the living and the dead, instead of a simple observance of communion with Christ and fellow-disciples at the Lord's Table; the obtaining of absolution only after private confession to a priest Divinely appointed to dispense it, in place of free and direct forgiveness granted to the penitent believer in Christ,—changes like these made in a religion are not slight and superficial. To some they represent a transition from crude infancy to vigorous maturity; to others they indicate deep-seated degeneration and the utter perversion of a pure and spiritual religious faith. An organism in process of growth depends upon its environment without, as well as its own living energies within. The history of the Christian Church does not present a complete parallel to this. No true Christian can believe either that it was left to a chance current of events, or that it was simply determined from without by natural causes. But the external factors which largely influenced the development of Christianity—Jewish beliefs and precedents, Greek philosophy and intellectual habits, Roman polity and law, the superstitious ideas and observances of paganism—must be taken into account by those who are studying the nature of the change which came over Christianity in the first thousand years of its history.

The point at issue in the 16th cent. between Roman Catholics and Protestants, one which still divides Christendom, concerned the real nature of this development. Had the growth of fifteen hundred years in doctrine, worship, and organization simply made explicit what was implicit in the New Testament; or were the accretions to the original faith excrescences, exaggerations, or more serious corruptions; and how was a line to be drawn between false and true? The Reformation was a protest against abuses which had become ingrained in Catholicism. The need of 'reform in head and members' had been felt and acknowledged long before, and only when repeated efforts to secure it peaceably had proved futile was it seen that a violent cataclysm like that brought about by Luther was necessary before effectual improvement could be attained. The Reformers claimed to be returning to original principles—to the New Testament instead of the Church; to justification by faith instead of salvation by baptism, absolution, and Mass; and to direct acknowledgment of the Headship of Christ instead of blind submission to the edicts of His vicar upon earth. Luther, who had intended only to remove some obvious abuses which disfigured the creed and practice of the Church he loved, found himself cutting at the very roots of ecclesiastical authority and institutional religion. But he did not do so consciously, the movement of which he was partly the originator, partly the organ and servant, meant a resolute effort to return to the faith and spirit of primitive Christianity.

This effort was not final, of course. It is easy now to condemn Luther's procedure as illogical and indefensible, to say that he should either have gone further or not so far. Doubtless the result of the conflict between Romanism and Protestantism in the 16th cent. was not ultimate: the issues raised by Luther went deeper than he intended, but they were not deep and far-reaching enough. To every generation and to every century its own task. But the whole Reformation movement showed that Christianity as a religion possessed remarkable recuperative power; that the organism could throw off a considerable portion of what seemed its very substance, not only without injury to its life, but with marvellous increase to its vigour; and that the essence of the religion did not lie where the Roman Catholic Church had sought to place it. Subsequent history has confirmed this. 'Evangelical revivals,' great missionary enterprises, remarkable extensions of the old religion in new lands and under new conditions, unexpected manifestations of new features and resuscitation of pristine energies, have during the last two or three centuries illustrated afresh the same power of recovery and spiritual reinforcement, and raised afresh the question as to what constitutes the essence of a religion which is so full of vitality and so capable of developing from within unanticipated and apparently inexhaustible energies. The Christianity of to-day embraces a multitude of systems and organizations, it includes most varied creeds and cults, it influences societies and civilizations that are worlds apart, and the question is perpetually recurring whether there be indeed one spirit and aim pervading the whole, and if so, where it lies and what it is.

This question becomes the more pressing when the future is contemplated. Many are prepared for still more striking developments in the 20th century. The spectacle of two or three great historical Churches on the one hand preserving the kind of stability which is gained by outward conformity to one doctrinal creed and ecclesiastical system, and, on the other, an almost endless diversity of sects and denominations, with a tendency to higgamory multiplication—cannot represent the révé, the ideal, the goal of the Christian religion. Christianity cannot be identified with one Church, or with all the Churches. Whilst many of these are enfeebled by age, the religion itself is young with a perpetually renewed vigour, and not for centuries has it shown more certain signs of freshly budding energy. Each new age brings new problems. As they arise, the power and permanence of a religion are tested by its ability to grapple with and to solve them, and by its success or failure is it judged. The problems of the present and the near future are mainly social, and the complaint is freely made that Christianity has proved itself unable to cope with them. But the principles and capabilities of a religion cannot be gauged by those of its representatives and exponents at a particular epoch. The assailants of Christianity as it is are often the allies of Christianity as it should be and will be. History has too frequently suggested the question which the poet asks of the suffering Christ.—'Saw, was not this Thy passion, to foreknow! In death's worst hour the works of Christian men?' What new regenerative influences, swaying the whole of society with wider and freer quickening power, will be developed in the 20th cent. none can tell. But the present state of Christendom, no less than a survey of two thousand years of history, is an compelling men to inquire, What, then, is the essence of Christianity?

iv. ESSENTIAL CHARACTER OF CHRISTIANITY.—

The interpretation of the facts thus hastily sketched appears to be this. Christianity in the concrete has been far from perfect, that is obvious; its serious and widespread corruptions have often proved a scandal and a stumbling-block. But neither has its history manifested a mere perversion of a great and noble ideal. Again and again in the darkest hour light has shone forth, and at the lowest ebb a new flood-tide of energy has arisen, making it possible to distinguish the real religion in its purity and power from its actual embodiment in decadent and unworthy representatives.

What we see in Christian history, as in the personal history of Christ upon earth, is the progressive development of a Divine Thought unfolding itself in spite of virulent opposition, under pressure of extreme difficulties, struggling against the misrepresentations of false friends and imprinting its likeness upon most unpromising and unsatisfactory material. When it first appeared on the earth, embodied in the Person and the Work, as well as the teaching, of Jesus Christ, the Divine Idea shone with the brightness of a new sun in the spiritual firmament. It was not developed out of Judaism, the Jews were its bitterest opponents; it was not indebted to Greek philosophic thought or to Roman political science, though afterwards it made use of and powerfully influenced both; it had nothing in common with the current superstitions of Oriental religions; it did not owe its origin to some cunningly devised religious syncretism, such as was not uncommon at the time when Christianity began to infuse life into the declining Roman Empire. A new idea of God, of man, and of the true reconciliation of man to God, formed the core and nucleus of the new faith. In the earliest records this idea appears as the germ of a nascent religion, a sketch in outline which remains to be filled up. In the history of nineteen centuries its likeness is to be discerned only as an image reflected in a dimly burnished mirror, in a troubled and turbid pool. None the less the dominant idea remains; as St. Paul expresses it, the light of the knowledge of the glory of God is seen in a face—the face of Jesus Christ (2 Co 4). Lecky, writing simply as a historian of European morals, describes it thus (Hist. Eur. Mor.<sup>11</sup> (1894) ii. 8 f.)—

‘It was reserved for Christianity to present to the world an ideal character, which through all the changes of eighteen centuries has inspired the hearts of men with an impassioned love; has shown itself capable of acting on all ages, nations, temperaments, and conditions; has been not only the highest pattern of virtue but the strongest incentive to its practice; and has exercised so deep an influence that it may be truly said that the simple record of these short years of active life has done more to regenerate and to soften mankind than all the disquisitions of philosophers, and all the exhortations of moralists.’

Whether the spectacle of an ideal human character alone has done this remains to be seen, but it is possible with care to distinguish between the glory of the Divine Thought and the imperfect medium through which its light has filtered. We see truth manifested amidst crudities and insan- cerities, amidst falsehoods which are bad and half-truths which are often worse; a pure and lofty character struggling, mostly in vain, for adequate expression; a kingdom not come but coming, of which we cannot say ‘Lo here’ or ‘Lo there,’ for it floats only in the midst of men as they move, in their hearts as they ponder and feel and hope—not as an achievement, not as a possession, but as a magnificent conception, an earnest longing, and a never fully attained, but ever to be attained, ideal.

In what, then, lies the perennial and imperishable essence of the ever changing phenomenon called Christianity? The unknown writer of the Epistle to Diognetus wrote in the 2nd century—

‘What the soul is in the body, this the Christians are in the world. The soul is spread through all the members of the body, and Christians through the divers cities of the world. The soul hath its abode in the body, and yet it is not of the body. So Christians have their abode in the world, and yet they are not of the world.’

If for ‘Christians’ we read ‘Christianity,’ where is the soul, or vital spark, of the religion to be found? Nearly all are agreed that the centre of the Christian religion is, in some sense, the Person of its Founder. De Pressensé closes an article on the subject by saying, ‘Christianity is Jesus Christ.’ But it is the sense in which such words are to be interpreted that is all-important. The relation of Christ to the religion called by His name is certainly not that of Moses to Judaism, or that of Confucius to Confucianism. But neither does He stand related to Christianity as do Buddha and Mohammed to the religions named after them. Not as a prophet of Nazareth, a religious and ethical teacher, however lofty and inspiring, does Christ stand at the centre of history. As Dr. Fairbairn has said, ‘It is not Jesus of Nazareth who has so powerfully entered into history; it is the deified Christ who has been believed, loved, and obeyed as the Saviour of the world. . . . If the doctrine of the Person of Christ were explicable as the mere mythical apotheosis of Jesus of Nazareth, it would become the most insolent and fateful anomaly in history.’ And as the secret is not to be found in the ethics, neither does it lie in the ‘religion of Jesus.’ Harnack is the modern representative of those who take this view when he says:

‘The Christian religion is something simple and sublime; it means one thing and one thing only: eternal life in the midst of time, by the strength and under the eyes of God.’

That is a fine definition of Theism, not of the historical Christianity which has done so much to regenerate the world. Nor can the essence of any religion be said to lie in its life, if by that be meant temper and conduct. These are fruits, and by their healthiness and abundance we judge of the soundness and vigour of the tree. But the life of a religion in the proper sense of the word lies far deeper.

The chief modern definitions of Christianity have been ably summarized and reviewed by Professor Adams Brown, who, in his Essence of Christianity, has produced an illuminating study in the history of definition which goes far to solve the problem before us. Schleiermacher, Hegel, and Ritschl are epoch-marking names in the history of Christianity during the last century, and their attempts at definition probably meet better than most others the conditions demanded by modern inquirers. Schleiermacher’s view is thus summed up by Professor Adams Brown—

‘Christianity is that historic religion, founded by Jesus of Nazareth and having its bond of union in the redemption mediated by Him, in which the true relation between God and man has for the first time found complete and adequate expression, and which, throughout all the changes of intellectual and social environment which the centuries have brought, still continues to maintain itself as the religion best worthy of the allegiance of thoughtful and earnest men.’

Hegel represents Christianity as the absolute religion, because in it is to be seen worked out in history the eternal dialectic immanent in the Being of God Himself, the ultimate principle of the Godhead, the Father, being revealed in the Son, the principle of difference, returning again in the synthesis of redemption. Finally, in the Holy Spirit Father and Son recognize their unity, and God as Spirit comes to full consciousness of Himself in history. Christianity, he says, is essentially the religion of the Spirit. Ritschl lays more stress on the idea of the Kingdom of God, but he follows in the steps of Schleiermacher when he defines Christianity as—

‘the monotheistic, completely spiritual, and ethical religion, which, based on the life of its author as Redeemer and as founder of the Kingdom of God, consists in the freedom of the children of God, involves the impulse to conduct from the motive of love, aims at the moral organization of mankind, and grounds blessedness on the relation of sonship to God, as well as on the kingdom of God’ (Justif. and Reconc., Eng. tr. p. 13).

Dorner is one of the best representatives of the many who lay chief stress upon the Incarnation as the ‘central idea and fundamental fact’ of Christianity, and who find in mediation through incarnation its archetypal thought. Professor Adams Brown himself considers the chief difficulty in framing a definition of Christianity to lie in the attempt to reconcile its historical and its absolute character, its natural and its supernatural elements—the two contrasted tendencies which mark respectively (1) its resemblance to other faiths, and its realization of their imperfect ideals; and (2) its difference from all other religions as the one direct and supreme revelation from God Himself. His own solution may be indicated in the following sentences:—

‘Christianity, as modern Christian thought understands it, is the religion of Divine sonship and human brotherhood revealed and realized through Jesus Christ. As such it is the fulfilment and completion of all earlier forms of religion, and the appointed means for the redemption of mankind through the realization of the kingdom of God. Its central figure is Jesus Christ, who is not only the revelation of the divine ideal for man, but also, through the transforming influence which He exerts over His followers, the most powerful means of realizing that ideal among men. The possession in Christ of the supreme revelation of God’s love and power constitutes the distinctive mark of Christianity, and justifies its claim to be the final religion’ (Essence of Christianity, 309).

These definitions are cumbersome, and no one of them is fully satisfactory. It is, however, clear that Christianity can never be properly defined if it is regarded merely as a philosophy, a system of ideas; or as a code of ethics, providing a standard of conduct; or as an ecclesiastical system, embodying rites and ceremonies of worship and institutions which are understood to be channels of salvation for mankind. It is a religion, that is, its root or spring lies in the relations which it reveals and establishes between God and men. It was the interpretation of the Person of Christ, the significance found in Him and His work, that changed the whole view of God and of human history, first for the Apostles and afterwards for all who followed them. Christ was to them doubtless a Lawgiver, His command was final. He was also an Example, perfect and flawless, the imitation of whom formed the highest conceivable standard of life. But unless He had been much more than this, the Christianity of history would never have come into being; and if it had had no other gospel for men than the most sublime human prophet could bring, it would not have regenerated mankind as it has done.

A religion may be described objectively or subjectively, from without or from within. As an objective religion in the world, Christianity is an ethical and spiritual monotheism of a high type, the highest that has been known in history, when its character and effects are fully estimated. So far there is general agreement. But the logical differentia has yet to be specified, and here opinions vary. If the characteristic and distinguishing doctrinal teaching of Christianity be considered, it may be said that the Incarnation is its central idea. But this must never be interpreted apart from Christ's whole work, including His death and resurrection, and the main purpose of that work, the Redemption of mankind, that Salvation and Reconciliation which He has made possible and open to all. Opinions may differ as to the exact mode in which this has been effected, but the Cross of Christ is its central feature. Christianity without a Saviour is a face without an eye, a body without a soul.

If the Christian religion be regarded from within, as a subjective, personal experience, its essence lies in a new life, conceived in a new spirit and animated by a new power. This power is directly imparted by the Spirit of God, but on the human side it arises from the new conceptions of God given by Christ and the new relation to Him established through the redemption and mediation of His Son. If the religion be viewed on its racial and social side, it may be described as having for its object the establishment of a brotherhood of mankind based on the Fatherhood of God and the Elder Brotherhood of Christ; a view of man which implies the inestimable individual worth of each, and the ultimate union of all in a renewed Order of which Christ has laid the foundation, given the foretaste, and promised the complete consummation and fruition.

The secret of the power of Christianity lies in the conviction which it engenders that—granted the fundamental principles of Theism—God has Himself undertaken the cause of man; that He enters into man's weakness, feels with his sorrows, and, chiefly, that He bears the terrible burden of man's sins; all this being assured by the gift of His Son and the work which the Son Himself has accomplished and is still carrying on by His Spirit. The metaphysical nature of Christ's Person may not be capable of being adequately expressed in words; the full scope of His redeeming work may be variously understood and may be incapable of being condensed into a formula; while Christians may widely differ as to the way in which the benefits of that work are best appropriated and realized and distributed by His Church in the world. But the essence of the religion lies in its conception of the spiritual needs of man, the ends for which he exists, his sin and failure to realize those ends; in its proclamation of Christ, the once dying and now ever living Lord as Himself the Way, through whom sin may be forgiven and failure remedied; and above all, in the moral and spiritual dynamic which is supplied by faith in the great Central Person of the whole religion, and the life in Him which is rendered possible for every believer by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit.

As to the claims of Christianity to be the only permanent, universal, and final religion for mankind, no vindication of them can amount to actual demonstration. But the argument would take the direction of inquiring whether history thus far confirms the high claim of Christianity to suffice for the needs of man as man. Is Tertullian's phrase anima naturaliter Christiana borne out by facts? Has Christianity, not in its miserably imperfect and often utterly misleading concrete forms, but in the idea of its Founder and the best attempts made to realize it, shown the 'promise and potency' of a universal religion for the race? Such an argument would have to take full account of criticisms like those of Nietzsche and his school, who complain that Christianity in its tenderness towards the weak and erring, in its hallowing of sorrow and its preoccupation with the evil of sin, profoundly misunderstands human nature and man's position in the Universe; that it amounts, in fact, to a worship of failure and decay. These criticisms have not been widely accepted as valid, and they can easily be met—they were, indeed, substantially anticipated by Celsus and refuted by Origen. But such objections are sure to recur, together with kindred difficulties arising from a naturalistic view of man which claims to be supported by physical science. They can be effectually repelled only by practical proof that the teaching of Christianity accords with the facts of human nature and meets the needs of human life more completely than any other system of philosophy or religion.

On the other hand, the triumphs which Christianity has already achieved; the power it has manifested of being able to satisfy new and unexpected claims; the excellence of its ideal of character, one which cannot be transcended so long as human nature continues to be what it is; the success with which it has brought the very highest type of character within reach of the lowest, as attested by the experience of millions; the power of recovery which it has exhibited, when its teaching has been traduced and its spirit and aims degraded by prominent professors and representatives;—these, with other similar characteristics, go far towards proving the Divine origin of Christianity, and its claim to be the perfect religion of humanity, sufficing for all men and for all time.

It is certain however, that if the true spirit of the Christian religion is to be rightly displayed generation after generation, and its work rightly done in the world, there must be a constant 'return to Christ' on the part of His Church. The phrase, of course, must be adequately interpreted. Much has been said concerning the 'recovery of the historical Christ' as characteristic of our time, and the expression represents an important truth. Christ is seen more and more clearly to be 'the end of critical and historical inquiry' and 'the starting-place of constructive thought.' But it is the whole Christ of the NT who is the norm in Christian theology, the object of Christian worship, the guide of Christian practice. The Christ of the Epistles cannot be separated from the Christ of the Gospels. The modern attempt, fashionable in some quarters, to distinguish between the Synoptic Gospels on the one hand as historic, and the Fourth Gospel and the Epistles on the other as dogmatic, cannot be consistently maintained, and does not adequately cover the facts of the case. The Sermon on the Mount does not reveal to us the entire Christ, nor the first chapter of St. John, nor the Epistle to the Romans; but there is no inconsistency between these representations of the Christians' Lord. There is no contradiction between the Christ of the Synoptic Gospels and the Christ of Apostolic experience and the Christ of historical Christianity, except for those who reject the element of the supernatural, which, as a matter of fact, pervades the whole. The Christ of the NT is the object of Christian faith, as well as the Founder of the Christian religion in its historical continuity. To Him it is necessary for His Church—compassed with ignorance and infirmity and not yet fully purged from its sins—continually to 'return,' generation after generation, if His religion is to be preserved in its purity and transmitted in its power. The vitality of Christianity in the individual heart and in the life of the community depends upon the closeness of personal communion with Christ maintained through His indwelling Spirit. 'To steep ourselves in Him is still the chief matter,' says Harnack in one place. 'Abide in me and I in you,' was His own word to His first disciples, and it must ever be obeyed, if the characteristic fruit of that Vine is to be seen in abundance on its dependent branches.

What the Christianity of the future might be and would be, if this command were adequately fulfilled, none can say; the capacities of the religion have been as yet only partially tested. In Christ, as St. Paul taught, are 'all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge'—the treasures of all-subduing love, of assimilating and transmuting power, of uplifting and purifying grace for the nations—'hidden' (Col. 2<sup>7</sup>). And the treasure is still hidden, because His followers, its custodians and stewards, do not adequately make it known—have not, indeed, adequately discovered it for themselves. But if in every generation there be, as there should be, a renewal of the very springs of Christian life by fresh recourse to the Fountain-head, then new claims, new needs, new problems, will only afford occasion for new triumphs of Christ and His Cross—the message of Divine self-sacrifice to the uttermost in redemption, as the one means of salvation for a sinning and suffering world.

CHURCH.—It is proposed in this article to deal with the references to the Church in the Gospels, particularly as they bear upon Christ's relation to the Church. The other books of the NT, and the beliefs and practices of the early ages of Christianity, will be referred to only as far as they appear to throw light upon the teaching and actions of Christ as recorded in the Gospels. It will be assumed that the accounts of the life and teaching of Christ contained in the four Gospels as well as the narrative of the Acts are substantially historical, and that the thirteen Epistles usually ascribed to St. Paul are genuine. Without this limitation the inquiry would be of quite a different character.

The historical society known as the Church has never claimed to have come into complete existence until the day of Pentecost, and its growth and organization were a gradual process. We shall not, therefore, on any theory, expect to find in the Gospels a complete and explicit account of the foundation and characteristics of the Church, and it will be a convenient method of procedure to take the chief elements of the conception of the Church which was generally accepted at a later date, when the community was fully constituted, and to inquire how far these can be traced back to the teaching of Christ Himself, and how far they may be regarded as later accretions, or the natural but not necessary development of ideas which existed before, if at all, only in germ. Now our knowledge of the first days of Christianity derived from the NT is but fragmentary, and the period immediately following is one of great obscurity; but from the middle of the 2nd cent. there is no doubt about the prevalent and almost universal belief of Christians with regard to the Church. It was believed that the Church, as it then existed, was a society founded by Christ as an integral part of His work for mankind. It was further believed that the Church possessed characteristics which were summed up under the words, One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic. And while it was believed that the Church stood in the most intimate spiritual relation to Christ, it was also held that its outward unity and continuity were secured by a definite organization and form of government, the essential features of which had been imposed upon the Church by the Apostles, acting under a commission given them by Christ Himself. The Church was further regarded as the instrument appointed by Christ for the completion of His work for mankind. The fact that these beliefs were generally held, at all events from the middle of the 2nd cent. onwards, suggests the following division of the subject. First, it will be asked whether the belief that it was Christ's intention to found a visible society is borne out (1) by what we know of His own actions and teaching, and (2) by the records of the earliest days of Christian life. Secondly, the characteristics ascribed to the Church in the Christian creeds will be examined in the light of the NT writings.

i. INDICATIONS OF A VISIBLE CHURCH.—1. In the Teaching and Actions of Christ.—(a) Relation of Christ to the Messianic Hope and the Kingdom of God.—The idea of a covenant relation between God and man is found in the earliest records of the Hebrew race. Covenants were at first made with individuals and families; but with the beginning of Jewish nationality there is a consciousness of a peculiar relation between the nation and Jehovah. The idea of a national God was, of course, shared by the Jews with all the nations with which they came into contact; but as their conception of the Deity advanced, and their religion developed through monolatry into a pure monotheism, the idea of Jehovah as a national God passed into the idea of the selection of Israel by the one God of all the earth for a special destiny and special privileges. Thus the Jewish religion was a religion of hope, and its Golden Age was in the future. This national hope became closely associated in thought with the kingdom,—at first the actual kingdom, and then the kingdom to be restored in the future. After the fall of the actual kingdom, the idea of the future kingdom became, to a great extent, idealized, and in close connexion with it there grew up the expectation of a personal Messiah. It is not necessary for the present purpose to inquire when this expectation first becomes apparent, or to trace the growth of the Messianic hope in detail. The important fact is that at the time of Christ's birth Israel as a nation was looking for a kingdom of God and a Messianic King. With many, perhaps with most, the expectation may have been mainly that of an independent and powerful earthly kingdom; but the remains of Jewish literature in the last century before Christ show that the more spiritually minded Jews undoubtedly looked for a kingdom which would indeed have Jerusalem for its centre, and of which the faithful Jews would be the nucleus, but which would also be world-wide and spiritual in character. It must also be noticed that the doctrine of a Remnant, which had taken strong hold of the Jewish mind since the time of Isaiah, had accustomed them to think of a community of the faithful, within and growing out of the existing nation, who should in a special sense be the heirs of the promises.

The most conspicuous feature in the teaching of Christ, as recorded in the Synoptic Gospels, is undoubtedly His claim to be the Messiah, and His announcement of the coming of the Kingdom of God. In using these terms, He must have intended to appeal to, and to a great extent to sanction, the ideas and hopes of those whom He addressed. And yet it very soon became plain that the kingdom which He preached was something very different from anything that the most spiritual of the Jews had conceived. The old Jewish kings had led the people in war, they had judged them in peace, they had levied tribute; but these functions Christ expressly disclaimed. He would not allow His followers to think of appealing to force (Mt 26<sup>27</sup>). He repudiated the idea of being a ruler or a judge of ordinary contentions (Lk 12<sup>4</sup>). He accepted the payment of tribute to an alien potentate as a thing indifferent (Mk 12<sup>17</sup>). But, on the other hand, the great acts which Jehovah Himself had performed for the Jewish nation, in virtue of which He Himself had been regarded as their King, Christ performed for a new nation. Jehovah had called Abraham and the patriarchs, and had attached them to Himself by intimate ties and covenants, and out of their seed had formed a nation which He ruled; and, in the second place, He had given this nation His own law. So Christ called from among the Jews His own disciples, from whom He required an absolute personal devotion, and to them He delivered a new law to fulfil or supersede the old (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>). See, further, art. KINGDOM OF GOD.

What is the relation of the Kingdom of God to the Church?—The two things are not simply identical, and the predominant sense of the Kingdom in the NT appears to be rather that of a reign than of a realm. But these two ideas are complementary, and the one implies the other. Sometimes it is hardly possible to distinguish between them. It may be true that 'by the words the Kingdom of God our Lord denotes not so much His disciples, whether individually or even as forming a collective body, as something which they receive—a state upon which they enter' (Robertson, Regnum Dei); but at the same time the whole history of the growth of the idea of the Kingdom led, naturally, to the belief that the Kingdom of God about which Christ taught would be expressed and realized in a society. The teaching of Christ about the Kingdom of Heaven does not perhaps, taken by itself, prove that He was the Founder of the Church; but if this is established by other evidence, it may at least be said that His Kingdom is visibly represented in His Church, and that 'the Church is the Kingdom of Heaven in so far as it has already come, and it prepares for the Kingdom as it is to come in glory.'

(b) How far the line of action adopted by Christ during His ministry tended to the formation of a society.—Christ began from the first to attach to Himself a number of disciples. Their numbers varied, and they did not all stand in equally close relations to Him; they were indeed still a vague and indeterminate body at the time of His death, but they tended to define themselves more and more. There was a process of sifting (Jn 6<sup>66</sup>), and immediately after the Ascension an expression is used which suggests some sort of list (Ac 1<sup>25</sup>). As much as this, indeed, might be said of most religious and philosophical leaders, but Christ did more than create an unorganized mass of disciples. From an early period He formed an inner circle 'that they might be with him, and that he might send them forth' (Mk 3<sup>14</sup>). The name 'Apostles' may have been given to the Twelve in the first instance with reference to a temporary mission, but subsequent events showed that this temporary mission was itself only part of a system of training to which Christ devoted more and more of His time. The Twelve became in a special sense 'the nucleus of an organization; and this is what is usually called in the Fourth Gospel. The larger body are also disciples, but the Twelve are their leaders and representatives. Their representative character culminates at the Last Supper, where the Eucharist is given to them alone, but, as the event showed, in trust for the whole body.'

Certain sayings recorded of Christ in connexion with the Apostles and their functions will be noticed later. For the present it is enough to call attention to the fact that, apart from any special saying or commission, the general course of Christ's actions not only tended to produce a society, but provided what is a necessary condition of the effectiveness and permanence of a society—the nucleus of an organization; and that the greater part of His labours was directed towards the training of this inner circle for carrying on a work which He would not complete Himself.

(c) The significance of the institution of the sacraments.—A society, to be plainly visible and unmistakable, requires some outward act or sign of distinction by which all its members can be recognized. Circumcision had been such to the Jews. And in order to be both effective and permanent, a society further requires some definite corporate action, binding upon all its members, and relating to the object for which the society exists. The observance of the Law has been the corporate action of the Jews. No society has, as a matter of fact, succeeded in maintaining itself in existence for an indefinite period without such signs of distinction and corporate actions. Both requirements were supplied by Christ, if the Gospel narrative may be trusted, in the sacraments which He instituted. In Baptism He provided a definite means of incorporation, and in the Eucharist a corporate act and a visible bond of union. This is indeed only part of the significance of the sacraments, but when they are regarded from another point of view it becomes all the more striking that the means appointed to convey the grace of God to the individual should be necessarily social in their character. The general tendency of the teaching of Christ, in the Sermon on the Mount and elsewhere, with regard to the Jewish Law and to the relation of the inward and outward, gives great significance to the fact that He should have ordered any external acts of the nature of sacraments, and makes it still more remarkable that He should have laid emphasis on their necessity as a condition of entrance into the Kingdom and into the possession of life (Jn 3rd 6th). And the fact that these are necessarily social ordinances is of primary importance in considering the relation of the Church to Christ.

It thus appears from a general view of Christ's ministry as recorded in the Gospels, without taking into consideration particular sayings ascribed to Him, that before the Ascension He had provided everything that was necessary for the existence of a society, for the development of an organization, and for its permanence and corporate action. The only thing wanting to the complete constitution of the Church was the fulfilment of the promise of the gift of the indwelling Spirit, for which the disciples were bidden to wait (Lk 24th, Ac 1st).

2. In the earliest period of Church history.—

The conclusions to which the Gospels appear to point will be corroborated if there is evidence that a society actually did exist immediately after the events recorded in the Gospels. Of this early period the only existing record is that which is contained in the Acts. There is also contemporary evidence of the ideas of a somewhat later period in St. Paul's Epistles. If the evidence of the Acts is accepted, there is no doubt of its general tendency. Immediately after the Ascension there appears a well defined body of disciples, led by the Apostles (Ac 1st 2nd). At the day of Pentecost this body is fully constituted for its mission, and receives a large accession of numbers. The mention of definite numbers (Ac 1st 2nd 4th) shows that there was no doubt who the persons were who belonged to the society. Nor is there any doubt, from the constant mention of baptism throughout the book, that this was the invariable means of acquiring membership. It is expressly mentioned even in the exceptional case recorded in 10th. Throughout the whole narrative the Apostles appear as the leaders and teachers of the whole community. Membership implies adherence to their teaching and fellowship, with 'the breaking of bread' and common prayer as a bond of union (2nd). The practice of community of goods is an evidence of the closeness of the bond, while the fact that this was voluntary shows that 'neither the community was lost in the individuals, nor the individuals in the community' (Hort, Christian Ecclesia, p. 48). The meetings of the Church must have been in houses, and none in Jerusalem can possibly have contained all the disciples; but no importance is attached to the place of meeting, nor are house congregations ever spoken of or alluded to as separate units of Church life. A theory has been formed that the Church as a society arose out of a federation of house assemblies, but there is absolutely no trace whatever of such a possibility in the Acts: the whole body of disciples is the only unit. The word ecclesia occurs for the first time in Ac 5th, and there it is the whole body which is spoken of. In the course of time the increase in the number of adherents led to an advance in organization, the Apostles delegating some of their functions to a lower order of ministers, and soon afterwards persecution caused an extension of the Church to other parts of Palestine. But there is as yet no subdivision: questions which arise in Samaria and Joppa are dealt with at Jerusalem (Ac 8th 11th). This state of things, however, could not last. When the process of extension had gone further, it became impossible to administer all the affairs of the community from a single centre. And so when a body of Christians established themselves in Antioch, a new use of the word ecclesia appears (12th). Hitherto it has meant the whole body of the brethren; now it is applied also to parts of the whole. Each centre is capable of separate action, and deals with local affairs, while remaining in close union with the whole. And so the step which was perhaps the most momentous of any that have been taken in Church history—the mission of Paul and Barnabas—was apparently the work of the Church in Antioch alone, without any reference to Jerusalem (13th). This mission led to the foundation of a large number of local ecclesiae, each of which was provided by the Apostle with a local ministry (14th), while he exercised a continual supervision over them, and visited them as often as circumstances would allow. The difficult questions which arise out of this great extension of the Church are referred to the 'Apostles and presbyters' at Jerusalem. The precise relations between the authority of the whole body and the legitimate independence of the local communities are undefined, but the recognition of the unity of the whole Church and of the Apostolic authority is unmistakable. In the Epistles of St. Paul the term ecclesia is constantly used of the local communities, of which he had frequent occasion to speak; the church in a city (1 Co 1st) or even in a house (Ro 16th Col 4th) is a familiar expression, and the churches of a region are spoken of (1 Co 16th 1st) in a way that possibly suggests the beginnings of a provincial organization. But 'the Church' is the one undivided Church of which these several churches are only local divisions. It is in the Epistle to the Ephesians that his doctrine of 'the Church' culminates. It is particularly with reference to this teaching that a distinction has been drawn between the actual and the ideal Church. This distinction is a real one, if it means that the ideal of the Church has never yet been realized in fact. But neither St. Paul nor any other NT writer draws any distinction, or appears to be conscious of the need of any. The Church, like the individual Christian, is regarded as being that which it is becoming. As the individual Christian, in spite of his imperfections, is a saint, so the existing body of Christians whom he is addressing is the Body of Christ, which is to be presented a glorious Church, holy and without blemish (1 Co 12th, Eph 5th). See ORGANIZATION.

ii. THE CHARACTERISTICS OF THE CHURCH.— Assuming now that the Church is a society founded by Christ to carry on His work for the redemption of mankind, the characteristic notes of the Church, as they have been embodied in the Creeds, may be considered with reference to the teaching contained in the Gospels. It is convenient to state at the outset what the principal passages in the Gospels are which bear upon the subject. In the first place, all the teaching relative to the Kingdom of God bears more or less directly on the Church. Some points with regard to this have already been noticed. Then there are the two passages in which the word ecclesia is used, Mt 16th 20th and 18th 20th. In connexion with the former, the other two 'Petrine' texts, Lk 22nd 28th and Jn 21st 17th, may be considered. There are also the charges given to the Apostles in general, Mt 10, Mk 3rd 13-15 6th 13, Mt 28th 19-20, Jn 20th 21-23, and the accounts of the institution of the Eucharist. And there is the long passage Jn 14-17, which specially bears upon the relations of Christ to the Church. The authenticity or credibility of some of these passages has been disputed on various grounds, but it will be assumed for the present purpose that they contain a credible record of the teaching of Christ. It will be convenient to consider this teaching under the heads of those notes of the Church which have been commonly ascribed to it from early times, and have been embodied in the Creeds.

1. Unity.—If the conclusion already reached about the origin of the Church is true, it is clear that it must be one society. The teaching of Christ on this point, as recorded in the Fourth Gospel, is very emphatic (Jn 17<sup>21-23</sup>), and He bases the unity of the Church on the unity of God (cf. Eph 4<sup>4-6</sup>). It is also to be a visible unity, for it is to be a sign to the world: 'that the world may believe.' It is, however, implied that it will be a progressive unity, not at once perfectly realized (Jn 17<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>30</sup>). This is illustrated by St. Paul, who speaks of unity as a thing to be gradually attained to (Eph 4<sup>9</sup>). These three points may be taken in order.

(a) If the unity of the Church is based upon the unity of God, it follows that it is an essential and transcendental, and not an accidental unity; i.e. it is not a merely political or voluntary association of men combining together with a view to effect certain ends, nor is it merely occasioned by the social instincts of human nature. These lower kinds of unity are not, indeed, excluded by the higher, but they are by themselves an insufficient explanation. It has been maintained that the idea of the unity of the Church is an afterthought, caused by the strong tendency to religious associations which prevailed in the Empire in the early ages of Christianity. Abundant evidence already exists, and more is being accumulated, of the existence of this tendency; but even if it should be shown that non-Christian associations influenced the manner in which the Christian community framed its external life and that they assisted its growth, this would not in the least disprove the essential unity of the Church. As far, however, as investigation has gone at present, it seems that the Church owed remarkably little to heathen precedents. The fact that from the earliest times there were some who more or less separated themselves and stood aloof, has been alleged as a proof that unity was not regarded as essential. But imperfectly, as has already been noted, is a condition of the earthly state of the Church; and the strong condemnation with which separation is invariably spoken of in the NT and by all early writers, is very strong evidence of the belief of the Church that unity is one of its essential marks. The existence from the first of the power of excommunication (1 Co 5, etc.), is further evidence to the same effect.

The unity of the Church is, then, a theological unity, arising from the unity of God, from the fact that all members of the Church are members of Christ and abide in Him as the branches abide in the vine, and from the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. From this flows a moral unity of thought and action among the members of the Church, who are bound together by the invisible bonds of faith, hope, and love.

(b) But this invisible unity will express itself, as far as regards that part of the Church which is on earth, in an outward form. There has not naturally been a good deal of conflict of opinion throughout the greater part of Church history as to the precise nature of the outward form which is necessary. Confining ourselves to the teaching of Christ upon the subject, the first thing to be noticed is that institution of the visible actions called sacraments which has been already spoken of. The necessity for performing certain outward actions at once distinguishes those persons who perform them, and these particular actions are social in their nature, and cannot be performed except in connexion with a visible society. In the next place, the administration of sacraments implies discipline, for a certain amount of organization is necessary in order to enable a society to act, and social actions cannot be performed in isolation. For this Christ provided by the institution of a ministry in the persons of the Apostles, to whom He expressly committed the sacraments. It follows that among the things which are necessary to effect valid administration, the preservation of the order instituted by the Church under the direction of the Apostles must be reckoned. And while the Church has recognized all its members as valid ministers of Baptism in case of necessity, the administration of the Eucharist has been confined amongst most Christians to those who have received special Apostolic authority for the purpose.

It is further held by a very large number of Christians, that in addition to the external bonds of union formed by the sacraments and the Apostolic ministry, the Church on earth, being visible, must have a visible head, and that this headship was given by Christ to St. Peter, and by implication to his successors. Union with the earthly head of the Church is therefore necessary to avoid the guilt of schism. It is alleged that this is the natural sense of the passages which record the special charges given by Christ to St. Peter (Mt 16<sup>18-20</sup>, Lk 22<sup>28-32</sup>, and Jn 20<sup>21-23</sup>), and that this interpretation of His words is borne out by the claims made from the earliest times by the bishops of Rome, and allowed or acquiesced in by the Church at large. It is argued, on the other side, that the passages in question were not interpreted in this sense by early Church writers, and that the testimony of the Acts and Epistles and of early Church history shows that such a position was not actually held by St. Peter. The controversy is of such enormous proportions that it can only be alluded to here, but a few of the innumerable books that deal with the subject are mentioned in the list of literature at the end.

(c) These inward and outward bonds of union give a real numerical unity to the Church, so that it will be one in any one place, one throughout the world, and one in all time. Nothing less than this can satisfy the conception of unity put before us in the NT. But it must be noted, in the third place, that unity may be real while it is still imperfect. The perfection of the Church, in respect of unity as well as of all other characteristics, is possible only when all its members are perfect, and therefore it cannot be fully realized in this life. Any loosening of those bonds which have been mentioned, whether inward or outward, must necessarily impair unity. It is not necessary that there should be an outward breach. A lack of charity, leading to party spirit, such as existed at Corinth, was regarded by St. Paul as impairing the unity of the Church although no visible severance had taken place. A want of faith, or errors concerning the faith, must have the same effect. A departure from the faith of the Church on fundamental matters is called 'heresy,' and any great want of either charity or faith on the part of a section of the Church commonly leads to a breach of the external conditions of union, which is called 'schism.' This again admits of different degrees, and is of two principal kinds. A suspension or refusal of communion between two parts of the Church undoubtedly amounts to a schism, even though both parts retain the due administration of the sacraments and the Apostolic ministry. Such a schism has arisen between the Churches of the East and the West, and it was the work of centuries of gradual estrangement, so that it is impossible to say at what precise moment the want of intercommunion became such as to amount to a formal schism. There is a breach of a very similar character between the Anglican Churches and those which adhere to the Roman obedience. There is also another kind of schism, which is caused when bodies of baptized persons form new associations which do not claim to be connected with the Apostolic Church, or which reject the sacraments. There is no other cause for such breaches of outward communion than the imperfection of the faith and charity of the members of the Church. But if such imperfection does not in itself destroy the unity of the Church, the external consequences which naturally result from it do not necessarily do so. Heresy and schism impair unity, but do not altogether destroy it, just as the spiritual life of the individual is not altogether destroyed even by grievous sins.

The Invisible Church.—So far only the unity of that part of the Church which is on earth has been spoken of. But members of the Body of Christ do not cease to be united to Him, and therefore to each other after death. That part of the Church which has passed away from earth is called the Invisible Church, in contrast to the Visible Church upon earth, but they are essentially one. With regard to the state of the departed, very little direct teaching is recorded to have been given by Christ Himself, and we must not presume to speculate too much where knowledge has been withheld. Perhaps little more can be said than that in the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>) Christ gave a general sanction to current Jewish beliefs as to the state of the departed, and that His words to the penitent thief (Lk 23<sup>43</sup>) assure us that union with Himself is not impaired by death. If this is so, it is sufficient justification for the universal belief of early Christians, that the Invisible Church is united to the Visible by common worship.

2. Holiness.—The Church may be called holy because it is a Divine institution, of which Christ is the head, and the special sphere of the working of the Holy Spirit, or because its members, being united to Christ as the branches are to a vine or the limbs to a body, are called to a life of holiness, and have a real though imperfect holiness infused into them. Something has already been said on these first points, and it is hardly necessary to show at length that Christ required holiness from His followers (Jn 17<sup>16-19</sup>, Mt 5<sup>48</sup>). It is no less evident that the holiness spoken of here and elsewhere is a progressive holiness.

One difficulty which has arisen with regard to this characteristic of the Church is that the want of holiness in many of those who have fulfilled the outward conditions of Church membership has often in Church history led to attempts to secure greater purity by a sacrifice of external unity. The Novatians, the Donatists, and many later bodies of separatists, have made such attempts. The persistency of this tendency in the face of such teaching of Christ as is contained in the parables of the Tares and the Draw-net is somewhat surprising, but at all events it testifies to a deep underlying conviction of the necessity of holiness. St. Paul emphasizes the holiness of any body of Christians which he addresses, by giving them the title of 'saints,' however imperfect many of the individuals might be (Ro 1<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>2</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>1</sup>, Eph 1<sup>1</sup>, Ph 1<sup>1</sup>, Col 1<sup>2</sup>; cf. Ac 9<sup>9</sup>). They are both individually and collectively a holy temple, and the habitation of the Holy Spirit (1 Co 3<sup>16-17</sup>, 3<sup>19</sup>, Eph 2<sup>19-22</sup>). And, as has already been pointed out, he does not draw any sharp line of division between the imperfect society on earth and that which shall be perfected hereafter (Eph 5<sup>25-27</sup>); he regards both the individual and the society as being already that which they are becoming.

'As a whole the Church is holy in that it retains faithfully those means of sanctification which Christ gave her, holy Sacraments, holy laws, holy teaching, so that, amid whatever imperfections, her whole aim is that the tendency of her acts and her teaching shall be to promote holiness and the inward spiritual life. . . . An university is learned, or a city rich, which abounds in learning or riches, although there may be many unlearned or poor, and although the learned or rich may yet be short of the ideal of learning or wealth.'—Forbes, Nic. Creed, p. 278.

3. Catholicity.—The earliest extant use of the word 'Catholic' as applied to the Church is in Ignatius (ad Smyrna, viii. 2): 'Wherever the bishop appears, there must the multitude be; just as wherever Christ Jesus is, there is the Catholic Church.' The natural sense of the word would appear to be that of the Church throughout all the world as opposed to that in one place; but this is not the sense in which the term has been commonly used. The Church has been called 'Catholic' not because it has actually extended throughout the world, for this it has never yet done, nor even simply because it is destined to be so extended, but rather as possessing characteristics which make it capable of being a universal religion, adapted to all classes of men in all parts of the world, and throughout all time. Even apart from particular words of Christ, such as those recorded in Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, nothing is more apparent in His teaching than that the religion which He taught was intended to be a universal religion, in special contrast to Judaism, which, like the religions of the ancient world generally, was a strictly national religion, and appealed only to a part of mankind. In spite of the many anticipations of universalism which are to be found in Jewish prophecy, the controversy which took place in the early Church about the observance of the Jewish law shows with what difficulty the idea was accepted by those who had been Jews. This quality, again, of universal applicability to all men at all times can belong only to a Divine revelation sufficient for the needs of all mankind. Such a revelation Christ professed to give, and the Catholicity of the Church must depend upon its faithfulness to the fulness of the truth revealed in Christ. And so, in addition to the idea of universal extension, the word Catholic has been used to convey the idea of orthodoxy in the communion of the Church. The well-known definition of Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. xviii. 23) co-ordinates these two ideas. 'The Church is called Catholic because it extends throughout the whole world . . . because it teaches completely all doctrines which men ought to know . . . because it brings into subjection to godliness the whole race of men . . . and because it treats and heals every sort of sins . . . and has in it every form of virtue.' In this sense the Church was called Catholic when it was very far from being extended even over a considerable part of the world, and the term can be applied even to the Church in a particular place, as being in communion with and possessing the characteristics of the whole. So in the Martyrdom of Polycarp he is spoken of as 'Bishop of the Catholic Church that is in Smyrna.' The Church or any part of it approaches the ideal of Catholicity in proportion as it possesses all the qualities which are necessary to make it literally universal; and, on the other hand, 'everything which hinders or lessens the capacity of the Church to be universal, everything which deprives it of part of the full truth or inserts in its teaching anything which does not belong to the truth, everything which cramps its power of getting rid of sin and increasing godliness, has a tendency to draw the Church away from the ideal of its Catholic life. To become such that it could not appeal to the whole world or to all classes of men, to deny essential parts of the revealed faith, to become in its accepted principles a necessary instrument of some sins or a necessary opponent of some virtues, would be, in proportion as this was wilful and deliberate and fully carried out, a sinking below the minimum which the note of Catholicity requires' (Stone, The Church, p. 59).

4. Apostolicity.—It has already been pointed out that Christ selected twelve of His followers to stand in a specially close relation to Himself, and to be charged with a special mission. In what is probably the earliest account of their appointment (Mk 3<sup>13</sup>), it is said they were to 'be with him,' and that He would 'send them forth.' Hence they were called Apostles (Lk 6<sup>12</sup>). The nature of this relation and this mission must now be examined in order to ascertain the sense in which the Church may be called Apostolic. It may first be noticed that a sharp distinction has sometimes been drawn between the position of the Twelve as representative disciples, that is, as standing in a specially close relationship to Christ, of the same kind, however, as that of other disciples, and their position as Apostles, that is, as men sent forth on a special mission. No such sharp distinction is drawn in the NT, nor does it appear to be necessary. The two things are spoken of in the passage of St. Mark just referred to as two sides of the same fact, not as two separable things. The close discipleship was necessary to fit the Apostles for their mission, and it therefore formed part of it.

The nature of this Apostolic mission is stated in the most comprehensive terms in Jn 20<sup>21</sup>: 'As the Father hath sent me, even so send I you'; that is to say, it was the task of carrying on upon earth the work of Christ Himself. It seems to be of little or no consequence to our estimate of the nature of the Apostolic functions whether others besides the Twelve were present upon the occasion when these particular words were spoken. The Twelve are frequently called 'the disciples,' especially in the Fourth Gospel. And the mission of the Apostles is not a separate thing from the mission of the Church. If, as St. Paul so constantly teaches, the Church is one body with many members, the acts of the organs of the body are the acts of the body itself. St. Paul insists equally strongly upon the unity of the whole and the differentiation of function within the whole. And so the point to be considered is not whether a separate mission was given to the Apostles apart from that of the whole Church, but rather what special functions of the Church were committed to the Apostles to be performed, by themselves or under their direction, on the Church's behalf.

(a) One principal object with which the Apostles were sent out in the first instance was undoubtedly that they might teach (Mk 3<sup>13</sup>). And it is equally clear that this was not merely a temporary, but a permanent function. Even the special directions given to them on their first sending out (Mt 10) are not intelligible unless a continuance of the work of teaching be understood. And the Twelve were specially trained by close and continual intercourse with Christ for the work of being witnesses to Him (Ac 1<sup>8</sup>), and it is clear that they considered this as one of their special functions (1<sup>9</sup> 2<sup>32</sup> 3<sup>14</sup> 4<sup>13</sup> etc.). And although this personal witness to the actions and words of Christ was necessarily confined to those who had been with Him, the transmission of the witness and the function of teaching in general are permanent. The commission given by Christ to the Twelve to make disciples of all the nations (Mt 28<sup>19-20</sup>) is one which was not, and could not be, accomplished by themselves in person, and it implies the continuance of the teaching office of the Church until this end is accomplished. So it is recognized as one of the special duties of those who were appointed by the Apostles to take part in their work (1 Ti 3<sup>10-11</sup> 5<sup>17</sup> 6<sup>2</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>14</sup> 2<sup>2</sup>, Tit 2<sup>10</sup> etc.). It is this teaching work of the Church which corresponds to the prophetic office of Christ Himself.

(b) The worship of the Church.—The Sacraments, which were especially committed to the Apostles, have been spoken of as social acts necessary to the existence and cohesion of the Church as a visible society. They are also means by which the relation of the Church to God is expressed, and channels by which the individual receives Divine grace. The worship of the Church centres and culminates in the Eucharist, the specially appointed action by which the Church takes part in the sacrifice offered by Christ. It makes a memorial of that part of His sacrificial work which has been accomplished in time (Lk 22<sup>19</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>26</sup>), and it unites itself with Him in His present mediatorial work of pleading that sacrifice in heaven (He 7<sup>24-25</sup>). So the whole Church, as the Body of Christ, takes part in His priestly work (1 P 2<sup>9</sup>, Rev 8<sup>3-4</sup>), and this has always been emphasized by the language of all the liturgies. See art. LORD'S SUPPER, SACRAMENTS.

(c) Discipline.—A visible society could hardly exist, or at least continue to exist, without some form of discipline. Christ sanctioned for His followers (Mt 18<sup>15</sup>), not only individual remonstrance, which may be considered as the gentlest form in which discipline can be administered (cf. 1 Th 5<sup>14</sup>), but also, in the case of the failure of this, the collective censure of the community (cf. 1 Ti 2<sup>20</sup>, Gal 2<sup>11</sup>), and in the last resort the exercise of the natural right of a society to expel one of its members (cf. 1 Co 5<sup>4</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>17</sup>). These last passages alone would suffice to show what is certain enough, that the power of excommunication was recognized and practised in the Church from the earliest times.

A still more emphatic commission was given by Christ to St. Peter (Mt 16<sup>19</sup>), and to 'the disciples' (18<sup>18</sup>). Whatever may be the exact meaning of these words, it is difficult to give them any interpretation which does not include the idea of jurisdiction. At all events the words in Jn 20<sup>22-23</sup> relate directly to discipline, and are of the most unqualified character. If the historical character of these passages is admitted, there can be no doubt that a disciplinary commission was given. There have been, however, differences of opinion as to the persons to whom it was given. The chief views held on this point may be roughly classed under four heads.

(1) It has been held that the position of St. Peter was different in kind from that of the other Apostles, and that jurisdiction was given directly to him alone, and to the other Apostles through him, and that the same holds good of his successors. (2) That jurisdiction was given directly to all the Apostles, and is inherent in their office and in that of their successors, but that it can be legitimately exercised only by those who preserve the unity of the Church by being in union with St. Peter and his successors. (3) That jurisdiction was given equally to all the Apostles and their successors as the Divinely appointed organs of the Church, and that only a primacy of honour belonged to St. Peter or is due to his successors. 'All the Apostles were equal in mission, equal in commission, equal in power, equal in honour, equal in all things, except priority of order, without which no society can well subsist' (Bramhall). (4) That the Apostles received no gift of jurisdiction from Christ Himself, and that any powers which they or their successors exercised were gradually conferred upon them by the act of the Church or of parts of it.

Closely connected with directly disciplinary functions are those general powers of direction and administration which must be exercised in a society by some persons appointed for the purpose. That they were used by the Apostles, even with regard to secular matters, is plain from the Acts and Epistles. The Apostolic background is everywhere present in the former book, and St. Paul assumes such powers throughout (e.g., 1 Co 11<sup>14</sup>). It is by the exercise of such powers of discipline and government that the Church participates in the kingly office of Christ.

We may therefore conclude that the Church may be called Apostolic in so far as it has held fast to the teaching, worship, and discipline of the Church as intrusted by Christ to the Apostles, and according to the order established by them.

NOTE.—The words 'church' and ἐκκλησία.—The word 'church' is found in a great variety of forms in the Teutonic and Slavonic languages as the exact equivalent of ἐκκλησία, which has passed into Latin and all the Romance and Celtic languages. There has been much dispute about its ultimate derivation. Suggested derivations from the Latin circus and from the Gothic are now set aside by philologists as impossible. The only derivation that will bear examination is from the Greek ἐκκλησία. This is used in the Apost. Const. (c. A.D. 300?) and in the canons of several councils early in the 4th cent., and was afterwards fairly common in the East. It means 'of the Lord,' and is used of 'the house of the Lord,' kyriakos being understood. The derivation of 'church' from kyriakos is not free from philological difficulties, and there is no sufficient historical explanation of the curious fact that a less common Greek word should have been adopted by the Teutonic languages in place of the usual kyriakos. But there is no other even plausible explanation of the derivation of the word 'church.'

The word kyriakos is common in classical Greek in the sense of an assembly of the people—literally, the calling them out (katekale) by the voice of a herald or otherwise. It is used in the LXX as the translation of the Hebrew word kahal, which has a similar derivation and meaning. Another word, ekklesia, is commonly translated by kyriakos, and means properly the congregation itself, whereas kahal means rather the assembly of the congregation; but there is no sharp distinction between the words, and in the later books of the OT ekklesia almost disappears, and kahal or kyriakos combines both shades of meaning. There is little or no evidence as to the precise contemporary ideas which would have been conveyed to a few of our Lord's time by the use of these words, but they could not fail to recall the thought of Israel as the congregation of God, and to suggest the idea of a Divine society.

It has often been supposed that the word kyriakos was intended to convey the idea of a people or a number of persons called out of the world for the special service of God. The idea of Israel as a chosen people and the idea of the special election and vocation of Christians occur constantly in the Scriptures, but they never appear to be connected with the words kyriakos or ekklesia. In both these words the idea of the summons to the assembly, which is their original significance, practically disappears, and the words mean simply the assembly itself, or the people who meet in assembly. See art. 'Congregation' and 'Church' in Hastings' DB.

The fact that the word kyriakos is found in the Gospels only in the two passages of St. Matthew already discussed, has led some to suppose that these passages are later insertions into the original narrative, made at a time when the idea of the Christian society had been developed, and when it was desired to add authority to the idea by a reference to the teaching of Christ. If, however, the view taken above of the general tendency of Christ's work and teaching is correct, His connection with the Church does not depend upon these two passages only, and there would be much difficulty in explaining the fact that this term and no other was universally applied to the Christian society from the time of the Apostles onwards, unless it were the natural equivalent of Aramaic terms used by Christ Himself.

LITERATURE.—The number of books which deal with the subject of the Church from exactly the point of view taken in this article may not be very large, but the literature which bears more or less upon the original constitution and characteristics of the Church is of stupendous extent; and the most that can be done here is to mention a very few specimens of different classes of books which relate to different parts of the subject. In the first place, most commentaries on the NT deal with the exegesis of the passages which bear upon the Church, but it is not worth while to attempt a selection here. The writings of most of the early Fathers contain either contributions to the history of the growth of the Church, or information as to the opinions of the writers on the subject. A few specially important works are mentioned below. During the Middle Ages there was a great mass of literature dealing with the papal authority and the relations of the Church to the State. From the time of Hildebrand onwards this aspect of the question was especially prominent. The Reformation period naturally produced abundant discussions in which the presuppositions of the Middle Ages were to a great extent laid aside. In modern times, and especially during the last fifty years, the early institutions of the Church have been investigated with great minuteness, especially by German writers, and there has been a great abundance of general Church Histories, which often deal with in all treatises on Christian doctrine to a greater or less extent, and from all points of view. The books mentioned below must be regarded merely as examples of the different kinds of works in which the subject may be studied.

CHUZA (Χουζᾶς).—The ἐπιτροπος or house-steward of Herod the tetrarch, and husband of Joanna one of the women who, having been healed either of a sickness or of an evil spirit, attached themselves to Jesus and 'ministered unto him of their substance' (Lk 8<sup>3</sup>). Chuza is identified by Mr. Stanley Cook (Glossary of Aramaic Inscriptions, Camb. 1898) with the father of one Hayyân whose family erected a rock-cut tomb at al-Hegg in Arabia, with the inscription: רמא רמא בן יוסף יוֹ חַיְיָאֵן, son of Kâza, his posterity (have erected this tomb). The monument is probably of the 1st cent. B.C. or A.D. Blass (Philology of the Gospels), on the authority of l, a 7th cent. MS of the Vulgate, identifies the name with the Greek Κουζᾶς; but this seems more than doubtful. Chuza may have been of a Nabatean family, married to a Jewish wife. Joanna is also mentioned (Lk 24<sup>10</sup>) as one of the women who came early to the sepulchre to anoint the Lord's body (see JOANNA).

Chuza is preferred by the American Committee of Revisers as the more proper spelling of Chuza.

CIRCUMCISION (ῥῆς, περιτομή).—With the origin of this rite we are not here concerned; as regards the three main theories—that it was a tribal mark, that it was of the nature of a sacrifice to the deity, and that it was practised from hygienic motives—see the Literature at the end of this article.

Circumcision was very far from being confined to the Hebrews; it was practised by the ancient Arabs (Eusebius, Præp. Evangeilica, vi. 11; W. R. Smith, Rel. of the Semites<sup>2</sup>, p. 328; Wellhausen, Esse Arab. Heident.<sup>2</sup> pp. 174-176; H. H. Ploss, Das Kind in Brauch und Sittē der Völker, i. 295-300; Bertheland, Mémoires et Mélanges des Arabes, pp. 306-314) as well as by the Mohammedans (Naldeck, Sketches from Eastern Hist. p. 68), by the Ethiopians (Philostorgius, Hist. Eccles. iii. 4), by the Kaffirs (J. G. Frazer, Golden Bough<sup>2</sup>, i. 327) and other African races (Hartmann, Die Völker Afrikas, i. 178; Ploss, op. cit. i. 295 ff.), by many Central Australian tribes (J. G. Frazer, Totemism, p. 47; Lagrange, Études sur les religions sémitiques, p. 239 ff.; Ploss, op. cit. ii. 250, 255, who says it is practised by the central, northern, and north-western tribes, but not by those in the east and south-west), by the Egyptians (Ebers, Ägypten und die Bücher Moses, i. 278; Lagrange, op. cit. p. 241 ff.), and by the Aztecs and other Central American races (Jewish Encyc. iv. 97), etc.

The great difference between the national observance of the rite by the Hebrews (however one may seek to account for the somewhat conflicting statements in Gn 17<sup>13</sup>, Ex 4<sup>10, 16</sup>, and Jos 5<sup>2</sup>; cf. Jn 7<sup>22</sup>)† and that of other peoples was, firstly, that its significance was wholly religious,—the outward symbol of a covenant with God,—it was a religious act, whereas, among other nations, whatever the reason may have been for practising circumcision, it did not occupy a position like this;‡ and secondly,

‡ It is noteworthy that as a ceremonial act circumcision is not considered in the book of Deuteronomy, though it is used in a figurative sense, 10<sup>16</sup> 30<sup>10</sup>.

§ A certain religious element, though in quite a subordinate that the Hebrews performed circumcision on the eighth day after birth,* i.e. in infancy, whereas among other races it almost invariably took place at the age of puberty.† It is possible that this difference between the Mosaic Code and the usage of others was due to the more humane character of the former, which enjoined the rite at a time when least painful.‡

It was the custom among the Hebrews at all times, as it is among modern Jews,§ to give a boy a name at his circumcision ¶ (see Lk 2<sup>21</sup>). The rite had to be performed on the eighth day after birth, even though that day happened to be a Sabbath; technically this was a breaking of the Sabbath, but the law concerning circumcision took precedence here (see Christ's words in Jn 7<sup>22</sup>). If, however, from one cause or another, e.g. sickness, a child's circumcision had to be postponed, the rite could under no circumstances be performed on the Sabbath. ** In the time of Christ the ceremony was performed in the house; by the 7th cent. it had become customary to perform it in the synagogue; the modern Jews, however, have gone back to the earlier custom, and have their children circumcised at home.†† How fully the Law was fulfilled in the case of Christ is seen from Lk 1<sup>9</sup> 'On the eighth day they came to circumcise the child [John]' (cf. Ac 7, Ph 8<sup>2</sup>), and Lk 2<sup>21</sup>. And when eight days were fulfilled for circumcising him, his name was called Jesus' (cf. Gal 4<sup>1</sup>).

Whatever may have been the original object and signification of circumcision,‡‡ it had lost its primary meaning long before the time of our Lord. By the time of the Babylonian exile it had become one of the distinguishing marks of Judaism, yet in spite of this, it is remarkable to find that in later days there arose a divergence of opinion among the Jews as to the need of circumcision for proselytes. Hellenistic Jews did not enforce circumcision in the case of proselytes, affirming that baptism was sufficient (see the Jewish Encyc. iv. 94, 95, where further details are given); the Palestinian Jews, on the other hand, would not admit proselytes without circumcision. The view of the latter ultimately won the day, but the epistle testifies to the fact that, in the opinion of a very influential and important class of Jews, circumcision and baptism were analogous rites. Now there was one element in circumcision which may possibly have been of greater significance than is often supposed. It was an essential part of the rite that blood should be shed (cf. the 'Mezizah' cup, an illustration of which can be seen in the Jewish Encyc. iv. 99); but blood represented life, was even identified with life (Lv 17<sup>11, 14</sup>, see art. BLOOD); it is therefore difficult to get away from the conviction that when a child was circumcised he was consecrated to God by the fact that his life (i.e. under the symbol of blood) was offered to

God. The fact of circumcision being called 'the sign of the covenant' (Gn 17<sup>10</sup> אַתָּה הָיִיתָ לְאֵלֹהִים; cf. also the modern name בְּרִית מִלֵּי, and the words in the service at a circumcision: 'From this eighth day and henceforth may his blood be accepted, and may the Lord his God be with him')§§ supports this view, for no covenant was ratified without the shedding of blood,† i.e. the symbolic laying down of a life.

God. The fact of circumcision being called 'the sign of the covenant' (Gn 17<sup>10</sup> אַתָּה הָיִיתָ לְאֵלֹהִים; cf. also the modern name בְּרִית מִלֵּי, and the words in the service at a circumcision: 'From this eighth day and henceforth may his blood be accepted, and may the Lord his God be with him')§§ supports this view, for no covenant was ratified without the shedding of blood,† i.e. the symbolic laying down of a life.

If circumcision, then, was in a certain sense a death (or at least a symbol of life laid down), there is a very striking analogy between it and baptism; cf. the words of St. Paul in Ro 6<sup>3</sup>. 'Are ye ignorant that all we who were baptized into Christ were baptized into his death? We were buried therefore with him through baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also might walk in newness of life. . . . Both circumcision and baptism were a figurative death, by means of which a new spiritual life was reached. In the later Jewish literature this view was held with regard to circumcision, as the following quotation, for example, will show: 'According to Pirke R. El. . . . Pharaoh prevented the Hebrew slaves from performing the rite; but when the Passover time came and brought them deliverance, they underwent circumcision, and mingled the blood of the Paschal lamb with that of the Abrahamic covenant, wherefore (Ezk 16<sup>9</sup>) God repeats the words: In thy blood live.'‡‡ The same thought is brought out in the modern 'service at a circumcision,' when the Mohel§ says, in reference to the newly circumcised: 'Let thy father and thy mother rejoice, and let her that bare thee be glad; and it is said, And I passed by thee, and I saw thee weltering in thy blood, and I said unto thee, "In thy blood live."§§

Taking these facts together, we must regard the circumcision of Christ as of the highest significance; for it was not only a fulfilling of the Law, but inasmuch as it was symbolic of a life laid down, it must also be regarded as a 'parable' of the Crucifixion (cf. Milton, Poetical Works, 'Upon the Circumcision'; Keble, Christian Year, 'The Circumcision of Christ').

CIRCUMSTANTIALITY IN THE PARABLES.—A parable consists of two members, viz. an illustration and a didactic part, which, according to the view we hold, may be called either the interpretation or the application. Both members are necessary to make the parable complete, though the didactic part need not be expressly stated, the circumstances in which the illustration is given making its purpose plain. Unfortunately the parables of Christ are mostly preserved only in fragmentary form. We have the illustrations, but not the lessons they were designed to enforce; and as we are uncertain as to the connexion in which those illustrations were given, it is sometimes difficult to make sure what Christ intended to teach by them. But if the Evangelists give little, sometimes even a misleading, light as to the context in which the parables were spoken, they record the illustrative portions of them with much fulness of detail. Particularly is this the case with those parables in which the illustration is in the form of a narrative. The story is told with much circumstantiality. Many little touches are introduced to heighten the effect. We are almost inclined to forget, at times, that the story is told with a purpose, so fully and circumstantially are its details narrated. Among the Evangelists, St. Luke is the most pronounced in the circumstantiality with which he reproduces the stories which Christ introduced in His parables. He likes to linger over them. He elaborates with a fulness of detail that brings the scene vividly before the mind. But though St. Luke is pre-eminent in this respect, all the Synoptists present the illustrative portion of the parables with more or less circumstantiality. And this feature of the parables suggests some questions which we may consider under the following heads:—(1) In how far is the circumstantiality of the narratives authentic? (2) If we accept the traditional principle of parabolical 'interpretation,' can we fix a limit beyond which it is illegitimate to interpret the details? (3) If we reject this principle of parabolical 'interpretation,' can we meet the objection that the circumstantiality of the illustrations is empty ornament?

1. The question of the authenticity of the circumstantiality of the illustrations is in many cases forced upon us by the fact that details which are recorded by one Evangelist are omitted by another. For instance, in the parable of the Sower, St. Matthew and St. Mark say of the seed that fell by the wayside, that the fowls came and devoured it up, but St. Luke adds that it was trodden down (8<sup>8</sup>). Again, in the parable of the Patch on the Old Garment, St. Matthew and St. Mark describe the patch as a piece of undressed cloth, while St. Luke heightens the folly of the proceeding by making the patch first be cut out of a new garment (ἀπὸ ἡμαρτου κλωθῆς ὄχιλας, 5<sup>28</sup>). In many cases we find the explanation of such variations in the details of the parables in the desire of the Evangelists to emphasize the point and heighten the effect of the illustration. Such is possibly the case with the examples just given, and many other instances of the same tendency might be cited. To give a few more,—in the parable of the Supper (Mt 22<sup>1-14</sup>, Lk 14<sup>15-24</sup>), St. Matthew merely says that the guests made light of the invitation and went their ways, one to his farm, another to his merchandise (v. 2); while St. Luke puts various excuses into the mouth of the guests (vv. 18-20). In the parable of the Lost Sheep (Mt 18<sup>12-14</sup>, Lk 15<sup>3-7</sup>), St. Luke represents the owner as taking the lost sheep, when he has found it, upon his shoulders. In the parable of the Houses built upon the Rock and upon the Sand (Mt 7<sup>24-27</sup>, Lk 6<sup>47-49</sup>), St. Matthew says merely that the wise man built upon the rock and the foolish upon the sand; but St. Luke represents the one as having to dig and go deep to find a foundation, while the other builds without a foundation, upon the earth. But in other cases we must assign a different motive for the variation in the details of the parables. Many seem due to an allegorizing tendency on the part of the Evangelists. They regarded the characters and events of the narratives as the counterparts of like characters and events in the religious sphere, and introduced details from this latter sphere into the illustration. Thus, for instance, when we compare St. Matthew's version of the parable of the Supper with St. Luke's (Mt 22<sup>1-14</sup>, Lk 14<sup>15-24</sup>), many of the new features in St. Matthew appear to be due to this tendency. The Supper of St. Luke has become the marriage-feast of the king's son, i.e. the Messiah; the king, in spite of the refusal of the guests, sends them a second invitation (vv. 2-4); they ill-treat and slay the servants who bring the invitation, and the king sends forth his armies to destroy them and to burn their city (vv. 6, 7). Evidently these details are suggested by the thought of Israel's behaviour towards her God, and the fate that overtook her. Again, in the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen, St. Mark relates that they took the son and slew him and cast him out of the vineyard; while St. Matthew and St. Luke reverse the order, and make them first cast him out and then slay him, with evident reference to the fate of Jesus (Mt 27<sup>1-35</sup>, cf. He 13<sup>3</sup>). Again, in the parable of the Watchful Servants (Mk 13<sup>33-37</sup>, Lk 12<sup>35-38</sup>), St. Luke represents the master as girding himself and making them sit down to meat and serving them, though he has himself borne witness (17<sup>36</sup>) to the unlikelihood of such conduct on the part of any ordinary master. Such extraordinary concessions are probably an allegorical feature introduced with reference to the Parousia.

2. If we accept the traditional principle of parabolical 'interpretation,' in how far are we justified in seeking to interpret the circumstantial details so largely present in the parables? There are some who insist that every little detail is significant, and who regard that as the true method of interpretation which seeks to find some spiritual truth to correspond to every item of the illustration. 'Quanto enim plus solide veritatis,' says Vitringa (quoted by Trench, ch. iii.) 'ex Verbo Dei eruimus, si nihil obestet, tanto magis divinam commendabimus sapientiam.' Teelman (quoted by Jülicher, Die Gleichnisreden Jesu, i. p. 270) insists that in every parable every word must be significant. And Petersen (ib. p. 271) maintains that Christ never introduces the slightest detail into any parable which is not designed to correspond to something in the interpretation. On the other hand, it has been generally recognized that there are limits beyond which the details of the illustration must not be pressed. 'Sunt autem quæ et simpliciter posita sunt,' says Tert. (de Pudic. 9), 'ad struendam et disponendam et texendam parabolam.' Chrysostom (in Mt. Hom. lxiv. 3) lays down the rule οὐδὲ χρὴ πάντα τὰ ἐν ταῖς παραβολαῖς κατὰ λέξιν περιεργάζεσθαι, ἀλλὰ τὸν σκοπὸν μαθόντας, δι' οὗ συντεθῆ, τούτων δρέπεσθαι καὶ μηδὲν πολυπραγμαίνειν περαιτέρω. But great difference of opinion exists, even among those who profess to observe Chrysostom's canon, as to where the πολυπραγμαίνειν begins. Indeed, if the principle of 'interpretation' be admitted at all, if the parables, as such treatment of them involves, in spite of all protest to the contrary, are really allegories, it is difficult to see on what ground a line can be drawn beyond which it is illegitimate to interpret the details. The more perfect the allegory, the more will it admit of interpretation down to the minutest circumstance. And so long as the significance attached to these details is relevant to the tenor of the whole, the interpreter may well demand on what ground it may be objected that the details in question are not to be regarded as symbolical. The artificiality of the method and the unsatisfactoriness of the conclusions may be urged as an objection to the general principle of parabolical

'interpretation' underlying such method, but on that principle the method itself appears thoroughly defensible.

8. If we reject the principle of parabolical 'interpretation,' does not the circumstantiality of the illustrations become mere useless ornament? This is an objection raised against those who contend that the parables are not to be regarded as allegories of which we have to seek the interpretation, but as comparisons between the principle involved in some case taken from everyday life and a similar principle which it is desired to establish in the spiritual sphere. Those who maintain this view insist that it is only the principles or relations involved in the two different spheres that are compared, not the details on either side. There is only the one point of comparison between the two cases, only the one lesson enforced by the parable. In answer to the objection that this seems to reduce the fulness of detail with which the illustrations are elaborated to mere useless ornament, it is replied that though the details are not regarded as significant in the symbolical sense, they are yet full of significance as serving to bring out with force and clearness the thought which it is the purpose of the parable to enforce. Were the illustrations not presented with such circumstantiality, they would not be so convincing as they are. The scene is brought vividly before our eyes; our interest is awakened, our sympathy enlisted. Many of the details which cause such trouble to the allegorical interpreters, as, e.g. the injustice of the Judge (Lk 18<sup>1-5</sup>) and the fraudulence of the Steward (Lk 16<sup>1-15</sup>), may easily be explained from this point of view. The injustice of the Judge serves to bring out more forcibly that it was the impotency of the widow that overcame him; the fraud of the Steward emphasizes the fact that it was for his wisdom alone that he was commended. And so with all the details with which the parables are supplied. There is no useless ornament. Every little touch serves to bring out more clearly the central thought enforced by the illustration, and so contributes to the effect of the parable.

CITY.—In the East the city developed from the necessity of protection from hostile invasion, and its characteristic was the wall or rampart. It was the wall that originally constituted the πόλις, though in later times its position amongst the Jews was determined by its ability to produce ten men qualified for office in the Synagogue (see Hastings' DB, art. 'City'). The κώμη was the village or hamlet, without walls, and was generally a dependency of some neighbouring city. In Mk 1<sup>38</sup> the word κωμόπολις is used, apparently as a designation of a large unwall'd village or town. Bethlehem and Bethsaida, though generally classed as cities, are spoken of as κώμαι in Jn 7<sup>4</sup>, Mk 8<sup>26, 29</sup>, the natural inference from which is that the words 'city,' 'town,' and 'village,' though having, as with us, a technical signification, were occasionally used in a looser and less precise manner.

The government of the πόλις was modelled on that of Jerusalem, where the Sanhedrin (wh. see) was the supreme authority on all matters which, after the Roman domination, did not fall within the province of the Roman governor. According to the Talmud (Mish. Sanh. i. 6), in every Jewish city there was a Council of twenty-three which was responsible to the Sanhedrin (Mt 5<sup>21</sup>). Josephus knows nothing of such a Council. The Court which he mentions (Ant. IV. viii. 14) consisted of seven judges, who had each two Levites as assessors. The College of Elders who presided over the Synagogue had also judicial functions, but what was its relation to the Council is not easy to determine. The gates of the city were places of public resort; the money-changers facilitated trade; and the various guilds of artisans had special districts allotted to them.

In the time of our Lord, Palestine was a land of cities. Galilee, measuring fifty miles north and south, and from twenty-five to thirty-five east and west—about the average size of an English shire—is said by Josephus (BJ III. iii. 2) to have had a population of 3,000,000. Allowing for patriotic exaggeration, the fact that the soil was so fertile as to make it a veritable garden, and that it was traversed by the three main trade routes of the East, would account for an exceptional density of population. Round the Lake of Galilee there were nine cities with not less than 15,000 inhabitants, some of them with considerably more, so that there must have been along its margin an almost unbroken chain of buildings. The blending of the Jewish with the Greek civilization must have given to these cities a striking picturesqueness alike in manners, customs, attire, and architecture. Tiberias, built by Herod Antipas, was a stately city, whose ruins still indicate a wall three miles long. Its palace, citadel, and public buildings were of the most imposing description, but it was almost wholly Gentile, no Jew who had the pride of his race setting foot within the walls of a city polluted alike by the monuments of idolatry and by its site on an ancient burial-place. Cities like Bethsaida and Capernaum, again, were preponderantly Jewish. Taricheæ, not mentioned in the Gospels, is described by Pliny (HN v. xv. 11) as one of the chief centres of industry and commerce, and by Josephus (Ant. XIV. vii. 3) as a stronghold of Jewish patriotism. Everywhere in Galilee there was an intense civic vitality. The problems of a complex civilization were presented with peculiar force. The Gospel narrative stands out from a background of a richer and more varied life than probably ever existed elsewhere in an organized community, and it reflects in a wonderfully accurate manner all its various phases. This is, indeed, one reason of its universal applicability. It is the application of absolute principles of conduct to typical situations of the most complex character.

This density of population passed over the Lake of Galilee to the region eastward. The Decapolis (Mt 4<sup>23</sup>) consisted of a group of ten or more cities east of the Jordan, united in a league for purposes of defence. These were Greek cities in the province of Syria, but possessing certain civil rights, such as coinage, etc., granted them by Rome. The cities constituting the Decapolis are variously named. Pliny (HN v. xviii. 74) enumerates them as follows: Scythopolis, Hippos, Gadara, Dion, Pella, Gerasa, Philadelphia, Canatha, and, with less probability, Damascus and Raphana. To the north of Galilee again lay the Phœnician cities of Tyre and Sidon (Mt 15<sup>34</sup>). Tyre, even in its decline, was a noble city, with a teeming population. The circumference of its walls is given by Pliny as nineteen Roman miles. Inland, Cæsarea Philippi nestled at the base of Mt. Hermon, in a situation of remarkable beauty and fertility. This city received its name from Herod the Great, who built there a temple to Augustus. It was in its neighbourhood that Peter made his striking confession (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>). The cities of Samaria to the south occupy no large place in our Lord's mission. Though Jesus passed through Samaria (Jn 4<sup>5</sup>), it is not recorded that He visited its capital, and the disciples were specially enjoined to refrain from preaching the gospel in any city of the Samaritans (Mt 10<sup>6</sup>). Samaria was itself a beautiful city—one of the cities rebuilt on a magnificent scale by Herod the Great owing to its strategic situation—the population being mixed, half-Greek, half-Samaritan, wholly alien, therefore, in sympathy from the Jews, alike through the Samaritan hostility and the Greek culture. The city of Sychar (Jn 4<sup>5</sup>), the scene of our Lord's conversation with the Samaritan woman, is generally identified with the modern Ain Askar, at the foot of Mt. Ebal, about a mile from Nablus (Shechem). Judaea, with its desolate mountain ranges, was never rich in cities. Jericho lay on its borders, situated in an oasis of remarkable fertility, a city of palms, in striking contrast to the stony and barren region of which it was the gateway. Jericho was rich in the natural wealth of the East, but singularly poor in heroic memories.

But to the Jew the city of cities—the city that symbolized all that was highest alike in his political and religious aspirations—was Jerusalem. Twice in St. Matthew's Gospel is Jerusalem called 'the holy city' (Mt 4<sup>5</sup> 27<sup>33</sup>), and as such it was enshrined in every Jewish heart through the noble poetry of the Psalter. It was the city where God had His chosen seat, and round which clustered the heroic traditions of the Hebrew race—the city, indeed, with which was intertwined the very conception of Judaism as a national religion, for in the Temple of Jerusalem alone could God be worshipped with the rites He had Himself ordained. The cities of Galilee owed their greatness and importance to commercial or political causes. Though some were preponderantly Jewish, and others, such as Tiberias, almost exclusively Gentile, there was yet in them all a mingling of races and a tolerably free and humane intercourse. Samaria was a great Roman stronghold, dominating the main trade-route from Caesarea on the coast to the East. But Jerusalem remained a city of the Jews, cherishing its own ecclesiastical traditions, and holding its patriotic exclusiveness with a narrowness all the greater from the pressure of the Roman subjection. It had almost complete autonomy under the Sanhedrin. Caesarea was the seat of the Roman Procurator, except during the great Jewish feasts, when he found it necessary to reside at Jerusalem to restrain the turbulence of a fanatically patriotic people who were ready to court martyrdom for the national cause. It is perhaps significant, as showing the ecclesiastical character of the population of Jerusalem, that it was a priest and a Levite who first passed the man lying wounded and bleeding on the road to Jericho (Lk 10<sup>31</sup>).

In the time of our Lord, then, the Jews had made the transition from a life mainly pastoral and agricultural to the more advanced life of the city. The Twelve and the Seventy are sent to preach the gospel in cities, and when they are persecuted in one city they are to flee to another (Mt 10<sup>16-23</sup>, Lk 10<sup>13</sup>). Jesus, after He had given instructions to the Twelve, departs to preach and to teach in their cities (Mt 11<sup>1</sup>). The conception of the city as the flower and fruit of the highest civilization is emerging, and the civitas Dei is taking the place of the regnum Dei, and thus bringing Hebrew into line with Greek ideals. This fact is very significant for the modern presentation of the gospel. It is sometimes assumed that Christianity is possible only for a primitive community, and many modern ideals of communal life are based on the supposition that the city is wholly an artificial product, and that the way of true progress lies in reverting to village communities. All through the Christian centuries there has been a tendency on the part of many who have felt with singular intensity the influence of Jesus, to seek the cultivation of the Christian life either in isolation or in withdrawing themselves from the strenuous civic activities. The Christian ideal of sainthood has been largely that of the cloister. But it is becoming more and more realized that Jesus lived His life in a crowd, that He was so seldom alone that occasions when He sought solitude are specially noted, and that it was the sight of great masses of people that most powerfully touched His emotions (Mt 14<sup>13</sup>, Lk 19<sup>21</sup>). The gospel of Jesus is essentially a social gospel. Its ideal is a civic ideal. Its precepts have no meaning and no applicability except to those who are living in a community. Its ultimate goal is the 'holy city, new Jerusalem, descending from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband' (Rev 21<sup>2</sup>). The fact is noteworthy as showing the place and influence of Christianity in the natural evolution of humanity. For the history of civilization is the history of cities. Babylon, Nineveh, Jerusalem, Athens, Rome, Alexandria, Venice, Florence, and the medieval cities all mark stages in the development of the higher culture of the race. The modern city, indeed, still lacks its raison d'être. It is as yet a huge amorphous entity, presenting problems which, so far from finding solution, are only now beginning to be fully faced. And the supreme test of the Divine power of the religion of Jesus in our day will lie in its capability of giving to the city rational meaning, of transmuting the blind force of economic pressure to the law of reciprocal harmony, of so applying the principles of the gospel to the marvellous complexities of our civic life as to induce the noblest faculties of the individual while securing the unity of communal existence.

CLAIM.—The term expresses a twofold relationship, either to a claim as advanced and enforced or as accepted and complied with. The assumption or imposition of a claim upon another is an act of authority, a relationship of established right and superior power; while the recognition and discharge of the same claim represent the corresponding social duty.

The narrative of the Gospels describes how Christ moved amid the social and religious relationships of the world into which He came. It tells how He knew all things in the heart of man (Jn 2<sup>25-26</sup>), and occasionally drew the attention of His disciples to the real importance of certain personalities and actions (Mt 16<sup>9</sup> 11<sup>3</sup>, Lk 21<sup>1-4</sup>), where a wrong impression might have been produced; but, as a rule, He does not take the initiative in criticising and condemning in detail the standards, methods, and institutions then prevailing in society. His kingdom is declared to be entirely distinct from that of the world, and it is only when challenged on a question of right conduct that He lays down the principle that whatever Caesar has an undisputed claim upon ought to be regarded as his, and whatever belongs to God should be rendered to Him only. On the ground of previous and higher claims, He expels those who had obtained the privilege of traffic within the temple area, inasmuch as the place had been dedicated to its Owner as a house of prayer (Mt 21<sup>13</sup>). The victims of masterful temptation and difficult surroundings (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>, Lk 7<sup>35</sup> 18<sup>3</sup> 22<sup>24</sup>, Jn 8<sup>14</sup>) are regarded with pity and hopefulness. His direct and indignant exposure is reserved for the attempt to give religious sanction to evaded duty (Mk 7<sup>11</sup>), or where the name of religion is made unlovely by the proud and harsh claims of those who profess it (Mt 6<sup>23-25</sup>).

Otherwise Christ moves amid the relationships of common life and the claims of organized society, using them as the field of parable and the vehicle of His teaching concerning the kingdom that was at hand. Thus He refers to purchasers of property, money-lenders and interest, employers of labour and the rights of the labourer. Similarly, we have allusions to war, judicial punishment, parental authority, marriage and divorce, fasting and sumptuous living. With regard to all such relationships and connected claims Christ uses the vocabulary and valuation current in the world. The prodigal son declares that he has forfeited the right to which he had been born (Lk 15<sup>29</sup>); Zaccheus (19<sup>9</sup>) and the woman bowed down with infirmity (13<sup>16</sup>) have, as children of Abraham, a family claim that should shut out more distant considerations. This fact gives emphasis to the exceptional instances of Naaman and the widow of Sarepta (Lk 4<sup>25-28</sup>). The Syro-Phœnician woman quite understands that local opinion as to race privilege does not allow her to share on equal terms with Israel (Mt 15<sup>27-28</sup>). The lineage of natural descent implies that of ethical resemblance (Mt 23<sup>31</sup>, Jn 8<sup>29</sup>). Parental affection is the basis of the assurance that our Heavenly Father will act still more wisely and lovingly towards His children (Mt 7<sup>11</sup>, Lk 11<sup>13</sup>). It is after the fullest recognition of the beauty and power of family claims that Christ calls His disciples to an even more intense and constraining relationship (Mt 10<sup>27</sup>, Lk 14<sup>26</sup>).

The claims of neighbourhood and hospitality are frequently alluded to. Lazarus, even in Abraham's bosom, must be willing to serve as had been an earthly neighbour (Lk 16<sup>24</sup>). A neighbour can be put to any inconvenience on behalf of a stranger guest in their midst (11<sup>5-8</sup>). The action of the woman who anointed Christ and bathed His feet with tears is shown to be right, inasmuch as the claim of a passing guest was greater than that of those who were always present (Mk 14<sup>8</sup>, Lk 7<sup>37-38</sup>, Jn 12<sup>7-8</sup>).

By the same use of current language and thought, religion is a codification of things bound and free, prohibited and permitted (Mt 16<sup>19</sup>, 18<sup>18</sup>). Its duties, as imposed by the scribes and Pharisees, are like the load on the submissive baggage animal (23<sup>3</sup>). John forbids those who taught in Christ's name without having the qualifying claim of discipleship (Mk 9<sup>38</sup>). With the formal appeal of a litigant, 'Legion' demands a proof of Christ's right to interfere (5<sup>7</sup>). Satan is another taskmaster with claims to be satisfied, and disease is the mark of his property and power (Lk 13<sup>16</sup>). Rabbinical rules so far supersede the commandments of God that Christ can be condemned as an enemy to religion (Mt 23<sup>28-29</sup>, Mk 8<sup>30</sup>, 7<sup>5-9</sup>, 10<sup>6</sup>, 11<sup>17</sup>, Lk 13<sup>34</sup>). Afterwards, to one who understood it all, it was evident that attention to their own claims had blinded the religious leaders of Israel to the presence of the Lord of Glory (1 Co 2<sup>8</sup>), just as the worship of nature, degraded and degrading, had darkened and alienated from God the heart of the Gentile world (Ro 1<sup>21</sup>).

It is thus evident from the Gospel narratives that the Hebrew-Roman world, into which Christ came as the Son of Man, had reached a high stage of development with regard to social authority and obedience. The areas of privilege and exemption were carefully marked off from those of servility and compulsion. Legislated right and wrong, like guarding cherubim, faced each other at all the gates of public life. The rich and noble confronted the poor and unclassed, the strong and conquering had their counterpart in the subject and enslaved, the wise and enlightened stood out in relief from the ignorant and barbarous, the male had defined authority and predominance over the female, and free-born citizens exercised a jealous censorship over the admission of strangers and foreigners. The universal pressure of such claims and obligations gave sedimentary stratification to all that was highest and lowest in social order, and only the infusion and uplift of a new volcanic force could invert its masses and confuse such established lines of cleavage.

It was largely due to this prevalence of legal relationship that the first presentation of the gospel to the world took the familiar form of forensic process and judicial pronouncement. A similar desire to present afresh to the present age the mind of Christ and the spirit of His kingdom would in the West draw upon the discoveries of physical science, the principles of commercial expansion, and the incentives of political empire. In the East it would measure the following of Christ with the self-denial of the devotee, likeness to Him with the claims of caste, and turn towards our Heavenly Father the venerated claims of ancestor-worship.

There were, however, two great relationships in the Hebrew-Roman world that were strangely marked by aloofness and disruption, namely, spiritual fellowship between God and man, and the racial status of Jew and Greek. Among the Jews the voice of prophecy and of direct communication with God had ceased. The word of Ezekiel (37<sup>11</sup>) had been fulfilled, 'Our bones are dried, and our hope is lost.' The message of religious teaching had dropt its preface, 'Thus saith the Lord,' and had come to express the contention of a sect, the presentation of a view, the quotation of a hearer from a hearer. On this account the teaching of Christ arrested the ear as sounding a note that had become unfamiliar, the voice of original authority. In the Roman world, the most serene and eloquent teacher of the age (Lucretius) had shown that there was no Divine care for man as had been once supposed, for in his vision of the opened heavens he had seen the gods in a happy seclusion of their own, undisturbed by the sound of human pain and sorrow (de Rer. Nat. ii. 18 ff.; Homer, Il. vi. 41 ff.). In that jaded and disenchanted day the most popular and reasoned religion could only unite gods and men in the creed of avoided care.

With regard to the mutual recognition of Jew and Gentile, the antagonism was regarded on both sides as radical and permanent. The Jew despised the Gentile as 'flesh and blood,' humanity without religion; the Gentile saw in the Jew the negation of all social instinct, the genius of unnatural hate, religion without humanity. It must have been indescribably wonderful in such an age to learn that 'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself' (2 Co 5<sup>19</sup>). It was a great task that was soon to confront the gospel, for the Jew had to be convinced that the alien had been divinely provided for in the promises (Eph 2<sup>12</sup>), and the Gentile had to learn that there was no place for pride where a wild branch had been grafted contrary to custom into a cultivated stem, and owed not only its sustenance but the higher quality of its new fruit to that incorporation (Ro 11<sup>17-20</sup>). And yet in a quarter of a century after Christ's death it could be stated as something that had passed beyond comment and controversy.—'There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female, for ye are all one in Christ Jesus' (Gal 3<sup>28</sup>; see POWER). The Christian was thus a 'new creature, and for him all things had become new' (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>); but this did not mean that he had any resident authority enabling him henceforth to please himself. Everything was in Christ Jesus. To come to Christ was to accept His yoke, and the spirit of bondage (Ro 8<sup>15</sup>) had only been exchanged for a nobler constraint (2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>). Wherever there was freedom from the law of sin and death, there was the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus (Ro 8<sup>2</sup>).

GEORGE M. MACKIE.

CLAIMS (OF CHRIST).—In any attempt to arrive at the truth with regard to the person of Christ, it is with the self-consciousness of Jesus and His witness regarding Himself that we must begin. To answer the question, 'What think ye of Christ?' we need above all to know what Christ thought of Himself. It was the men who knew Jesus only in an external fashion that took Him to be John the Baptist, or Elijah, or Jeremiah, or one of the prophets (Mt 16<sup>14</sup>). It was one who had come into the closest contact with the mind of the Master, and had learned to judge Him, not by outward signs merely, but by His implicit and explicit claims, that broke into the great confession, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God' (v. 16). Hence it becomes a matter of the highest importance to consider the testimony of the Gospels as to our Lord's personal claims.

1. The fundamental claim of Jesus was a claim to moral authority. And this authority was asserted in two ways. (a) He claimed the authority of a master, an authority over the will and the life, to which obedience was the only natural response. It was by this most probably that the earliest disciples were first impressed. 'Follow me,' Jesus said to men (Mt 4<sup>19-21</sup> || 8<sup>22</sup> 9<sup>9</sup> || 19<sup>21</sup> || Jn 1<sup>40</sup>); and they either rose up straightway and followed Him (Mt 4<sup>22-23</sup> || 9<sup>9</sup> ||), or, if they failed to do so, 'went away sorrowful,' feeling in their inmost hearts that they had made 'the grand refusal' (Mt 19<sup>22</sup> ||). (b) But, further, He claimed authority as a teacher. If His immediate followers were first impressed by His claim to be obeyed, it was the authority of His teaching that first struck the multitude and filled them with astonishment (Mt 7<sup>28-29</sup> ||). It was not only that He constantly placed Himself in opposition to their acknowledged instructors, those scribes who sat in Moses' seat, and set His simple 'Verily I say unto you' against all the traditional learning of the synagogue. He did much more than this. He claimed the right either to abrogate altogether or to reinterpret in His own way laws which were regarded as clothed with Divine sanctions—the law of retaliation (Mt 5<sup>38-39</sup>), the law of divorce (v. 31), and even the thrice-holy law of the Sabbath (Mt 12<sup>10-12</sup>, 10<sup>6</sup> ||, Lk 13<sup>14</sup>, Jn 7<sup>22</sup>). See art. AUTHORITY OF CHRIST.

2. But moral authority, like all other forms of authority, must rest upon a power that lies behind. What right has Jesus to speak thus? men would ask; What right to call upon us to leave our homes, our friends, our all, to follow Him? What right to bid us accept His teaching as a perfect revelation of the will of God, and His interpretation of the Law as its true fulfilling? Moral authority quickly disappears when there is no moral power at the back of it. But our Lord's claim to authority rested upon an underlying claim to holiness—a claim which His hearers and disciples were in a position to verify for themselves. There is nothing which gives a man such sway over the consciences of other men as the possession of true holiness; while there is nothing more certain to be found out than the lack of this quality in one who professes to have it. It was the holiness of Christ's character that made His words fall with such convincing weight upon the hearts of men and women. It was His holiness that gave Him the right to command, and made them willing to obey. According to the Fourth Gospel, it was the Baptist's testimony, 'Behold the Lamb of God' (Jn 1<sup>29</sup>), that brought the first pair of disciples to Jesus. They came to see if this testimony was true (cf. v. 37), and what they saw bound them to Jesus for ever. Publicans and sinners drew near to Him (Mt 9<sup>10</sup>, Lk 15<sup>1</sup>), not, as His enemies insinuated (Mt 11<sup>19</sup> ||), because He was a sinner like themselves, but because they saw in Him One who, with all His human sympathy, was so high above sin that He could stretch out a saving hand to those who were His slaves (Mt 9<sup>12</sup> ||, Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup> 19<sup>9-10</sup>). And this holiness, which others saw and felt in Him, Jesus claimed, and that in the most absolute fashion. He claimed to be without sin. He claimed this not only when He said to His foes, 'Which of you convicteth me of sin?' (Jn 8<sup>46</sup>), but by the attitude of His whole life to the facts of moral evil. He claimed it by calling Himself the Physician of the sinful (Mt 9<sup>12</sup> ||), by assuming the power to forgive sins (Mt 9<sup>6</sup> ||, Lk 7<sup>48</sup>), by never making confession of sin in His own prayers, though enjoining it upon His disciples (Mt 6<sup>12</sup> ||), by never even joining with His disciples in common prayers, of which confession would necessarily form an element (on this point see Forrest, Christ of History and of Experience, p. 22 ff.; Expos. Times, xi. [1900] 352 ff.). See, further, art. HOLINESS, SINLESSNESS.

3. A very important aspect of Christ's claims is their point of connexion with the national hope regarding the Messiah (which see). There can hardly be any doubt that from the very beginning of His public ministry the Messianic consciousness was fully awake in the heart of Jesus. We see the presence of this consciousness in the Temptation narratives (Mt 4<sup>1-11</sup> ||), in the sermon in the synagogue of Nazareth (Lk 4<sup>16-21</sup> ||), in the claim of the preacher on the Mount that He came to fulfil the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5<sup>17</sup> ||). At a later stage He welcomes and blesses Peter's express declaration, 'Thou art the Christ' (Mt 16<sup>16c</sup> ||), and, finally, He accepts the homage of the multitude as the Son of David (wh. see), who came in the name of the Lord (Mt 21<sup>9</sup> ||), and dies upon the cross for claiming to be the King of the Jews (Mt 27<sup>11</sup> ||, cf. v. 37). And if until the end of His ministry He did not call Himself or allow Himself to be called the Messiah (Mt 16<sup>20</sup> ||), this was clearly because the false ideals of the Jews regarding the Messianic kingdom made it impossible for Him to do so without creating all kinds of misunderstandings, and so precipitating the inevitable crisis before His work on earth was accomplished. But by His constant use of the title 'Son of Man' (wh. see), Jesus was giving all along, as Beyschlag says (NT Theology, I. 63), 'a veiled indication of His Messianic calling'; for hardly any one now doubts that He used this title with precise reference to the well-known passage in the 7th chapter of Daniel (v. 13<sup>27</sup>), and that by so describing Himself He was claiming to bring in personally and establish upon earth that very kingdom of God which formed the constant theme of His preaching (see Mt 26<sup>18</sup> ||).

4. But if Christ's use of the title 'Son of Man' shows how He claimed to fulfil the Messianic idea, His further claim to be the Son of God (wh. see) shows that He filled this idea with an altogether new content, which formed no part of the Messianic expectation of the Jews. No doubt in popular usage the title 'Son of God,' through the influence especially of Ps 2<sup>7</sup>, had become an official name for the Messiah (Mt 8<sup>29</sup>, Mk 14<sup>61</sup>, Jn 1<sup>49</sup>). But Christ's claim to be the Son of God evidently meant much more than this. In asserting His Divine Sonship He was not merely affirming His right to an external title of honour, but was giving expression to a consciousness of relationship to God the Father which was absolutely unique, and in which the very essence of His Messiahship consisted. It is true that in the Synoptics He does not expressly designate Himself the Son of God, as He does in the Fourth Gospel (5<sup>20</sup> 9<sup>38</sup> [par. lect.] 10<sup>36</sup> 11<sup>4</sup> ||), but at all events He repeatedly calls God His Father, and refers to Himself as 'the Son' when speaking of God, and that in a sense manifestly distinct from the general idea of God's universal Fatherhood (e.g. Mt 11<sup>27</sup> 12<sup>50</sup> 18<sup>10</sup> ||). In the Fourth Gospel, quite apart from those passages in which Christ assumes the title 'Son of God,' the sense of this unique relation to God as bearing upon His saving relationship to men meets us everywhere, but especially in the farewell discourse and the intercessory prayer which followed (Jn 14-17). But in the Synoptics also this Divine consciousness appears repeatedly (e.g. Lk 2<sup>9</sup>, Mt 7<sup>21</sup> 10<sup>22</sup> 16<sup>17</sup> 22<sup>2</sup>, Mk 12<sup>2</sup>), and it finds full expression in that great saying, 'All things have been delivered unto me of my Father; and no one knoweth the Son save the Father; and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him' (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, Lk 10<sup>22</sup>), which serves in St. Matthew's account as the ground of the Saviour's universal invitation and of His promise of rest for the soul (v. 28<sup>2</sup>). See PREACHING CHRIST, 5 (c).

5. In connexion with His eschatological teaching, and forming its central and most essential feature, is the claim made by Christ to be the final and universal Judge of men. Not only did He declare the fact of His own Return, an astonishing declaration in itself, but He affirmed as the purpose of His Second Coming the Judgment of the world. This claim to be the arbiter of human destinies is distinctly announced again and again (Mt 7<sup>22-23</sup> 16<sup>27</sup>, Mk 3<sup>28</sup>). It is further implied in the parables of the Wise and Foolish Virgins (Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>) and the Talents (vv. 14-20), and is set forth in detail in that solemn picture of the Last Judgment by which these parables are immediately followed (vv. 31-46). The testimony of the Synoptics with regard to this claim of our Lord is supported by the testimony of the Fourth Gospel to the same effect (Jn 5<sup>27</sup> cf. v. 7), and is confirmed by the fact that throughout the rest of the NT the office of the final Judge is constantly assigned to Jesus (Ac 10<sup>42</sup> 17<sup>31</sup>, Ro 2<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>10</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>1-5</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>5</sup>, Ja 5<sup>8-9</sup>), an office, be it noted, which was never ascribed to the Messiah either in the OT revelation or in the popular Jewish belief (see Salmond, Christian Doct. of Immortality, p. 318). This is in some respects the most stupendous of Christ's claims. It was a great thing for Jesus of Nazareth to assume the titles and functions of the Hope of Israel, to declare Himself to be the Fulfiller of the Law and the Expected of the Prophets. But it was something greater still to claim that with His Return there would arrive the grand consummation of the world's history (Mt 25<sup>13</sup>), that before Him all nations should be gathered (v. 32) and all hearts laid bare (vv. 32, 34, 42-43), that the principle of the Judgment should be the attitude of men to Himself as He is spiritually present in the world (vv. 40, 45), and that of this attitude Christ Himself should be the Supreme Judge (vv. 22, 23). See art. JUDGMENT.

6. That the doctrine of Christ's pre-existence is specifically taught in the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel, is apparent to every reader (Jn 1<sup>1</sup> 10, 14, 18). But it is not less plain that, according to the author, this doctrine was not simply a solution forced upon the Christian mind by a consideration of Christ's other claims and of His whole history, but was the unfolding of an affirmation made by Christ's own lips (3<sup>16</sup> 8<sup>58</sup> 17<sup>2-24</sup>). In spite of all that has been said by writers like Beyschlag (op. cit. i. 254) and Wendt (Teaching of Jesus, ii. 169), the theory of an ideal pre-existence is quite inadequate as an explanation of such language. Only by maintaining that John's picture of Jesus and presentation of His words is no record of historical fact, but a theologically determined construction of his own, can we escape from the conclusion that, as Jesus claimed to be in an absolutely unique sense the Son of the Father, so also He claimed to be the personal object of the Father's love and the sharer of His glory before the world was. See art. PRE-EXISTENCE.

CLEOPAS (Κλεόπας, Lk 24<sup>13</sup>).—One of the two disciples to whom the Lord appeared on the afternoon of the Resurrection day as they went to Emmaus, distant about two hours from Jerusalem (see EMMAUS). The omission of all reference to the story in 1 Co 15 is not a sufficient ground for questioning its truth. We have no guarantee that St. Paul's knowledge extended to all the actual events of the Passion and Resurrection period (cf. Chase, Credibility of the Acts, p. 184). The story may have been received by the Evangelist from Cleopas himself: it bears marks of its early origin in the primitive Messianic ideas it preserves, and in the use of the name Simon for St. Peter. By some (Theophylact, Lange, Carr) the unnamed companion of Cleopas is identified with St. Luke himself; but this is unlikely, as both appear to have been Jews (cf. ἀρχαίως ἡμῶν, v. 20), though they do not speak in a tone of such personal nearness to Jesus that we can accept the conjecture that they were of the Eleven. The two were in high dispute about late events, Cleopas apparently taking the more optimistic view, as, in spite of all, he clings to the few facts which make for belief. The inability of both to recognize Jesus is explained in St. Luke to be due to spiritual dullness (οἱ ὀφθαλμοὶ αὐτῶν ἐπαρόντο, v. 18). The pseudo-Mark (whose allusion does not depend on St. Luke, for he gives a different sequel in Jerusalem) says that the Lord appeared in another form (ἐτερομορφῶς, Mk 16<sup>12</sup>), an interpretation favoured by Augustine, who compares the effect of the Transfiguration (μετεμορφώθη, Mk 9<sup>2</sup>). Whatever the cause, the Lord treated them with tenderness (v. 32 ἀδελφοί, 'O foolish men,' RV, not 'fools,' as AV; cf. Ramsay on Gal 3<sup>1</sup>).

The discourse in which they were enlightened furnishes from Christ's own lips what in fact became the kernel of the preaching of the Apostles, as seen in the sermons recorded in the Acts (e.g. Ac 2<sup>22-36</sup> 17<sup>2</sup>) and in the Gospels. The two disciples had already given the summary of the earthly life of Jesus (Lk 24<sup>19-24</sup>). He now shows that it was required by OT prophecy that all this should be the means by which He was to enter into His glory (24<sup>27</sup> should be read in the light of vv. 44-47). It is this teaching that invests the narrative with its peculiar value for the Church, and was doubtless a prime cause of its preservation.

Many of the speculations about the phrase, 'He made as though He would go further' (Lk 24<sup>29</sup>), would have been avoided if the real spiritual meaning of the incident had been discerned. Knowledge of the Lord's presence is vouchsafed only in answer to prayer, it is not forced on anyone. This is the NT Penuel (cf. Gn 32<sup>26</sup> with Lk 24<sup>30</sup>). It is a too rigid interpretation which regards the breaking of the bread here as a celebration of the Eucharist; rather it was an ordinary meal at which the Stranger, who had so impressed them on the road, was put in the place of honour. Something in His manner suddenly confirmed the suspicion of His identity which was forming itself in their minds. The result which the Lord desired, the corroboration of their faith, having been reached, He vanished from sight. To carry the tidings to Jerusalem, 'they who had dissuaded their unknown Companion from making a night journey now have no fear of it themselves' (Bengel).

CLEOPHAS.—This form appears in some Latin MSS, and is retained in the Vulgate (though against the evidence of Codex Amiatinus) in both Lk 24:18 and Jn 1:19. It was adopted by the early English versions (Wylliffe, Tindale), and passed into the AV of 1611. It still stands there in Jn 1:19 for Clopas (wh. see), but in Lk 24:18 it was replaced in 1629 by Cleopas (wh. see).

C. T. DIMONT.

CLOKE (the spelling in both AV and RV of the modern 'cloak').—There was originally a marked distinction between Classical and Oriental costume, a distinction which was lessened under the cosmopolitanism of the Roman Empire; thus the Greek words used in the NT bear different meanings. The two normal Classical garments, the χιτών and ἱμάτιον of Mt 6:25 and Lk 6:29, translated 'coat' and 'cloak,' were usually of extreme simplicity.

The χιτών, tunica, tunic, or shirt (see art. COAT), was the under-garment worn indoors by men and women alike, an oblong strip of material doubled round the body and fastened at the shoulders, without any shaping or sewing, sometimes girt and sometimes ungirt. The σάβης of the Jews differed from this in being longer and furnished with sleeves; over it was worn the κῆθονῆθ, a long sleeved tunic, open in front, but folded across and girt; this latter formed a second tunica, which is the χιτών, apparently, of Mt 6:25 and Lk 6:29. Oriental influences led to the adoption of the long tunic in Rome under the name of tunica talaris, a garment which, in Cicero's time, was regarded as a mark of effeminacy; in later years it was known in its white form as the tunica alba or alb. The ἱμάτιον, over-garment or 'cloak,' was, with the Greeks and Romans, originally an oblong strip, thrown over the tunic (χιτών) when the wearer went out of doors; in its simplest form it was the pallium; more elaborately folded, it was the toga. Thus the χιτών and the ἱμάτιον are the under- and the over-garment, though what we call underclothing was often worn also. But the use of sleeves among the Orientals made a still greater distinction in their over-garment; the mé'ûl and simlâh of the Jews were sleeved garments rather like a modern overcoat, open in front, and reaching to the feet. The 'long robe' of the scribes and Pharisees (Lk 20:46) was the mé'ûl, rendered by St. Luke as σάβης, which merely means a long sleeved garment, a tunica talaris, in fact; for which reason the 'great multitude' of the Apocalypse (7:9, 13) are also described as wearing στολάς λευκάς, that is, long white tunics, or tunicae albae, though in Rev 9:17 the more general word is used—ἱματίων λευκῶν, 'in white garments' (RV).

The classical over-garment appeared in many varieties besides the changing fashions of the toga. The pallium, Greek in its origin, had become international in its character at the time of the Roman Empire, and was regarded as the mark of a philosopher or teacher; so Justin Martyr preached in the 'philosopher's robe,' and was thus recognized by Trypho as a teacher (Τρυφ. 1). It was for this reason that the pallium was chosen by the artists of the Catacombs as the distinguishing dress of Christ, the Apostles, and the Prophets, and has continued so by an artistic convention that has lasted from the 2nd cent. to the present day. The chlamys, χλαμύς, sericum or paludamentum, was made of a smaller oblong strip, fastened by a buckle on the right shoulder (as in the Apollo Belvidero); it was a light military cloak, and was the 'scarlet robe,' χιλαμύδα σκελεμένη, which the soldiers put upon our Lord in mockery (Mt 27:28). The seamless 'coat,' for which the soldiers cast lots at the Crucifixion, is distinguished by St. John (19:23) by the word used for a tunic or under-garment, χιτών, and not by any of the terms used for the various forms of outer garment, such as we should expect if the 'coat' were the Jewish simlâh.

Another common form of outer garment is the φαιδώνη, the 'cloak' which St. Paul left at Troas (2 Ti 4:13). This was the pænula (φαιδώνη, φαιδώνη, φαιδώνη), a heavy woollen garment, generally red or dark-yellow in colour, worn as a protection against cold and rain, at first especially by travellers and by artisans and slaves; hence on the one hand its use by St. Paul, and on the other its frequent occurrence in the Catacombs of Rome (where the tunica, the tunica talaris, dalmatic, chlamys, pallium, and the laccerna, a cope-shaped garment, are also found, while the toga occurs only once). The pænula was the original of the Eucharistic chasuble, and resembles it exactly in shape (a circle or ellipse, with a hole in the centre), though not in material. As time went on, it was used by all classes, and after the Peace of the Church it became in course of time restricted to bishops and presbyters. It is worn by the ecclesiastics in the famous 6th cent. frescoes at Ravenna, where appear also the tunica talaris, still adorned with the orphrey-like strips of the clavus, the dalmatic, laccerna, and the pallium, which, by the process of contabulatio or folding, has come to resemble a long stole, and is distinctive of bishops. Thus, while the toga, chlamys, and the original tunica disappeared, and are to us typical of classical antiquity, the pænula, pallium, laccerna, dalmatic, and tunica talaris were handed on as ecclesiastical vestments (chasuble, pall, cope, dalmatic, and alb), the last named forming a link not only with imperial Rome, but also with the East. PERCY DEARMER.

CLOPAS (Κλωπᾶς).—Mentioned in Jn 1:92 as a relative, probably the husband, of one of the women who stood by the cross (Μαρία ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶς). By Chrysostom he was identified with Alphæus; but this is improbable (see ALPHÆUS). For his connexion with Joseph and the family of Jesus, see art. BROTHERS OF THE LORD and Hastings' DB, vol. i. p. 322. According to certain apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, he is the same as the Cleopas of Lk 24:18. In that case the devotion which kept Mary of Clopas near the cross till the end finds a counterpart in her husband's sorrow at the Crucifixion. But the identification rests on the derivation of both names from a common Greek original, Cleopatros, and is denied by those who regard Clopas as a Semitic name (see Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr. p. 315, n. 2).

CLOSET (κρυψίον).—Mt 6:25, Lk 12:3 AV.

The older form of the Gr. word was κρυψίον (found in some NT MSS), but the later language frequently shows the coalescence of two following s sounds. The etymology (cf. κρυμνός, 'distribution'; 'treasurer,' 'steward,' etc., akin to κρυμνός) shows that 'store-chamber' is the primitive meaning of the Gr. word (i.e. not small sitting-room or bedroom). In this sense it occurs in Lk 12:34, and even the RV, following Vulg. and Luther, have been compelled to break their rule of uniformity of rendering in this case. The four occurrences of the Gr. word are dealt with as follows in the versions:—

	AV	RV	Vulgate	Luther
Mt 6:25	closet	inner chamber	cubiculum	Kämmerlein
Mt 24:26	secret chambers	inner chambers	penitentialibus	Kammer
Lk 12:3	closets	inner chambers	cubiculis	Kammern
Lk 12:34	store-house	store-chamber	cellarium	Keller

The Peshitta has ܠܘܚܐ (lo-uhnd) in all four passages, and it seems a pity that 'store-closet' or 'store-chamber' was not used by RV in the same way throughout.

* Cf. J. H. Moulton in Expositor, 6th ser. ix. (1904) 261: 'κρυμνός, κρί and κρυμνός are overwhelmingly attested by the papyri, where there are only rare examples of a curious reversal, like that in Mt 20:21 (where WH read κρί, elsewhere κρί).

CLOUD

Every Jewish house, except the very smallest huts, would have a small room opening out from the 'living-room,' as our workmen's cottages have small pantries, larders, etc., in many cases; but few houses would have a small room specially for private prayer. Yet, curiously, many writers have assumed that Jewish houses did have 'prayer closets'; usually, they say, in the upper part of the house,* and many identify it with the ὑπερῶν (ἡγυῖα). Is there any ground for this? The 'upper rooms' mentioned in NT were usable as guest-chambers (Mk 14<sup>22</sup>, etc.), large enough to accommodate thirteen persons reclining round tables, and (perhaps) even 120 persons (Ac 1<sup>13</sup>). Would the individual worshipper be able to enter such an important room in a house, and 'shut the door' (Mt 6<sup>6</sup>) against the rest of his family? Others (e.g., Keil, Biblical Archaeology, § 95) think of the frail summer-house on the flat roof.

According to modern European ideas, the Vulgate ubiculum, 'bedroom,' would suit the context and circumstance well in Mt 6<sup>6</sup>, perhaps in Mt 24<sup>26</sup> and Lk 12<sup>2</sup>, but not at all in Lk 12<sup>24</sup>. Moreover, (a) this rendering loses the connexion with the etymology; (b) the use of separate bedrooms is not common in the East; (c) there are other Gr. and Syr. words to express the idea.

It must be noticed that Mt 6<sup>6</sup> is founded on Is 26<sup>20</sup> ἵσθαθε εἰς τὰ ταμεία σου ἀπόκλεισον τὴν θύραν σου. But the motive in Isaiah is fear, in Matthew desire of loving communion. ταμείον occurs 40 times in LXX. In most cases it retains the meaning 'store-closet' (Dt 28<sup>5</sup>, Sir 29<sup>13</sup>, etc.). In other cases it is a private chamber of some sort as in Mt 6<sup>6</sup>: e.g., Gn 43<sup>25</sup>, Dt 32<sup>24</sup>, Jg 3<sup>24</sup>. The last case is noticeable. ταμείον is defined by τῷ θερμῷ, and represents τῷ (bedroom), while ὑπερῶν in the context is ἡγυῖα, rather implying a distinction. The summer 'upper room' (EV 'parlour') had a summer 'closet' (EV 'chamber') attached to it. In the one Eglon was with his attendants till Ehud came, but they afterwards supposed that Eglon had retired into the other, and would not disturb him.

We now get a group of passages which explain ταμείον. In Ex 9<sup>7</sup> (7<sup>8</sup>), Jg, 15, 2(4) K 9<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>2</sup>, 2 Ch 29<sup>7</sup>, etc., it is the special 'store-closet' (leading or opening out from the larger room) in which the bedding required by night was stored during the day (τὰ ταμεία τῶν κοιτῶν ἢ ταμείον κλιτῶν).† In such a 'closet' the Philistines were hiding while Delilah practised her wiles on Samson (Jg 16<sup>12</sup>, LXX, also Ec 10<sup>9</sup>). In such a 'closet' for holding the bedding, the baby prince Joash was concealed when Athaliah murdered the rest of the royal family. Samson's father prevented him from entering the ταμείον (Jg 15<sup>1</sup> LXX, note the variant of A εἰς τὸν κοιτῶνα). Such small rooms or closets could be used as more private sleeping-rooms if required, and would also be available for private conference, concealment, or any similar purpose, as well as for the normal use of storing the bedding and other things which were not immediately required. Our Lord advised their use for private prayer. Thus storage was the primary purpose of the apartment. The other uses were secondary ones, or adaptations.

The AV 'closet' is therefore quite as correct as the RV 'inner chamber.' Of course we do not think of an European cupboard with shelves, in which a person could hardly stand. But Dryden (Fables) possibly uses 'closet' in the sense of a 'store-closet,' as ταμείον in Lk 12<sup>24</sup>, though he may have meant 'private chamber':

He furnishes her closet first, and fills
The crowded shelves with rarities of shells.
Shakespeare has the other use:
'The taper burneth in your closet' (Sul. Can. II. 1).*

CLOTHES.—See DRESS.

CLOUD.—The cloud appears in the Gospels at our Lord's Transfiguration (Mt 17<sup>2</sup> || Mk 9<sup>7</sup>, Lk 9<sup>34</sup>) and (if we may treat the first verses of the Book of Acts as practically part of St. Luke's Gospel) at His Ascension (Ac 1<sup>9</sup>). Twice also it has a place in His own prediction of His coming again (Mt 24<sup>30</sup> || Mk 13<sup>26</sup> || Lk 21<sup>27</sup>, Mt 26<sup>34</sup> || Mk 14<sup>26</sup>).

The most interesting occurrence of this cloud is that in connexion with the Ascension; but it is its appearance above the Mount of Transfiguration that rules the interpretation of its significance. For there a voice comes out of it which is that of the Heavenly Father; it is seen to be the veil of the Divine Presence. Veiling the glory which no mortal might see and live, veiling yet revealing the Presence of God, the cloud has two aspects, of which the greater and more characteristic is not the negative one of veiling, but that positive aspect in which it attests and manifests the Divine Presence. To come under its shadow (a 'shadow'; it would seem, of light, since it was νεφέλη φανερά) awoke in the disciples the dread felt by Jacob at Bethel. And for the same reason—that this cloud is a 'gate of heaven,' at which a man may stand to hear the voice of God. Here, in this bright cloud, the two spheres, earthly and heavenly, open upon each other. The cloud is less a veil than a lifting of the veil. Here the invisible barrier becomes a portal of heaven, through which may come the voice of the Almighty, and entering by which Christ is passed into heaven. It is a 'cloud of heaven': with earth and human life upon this side of it, and on the other side (not sky and stars, but) the invisible things of God, the heavenly sphere, the other world.

Thus in our Lord's Ascension we do not conceive of Him as 'going up' farther than would symbolize and declare His departure from this world: 'He was taken up, and a cloud received Him out of their sight'—they saw Him go and they saw what door opened to receive Him. As identifying this cloud with 'heaven,' compare Ac 1<sup>9</sup>: 'a cloud received him,' with 1<sup>11</sup>: 'received up from you into heaven': with which agrees 2 P 1<sup>18</sup>, 'there came a voice to him out of the excellent glory . . . and this voice we (ourselves) heard brought out of heaven.' The voice out of the cloud was 'out of heaven—the disciples in beholding Christ enter the cloud—' beheld him going into heaven.'

If for us the cloud is as a door which closes, a veil that hides (as God verily is a God that hideth Himself), this is of grace: 'thou canst not follow me now' (Jn 13<sup>26</sup>)—'ye cannot bear it now' (16<sup>12</sup>). And the cloud is, for Christ's disciples, itself an excellent glory, since He is now passed within it (not behind as our earthly sun), filling it with brightness of light. He, our Redeemer and Advocate, the Lord who is our Brother, is now within the cloud that covers Sinai, that leads through the wilderness, that shines above the Mercy-seat; that is to say—in all that by which God draws near to man (in His law as in Sinai, in His providences as in the shepherding of Israel, in religious life and worship as in the Holiest of all), Christ is present, and the love which He has made known, bestowed and sealed. To His disciples the Law is no more a threat and fear, but is written upon the heart for honour and obedience; and God's providence is trusted—the sheep follow, for they know His voice; and for the deep things of the soul there is a great High priest passed into the heavens, and they that know His name come boldly to the throne of grace.

μακρῶν); cf. Liddell and Scott sub voce. W.H. Notes on Orthography, II, 146-170. The Tetralog. Rosopius, according to Scrivener, has the older form in Mt 6<sup>6</sup>, but the later one in the three other places.

COAL.—This word occurs in the Gospels only in Jn 18<sup>18</sup> and 21<sup>9</sup> (Gr. in both ἀρβακιά, meaning properly 'a brazier filled with lighted charcoal'). As a mineral, coal does not exist in Palestine except in the Wady Hummanā in the Lebanon, and was mined there only during the rule of Muhammad Ali about 1834 (Thomson, The Land and the Book, 1886, iii. 193). The rendering 'coal' must be taken as 'charcoal.' Both in ancient and in modern times, the latter substance, prepared from native timber, has been the common fuel of the East. The destruction of the forests of Palestine and Syria may be assigned as the main reason for the absence of timbered gables, and the universal prevalence, instead, of brickwork cupola roofs, and also for the wretched substitutes for fuel now employed by the natives, such as sun-dried cakes of chaff and dung, etc. The charred roots of the desert broom (tridaxen, see Ps 120<sup>9</sup>) make an excellent fuel, and are much in demand in Cairo (Tristram, Nat. Hist. of Bible, 1889, p. 360).

The geological survey of Palestine reveals its uniformly cretaceous formation, extending from the Lebanon ranges to the plateau of Hebron. The earlier rocks of the carboniferous period, if they do exist there at all under the subsequent strata, are buried at quite inaccessible depths. Traces of carboniferous outcrop, but destitute of carbonaceous deposits, have been found in the sandstone of the southern desert and the limestone of the Wady Nash.

F. HENDERSON AITKEN.
COAT.—This word in the Gospels usually represents the Gr. χιτών, i.e. the tunic or long close-fitting under garment worn in Palestine, as opposed to the ἵδιον or full and flowing outer garment (see Hastings' DB, art. 'Dress').

Our Lord's instructions to the Twelve included one which forbade their wearing or having in their possession more than one such garment (Mt 10<sup>10</sup>, Mk 6<sup>9</sup>, Lk 9<sup>3</sup>; cf. Lk 3<sup>11</sup>). And in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5<sup>4</sup>; cf. Lk 6<sup>29</sup>) we are bidden to cultivate such a spirit of meekness as would be illustrated by a readiness to part even with one's cloak (ἵδιον) to him who took away one's coat.*

* In Luke the order is transposed, the cloak coming before the coat, this being the order in which these two garments would be torn off.

The soldiers at the Crucifixion (Jn 19<sup>23, 24</sup>) took possession of the Saviour's garments, according, we suppose, to the usual practice. The outer robes they divided into four parts, one for each of the quaternion, but for the coat (ῥῶ χιτῶνα), in close fulfilment of Ps 22<sup>8</sup>, they cast lots, not wishing to tear it up, because it was 'without seam, woven from the top throughout.' Josephus (Ant. iii. vii. 4), quoted by Bp. Westcott, tells us that the long robe (χιτῶν ποδήρης) of the high priest was of this character: 'This vesture was not composed of two pieces, nor was it sewed together upon the shoulders and the sides, but it was one long vestment, so woven as to have an aperture for the neck' (Whiston's tr.). Bp. Westcott further quotes Chrysostom, who perhaps wrote from personal knowledge, as thinking 'that the detail is added to show "the poorness of the Lord's garments, and that in dress as in all other things He followed a simple fashion."' Others incline to the view that there is a parallel suggested between the Eternal High Priest's garment and that of the Aaronic high priest. In any case the seamless robe of Christ has often been taken as a type of the One (ideally) Undivided Church, e.g. by Cyprian in a famous passage (de Unit. Eccl. 3<sup>o</sup>), where he contrasts the 'incurrupta atque individua tunica' of Christ with the prophet Ahijah's robe, which he tore in duodecim scissuras in token of the disruption of the kingdom (1 K 11<sup>30</sup>), and concludes: 'sacramento vestis et signo declaravit ecclesie unitatem.' For the part which the Holy Coat has played in legend at Trèves and elsewhere, those who are curious in such matters may consult Gildenmeister and v. Sybel, Der Heilige Rock zu Trier und die 20 anderen heiligen ungenähten Röcke, 1845.

We may note finally: (1) that the word 'coat' (so RV; AV 'fisher's coat') in Jn 21<sup>7</sup> stands for the large loose garment (τενθήρη) which St. Peter threw as a covering over his almost naked body when he left his fishing and came into the Master's presence; (2) that it was the under-garments (χιτῶνες) that the high priest rent when he 'heard the blasphemy' at our Lord's trial (Mk 14<sup>65</sup>; see Swete's notes, in loc.). COCK.—See ANIMALS, p. 64*, and following article.

COCK-CROWING (ἀλεκροφωνία).—The word occurs only in Mk 13<sup>35</sup>, where it is evidently used to designate the third of four parts into which the night was divided—at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning.' In OT times there were only three watches in the night—the first, the middle, and the last; but by the time of Christ the Roman division into four watches had become common, though it had not altogether superseded the threefold division of the Jews. The night was reckoned, roughly speaking, from our 6 P.M. to 6 A.M., and these twelve hours were divided into four watches of three hours each. Jerome says: 'Nox in quatuor vigiliis dividitur, que singula trium horarum spatio supputantur' (Ep. cxi. 8). The cock-crowing in Mk 13<sup>35</sup> thus refers to the third watch of the night, between the hours of 12 and 3.

Although the noun 'cock-crowing' occurs only once in the NT, each of the four Evangelists records the fact that on the night of the betrayal Jesus forewarned Peter that before the cock crew he should thrice deny his Lord, and each of them also records a crowing of the cock immediately after the denial (Mt 26<sup>74</sup> and <sup>75</sup>; Lk 22<sup>34</sup> and <sup>35</sup>; Jn 13<sup>38</sup> and <sup>39</sup>). In St. Mark we have the variations—all the more significant because of the writer's commonly acknowledged dependence upon the Petrine tradition—that Jesus said to Peter, 'Before the cock crow twice; thou shalt deny me thrice; and in correspondence with this a record of two distinct cock-crowings (Mk 14<sup>28</sup> ss. 7).

Attempts have been made to distinguish between these two cock-crowings in St. Mark as occurring at definite seasons of the night, the one about midnight and the other at the first approach of dawn, just before the commencement of the fourth or morning watch, and to define the second of the two as the gallicantum proper, and consequently the only one of which the other three Evangelists take notice. No doubt it is true that in the most distinctive sense of the word 'the cock-crowing,' as an indication of time, refers to the breaking of the dawn; thus in the Talmud it is prescribed that at cock-crow the benediction shall be used: 'Praised be Thou, O God, the Lord of the world, that givest understanding to the cock to distinguish between day and night.' But as a matter of fact cocks crow during the night, in the East as elsewhere, at irregular times from midnight onward; and the narrative of Mk 14<sup>28-72</sup> does not suggest that there was an interval of anything like three hours between the first cock-crowing and the second. The probability is that Jesus meant no more than this, that before Peter himself had twice heard the cock crow he should thrice have been guilty of his great denial. And if we accept St. Mark's narrative as embodying Peter's own account of the incident, it will seem natural that the disciple to whom the warning was directly addressed, and on whom it would make the deepest impression, should distinguish between two separate cock-crowings where others thought only of the last.

There is no mention of the cock in the Mosaic law, and the supposed allusion to the breed in 1 K 4<sup>28</sup> (צִנְוֹרִים, translated 'fatted fowls' both in AV and RV) is very doubtful. It may be that Solomon had imported these birds from the East; but, on the other hand, the fact that in the Talmudical literature the cock is always called by the name תורנגל (torngal), suggests rather that it was introduced into Palestine from Babylonia.* But while the domestic fowl was quite familiar to the Jews of our Lord's time, both the Mishna and the Midrash state that, so long as the Temple stood, the breeding or keeping of cocks in Jerusalem was forbidden, on the ground that by scratching in the earth they dug up unclean things, thus spreading the contagion of Levitical uncleanness, and even contaminating the sacrifices of the altar. On this ground exception has sometimes been taken, especially from Jewish sources, to the statements of the Evangelists as to the crowing of the cock in Jerusalem on the night before the crucifixion. But if such an ordinance existed, it is very unlikely that it could be strictly enforced in a city like Jerusalem, with a large and mixed population. In particular, we must remember that cock-fighting was one of the favourite sports of the Romans; and the Roman soldiers of the garrison would concern themselves very little about any Jewish prohibition of this kind.

* A reference to the cock is found by some scholars in Pr 30<sup>1</sup> (EV 'greyhound') where the צִנְוֹר (cinor) of MT is rendered by the LXX ἀλεκτορ; similarly Aquila and Theodotion, the Peshitta (ἀλεκτή) and the Vulgate (galinus).

COMFORT.—The English word 'comfort' means being made strong together. The idea seems to be that sorrow weakens or shatters the whole system of the afflicted man, and that the dispelling of his grief braces him up anew. The sore is not merely plastered over or covered with a surface skin, but healed, so that the sufferer becomes as vigorous as before. Such is, indeed, the comfort imparted by Christ. In connexion therewith the words παρακαλέω and θάρσυνω, or θαρρῶ, are both employed. In NT 'beseech,' 'entreat,' 'exhort' are all used as equivalents for παρακαλέω, while παρακλησις is most frequently rendered 'consolation' in AV, and θάρσυνω or θαρρῶ (the former in imperat. only) is commonly translated 'to be of good cheer.' But both παρακαλέω and παρακλησις are occasionally rendered 'comfort' in AV (e.g. Mt 5<sup>4</sup>, 2 Cor 1<sup>3</sup>), while in RV 'comfort' has usually been substituted for 'consolation' of AV in the rendering of the noun. In three places (Mt 5<sup>4</sup>, Mk 10<sup>29</sup>, Lk 8<sup>34</sup>) AV renders θάρσει 'Be of good comfort.' In the first two RV substitutes 'Be of good cheer,' and in the last drops θάρσει from the text. In Jn. παρακλητος, which occurs four times (14<sup>16</sup>, 29, 15<sup>26</sup>, 16<sup>7</sup>), always appears in EV as 'the Comforter.'

While the mission of Christ was mainly to save men from their sins, it was His purpose to bring them true relief from their troubles. In His sermon at Nazareth (Lk 4<sup>18-27</sup>) He applied to Himself the prophecy of Isaiah (61<sup>1-3</sup>), which tells that the Messiah was 'to comfort all that mourn.' He would indeed have failed to fulfil the Messianic expectation if He had not set Himself, alike by His person, His gospel, and His work, to heal the broken in heart and to comfort the people of God's choice (cf. Is 40<sup>1</sup>). Among pious Jews the phrase had become a holy oath, Ita videam consolationem, etc. (Alford on Lk 2<sup>25</sup>). Thus Simeon is said to have been 'looking for the consolation of Israel' (loc. cit.), where παρακλησιν has almost a personal import as though equivalent to τὸν Χριστὸν ἑλπίων. The whole gospel of Jesus Christ is therefore one of good tidings to the afflicted, the destitute, the oppressed. The removal of the cause of woe involves the furtherance of the cure of woe. In answer to the Baptist's question, Jesus named, as one of the signs that He was ὁ Ἐρχόμενος, 'the poor have good tidings preached to them' (εὐαγγέλιόν ἐστίν). Accordingly, in the Sermon on the Mount, Christ gave the beatitude of comfort to the mourners (Mt 5<sup>4</sup>). As the Revealer of the Father, moreover, He was bound to make comfort one of the most prominent features of His ministry, not less in action than in word. The Fatherly pity (Ps 103<sup>13</sup>) and the Motherly tenderness (Is 66<sup>1</sup>) of the All-merciful must be set forth by the Son of God, if, looking on Him and listening to Him, men were to be able to see the image and to hearken to the voice of God.

Christ is well fitted to afford comfort not only by His Divine knowledge of our deepest needs and of what best meets these needs, but by His own human experience of affliction and woe. The Man of Sorrows, the One acquainted with grief, as well as the God of all comfort, He can appreciate the necessity of consolation as well as apply the consolation that is availing. Having suffered in temptation, He is able to succour them that are tempted (He 2<sup>18</sup>). The pangs of Him who 'himself bare our sicknesses' fitted Him for being the true Physician for the wounded in heart. Through His own weariness He has won multitudes of the heavy-laden to come to Him for rest.* The exceeding sorrow even unto death of His own soul as He took the cup from His

* In Expos. Times, viii. 230 and x. 48, Nestle shows that rest and comfort are 'almost identical for Semitic feelings.'

Father's hand that He might taste death for every man, has made Him able to give ease and peace to His people in the valley of the shadow. One of the occasions when comfort is most needed is bereavement; and perhaps the tears of Jesus at the tomb of Lazarus (Jn 11<sup>35</sup>) have been as potent to solace the stricken as His word to the widow of Nain, 'Weep not' (Lk 7<sup>13</sup>). When upon the cross He commended to one another's care and sympathy the Virgin Mother and the beloved disciple: 'Woman, behold thy son!' 'Behold thy mother!' (Jn 19<sup>26-27</sup>), we see how truly Christ entered into the heart of the afflicted children of men.

Christ's dealing with His own chosen followers was one of special tenderness in their hour of sorrow. He knew that while on the whole His departure was expedient for them, yet it would be a terrible wrench, and expose them to bitter persecution. He therefore consoled them when sorrow filled their heart by telling them that He would not leave them orphans (ὀρφανούς, AV 'comfortless,' RV 'desolate'). After His ascension He would be nearer to them in spiritual presence than when with them in the flesh (Jn 14<sup>18-20</sup>, cf. Mt. 28<sup>20</sup>). By rising from the dead He would be Victor over the world in its direst and fiercest assault, and if they shared with Him the world's hate they would also share His triumph. The discourse (Jn 14-16) which began, 'Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me,' fitly ended, 'In the world ye shall have tribulation; but of good cheer; I have overcome the world.'

The idea of future compensation for present sufferings is not wanting in the 'consolation in Christ.' In His Father's House are many mansions, on entering which He goes to prepare a place for His disciples, where they shall both behold, and be partakers of, His glory (Jn 14<sup>2</sup> 17<sup>22-24</sup>). The same idea of a compensating 'weight of glory' for 'light affliction which is but for a moment' (2 Co 4<sup>17</sup>) is involved in the parable where Abraham says of Lazarus, 'Now he is comforted' (Lk 16<sup>26</sup>). On the other hand, those who are now satisfied with their riches and have no hunger for righteousness, the men of the world who have their portion in this life, 'have received their consolation' (Lk 6<sup>24-25</sup>).

ARTHUR POLLOK SYM.

COMFORTER (παράκλητος).—A term applied to Christ in RVm of 1 Jn 2, and four times (Jn 14<sup>16</sup> 26 15<sup>26</sup> 16<sup>7</sup>) to the Holy Spirit. For the meaning of the original and the probable source from which St. John derived it, see art. 'Paraclete' in Hastings' DZ iii. 665-668. The active sense is confined to ecclesiastical usage, and may have been emphasized by translators, from its appropriateness to the circumstances amidst which the word first occurs in Jn 14<sup>16</sup>; but the passive sense may still be traced in relation to the Father and the Son, the Spirit being called and sent by Them to the help of men, as well as for the purpose of witnessing for God at the tribunal of the human reason (Jn 15<sup>26</sup>). The English term is, however, quite inadequate. Whilst there is a suggestion of actual consolation in Jn 14<sup>16</sup>, the principal points of St. John's teaching are that the mission of the Spirit is contingent upon the departure of Christ (Jn 16<sup>7</sup>), is thenceforward continuous and permanent (Jn 14<sup>16</sup>), and includes functions in regard to both classes of men, the disciples and 'the world.' The latter He will convict (Jn 16<sup>8-11</sup>) in respect of the three decisive matters of sin, righteousness, and judgment. With still a significant preference for words of an intellectual bearing, He will continue and complete the instruction begun by Christ (Jn 14<sup>26</sup>), and guide the disciples 'into all the truth' (Jn 16<sup>13</sup>). See art. HOLY SPIRIT. The predominant cast of these phrases, almost all pointing to mental processes, is in itself a sufficient evidence of the unfitness of the term 'Comforter,' for which 'Paraclete' (wh. see) might with advantage be substituted.

COMING AGAIN.—Though He had appeared in the world to found the kingdom of God and fulfil the Messianic hope in its true spiritual meaning (see ADVENT), Jesus repeatedly gave it to be understood that the object of His mission would not be perfectly attained in that first coming among men. There was to be a break in His visible connexion with earthly affairs (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>); He would depart for a time (Jn 14<sup>19</sup> 16<sup>7</sup>); but He promised that He would come again to continue His work and carry it on to complete fulfilment. As the clouds of danger gathered, and a violent death loomed in view, He began to speak with growing frequency of a marvellous and triumphant return, in which His living presence and power would be gloriously revealed. His sayings on this subject, however, are not always easy to interpret; they do not all refer to the same event; we find in them traces of His having in His mind more than one coming, and, in several cases, it is only by a careful study of the context that we can discover to which coming His words were meant to point.

The comings of which Jesus spoke from time to time may be distinguished as follows:

1. His coming after His death to make patent to the disciples His continued and exalted life, and thereby to establish their faith in Him as their ever-living Lord. He predicted a meeting with them in Galilee (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>, Mk 14<sup>28</sup>), and indicated that though for a little while they should not see Him, yet after a little while again they should see Him (Jn 14<sup>19</sup> 16<sup>7</sup>).

2. His coming to enter into fellowship with the disciples in a closer spiritual reunion. As the Risen One, He was to return to them and abide with them continually (Jn 14<sup>23</sup>), manifesting His presence through the Paraclete, the Spirit of truth, and guiding, teaching, sustaining them by His gracious working in their hearts (14<sup>16</sup> 15<sup>26</sup> 16<sup>14</sup>). It would appear that in this sense Jesus regarded His coming again as a vital experience, to be shared by all believers in all after generations, thus foreshadowing His abiding presence through the Spirit in the Christian Church.

3. His coming to remove the disciples from their toils and struggles on earth, and take them to the place He would prepare for them in His Father's house (Jn 14<sup>2-3</sup>), that where He was they might be also.

4. His coming at the great crises of history to bring to their disastrous issues the sins of societies, nations, and religious institutions, and to vindicate His power over all the corrupt agencies in the world that oppose His truth. In the solemn discourse on the future recorded in Mt 24 and Mk 13, there are certain passages which, as usually interpreted, convey the impression that the destruction of Jerusalem and the fall of the Jewish State was one such momentous crisis that Jesus had particularly in view (Mt 24<sup>15-22</sup> 32-34, Mk 13<sup>14-22</sup> 32; cf. Lk 19<sup>41-44</sup> 21<sup>20-22</sup> 33 23<sup>28-30</sup>), although His words may be recognized as covering also all other marked epochs in history, in which His triumphant glory and the impotence of all the world-powers that come into conflict with Him are made clear. The course of events which was to culminate in the ruin of Jerusalem was to be the first startling revelation of His victorious energy in asserting His supremacy in the affairs of men and nations; and this is apparently suggested, in vivid figurative language, by the statement to the high priest, 'Henceforth—from this time onward—ye shall see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven' (Mt 26<sup>64</sup>), as if a process of judicial and retributive manifestations of His power in human history would then begin.

5. His final coming at the end of the dispensation He had inaugurated, to sit in judgment over all classes and nations of men, to apportion their merit and demerit, decide their destinies, overthrow all evil, and bring the kingdom of God to its supreme triumph and glory. This final and most decisive coming—which will be more fully discussed under PAROUSIA—is described in terms that betoken the appearance of Jesus in august splendour and irresistible authority. He is to come in the glory of His Father with His angels, and reward every man according to his works (Mt 16<sup>27</sup>); seated on the throne of His glory, He is to gather before Him all nations, and separate them one from another as a shepherd divides His sheep from the goats (Mt 25<sup>31-32</sup>). That is to be the Last Day, the termination of the existing order of things, when all pretences will be exposed, obstinate unbelief and ungodliness punished, and faithfulness crowned with its eternal reward.

That these several comings were present to the mind of Jesus, seems sufficiently evident when His recorded utterances are duly weighed. We may assume that they were regarded by Him as the forms of manifestation by which, in the future, He would give proof of His living presence and conquering power. They were the varying stages in the development, after His death, of His victorious work for the establishment of righteousness and the destruction of evil. Hence they could all be conceived and predicted under one name; but, as Beyerslag remarks, under the conditions of prophecy, each stage was not seen as something apart; they were felt and described as so many phases of the whole, according to the suggestion of the moment (NT Theol. i. 202). On that account there is discernible in the predictions of Jesus an occasional blending of one coming with another; at least in the reports furnished by the Evangelists it does not always distinctly appear to what precise form of His future manifestation His words apply. Probably in the consciousness of Jesus all His future comings were wrapped up, as in a seed, in the thought of His spiritual coming, His coming in the fulness of His spiritual life and power, as an effective and abiding force on the side of God, to act on the hearts and lives of His faithful followers, and also on the general life of the world. This view makes His several comings fall into line as phases or stages of a continuous process, in which, sometimes through the quickened vitality of His Church, sometimes through the catastrophic action of the moral laws and forces which lie behind the movements of human society, His invincible operation should be revealed, until the final consummation is reached in the sovereign manifestation of His authority and glory at the end of the age.

It has been suggestively shown by Wendt (Teaching of Jesus, vol. ii. 297, 305) that it is on the utterances of Jesus regarding His spiritual coming in the hearts of believers that the Fourth Gospel lays the principal and almost exclusive stress; and probably it is in the light of Jesus' predictions of this spiritual or dynamical coming that we are to find the clue to what He meant in His sayings respecting the historical coming or comings, and the great apocalyptic coming, which the Synoptics report with special fulness and detail. The coming again of Jesus may thus be conceived as a series of manifestations of His living presence and activity in the world, culminating in a glorious triumph at the Last Day, when He shall sit as Judge of all.

G. M'HARDY.

COMING TO CHRIST.—Under this heading we bring together a number of passages, all sayings of Jesus, most of them in the Fourth Gospel, which express at once His widest invitation to men and His strongest claims upon them. Outside these there is a much larger group of passages, occurring in all the Gospels, many of which are intimately connected with the inner group. The expression thus frequently occurring, and used in the few passages first mentioned to convey the deepest truths of the gospel, is based on the everyday events of our Lord's ministry and of ordinary life. In its literal meaning it occurs constantly throughout the Gospel narrative. We may here disregard this widest class of passages, which speak of the multitudes who, from very various motives, 'came to Christ' to see and to hear Him, and fix our attention on those which have a moral and spiritual significance. The latter, bearing directly on the proclamation of the Kingdom of God and on the conditions of membership in it, are of supreme importance.

The constructions used in these groups of passages may here be noticed. In nearly all of them we have the simple verb ἔρχομαι followed by πρός with the accusative. In Mt 11<sup>28</sup> we have the interjectional adverb ἔρχεσθε with πρός and the accusative. In the kindred passage, He 7<sup>25</sup>, the compound ἔρχομαι occurs with the dative. In a closely allied group of passages, which we shall have occasion to notice later, ἔρχομαι is followed by ἵνα and the genitive. The call to the earliest disciples is ἔρχεσθε ἵνα ἴδωσθε (Mt 4<sup>23</sup>, Mk 1<sup>7</sup>). In some passages (Mt 10<sup>41</sup>, Jn 10<sup>41</sup>; cf. 7<sup>54</sup> vs 55; 13<sup>21</sup>) the aorist of ἔρχομαι is used, the 'coming' being regarded as complete, while in others the use of the present indicates that the 'coming' is thought of as in progress (cf. Westcott on Jn 6<sup>68</sup>). In Jn 6<sup>70</sup> ἔρχομαι with πρός and the accusative signifies arrival, attainment. In many passages of the second group, some of which will be used in illustration of the subject, we have the fact of the coming without the use of any of the phrases here mentioned.

Among the crowds who flocked to Jesus were many who came, or who were brought by their friends, because of some special need. Blind and deaf and dumb came to have their lost senses restored (Mt 9<sup>35</sup>, 20<sup>30</sup>; Mk 7<sup>32</sup>, Jn 9<sup>1</sup> et al.). Lepers cried to Him for cleansing (Mt 8<sup>23</sup>; Lk 17<sup>12</sup>). The lame and the palsied came, or were brought, to Him for renewal of their powers (Mt 9<sup>35</sup>; Jn 5<sup>3</sup>). More than once the friends of the dying or the dead came beseeching Him to give them back their loved ones from the grasp of death (Mt 9<sup>18</sup>; Jn 11<sup>21</sup>). Obviously this 'coming' was in most cases much more than a mere physical fact. The whole motive does not in all cases lie open to us, but in many we know, and in others there is no room for doubt, that there was behind the coming an attraction of His person, a perception of and faith in His power to bless, a confidence in His mercy and grace, apart from which even the most needy would not have been moved to come to Him. This is in some instances conspicuously clear, and is recognized by Jesus with joy. Thus the 'faith' of the centurion (Mt 8<sup>26</sup>) is declared to be greater than any He had found in Israel. For her 'great faith' the prayer of the Syro-Phoenician woman is granted (Mt 15<sup>22</sup>). The latter is one of many cases in which the faith of those who came to Him was tested by Jesus before He complied with their request (cf. Mt 9<sup>28</sup>, Jn 4<sup>46</sup>, and many others). This testing of faith shows the spiritual significance of the incidents, even where the blessing craved and granted, looked at merely from the outside, is purely physical. This is still more the case where the need which brought men to Christ was not physical, but moral or spiritual, e.g. Nicodemus to some extent (Jn 3), Zacchæus the chief publican (Lk 19<sup>22</sup>), the woman who was a sinner (Lk 7<sup>36</sup>), and many others.

From these cases we pass by an easy transition to the higher level of meaning of the phrase 'coming to Christ.' The passages in which this occurs are entirely words of Jesus. He calls men to come to Him. For the most part His call is that of gracious, loving invitation. But the condemnation of the Jews because they would not come to Him (Jn 5<sup>40</sup>; cf. Mt 22<sup>8</sup>, Jn 16<sup>9</sup>) shows that under the graciousness of the invitation there lies the assertion of a paramount claim. These are two aspects of Christ's call which it may be well to consider to some extent apart. Experimentally they must always go together.

In Mt 11<sup>28-30</sup> we have the great call of Jesus to those who 'labour and are heavy laden,' with its promise of 'rest.' These verses bear a likeness to several passages of the OT, especially to Jer 6<sup>16</sup> 'Thus saith the Lord, Stand ye in the ways and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls.' But the Heb. word ruah 'rest,' is rendered in the LXX not by anapausis, the word used in Mt 11<sup>29</sup> (cf. anapausis, v. 29), but by dytiostichos (or dytiostichos). Some have thought that there is here an echo of the words of Jesus ben Sira (Sir 34<sup>28</sup>, 31<sup>25-27</sup>), with which our Lord was probably familiar (see Expositor's Greek Testament, in loco). But the words of Christ, in the greatness of the call and of the promise, and in the connexion of both with His own person, go far beyond those of Ben Sira or anything which we find in the canonical books of the OT. The call is probably addressed in the first instance to those who, groaning under 'the yoke of the law,' which generations of Rabbinic teaching and Pharisaic formalism had made intolerable, had no hope of rest for their souls. But it goes beyond that, as the whole ministry of Christ shows, to all those on whom the burdens of life press heavily, and especially to those who are being borne down by the weight of sin. To all Christ offers 'rest,' a ceasing from the crushing weight and from the hopeless toil, an inward, satisfying peace.

The words of Jesus in Jn 7<sup>37</sup> (cf. 6<sup>35</sup>) are even greater than those just considered. Under the natural figure of 'thirst' and the companion figure of 'hunger,' He speaks of the deepest needs and longings of the soul of man—not those which are passing and accidental, but those which are essential and permanent, above all, the need of God—and promises to all who come to Him a perfect and abiding satisfaction. They should not only themselves be satisfied, but by the 'receiving' of the Holy Spirit should become sources of blessing to others.

To these two great promises we may add the words of Jesus in Jn 5<sup>24</sup> which imply, under the condemnation of those who would not come to Him, a promise of 'life' to those who do come. This evidently means a life other than that which they already had, a life in union with God as contrasted with their life apart from Him, a life in whose abundance man finds perfect satisfaction and the purpose of God is realized, a life which is eternal. Into the enjoyment of this life he who 'cometh to Christ' enters at once, but its full realization belongs to the future.

The supreme promise of Christ, embracing and transcending all others, is implied in Jn 14<sup>6</sup> 'No man cometh to the Father but by me.' Access to God, fellowship with Him, are dependent on coming to Christ, and are promised to all who come to Him (cf. Jn 6<sup>37</sup>).

We infer from our study of the passages cited, that, on one side, 'coming to Christ' is practically synonymous with faith in Him. It is the active movement of the soul towards Christ. More than once 'cometh' and 'believeth' occur as parallel, if not virtually synonymous, expressions (cf. Jn 6<sup>35</sup> 7<sup>27</sup>). The first word presents faith in deed as thought as resting and inward' (Westcott on Jn 6<sup>35</sup>). The 'coming' is the response of the soul in its natural cravings, in its need, in its sin, to the call of Christ. It is its recognition in act, the act of trust, of His readiness to receive and His power to bless.

This, however, is only one side of the meaning of the phrase. There is another which is largely overlooked, perhaps because it does not immediately appeal to man's sense of need.

Christ's condemnation of the unbelieving Jews (Jn 5<sup>40</sup>) has already been mentioned. This implies that man's destiny depends on his attitude to Christ. 'Coming,' the first movement of the soul to Christ, is associated with, and derives spiritual and permanent value from, hearing and doing the words of Christ. The mere lip acknowledgment of Him is nothing, or worse than nothing, for it brings disaster; the heart acknowledgment, issuing in obedience, is everything. This is stated even more strongly in Lk 14<sup>26</sup> 'If any man cometh unto me, and hateth not his own father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple.' The next verse carries us a step further, from the 'coming to' to the 'coming after,' from the negative 'hating' or renunciation to the positive 'bearing' or 'taking up' of the cross (cf. Mt 16<sup>24</sup>, Mk 8<sup>34</sup>, Lk 9<sup>23</sup>). These are Christ's conditions of discipleship, stringent, at first sight even repulsive. Mt 10<sup>37</sup> may be compared with Lk 14<sup>26</sup>, not as toning down the demands of Christ, but as helping us to understand them. He claims to be the first, and in a profound sense the only object of man's affection and devotion. None other shall stand before Him, none other beside Him. There is here no condemnation, no abrogation of the claims of human affection, which are Divine in their origin, and have been strengthened and beautified under the influence of Christ. But there is a demand that these shall stand aside, shall be put aside ruthlessly and with the heart's whole passion, so far as they come into conflict or rivalry with the claims of Christ. The 'great possessions' of the rich young ruler stood between him and Christ. Father and mother, wife and child, do the same with others. If so, 'he cannot be my disciple.' Further, Christ demands the taking up of the cross; that is, not the acceptance of trials, often trifling trials, as they come to us, to which in common use this great word has been reduced, but the readiness, for His sake, to follow Him to shame and to death.

While, then, 'coming to Christ' means, on the one hand, faith in Him, a movement of the soul to Him for the acceptance of the blessings He offers, it means, on the other hand, no less clearly an absolute surrender of the soul, of the whole man to Him. This aspect of the truth already emerges in Mt 11<sup>28-30</sup>. 'Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me. . . . For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light.' This involves the recognition of Him as 'Lord,' a whole-hearted obedience, an absolute surrender in which nothing, not even the dearest object of earthly affection, shall weigh with us against Him, a readiness to suffer shame and death for His sake. This is to 'come to him' in the fullest sense, to come 'to' in order to coming 'after'; this is to become His disciple. It seems harsh and repellent; it is not really so. It is the detachment from the lower in order to attachment to the higher. It is the weaning, it may be the wrenching, of the soul from all else, that it may be united to God. There is no other way to the highest good.

The call of Christ, whether it be regarded as an invitation or as a claim, raises in an acute form the question of His Person. Its bearing on this can only be indicated, not fully discussed, in this article. Christ's call is, on the one hand, a universal call. The 'all ye' of Mt 11<sup>28</sup> has no limits of space or time within the limits of human personality and need. It is the gospel for all men of all times and of all lands. It is the keynote of the whole NT and of all evangelical thought and preaching. On the other hand, Christ's call is an exclusive call. It is 'Come unto me,' shutting out all other teachers or saviours. He professes to be able to satisfy all human need, even the deepest—that of the consciousness of sin. He claims to be the only object of affection and obedience. He declares Himself the only way to God. Either His professions and claims are false and absurd, or He is more than a man, more than the greatest among the great, than the best among the good. If we admit His claims—and they find the fullest justification in the history of faith—we must make our confession with St. Peter: 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God' (Mt 16<sup>16</sup>).

Another question, the full discussion of which lies beyond the scope of this article, must be mentioned. The movement of the soul to Christ does not originate with itself. Jesus traces it to the 'drawing' of the Father (Jn 6<sup>44</sup>; cf. Jn 12<sup>32</sup>). In this we have a suggestion of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. But it is obvious that this involves neither compulsion on the one hand nor lessening of human responsibility on the other. A man's coming to Christ, under the Divine influence, is a voluntary surrender. A man's refusal to come is and will be just ground of condemnation.

It remains only to point out the harmony of the rest of the NT with the teaching of Christ in the Gospels in respect of our subject. The phrase 'coming to Christ' belongs, it is true, almost exclusively to the Gospels, and is found in its highest meaning mainly in that of St. John (but see 1 P 2<sup>4</sup>, Rev 22<sup>17</sup>, and cf. He 7<sup>26</sup>). But all the NT is Christocentric, and implies a call to men to come to Christ. 'In none other is there salvation: for neither is there any other name under heaven that is given among men wherein we must be saved' (Ac 4<sup>12</sup>), sums up the whole teaching of NT history and letters. But there is a difference between the Gospels and the other books which it is important to notice, not a difference in essential truth, but in the point of view from which it is presented. In the Gospels, 'Come unto me' is the personal call of Christ as teacher and Lord. In the rest of the NT the call is to the crucified and ascended Christ. This is indeed anticipated in the Gospels (e.g. Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, Jn 12<sup>32</sup> et al.), but its full development before the death of Christ would have been premature, if not impossible. Immediately after the Crucifixion and Ascension, however, these two great historical facts are placed in the foreground of Apostolic preaching, e.g. in St. Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost (Ac 2), in his remonstrance with the people after the healing of the lame man (ch. 3), in the declaration before the Council (5<sup>28-29</sup>). They are the central truths of the Pauline and other letters: 'We preach Christ crucified' (1 Co 1<sup>23</sup>), 'Far be it from me to glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ' (Gal 6<sup>14</sup>), 'He is able to save to the uttermost them that draw near to God through him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them' (He 7<sup>25</sup>, cf. Rev 5<sup>6</sup> etc.). We must interpret the invitation and the claim in the light of the Cross and of the Throne.

COMMANDMENTS.—As commandments (ἐπιτάγαι) Jesus recognizes (1) the injunctions of the Decalogue, (2) certain other requirements of similar ethical character laid down in the Law. In one instance (Mk 10<sup>2</sup>) the Mosaic regulation for divorce is quoted as a 'commandment,' but its temporary provisional nature is clearly indicated. 'This commandment,' given for a time in view of special circumstances, is implicitly contrasted with the true and abiding ἐπιτάγαι. In the case of a purely ritual ordinance the term επιταγή is used (Mt 8<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>4</sup>, Lk 5<sup>14</sup>).

The main passages in which our Lord defines His attitude to the commandments are: (1) the exposition in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5<sup>17-19</sup>); (2) the criticism of Pharisaic tradition (Mt 15<sup>1-9</sup>, Mk 7<sup>1-23</sup>; cf. also Mt 23); (3) the reply to the rich young ruler (Mt 19<sup>17-21</sup>, Mk 10<sup>19-21</sup>, Lk 18<sup>18-22</sup>); (4) the dialogue with the lawyer (Mt 22<sup>34-40</sup>, Mk 12<sup>28-32</sup>). The fulfilment of the Sabbath commandment (Mk 2<sup>24-27</sup>, Lk 6<sup>1-10</sup>, 13<sup>10-16</sup>) will have to be considered under LAW and SABBATH.

It is assumed by Jesus that the commandments were given directly by God, and as such they are contrasted with the 'traditions of men' (Mt 16<sup>9</sup>, Mk 7<sup>8</sup>). This assumption of their Divine origin determines His whole attitude towards them. As ordained by God they are valid for all time and authoritative; the keeping of them is the necessary condition of eternal life (Mt 19<sup>17</sup>, Mk 10<sup>19</sup>); men will take rank in the Kingdom of Heaven according to their obedience to the commandments (Mt 5<sup>19</sup>). It is objected to the Pharisees as their chief offence that they have perverted and overlaid with tradition the commandments of God (Mt 15<sup>3</sup>, Mk 7<sup>7</sup>).

In view, then, of the Divine origin of the commandments, Jesus accepts them as the eternal basis of morality. His own ethic is presented not as something new, but as a truer and more inward interpretation of the existing Law. It has been maintained (most notably in recent times by Tolstói) that Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount enacts an entirely new moral code,—five new laws in contrast to those ordained 'in old time.' This, however, is opposed to His own declaration, 'I came not to destroy but to fulfil.' The authority which He claims for Himself is not an authority to originate laws, but to explain more fully in their Divine intention those already laid down by God. 'It was said to them of old time,—I say unto you,' implies an opposition not of the Decalogue and the new Christian code, but of the ancient interpretation of the Decalogue and the Christian interpretation. Where the men of old time stopped short with the letter, Jesus unfolds the inward principle which must henceforth be accepted as the true aim of the commandment. 'Thou shalt not kill' prohibits anger, scorn, contention. 'Thou shalt not commit adultery' demands chastity of heart as well as of outward act. The law that forbids false swearing requires in the last resort abstinence from all oaths, and perfect simplicity and truthfulness. The case is somewhat different with the two remaining rules which are subjected to criticism ('an eye for an eye,' 'thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thine enemy'). Here our Lord indeed appears to set new laws of His own over against the imperfect maxims of the ancient morality. But He is still emphasizing what He conceives to be the real drift of the Divine legislation, in contrast to the false and limited constructions which men had placed upon it.

The ethical teaching of Jesus is thus based on the Divinely-given commandments. It claims to be nothing more than a 'fulfilment,' a reinterpretation of them in the light of their inward spirit and purpose. At the same time, they are so transformed by this unfolding of their ultimate intention, as to result in a code of morality which is radically new. This is recognized in the Fourth Gospel, where the originality of the Christian law is brought into clear prominence (see art. NEW COMMANDMENT). It remains to consider how Jesus, while accepting the commandments, replaced them in effect by a new ethic, different in character as well as wider in range. The process by which He thus transformed them can be traced, with sufficient distinctness, in the Synoptic teaching.

(1) The Moral Law is freed from its association with outward ritual. Jesus does not definitely abrogate the ritual ordinances ('ye ought not to leave the other undone,' Mt 23<sup>23</sup>), but He makes the distinction plain between these and the higher obligations, justice, mercy, and faith. He subordinates the law of the Sabbath to the requirements of duty and humanity (Mk 2<sup>27</sup>, Lk 6<sup>9</sup> 13<sup>14</sup>); He confronts the formal piety of His time with the Divine demand as stated by Hosea: 'I will have mercy and not sacrifice' (Mt 9<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>7</sup>); He challenges the whole system of rules concerning meat and drink by His great principle, 'that which cometh out, not that which goeth in, defileth a man' (Mt 15<sup>11</sup>, Mk 7<sup>2</sup>). This principle, applied to its full extent, meant the abolition of the Levitical law.

(2) In a similar manner the 'traditions' which had gathered around the Law and obscured its genuine meaning are swept away. The ethical teaching of Jesus is directed, in the first place, to restoring the commandments to their original simplicity and purity. In the glosses and corollaries with which Pharisaic ingenuity had overlaid them, He sees an attempt to narrow the scope and weaken the full stringency of the Divine law. He instances the casuistry which made it possible to evade a strict obedience to the command, 'Honour thy father and mother' (Mt 15<sup>6</sup>, Mk 7<sup>10-13</sup>). As against such trifling with the law of God, He insists on an honest acceptance of it in its plain and literal meaning. The ten thousand commandments into which the Decalogue had been divided and subdivided are to give place again to the simple ten.

(3) Not only is the Moral Law restored to its original purity, but it is simplified still further. While accepting the commandments as all given by God, Jesus recognizes that they are of different grades of importance. When the young ruler asked Him which of them were life-giving, He singles out the more distinctively ethical: 'Do not commit adultery, do not kill, do not steal, do not bear false witness, defraud not, honour thy father and mother' (Mk 10<sup>18-19</sup>, Mt 19<sup>18-19</sup>, Lk 18<sup>20</sup>). So the question of the lawyer, 'Which is the great commandment?' is admitted by Jesus to be a just one. It is significant that in His answer to it He does not quote from the Decalogue itself, but from De 6<sup>5</sup> and Lv 19<sup>18</sup>. He thus indicates that it is not the formal enactments which are sacred and binding, but the grand principles that lie behind them. Those sayings extraneous to the Decalogue, which yet lay bare its essential meaning, are 'greater' than any of the set commandments.

(4) The two requirements thus singled out are declared to be not only the greatest, but the sum and substance of all the others. The Law in its multiplicity runs back to the two root-demands of love to God and love to men. Of these two, Jesus insists on the former as 'the first and great commandment.' The duty of love to God is at once the highest duty required of man, and that which determines the right performance of all the rest.

In this sense we must explain the words that follow: 'The second is like to it' (Mt 22<sup>37-39</sup>, Mk 12<sup>29-31</sup>). Its 'likeness' does not consist merely in its similar largeness of scope or in its similar emphasis on love, but in its essential identity with the other commandment. The love to man which it demands is the outward expression, the evidence and effect of love to God (cf. Gal 5<sup>6</sup> 'Faith that worketh by love'; 1 Jn 4<sup>20</sup> 'He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?'). Thus in our Lord's summary of the Law we have more than a resolution of the Ten Commandments into two, corresponding broadly to the two divisions of the Decalogue. We have a clear indication that even those two are ultimately reducible to one.

(5) In this 'summary' the Moral Law, however simplified and purified, is still presented under the form of outward enactment. The early Catholic Church so accepted it, and set the nova lex imposed by Jesus on a similar footing with the Law of Moses. Jesus Himself, however, passed wholly beyond the idea of an outward statutory law. His demand is for an inward disposition so attuned to the will of God that it yields a spontaneous obedience. This demand is implicit in the 'summary,' couched though it is in the terms of formal enactment. It says nothing of particular moral actions, and insists solely on love, the inward frame of mind in which all right conduct has its source and motive: 'A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good' (Lk 6<sup>8</sup>); 'Either make the tree good and his fruit good, or else make the tree corrupt and his fruit corrupt' (Mt 12<sup>33</sup>). The ultimate aim of our Lord's ethical teaching is to produce a morality which will be independent of outward ordinance, and arise spontaneously out of the pure heart.

Thus the Decalogue, which in appearance is only revised and expounded, is virtually superseded by Christ. He bases morality on a new principle of inward harmony with God's will, and discards the whole idea involved in the term 'commandment.' It follows that in three essential respects His ethic differs from that which found its highest expression in the Decalogue. (a) Its demands are positive as distinguished from the old system of prohibitory rule. The Rabbinical precept, 'Do not to another what would be painful to yourself,' is adopted with a simple change that alters its whole character (Mt 7<sup>12</sup>). Where there is an inward impulse to goodness, it will manifest itself in active love towards men, in positive obedience to the will of God. (b) The ethic of Jesus makes an absolute demand in contrast to the limited requirements of the ancient Law. The chief purpose of the exposition in the Sermon on the Mount is to illustrate and enforce this difference. 'I say unto you, Refrain not only from the forbidden act, but from evil looks and thoughts. Obey the Moral Law without condition or reservation. Be perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect' (cf. the 'seventy times seven' of Mt 18<sup>22</sup>). This absolute demand is likewise involved in the substitution of an inward spirit for a statutory law. The moral task is no longer outwardly prescribed for us, and makes an infinite claim on our willing obedience. (c) As opposed to the Decalogue with its hard and fast requirements, the teaching of Jesus imposes a 'law of liberty.' The moral life, springing from the inward disposition, is self-determined. It possesses in itself a power of right judgment which makes it independent of any outward direction. It originates its own rules of action, and adapts them with an endless flexibility to all changing circumstances and times.

Our Lord's 'fulfilment' of the ancient Law has thus its outcome in a new morality which cannot be separated from His gospel as a whole. What He demands in the last resort is a change of nature such as can be effected only by faith in Him and possession of His spirit. The ultimate bearing of His criticism of the commandments is well indicated in the words of Luther: 'Habitō Christo facile condemus leges et omnia recte judicabimus. Immo novos decalogs faciemus, qui clariores erunt quam Mosis decalogus, sicut facies Christi clarior est quam facies Moisi.' See also ETHICS.

COMMISSION.—Christ's last recorded words to His disciples, as contained in Matthew's Gospel, are weighted with the impressiveness befitting such an occasion. They contain a commission, which focusses the duty of professed followers with regard to His own Person and Work. All four Evangelists give this Commission in one form or another (Mt 28<sup>18-20</sup>, Mk 16<sup>15-18</sup>, Lk 24<sup>48-49</sup>, Jn 20<sup>21-22</sup>). Without discussing the critical questions raised by these passages, what follows is based on their historicity, as that has been held by the Christian Church.*

On two other occasions our Lord formally commissioned His Apostles. First, the Twelve were sent forth on a trial mission (Mt 10<sup>5-6</sup>, Lk 9<sup>10-11</sup>). That mission was limited, both as to area—the towns and villages of Galilee—and to objects—the lost sheep of the house of Israel. It aimed (1) at preparing the way of the kingdom of heaven, which our Lord came to found; and (2) at training the Apostles themselves in faith and fortitude for the more responsible work afterwards to devolve upon them. Later, seventy disciples were chosen (Lk 10), and sent—also, apparently—to itinerate in Galilee. Their instructions were similar to those of the Twelve. But, as opposition had now become more pronounced, greater emphasis is laid on it; and the brethren, like carabinieri patrols in modern Italy, travelled two and two. The instructions given to both the Twelve and the Seventy may be called lesser commissions in comparison with the great Commission of Mt 28. As these commissions were local, temporary, and provisional, it is unnecessary to do more than mention them, except for purposes of comparison and contrast. At one point, however, there is an interesting link between them and the great Commission. After giving His instructions to the Twelve, Christ fell into an audible soliloquy, and went on (vv. 16-17) to speak of the trials, the duties, and the supports of those who in subsequent ages were to carry on His missionary work.

That Christ should speak frequently to the disciples about their future work during the forty days between His resurrection and ascension, is what might be expected. This accounts for the various forms under which all four Evangelists record His Commission. Conditions of time, place, and circumstances call for fuller, or more condensed, general, or particular statements. Processes of repetition, condensation, expansion, or omission in recording the subject of conversations which extended over nearly six weeks, were present to each writer's consciousness as he penned his narrative. Grotius, as quoted in Poli, Syn., says: 'Uno compendio Matthæus complectitur præcipua capita sermonum quos Christus cum Apostolis non in monte tantum, sed et Hierosolymis, antea et post, in eorum jamjam ascensurus, Bethanie habuit.' Notwithstanding these conditions, certain essential features of the Commission correspond in the Gospels, as the following table shows:

* It should be noted, however, that as Mk 16<sup>7-8</sup> is lacking in the best MSS, modern scholars are practically unanimous in holding that these verses did not form a part of the original Gospel, so that it is doubtful whether they possess any independent value.

CONTENTS OF COMMISSION COMMON TO EVANGELISTS.
Universal Mission	Universal Mission	Universal Mission	Mission of undefined range
Baptism	Baptism and Faith	Repentance and Remission of sins	Message whose substance is Forgiveness
Promise of spiritual Presence	—	Promise of Comforter	Gift of Holy Ghost.

'All power is given unto me in heaven and on earth. Go ye therefore, and make disciples of (μαθητεύσατε) all nations, baptizing them into (eis) the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.' (Mt 28<sup>18-20</sup>). These words constitute the charter of the Christian Church. They define in a solemn, authoritative, formal manner, the Commission under which the Apostles and that Church of which they were representatives were to prosecute to its consummation the work begun at Christ's Incarnation. If our Lord gave this Commission in presence of the five hundred witnesses referred to by St. Paul in 1 Co 15<sup>6</sup>, we can understand the remark of Mt 28<sup>18</sup> that 'some doubted,' for these doubters could scarcely at this stage be any of the Eleven. Should this be so, 'it follows that the Lord Himself here committed His formal institutions and commissions to the whole assembled Church, with the Apostles at her head, just as at a later day He poured out His Spirit upon the whole assembled Church. And from this, then, we argue that, according to the law of Christ, the Apostolic office and the Church are not two divided sections. In the commission to teach and to baptize, the Apostolic community is one, a united Apostolate involving the Church, or a united Church including the Apostles' (Lange, Com. on Matt., Edinburgh ed. p. 560).

Peuliarities in two of the Synoptists' accounts are noticeable. St. Luke tells how Christ opened the understanding of His disciples that they might understand the Scripture testimony to His suffering and resurrection on the third day. This is the line which we should expect Christ to take, if, on any of the occasions when He discussed their future work with the Eleven, He referred to His own part. The Divine necessity for His death would most readily impress itself on their minds when associated with intimations thereof in the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms. Mk 16<sup>7</sup> [a passage that is very early, even if not from the pen of St. Mark],* where the promise of miraculous gifts (σημεία) is made, has occasioned difficulty, because it seems strange that any of the Evangelists should have omitted to mention so great an endowment. On the other hand, the historicity of these verses is strongly urged by Calvin on a priori grounds. He argues that the power of working miracles was essential to the establishment of the disciples themselves, as well as necessary for proving the doctrine of the gospel at its commencement, that the power was possessed by only a very few persons [but cf. v. 17, where the power is to belong to them that believe] for the confirmation of all, and (though not expressly stated by Christ) granted only for a time.

Turning now to St. Matthew's narrative, as fullest and most formal, the first noticeable thing is that the Commission proper is prefaced by our Lord's claim of universal power; and concluded with a promise of His abiding presence. The risen and glorified Christ speaks as Lord and King of heaven and earth, in 'the majesty of His exalted humanity and brightness of His divinity' (Lange). His disciples, having to undertake a superhuman task, required to be assured that they were backed by superhuman authority. Nothing but the assurance of such power at their disposal could nerve men to attack those strongholds of sin and Satan which must be overthrown before the kingdom of heaven can be established in human hearts. Meyer defines the power here claimed by Christ as the 'mundus regnum Christi' without limitation.

By the promise 'And, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world,' Christ assures His followers that the universal power possessed by Himself will be at their disposal when engaged in doing His work. The mystery of Christ's name Ἐμμανουήλ—God with us, is here fulfilled—I in the fullest sense, as if He, the risen, exalted, all-powerful head of the Church, 'stretched out His hand from heaven' (Calvin). He is present in the Person of the Holy Spirit (Jn 14:16, 17) through His Word (14:26) and Sacrament (Mt 26:28). This promise is made to the whole Church in the widest sense, as well as to the Apostles and all who should take up their official work in propagating and preserving the Christian Church as missionaries and pastors. Alford says: 'To understand μεθ' ὑμῶν only of the Apostles and their (?) successors, is to destroy the whole force of these most weighty words. . . . The command is to the Universal Church, to be performed in the nature of things by her ministers and teachers, the manner of appointing whom is not here prescribed, but to be learnt in the unfoldings of Providence recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, who by His special ordinance were the founders and first builders of that Church, but whose office, on that very account, precluded the idea of succession or renewal.'

The Mediatorial Presence is to last unto the end of the world—whether that refer to the end of the material order here, or the end of the present moral and spiritual order, for Christ's return will make all things new. Schaff points out that 'unto' (ἕως) 'does not set a term to Christ's presence, but to His invisible and temporal presence, which will be exchanged for His visible and eternal presence at His last coming.' An important link between the power and promised presence—one which connects them also with the intervening Commission—is this: The power is placed at the disposal of, the presence granted to, those alone who obey the command, Go and disciple the nations.

The Commission itself is evangelistic, or missionary, and pastoral—the one merging into the other, with Baptism as the link connecting these two departments. Its order is threefold—Discipling, Baptizing, Instructing. All nations are to be brought to the obedience of the faith. Their standing is to be sealed and ratified by the sign of the gospel. Then their instruction is to go on, that so these baptized scholars in the school of Christ may reach up to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

(1) 'Go ye therefore and make disciples (μαθητεύσατε) all nations.' Demonstrably, this was not understood as spoken to the Apostles only, but to all the brethren' (Alford). Go forth—out of the bounds of Israel—and disciple the nations—convert them, enrol them as scholars in the school of Christ. St. Mark specifies the means by which this discipling is to be accomplished—'Preach the gospel' (κηρύξατε τὸ εὐαγγέλιον); herald the good news of a crucified, risen, and exalted Saviour. By the mention of 'all nations' the restriction of 10<sup>6</sup> is now removed: for the middle wall of partition, that divided Jew from Gentile, was broken down by Christ's death. Christ's words give no hint of an answer to that question, soon to disturb the early Church, about the method of Gentile admission; but the principle of their admission is emphatically laid down. The corresponding words in Mk 16:7 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature' (πάσῃ τῇ κτίσει), emphasize the universality of the gospel message even more strongly than those of Matthew. All the world is the sphere, every creature the object, of evangelistic effort.

(2) 'Baptizing them.' The Church of Christ being a visible community, to be gathered out of the world until it become itself universal, has its peculiar rites, by which that visibility is manifested. Besides being channels of Divine grace, they are seals of Divine favour, and pledges, on the part of disciples, of obedience to Divine commands. Baptism is the initiatory rite. It signifies both the bestowal and the reception of that grace of God in Christ which brings salvation. It testifies to the adoption of believers by grafting into the body of Christ, the washing of regeneration, and the imputation of a new righteousness on God's part. The person baptized, on the other hand, ratifies by his signature the faith in Christ through which these blessings are appropriated. A profession of that faith has been required in all ages of the Church from those of mature years when seeking admission to her pale. This profession was manifestly intended by our Lord when He instituted the rite of Baptism. A minority of the Christian Church confine the rite to those who are capable of cherishing and professing such a personal faith. See art. BAPTISM.

Baptism is 'into' (εἰς) the name of the trine God—by the authority and unto the authority of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The unity in Trinity of the Godhead is distinctly marked by the use of the singular τὸ θεῶμα instead of τὰ θεῶματα. These words, 'into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost,' have been used for ages as our formula of Baptism when admitting candidates into the covenant of Redemption—'into the name,' 'as the expression, according to the common Scripture use, of the whole character of God, the sum of the whole Christian revelation. The knowledge of God as Father, the spiritual birthright of sonship, the power and advocacy of the Spirit—all these privileges belong to those who, in the divinely appointed rite, are incorporated into the Divine name' (G. Milligan in Expository Times, vol. viii. [1897] p. 172).

(3) 'Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever . . . which I have commanded you.' Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever . . . which I have commanded you. . . .

* The critical questions connected with Mk 16:7-9 will be found thoroughly discussed in Swete's Gospel according to St. Mark, Macmillan, 1896, pp. xxvii-xxv.

ever I have commanded you.' The process begun before, must be continued after Baptism. Admission into the Church—whether visible or invisible—is only the beginning of Christian discipleship. Eternity cannot complete the process of learning what has to be known of an infinite God, and the relation of His creatures to Him. It is part of the pastoral duty of the Christian ministry to inculcate the truth as it is in Jesus, that every member may be built up into the full manhood of the Author and Finisher of our faith. The subject-matter of teaching is the doctrines and precepts of Christ, which lie at the root of Christian faith and Christian practice. On all the members of His Church it is incumbent to be diligent scholars in the school of Christ, learning obedience to His commandments from those appointed as teachers. On some of these learners the additional duty rests of being official exponents of His law—teachers in their turn—devoting their lives, as the Apostles did, to edify the body of Christ.

The place assigned to Word and Sacrament in the spiritual perspective of this Commission is well worthy of notice. It portrays the minister of the gospel in the character of a teaching prophet rather than in that of a sacrificing priest. The ministry is first a ministry of the Word, and then of the Sacraments. Thus Baptism—the Sacrament of regeneration—is closely associated with preaching and teaching; while the Lord's Supper—the Sacrament of sanctification—is not directly mentioned, although included among the 'all things whatsoever I have commanded you.' The Word must not be exalted at the expense of the Sacraments, nor the Sacraments at the expense of the Word. When each is assigned its true place as a means of grace, the work of evangelizing and edifying, committed to His Church by Christ, will most surely prosper.

D. A. MACKINNON.

COMMON LIFE.—The teaching of our Lord upon this subject is no more restricted and definite than it is upon any other of life's relations. It was never His purpose to draw up anything like a code of laws for the regulation of human life. Indeed, it is just this indefiniteness, this liberty, this leaving all detail to the spiritual guidance which He promised, that has made the religion of Jesus so far transcend every other religion that has been given to men. Christ left His teaching unrestricted, that by its inner and spiritual power it might be able to adapt itself to the ever-changing needs and thoughts of men. That doctrine which makes itself particular, which binds itself up with the peculiar circumstances of a definite people, a definite clime, a definite era, must of necessity pass away with those circumstances to which it specially applied. Our Lord, in that He laid down principles, not rules, has given us that which will apply to all peoples and climes and eras. Christianity is the universal faith, because it is founded upon the universal needs of the human heart (Jn 8:32, 33, 14:12, 13).

It is, of course, true that Christianity is particular to this extent, that its Founder faces and combats those particular evils which chanced to be most prevalent at the time when He lived on earth. Had renunciation of the world in the monastic sense been as widespread as it became two centuries after His death, we should certainly have had more definite teaching upon our subject. But it was Pharisaism that He had to oppose, not asceticism. There were, indeed, the Essenes at the time of Christ, but that community was never a large one, nor were their tenets so opposed to the truths He taught as to demand His special attention. The Baptist, it is true, was an ascetic (Mt 3:4; Mk 1:6; Mt 11:18; Lk 7:33); but we never find him commanding others to lead his life. John preached repentance, but a repentance that did not entail renunciation of the world. Even the publicans and the rough soldiery of Herod, when they came seeking his advice, were not required to give up professions so fraught with temptation. All that he asked of them was that they should perform the duties of their callings honestly and honourably (Lk 3:10-14). It was therefore in opposition to the ritualism of the Pharisees alone that Christ had to develop His teaching as to common life. Purity and holiness in the eyes of the Pharisees were matters of ceremonial observance far more than of heart and life; and to such an extent had they elaborated the Mosaic ritual, that it was no longer possible for the poor man and the toiler to attain to holiness in the sense which they had rendered popular. Only the wealthy and the leisured could win their esoteric righteousness. It is for this reason that we so continually find our Lord in strenuous opposition to all externalism. It is ever the religion of heart and life, not that of ceremonial, that He demands of His followers. Consider, for example, His fulfilling of the Law in the Sermon on the Mount. Throughout it is the Law's moral requirements that He treats of; and the discourse is prefaced by the assertion that the righteousness of the new kingdom must start by exceeding that of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 5:20). He speaks of least commandments, the breaking of which does not exclude from the kingdom (v. 19); and which He accounts the greater and which the less is manifested by His saying: 'First be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift' (v. 24). From a similar standpoint He treats the observance of the Sabbath, subordinating all external and ceremonial requirements to those spiritual commands of love to God and to our neighbour which He made all-important (Mk 2:27-28; Lk 6:1-12; 13:10-17). In regard to the question of washing the hands before eating, He comes into open conflict with the Pharisees, upbraiding their hypocrisy, and contending that defilement comes not from external things, but from within the heart (Mt 15:1-20; Mk 7:1-23).

All this tends towards the placing of a higher value upon common life. He is thus clearing the way for the reception of the thought that God may be as truly served in the round of daily life and toil as in those observances distinctively called religious. We have the boldest assertion of this truth in the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican (Lk 18:9-14), wherein He points out that the strictest—nay, the supererogatory—performance of ritual cannot win justification in the sight of God, while simple repentance, utterly without these things, is assured of pardon and peace. We are not told whether the repentance of this publican entailed the giving up of his profession; but in the case of Zacchæus there is evidence that it did not (Lk 19:1-10). Apparently, then, in the eyes of our Lord, even this, the most despised of callings, could be followed by a member of the kingdom. Levi, it is true, was called to leave all and follow (Lk 5:27); but his case we must regard as an exception. He showed a special aptitude, and was called to a special office.

But it is rather the whole tendency of the teaching and example of Jesus, than any explicit statement, that in Christianity assigns to common life a dignity which it receives in no other religion.

That Christianity so early developed monkish asceticism cannot be adduced as an argument against Christ's teaching. The life of Jesus is throughout a clear admission of the value of that probation which God the Father and Creator has allotted to mankind. Jesus as the universal Man, the Example for all the world, assumed for Himself the most universal experience. For thirty years He lived the common life of a labouring man, working like any one of His brethren in the carpenter's shop at Nazareth. We have Him described as a carpenter, as one well known to His fellow-townsmen, as one but little distinguished from His brothers and sisters (Mt 13<sup>55</sup>, Mk 6<sup>3</sup>). Commonplace daily toil and family intercourse, and that throughout a period of thirty years, were thus the training which the Heavenly Father accounted the best for His Son who was to be the Saviour of the world. In this lowly sphere the Son of God grew 'in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man' (Lk 2<sup>52</sup>). Than this there could be no stronger argument for the value and the nobleness of common life in the eyes of the Father and the Son. It is impossible to conceive that He who thus honoured the common lot could desire any renunciation of it on the part of those who wished to be His followers. Those who were called to be His missionaries must of necessity give up all to do a higher work, but not to attain a higher life. It is to be noted that when for a time that work is in abeyance, His chief disciples return to their old calling (Jn 21<sup>3</sup>).

The whole attitude of Jesus towards the world of nature and of man is in accordance with His claim to be the Son of the Creator. He clearly recognized the wisdom and the beauty and the love that shine forth in Creation and Providence. The lilies of the field and the fowls of the air, the sunshine and the rain, are used by Him as evidences of the goodness of the Father. His teaching is bound up in closest harmony with the things of earth and time. For Him the family ties are types of Heaven. His kingdom is far more a family than a nation. The names of father, mother, brother, sister, wife, are ennobled by His use of them. From all the callings of men He draws images of Divine things. The physician, the sower, the reaper, the fisherman, the vine-dresser, the shepherd, the king at war, the housewife at her baking, the commonest incidents of daily life, the simplest phenomena of nature,—all have a place in His doctrine; all are used to illustrate the character and development of His kingdom. He did not, it is true, enlarge upon the relations of life. That was not His mission. His reformation was to proceed from within, not from without. But everywhere there is the manifest acceptance of the order, alike social and natural, which God has ordained. Even the civil order, with which He came into contact in no ideal form in the Roman domination, receives His sanction. 'Render unto Caesar,' He says, 'the things which are Caesar's; and unto God the things that are God's' (Mt 22<sup>21-22</sup>, Mk 12<sup>13-17</sup>, Lk 20<sup>25-26</sup>). There is duty to God and duty to civil order, and these must not conflict in religion's name: the former should include the latter. Marriage is recognized by Him as a holy tie, an indissoluble Divine institution, and thus obtains a position more honourable than it had ever held before (Mt 19<sup>6</sup>, Mk 10<sup>9-10</sup>). His presence and first miracle at the wedding at Cana of Galilee (Jn 2<sup>1-11</sup>)—a miracle which shows His deep sympathy with even trivial human needs—is in itself a consecration of marriage. That episode strikes the keynote of His life,—a life lived amid His fellows, sharing their joys and sorrows, their trials and temptations, their feasts and their mourn-ings. The Son of man came eating and drinking, with no ascetic gloom; came to live in, and thus to sanctify, the whole round of common life.

Yet in the view of our Lord all these things had but a transitory value. They were but means to something higher. They were the temporal and seen, from which the unseen and eternal was to be extracted. In so far, then, as they conflicted with that higher good, that eternal treasure, Christ demanded renunciation in regard to them. His treatment of the young ruler (Mt 19<sup>16-22</sup>, Mk 10<sup>17-27</sup>, Lk 18<sup>18-27</sup>) illustrates well this attitude. Wealth is not in itself an evil, but it is a great danger, and in certain cases it may destroy the life of the soul. For some, therefore, it is wiser and safer to discard it. It has an engrossing power that deprives the soul of its proper nourishment (cf. the parable of the Rich Fool, Lk 12<sup>13-21</sup>). It tends to harden the heart against compassion and charity, to make the man self-sufficient, to give a physical delight so great as to close the eyes to that which is spiritual (cf. the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus, Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>). But there are other blessings far more innocent that possess a like danger. Things as precious and as natural as the hand and eye and foot may yet lead to sin and obstruct the passage to the higher life (Mt 5<sup>29</sup>, Mk 9<sup>43-45</sup>). In such cases, too, these must be renounced. Even the family ties, if they become so binding as to come between the soul and its true weal—the service of God in Christ—must be broken; for the kingdom of God is the one aim and purpose of the spiritual man, and nought must be permitted to interfere therewith (Mt 10<sup>37</sup>, Lk 14<sup>26</sup>, Mt 6<sup>24</sup>). Even life itself must be laid down for the sake of Christ (Mt 10<sup>39</sup>, Lk 17<sup>33</sup>, Jn 12<sup>25</sup>).

Christ's teaching as to worldly good is particularly revealed in the parable of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16<sup>1-13</sup>). There He calls the command of wealth and natural advantage by the name of 'the unrighteous mammon,' thus pointing to its seductive power and contrasting it with the true spiritual good. He calls it also 'that which is another man's' in distinction to 'that which is your own.' Of earthly good we are but the stewards. Wealth is never really our own. We may use it or abuse it, but sooner or later we must resign its control. The spiritual gifts of God are of a nature totally different. They become truly ours, a part of our true self. Yet the unrighteous mammon can be so employed as to win us spiritual advantage. By its means we can make us friends who will receive us into everlasting habitations. As the unjust steward employed his power to his own worldly advantage, so must we with the wisdom of light use to our highest advantage the worldly power which is ours which is always one with the service of God.

There is a remarkable passage in Mk 10<sup>29</sup> (cf. Mt 19<sup>29</sup> and Lk 18<sup>29</sup>), which promises that earthly loss suffered for Christ's sake and the gospel's shall receive an hundredfold reward 'now in this time' in the same kind in which the loss was suffered. That the Christian in his profession and practice of love to all men must have the family ties strengthened and extended an hundredfold, is readily to be understood; but the promise of lands is not so simple. To the mind of the present writer it suggests the great truth, which Christ's own life exemplified, that only the child of God is capable of the pure and perfect enjoyment of all that God has made. Only to the eyes of him whose heart is filled with the Father's love, is all the beauty of the Creator's work displayed. As one with the Father through Christ, as sharing the purposes of God, as beholding the Divine plan and submitting to and working for it, the Christian possesses the world in a sense in which no other can. It is his to rejoice in and to use for God's glory. (Cf. Expositor 1st ser. iv. [1876] 256 ff.)

To sum up the whole, we may say that there are two great ideas which underlie Christ's teaching:—(1) The inestimable value of the human soul (Mt 16<sup>26</sup>, Mk 8<sup>36</sup>, Lk 9<sup>25</sup>), to the salvation of which all must be subordinated, for the sake of which all things, if necessary, must be renounced: the Gospel, therefore, which gives this salvation is all-important, and its service must have no rival; and (2) the recognition of common life and daily toil, with all that these terms include, as the ordinances of a loving Father by whose Providence they are designed to be the chiefest elements in fitting men for citizenship in the Kingdom of Heaven. He who uses well the talents which God gives, in the sphere in which his lot is cast, who is faithful in a little, shall have his reward hereafter in the obtaining of a larger sphere wherein to exercise for God's glory those very qualities, purified and ennobled, which his earthly diligence has made his own (Mt 25<sup>14-30</sup>, Lk 19<sup>11-27</sup>). Work that is the expression of love to God and man is always noble; and there is no work on earth that may not be performed to God's glory.

COMMUNION.—It is surprising that neither the substantive (κοινωνία) nor the verb (κοινωνέω), which represent the concept of 'communion' in NT, is to be found in any of our four Gospels. It would, however, be unsafe, and indeed untrue to fact, to assume on this account that the idea of communion is wanting. While there is an absence of the words concerned, there is no absence of the conception itself. A careful study of the Gospels, on the contrary, not only reveals a plain recognition of this vital aspect of the religious life, but also (and especially in the records of our Lord's teaching preserved by St. John) presents the conception to us with a certain clear, if unobtrusive, prominence.

The subject contains three distinct parts, which will naturally be considered separately: (1) The communion of Christ with the Father; (2) our communion with God; (3) our communion one with another.

1. The communion of Christ with the Father.—The more conspicuous aspect of our Lord's communion with the Father as reflected in the Gospels, is that which characterized His earthly ministry. But it is not the only aspect presented. Christ Himself clearly claimed to have enjoyed pre-existent communion with His Father (Jn 17<sup>24</sup>), and the Prologue of the Fourth Gospel in three or four weighty clauses confirms the claim. This pre-existent communion included both unity of essence and life, and fellowship in work. (a) The Word was πρὸς τὸν θεόν (Jn 1<sup>1</sup>), realizing His very personality 'in active intercourse with and in perfect communion with God' (Westcott, in loc.). His nature was the nature of Deity (καὶ θεὸς ἦν ὁ λόγος, 5b). His Sonship is unique (v. 14), and for the uniqueness of the relationship of the important Synoptic passage, Mt 11<sup>27</sup>=Lk 10<sup>22</sup>). His is the πλήρωμα—the sum of the Divine attributes (Jn 1<sup>16</sup>, cf. Col 1<sup>19</sup> 2<sup>9</sup>; Eph 1<sup>23</sup>), and He is μονογενὴς θεός (Jn 1<sup>18</sup>)—"One Who is God only-begotten" (Westcott). (b) The pre-existent communion not merely consisted in identity of essence, but was also expressed by fellowship in work. The Word was the Agent

Our Lord's realization of His Father's presence during His life upon earth was constant. That He Himself laid claim to such fellowship is beyond contention. He did so directly in His words (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>=Lk 10<sup>22</sup>, Jn 12<sup>42, 43</sup>, 14<sup>2, 10, 11</sup>, 16<sup>28, 29</sup>), emphasizing especially His unity with the Father (Jn 10<sup>38-39</sup>, 12<sup>44</sup>), and accepting with approval the title of 'God' (Jn 20<sup>28, 29</sup>). He did so even more impressively, if less directly, by assuming His Father's functions in the world (Mk 9<sup>2-7</sup>=Mt 9<sup>2, 3</sup>=Lk 5<sup>20, 21</sup>, 7<sup>38</sup>) and representing Himself as controlling Divine forces and originating Divine missions (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, Jn 15<sup>26</sup>, 20<sup>22, 23</sup>). Moreover, any attempt to explain away that intimate knowledge of God which the Gospels consistently ascribe to Him, is compelled to disregard not merely the passages in which His own words and actions distinctly assume it, but also not a few in which, whether with approval or with disapproval, others recognize that He claimed to possess it (Jn 5<sup>18</sup>, 10<sup>33</sup>, 13<sup>19</sup>, cf. also 17<sup>7-9</sup>). See CLAIMS OF CHRIST.

But apart altogether from His specific claim to the enjoyment of this Divine fellowship, we have abundant evidence of its existence in His earthly life itself. The sense of communion was an integral part of that life. It is one of those elements in His personality that could not be eliminated from it. A Christ unconscious of intercourse with God would not be the Christ of the Gospels. It was this sense of communion that moulded His conception of duty (Lk 9<sup>29</sup>, AV or RV). The thirty years of quiet preparation for a three years' ministry (the proportions are suggestive; for other examples of equipment in seclusion see Ex 3<sup>1</sup>, Lk 1<sup>8</sup>, Gal 1<sup>10-17</sup>) may without doubt be summed up as one long experience of fellowship with His Father. And the recognition of this union, which marks His first thoughts of His mission, and which must so largely have constituted His earthly preparation for it, is found to be His constant support amid the stress of the work itself. It is present in a special manner in the Baptism which signalized the beginning of His ministry among men (Mk 1<sup>10-11</sup>=Mt 3<sup>16-17</sup>=Lk 3<sup>21-22</sup>). It is His stay alike before the labours of the day begin (Mk 1<sup>35</sup>), at the very moment of service (Mk 6<sup>41</sup> ἀναβλέψας εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν; cf. also 7<sup>24</sup> 8<sup>24</sup>, Jn 6<sup>11</sup> 11<sup>41</sup>), and when refreshment of soul is needed at the close of the long hours of toil (Mk 6<sup>46</sup>=Mt 14<sup>23</sup>, Lk 5<sup>15</sup>). The Gospels, indeed, make it plain that He regarded such communion as a condition on which the accomplishment of certain work depended (Mk 9<sup>29</sup>, cf. Jn 5<sup>9</sup>), and we cannot fail to observe the frequency with which both He and His biographers insist that the Divine Presence is with Him in all His words and works (Lk 4<sup>14, 15</sup>, Jn 3<sup>24</sup> 5<sup>19-21, 36</sup> 8<sup>16, 34, 35</sup>). So constant is the communion, that even the most familiar objects of Nature convey to Him suggestions of the Father in heaven (Mt 6<sup>29, 30</sup>). It is noteworthy that retirement for intimate converse with unseen realities is especially recorded as preceding Christ's action or speech at certain great crises in the development of His life-mission (Luke is particularly careful to draw attention to this; see 3<sup>21</sup> 6<sup>12, 13</sup> 9<sup>18, 28</sup>, 22<sup>24</sup> 23<sup>46</sup>; cf. also Mk 9<sup>2</sup>, Jn 12<sup>26</sup> 17<sup>25</sup>), and that intercession for individual men had its place in this sacred experience (Lk 22<sup>31, 32</sup>, cf. 23<sup>34</sup>, Jn 17<sup>9-20</sup>).

Thus constantly, alike at critical junctures and in more normal moments, did the sense of His Father's presence uphold Him. In one mysterious moment, the full meaning of which baffles human explanation, His consciousness of it appears to have wavered (Mk 15<sup>34</sup>); yet even this cry of desolation must not be considered apart from the certain restoration of the communion revealed in the calm confidence of the last word of all (Lk 23<sup>46</sup>). See art. DERELICTION.

One further point may be briefly suggested. Our Lord's communion with the Father was not inconsistent with His endurance of temptation. Nay, it was under the strong impulse of that Spirit whose presence with Him was at once the sign and the expression of His union with God (see Mk 1<sup>10</sup>), that He submitted to the assaults of evil (Mk 1<sup>13</sup>, note ἐβιάσθη, = Mt 4<sup>1</sup> = Lk 4<sup>1</sup>). The protracted testing (ἢν τεταράχμενος, analytical tense, cf. the suggestion of other occasions of temptation in the plur. ἐν τοῖς τεταράχμοις μου, Lk 22<sup>28</sup>, and Jn 12<sup>27</sup>), successfully endured, itself became to our Lord the means of a fresh assurance and (perhaps we may add) a fuller realization of fellowship with the spiritual world (Mk 1<sup>13</sup> ἐαγέθου—impf.). In this respect, as in others also, His life of communion, while in one sense unique (Lk 10<sup>20</sup>), is seen to be the exemplar of our own.

2. Our communion with God.—The reality of the believer's communion with God is plainly revealed in the teaching of the Gospels. This communion is presented sometimes in terms of a relationship with the Father, sometimes in terms of a relationship with the Son, sometimes in terms of a relationship with the Spirit; but all three presentations alike are relevant to our study (1 Jn 2<sup>24</sup>, cf. 1 Jn 14<sup>16, 17</sup>)*. If our outline is to be at once clear and comprehensive, we must treat the passages concerned under two headings. The first (a) will include those that deal with the state of communion with God into which a man is brought when he becomes the servant of God; the second (b) those that relate to the life of conscious communion with God which it is his privilege to live from that time forward. The distinction, as will shortly appear, is by no means an unnecessary one, the second experience being at once more vivid and more profound than the first need necessarily be.

(a) It is clear that in the case of every believer the barrier raised between himself and God by his sin has been broken down. In other words, he has been restored to a state of communion with God. The means by which this state is brought about have both a Divine and a human significance. It is in considering their Divine aspect that we reach the point of closest connexion between the communion of believers with God and the communion of Christ with His Father. For these in a true sense stand to one another in the relation of effect and cause (cf. what is implied in such passages as Jn 1<sup>13</sup> 14<sup>16, 17</sup> 17<sup>21-23</sup>). It is in virtue of our Lord's perfect fellowship with God that through His life and death we too can gain unrestricted admission to the Divine Presence. This truth is all-important. It needs no detailed proof. The whole story of the Incarnation and of the Cross is one long exposition of it. Perhaps it is symbolically represented in Mk 15<sup>38</sup>. The conditions required on the human side for restoration to the state of communion with God appear plainly in our Lord's teaching. This state is described in varied language and under different metaphors. Sometimes it is presented as citizenship in God's kingdom (Mk 10<sup>14, 15</sup>, Jn 3<sup>3</sup>); sometimes as discipleship (Lk 14<sup>26</sup>, Jn 8<sup>13</sup>), friendship (Jn 15<sup>13</sup>), and even kinship (Mk 3<sup>32-33</sup>) with Christ Himself. In other places it is spoken of as a personal knowledge of Him (1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup>); in others, again, as a following in His footsteps (Mk 8<sup>34</sup>, Jn 8<sup>12</sup>); and in yet others as the possession of a new type of life (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>: for the definition of eternal life as 'knowing God' see Jn 17<sup>3</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>20</sup>). As one condition of finding this experience, which, in whatever terms it is described, places men in a new relationship with God, Christ mentions childlikeness of disposition (Mk 10<sup>13</sup>). As other conditions He emphasizes poverty of spirit, (Mt 5<sup>3</sup>, Lk 18<sup>26</sup>), and the performance of the Divine will in a life of righteousness and love (Mk 3<sup>35</sup>, Lk 6<sup>33, 36</sup> 8<sup>21</sup>, Jn 8<sup>14</sup>, cf. 1 Jn 1<sup>6</sup> 2<sup>3-8</sup> 3<sup>6</sup>). In one very important passage, addressed both to the multitude and to His own band of disciples, He may perhaps be said to include all individual conditions. 'If any man willeth to come after me, let him renounce himself' (Mk 8<sup>34</sup> and ii). This saying has a meaning far more profound than that suggested by our English versions. Taken with the explanation contained in the verse that follows, it really leads us to the basis of communion. All communion between two persons, whether human and human or human and Divine, is possible only in virtue of some element common to the natures of both (see Jn 4<sup>24</sup> 3<sup>27</sup>; cf. the same principle differently applied in 5<sup>27</sup>). Man's sole possibility of communion with God lies in his possession, potential or actual, of the Divine life (cf. Jn 1<sup>13</sup>). But joined to the 'self' (the second ψυχή of Mk 8<sup>34</sup>) which is capable of union with God, he is conscious also of another 'self' (the first ψυχή of Mk 8<sup>34</sup>) which is incongruous with that close relationship to Deity. The condition of realizing the one 'self,' and with it, in natural sequence, communion with God, is the renunciation of the other and lower 'self.'

So both vv. 34 and 35; the incuris of Mk 8<sup>34</sup> is thus equivalent to the first ψυχή of 8<sup>34</sup>. The 'taking up his cross'—i.e. for his own crucifixion thereon—denotes the 'renouncing himself' more closely. The teaching of the whole passage is the Evangelic representation of the Pauline doctrine of self-crucifixion, cf. Gal 2<sup>20</sup> 2<sup>24</sup>.

To change the figure somewhat, the unity of life involved in the idea of communion between man and God can be attained only through man's rising to God's life. This, it is true, would have been outside his power had not God first stooped to his level. But in the Incarnation this step of infinite condescension has been taken, and by it the possibility of mankind's rising to the life of God—in other words, the possibility of its entering into a state of communion with God—has been once for all secured. In order to make this state of communion his own, Christ teaches, each individual man must now leave his lower life, with all that pertains to it, behind; must be content to 'renounce himself'; must be willing to 'lose' that 'life' which cannot consist with the Divine life. So complete, indeed, is to be the severance from the past, that the experience in which it is brought about is called a 'new birth' (Jn 3<sup>3</sup>), as real as, though of a type essentially different from, the physical birth (v. 5). When with this self-renouncement is combined that faith in Christ which leads to union with Him and reliance upon Him (πιστεύειν εἰς—Jn 3<sup>15, 36</sup> 6<sup>29</sup> 11<sup>25</sup>), we have the experience which sums up into one great whole the various individual conditions required on the human side for entering into the state of communion with God.

(b) Quite distinct in thought from the state of communion into which all believers are brought, is the life of communion which it is their privilege to enjoy. The one is always a fact, the other is also a consciously realized experience. Like so many of the blessings revealed in NT, such a life of communion is too rich an experience to be described in any one phrase or under a single metaphor. In different contexts it is presented in different ways. Sometimes, for example, it is set forth as an abiding in Christ who also abides in the believer (Jn 15<sup>4th</sup>). In other places it is represented as an indwelling of the Spirit (Jn 14<sup>16-20</sup> 16<sup>7, 13-15</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>20, 27</sup> 3<sup>24</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>), whose presence, to believers (as in a deeper sense to their Lord) the sign and expression of union with God, is to be with them from the moment of their initiation into the new life (Mk 1<sup>8</sup> and ||; 1 Jn 3<sup>24</sup> 4<sup>23</sup>). Yet another statement, emphasizing in a remarkable metaphor the inwardness and intimacy of the union that results, sets the experience before us as a mystical feeding upon Christ (Jn 6, esp. vv. 53-58, cf. also v. 52). But while there is variation in the language in which this sense of the Divine Presence is set forth, there is no question as to the reality of the experience itself. It is the inspiration of this Unseen Presence that shall give to believers definite guidance in moments of crisis and perplexity (Mk 13<sup>21</sup> and ||, Lk 12<sup>11-12</sup>). It is in this communion with God that they will find their surest refuge against fears and dangers (Mk 13<sup>28</sup>—Mt 24<sup>20</sup>) and against the assaults of temptation (Mk 14<sup>28</sup> and ||). Such fellowship, too, is their ground of certainty, alike in their teaching (Jn 8<sup>25</sup>—note the plurals; 1 Jn 1<sup>1-2</sup>) and in their belief (cf. Jn 4<sup>26</sup>). It is, moreover, the source of all their fitness for service (cf. Gabriel's suggestive speech, Lk 1<sup>19</sup>) and the means of all their fruit-bearing (Jn 15<sup>1-10</sup>). As would have been expected, the full significance of this converse with God is not understood, nor is its closest intimacy appropriated, in the earliest days of initiation. Knowledge of God, like knowledge of men, has to be realized progressively (cf. χάρις ἀπὸ χάριτος, Jn 1<sup>16</sup>). There are degrees of intimacy (cf. Jn 15<sup>10</sup> and the suggestive interchange of ἀγαπᾶν and φιλῶν in 21<sup>15c</sup>), and the extent to which the believer is admitted into fellowship is proportionate to the progress he has made in the lessons previously taught (cf. the significant connexion between Mk 8<sup>24</sup> and 8<sup>27-28</sup>, which is clearly brought out in the emphatic ἀφ᾽ ἑαυτοῦ ἠθέλησεν of v. 31; cf. also Mk 4<sup>23</sup>, Jn 10<sup>27</sup>). The reason for this basis of progress is plain. An important element in communion being self-adjustment to God's will (cf. our Lord's own illustration of this, Mk 14<sup>26</sup> and ||), the degree of intimacy that ensues will naturally be conditioned by the extent to which this element is rendered prominent. Thus, while its neglect will open up the possibility of lapsing even to one who has been on intimate terms with Christ (Mk 14<sup>28</sup>, Jn 13<sup>36</sup>), its constant and progressive practice may bring a man to a union with God so close as to constitute his complete possession by Divine influence (cf. the Baptist's magnificent description of himself as a 'Voice,' Jn 1<sup>8</sup>, taken from Is 40<sup>3</sup>). And the fellowship so enjoyed and ever more intimately realized under the restricted conditions of earth, is to find its perfect consummation only in the hereafter (Jn 12<sup>28</sup> 14<sup>2-3</sup> 17<sup>24</sup>, cf. 1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>). See art. ABIDING.

The means by which, according to the Gospel teaching, the believer will practise this life of communion with God, may be briefly indicated. Prominent among them is seclusion from the world for the purpose of definite prayer. The importance of this our Lord emphasized by His own example. He also enjoined it upon His followers by oft-repeated precepts (Mt 6<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>7-8</sup> 28<sup>10</sup> and ||, Lk 6<sup>25</sup> 18<sup>1</sup>). At the same time the Evangelio teaching does not aim at making recluses. There are active as well as passive means of enjoying intercourse with God, and our Lord's whole training of the Twelve indicates, even more clearly than any individual saying (cf. Jn 17<sup>23</sup>), His belief in the Divine communion that is found in the service of mankind. The sense of fellowship with God vivified in secret devotion is to be realized afresh and tested in contact with men (so 1 Jn 4<sup>12-13</sup>).

Two more points call for separate attention. (1) Before His death our Lord ordained a rite which not only symbolizes the union of His followers with Himself, but is also a means of its progressive realization. If an intimate connexion between the Lord's Supper (Mk 14<sup>22c</sup>, and ||) and the Jewish Passover may, as seems reasonable, be assumed, that conception of the Christian rite which represents it as a means of communion between the individual soul and its Saviour would appear to have a basis in the foundation principle on which all ancient worship, whether Jewish or heathen, rests—the belief that to partake of a sacrifice is to enter into some kind of fellowship with the Deity. This aspect of the Lord's Supper does not, of course, exhaust its meaning (see art. LORD'S SUPPER), but it is certainly prominent, and it is emphasized both by St. Paul (1 Co 10<sup>16</sup>) and by Christ Himself (Jn 6<sup>56</sup>, where the eating would certainly include that of the Lord's Supper, even though, as is most probable, it does not refer to it exclusively).

(2) One more suggestion may be put forward. Our Lord seems to hint at a special means of communion with Himself which is really a particular extension of the self-renouncement considered above. This is a mysterious fellowship with Him in His own sufferings for mankind (Mk 10<sup>38-39</sup>; Mt 20<sup>22, 23</sup>; for a symbolical illustration see Mk 15<sup>21</sup>). It is only a hint, but the words are significant; and, taken in conjunction with St. Paul's ἀνταναπληρῶ τὰ ὑστερήματα τῶν θλίψεων τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἐν τῇ σαρκί μου (Col 1<sup>24</sup>), and his purpose τοῦ γινῶμαι . . . κοινωνῶν παθημάτων αὐτοῦ (Ph 3<sup>10</sup>; cf. also 2 Co 1<sup>4</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>13</sup>), would certainly seem to imply that the believer's own sufferings for Christ's sake may become a medium through which he may enter into close communion with his Lord.

Even this brief study will have revealed that the Gospel conception of the Christian's communion with God is essentially different from that of the Quietist. Whether we have regard to our Lord's example or to His teaching, whether we are thinking of the status of fellowship or of its conscious practice, the means by which the Divine communion is realized are not exclusively periods of secluded contemplation. In Christ's own life upon earth the two elements of active and passive fellowship are signally combined. The sense of union with the Unseen Father, fostered in lonely retreat, is also intensified in moments of strenuous activity. In His thoughts for the lives of His followers, too, the consciousness of God's presence is secured not alone by solitary worship, but also by the doing of the Divine will, by the earnest struggle to subdue the lower self, and even by active participation in the very sufferings of Christ. So the servant, as his Lord, must practise the communion of service as well as the communion of retirement (cf., again, Jn 17<sup>23</sup>). The desire for the permanent consciousness of the more immediate Presence must be sunk in the mission of carrying to others the tidings of salvation (Mk 5<sup>20-22</sup>—Lk 8<sup>22-23</sup>). It is but natural that in the moment of special revelation on the mountain the disciple should long to make it his abiding place (Mk 9<sup>9</sup> and ||); but his Master can never forget the need of service on the ordinary levels of life (Mk 9<sup>10c</sup>, and ||). And the experience of the one is the source of power for the other (Mk 9<sup>29</sup>, cf. Jn 15<sup>5</sup>).

3. Our communion one with another.—Just as our communion with God was seen to bear a close relation to our Lord's communion with the Father, so our spiritual fellowship one with another rests upon the fellowship of each with Christ. As we had occasion to point out above, communion between any two persons is possible only in virtue of some element common to the natures of both. This common possession in the case of believers is the life, the 'self,' which is called into being and ever progressively realized in their individual communion with Christ. The possibility of our spiritual fellowship with one another rests ultimately upon what He is and our relationship to what He is (see 1 Jn 1<sup>3-5</sup>, and especially 1<sup>7</sup>; cf.

also 1 Co 10<sup>16-17</sup>). His Presence is the bond of union in which we are one, and in which we realize the oneness that we possess (Mt 18<sup>20</sup>). Indeed, the two types of communion—the communion with God and the communion with our fellow-believers—react each upon the other. On the one hand, as we have just seen, our communion with men rests upon our communion with Christ; on the other hand, our Divine fellowship may be intensified (Mt 18<sup>20</sup> again and 25<sup>40</sup>) or impeded (Mt 5<sup>23-24</sup> 6<sup>19</sup> 25<sup>23</sup>, Mk 11<sup>25</sup>) by our relations with our fellow-men.

That our Lord looked for the unity of His followers is not open to question. He both prophesied it (Jn 10<sup>16</sup>) and prayed for it (17<sup>21-22</sup>). An intimate friend, clearly one of an inner circle of disciples and probably John himself, understood its attainment to be part of His purpose in dying for mankind (Jn 11<sup>52</sup>). Moreover, it is natural to suppose that the desire to ensure it would contribute to His decision to found an organized society (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>) and to institute an important rite (Mk 14<sup>22-25</sup> and 1) for those who should believe in Him. The unity of His followers was even to be one of the grounds on which He based His appeal for mankind (Jn 17<sup>21</sup>). Of His wish for this unity, therefore, there can scarcely be reasonable doubt. But when we ask in what He meant the unity to consist, agreement is not so easily reached. The expression of His followers' unity certainly includes kind and unselfish relations with one another—mutual honour and service (Mk 10<sup>45-46</sup> = Mt 20<sup>26-28</sup>), mutual forgiveness (Mt 6<sup>14</sup>, Lk 17<sup>4</sup>), mutual love (Jn 13<sup>34</sup> 15<sup>12</sup>). It is exemplified further by participation in the common work (Jn 4<sup>34-38</sup>). Another very special means of its realization, the Lord's Supper, we have already indicated. Although this particular aspect of the rite is not actually revealed in the Gospel narrative itself, it will scarcely be questioned that one of the great truths which it both signifies and secures, is that of the fellowship of Christ's followers. The sacred service in which the believer may realize communion with His Lord (see § 2 above), is also a means by which he is to apprehend his oneness with all other believers (see 1 Co 10<sup>17</sup>).

While, however, it is plain that in Christ's teaching the communion of Christians is at once attested and secured by means like these, it is disputed whether He designed their unity to be simply a spiritual or also an external one. Three important passages may be very briefly considered. (1) Jn 10<sup>16</sup> affords no support to the upholders of an external unity. The true rendering is unquestionably, 'They shall become one flock' (RV; cf. 'finsale and Coverdale), and not, 'There shall be one fold' (AV; cf. Vulgate). The unity mentioned here is one that is realized in the personal relation of each member of the flock to the Great Shepherd Himself.—(2) There is teaching a little more definite in Jn 17<sup>21</sup> and 22. In both these places our Lord makes His own unity with the Father the exemplar of the unity of believers. Reverence forbids any dogmatic statement as to the point to which this sacred analogy can be pressed. But Christ's own words in the immediate context contain suggestions as to His meaning in using the analogy. It is noticeable that here also, as in Jn 10<sup>16</sup>, the underlying basis of unity is the believer's personal relation to Christ (and the Father). 'That they may be one, even as we are one,' in v. 22 is at once defined more closely in the words, 'I in them, and thou in me' (v. 23). The resultant unity is gained through the medium not of an external, but of a purely spiritual, condition (ἵνα ὁμοῦν ἕνωσιν ἔσται ἐν ἐμοῦ, v. 23). In the same way, in the statement of v. 11 it is a spiritual relationship to God that will yield the unity Christ craves for His disciples. This unity will follow upon their being 'kept ἐν τῷ ὄνοματι σου.' It will be assured if their relationship to the Father is a counterpart of what had been their relationship to Christ (v. 13), i.e. a personal relationship. Whatever, therefore, be the exact meaning which the analogy used by our Lord was intended to convey, His own language in the context appears to make it plain that it must be interpreted with a spiritual rather than with an external significance.—(3) This conclusion derives not a little support from the incident of Mk 9<sup>38-40</sup>. When a definite test case arose, He declared the real fellowship of His followers to depend not upon any outward bond of union between them, but upon each bearing such a relationship to Himself as would be involved in His working ἐν τῷ ὄνοματι σου. True, the man in question may not have been a nominal disciple of our Lord, but that in His view he was a real disciple is distinctly stated (v. 40). This instance, therefore, may be regarded as a practical application on the part of Christ Himself of the teaching under consideration; and thus it strongly confirms the interpretation that we have put upon it. It would be outside the scope of the present article to consider arguments for or against the corporate unity of Christians drawn from other sources, some of which are very strong and all of which must, of course, be duly weighed before a fair judgment on the whole question can be reached. But so far as the subject-matter before us is concerned, we find it hard to resist the conclusion that such external unity formed no part of the teaching of Christ and the Gospels.

One word must be added. The 'communion of saints' joins the believer not merely to his fellow-Christians upon earth, but also to those who have passed within the veil (cf. He 12<sup>1</sup>). This aspect of communion is not emphasized in the Gospels, but there are indications that the fellowship of believers upon earth was linked in the thought of Christ to the yet closer fellowship of those beyond death. At any rate, it is worthy of notice that in instituting the sacred rite which, as we have seen, at once witnesses to and secures our communion one with another, our Lord carefully pointed forward to the reunion that will take place in the world to come (Mt 26<sup>29</sup>; note μεθ' ὑμῶν); and that in a few suggestive words He represented the earthly gathering as incomplete apart from its final consummation in the heavenly kingdom (Lk 22<sup>16</sup>). COMPLACENCY.—
 Of Scripture words expressive of the idea of complacency as distinguished from benevolence, we find in the Heb. of the OT פָּדָה, פָּדָה, variously rendered in the LXX by ἠγάπη ἐν, or by some derivative of the verb ἀγαπάω. In the NT the expressions used are ἀγάπη, ἔλεος, ἰσχυροῦς, ἐλεος, ἀγάπη. The words ἀγάπη, ἔλεος are also used in this sense. In the OT we find פָּדָה 'take pleasure in,' in 1 S 15<sup>22</sup> 14. In the LXX by the phrase ἠγάπη ἐν, where Saul's servants say to David, 'Behold the king taketh pleasure in thee,' meaning that he was willing to regard with satisfaction a matrimonial alliance between David and Saul's daughter. Similarly the word פָּדָה 'delight,' is rendered by the same Gr. equivalent in 1 Ch 28<sup>4</sup>, where David says of God, 'He liked me to make me king.' פָּדָה is used of God's pleasure in the work of the Servant of Jehovah in Is 42<sup>1</sup>, where the LXX reads ἀγαπήσθε αὐτὸν ὡς ψυχὴν μου, 'my soul has accepted him'; St. Matthew, on the other hand, translates the whole phrase פָּדָה רָצוֹן בְּיָדָי בְּאֵימָנוֹתַי מִן הַיָּם, rightly rendered in the AV 'my beloved, in whom my soul is well pleased.' Here, apparently, the thought of the LXX inclines more to the idea of the Divine act of will by which the Servant of God was appointed to his mission, while St. Matthew emphasizes the love with which, because of His redemptive work, the Father regards His Son, and so he prefers 'my beloved' to 'mine elect' as a rendering of אהובי (Mt 12:18). In other passages also where the word פָּגַע is used, as in Is 63:10, the LXX makes prominent the idea of the good pleasure of the Father's will.

COMPLACENCY

Again פָּגַע is used in Pr 16:7 of the favour with which God regards the ways of the righteous, where the LXX renders the passage, 'The ways of righteous men are acceptable (to) the Lord'; and the AV, 'When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him.'

In the NT, where ἀρέσκω, ἀρέσκω, are used, it is not always apparent how far the thought of complacency and how far that of will or choice is predominant. Ἐδέξατο evidently occurs in the latter sense in those passages which refer to election, the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God. So Eph 1:5, Ph 2:13 etc. According to Cremer, ἀρέσκω (1) relates to a determination when it is followed by an infinitive, Lc 12:29. (2) Where the matter under consideration is the relation of the subject to an object, the latter is expressed in profane Greek by the dative, rarely by the addition of εἰς. . . . In the NT the accusative occurs only in He 10:5 (from Ps 40:7), and here ἀρέσκω is obviously parallel to ἀγαπάω. 'Elsewhere it . . . So in Mt 37:1 Mt 14:1 Lk 22, and again Mt 17. "This mode of indicating the object is justified by the circumstance that ἀρέσκω may be classed among the verbs which denote an emotion, a mood, a sentiment, directed towards another one—to take pleasure in something, to have an inclination towards it."

'Complacency,' as the word is commonly used, means a state of being pleased or gratified, and is synonymous with 'pleasure,' 'gratification,' 'satisfaction.' The appropriateness of such a word in the department of Biblical theology is suggested by what we know to be its recognized use in the sphere of ethics. Complacency, as a mental state, arises when there is perceived in the object contemplated some quality or qualities which call forth a feeling of pleasure or satisfaction. The object may be something without, upon which the mind can rest with pleasure, or it may be in the mind itself, when, in seasons of reflexion, thought turned inwards upon itself is in a condition of perfect harmony, finding in itself no jarring element. The mind or soul is self-complacent when it is at peace with itself, satisfied that all is as it ought to be, no disturbing or self-accusing thoughts arising. Again, the mind is said to regard with complacency any outward object, animate or inanimate, which suggests thoughts of order and beauty, as when it is affected with pleasure or contentment by the contemplation of the beauty of nature, of a fair landscape, or of the harmony of earth and sky. The word applies also to relations between intelligent beings, as between friends, between husband and wife, parent and child, brothers and sisters, when one is satisfied with the character, or state of health, or conduct, or prosperity of the object of his affection or interest. Complacency arises in the mind when one's efforts in any direction are successful, and the object aimed at is attained. The artist, or the composer in prose, poetry, or music, regards his work with complacency when he has succeeded in giving adequate expression to his ideas, the workman when he is successful in his workmanship, the merchant or tradesman when his enterprise accomplishes the end at which he aims, the philanthropist when his efforts for the material or moral or spiritual well-being of the objects of his interest are rewarded, and he sees the fruits of his labours in the happiness and the gratitude of his fellows.

In ethics, complacency is considered as one of the forms of love, and as such is distinguished from benevolence. The distinction is well put by Edwards in his 'Dissertation concerning the Nature of True Virtue' (Works, ed. London, 1834, vol. i. pp. 123-125):

'Love is commonly distinguished into love of benevolence and love of complacency. Love of benevolence is that affection or propensity of the heart to any being which causes it to incline to its wellbeing, or dispose it to desire and take pleasure in its happiness. And if I mistake not, it is agreeable to the common opinion that beauty in the object is not always the ground of that propensity; but that there may be a disposition to the welfare of those that are not considered as beautiful, unless mere existence be accounted a beauty. And benevolence to be prior to the beauty of many of its objects, but to their existence; so as to be the ground both of their existence and of their beauty, rather than the foundation of God's benevolence; as it is supposed that it is God's goodness which moved Him to give them both being and beauty. So that, if all virtue primarily consists in that affection of heart to being which is exercised in benevolence, or an inclination to its good, then God's virtue is so extended as to include a propensity not only to being actually existing, and actually beautiful, but to possible being, so as to incline Him to give a being beauty and happiness.

What is commonly called love of complacency, presupposes beauty. For it is no other than delight in beauty, or complacency in the person or being beloved for his beauty. . . . When any one under the influence of general benevolence sees another being possessed of the like general benevolence, this attaches his heart to him, and draws forth greater love to him than merely his having existence; because so far as the being beloved has love to the being in general, so far his own being is, as it were, enlarged, extends to, and in some sort comprehends, being in general, and therefore he that is governed by love to being in general must of necessity have complacency in him; and the greater degree of benevolence to him, as it were out of gratitude to him for his love to general existence, that his own heart is extended and united to, and so looks on his interest as its own. It is because his heart is thus united to being in general that he looks on a benevolent propensity to being in general, wherever he sees it, as the beauty of the being in whom it is; an excellency that renders him worthy of esteem, complacency, and the greater goodwill. . . . This spiritual beauty, which is but a secondary ground of virtuous benevolence, is the ground, not only of benevolence but complacency, and is the primary ground of the latter; that is, when the complacency is spiritual. Love is in particular, and is understood, may be a secondary ground, but this is the primary objective foundation of it. . . . He that has true virtue, consisting in benevolence to being in general and in benevolence to virtuous being, must necessarily have a supreme love to God, both of benevolence and complacency.'

According to this exposition, complacency as a moral quality is the result, for the most part, of benevolence reacting upon itself, love making the object beloved become worthy of affection. What one loved at first out of mere benevolence becomes an object morally beautiful, worthy of love, and thus an object of complacency. Scripture illustrations of the Divine love as benevolence and as complacency naturally suggest themselves, and enable us to understand how the latter is often the fruit of the former. The work of Creation is a typical instance of the benevolence of God, the Almighty forming the world out of nothing, bringing light out of darkness, beauty out of chaos, life out of death. When, at the completion of His work, God beheld the product of His benevolence, and pronounced all very good, He showed complacency. So also with regard to the work of Redemption, God's love to the ruined world (Jn 3:16) was the love of benevolence. His love to sinners as redeemed, made a new creation by that love, is the love of complacency (Mt 3:17).

Keeping this distinction in view, we find in the Gospels not a few instances in which the expression 'complacency' may be fitly applied to describe that particular aspect of the love of God, or of the love of Jesus Christ, or even that feeling of grateful affection and devotion which the Divine love kindles in the hearts of true believers, to which the Evangelists direct our attention. If complacency means pleasure in the contemplation of beauty, or pleasure in the results of benevolence, (1) the expression may with all propriety be in these respects used to describe the love of God the Father to God the Son, or again the love with which the Father contemplates the fruits of the Divine work of redemption in the hearts and lives of the redeemed. (2) It may be applied also to the witness of Jesus to His own character, life, and work, and to His gracious acceptance of the faith and devotion of His disciples. (3) Lastly, it is appropriate as a description of the joy and peace with which believers realize the love of God and the grace of Christ, and of their satisfaction with the all-sufficiency of the Redeemer's work.

1. The love of God the Father to God the Son, especially with regard to His life and ministry.—The ineffable love, with which from all eternity the Father has regarded the Son, is referred to in those passages which speak of the glory which Christ had with the Father before the world was (Jn 17<sup>24</sup>), or which describe Christ as 'the only-begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father' (1<sup>3</sup>). But the Divine complacency, in the aspect of delight in the contemplation of the beauty of Christ's character and work, is that upon which special emphasis is laid in the Gospels, in which our attention is carefully directed to the Father's interest in the ministry of His Son, and to His sympathy and satisfaction with Christ's perfect submission to His will, in connexion with His voluntary humiliation and suffering for the sake of man. And, it is worthy of special note, it is in this connexion that we find the expression 'be well pleased,' 'take pleasure in' (εὐδοκεῖν ἐν), where text and context plainly indicate that the thought of complacency is intended, as distinguished from the other sense in which the words εὐδοκεῖν, εὐδοκία occur in the NT, that of the Divine election, the will or purpose of God, 'His mere good pleasure.' The Gospels mention two occasions on which the words, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased,' were uttered by the voice of God Himself.

At the Baptism, God spoke thus (Mt 3<sup>17</sup> || Mk 1<sup>11</sup> || Lk 3<sup>22</sup>). By these words He testified the peculiar pleasure with which He regarded His Son at the moment of His consecration to His mission; His satisfaction with the spirit of submission to the Father's will which had characterized Jesus throughout the years of obscurity during which He prepared Himself for His ministry, and the lowliness with which He submitted to the baptism of John—because thus it became Him 'to fulfil all righteousness'; and His gracious acceptance of the voluntary offering which the Son now made to the Father. It was the moment of consecration to that ministry of humiliation to fulfil which Christ had come into the world. Therefore, in token of His acceptance of that act of submission, which spoke thus, 'Lo, I come to do thy will, O God,' the Father spoke thus from heaven in the audience of men and angels, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.' We may not, indeed, here or in the other case in which this voice from heaven was heard, leave out of sight the additional thought suggested by the tense of the last word, εὐδοκῆσα, the Greek aorist—the thought, that is, of the complacency with which from all eternity the Father had regarded the Son. But this is the central thought of the passage, the peculiar pleasure with which the Father contemplated the Son's voluntary humiliation, His submission to the Law, and His resolve to fulfil all righteousness by a life of lowliest service.

Again, with equal appropriateness these words were used in the parallel case of the Transfiguration (Mt 17<sup>5</sup>, cf. Mk 9<sup>7</sup>, Lk 9<sup>29</sup>), when Jesus entered upon the final stage of His ministry. Then, in full view of the cross, at the close of our Lord's conference with Moses and Elijah concerning 'his decease which he was about to accomplish at Jerusalem,' that Divine voice spoke in the audience of Jesus and the three disciples. Thus a second time God set the seal of His Divine approval to His Son's submission, and testified to the complacency with which He regarded His resolve by His death to make atonement for the sins of the world.

In this connexion may be noted also those passages in which Jesus speaks of the glory of God in the triumph of redeeming love. Such are: Jn 10<sup>17</sup> 'Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life that I might take it again'; 13<sup>31-32</sup> 'Now is the Son of Man glorified, and God is glorified in him, and God shall glorify him in himself, and shall straightway glorify him'; to which may be added St. Matthew's tr. of Is 42<sup>1</sup> in Mt 12<sup>18</sup> 'My beloved, in whom my soul is well pleased.'

The thought of God's complacency in connexion with His contemplation of the fruits of Christ's redemptive work in the regeneration and reconciliation of the world is suggested by the closing words of the Angels' Song (Lk 24<sup>4</sup> RV), 'on earth peace among men in whom he is well pleased' (ἐν τῷ γῆς εὐφροῦν ἐν ἀποστόλοις εὐδοκίας), where again we find the technical word, if such it may be called, for this aspect of the Divine love.

It is now very generally admitted that this is the sense in which εὐδοκία, bonae voluntatis, ought to be rendered. That is to say, here we have the assurance of another voice from heaven, a message expressly sent at the time of our Lord's nativity, for the comfort of those who waited for the consolation of Israel, of the complacent regard with which the Father, contemplating the objects of His grace, looked upon them as identified with His well-beloved Son. 'The eye of God could again with complacency rest upon mankind,' regarding them as being represented by His incarnate Son, and in view of that state of spiritual excellence to which His work was destined to raise them. The expression is thus used in an ideal or prophetic sense, not of mankind as they actually were, but of the objects of the Divine love as, through their Representative, they should yet become.

The same thought, that of the pleasure which God the Father takes in the spiritual welfare of His children, is suggested by passages which speak of God's joy over the return of penitent sinners. Such are: Jn 10<sup>17</sup>, Lk 15<sup>7-10, 22, 24-25</sup> (in the parables of the Lost Sheep, the Lost Coin, and the Prodigal Son, in which vv. 22, 23 are especially notable, where Jesus mentions the joy of the father over the son's return, and the reason which the father gives for that joy: 'It was meet that we should make merry, and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found'); our Lord's assurance in another place that the prayer of the Publican was accepted of God (Lk 18<sup>14</sup>); and again His testimony that prayer and almsgiving, if prompted by the right spirit, are rewarded by the Father who seeth in secret (Mt 6<sup>6-9</sup>).

2. (a) Christ is represented as regarding with complacency His own character and work, and His perfect harmony with the Father.—This appears in many passages, especially in the discourses recorded by St. John. In conversation with the Woman of Samaria, Jesus declares that He only can bestow the gift of living water which the soul of man requires; and, in connexion with the same incident, tells His disciples that it is His meat and drink to do the Father's will and to finish His work (Jn 4<sup>34-35</sup>). Again He says to the Jews that He is in full accord with His Father in respect of will and of work (5<sup>17-19</sup>), that 'the Father loveth the Son, and showeth him all things that himself doeth. . . . That all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father' (vv. 20-22). In His discourse on the Bread of Life (ch. 6) we find expressions indicative of His conviction that His work is in all respects well pleasing to the Father (v. 57<sup>a</sup>). He challenges His adversaries to convict Him of sin (8<sup>4</sup>). He enjoys perfect communion with the Father (7<sup>28-29</sup>). He claims that the Father glorifies Him, and bears witness of Him (8<sup>18</sup>, cf. vv. 14-16). He declares that He only is the Good Shepherd, and all that came before Him were thieves and robbers (10<sup>1, 2, 8</sup>, cf. vv. 11, 14). He speaks of the excellence and thoroughness of His work, and of the satisfaction with which the Father regards it (10<sup>17<sup>a</sup></sup>). He speaks of the success of His mission, and testifies the complacency with which He surveys His ministry. On the night of the betrayal He declares that hostility to Himself means hostility to the Father (14<sup>21-24</sup> 15<sup>23</sup>). A distinct note of triumph marks His closing utterances. So in 12<sup>28c</sup>, cf. 13<sup>31c</sup>; and again, when He bids His disciples be of good cheer, for that He has overcome the world (16<sup>33</sup>). Addressing the Father Himself in His intercessory prayer, He says: 'I have glorified thee on the earth: I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do' (17<sup>4</sup>); and again, speaking of the disciples: 'Those that thou gavest me I have kept, and none of them is lost, but the son of perdition' (v. 12). Lastly, one of His last words from the cross is the exclamation of triumph, 'It is finished' (19<sup>30</sup>). The force of such passages cannot be mistaken. They show the Christ seeing 'of the travail of his soul,' and expressing Himself as 'satisfied,' His complacency, as He surveys the work of redemption, appearing as a true parallel to the judgment pronounced by God upon the work of creation, when 'God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good' (Gn 1<sup>31</sup>).

With the instances cited above may be compared in this connection such a passage as that where Jesus, confirming the joy of the seventy disciples in the success of their mission, says: 'I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven. . . . Notwithstanding in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rather rejoice that your names are written in heaven' (Lk 10<sup>21-23</sup>).

(3) Jesus further expresses complacency with respect to the wisdom of His Divine counsels, and as He contemplated the fruits of His work in the hearts of believers. With regard to the first point, we note that which St. Matthew and St. Luke record—Christ's ascription of praise to the Father who 'hid these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes' (Mt 13<sup>35</sup>; Lk 10<sup>21c</sup>). With regard to the second, instances abound in the Gospels. Thus Jesus testified the pleasure with which He regarded the faith of Peter, as when at the first He welcomed him, and showed him what he should yet become (Jn 1<sup>42</sup>, cf. Lk 5<sup>27</sup>); and when, towards the end of His ministry, He accepted Peter's confession (Mt 16<sup>17-19</sup>). He showed gracious appreciation of the character and devoutness of Nathanael (Jn 1<sup>47-48</sup>).

Again, an illustration of complacency is found in the blessing pronounced by our Lord upon little children (Mt 19<sup>13</sup> || Mk 10<sup>13</sup> || Lk 18<sup>15</sup> || cf. Mt 18<sup>26c</sup> || Lk 9<sup>47-48</sup>); while the value which He attached to their faith and devotion is clearly shown in the incident of the children in the Temple, when Jesus silenced the cavils of the Pharisees and priests, and demanded, 'Have ye never read, Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise!'

3. Of complacency on the part of man, considered as a virtue, i.e. pleasure in the contemplation of moral and spiritual beauty, we find one notable illustration in the Gospels, in the Baptist's testimony to Jesus in Jn 1<sup>35</sup>, where John expresses his pleasure in the success of Christ's ministry, and compares Jesus to the bridegroom and himself to the friend of the bridegroom, who 'rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice.' Such complacency as that, sympathetic interest in the Saviour and His scheme of salvation, and grateful acquiescence in the will of God for man's salvation, is alone legitimate on the part of fallen man. As to complacency in view of man's own knowledge and attainments, Jesus teaches that it is wholly inadmissible. No man, in the imperfect state of this present life, has a right to be satisfied with himself. Self-complacency is a sure sign of ignorance and spiritual blindness. The penitent publican, who the complacent Pharisee, is justified of God (Lk 18<sup>11-14</sup>). The followers of Jesus must, when they have done all, confess that they are unprofitable servants (Lk 17<sup>10c</sup>); and Jesus, while generously acknowledging the faithfulness of His disciples and assuring them that they shall in nowise lose their reward, expressly warns them that the last may be first and the first last (Mt 19<sup>30</sup> || Mk 10<sup>31</sup>, cf. Mt 20<sup>16</sup>).

CONCEPTION.—See VIRGIN BIRTH.

CONDEMNATION.—The disappearance of the term 'damnation' in the RV of the Gospels is suggestive of more sober and reasonable thoughts about the Divine judgment against sin. Condemnation at the last may indeed fall like a thunderbolt upon the rejected (Mt 21<sup>19</sup>). The fig-tree in the parable has a time of probation and then may be suddenly cut down (Lk 13<sup>6-9</sup>). At the Day of Judgment the universal benevolence of God experienced here (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>, Lk 6<sup>35</sup>) will give place to His righteous wrath against the persistently rebellious. Condemnation is the irrevocable sentence then passed upon the abusers of this life (Mt 25<sup>41-46</sup>). Especially will this sentence of rejection and punishment descend then upon the hypocrite (Mk 12<sup>40</sup>). The state of the condemned will be a veritable Gehenna (Mt 23<sup>33</sup>). Woeeping and gnashing of teeth picture the dreadful condition of condemned souls (Mt 22<sup>13</sup> 24<sup>51</sup> 25<sup>30</sup>). Not only, we must suppose, punishment by pain for rebellion, but regret at past indifference, remorse at past folly, shame at past malice, will be the terrible feelings lacerating souls that have found not forgiveness but condemnation. The condemned will regret their indifference to Christ's demands, which they have ignored (Jn 3<sup>36</sup>). They will be tortured by the keen perception of their extreme folly in rejecting the knowledge they might have used (Lk 13<sup>34, 35</sup>). They will feel the shame of having their secret thoughts of evil exposed to a light broader than that of day (Mt 23<sup>28</sup>). This will be the condemnation to perpetual darkness for those who have loved darkness more than the light (Mt 8<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>28</sup> 22<sup>29</sup>).

But in this present life there is always at work a certain inevitable and automatic Divine condemnation. 'The earth beareth fruit of herself' (ἀνθρωπότης, Mk 4<sup>28</sup>), and yet the fact is due to the directing will of God. So, even in this life, the Divine condemnation of evil is being worked out, without that irrevocable sentence which constitutes the final condemnation. The guest may already feel the lack of a wedding-garment (Mt 22<sup>11</sup>), and so, warned by the present workings of condemnation, escape the last dread sentence. Nothing but what God approves can endure the stresses and storms that are imminent (Lk 6<sup>46-48</sup>). Without the sap of God's favour the vine must already begin to wither (Jn 15<sup>5</sup>).

But this present immanent condemnation is rather a most merciful conviction of sin and wrongfulness (Jn 16<sup>8-11</sup>). In this present age condemnation is not final for any; nay, God's purpose is the eternal security of men in true peace and true happiness (Jn 3<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>47</sup>). So far from condemnation being any man's sure fate, there is no need for any member of the human family to have to undergo such judgment as might result in condemnation (Jn 6<sup>37</sup>). The strong assertion in the present ending to the second Gospel, 'He that believeth shall be condemned' (Mk 16<sup>16</sup>), is surely the expression of the true conviction that Christ is the only Way to avoid condemnation (cf. Jn 3<sup>36</sup>). Condemnation is God's prerogative, and not the privilege or duty of the individual Christian as such: 'Condemn not, and ye shall not be condemned' (Lk 6<sup>37</sup>). W. B. FRANKLAND.

CONFESSION (of Christ).—The words 'confess' and 'confession' are employed in common usage to express not only an acknowledgment of sin, but an acknowledgment or profession of faith. The AV affords many illustrations of this use, and the examples are still more numerous in the RV, which in several passages has quite consistently substituted 'confess' and 'confession' for 'profess' and 'profession' of the AV in the rendering of ἁπολογία, ἁπολογία (2 Co 9<sup>13</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>6</sup>, He 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>29</sup>). A corresponding twofold use of terms meets us in the original, the verbs ἁπολογέω and ἐξομολογέω being used to denote both confession of sin and confession of faith (e.g. for ἁπολογία, Mt 10<sup>32</sup> and 1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>; for ἐξομολογέω, Mt 3<sup>9</sup> and Ja 5<sup>16</sup>). The noun ἁπολογία, however, in NT Greek is employed only with reference to the confession of faith.

In the OT it is Jehovah who is the personal object of the confessions of faith which we find on the lips of psalmists and prophets (e.g. Ps 71 48<sup>1</sup>, Is 12 61<sup>1</sup> and passim); but in the NT it is Jesus Christ whom men are constantly challenged to confess, and it is around His person that the confession of faith invariably gathers. This lies in the very nature of the case, since personal faith in Jesus Christ constitutes the essence of Christianity, and confession is the necessary utterance of faith (Ro 10<sup>9</sup>, cf. Mt 12<sup>24</sup>).

I. WHAT IS MEANT BY THE CONFESSION OF CHRIST.—In the earlier period of the ministry of Jesus the faith of His followers did not rise above the belief that He was the long-expected Messiah; and it was this conviction which was expressed in their confessions. Typical at this stage are the words of Andrew, 'We have found the Messiah' (Jn 1<sup>41</sup>). It is true that even in this earlier period Jesus is sometimes addressed or spoken of as the 'Son of God' (Jn 1<sup>34-36</sup>, Mt 8<sup>29</sup> 14<sup>33</sup>); but it is not probable that in these cases we are to understand the expression otherwise than as a recognized Messianic term (cf. Ps 2<sup>7</sup>), so that it does not amount to more than a recognition that Jesus is the Christ. And yet even this was a great thing—to see in the man of Nazareth the Messiah of prophecy and hope. It marked the dividing line between those who believed in Jesus and those who believed Him not. St. John tells us that the Jews had agreed that if any man should confess Jesus to be Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue (Jn 9<sup>22</sup>); that they actually cast out, for making such a confession, the blind man whom Jesus had cured (9<sup>34</sup>); and that through fear of excommunication many of the chief rulers who believed in His Messiahship refrained from the confession of their faith (12<sup>42</sup>). It was no small thing to confess that Jesus was the Christ, crude and unspiritual in most cases as the notions of His Messiahship might still be.

But in the minds of the Apostles, though crude ideas were far from vanishing altogether (cf. Mt 20<sup>20</sup>, Mk 10<sup>28</sup>, Lk 22<sup>24</sup>), there had gradually grown up a larger and deeper conception of their Master's person and dignity; and St. Peter's grand utterance at Caesarea Philippi, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God' (Mt 16<sup>16</sup>); cf. Jn 6<sup>69</sup>), shows a great extension of spiritual content in the confession of Christ, as our Lord's language on the occasion plainly implies. The Apostle's language seems to unfold, in germ at least, the doctrine of Christ's divinity; and it formed the high-water mark of Apostolic faith and profession in the pre-Resurrection days.

After the Resurrection had taken place, faith in that transcendent fact, and readiness to bear witness to it, were henceforth implied in the confession of Christ (Jn 20<sup>28-29</sup>, Ro 10<sup>9</sup>). But while any profession of faith would have as its implicate the acceptance of the great facts of the historical tradition, all that was actually demanded of converts at first may have been the confession, 'Jesus is Lord' (1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>; cf. Ph 2<sup>11</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>); a confession of which an echo perhaps meets us in their being baptized 'into (or in) the name of the Lord' (εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ, Ac 8<sup>16</sup> 19<sup>5</sup>; εἰς τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ κυρίου, 10<sup>48</sup>). At a later time the growth of heretical opinions rendered it necessary to formulate the beliefs of the Church more exactly, and to demand a fuller and more precise confession on the part of those who professed to be Christ's disciples. In the Johannine Epistles a confession on the one hand that 'Jesus Christ is come in the flesh' (1 Jn 4<sup>2-3</sup>, 2 Jn 7), and on the other that 'Jesus is the Son of God' (1 Jn 4<sup>14</sup>), is represented as essential to the evidence of a true and saving Christian faith. With this developed Johannine type of confession may be compared the later gloss that has been attached to the narrative of the baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch (Ac 8<sup>37</sup>, see RVm), which is not improbably the reproduction of a formula of question and answer which had come to be employed as a baptismal confession in the early Church.

It may be noticed here that it was out of the confession of personal faith which was demanded of the candidate for baptism that the formulated 'Confessions' of the Church appear to have sprung. There can be little doubt that the so-called Apostles' Creed was originally a baptismal confession. And Hort, Harnack, and others have shown that what is known as the Nicene Creed is in reality not the original creed of the bishops of Nicea, but a creed which gradually grew up in the East out of the struggles of the Church with varying shapes of heresy, and the nucleus of which is probably to be sought in the baptismal formula of the Jerusalem Church (Hort, Two Dissertations, ii.; Harnack, History of Dogma, iii. 209; Herzog-Haacke, Realencycl., art. 'Konstantinopolitanisches Symbol').

ii. THE IMPORTANCE ATTACHED TO THE CONFESSION OF CHRIST.—We see this (1) in the teaching of Christ Himself. He showed the value He set upon it not only by the deep solemnity of His affirmations upon the subject, but by expressing the truth in a double form, both positively and negatively, declaring that the highest conceivable honour awaits every one who confesses Him before men, and the doom of unspeakable shame all those who are guilty of denying Him (Mt 10<sup>32, 33</sup>, Lk 12<sup>9</sup>; cf. Mk 8<sup>38</sup>). We see it in the pathos of the warning He gave St. Peter of the approaching denial (Mt 26<sup>34</sup>; cf. Mk 14<sup>30</sup>, Lk 22<sup>34</sup>, Jn 13<sup>38</sup>), in the look He cast upon him when the crowing of the cock recalled that warning to his mind (Lk 22<sup>34</sup>), in the Apostle's bitter tears as he remembered and thought upon the word of the Lord (Mt 26<sup>75</sup>, Mk 14<sup>72</sup>, Lk 22<sup>61, 62</sup>), and in the thrice-repeated 'Lovest thou me?' (Jn 21<sup>15-17</sup>) recalling the threefold transgression. But, above all, we see it in the words addressed at Caesarea Philippi to this same Apostle, who, though afterwards he fell so far in an hour of weakness, rose nevertheless on this occasion to the height of a glorious confession (Mt 16<sup>17-19</sup>). The evident emotion of Jesus at St. Peter's language, the thrill of glad surprise which seems to have shot through Him and which quivers through the benediction into which He burst, the great benediction itself,—these things show the supreme worth He attached to this confession of His strong Apostle. But especially we see the significance of St. Peter's utterance in the everlasting promise which Christ then gave to him merely, but to all who should hereafter believe on His name and confess Him after a like fashion: 'Upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it' (v. 18). Whether the 'rock' is St. Peter's confession or St. Peter himself is a matter of little moment; for if the latter is meant, it is undoubtedly as a type of believing confession that the Apostle receives the splendid promise, and it is on the firm foundation of such confession as his that Jesus declares that His Church shall be built.

The view of a certain class of critical scholars (e.g. Holtzmann, Zeitachr. f. wis. Theol. xxi. p. 202; Harnack, History of Dogma, i. p. 73 n. 2; Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, ii. p. 321 n.) that Mt 16<sup>18</sup> are not authentic utterances of Jesus, but a subsequent addition intended to canonize the dogmatic and constitutional situation of a later age, is not one that commends itself to those who do not accept the views as to the composition of the First Gospel which are represented by these writers and by Holtzmann in particular. There is no textual ground for objecting to the authenticity of the words, while there are very strong psychological grounds for accepting such words as true. See the admirable remarks of Prof. Bruce, Expos. Gr. Test., in loc.

(2) If Jesus laid great stress upon the confession of Himself, the importance of such confession is not less prominent in the teaching of the Apostles. Even if baptism 'into the name of the Lord Jesus' did not imply an explicit confession of Jesus as Lord (though this seems by no means improbable), at all events the Christian baptism which meets us constantly from the earliest days of the Church (Acts, passim) clearly involved, in the relations of Christianity whether to the Jewish or the Gentile world, a confessing of Christ before men. St. Paul makes very plain his conviction that, in order to salvation, believing with the heart must be accompanied by confession with the mouth (Ro 10<sup>9, 10</sup>), though he also enlarges our conception of the forms which confession may take when he finds a confession of the Christian gospel not only in words spoken but in liberal gifts cheerfully bestowed for the service of the Church (2 Co 9<sup>13</sup>). In 1 Timothy he commends the young minister of the Church in Ephesus because he had 'confessed the good confession in the sight of many witnesses' (6<sup>12</sup>), and finds in this matter the perfect example for Christian imitation in the 'good confession' which Christ Jesus Himself witnessed before Pontius Pilate (v. 13); while in 2 Timothy we have an evident re-echo of the Lord's own language in the warning, 'If we shall deny him, he also will deny us' (2<sup>12</sup>).

In the Epistle to the Hebrews Jesus is described as 'the Apostle and High Priest of our confession' (3<sup>1</sup>), and that confession the author exhorts his readers to hold fast (4<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>23</sup>). In the Johannine Epistles, as we have seen, confession begins to assume a more theological form than heretofore, but the writer is not less emphatic than those who have preceded him in insisting upon its spiritual value. In one place it is said to be the proof of the presence of the Spirit of God (1 Jn 4<sup>7</sup>), and in another it becomes not the proof merely, but the very condition of the abiding in God and God in man (v. 16).

iii. THE REASON FOR THE IMPORTANCE ATTACHED TO CONFESSION.—When we ask why such supreme value is set upon confession by Christ and His Apostles and all through the NT there are various considerations which suggest themselves. (1) Confession is nothing else than the obverse side of faith. The two necessarily go together, for they are really one and the same spiritual magnitude in its inward and outward aspects. The word of faith, as St. Paul says, is at once in the mouth and in the heart (Ro 10<sup>8</sup>), and whatever value belongs to faith as a vital and saving power necessarily belongs to confession also. (2) It is the evidence of faith. Like all living things, faith must give evidence of itself, and confession is one of its most certain and convincing signs. According to St. Paul, it belongs to the very spirit of faith to believe and therefore to speak (2 Co 4<sup>13</sup>); and if the readiness to confess Christ begins to fail, we may take it as a sure evidence that faith itself is failing. How significant here are the words of Jesus to St. Peter just before He warned him of the sifting trial which was near at hand, 'Simon, Simon, behold Satan asked to have you that he might sift you as wheat: but I made supplication for thee that thy faith fail not' (Lk 22<sup>31, 32</sup>). (3) It is a test of courage and devotion. A hard test it often is; witness St. Peter's fall. But it is by hard trials that the soldier of Christ learns to endure hardness, and gains the unflinching strength which enables him to confess the good confession in the sight of many witnesses (1 Ti 6<sup>12</sup>), and not be ashamed of the testimony of our Lord (2 Ti 1<sup>8</sup>). (4) It has a wonderful power to quicken faith. It both begets faith and quickens faith in others, as we shall see presently; but what we are speaking of now is its reactive influence upon the believer himself. It is a matter of common experience that nothing transforms pale belief into strong full-blooded conviction like the confession of belief in the presence of others. Something is due to the shaping power of speech upon thought, but even more to the definite committal of oneself before one's fellows, and the kindling influences which come from the contact of soul with soul. And it is not till men have publicly confessed their belief in Christ that faith rises to its highest power, so that 'belief unto righteousness' becomes 'confession unto salvation' (Ro 10<sup>10</sup>). It is to the psychological experiences that were naturally attendant on the public confession of Christ that we must attribute much of the language used in the NT with regard to the effect of baptism upon the soul (Ac 22<sup>16</sup>, Ro 6<sup>3a</sup>, Gal 3<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>13</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>21</sup>). And it is worth noting how the author of Hebrews connects in the same sentence holding fast 'the confession of our hope' and drawing near to God in 'fulness' or 'full assurance' of faith (He 10<sup>22-23</sup>, cf. 1<sup>14-15</sup>).

(5) But, above all, the value attached to confession in the NT seems to lie in the fact that it is the great Church-building power. The grand typical case of confession of Christ is that of St. Peter at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16<sup>13-19</sup>); and this was the occasion on which Jesus for the first time spoke of His Church, and declared that on the rock of Christian confession that Church was to be built (v. 18). So it proved to be in after days. It was by St. Peter's powerful testimony to Jesus as the risen Lord and Christ (Ac 2<sup>32-38</sup>) that 3000 souls on the day of Pentecost were led gladly to receive the word, and in baptism to confess Christ for themselves (vv. 37-41).

St. Paul knew the mighty power that inheres in confession, and both in his preaching and writing made much of the story of his own conversion (Ac 22<sup>6-26</sup>, Gal 1<sup>24</sup>), thereby confessing Jesus afresh as his Saviour and Lord. It was above all else by the personal confessions of humble individuals—a testimony often sealed with blood (Rev 2<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>11</sup>)—that the pagan empire of Rome was cast down and the Church of Christ built upon its ruins. And it is still by personal confession, in one form or another, that the word of the Lord grows and multiplies, and His Church prevails against the gates of Hades. It is by testifying to Jesus Christ as Lord that men become the ambassadors of Christ to the souls of other men. The secret of the influence exerted by such confession lies not only in the appealing grace of the Lord whom we confess, but in the subtle and mysterious power of a believing and confessing heart over its fellow. 'Blessed influence of one true loving human soul on another! Not calculable by algebra, not deducible by logic, but mysterious, effectual, mighty as the hidden process by which the tiny seed is quickened, and bursts forth into tall stem and broad leaf, and glowing tasselled flower' (George Eliot, Scenes of Clerical Life, p. 287).

CONFESSION (of sin).—In the OT a large place is given to the confession of sin, as being the necessary expression of true penitence and the condition at the same time of the Divine forgiveness. Witness the provisions of the Mosaic ritual (Lv 5<sup>6a</sup>), the utterances of the penitential and other psalms (e.g. 32<sup>5</sup> 51<sup>2a</sup>), and prayers like those of Ezra (10<sup>1</sup>), Nehemiah (1<sup>6-7</sup>), and Daniel (9<sup>19-20</sup>). It may surprise us at first to find that in the Gospels the confession of sin is expressly named on only one occasion, and that in connexion with the ministry of John the Baptist (ἐξουλοῦσθε τὰς ἀμαρτίας ὑμῶν, Mt 3<sup>6</sup>, Mk 1<sup>5</sup>). But apart from the use of the actual phrase, we shall see that the Gospel narratives take full account of the confession of sin, and that, as in the OT, confession is recognized both as the necessary accompaniment of repentance and as the indispensable condition of forgiveness and restoration to favour, whether human or Divine. There are three topics which call for notice: (1) confession of sin to God; (2) confession of sin to man; (3) Christ's personal attitude to the confession of sin.

1. Confession of sin to God.—It is to God that all confession of sin is primarily due, sin being in its essential nature a transgression of Divine law (cf. Ps 51<sup>1</sup>). And in the teaching and ministry of Jesus the duty of confession to God is fully recognized. Our Lord begins His ministry with a call to repentance (Mt 4<sup>17</sup>, Mk 1<sup>15</sup>). In the midst of His public career He characterizes the generation to which He appealed as an evil generation because of its unwillingness to repent (Lk 11<sup>29-30</sup>). Among His last words on earth was His declaration that the universal gospel was to be a gospel of repentance and remission of sins (Lk 24<sup>47</sup>). And as confession is inseparable from true penitence, being the form which the latter instinctively and inevitably takes in its approaches to God, we may say that all through His public ministry, by insisting upon the need of repentance, Jesus taught the necessity of the confession of sin.

But besides this we have from His lips a good deal of direct teaching on the subject. The prayer which He gave His disciples as a pattern for all prayer includes a petition for forgiveness (Mt 6<sup>12</sup>, Lk 11<sup>4</sup>); and such a petition is equivalent, of course, to a confession of sin. In the parable of the Prodigal Son the prodigal's first resolution 'when he came to himself' was to go to his father and acknowledge his sin (Lk 15<sup>17-18</sup>); and his first words on meeting him were the frank and humble confession, 'Father, I have sinned' (v. 21). The parable of the Pharisee and the Publican, again, hinges upon this very matter of the acknowledgment of sin and unworthiness. It was the total absence of the element of confession from the Pharisee's prayer, and the presence instead of a self-satisfied and self-exalting spirit, that made his prayer of no effect in the sight of God; while it was the publican's downcast eyes, his smitten breast, his cry, 'God be merciful to me a sinner!' that sent him down to his house 'justified rather than the other' (Lk 18<sup>13-14</sup>; cf. the words of Zacchaeus, another publican, Lk 19<sup>8</sup>).

Under this head may be included one or two cases of confession of sin to Christ. When Peter cries, 'Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord' (Lk 5<sup>8</sup>), and when the sinful woman in the house of the Pharisee silently makes confession to Jesus as she washes His feet with her tears (Lk 7<sup>37-38</sup>), it is too much to say of these confessions, in Pliny's language (Ep. x. 96) with regard to the hymn-singing of the early Christians, that they were offered 'to Christ as to God'. But they were certainly made to one who was felt to be raised above the life of sinful humanity, and to be the representative on earth of the purity and grace of the heavenly Father.*

2. Confession of sin to man.—According to the teaching of Christ and the Gospels, confession of sin should be made not only to God but to man, and, in particular, to any one whom we have wronged. In Mt 5<sup>23-24</sup> confession to a justly offended brother is directly enjoined; and more than that, it is implied that the very gifts laid on God's altar are shorn of their value if such confession has not first been made. In Lk 17<sup>4</sup> again, our own forgiveness of an offender is made to depend on his coming and confessing, 'I repent.' But apart from this confession to the person wronged, a wider and more public confession of sin meets us in the Gospels. The necessity of such confession is implied, for instance, in our Lord's denunciations of hypocrisy—in His condemnation of the life of false pretence (Mt 23<sup>14</sup>); of the cup and platter outwardly clean, while inwardly full of extortion and excess (v. 23); of the whitened sepulchres fair to look at, though festering with rotteness within (v. 53). It is implied similarly in His frequent commendation of simplicity and single-mindedness, and honest truth in the sight both of God and man (cf. Mt 6<sup>22-23</sup> 7<sup>3-5</sup> 9<sup>3b</sup>).

* It is a point worth noticing, in the comparative study of the Gospels, that St. Luke, who is pre-eminently the Evangelist of salvation for the sinful, supplies us with the great bulk of the Gospel evidence that the Divine forgiveness is conditioned by the confession of sin.

It seems to be recognized in the Gospels that acknowledgment of sin to man as well as to God has a cleansing power upon the soul. There may, of course, be a confession that is spiritually fruitless, to which men are urged not by the godly sorrow of true repentance, but by the goads of sheer remorse and despair. Of this nature was the confession of Judas to the chief priests and elders (Mt 27<sup>4</sup>, cf. v.<sup>3</sup>). On the other hand, the confession of the penitent thief to all who heard him (Lk 23<sup>41</sup>) was the beginning of that swift work of grace which was accomplished in his heart through the influence of Jesus. It illustrates George Eliot's words, 'The purifying influence of public confession springs from the fact that by it the hope in lies is for ever swept away, and the soul recovers the noble attitude of simplicity' (Romola, p. 87).

3. Christ's personal attitude to the confession of sin.—That our Lord never made confession to man, and never felt the need of doing so, is sufficiently shown by His challenge, 'Which of you convicteth me of sin?' (Jn 8<sup>26</sup>). But did He make confession of sin to God? The fact that John's baptism was 'the baptism of repentance' (Mk 1<sup>4</sup>), and that the people 'were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins' (Mt 3<sup>6</sup>), together with the further fact that Jesus Himself came to the Jordan to be baptized (Mt 3<sup>13</sup>, Mk 1<sup>9</sup>, Lk 3<sup>21</sup>), might be so interpreted. But against such an interpretation must be set the attitude of John both when Jesus first came to him (Mt 3<sup>14</sup>) and afterwards (Jn 1<sup>29</sup>), the language of Jesus to the Baptist (Mt 3<sup>15</sup>), the descent of the Spirit (v.<sup>19</sup>), and the voice from heaven (v.<sup>19</sup>). The baptism of John, we must remember, had more than one aspect; it was not only the baptism of repentance, but the baptism of preparation for the approaching kingdom of heaven (Mt 3<sup>2</sup>) and of consecration to its service (Lk 3<sup>10-14</sup>). It is not as an act of confession, but as one of self-consecration (including, it may be, an element of sympathetic self-humiliation, cf. Ph 2<sup>8</sup>), that the baptism of Jesus is to be regarded. He had no sins to confess, but He knew that John was the prophet divinely commissioned to inaugurate the kingdom of righteousness (cf. Mt 21<sup>23</sup>), and to inaugurate it by the rite of baptism (Mt 21<sup>25</sup>). And by submitting Himself to John's baptism He was openly dedicating Himself to the work of that kingdom, and taking up His task of fulfilling all righteousness (Mt 3<sup>15</sup>). (See Sanday in Hastings' DB ii. 611; Lambert, Sacraments in NT, p. 62 f.; Expos. Times, xi. [1900] 354.)

But, above all, it is to be noted that while Jesus taught His disciples to pray for the forgiveness of sins, we never find Him humbling Himself before God on account of sin, and asking to be forgiven. And the complete silence of the Gospels upon this point acquires a fuller significance when we observe that there is not the slightest evidence that He ever engaged in common prayer with the Apostles. When Jesus prayed to the Father, He seems always to have prayed alone (Mt 14<sup>23</sup> 26<sup>36</sup>, Lk 9<sup>18</sup> 11<sup>1</sup>; cf. Jn 17, where He prays in the presence of the disciples, but not with them). The reason probably was that while the attitude of a sinful suppliant and the element of confession, whether uttered or unexpressed, are indispensable to the acceptableness of ordinary human prayer, these could find no place in the prayers of Jesus. CONSCIOUSNESS.—We have to consider, so far as the facts recorded in the Gospels permit, our Lord's consciousness of Himself and of His mission. The subject is difficult. It is beset by perplexing psychological and theological problems. It also demands very careful treatment, for it opens up discussions which may soon pass beyond the limits prescribed by reverence. We shall be guided by the following division:—

- I. The data, as found in the Gospels.
  - i. Certain narratives that reveal the consciousness of Jesus.
  - ii. The implications involved in His teaching generally, and in the impression He produced upon His disciples.
- II. Psychological problems.
  - i. Growth.
  - ii. The Divine consciousness and the human.
  - iii. Knowledge and ignorance.
- III. Theological results.
  - i. Uniqueness of our Lord's personality.
  - ii. His Divinity.

I. THE GOSPEL DATA.—i. Narratives revealing the consciousness of Jesus.—1. Among the narratives which, in a specially clear way, reveal our Lord's consciousness, one of the most remarkable refers to a very early period of His life. St. Luke tells us (24<sup>1-25</sup>) of His visit to Jerusalem at the age of twelve years. When, after long searching, He is found in the Temple, and His mother questions Him, 'Why hast thou thus dealt with us?' His reply shows plainly that extraordinary realization of God which is the most outstanding characteristic of His consciousness: 'How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be in my Father's house?' (or, 'about my Father's business,' ἐν τοῦ πατρὸς καρποῖς μου). Here is evident the work of the child's imagination, in which the dominant idea controls absolutely everything else, and the most unlikely events appear perfectly natural: 'How is it that ye sought me?' What is extraordinary is the nature of this dominant idea. Already, at the age of twelve, our Lord knows God as His Father, and that in a manner so intimate and so peculiar that ordinary human relationships are as nothing in comparison with the relation to God. The doing of God's will is already the supreme motive. It is to be noted also how the 'my Father' of His reply contrasts with the 'thy father' of Mary's question. It is perhaps more natural to regard this as the inevitable reaction of His consciousness than as a deliberate correction of His mother. If so, it is all the more impressive. It shows how fundamental was the position in His mind of the filial relation in which He stood to God. How unlike this was to the Jewish mind of the time is shown by St. Luke's statement about Joseph and Mary: 'They understood not the saying which he spake unto them.'

2. The Baptism occupies an important place in the data of our subject. It is clear that all the Evangelists intend to point out that our Lord's baptism was unlike all others performed by John the Baptist. It was not a baptism of repentance. This is most clearly shown in St. Matthew's account. John felt the difficulty and 'would have hindered him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me? But Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it now; for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness. Then he suffered him.' John discerned the incongruity, and our Lord acknowledged it, but gave a reason which showed how distinctly He realized His unique position and calling. The baptism was part of God's will for Him. It had a necessary place in His life and work. It is also noteworthy that the descent of the Spirit and the voice from heaven are stated by St. Mark to have been manifested to our Lord Himself. With this St. Matthew and St. Luke agree. Only from St. John do we learn that the Baptist shared the experience. In view of what has gone before, we cannot look upon this event as the beginning of our Lord's knowledge of His unique Sonship. It was, rather, an objective Divine confirmation of the truths which He already knew from the testimony of His inner consciousness. It was manifested to Himself and to the Baptist when the time had come for the public proclamation of the gospel of the Kingdom. It was a witness to His Sonship, 'Thou art my beloved Son'; to His sinlessness, 'in thee I am well pleased'; and to His Messiahship, 'He saw the heavens rent asunder, and the Spirit as a dove descending upon him' (see Is 42<sup>1</sup>).

Careful study of the Gospels shows that these three elements in our Lord's consciousness are those which are disclosed most frequently in His life and teaching.

Some able students (e.g. Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, I, p. 96 ff., Eng. tr.) think that at the Baptism Jesus first attained to the consciousness of His Messiahship, though already aware of His Sonship. But, as has just been pointed out, the answer which He gave to John the Baptist reveals a fully developed sense, not merely of His sinlessness and relation to God, but of His mission. The testimony of even one Evangelist (St. Matthew) on a point like this is superior, as evidence, to any amount of psychological speculation.

3. The Temptation of our Lord, following immediately (Mk 1<sup>7</sup>) after His Baptism, shows the nature of the internal conflict which He had to face when He set about the work of His life. There was no struggle with doubt as regards God, or Himself, or the end which He sought. The force of every temptation depended indeed on the clearness with which these were realized. His victory was an overcoming of the tendency to escape from the limitation, the lowliness, and the self-sacrifice which, to human thought, seem so unbecoming the Son of God in His great work of establishing the Kingdom.

It is impossible in the short space available here to deal with all the definite instances of self-revelation which are given in the four Gospels. It must suffice to dwell briefly upon a few of the more remarkable, and to mention such of the rest as cannot be omitted. It may be added that, to those who have really considered the question, almost every incident in our Lord's life is, in some way or other, a manifestation of His superhuman consciousness.

4. One of the most noteworthy instances is that given by St. Matthew (11<sup>25-27</sup>) and by St. Luke (10<sup>21-22</sup>). St. Luke introduces the passage with the remarkable words, 'In that same hour he rejoiced in the Holy Spirit, and said.' It is a proof that the Apostles recognized our Lord's utterance on this occasion as the open expression of His communion with God. The insight into the heart of God, which was the secret of the inner life of Jesus, finds here such utterance as human language can give it. He addresses God as 'Father, Lord of heaven and earth,' a great expression which foreshadows the truth which follows: 'All things have been delivered unto me of my Father; and no one knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him' (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>). It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of these words. They contain four great assertions about our Lord and His work: (1) His universal authority; (2) the mystery of His person, known in its fulness to the Father only; (3) the unique relation of the Son to the Father, as involved in the Son's perfect knowledge of the Father; (4) the knowledge of the Father, so far as it is possible to man, is to be had only through the Son. This short passage contains the whole Christology of the Fourth Gospel. It records for us an occasion when our Lord permitted His hearers to gain some insight into His consciousness of God, of Himself, and of His mission.

Among the many important passages which agree with those which have been discussed may be mentioned the following: (1) The account of our Lord's reception of the disciples of John the Baptist who brought their master's doubts to Him for solution (Mt 11<sup>2-7</sup> and Lk 7<sup>19-24</sup>). Here our Lord's perfect confidence in His mission is obviously based upon His consciousness. The contrast with the intensely human searchings of heart displayed by John in his time of trial is very striking. (2) The narrative which includes the confession of St. Peter and the teaching which followed it (Mt 16<sup>13-19</sup>, Mk 8<sup>27-30</sup>, Lk 9<sup>18-22</sup>). The announcement of His approaching death and the tremendous terms in which He claims the utmost self-sacrifice from His disciples, give an extraordinary depth to the revelation of our Lord's self-knowledge contained in this narrative. (3) Every incident and every teaching belonging to the last period of the ministry reveals the overpowering intensity of His consciousness of the mission which He had to fulfil and of its dependence upon Himself. All the circumstances of His public entry into Jerusalem are notable in this respect (Mt 21<sup>1-16</sup>, Mk 11<sup>1-11</sup>, Lk 19<sup>28-47</sup>, Jn 12<sup>12-19</sup>; see especially vv. 28-47 in St. Luke's account).

(4) His answers to those who questioned His authority (Mt 21<sup>23-24</sup>, Mk 11<sup>27-32</sup>, Lk 20<sup>1-8</sup>) are equally impressive. The parable of the Wicked Husbandmen, which is given in all the Synoptic Gospels, is very striking, as showing how our Lord made an essential distinction between Himself and all other messengers of God. (5) The description of the Future Judgment (Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>, cf. Mk 8<sup>38</sup>), which shows the same conception, and proves that the idea is not peculiar to St. Matthew among the Synoptists), contains as lofty a conception of the dignity of the Son as any passage in the Fourth Gospel: 'Then shall the king say' (vv. 34-41). What a depth of consciousness is involved in the words, 'ye did it unto me' and 'ye did it not to me' (vv. 40, 42).

It would be possible to give many more instances almost as impressive. The fact is important, as showing that here we are dealing with an essential element in the Gospel history. So far our instances have been taken from the Synoptic Gospels, and mainly from narratives which are common to them all. When we turn to St. John, we find the self-revelation of Christ on every page, almost in every paragraph. See, as examples, Jn 1<sup>9</sup> 2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>26</sup> 5<sup>17-29</sup> 6<sup>38-42</sup> 8<sup>12</sup> 8<sup>14-46</sup> (sinlessness) 10<sup>38</sup> 12<sup>44</sup> 13<sup>14-16</sup> etc. The climax is reached in ch. 17, in which we are admitted to the sanctuary in which the Son pours out His heart in the presence of His Father. Here are evident all the elements already noted as peculiar to our Lord's thought about Himself and His mission: His unique Sonship, His sinlessness, His Messiahship, His universal authority, the mystery of His relation to the Father.

ii. Implications of His teaching and the impression He produced.—When we come to consider how this consciousness is implied in His teaching generally and in His effect upon mankind, we find ourselves face to face with a mass of materials so great that selection becomes very difficult. It must suffice to point out certain classes of facts—

1. His mode of thinking and speaking about God. God is, for Him, 'the Father.' Sometimes, with clear reference to His own unique relationship, our Lord calls God 'my Father' (Mt 7<sup>21</sup> 10<sup>23-25</sup> 11<sup>27</sup> 16<sup>17</sup> 18<sup>19</sup>, 25, Mk 8<sup>38</sup> 13<sup>32</sup>, Lk 10<sup>22</sup> 22<sup>29</sup>, Jn 5<sup>17</sup> 6<sup>28</sup> 8<sup>19</sup>, and throughout chs. 14-17, etc.). But it is perhaps even more remarkable that when Christ is teaching His disciples to think about God as their Father in heaven, and speaking of Him as 'the Father' or 'your Father,' He always adopts the manner of one who knows this truth from within.

It is not a doctrine which He has learned from Scripture, or proved by reason, or even gained by vision or revelation. It is spontaneous, a truth welling up from the depths of His being, and as essential and natural to His thought as breathing to His bodily life. To Him God, His Father, was an ever-present reality, the greatest and most intimate of all realities. He knew God as none else knew Him (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>). He abode in His Father's love (Jn 15<sup>10</sup>). These expressions describe in the simplest possible way the spirit which is manifested in all our Lord's utterances. Take, as an example, the Sermon on the Mount, the most distinctively ethical part of His teaching. Here, if anywhere, we should expect this purely religious apprehension of God to become dormant. In the introduction (Mt 5<sup>2-13</sup>), the promises all reveal a deep insight into the purposes and nature of God: they view the world with its many kinds of people from the Divine point of view (see also 5<sup>15-20</sup>, 43-48, 61-68, 71-72, 77-82, 91-96, 101-121). All human things are viewed in the light of God's character. Jesus knew all these things about human life because He first knew God. Instances of this underlying consciousness might be multiplied indefinitely.

2. His self-assertion. It has often been pointed out (especially by Liddon in his Deity of our Lord, Lect. IV.) that qualities which are incompatible in any other character combine freely and harmoniously in the character of Jesus. The most remarkable instance is the union of self-assertion with the most perfect humility. To those who believe in the Deity of Christ, the reason, the 'why,' of this fact is not far to seek. But the 'how' remains a difficulty. How is it that all seems natural and inevitable in the portrait as we find it in the Gospels? The answer must surely be that the self-assertion is the necessary expression of a real consciousness. It is well to be reminded how tremendous the self-assertion is. The following passages are a selection: Mt 5<sup>19-20</sup>, 23-24, 28-34, 37-38, 39, 41, 43, 44, 46, 47, 48, 49, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

3. The effect of this consciousness upon those who were brought under His influence is very evident. The impression which Jesus produced upon the minds and hearts of men was quite unique. He not only preached Himself, He revealed Himself. This revelation carried conviction with it. It is plain that He designed His ministry to be such a revelation. It was not His usual method to say exactly who He was, but rather to lead His hearers on until they were able to make that discovery for themselves (Mt 16<sup>17-20</sup>). We speak of our Lord 'claiming' such and such things; but whenever He made an assertion about Himself, it was because it was necessary that His hearers should know the truth on account of its essential importance for themselves. His object was to lead them to give Him the whole faith and love of their hearts, because in so doing they attained their highest good. A notable instance of the effect of our Lord's self-revelation occurs in the case of St. Peter (Lk 5<sup>8</sup>), 'Depart from me: for I am a sinful man, O Lord.' Here the depth of the impression is shown by the moral effect (cf. Job 42<sup>5-6</sup> and Is 6<sup>7</sup>). It is clear that St. Peter was impressed not merely by the miracle, but by the moral glory of Christ. The miracle was but the occasion when there came to him a sudden insight into the character of Jesus. The intense faith which our Lord awakened in the hearts of those who responded to Him testifies to His self-revelation. He looked for a faith which rested in Himself as its object. Such faith always called forth His highest approbation. Almost every page of the Gospels witnesses to the truth of this. The case of the Centurion (Mt 8<sup>5-13</sup>, Lk 7<sup>1-10</sup>), though perhaps the most striking instance, is yet only typical. The principle involved in it may be found everywhere; see Mt 8<sup>2-4</sup>, 9<sup>1-10</sup>, 10<sup>2-12</sup>, 13<sup>1-17</sup>, 15<sup>2-10</sup>, 19<sup>1-10</sup>, Mk 1<sup>40-41</sup>, 2<sup>1-11</sup>, 5<sup>34-46</sup>, 6<sup>7-13</sup>, 7<sup>1-10</sup>, 8<sup>2-9</sup>, 9<sup>1-13</sup>, Lk 7<sup>2-10</sup>, 9<sup>1-14</sup>, 10<sup>1-16</sup>, 11<sup>1-10</sup>, 12<sup>1-10</sup>, 13<sup>1-10</sup>, 14<sup>1-10</sup>, 17<sup>1-10</sup>, 18<sup>1-10</sup>, 19<sup>1-10</sup>, Jn 4<sup>46-54</sup>, 6<sup>59-71</sup>, 7<sup>37-44</sup>, 8<sup>12-20</sup>, etc. The extraordinary claim involved in these passages, and in many others, would strike us much more than it does were it not for the fact that the experience of the Christian centuries has amply justified it, Christianity, together with all the moral and spiritual values which it has bestowed upon humanity, the effect produced not primarily by any doctrinal system or method of organization, but by a personality. It was the deliberate aim of our Lord, with full consciousness of the method He was adopting, to influence humanity by the revelation of Himself.

ii. PSYCHOLOGICAL PROBLEMS.—These are many and difficult.

i. Growth.—In the case of a merely human intelligence, growth is a necessary element; and a psychological examination would aim at tracing the course of development by showing how the mind reacted upon the circumstances of its history and environment. Our Lord was truly human; but He was not merely human, and therefore it is unsafe to reason from ordinary experience apart from the facts of His life as given in the Gospels. Concerning His early years, we are distinctly told that there was development. 'The child grew and waxed strong, filled (becoming full, πληροῦμενος) with wisdom' (Lk 2<sup>52</sup>). And again (v. 40), 'Jesus advanced (προέβη) in wisdom and stature.' The language in both places implies growth in the true sense of the term. We are not, then, to imagine the infant Jesus looking out upon the world, from His mother's arms, with eyes already gleaming with the fulness of that superhuman knowledge which He afterwards possessed, as certain ancient pictures would suggest. In His consciousness, as in His bodily frame, He developed from helpless infancy to maturity. But there is unmistakable evidence that, as His consciousness unfolded, it attained, in ways which were to it perfectly normal and proper, experiences which are unique among the phenomena of human existence. It is clear from what has been already stated, that Jesus, from His childhood, possessed a consciousness of God as His Father which was utterly different from the faith to which others attain through teaching and the influence of religious surroundings. The incident of His childhood which reveals this fact must be viewed in the light of the self-revelation which fills all His teaching. Then its meaning is clear. We learn that His knowledge of His Father in heaven and of the loving harmony of will which subsisted between them was not a revelation imparted when the time of His public ministry drew near. It was an essential element in His earliest spiritual experiences. So far we are carried by the mere facts,

Every attempt at a theological, or even psychological, co-ordination of these facts will carry us much further, and show that this inexplicable knowledge of God and consciousness of harmony with Him form together the ruling and guiding principle of our Lord's whole life.

We have already passed in review the large classes of passages which show most distinctly our Lord's self-revelation of His consciousness of union with His Father. The force of these passages is greatly augmented when certain negative characteristics most clearly manifested in the Gospels are taken into consideration.

1. There is no trace in our Lord's teaching or life of any effort to arrive at truth by means of reasoning. Jesus was never a seeker for truth: it was not any task of His to discern God's will before He began to do it, or to satisfy His own intelligence before He taught others. In dealing with the things of God, He moves with the absolute certainty of One who knew the truth from within. His use of Holy Scripture is never an effort to fortify His own mind: He speaks and acts as One who knew Himself a superior authority. Just as He was greater than the temple and Lord of the Sabbath, so is He above the Law and able to take the position of One who has the right to modify it or deepen it on His sole authority (see Mt 5<sup>17, 21, 22, 28</sup> etc. 7<sup>28, 29</sup> 12<sup>8</sup>, Mk 2<sup>28</sup>). When, in His teaching, He reasons from Scripture or from nature, it is simply that He may convey to others, in a way which corresponds to their mental equipment, the truth which He Himself knows independently. In such cases there is always some degree of that 'fulfilling of the Law,' that drawing out of a deeper meaning, of which so many instances occur in the Sermon on the Mount. Perhaps the most remarkable example is His proof of the future life from the revelation at the Bush (Mt 22<sup>29</sup>, Mk 12<sup>26, 27</sup>, Lk 20<sup>27, 28</sup>). Here the real proof is the manifestation of the character of God as it is involved in the declaration to Moses. See for other instances of argument of this kind from Scripture, from reason, or from nature, Mt 23<sup>35</sup> 24<sup>28, 29, 30, 31, 32</sup> 71<sup>1-16</sup> 12<sup>28, 31, 32, 33</sup>, Mk 2<sup>2, 3</sup> 7<sup>19</sup>, 10<sup>28</sup>, 12<sup>28</sup>, Lk 13<sup>15</sup> 14<sup>28</sup>, Jn 13<sup>14</sup>. It is quite plain in these and all other instances that our Lord is reasoning, not in order to satisfy His own mind, but to carry conviction to the minds of His hearers. There is not the faintest trace of the struggle for truth.

2. There is no sign that progressive revelations were made to Him during the course of His ministry. Many efforts have been made to show that Jesus attained at certain turning-points to new views of His mission, and of the means by which His work was to be accomplished. It is certainly true that in His teaching it is possible to discern two stages, the first marked by a broad and more ethical treatment of the Gospel of the Kingdom, the second dealing with the means by which the Kingdom is to be established, His own Person, sufferings, and death. But it is quite impossible to show that these two stages are not essential parts of one organic whole. The truth is that they are perfectly consistent, and form together one great scheme of revelation. To suppose any change of purpose, or even fresh insight into the means by which our Lord's mission was to be accomplished, during His ministry, is to go beyond the evidence afforded by the Gospel history, in obedience to some a priori psychological or theological theory. It is supposed by some that He began with the belief that the Kingdom would be, somehow or other, introduced miraculously when the people as a whole were ready to receive it, but that, as time went on, and He found Himself rejected by the leaders, He became convinced that the Kingdom was already being realized in the hearts of the faithful, and finally saw that it was necessary that He Himself should die for its advancement. But how is this consistent with such passages as these: Mk 1<sup>17, 22, 34, 37, 38, 42, 45</sup> 2<sup>28</sup> 3<sup>12</sup>, and the corresponding passages in St. Luke; also the whole Sermon on the Mount in St. Matthew? Why should our Lord so sternly and so consistently forbid the spread of popular excitement if He thought the Kingdom would suddenly appear, supervening miraculously upon the old order? Here is clear proof that from the beginning He understood the spiritual nature of the Kingdom. Why again should He, from the beginning, foreshadow the days of mourning 'when the Bridegroom shall be taken away,' unless He had in view all along the great sacrifice which was to end His ministry? (See Mt 9<sup>12</sup>, Mk 2<sup>19, 20</sup>, Lk 5<sup>24, 25</sup>). This saying obviously belongs to the earlier days, when the disciples of Jesus were marked by their joyous acceptance of all the good gifts of their Father in heaven). These conclusions are greatly strengthened by a consideration of the crisis which was brought about by the feeding of the five thousand. That there was a crisis is evident from Jn 6<sup>24, 26, 27</sup> compared with Mt 14<sup>22, 24</sup> and Mk 6<sup>35-47</sup>. But it was not a crisis in the consciousness of Jesus. It concerned rather the response of the people. Now at last they are utterly disappointed of their hopes of a worldly Messiah, and the very manner of their disappointment shows our Lord's perfect consistency. His conduct throughout is that of one whose mind is made up and whose course is absolutely clear. At the very end, it may be thought, we have, in the Agony in the Garden, a crisis at which He became at last fully persuaded of the necessity of His death. But surely it is much more in accordance with the whole history to regard this as a moral crisis, when, for the last time, He was tempted to turn aside. There are indications that, all along, this temptation was presented to Him (see Mt 16<sup>22, 23</sup>, Mk 8<sup>32, 33</sup>, Jn 12<sup>27</sup>). Our Lord's utterances before the Agony show the very fullest consciousness of His mission, and of how it was to be accomplished.

3. Repentance had no place in the consciousness of Jesus. As Harnack (What is Christianity?, p. 32 f.) puts it, 'No stormy crisis, no breach with His past, lies behind the period of Jesus' life that we know. In none of His sayings or discourses . . . can we discover the signs of inner revolutions overcome, or the scars of any terrible conflict. Everything seems to pour from Him naturally, as though it could not do otherwise, like a spring from the depths of the earth, clear and unchecked in its flow.' This is the strongest proof of our Lord's perfect sinlessness. It is incredible that the keenest spiritual insight ever possessed by man should have been blind to its own condition. In confirmation of this the following passages are important: Mt 5<sup>20, 21</sup> 18<sup>24, 25, 26</sup>, Mk 9<sup>27</sup>, Lk 13<sup>3-5</sup> 17<sup>19</sup> etc. show our Lord's sensitiveness to the presence of sin in the hearts of men; how He recognized its universality in the world, and how high was His standard. Mk 1<sup>15</sup>, Lk 6<sup>40</sup>, Jn 4<sup>24</sup> 8<sup>32, 46</sup>, give a direct insight into His consciousness of His own moral condition. Lk 5<sup>8</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>22</sup> 3<sup>15</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>28</sup> 3<sup>5, 7</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>, He 4<sup>12</sup> etc. show the impression He produced, in regard to this matter, upon the minds of His disciples. Our Lord's consciousness of union with His Father was not marred by any sin within His own soul.

On the subject of growth, then, our data lead us to the conclusion that there was a real development in the consciousness of Jesus during His youth, but that this development was completed, certainly in all its essential elements, before He began His ministry.

ii. The most perplexing of all the psychological problems opened up by our subject is that which is presented by the endeavour to distinguish the Divine and human elements in our Lord's consciousness, and to define the mode of their union. What in general the contents of His Divine consciousness were, so far as they have been revealed to us, we have seen above. But it is extremely hazardous to draw negative conclusions from these positive results, and every attempt at definition of the two elements involves negative as well as positive statements. Psychologically, we are presented with an insoluble problem. There are no facts, and no laws, known to the science of mind which can help us to understand the consciousness of Jesus. That He knew as man knows there can be no question. All the evidence we possess points to mental growth during the years of His youth; and though, as we have seen, the facts of His history during the period of His ministry do not warrant us in attributing to Him progressive attainments in the knowledge of Divine things, it is clear that ordinary human knowledge came to Him as it comes to us. It is often said of Him, that He 'came to know' (γινώσκειν, Mt 12<sup>24</sup> 22<sup>29</sup> 23<sup>17</sup>, Mk 2<sup>27</sup>, Jn 4<sup>43</sup> 6<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>19</sup>; see Mason, Conditions of our Lord's Life on Earth, p. 130 ff.). Again, we are told that He was guided by the evidence of His senses: 'When Jesus saw it, he was moved with indignation' (Mk 10<sup>14</sup>); 'He came forth and saw a great multitude, and he had compassion on them' (Mt 14<sup>13</sup>); 'When he drew nigh, he saw the city and wept over it' (Lk 19<sup>41</sup>). Such passages are convincing; and others, which tell of a supernatural knowledge of the thoughts and motives of men or of events (e.g. Jn 1<sup>38</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>, Mt 21<sup>2</sup>, Mk 14<sup>23</sup>, etc.), do not weaken their force. But side by side with this human consciousness we find unmistakable evidence of a consciousness which knows the heart of God from within, and which therefore holds an unparalleled illumination over the whole realm of spiritual things. Jesus could say of Himself, 'No one knoweth the Son save the Father; neither doth any know the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him.' Such an assertion would be folly or worse were it not justified by the contents of His teaching. But the truth is that what Jesus showed mankind about the Father and His Kingdom, His Love and His holiness, and the revelation which Jesus gave of human life as seen in the light of this Divine manifestation, have ever remained the highest heights of spiritual vision. And, more wonderful still, this revelation has proved itself, as He foretold, inseparable from the Person who gave it. The teaching, Divine though it is, has ever been subordinate to the Teacher. It is always Jesus Christ who reveals the Father. Here then are the two elements, a consciousness of God and of Himself in relation to God different in kind from anything known in our experience, and side by side with it ordinary human knowledge based on the evidence of the senses. Harnack puts the problem thus: 'How He came to this consciousness of the unique character of His relation to God as a Son, how He came to the consciousness of His power, and to the consciousness of the obligation and the mission which this power carries with it, is His secret, and no psychology will ever fathom it' (What is Christianity? p. 123).

iii. Knowledge and ignorance.—We cannot enter here upon a general discussion of this question. It must suffice to note that our Lord in one instance pointedly confessed ignorance (Mk 13<sup>32</sup>), that He asked questions, evidently to gain information (Mk 5<sup>9</sup> 6<sup>38</sup> 9<sup>21</sup>, Jn 11<sup>34</sup>), that He showed surprise (Mt 8<sup>9</sup>, Mk 6<sup>8</sup>), that He sought for what He could not find (Mt 21<sup>19</sup>, Mk 11<sup>13</sup>), and that there is no trace in the Gospels of His possessing supernatural knowledge of human and secular things beyond what was necessary for His work. These facts may be connected with the following statements made by our Lord Himself: 'The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father doing' (Jn 5<sup>19</sup>); 'I can of myself do nothing; as I hear, I judge: and my judgment is righteous; because I seek not mine own will, but the will of him that sent me' (v. 30); 'My teaching is not mine, but his that sent me' (7<sup>16</sup>); 'He that sent me is true; and the things which I heard from him, these speak I unto the world' (8<sup>20</sup>); 'I do nothing of myself, but as the Father taught me, I speak these things' (v. 23); 'I speak the things which I have seen with my Father' (v. 38); 'The Father which sent me, he hath given me a commandment, what I should say and what I should speak'; 'The things therefore which I speak, even as the Father hath said unto me, so I speak' (12<sup>49</sup>, 50); 'The words that I say unto you I speak not from myself; but the Father abiding in me doeth his works. Believe me that I am in the Father and the Father in me' (14<sup>10</sup>, 11); see also 14<sup>24</sup>, 17<sup>17</sup>, 19). From these statements it surely follows that our Lord's Divine knowledge was imparted to Him in His communion with His Father. Apart from this means of knowing, He depended simply upon His human faculties. 'This being the case, we must see that, if anything which could not be known naturally was not made known to Him by the Father, it would not be known by Him' (Bishop O'Brien of Ossory, quoted by Canon Mason, op. cit. p. 192). The psychology of this communion with the Father, as a means of knowledge, is doubtless beyond us; but the facts given in all the Gospels agree with the statements of our Lord Himself as recorded by St. John. See, further, AUTHORITY OF CHRIST.

iii. THEOLOGICAL RESULTS.—1. The first result is an extraordinary emphasis upon the uniqueness of our Lord's personality. In the psychological sphere the consciousness of Jesus Christ is as miraculous as His resurrection is in the physical. There is this difference, however, that His consciousness is a fact which comes in all its freshness before everyone who reads with clear eyes the story of His life. It is the most truly living element in the Gospels, and it is the same in them all. It is a concrete fact, not an abstract doctrine. To attribute its unity and concreteness to the sudden development of a dramatic instinct among certain religiously-minded Jews of the 1st cent., is as impossible as to derive its amazing spiritual elevation from an idealizing tendency among those who believed in God and His promises, and were looking for the Messiah and His Kingdom. Every attempt at explanation of this kind has proved, and must ever prove, a failure. The truth and vividness of the Gospels flow from the reality of the Christ whom they portray, and the consciousness of Jesus is the soul of that reality.

ii. The study of the consciousness of our Lord is the most convincing proof of His Divinity. When such passages as Jn 5<sup>17-20</sup> 8<sup>12-58</sup> 10<sup>27-38</sup> 14<sup>1-16</sup> are compared with such as these from the Synoptics—Mt 11<sup>25-30</sup> 22<sup>21-46</sup>, Mk 3<sup>24-38</sup> 10<sup>28-30</sup> 12<sup>28-37</sup> 14<sup>1</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22-27</sup>, 17<sup>22-24</sup>, 12<sup>8-10</sup> 19<sup>40</sup> 20<sup>12-19</sup>—and both series are discerned to be the inevitable and consistent utterances of the mind of Him who called Himself the Son of God and the Son of Man, the conclusion is irresistible, unless, indeed, preconceived views of the nature of the Universe forbid the inference, that the traditional doctrine of Christianity is the only adequate interpretation of the facts of the life of Jesus.

In some of these, and in many other works which might be named, will be found a great deal of rather free speculation based upon psychological considerations, and often but loosely connected with the statements of the Gospels. The present writer has endeavoured to keep as closely as possible to the historical evidence. On account of the peculiar nature of the problem, he is convinced that psychology affords but little assistance, and he regards even an isolated statement by one of the Evangelists as evidence of higher quality than a priori arguments of any description. Yet he has not forgotten the views of modern critics, and has been careful to show, by an array of references to texts, that the principal contents of our Lord's consciousness are witnessed to by all the original authorities.

CONSECRATE, CONSECRATION.—In the AV of NT 'consecrated' occurs twice. In both places the reference is to the work of Christ, but to two different aspects of that work, neither of which is suggested by the rendering 'consecrated.' (1) In He 7<sup>28</sup> the word used is τετελειωμένος=RV 'perfected.' Our Lord, as 'a Son perfected for evermore,' is contrasted with human high priests
 'having infirmity.' The connexion of thought, obscured in the AV, is with 2<sup>o</sup> 5<sup>a</sup> etc. The perfection of Him who 'abideth for ever,' and whose priesthood is inviolable, is the result of the human experience of the Divine Son. By His life in the flesh, His lowly obedience, and His sufferings, He has gained that abiding sympathy with men which fits Him to be 'the author of eternal salvation.'
 (2) In He 10<sup>10</sup> the word used is εθεωτήσατο=RV 'dedicated,' lit. 'made new,' Jesus 'dedicated for us a new and living way' into the Holy Place.
 The thought is that by means of His own blood our High Priest passed into the Divine presence, inaugurating a way for us. Because He passed through our human life, and out of it by the rending of 'the veil, that is to say, his flesh,' He is not only our representative, but also our forerunner; in full assurance of faith we also may draw near and follow Him into that heavenly sanctuary.

In the RVm 'consecrate' is found three times, viz., Jn 10<sup>36</sup> 17<sup>17, 19</sup> ἀγιάζω, of which 'consecrate' is an alternative rendering, is usually translated 'sanctify.' The exception in the EV is the first petition of the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>=
 Rheims version has 'sanctified be thy name'; on the other hand, Wyclif has 'halowe,' 'halowid' in Jn 10<sup>36</sup> 17<sup>17, 19</sup>.

The distinction between 'consecrate' and 'sanctify' turns rather upon usage than upon etymology.
 Both words mean 'to make holy.' But a person or a thing may be made holy in two different ways: (1) By solemn setting apart for holy uses, as when in the LXX ἀγιάζω designates the consecration of a prophet (Jer 1<sup>8</sup>, cf. Sir 45<sup>a</sup> 49<sup>b</sup>);
 (2) by imparting fitness for holy uses, as when St.
 Paul speaks (Ro 15<sup>16</sup>, cf. 1 Th 5<sup>23</sup>) of his offering as 'made acceptable' because it has been 'sanctified by the Holy Spirit.' On these lines it now seems possible and desirable to distinguish the two English words which mean 'to make holy.'
 Ideally, consecration implies sanctification. But in modern English 'consecrate' suggests the thought of setting apart for holy uses, whilst 'sanctify' has come rather to imply making fit for holy uses.

The rendering 'consecrated' better suits the context of Jn 10<sup>36</sup> 'Say ye of him, whom the Father consecrated and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest; because I said, I am Son of God?'
 Jer 1<sup>8</sup> supplies a suggestive OT analogy, for the word of the Lord reminds the young prophet that, in the Divine counsel, he was set apart for holy uses before his birth. The thought would be more appropriately presented by 'consecrated' than by RV 'sanctified' (LXX ἀγιάζω). Similarly, as our Lord declares in His argument with the Jews (Jn 10<sup>36</sup>), the Father consecrated His Son to His redemptive mission before sending Him forth to His work. More is implied in this statement than that the Father 'chose' or 'set apart' His Son.

 All things were given into His hand (Jn 3<sup>35</sup>), and amongst the all things were 'life in himself' (Jn 5<sup>26</sup>), fulness of grace and truth (14), and the Spirit 'without measure' (3<sup>34</sup>). 'The fact belongs to the eternal order. The term expresses the Divine destination of the Lord for His work. This destination carries with it the further thought of the perfect endowment of the Incarnate Son' (Westcott, Com. in loc.). It is only in this sense of complete equipment that the Divine Son was made fit for His sacred mission; the Holy One had no need of sanctification 'in a way of qualification,' as the Puritan divines used the word, when they meant inward cleansing from sin and the Holy Spirit's bestowal of purity of heart.

Our Lord's words, 'I consecrate myself' (Jn 17<sup>19</sup>), are best understood in the light of His earlier saying that 'the Father consecrated' Him (Jn 10<sup>36</sup>).
 The two statements are complementary. His consecration of Himself was proof of His perfect acquiescence in the Father's purpose concerning Himself, His disciples, and the world. The secret of His inner life was continually revealed 'in loveliness of perfect deeds' which constrained men to acknowledge the truth of His words, 'I seek not mine own will, but the will of him that sent me' (Jn 5<sup>30</sup>); the law that ruled His every word and work He was soon to fulfil to the uttermost;
 His readiness to drink the cup which the Father was about to put into His hands was involved in His calm word, 'I consecrate myself'; its utterance in this solemn hour affords a glimpse of the spirit of absolute devotion to His Father's will in which Jesus is finishing His work and consummating in death the self-sacrifice of His life. And as for the sake of His disciples Jesus consecrates Himself, He prays for them, knowing that the future of His kingdom depends on their having the same spirit of complete consecration to the Divine will.

Commentators who follow Chrysostom in regarding ἀγιάζω as practically equivalent to εθεωτήσατο (cf. Euth. Zig. ἐθεωτήσατο θρωπία θεωρία), and as connoting the idea of expiatory sacrifice, support their interpretation by references to OT passages in which ἀγιάζω (= קדש) is a sacred word for sacrifices, as, e.g., Ex 13<sup>10</sup>, Dt 15<sup>22</sup>, 2 S 8<sup>1</sup> (cf. Meyer, in loc.).
 They are obliged to give the word ἀγιάζω two different meanings in the same sentence, as does the RVm: 'And for their sakes I consecrate myself, that they themselves also may be sanctified in truth.' But it is not from the word ἀγιάζω that the nature of Christ's death is to be learnt; that which differentiates the consecration of Christ from the consecration of His disciples is brought out rather by the other words in this pregnant saying. The consecration of Jesus is His own act, but He does not pray that apart from Him the disciples may follow His example and consecrate themselves; His consecration is the pattern of theirs, therefore the same word is used of the Master and of His disciples; but without His consecration 'for their sakes' (ὑπὲρ αὐτῶν), their consecration would be impossible, therefore it is said of the Master alone that He consecrates Himself on behalf of others.

If ἀγιάζω be uniformly rendered 'consecrate' in our Lord's intercessory prayer, it will be seen that He twice expresses His yearning desire for the consecration of the men whom His Father had given Him out of the world: (1) Jn 17<sup>17</sup> 'Consecrate them in the truth'; as Jesus sends forth His disciples on the same mission which brought Him into the world at His Father's bidding, He asks that they also may be set apart for holy service, and may be divinely equipped for their task, even as He was, by the indwelling of the Father's love (v. 26). They possess the knowledge and the faith that the world lacks, for they have come to know and to believe that the Father sent the Son (vv. 8, 25, cf. vv. 21, 22). It is because Jesus desires intensely that the world may know and believe, that He so fervently prays for the consecration of the men whose faith and knowledge qualify them to speak in the world the word which He has given them. (2) V. 19 'And for their sakes I consecrate myself, that they also may be consecrated in truth.' Reasons for departing from the rendering of the RV and the RVm have been given above. No doubt it is important to remember that men 'having infirmity' need by inward sanctifying to be made fit for the holy service to which they have been consecrated; but the emphatic words, 'they also' (aut admodum), suggest not a contrast, but a resemblance—a consecration common to the Master and His disciples. It is a resemblance not in the letter, but in the spirit. Between their work as witnesses and His as Redeemer there was a contrast; but their lives might be ruled by the 'inward thought' (1 P 4<sup>1</sup> RVm) which constrained Him to suffer for their sakes. For the disciples of Jesus and consecration consists in having the mind which was in Him, who 'humbled himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross' (Ph 2<sup>8</sup>). It should also be noted that the consecration spoken of in Jn 17<sup>19</sup> is, alike in the case of Jesus and of His disciples, 'not a process but an act completed at once,—in His case, when gathering together in one view all His labours and sufferings, He presented them a living sacrifice to His Father; in theirs, when they are in like manner enabled to present themselves as living sacrifices in His one perfect sacrifice' (W. F. Moulton, Com. in loc.). See, further, art. SANCTIFICATION.

CONSIDERATENESS.—It was a saying of St. Francis, 'Courtesy is own sister to Love'; but considerateness is more than courtesy (wh. see), for it takes account not only of our neighbour's feelings, but of all his circumstances and all his wants. Our Lord 'knew all men, and knew what was in man' (Jn 2<sup>25</sup>); and in this knowledge we find Him acting always with the most exquisite care for all their needs. Their bodily needs He anticipates and provides for, as in the case of the hungry multitudes (Mt 15<sup>32</sup>, Mk 8<sup>1-9</sup>, Lk 9<sup>13</sup>, Jn 6<sup>9</sup>), where, moreover, He takes care also that nothing of the store He had provided should be lost (Jn 6<sup>12</sup>), and in the case of His over-wrought disciples ('Come ye apart and rest awhile,' Mk 6<sup>31</sup>). To which may be added His directions regarding Jairus' daughter, when He had raised her from the dead ('He commanded that something should be given her to eat,' Mk 5<sup>43</sup>). Still more beautiful is Christ's delicate consideration of men's feelings. Among the many rays of 'his own glory' (Jn 2<sup>11</sup>) manifested forth in His first miracle, we must not omit His considerateness for the mortification which the falling short of their wine would cause to His peasant hosts, and His taking care that none save His mother and the servants knew whence the new and better supply was drawn (Jn 2<sup>9</sup>). As instances of His considerateness of men's spiritual needs, we may cite His giving scope for the strong faith of the good centurion by not going to his house (Mt 8<sup>4</sup>, Lk 7<sup>2</sup>), while by going with Jairus He supports his weak faith, and is beside him when the stunning message reaches him, 'Thy daughter is dead: why troublest thou the Master any further?' (Mk 5<sup>39</sup>); His whole action in the case of the woman taken in adultery (Jn 8<sup>1-11</sup>); and His attention to the still deeper need of the woman with the issue of blood, whose faith, great as it was, required to be adorned with gratitude to, and confession of, her healer (Mk 5<sup>34-36</sup>). Extreme pain tends to make men forget everything except their own suffering: it only brought out the more the all-embracing considerateness of Christ. His words from the Cross to the Virgin Mother and St. John (Jn 19<sup>26, 27</sup>) teach, no doubt, the new relationships created for believers by the gospel (Mk 10<sup>29</sup>, cf. Ro 16<sup>13</sup>); but they exhibit also His considerate care not needlessly to mention a relationship which might so easily have exposed St. Mary to hustling by the mob, or to syllable names which would have been repeated by irreverent tongues. The post-resurrection sayings to Mary Magdalene (Jn 20<sup>12, 13</sup>), to St. Thomas (Jn 20<sup>27</sup>), and to St. Peter, who, as he had thrice denied his Lord, is thrice restored with delicate allusion to, but not mention of, his threefold fall (Jn 21<sup>16-17</sup>), are examples no less shining and illustrative. (Cf. Bishop Paget's sermon on 'Courtesy' in Studies in the Christian Character, p. 209).

J. COOPER.
CONSOLATION.—1. The word 'consolation' (παράκλησις) occurs only twice in the Gospels (Lk 22<sup>32</sup>, both AV and RV). παράκλησις, however, is a word of common occurrence in the rest of the NT, where in AV it is usually rendered 'consolation,' although not infrequently 'comfort.' In RV 'comfort' has been substituted for 'consolation' except in Ac 4<sup>38</sup> ('exhortation,' marg. 'consolation') 15<sup>31</sup> ('consolation,' marg. 'exhortation'), He 6<sup>18</sup> ('encouragement'). Besides meaning consolation or comfort, παράκλησις sometimes denotes exhortation, and is so rendered both in AV and RV. When it is said of Simeon that he was 'looking for the consolation of Israel' (Lk 2<sup>25</sup>), the word is used by metonymy for the Messianic salvation as bringing consolation to the Chosen People. Similarly the Messiah Himself was known to the Rabbins as נֹחֵם, 'the Consoler,' or 'Comforter,' of Israel (see Schöttgen, Hor. Heb. et Talm. ii. 18). In Lk 6<sup>24</sup> the rich are said to have received their consolation, i.e. the comfort which comes from worldly prosperity, in contrast to those spiritual blessings which Jesus had just promised that His disciples should enjoy in spite of poverty, hunger, and tears (vv. 25-26, cf. 2 Co 13<sup>4</sup>).

2. Consolation in the teaching of Christ.—First of all, there will ever stand the words: 'Come unto me, all ye that travail and are heavy laden' (Mt 11<sup>28-29</sup>). Amid outward storm and inward fear the Lord greets His disciples: 'Be of good cheer: it is I; be not afraid' (Mk 6<sup>5</sup>). The Physician of the ailing body and sick soul addresses the weary sufferer: 'Son, be of good cheer: thy sins are forgiven' (Mt 9<sup>2</sup>). To us to-day His Holy Spirit breathes the same blessings in the gospel of mercy and peace, the Spirit by whom He is with us 'all the days, even unto the completion of the age' (Mt 28<sup>20</sup>). His words do not pass away (Mk 13<sup>31</sup>), and from His Divine lips no word is void of power (Lk 1<sup>37</sup>). 'Peace be unto you' is the first message of the ascended as of the risen Lord (Jn 20<sup>19, 26</sup>). Still He loves 'to the uttermost' (Jn 13<sup>1</sup>); still He can bear to lose not one of those whom His Father has given Him (Jn 18<sup>9</sup>), and still no enemy shall snatch them from His hand (Jn 10<sup>28</sup>). Even the hairs of the head of the children of God are objects of His watchfulness (Lk 12<sup>21</sup>), to number them and to preserve them. So, truly, His service should be without fear (Lk 1<sup>24</sup>). Amid the storms of this changeable life we cry: 'Carest thou not that we perish?' (Mk 4<sup>38</sup>),—and nevertheless the very purpose of His mission was and is that we should have life, and have it more abundantly (Jn 10<sup>10</sup>). There is no uncertainty on His part,—eternal life is the settled purpose of God for man (Jn 6<sup>40</sup>). The grace He bestows is in its nature prolific, and its fruit is eternal life (Jn 4<sup>14, 36</sup>). He gives the Kingdom of God (Lk 12<sup>29</sup>). His message is a gospel (Mt 4<sup>23</sup>). His ears are never closed to our cry (Mt 21<sup>25</sup>). All things are possible with Him (Mk 10<sup>27</sup>).

To these higher thoughts may be added precious truths which have a like consoling power in the conflict with evil ever surging within and without. Our Lord knows our human nature through and through (Jn 2<sup>25</sup>). His purpose is to avert judgment and not to condemn whilst there is time for salvation (12<sup>7</sup>). His condemnations were against hypocrisy and hardness of heart and contempt of His gospel. He came bearing our infirmities and saving us from our sins (Mt 12<sup>12</sup>, Lk 14<sup>14</sup>). What is done to the poor, sick, bereaved, afflicted, is done to Him; and He will remember (Mt 25<sup>40</sup>). His blessing abides with the poor, meek, sincere soul, faithful to the end (Mt 5<sup>12-13</sup>, 10<sup>22</sup>). In this life the disciple must be content to expect little of worldly success, and yet he shall not be uncooled (Mt 10<sup>38</sup>, Mk 10<sup>38</sup>, Jn 16<sup>28</sup>). To His disciple Christ promises: 'I will love thee' (Jn 14<sup>21</sup>). See also art. COMFORT.

W. B. FRANKLAND.

CORBAN is a Hebrew word (קרבן) which appears in the Greek of Mk 7<sup>11</sup>, transliterated κορβάν or κορβάν, and in this form passes into the English Versions. The same word in a modified form occurs also in Mt 27<sup>6</sup>, εἰς τὸν κορβανᾶν, 'into the treasury.' The termination -as in κορβανᾶς is the Greek method of indicating the Aramaic determinative in קרבן. Codex B reads κορβάν for κορβανᾶν.

The word has three meanings: (1) An offering, both bloodless and otherwise. In this sense it occurs about 80 times in OT, always in Leviticus and Numbers, except twice in Ezekiel. In EV it is rendered 'offering' or 'oblation,' but in LXX it is rendered by δῶρον, 'a gift,' and this is the tr. given to κορβάν in Mk 7<sup>11</sup>. (2) A vow-offering, something dedicated to God. In this sense it occurs in the Heb. and Aram. portions of the Talmud, and also in Josephus. In his Antiquities, iv. iv. 4, Josephus says of the Nazirites: 'They dedicate themselves to God as a corban, which in the language of the Greeks denotes "a gift."' So also in c. Apion, i. 22, he speaks of corban as a 'kind of oath, found only among Jews, which denotes "a thing devoted to God."' (3) The sacred treasury into which the gifts for the Temple service were cast by the pious; or, the treasure therein deposited. Thus, in EJ, ii. ix. 4, Josephus says that Herod 'caused a disturbance by spending the sacred treasure, which is called corban, upon aqueducts.' So in Mt 27<sup>6</sup> the high priests say to one another: 'It is not lawful to cast them [Judas' silver pieces] into the treasury (εἰς τὸν κορβανᾶν, B* κορβάν), for it is the price of blood.'

The passage in which corban occurs in our English Bible is Mk 7<sup>11</sup>. Our Lord is there replying to the criticism of the Pharisees that the disciples ate food with hands ceremonially unclean. Christ's reply is a retort. He accuses the Pharisees of attaching too much value to the tradition of the elders, so as even in some cases to set aside in their favour the plain moral commandments of God. The words of Jesus are: 'Is it well for you to set aside the commandment of God, in order that ye may observe your tradition? For Moses said, Honour thy father and thy mother; and, He that speaketh evil of father or mother, let him die the death. But ye say, If a man has said to his father or mother, That wherewith thou mightest have been benefited from me is corban, that is, a gift, [he is absolved]. Ye no longer allow him to do anything for his father or mother.' The same incident is recorded, with slight variations, in Mt 15<sup>2-4</sup>. Commentators are divided as to whether the dedication was meant seriously, and the property actually given to God and put into the treasury; or whether the utterance of the word was a mere evasion, and when the magic word corban had been uttered over any possession, the unfilial son was able to 'square' matters with the Rabbis, so as to be free from obligation to support his aged parents (Bruce on Mt 15<sup>3</sup>). It must be admitted that the Jews were much addicted to making rash vows. One tractate in the Talmud, Nedarim, is specially devoted to the subject. We there find that the customary formula among the Jews for devoting anything to God was, 'Let it be corban;' though, to allow a loophole of possible escape from the vow if they regretted it afterwards, they were in the habit of using other words which sounded like corban. Nedarim, i. 2, says: 'When any one says "konám, or konáh, or konás (be this object, or this food)," these are by-names for forbán.' These words came to be used as a mere formula of interdiction; without any intention of making the thing interdicted 'a gift to God'; e.g., a man seeing his house on fire, says, 'My tallith shall be corban if it is not burnt' (Ned. iii. 6). In making a vow of abstinence a man says: 'Konás be the food (vi. 1) or the wine (viii. 1) which I taste.' When a man resolves not to plough a field, he says, 'Konás be the field, if I plough it' (iv. 7). Repudiation of a wife is thus expressed, 'What my wife might be benefited by me is konás' (יְהִי כְּקִנְיָן אֲשֶׁר אֶקְנֶה, because she has stolen my cup' or 'struck my son' (iii. 2). In viii. 11 we have the very same formula as in Mk 7<sup>11</sup>, except that we have the substitute or substitute, קִנְיָן for קִנְיָן, לִי קִנְיָן אֲשֶׁר אֶקְנֶה (Lowe's Mishná, p. 88).

It is not necessary to think that Jesus had such cases of recklessness in His mind. We prefer to believe that He was thinking of bond fide vows, made to the Temple, hastily, perhaps angrily, without sufficient regard to the claims of aged parents. The question was a very intricate one, What ought the Rabbis to advise the man to do? The Law was most emphatic in its insistence that all vows, when once made, must be kept (Dt 23<sup>21-22</sup>). Which has the higher claim on a man's conscience? The service of God, promoted by the gift, and the Law obeyed by keeping the vow inviolate? or, the support of poor aged parents, the Law broken and the vow violated? It was a delicate matter, and we can scarcely wonder that the Rabbis of Christ's day adhered to the literal significance of Dt 23<sup>21-22</sup> and held that nothing could justify the retraction of a vow. In other words, they allowed the literal and the ceremonial to override the ethical. Jesus disclosed a different 'spirit,' as He ruled that duty to parents is a higher obligation than upholding religious worship, or than observance of a vow rashly or thoughtlessly made.

In Nedarim, ix. 1, we find Eliezer ben Hyrkanos (c. A. D. 90), who in many respects felt the influence of Christianity, give the same view as the Lord Jesus with regard to rash vows. We translate the passage thus—
'R. Eliezer said that when rash vows intrude at all on parental obligation, Rabbis should suggest a retraction (lit. open a door) by appealing to the honour due to parents. The sages dissented. R. Zadok said, instead of appealing to the honour due to parents, let them appeal to the honour due to God; then might rash vows cease to be made. The sages at length agreed with R. Eliezer that if the case be directly between a man and his parents (as in Mk 7<sup>11</sup>), they might suggest retraction by appealing to the honour due to parents.'

The words of R. Meir (c. A. D. 150) are also interesting in this connexion as given in Nedarim, ix. 4—

'One may effect a retraction of a rash vow by quoting what is written in the Law. One may say to him: If thou hadst known that thou wast transgressing such commandments as these, "Thou shalt not take vengeance nor bear a grudge";

"Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart": "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Lv 19:17); "Thy brother shall live with thee" (Lv 25:36); "wouldest thou have made the vow? Perhaps thy brother may become poor, and thou (because of thy rash vow) will not be able to support him. If he shall say, 'If I had known that it was so, I would not have made the vow,'—he may be released from his vow."

These quotations show that, in some directions, the spirit of humaneness was triumphing over the literalism which Jesus combated in His day.

CORN.—In AV of the Gospels 'corn' is used to translate four distinct words in the original:

(1) σπόρια: 'Jesus went on the Sabbath day through the corn' (Mt 12:1). Here 'corn' should be 'cornfields', the rendering of RV in this verse, and of both AV and RV in the parallel passages in Mk. (2nd) and Lk. (6th). σπόρια properly means seed land (σπίρω), and in classical Greek is not found in its NT sense of 'cornfields.'

(2) σίτος, in Mk 4:28, where a contrast is drawn between the different stages in the growth of the cornstalk—first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear. In LXX, as in classical Greek, σίτος is a generic word for cereals, but refers especially to wheat as the staple grain food. Corresponding to this, we find that elsewhere in the NT, both in AV and RV, the word is always translated 'wheat' (Mt 3:12, 28, 29, Lk 3:17, 22nd, Jn 12:24).

(3) σάχυς = 'an ear of corn' (Mt 12:1 || Mk 4:28). So in LXX as an equivalent for ἄνθος in Gn 4:9 etc.

(4) κόκκος = a single grain or 'corn.' It is rendered 'corn' only in Jn 12:24 (AV): "Except a corn of wheat [ὁ κόκκος τοῦ σίτου] fall into the ground and die . . ." (cf. the use of the words 'peppercorn,' 'barleycorn'). Elsewhere in AV (Mt 13:31 || 17:23 ||), as always in RV, it is rendered 'a grain.'

'Corn' is thus used in AV in four distinguishable senses—as applying to a cornfield, to a ripe cornstalk, to an ear of wheat, and to a single grain. And it is noteworthy in each case how intimately the Gospel references to corn are associated with our Lord's revelation of the mysteries of the Kingdom and the truth regarding His own person and saving work. The parable of the Blade, the Ear, and the Full Corn was used to unfold the law of growth in the Kingdom of God. The incident of the plucking of the ears of corn in the cornfields on the Sabbath day served as the occasion for a notable declaration regarding both the dignity of the Son of Man and the graciousness of Him who loves mercy more than sacrifice. The death and fruitful resurrection of the grain of wheat became the prophecy and type of Christ's Passion and consequent power to draw all men unto Himself. And these lessons from the corn in the records of the Lord's ministry may be greatly extended as we recall what He said about the sowing of the corn (parable of the Sower) and its reaping (the Tares and the Wheat); how He saw in the white fields a vision of a great spiritual harvest only waiting to be gathered (Jn 4:34); how at Capernaum He turned the people's minds from the barley bread of the previous day's miracle to think of Himself as the Bread of Life (Jn 6); and said of the broken loaf at the Last Supper, 'Take, eat, this is my body.'

parable of the Wicked Vinedressers (Mt 21:33, Mk 12:1, Lk 20:17). A question was asked about the punishment of such unfaithful servants and the transferring of the vineyard to the charge of others; and the quotation afforded Scripture proof that the necessity for such a transference, however surprising to those rejected, may actually arise in God's administration of His kingdom.

1. Literal meaning of corner-stone.—The term 'stone of the corner' is applied in Palestine not only to the stones at the extreme corners of a building, but to the stone inserted in any part of the outer wall to form the beginning of an interior room-wall at right angles to it. It applies especially, however, to the stone that is ἀγώνιστος, belonging to an extreme corner of the building. In the construction of a large edifice, the foundations are generally laid and brought up to the surface of the ground, and are then left for several months exposed to the rain, so that the surrounding earth may settle down as close as possible to the wall. When the first row of stones above the ground line is to be laid, the masons place a long, well-squared block of stone at the corner to be a sure rest for the terminus of the two walls. It is the most important corner-stone (Eph 2:20).

2. Selection and treatment of the corner-stone.—It is always carefully chosen, and is specially treated in view of its service to be rendered. It must be sound, in the case of sandstone being free from weakening cavities, and in the case of limestone being without any white streaks of spar that under pressure and strain might lead to cleavage.—(b) It must be carefully dressed so as to be quite a rectangular block, whereas the ordinary stones usually slope away at the back, and the empty spaces are filled in with stone chips and plaster. It is expected to be in close and solid contact with whatever is under it and above it.—(c) In preparing a place for it, the mason gives it a more liberal allowance of mortar so as to increase the power of adhesion. These qualifications are summarized in Is 28:16. Thus the corner-stone is expected to be strong and sound in itself, and able to control the tier that belongs to it, and check any tendency to bulge either outwards or inwards.

The thought of Mt 21:44 and Lk 20:17 passes beyond the idea of a corner-stone, which is required to remain in its place, and neither falls on any one nor is fallen upon. The transition is so abrupt that some have been inclined to attach importance to the fact that the addition is omitted in Mk 12:12, and that certain ancient authorities (e.g. D 33) omit it even in St. Matthew. It is a similar conception that appears in 1 Co 12:1, 1 P 2:6, 7, namely, that of a stumbling-block on the public highway. The 'way of life' was a familiar religious term, 'the Way' being a descriptive epithet which Christ applied to Himself (Jn 14:6), and one of the first designations of the Christian Church (Ac 9:2). The same situation of conflict is presented in Is 8:14, where the fear of the Lord would be to some a sanctuary, a place of safety and rest by the way, but to others a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence. Those who marked out to their own liking the moral highway of the nation had obscured the truth that Israel existed for God, not God for Israel, and left no space for the sufferings of Christ. It was an error of blindness like that of the house-builders concerning the rejected corner-stone. They should have made allowance for the immovable object of bed-rock truth that had the right of priority. In the Syrian town of Beyrout one of the carriage roads has at one point a third of its width occupied by an ancient saint-shrine, with its small rough room and dome. It is a useless and inconvenient obstacle to the traffic, but any petition to have it removed would be frowned down as an act of irreverence and infidelity. The shrine was there before the road.

3. Oriental respect for the builders.—In connexion with the rejection of a particular stone, it has to be remembered that the ancients had no explosive by means of which to lighten their labours. The work had to be done by hammer, chisel, and saw, though they knew how to insert wooden wedges in prepared sockets in the line of desired cleavage, and make them expand by soaking with water. They would naturally pass by a stone that required a great deal of work and yielded only ordinary results. They carried this principle to the length of often taking prepared stones from one building for the erection of another at a considerable distance, as when the carved stones of the Ephesian temple of Diana were taken to build the church of St. Sofia in Constantinople, and the ruined edifices of Roman Caesarea supplied the material for the city wall of Acre. It would, however, sometimes happen that a stone discarded by certain builders would be recognized by a wiser master as that which he needed for an important place in his building, and this gave rise to the proverbial saying quoted in Ps 118<sup>22</sup>, which is familiarly repeated and applied to-day in Syria.

The epigrammatic value of the saying is enhanced by the fact that in the East the master-knowledge of the different trades has always been carefully guarded, and a sharp distinction is drawn between the man who thinks and plans and the man who by his elementary manual labour merely carries out the orders of another. In the art of building, a familiar proverb says, 'One stroke from the master, even though it be behind his back, is better than the hammering of a thousand others.' In explanation of this the story is told of a Lebanon prince who engaged a master-mason to build a large bridge of one arch over the river Adonis, and agreed to defray all costs and give the master a certain sum when the work was done. When the bridge was constructed, and nothing remained but to remove the scaffolding, the master claimed his remuneration; and as the prince argued for a reduction of the sum, the master declined to remove the scaffolding. Other men were engaged to do this, but they found it to be such a complicated and dangerous task that they abandoned it, and the original builder had to be called in on his own terms. He stepped forward, and, standing with his back to the network of supporting beams, gave a single tap with his hammer to a particular wedge. Its removal liberated the supports, and as he hurriedly sprang back, the scaffolding collapsed, and left the empty arch of the completed bridge. He alone knew how to do it. Similar proverbs are current with regard to the baker, tailor, carpenter, blacksmith, teacher, doctor, and almost every form of technical industry and specialized profession. The master in his trade occupies a position of respect similar to that of the father in the family and the sheikh in the tribe. In no department is this submission more thoroughgoing than in the deference shown to the Rabbis and priests as the trained masters of religious observance and ecclesiastical duty. In consequence of this the people of the country find a keen though guarded enjoyment in any situation that seems to discredit the wisdom of the wise.

4. Figurative applications of the corner-stone.—In Jg 20<sup>2</sup> and 1 S 14<sup>28</sup> the word pinnith ('corner-stones') is translated 'the chiefs' of the people, as being those whose opinions and actions gave stability and direction to others. In Is 19<sup>13</sup> it is stated that the error of Egypt was through her trust in the princes of Zoan and Noph, who were the corner-stones of her tribes. In the East, the mason in laying a row of stones begins with the corner-stone, and some twelve feet farther down, or at the other terminus of the wall, if it be short, another stone of the same height is laid with lime, and then the mason's measuring-line is stretched tightly over the outer top-corner of each. This gives the line of frontage and elevation to all the stones that fill in the space between them. Zoan and Noph, the corner-stones, being themselves in a false position, affected all between that took measure from them. In Zeph 1<sup>13</sup> 3<sup>8</sup> the same word is translated 'towers,' as the corners of the wall were especially fortified; and in 2 Ch 26<sup>15</sup> 'bulwarks' (RV in all three passages 'battlements'). In Job 38<sup>6</sup> the act of laying the foundation corner-stone of a house is made to describe that of the creation of the world. In Jer 51<sup>28</sup> the inability of Babylon to furnish any more a corner-stone is made to figure its perpetual desolation. In Zec 10<sup>4</sup>, in the prophecy of the pre-eminence of Judah, the corner-stone is a conspicuous emblem, along with the tent-peg and the bow, as signifying that that tribe was to excel in the peaceful industries of the city and the field, and in the art of war.

Such were the meanings of the rejected corner-stone that in their Messianic application were hidden from those who crucified the Lord of glory (1 Co 2<sup>9</sup>), but were revealed to the Gentiles, the 'other husbandmen,' when the word of acceptance and service came to them (Eph 2<sup>12-23</sup>).

It is a tragical error to suppose that the message of the rejected corner-stone was exhausted in the forfeiture and fate of Israel. The city of God is still being built, and blindness with regard to the corner-stone, the mystical presence and the missionary command of Christ, may again expose the builders to scorn, and necessitate another transference of the service.

COSAM.—A name occurring in the Lukan genealogy of our Lord (Lk 3<sup>28</sup>).

COSMOPOLITANISM.—That the Jews were of all nations the most exclusive, was familiar to classic writers (cf. Juv. Sat. xiv. 103 'non monstrare vias eadem nisi sacra colenti,' and Mayor's references ad loc.); though both political and social conditions in the 1st cent. had made cosmopolitanism more possible than it had ever been before (cf. Juv. id. iii. 62 'in Tiberim Syrius defluxit Orontes'). Under the Roman emperors the world was becoming more and more one great State; St. Paul's Roman citizenship stood him in good stead in Philippi as in Jerusalem (Ac 16<sup>21</sup> 22<sup>25</sup>). Even in Palestine there were distinctly cosmopolitan elements, as was inevitable in the case of a country lying across the great trade routes of the world. Decapolis was almost entirely Greek; in Galilee there had for long been a large Gentile population; and foreigners as well as proselytes from all parts of the empire found their way to Jerusalem (Ac 2<sup>9</sup>; see Schürer, HJP, Index, s. 'Hellenism'; and Merrill, Galilee in the Time of Christ). The presence of foreigners, however, is seldom mentioned in the Gospels, save for a few references to centurions (Mt 8<sup>8</sup>, Lk 7<sup>2</sup> 23<sup>47</sup>), strangers from Tyre and Sidon (Mk 3<sup>8</sup>), a short journey to Decapolis (Mk 7<sup>31</sup>), where, strangely enough, the Aramaic word 'Ephphatha' finds special place in the text, and the notice of the Greeks who sought for Jesus at the feast—though no account of His interview with them is given (Jn 12<sup>20</sup>). Traces of a cosmopolitan atmosphere may be detected in Mk 15<sup>21</sup> ('Simon, father of Alexander and Rufus'), in the Greek names of two of the disciples (Andrew and Philip), and the trilingual 'title' on the cross (Jn 19<sup>20</sup>).

Jewish exclusiveness was apparently endorsed by Christ Himself (Mt 5<sup>47</sup> (RV) 6<sup>7-23</sup>); the Twelve are forbidden to go into any way of the Gentiles (Mt 10<sup>5</sup>); and the Syrophenician woman is at first addressed in thoroughly Jewish language (Mt 15<sup>21</sup>, Mk 7<sup>24</sup>). On the other hand, our Lord speaks the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>25-36</sup>); commends the faith of a Roman centurion as greater than any faith He had found in Israel (Mt 8<sup>10</sup>, Lk 7<sup>9</sup>); and, notwithstanding His first words to the Syrophenician woman, recognizes and rewards the greatness of her faith (Mt 15<sup>22-28</sup>, Mk 7<sup>24-29</sup>). Simon welcomes the infant Messiah as a light to lighten the Gentiles (Lk 2<sup>32</sup>), in spite of the markedly Jewish tone of Lk 1 and 2. St. Matthew is the narrator of the visit of Wise Men from the East (Mt 2<sup>1</sup>); and if he traces the genealogy of Christ to Abraham (Mt 1<sup>1</sup>), St. Luke takes it back to Adam and God (Lk 3<sup>38</sup>).

It is true that the Gospels are full of protests against Jewish exclusiveness (Mt 3<sup>9</sup> 'Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father'; cf. Jn 8<sup>37-40</sup>, where the claim founded on descent from Abraham is contemptuously dismissed; also Mt 12<sup>41</sup>, Lk 11<sup>31</sup>, 'the men of Nineveh . . . the queen of Sheba shall rise up in the judgment with this generation and shall condemn it'; Mt 8<sup>11</sup>, Lk 13<sup>29</sup> 'many shall come from the east and the west . . . but the sons of the kingdom shall be cast forth'; and Mt 11<sup>12</sup>, Lk 10<sup>10</sup>, where the unrepentant Bethsaida and Chorazin are contrasted with Tyre and Sidon). So far as this break with the Jews shows itself, it rests on (a) enthusiasm for humanity; cf. esp. the references to publicans and sinners, Mt 9<sup>11</sup>, 11<sup>19</sup>, Mk 2<sup>15</sup>, Lk 5<sup>29</sup>, 7<sup>34</sup>, 15<sup>1</sup>, and the fragment in Jn 7<sup>53-54</sup>; (b) the universalism of the gospel, Mt 24<sup>14</sup>, Mk 14<sup>9</sup> ('what she hath done shall be preached in all the world'), Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, Mk 16<sup>15</sup>, Lk 24<sup>46</sup> ('make disciples of all the nations'); so Jn 3<sup>16</sup> ('I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto myself'); the same thing would result from Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, Mk 10<sup>45</sup> ('to give his life a ransom for many'), if carried out to its logical conclusion; (c) anti-legalism in regard to the Sabbath (Mt 12<sup>1</sup>, Mk 2<sup>23</sup>, Lk 6<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>14</sup>), ceremonial ablutions (Mt 15<sup>1</sup>, Mk 7<sup>19</sup>), the provisions of the Law (Mt 5<sup>21, 27, 28, 43</sup>), and the inadequacy of the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 5<sup>20</sup>). It is noteworthy that the ground of marriage fidelity is carried back from Moses to the Creation (Mt 19<sup>4</sup>, Mk 10<sup>2</sup>), and the Sadducees are referred, on the subject of the resurrection, to God's language to the pre-Mosaic patriarchs (Mk 12<sup>18</sup>, Lk 20<sup>27</sup>); still Christ regards as final a combination of Dt 6<sup>4</sup> and Lv 19<sup>18</sup> (Mk 12<sup>29-31</sup>), and He asserts that His purpose is not to destroy the Law but to fulfil it (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>, cf. Mt 3<sup>9</sup>).

The real nature of Christ's teaching cannot be understood apart from the deductions from it in the Acts, where the recognition of the cosmopolitanism of the gospel is forced on the Apostles almost against their will (Ac 8<sup>29</sup> 10<sup>11-24</sup> 11<sup>20</sup>), and even opposed by a powerful party in the Church when explicitly stated by St. Paul (Ac 13<sup>46</sup>); but it reaches its full statement in Ro 10<sup>12</sup>, Gal 3<sup>28</sup>, Col 3<sup>11</sup> ('neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free'), and Ph 3<sup>20</sup> ('our citizenship is in heaven'). (Cf. J. R. Seeley, Eccle Homo, ch. xii. 'The Universality of the Christian Republic'). It will thus be seen that the recognition of cosmopolitanism in the sense of a universal mission of Christianity is, in the Synoptic Gospels, only slight (cf. Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, Eng. tr. vol. i. pp. 40-48, especially the statement that, omitting what is probably unauthentic, 'Mark and Matthew have almost consistently withstood the temptation to introduce the Gentile mission into the words and deeds of Jesus,' p. 40). St. Luke differs from them in a slight colouring of expression rather than in the narration of fresh facts. St. John had both watched and taken part in the expansion; but the universalism of the Fourth Gospel is chiefly confined to the striking use of the expression 'the world' (see above and 4<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>63</sup> 12<sup>17</sup> etc.), which silently bears out the view—to a Christian, abundantly confirmed after 70 A.D.—that the Jews were a reprobate people. From the rejection of one race followed the acceptance of all (Ro 11<sup>11-12</sup>). See also articles EXCLUSIVENESS, GRECIANS, and UNIVERSALISM. W. F. LOFTHOUSE.

COUCH.—The word 'couch' is found in Lk 5<sup>19-24</sup> (as tr. of κλῦθρον), where Mt 9<sup>2-6</sup> and Mk 2<sup>4-11</sup> have 'bed' (κλίνη and κρεβάττω respectively; κλίνη also in Lk 5<sup>18</sup>). It is found also in RVm of Mk 7<sup>4</sup> as tr. of κλίνη. In Ac 5<sup>15</sup>, where the AV and RV have 'beds and couches,' the correct text is ἐστὶ κλῦθρον καὶ κρεβάττω, 'small beds and couches,' or, as some render, 'small couches and beds.' The fact is, the terms used for 'couch' and 'bed' are not always sharply distinguished—certainly not by translators. The distinction made by Bengel and Kuinoel between κλῦθρον (TR of Ac 5<sup>15</sup>) and κρεβάττω, that the former denotes 'soft and costly,' and the latter 'poor and humble,' beds is quite arbitrary (Meyer). In English usage the distinction between 'bed' and 'couch' is clear enough; a couch is a piece of furniture on which it is customary to repose or recline when dressed. A like distinction was made by the Romans, and in a measure by the Jews in the time of Christ, when 'couches' were often used for the purpose of reclining at meals. They were known among the Romans as triclinia, because they ran round three sides of a table. Such 'couches' were undoubtedly in common use among the Jews of Christ's day, though they are not mentioned in the Gospels in express terms, unless, against the best authorities, we accept καὶ κλῦθρον in Mk 7<sup>4</sup>. They were provided with cushions, such as are now in vogue, on which the left elbow could rest, so as to leave the right arm free; and were often arranged around three sides of a table in the form of a parallelogram, the fourth side of which was left open for the convenience of those waiting on the guests.

This practice of reclining at table first appears in the Bible in the prophecy of Amos (6<sup>4</sup>, cf. Eek 23<sup>4</sup>), and is denounced by the prophet as of foreign origin and as savouring of sinful luxury. The 'couches' there coming into view were of costly cedar-wood inlaid with ivory (6<sup>6</sup>); the feet were plated with silver, and the backs covered with gold-leaf (cf. Ca 3<sup>10</sup>). They were usually furnished with pillows and bolsters, often of fine Egyptian linen or silk, and richly embroidered coverings, costly rugs, etc. (cf. Pr 7<sup>15</sup>). The Tel el-Amarna tablets show how early such luxury prevailed in Palestine, and state that even in those ancient times couches of rare and costly wood inlaid with gold were sent as presents from Palestine to Egypt.

Keeping this in mind will throw light on some otherwise obscure passages in the Gospels, e.g. where the woman is spoken of (Lk 7<sup>38-39</sup>) as washing and anointing the feet of Jesus while He was 'sitting (reclining) at meat in the Pharisee's house'; where our Lord washed the feet of His disciples while they were at supper (Jn 13<sup>5</sup>); and where it is said of the beloved disciple at the supper that he, 'leaning back, as he was, on Jesus' breast,' spoke to Him of His betrayer (v. 25).

There is reason to believe, however, that among the Jewish people in general, in the most ancient times and later, the 'bed,' so far as use went, was 'bed' and 'couch' in one—a plain wooden frame with feet and a slightly raised end for the head (Gn 47<sup>31</sup>), differing very little, indeed, from the bed of the Egyptians represented on the monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 416, fig. 191). In the daytime and at meals people sat on it, in the most ancient times, perhaps, with crossed legs; and then at night they placed it here or there, as the season or need suggested, and slept on it. In the East to-day the beds are often made by laying bolsters on the raised part of the floor, or on the low divans which run along the walls, and the sitting-room of the day becomes a bedroom at night. (See BED, CLOSET). GEO. B. EAGER.

COUNCIL, COUNCILLOR.—See SANHEDRIN.

COUNSELS OF PERFECTION.—See PERFECTI-ON (human).

COUNTENANCE.—See FACE.

COURAGE.—ἀνδρεία, the Gr. equivalent for Heb. נִפְּזוּת and נִפְּזָה, is not found in the Gospels, and, except in 1 Co 16<sup>13</sup>, not in the NT. The valour of the battlefield, so often commended in the OT, nowhere comes into view. Christ's kingdom is not of this world. It does not call for the prowess of the warrior. But there was no taint of cowardice in Jesus, and to be His disciple did not involve any slackening of moral fibre, or impairing of true manliness. He foresaw a situation bristling with menace to His followers, and courage was therefore a prime desideratum in His disciples, as it was an outstanding quality of His own nature. With unsparing hand He lifted the curtain of the future, and disclosed to all who would follow Him the hostility and peril which discipleship must involve (Mt 5<sup>1</sup>, 10<sup>28-29</sup>, Mk 13<sup>12</sup>, Lk 21<sup>17</sup>, Jn 15<sup>20</sup>, 16<sup>1</sup>). He who would follow Christ must not be faint-hearted or double-minded (Lk 9<sup>2</sup>), he must be prepared to surrender many interests that were formerly dear to him, brace himself even to the renunciation of the closest earthly relationships, and, recognizing that the discipline is not greater than his Master, be ready to tread the same rough path, and bear the same cross. The demand for courage is all the more severe that it is not the courage of resisting, but of enduring wrong. The disciple of Jesus is called to meekness, to the patient endurance of suffering wrongfully inflicted, to the heroism of a calm and trustful heart. But the meek temper is not the sign of weakness. It is restrained strength. It is the high courage of endurance, in the spirit and for the sake of Christ. It is of this sustained heroism that Jesus says, 'In your patience (ὑπομονή, 'patient endurance') ye shall win your souls' (Lk 21<sup>19</sup>), 'He that endureth to the end shall be saved' (Mt 10<sup>22</sup>, 24<sup>13</sup>); and those who, in spite of pain and persecution, confess Him before men, He declares He will confess before His Father and the holy angels (Lk 12<sup>9</sup>, cf. Mt 10<sup>32</sup>).

Of this high moral courage Jesus Himself is the supreme example. The emphasis which is so rightly laid upon His gentleness and compassion tends to obscure His strength and virility. But the remark in Ac 4<sup>13</sup> 'When they saw the boldness of Peter and John . . . they took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus,' is the record of the dominant impression made by Jesus upon His enemies. The depth and warmth of His sympathy had not deluded them into the thought that He was deficient in courage. They bore witness to His fearlessness and fidelity to truth (Jn 7<sup>26</sup>, Mt 22<sup>6</sup>). His fearless exposure of hypocrisy (Mt 15<sup>1-4</sup>, Mk 7<sup>1-13</sup>, Mt 23<sup>1-38</sup> et al.), His disregard of, or opposition to, religious practices which had been invested with the sanctity of Divine law, and the performance of which was the hall-mark of righteousness (Mt 9<sup>14</sup>, 12<sup>1-9</sup>, Mk 2<sup>16-17</sup>, Lk 5<sup>27</sup>, 6<sup>1-9</sup>), His defiance of social and religious caste in receiving sinners and eating with them were the moral utterances of a courageous righteousness and love (Mt 9<sup>10</sup>, Lk 15<sup>2</sup>). In circumstances of danger He is calm and self-possessed (Mt 8<sup>26</sup>). He does not rush into danger, and more than once retires from scenes where His life is threatened (Lk 4<sup>29</sup>, Jn 8<sup>29</sup>, 10<sup>39</sup>). At those times He felt that His hour had not come. His courage was inspired by faith in God (Mt 8<sup>26</sup>), and was controlled by obedience to the Divine will. When He knows that His hour has come, He presses to the cross with an eagerness which made those who saw Him afraid (Mk 10<sup>32</sup>). But it is only as we enter into the consciousness of Jesus and see Him in His perfect purity of soul taking upon Him the sin of the world, that we feel the wonder of His heroism. We do not marvel that He shrank from the cup His Father gave Him to drink. We are amazed equally at the love and at the courage which bore Him through until He said, 'It is finished' (Jn 19<sup>30</sup>). See, further, FEAR.

COURSE.—See ABIAH, and PRIEST.

COURT (αὐλή, tr. 'court' in Rev 11<sup>2</sup>, 'sheepfold' or 'fold' in Jn 10<sup>1, 25</sup>, and 'palace' [RV 'court'] in Mt 26<sup>68</sup> etc.).—The 'court' is an essential part of the typical Oriental house. The Eastern house represented on the monuments of Egypt and Assyria is much like that now found, and doubtless found in the time of Christ, in Palestine. It is built around an open square called 'the court,' into which each room opens, seldom one room into another. Sometimes the house has more than one 'court,' if the wealth or the official station of the owner warrants it.

In the richer private and public houses the 'court' is fitted up with great magnificence. In Damascus we find several courts connected with a single house, in some cases of rare richness and beauty. The houses of two or more storeys have chambers on each floor opening on to a common balcony running round the inside of the court, with a staircase in a corner of the court open to the sky. This type of 'court' is usually paved with marble or flagging, and has a well or fountain in the centre (2 S 17<sup>18</sup>), with orange and lemon trees and other shrubs around it. Some of them are planted with choice tropical trees, and the walls, verandahs, staircases, etc., are covered and adorned with creepers and vines of untold varieties.

In Mt 26<sup>68</sup> it is said that 'Peter sat without, ἐξῆρθε αὐλήν,' i.e. in the 'court' of the high priest's house (v. 28). It was during the trial of Jesus; and 'without' is used in contrast with an implied 'within'—the interior of the audience-room in which Jesus was appearing before the authorities. Peter was not allowed into this room, but was out in the open air of the 'court'; and this was 'beneath' (Mk 14<sup>6</sup>), i.e. on a somewhat lower level than the audience-chamber.

The 'court of the Gentiles,' which was 'without the temple' (Rev 11<sup>2</sup>), was on the lowest level or terrace of the Holy Mountain, and separated from the 'Sanctuary' or 'Mountain of the House' by a stone wall four or five feet high, called 'the Soreg.' All Gentiles were warned to remain outside of this sacred enclosure under penalty of death (cf. Ac 21<sup>28-29</sup>, 24<sup>11</sup>, 26<sup>21</sup>). See also art. DOOR, HOUSE. GEO. B. EAGER.

COURTESY.—The courtesies of life have always received more strict and formal recognition in the East than in the West. The people of Palestine in Christ's time were no exception to this rule. They were punctilious about those conventional forms which hedge in and govern social life, and were not slow to resent the breach or neglect of these forms when it affected them directly (Mt 22<sup>7</sup>, Lk 14<sup>10-21</sup>). A remarkably complete picture of the ordinary forms of courtesy observed by them may be made up from the Gospel narratives. The incidents of Christ's life, together with His sayings and parables, show us the marked deference paid to authority, position, and learning (Mt 17<sup>14</sup> 22<sup>24-25</sup> 23<sup>7</sup> etc.), the elaborate and somewhat burdensome hospitality bestowed on friends and strangers when received as guests into a house (Lk 7<sup>44-46</sup>), the embracings and prolonged salutations practised (Mt 26<sup>9</sup>, Mk 14<sup>4</sup>; cf. Lk 10<sup>41</sup> 15<sup>20</sup> 22<sup>7</sup>, Mt 10<sup>21</sup>), the formalities observed in connexion with feasts in rich men's houses (Mt 22<sup>11</sup>, Lk 14<sup>17</sup>).

These courteous habits must not be regarded as mere superficial forms. The fact that the neglect of them, especially if believed to be intentional, caused such serious offence to the suffering party, is a sufficient evidence that they were more than surface forms. At the same time the courtesies practised were not always sincere (note the kiss of Judas), and were, moreover, occasionally violated in a peculiarly flagrant manner, as we learn from the treatment Christ received once and again from those who opposed Him, especially the treatment He received immediately before His death. The warm Oriental temperament, indeed, which had so much to do with creating these courtesies, and which found so much satisfaction in observing them, was ready, under certain circumstances, to violate them to an extent that the colder Western temperament would never have done.

Christ's attitude towards the established rules of courtesy is a question of interest and importance. His relation towards these time-worn rules was the same as His relation towards the Law of Moses. He observed them in the spirit and not in the letter, and only in so far as they sincerely revealed His thoughts and feelings. They were never mere forms to Him, much less forms used to hide the real intents of His heart. That His attitude was not the conventional attitude of others, but was peculiar to Himself, like His attitude towards the Law (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>), is evident from the following considerations: (1) He recognized and followed the customary laws in so far as they served to express His real sentiments (Lk 7<sup>44-46</sup> 10<sup>5</sup>, Jn 13<sup>6-7</sup>); (2) He transgressed them boldly at times, as in His cleansing of the Temple, His injunction 'Salute no man by the way' (Lk 10<sup>5</sup>), and His intercourse with tax-gatherers and sinners; (3) He gave a larger and more humane interpretation to them by His generous and considerate treatment, not only of tax-gatherers and sinners, but of women, children, Samaritans, and others who were regarded as more or less outside the ordinary rules of courtesy.

There are two instances where Jesus seems to fail in the matter of courtesy—in His reply to His mother, 'Woman, what have I to do with thee?' (Jn 2<sup>4</sup>), and in His reply to the Syro-Phœnician woman, 'Let the children first be filled: for it is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it unto the dogs' (Mt 15<sup>26</sup> || Mk 7<sup>27</sup>). It is only in appearance, however, that He offends against courtesy in these instances. The study of the passages with the aid of a good commentary will clear up any difficulty attaching to them.

MONSON DRYCE.

COVENANT.—In order to a correct apprehension of the term 'covenant,' as it is used by our Lord in the Gospels, a brief survey of the OT usage is necessary.

The covenant conception is of frequent occurrence in the OT. Used at first in connexion with single transactions and partial aspects of the religious intercourse between God and man, it later becomes the formula designating the entire structure and content of the religion of Israel in its most comprehensive sense. This latter representation occurs as early as Gn 17<sup>1-14</sup>, Ex 19<sup>8</sup> 24<sup>7</sup>, and often in Deuteronomy. The earlier covenants belonging to the time of Noah and Abraham (Gn 9<sup>11</sup> 9<sup>17</sup> 15<sup>18</sup>) do not yet possess this comprehensive character, but appear as solemn religious rites whereby some particular promise of God is made sure. Whether the word berith (ברית) originally meant 'enactment,' 'appointment,' 'law,' a meaning which it undoubtedly has in several instances, or did from the beginning signify a two-sided agreement, cannot be determined with certainty. It seems easier to conceive of the former sense as developed out of the latter than the reverse. At any rate, the comprehensive signification in which it stands for the whole religious relationship between God and Israel, rests on the idea of the covenant as a two-sided agreement. It should be remembered, however, that the two-sidedness never extends so far that God and Israel appear on an equal footing in the determination of the covenant. The planning and proposing of the covenant belong exclusively to God. Still the fact that Israel voluntarily accepts the covenant is as strongly emphasized (Ex 19<sup>8</sup> 24<sup>7</sup>, and elsewhere). Indeed, the covenant idea serves primarily to express the free, ethical, historically originated bond that exists between God and Israel. Its covenant character marks off the religion of Israel as a religion of real, conscious, spiritual fellowship between God and His people, in distinction from the religions of paganism, in which either the Deity and the creature are pantheistically fused, or the God-head after a deistic fashion is so far removed from the creature as to render true communion impossible, and where the relation between a national god and his worshippers is not a matter of choice but of necessity on both sides.

In the early Prophets the conception of the covenant is not particularly prominent. With Hosea, the figure of marriage, probably not viewed as yet by the prophet as a species of covenant, serves the same purpose. There is no reason, however, for denying that Hosea knew the covenant conception in its comprehensive religious sense, and on this ground to call in question the genuineness of 8<sup>1</sup>. Greater prominence the covenant idea obtains from the age of Jeremiah onwards. Besides the emphasis thrown on the ethical-historical character of Israel's religion, two other important principles attach themselves to the term, partly developing out of the principle just stated. On the one hand, the covenant idea begins to express the continuity of God's dealings with His people; as it is a bond freely established, so it is the fruit of design and the fountain of a history of redemption and revelation. On the other hand, inasmuch as God is the originator of the covenant and has solemnly bound Himself not merely to fulfil His promises to Israel, but also to carry out His own purpose contemplated in the covenant, the same bond which originally expresses the freedom of the relation between God and Israel can also become the pledge of the absolute certainty, that God will not finally break with His people, Israel's infidelity notwithstanding. In Isaiah 40-66, and especially in Jeremiah, the covenant thus stands to express the continuity and sureness of the accomplishment of the Divine purpose with reference to Israel. Out of the combination of these two ideas arises the Messianic or eschatological significance which the covenant idea obtains in both these prophets. In Isaiah 40-66 it is more than once introduced to emphasize the infallible character of the Divine promise given of old (Is 42<sup>10-13</sup> 53<sup>9</sup> 66<sup>19</sup> 67<sup>1</sup>). In two passages (48<sup>9</sup> and 49<sup>8</sup>) the servant of Jehovah is designated as עַבְדִּי, a somewhat obscure phrase, of which the two most plausible interpretations are, either that the servant will be the instrument of realizing the future covenant between God and Israel, or, placing the emphasis on עַבְדִּי, that he will be the means of establishing a people-berith, a berith in which Israel, in contrast to its present scattered condition, will once more become a united, organized nation. These two passages are of importance, because they bring the idea of the covenant into connexion with the figure of the Servant of Jehovah, which, assuming that the latter was Messianically interpreted by our Lord and applied to Himself, would explain that He represents Himself as the inaugurator of a new covenant.

In Jeremiah the covenant idea appears as a Messianic idea in two forms. In so far as the promise given to the house of David was a promise pledged in solemn covenant, the Messianic blessings are a covenant gift (33<sup>20</sup> 32; cf. Ps 89<sup>28</sup>, Is 55<sup>3</sup>). This is an instance of the old application of the idea to a concrete promise, which, however, in the present case, owing to the wide scope of the promise involved, would easily become identified in the mind of later generations with the expectation of an eschatological covenant in the comprehensive sense. The latter is the other form in which Jeremiah uses the covenant with reference to the future (31<sup>31-34</sup>). This is the only place where the notion of a new covenant occurs explicitly, although the thought itself is not foreign to the older prophets. Hosea has it in the form of the new marriage which Jehovah will contract with Israel. Jeremiah conceives of the new covenant as the outcome of the covenant character of the relation between God and Israel in general. To the prophet's mind religion and the covenant have become so identified that the covenant idea becomes the stable, permanent element in the historical development; if in its old form the covenant disappears, then in a new form it must reappear. The newness will consist in the twofold feature, that the sin of the people will be forgiven, i.e. the former sin, and that the law of Jehovah, instead of being an outward, objective covenant obligation, will become an inward, subjective covenant reality, written on the heart in consequence of the universal and perfect knowledge of Jehovah which will prevail. This passage in Jeremiah lies at the basis of the NT use of the phrase 'the new covenant.'

Two further passages in the prophets, to which a Messianic application of the covenant idea could easily attach itself, are Zec 9:11 and Mal 3:1. In the former passage the original reads: 'Because of the blood of thy covenant, I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water'; the LXX has, in the second person of address to Jehovah, 'Because of the blood of thy covenant, thou hast sent forth'; etc. On the former rendering the covenant is the covenant made with Israel, or, since this interpretation of the suffix 'thy' is deemed impossible by some, we may refer the suffix to the compound phrase: 'covenant blood', and understand the phrase 'thy covenant blood' of the sacrificial blood by means of which Israel continually upholds and renews the covenant with Jehovah. On the rendering of the LXX the covenant is represented as the covenant made and maintained by Jehovah. In the Malachi passage the coming of the 'angel' or 'messenger of the covenant' is predicted. This 'angel of the covenant' is not identical with the Lord, but as a distinct person he accompanies the coming of the Lord to His temple. He is called 'the angel of the covenant', either because he realizes the covenant, or because his coming is in virtue of the existing covenant. It is easy to see how on either view a significant connexion could be established between the Messiah and the covenant.

The LXX regularly renders berith by diathesis, the later Greek versions prefer synthesis. The latter term better expresses the idea of a two-sided agreement; but probably this was precisely the reason why the LXX translators, desiring to emphasize the one-sided Divine origin and character of the covenant, avoided it. It should also be remembered that in not a few instances berith in the original meant not a covenant, but an authoritative disposition, which, as stated above, is according to some scholars even the primary meaning of the word. On the side of the Greek, also, there were considerations which explain the choice of diathesis in preference to synthesis. It is true, in classical Greek the former meant usually a testamentary disposition, and might in so far have seemed unsuitable as a rendering for berith. But occasionally at least diathesis could stand for a two-sided agreement (Aristoph. Av. 432). The verb diathesis was not bound to the notion of 'testament', but signified authoritative arrangements generally. And above all things it should be noted that the testamentary diathesis among the Greeks before and at the time of the LXX translation differed in many respects from our modern Roman-law 'testament', and possessed features which brought it into closer contact with the Hebrew berith. The diathesis was a solemn and public transaction of a religious character, by which an irrevocable disposition of rights and property was made, and which for its effect was dependent on the death of the testator, but immediately set in operation certain of the duties and relationships established. Thus conceived, the diathesis could all the more easily become the equivalent of the berith between God and Israel, because already in the OT the idea of 'the inheritance' had significantly attached itself to that of the covenant.

In the NT the noun used is always diathesis, but the cognate forms of synthesis appear in the verb (Lk 22:20) and the adjective (Eo 1:13). Diathesis occurs in the NT 23 times. The word retains the one-sided associations of the LXX usage, yet in most cases the NT writers show themselves aware of the peculiar covenant-meaning descended with it from the OT. An additional possibility of interpreting it in the sense of testament was furnished by the fact that the blessings of the Messianic era were derived from the death of Christ. Hence in He 9:15-17 the new covenant is represented as a testament bestowing upon believers the eternal inheritance, because the death of Christ had to intervene to make the bestowal effectual. As Ramsay has pointed out (Expositor, Nov. 1896, pp. 321-330), this representation is based on Roman law, according to which a testament has no force until the death of the testator. On the other hand, the Pauline representation of Gal 3:17-18 is based on the Greco-Syrian law of the earlier period, under which the diathesis, once made, could not be subsequently modified, and took effect in certain directions immediately. No reflection is here made on the death of the testator. Still, that diathesis does not here have the unmodified OT sense of 'covenant', but means 'testamentary disposition', is plain from the fact that 'sonship' and 'heirship' are connected with it in the course of the argument. These two passages in Hebrews and Galatians are the only NT passages which explicitly refer to the testamentary character of the diathesis. In how far in other instances the associations of the testament idea lay in the speaker's or writer's mind cannot be determined with certainty (cf. Ac 20:32 hetairotai; Gal 4:34 diathesis synthesis hetairotai diathesis).

In the AV of the NT diathesis is in 14 instances rendered by 'testament' (Mt 26:28, Mk 14:24, Lk 22:20, 1 Co 11:25, 2 Co 3:14, He 7:22, 9:15, 10:17, 10:20, Rev 11:19). As a marginal alternative 'testament' is also offered in Eo 9:4, Gal 3:15, He 9:15, 12:20. In all these cases, except in He 9:15, the RV has replaced 'testament' by 'covenant', offering, however, the former as a marginal alternative in Mt 26:28, Mk 14:24, Lk 22:20, 1 Co 11:25, 2 Co 3:14, Gal 3:15, He 7:22, 9:15, 10:17, 10:20, Rev 11:19. In the American RV the marginal reading 'testament' has in all these cases been dropped, except in He 9:15. The principle by which the Revisers were guided is plain. The only question can be whether, in view of what was stated above, they were right in rendering 'covenant' and not 'testament' in Gal 3:15-17. The point to be determined in each case is not whether the associations of 'testament' were present to the speaker's or writer's mind, but whether those of 'covenant' were absent: only where the latter is the case ought 'covenant' to be abandoned, and Gal 3:15 seems to belong to this class. What motives in each case underlie the choice of 'testament' and 'covenant' in AV is not so plain. Possibly these motives were not always exceptional, but derived from the usage of earlier (English and other) versions. The following explanation is offered tentatively: wherever the contrast between the old and the new diathesis is expressed or implied, 'testament' was chosen, because 'testament' had long since, on the basis of the Latin Bible, become familiar as a designation of the two canons of Scripture, in the forms 'the Old Testament,' 'the New Testament.' This will explain Mt 26:28, Mk 14:24, Lk 22:20, 1 Co 11:25, 2 Co 3:14, He 7:22. In He 9:15-20, of course, the import of the passage itself required 'testament.' He 9:15 ('a better covenant') ? ('that first covenant') ? ('a new covenant') ? 12:24 ('the new covenant'), seem to run contrary to the explanation offered, but in each of these instances the context furnished a special reason for favouring 'covenant': in He 9:15 the discourse revolves around the quotation from Jeremiah, which had 'covenant'; 9:15 is still continuous with this section, and in 12:24 the contrast between the mediatorship of Moses and that of Jesus, and the reference to the transaction of Ex 24, suggested 'covenant.' In 2 Co 3:14 'testament' was especially suitable, because here the idea of diathesis might seem to approach that of a body of writings (v. 14 'the reading of the Old Testament'). Strong's adds an explanation in Rev 11:19 ('the ark of the testament'), cf. He 9:4 ('the ark of the covenant').

It seems strange at first sight that a conception so prominent in the OT is so little utilized in the NT. Perhaps the main reason for this was the intensity of the eschatological interest in that age, which made other terms appear more suitable to describe the new order of things felt to be approaching or to have already begun. On the whole, the covenant idea had not been intimately associated with eschatology in the OT. The consciousness that the work of Christ had ushered in a new state of things for the present life of the people of God, distinct and detached from the legal life of Judaism, for which latter the word 'covenant' had become the characteristic expression, dawned only gradually upon the early Church. The phrase 'Kingdom of God,' while emphasizing the newness of the Messianic order of things, leaves unexpressed the superseding of the Mosaic institutions by the introduction of something else.

With this agrees the fact that the conception of Christianity as a covenant is most familiar to precisely those two NT writers who with greatest clearness and emphasis draw the contrast between the Mosaic forms of life and those of the Christian era, viz. St. Paul and the author of Hebrews. Even with St. Paul, however, the contrast referred to finds only occasional expression in terms of the covenant: as a rule, it is expressed in other ways, such as the antithesis between law and grace, works and faith. The Epistle to the Hebrews is the only NT writing which gives to the covenant idea the same central dominating place as it has in the greater part of the OT.

In the Gospels the word 'covenant,' in a religious sense, occurs but twice, in Lk 1:22, and in the words spoken by our Lord at the Supper. In the former passage the covenant with Abraham is referred to, and the Messianic salvation represented as a fulfilment of the promise of that covenant. The emergence of the idea here is in harmony with the best OT traditions: it expresses the consciousness of the sovereign grace and undeserved faithfulness of God which pervades the prophetic pieces preserved for us in the gospel of the incarnation according to St. Luke. Of course, in a broad sense the idea of the relation between God and Israel embodied in the word 'covenant' underlies and pervades all our Lord's teaching. Notwithstanding the so-called 'intensive universalism' and the recognition of religion as a natural bond between God and man, antedating all positive forms of intercourse, our Lord was a thoroughgoing supernaturalist, who viewed both the past relationship of God to Israel and the future relationship to be established in the Kingdom not as the outcome of the natural religion of man, but as the product of a special, historic, supernatural approach of God to man, such as the OT calls 'covenant.' While probably the legalistic shade of meaning which the word had obtained was less congenial to Him. He must have been in full accord with the genuine OT principle expressed in it. Mk 8<sup>38</sup> and Mt 12<sup>29</sup> speak of the Jews as an 'adulterous generation,' and probably the later prophetic representation of the covenant as a marriage-covenant lies at the basis of this mode of statement.

The words spoken at the Supper were, according to St. Matthew (26<sup>28</sup>) and St. Mark (14<sup>22</sup>), τοῦτο ἔστιν τὸ αἶμα μου τῆς διαθήκης (AD in Matthew and A in Mark τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης); according to St. Luke (22<sup>20</sup>) and St. Paul (1 Co 11<sup>25</sup>) τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον ἢ καιρῆ διαθήκη ἐν τῷ αἵματι μου [in 1 Co. ἐφ' αἵματι]. There is some doubt, however, about the genuineness of the context in St. Luke in which these words occur. In (and some other) MSS, 22<sup>20</sup> (beginning with τὸ ἕρπ ἕωσιν) and v. 20 are lacking. The textual-critical problem is a very complicated one (cf. Westcott and Hort, Notes on Select Readings in the Appendix, pp. 63-64; Haupt, Ueber die ursprüngliche Form und Bedeutung der Abendmahlsworte, pp. 6-10; Johannes Weiss, Das älteste Evangelium, p. 29; Johannes Hoffmann, Das Abendmahl im Urchristenthum, pp. 7, 8 [all of whom adopt the shorter text]; Schultzen, Das Abendmahl im Neuen Testament, pp. 5-19; R. A. Hoffmann, Die Abendmahlsgedanken Jesu Christi, pp. 7-21 [who are in favour of the TR]). It ought to be remembered, though it is sometimes overlooked, that the rejection of vv. 20<sup>20</sup> as not originally belonging to the Gospel is by no means equivalent to declaring these words unhistorical, i.e. not spoken by Jesus. Wendt, e.g. (Die Lehre Jesu?, p. 496), assumes the originality of the shorter text in St. Luke, and yet believes, on the basis of the other records, that Jesus spoke the words which St. Luke, for reasons arising out of his 'combination-method,' omitted. (Similarly Haupt, p. 10). Still, as a matter of fact, with some writers the adoption of the shorter text is accompanied by the belief that it represents an older and more accurate tradition of what actually took place. On the other hand, it remains possible, even in retaining the TR as originally Lukan, to believe that St. Luke's source supplied him with a highly peculiar version of the occurrence preserved in vv. 18-20, and that he assimilated this to the other more current representation by borrowing vv. 19b, 20 from St. Paul. On the whole, however, the acceptance of the genuineness of the longer text naturally tends to strengthen the presumption that a statement in regard to which all the records agree must be historical. Contextual considerations also seem to speak in favour of the genuineness of the disputed words. If vv. 19b, 20 do not belong to the text, St. Luke must have looked upon the cup of v. 17 as the cup of the Sacrament, for it would have been impossible for him to relate an institution sub uno specie. But this assumption, viz. that the cup of v. 17 meant for St. Luke the cup of the Sacrament, is impossible, because v. 19 comes between this cup and the bread of v. 19. Further, v. 19 so closely corresponds to v. 16 as to set vv. 18-19 by themselves, a group of four verses with a carefully constructed parallelism between the first and the third, the second and the fourth of its members respectively; and inasmuch as v. 17 belongs to this group, it cannot very well have been connected by the author with v. 19 in such a close manner as the co-ordination of the cup and the bread in the Sacrament would require. In general, the advocates of the shorter text do not succeed in explaining how the author of the Third Gospel, who must have been familiar with the other accounts, and can hardly have differed from them in his belief that the Supper was instituted as celebrated in the Church at that time, could have regarded vv. 19b-20 as an adequate institution of the rite with which he was acquainted. It is much easier to believe that a later copyist found the cup of the Sacrament in v. 17, and therefore omitted v. 20, than that a careful historian, such as St. Luke was, should have deliberately entertained this view, even if he had found a version to that effect in one of his sources.

Altogether apart from the textual problem in St. Luke, the historicity of the words relating to the covenant-blood has been called in question. Just as the saying about the λόγος in Mk 10<sup>6</sup> and Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, so this utterance has been suspected since the time of Baur on account of its alleged Paulinizing character. Recently this view has gained renewed advocacy by such writers as W. Brandt, Die Evangelische Geschichte, pp. 289 ff. 566; Bousset, Die Evangelicität Justin des Märtyrers, p. 112 ff.; Wrede, ZNTW, 1900, pp. 69-74; Hollmann, Die Bedeutung des Todes Jesu, p. 145 ff. The principal arguments on which these writers rest their contention are, that whilst to St. Paul the idea of the new covenant is familiar, no trace of it appears elsewhere in the teaching of Jesus; that it is expressive of an antithesis to the OT religion and its institutions out of harmony with Jesus' general attitude towards these; that in Justin Martyr's version of the institution the disputed words do not occur (so Bousset); that the structure of the sentence in Matthew and Mark still betrays the later addition of the genitive τῆς διαθήκης (so Wrede). The mere fact, however, that a certain conception occurs with a degree of doctrinal pointedness in Paul, does not warrant us in suspecting it when it occurs in the mouth of Jesus. With St. Paul himself the shade of meaning of the word is not in every passage the same. It cannot be proved that the Apostle read into what were to him the words of the institution an anti-Judaistic significance, such as belongs to the conception in Gal 4<sup>4</sup> and 2 Co 3<sup>6</sup>. Even the characterization of the διαθήκη as καιρῆ does not require us to assume this. Even to St. Paul, we shall have to say, the phrase καιρῆ διαθήκη has in the present instance the more general soteriological associations, in view of which the antithesis of the new to the old and the superseding of the old by the new recede into the background. The new covenant is the covenant which fulfils the OT promises, rather than the new covenant which abrogates the OT law. With still more assurance we may affirm this of the words as ascribed to Jesus in Mark and Matthew. Here (apart from the hardly original reading of A and D in Matthew and A in Mark) the explicit designation of the διαθήκη as καιρῆ is not found. While the thought of the substitution of one covenant for another is undoubtedly the logical correlate of the statement even in this form, yet such an inference, if present at all, can have lain in the periphery only, not in the centre of the consciousness of Him who thus spoke.

It ought to be observed that the literal rendering of the words is not: 'This is my covenant-blood,' with the emphasis on the pronoun, but: 'This is my blood, covenant-blood.' The enclitic μου is too weak to bear the stress the former rendering would put upon it. Accordingly, μου belongs neither to δαθήκη nor to the compound idea 'covenant-blood,' but to the noun 'blood' only, as is also required by this, that τὸ αἷμα μου should be the exact correlate of τὸ σῶμα μου. The other construction, 'my covenant,' could only mean either 'the covenant concluded with me,' as in the original of Zec 9<sup>11</sup>, or 'the covenant made by me as a contracting party,' as in the LXX rendering of that passage, hardly 'the covenant inaugurated by me between God and you.' And yet the last it would have to mean here, if μου went with δαθήκη. By these considerations we are led to adopt the rendering 'this is my blood, covenant-blood'; and this rendering makes it appear at once, that our Lord does not in the first place contrast His covenant-blood with the Mosaic covenant-blood, but simply speaks of His blood as partaking of the character of covenant-blood after the analogy of that used by Moses. But even if the comparison with the Mosaic covenant bore more of an antithetical character than it does, it would still be rash to assert that such an antithesis between the relation to God inaugurated by Himself and that prevailing under the Mosaic law could find no place in our Lord's consciousness, especially towards the close of His life. His attitude towards the Mosaic law, as reflected in the Gospels, presents a complicated problem. This much, however, is beyond doubt, that side by side with reverence for the Law there is, both in His teaching and conduct, a note of sovereign freedom with regard to it. From the position expressed in such sayings as Mk 2<sup>21</sup>, 27<sup>18-23</sup> to the conception of a new covenant superseding the old there is but one step.

We take for granted that the words were actually spoken by Jesus. In view of the fact that He uttered them in Aramaic, the question, whether the rendering of Matthew and Mark or that of Paul and Luke more nearly reproduces the original, becomes difficult to decide and also of minor importance. Zahn (Evangel. d. Matth., p. 686, note 52) suggests that from the Aramaic form ܡܝܢ ܕܢܝܚܝܢ both renderings might, without material modification of the sense, have been derived. That the thought is in both forms essentially the same will appear later, after we have inquired into the content of Jesus' statement.

The intricate problems connected with the institution of the Supper can here be touched upon in so far only as they bear upon the meaning of the words relating to the covenant. We give a brief survey of the various interpretations placed upon those words.

First we may mention the interpretation according to which the covenant spoken of by Jesus stands in no real connexion with His death. Most modern writers who detach the original significance of the act of Jesus from His death, assume that the reference to the covenant is a later addition. Thus Johannes Hoffmann makes Jesus say no more than 'This is my body,' 'This is my blood,' and interprets this as meaning, that the disciples must be closely knit together as members of one body, Himself forming the centre. The meal is a meal of friendship, the Saviour even at this eleventh hour did not expect to die, but confidently looked forward to the immediate glorious appearance of the Kingdom of God. With this thought in mind He asked the disciples to unite themselves symbolically into the little flock for which the Kingdom was appointed.

Dismissing this and similar views, because they leave the covenant words out of consideration, we note that Spitta has developed a hypothesis which, while cutting loose the Supper from the death of Christ, nevertheless interprets its symbolism as a covenant symbolism (Zur Geschichte und Literatur des Urchristentums, I, pp. 207-237). According to Spitta, the covenant is none other than the Davidic-Messianic covenant promised by the prophets, and inasmuch as this covenant had been frequently represented under the figure of a great feast, our Lord could by means of the Supper give to the disciples a symbolic anticipation of its approaching joys, the more so since the figure of a banquet to describe the eschatological Kingdom occurs also elsewhere in Jesus' teaching. The partaking of this Messianic feast could be represented as a partaking of the Messiah ('This is my body,' 'This is my blood'), because the Messiah was the Author and Centre of these future blessings. Jesus, while knowing that His death was at hand, yet in faith projected Himself beyond death into the time of the Kingdom:

the Supper was to Him a feast of joy, not a memorial of death. It was a single triumphant anticipation of the great feast of victory, not intended to be repeated as a rite. The present description of the covenant as a new covenant in the Pauline-Lukan record is, according to Spitta, a later modification of the conception in an anti-Judaistic direction. So far as its understanding of the term 'covenant' is concerned, this hypothesis has a certain OT basis to rest upon. To be sure, the Davidic covenant, to which Spitta makes Jesus refer, is in the OT a past covenant, a covenant made with David, the pledge and basis of future blessings, not a name for the blessings of the Messianic age themselves. But this might easily become blended with the prophetic prediction of a new covenant in the Messianic time, and then actually the covenant of David could become equivalent to the Messianic blessedness (cf. Is 55<sup>3</sup> 'the sure mercies of David'). There is, however, no prophetic passage which joins together the conceptions of the Messianic covenant and of a feast, so that no explanation is offered of the association of the one with the other in the mind of Jesus. The account of Ex 24 far more plausibly explains the combination of these two ideas, for here the covenant and the feast actually occur together. And if this be the more direct source of our Lord's reference to the covenant, then it follows that the blood and the covenant stand in a much more direct connexion with each other than Spitta assumes. According to Spitta, it is the blood which represents the personality of Jesus, who is the Author and Centre of the covenant. According to Ex 24<sup>8</sup> it is the blood directly inaugurating the covenant. Apart from every reference to Ex 24, when the blood is brought into connexion with the covenant ('this is my blood of the covenant'), it becomes entirely impossible to think of anything else than a covenant based on sacrament of blood; every other mode of joining these two terms is artificial. Spitta's further assumption, that the eating of the bread and the drinking of the wine stand for a partaking of the Messiah's body and blood, as a symbol of the eating of the Messiah, altogether apart from His death, is highly improbable. The feast as a whole might be the symbol of a participation in the Messiah, though even the examples quoted by Spitta of this mode of speaking are not sufficient to prove a current usage, if the sacrificial meal be left out of account. Assuming, however, that the general phrase 'eating the Messiah' was familiar to Jesus and the disciples outside of every connexion with the sacrificial meal, the distributive form in which the records present the thought, that of eating the Messiah's body and drinking His blood, could hardly have possessed such familiarity, and compel us, while not rejecting the idea of appropriating the Messiah, to think of Him as appropriated in His sacrificial capacity.

We turn next to the theories which recognize that the covenant stands through the blood in connexion with the death of Jesus. When the blood is called 'covenant-blood,' this undoubtedly implies that Jesus' death is instrumental in introducing the covenant. Justice is not done to this when merely in some indirect way the death is supposed to prepare the way for the covenant, viz., in so far as it forms the transition to a higher life which will enable Jesus to bestow upon His disciples the covenant-blessings. Thus the direct nexus between the blood and the covenant is severed. The view stated is that of Titius (Die neutestamentliche Lehre von der Sühne, I, p. 150 ff.). According to this writer, the Supper is to be explained not from the idea of the forgiveness of sin, but from that of the communication of life. Titius does not identify this covenant with the consummate eschatological state; it is something intermediate between that and the communion with God into which Jesus introduced His disciples before His death. The new covenant is made possible by the death of Jesus, because through this death He will be raised into heaven, whence the powers of eternal life can descend upon His Church through the gift of the Holy Spirit. It may be justly objected to this construction, that in it the death of Jesus appears not as a source of blessing by itself, but as a more or less accidental entrance into the life of glory, from which the blessing flows. As Titius himself admits, in the abstract it would have been quite possible to procure the new covenant and the perfected communion with God without the intervention of Jesus' death, viz., if it had pleased God to exalt the Messiah in some other way. Thus it becomes difficult to understand how so much emphasis can be placed by Jesus upon the appropriation of His death, or how He can require the disciples to drink His blood. The appropriation symbolized certainly cannot relate to the accidental form in which the blessing is prepared, it must have reference to the substance of the blessing itself. If the death is the object of appropriation, then it must possess a direct and intrinsic significance for the covenant in which the disciples are to share.

This is recognized by Wendt (Lehre Jesu 2, p. 608 ff.), according to whom Jesus regarded His death as a covenant-sacrifice, standing in the same relation to the new covenant predicted by Jeremiah as the sacrifice brought by Moses sustained to the Sinaitic covenant. In his opinion, the record of Ex 24 shows that the Mosaic sacrifice had nothing to do with atonement, but consisted of burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, inasmuch as a gift to God expressing the people's consent to His revealed law, and hence became a seal of covenant relation. The sacrifice pledged both God and the people. In analogy with this, Jesus represents His death as a gift dedicated to God, for the sake of which God will establish the new covenant, i.e. the state of salvation in the Kingdom of God, not, to be sure, on any strictly legal principle of recompense, but in harmony with His inexhaustible goodness and grace. Wendt's interpretation is wrong, not so much in what it affirms as in what it denies. That Jesus regarded the sacrifice of His life as a gift to God, and ascribed to it saving significance because it was an act of positive obedience, may be safely affirmed. The confidence, however, with which He appropriates the effects of this act to the disciples does not favour Wendt's assumption, that He made these effects dependent on a gracious will of God, imparting to the sacrifice a value which intrinsically it did not possess. But, apart from this, the analogy with the Mosaic sacrifice leads us to believe that Jesus did not confine Himself to viewing His death under the aspect of a gift. The prominence here given to the blood forbids us to interpret the sacrifice as exclusively, or even primarily, a symbol of gratitude or consecration to God. Even though the sacrifices brought were not specific sin-offerings, but burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, this does not eliminate from them the element of expiation. The Law itself speaks of expiation in connexion with the burnt-offerings (Lv 15), and the Passover-sacrifice, closely akin to the peace-offerings, certainly had expiatory significance. It may even be doubted whether the idea of a gift to God, except in the most general sense in which every sacrifice is a gift, was present to the mind of the author of Ex 24. When Moses calls the blood sprinkled on the people 'the blood of the covenant which Jehovah has made with you', this can scarcely mean 'the blood by the dedication of which God is induced to make the covenant.' It must mean either 'the blood by whose expiatory power the covenant is inaugurated,' or 'the blood by which, as a bond of life between God and the people, the covenant is established and maintained.' Perhaps it may express both of the thoughts just mentioned, since the ideas of expiatio and communio were often united in the conception of sacrifice. Besides this, the association in the mind of Jesus between the new covenant and the forgiveness of sins is rendered highly probable by the joint-occurrence of the two ideas in the Jeremiah-passages, where the forgiveness of sins is named as the great blessing of the new covenant. Now, if Jesus had this thought in mind, and spoke at the same time of the sacrificial pouring forth of His blood, then it was almost impossible for Him not to unite the two thoughts, so as to conceive of the blood as a blood of expiation securing forgiveness. It is by no means necessary to rest this argument on the words in Matthew 'unto the forgiveness of sins.' Supposing that these words are a later interpretation of the thought, we shall still have to recognize them as an essentially correct interpretation, which merely resolves the seip of Mark and Luke into eis + ut.

A further argument may be added to this from the part which the covenant conception plays in the second part of the Book of Isaiah in connexion with the figure of the Servant of Jehovah, who is called, as we have seen, the cy my. In our opinion, although this has been denied by Ritschl and others, there can be no doubt that the Servant-of-Jehovah-prophecy, and particularly Is 53, was an influential factor in determining the Messianic consciousness of Jesus. In this prophecy, however, the sacrificial rôle of the Servant, in an expiatory, vicarious sense, is so distinctly delineated, that, once finding Himself in the chapter, Jesus could not conceive thereafter of His death, or of the relation of His death to the covenant, on any other principle than is here set forth (cf. Denney, The Death of Christ, pp. 15-16).

As a matter of fact, the trend of recent investigation of the problem of the Supper is towards the acknowledgment, that the words, as they stand, not merely in Luke and Paul, nor merely in Matthew, but even in Mark, clearly express, and were intended by the writers of the Gospels to express, the expiatory interpretation of the death of Jesus. So far as the purely exegetical determination of the sense of the words ex animo auctorum (in distinction from the estimate put upon their historic credibility) is concerned, the traditional Church-doctrine is being more and more decisively vindicated. True, many modern writers, while granting this, emphatically deny that our Lord spoke, or could have spoken, the words which St. Paul and the Synoptists attribute to Him, or that what He spoke can have had the meaning which the words in their present setting and form convey. The two main reasons for this denial are, that, on the one hand, the teaching of Jesus about the sinner's relation to God is such as to leave no room for sacrificial expiation as a prerequisite of the sinner's acceptance, forgiveness flowing from God's free grace; and that, on the other hand, in the early Apostolic Church the expiatory interpretation of the death of Jesus is not present from the beginning, as it would have been if Jesus had taught it, but marks a subsequent doctrinal development. Neither of these contentions has sufficient force to discredit the unanimous witness of St. Paul and the Synoptists. In point of fact, Jesus nowhere represents the forgiveness of sins as absolutely unconditioned. It is one of the gifts connected with the state of sonship in the Kingdom. Consequently, it is bound to His own person in the same sense and to the same degree as the general inheritance of the Kingdom is. Unless one is ready to assert with Harnack, that in the gospel, as preached by Jesus Himself, there is no place for His person, it will be necessary to believe that our Lord considered His own Messianic character and work of supreme importance, not merely for the preaching, but also for the actual establishment of the Kingdom of God. This being so, it became necessary for Him to combine with the specific form He gave to His Messiahship a specific conception of the manner in which the blessings of the Kingdom are obtained by the disciples. His views about the forgiveness of sins would be less apt to be determined by any abstract doctrine as to the nature of God, than by the concrete mode in which the developments of His life led Him, in dependence upon Scripture, to conceive of the character of His Messiahship and its relation to the coming of the Kingdom. If He anticipated death, as there is abundant evidence to show He did, from a comparatively early point in His ministry, then He could not fail to ascribe to this death a Messianic meaning; and this Messianic meaning, if there was to belong to it any definiteness at all, could hardly be other than that portrayed by the prophet Isaiah in the suffering Servant of Jehovah.

It is quite true that the silence observed by our Lord in regard to this important matter till very near the close of His ministry is calculated to awaken surprise. But this silence He likewise preserved till the same point with regard to His Messianic calling in general; the problem is not greater in the former respect than in the latter; the reasons which will explain the one will also explain the other. Nor should it be forgotten that, side by side with His high conception of the love of God, Jesus ascribed supreme importance to the Divine justice. He carefully preserved the valuable truth contained in the exaggerated Jewish ideas about the forensic relation between God and man (cf. Keim, v. 331, 'A continual oscillation between the standpoint of grace and that of Jewish satisfaction can be established'). Recognizing this element in His teaching as something He did not hold prefunctorily, but with great earnestness of conviction, we have no right to assert that every idea of expiation and satisfaction must have been on principle repudiated by Jesus as inconsistent with the love of God. Nor is there much force in the second contention, namely, that the absence of the expiatory interpretation of the death of Jesus from the early Apostolic preaching proves the impossibility of deriving this doctrine from Jesus. The doctrine is certainly older than St. Paul, who declares that he 'received' ex prophetis, as one of the fundamental tenets of the Apostolic faith, that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures (1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>). This 'receiving' on the part of St. Paul is separated by no more than seven years from the death of Jesus; according to recent schemes of chronology, by an even shorter interval. When in the discourses of the earlier chapters of Acts the emphasis is placed on the resurrection rather than on the death of Jesus, this must be explained from the apologetic purpose of these discourses. They were intended to prove that, notwithstanding His death, Jesus could still be the Messiah. Probably even upon the disciples themselves, at that early date, the full meaning of the teaching of Jesus concerning His death had not dawned; but if it had, to make this the burden of their preaching to the Jews would have been an ill-advised method. We know from these same discourses in Acts that the disciples looked upon the death of Jesus as foreordained. It is not likely that, holding this, they can have rested in it as sufficient for their faith, and entirely refrained from seeking the reasons for the Divine foreordination, which in this, as well as all other cases, must have appeared to them teleological. In the light of this, the references to Jesus as the Servant of God, which occur in these early discourses, sometimes in connexion with His suffering, become highly significant, partly because they sound like reminiscences of Jesus' own teaching, partly because they render it probable that our Lord's death was interpreted in dependence on Is 53. Finally, attention should be called to the central place which the forgiveness of sins occupies in the early Apostolic preaching. The prominence of this theme requires for its background a certain definite connexion between the Messiahship of Jesus and the forgiveness of sins, and this is precisely what is afforded by the expiatory interpretation of the Saviour's death (cf. Denney, The Death of Christ, pp. 65-85, where the preceding points are luminously discussed).

On the grounds stated we conclude that there is neither exegetical nor historical necessity for departing from the old view, that Jesus represented His death as the sacrificial, expiatory basis of a covenant with God. The next question arising is, Who are meant as the beneficiaries of this expiation on which the covenant is founded? At first sight it would seem as if only one answer were possible, viz. those to whom He gives the cup in which the wine, the symbol of the expiating blood, is contained. Nevertheless, the correctness of this view has been of late strenuously disputed. This has been done mainly on the ground before stated, that for the disciples the whole tenor of our Lord's teaching represents the forgiveness of sins as unconditioned, assured by the gracious love of God as such. Hence it is assumed that Jesus intended the covenant-sacrifice not for His disciples, but for the unbelieving mass of the people, who were so hardened in their unbelief as to render an atoning sacrifice necessary in order to their receptance into the favour of God (thus Johannes Weiss, Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes, p. 28 ff.; and R. A. Hoffmann, Die Abendmahlsgedanken Jesu Christi, pp. 60-88). Weiss, while believing that the covenant-blood is primarily shed for the nation, would not exclude the disciples from its effects. Hoffmann, on the other hand, distinguishes sharply between those who are concerned in the covenant-sacrifice as its direct beneficiaries, i.e. the enemies of Jesus, and those whom He desires to appropriate the spirit of His self-sacrifice for others, and therefore invites to eat His body and drink His blood. The words spoken with the cup express on this view two distinct thoughts: (1) the blood is covenant-blood for the unbelieving Jews; (2) the blood as the exponent of the spirit of self-sacrifice of Jesus must pass over into the disciples, so that they too shall give their life for others. In other words, the disciples do not drink the blood in the sense in which it is defined by the phrase τὸ ἁιματὶν, but in the sense in which it symbolizes the subjective spirit on Jesus' part which led Him to offer His life for others. It will be readily perceived that this introduces an intolerable dualism into the significance of the blood: it must mean at the same time objectively the life poured forth in death as the principle of atonement, and subjectively the life pouring itself forth in death as the principle of self-sacrifice. There is no hint in the words themselves at any such double meaning. From the simple statement no one would guess that the blood is drunk by the disciples in any other capacity than that in which the Lord describes it, as 'blood of the covenant.' St. Paul and St. Luke have not understood Jesus in the manner proposed; for, according to their version, the cup, that which the disciples drink, is the new covenant itself in the blood, not merely the blood which for others is the covenant-blood. Hoffmann has to assume that St. Paul and St. Luke misinterpreted the intent of Jesus, and regards Mark and Matthew as giving the correct version. But even into the words of St. Mark and St. Matthew his view will not fit readily. If our Lord invited the disciples to drink His blood, in the sense of receiving into themselves the spirit of His self-surrender to death, the description of this blood as covenant-blood becomes irrelevant to the expression of this thought. Whether the blood is covenant-blood or serves any other beneficent purpose, is of no direct consequence whatever for the main idea, viz. that it is the exponent of a spirit which the disciples must imitate, nay, the introduction of the former thought only tends to obscure the latter. Our Lord certainly did not expect the disciples to make the sacrifice of their own life a covenant-sacrifice in the sense His was for the nation. The ἵπὲρ πολλῶν in Mark and the περὶ πολλῶν in Matthew, to which Hoffmann appeals, cannot prove the exclusion of the disciples from the covenantal effect of the blood. The phrase is derived from Is 53<sup>11</sup>, where it serves to affirm the fruitfulness, the efficacy of the self-sacrifice of the Servant of Jehovah. This simple thought suffices here as well as in Mk 10<sup>45</sup> to explain Jesus' statement that many will be benefited by His death. Who the many are, disciples or non-disciples, the ἵπὲρ πολλῶν alone does not enable us to determine.

The one question that still remains to be answered is, whether the covenant-blood appears in the words of Jesus, 'This is my blood of the covenant,' primarily as the blood which through expiation inaugurates the covenant, or primarily as the blood which by being sacramentally received will make those who receive it partakers of the covenant. Both meanings are equally well suited to the words themselves. In order to choose definitely between them, we should have to enter upon the extremely complicated discussion that has of recent years been carried on, and is still being carried on, concerning the origin of the Lord's Supper and the significance of the act performed and the words spoken by our Lord on the last evening of His earthly life. A few remarks must suffice to indicate the bearings of this problem on the question before us. The two views above distinguished coincide with the so-called parabolic or purely symbolic and the so-called institutional or sacramental interpretation of the transaction. According to the former, Jesus did not mean to institute a rite, did not intend the act to be repeated, but simply enacted before the eyes of His disciples, in a visible parable, the drama of His death, indicating by the parabolic form He gave it that His death would be for their good through the inauguration of a covenant. According to the latter, Jesus instituted, and for the first time caused His disciples to celebrate, a rite in which He made the partaking of bread and wine, as sacramental symbols of His body and blood, to stand for the appropriation of His expiatory sacrifice and of the covenant founded on it.

It ought to be observed that these views are not in themselves mutually exclusive. The parabolic significance of the body and blood, as symbolizing death, must on the second view be assumed to form the background, expressed or presupposed, of the sacramental transaction—expressed, if the breaking of the bread and the pouring of the wine be made significant; presupposed, if the broken bread and the poured wine be made the starting-point of the observance. That the so-called parabolic view is frequently advocated in a form which excludes the sacramental complexion of the act, is due not so much to the view itself, but largely to a general theory on the nature of the parables of Jesus.

Jülicher, the foremost representative of the parabolic interpretation of the Supper (cf. Theologische Abhandlungen C. v. Weis-sacker geistlich, p. 207 ff.), is also the strenuous advocate of the theory that in every genuine parable of Jesus there can be but one point of comparison. Consequently it is insisted upon that, if the broken bread and the wine stand as figures for the death of Jesus, figures which involve the destruction of these elements, they cannot at the same time stand as figures for the appropriation of the benefits of His death, because this would involve the usefulness of the elements, the very opposite of their destruction. Jülicher was not at first disposed to carry this to an extreme, but admitted that as a secondary point of comparison the usefulness of the bread and wine as food and drink might have stood before the mind of Jesus. Others, however, demanded that on the parabolic view every figurative significance of the eating and drinking must be rigorously excluded, and make this a ground of criticism of said view, because in the records the eating and drinking are undoubtedly made prominent (cf. Johannes Hoffmann, Das Abendmahl im Urchristentum, pp. 61-65, and Jülicher's review of Hoffmann's book in Theol. Literaturzeitung, 1904, col. 288 ff.).

Jülicher's canon of interpretation, while on the whole representing a sound principle of exegesis, leads in single instances to the rejection of undoubtedly genuine material. It makes Jesus construct His parables with conscious regard to the unity and purity of their form, rather than with the practical end of their efficacy in view (cf. Burger, Die Haupt-Parabeln Jesu). Where, as in the present case, the two points of comparison, that of the dissolution of the elements and that of their appropriation for nourishment, are so naturally combined into the one act of the meal, it were foolish to require the exclusion of either on the ground of a puristic insistence on the rules of formal rhetoric.

In all probability the combination of these two aspects of the symbolism was not first made by our Lord, but was antecedently given in the union of the OT sacrifice and the sacrificial meal. Schultzen (Das Abendmahl im Neuen Testament, p. 53 ff.) has shown, to our mind convincingly, that the eating of the bread and the drinking of the cup are placed by our Lord under the aspect of a sacrificial meal, for which His own death furnishes the sacrifice. As in the sacrificial meal the offerer appropriates the benefits of the expiation and the resulting benefits of covenant-fellowship with God (Ex 24<sup>10-11</sup>, Ps 50<sup>9</sup>), so the disciples are invited to appropriate by eating and drinking all the benefits of expiation and covenant-fellowship that are secured by the sacrifice of the Saviour's death.

We may assume, therefore, that both the symbolism of sacrifice and the symbolism of the sacrificial meal are present in the transaction performed by Jesus. But the question still remains unanswered, whether the former is present in explicit form or merely as the unexpressed background of the latter. Those who emphasize the symbolical significance of the breaking of the bread, a feature named in all the records, hold that the death is not merely presupposed but formally enacted. On the whole, however, the trend of the discussion has of late been in the direction of the other view, which attributes no special significance to the breaking of the bread or the pouring forth of the wine, but makes the broken bread and the wine, as symbols of the death as an accomplished fact, the starting-point for the enacted symbolism of the sacrificial meal. It has been pointed out with a degree of force that the formula, 'This is my body,' 'This is my blood,' in the sense of 'This symbolizes what will happen to My body and to My blood,' is out of all analogy with Jesus' usual parabolic mode of statement, because elsewhere not the symbol, but the thing symbolized, always forms the subject of the sentence (so Zahn, Das Evangelium des Matthäus, p. 687, note 53). It may also be urged that the natural sequence, in case a parabolic enactment of the death of Jesus were intended, would have been as follows: 'He brake the bread and said: This is my body; and he gave it to them and said, Take,' and similarly with the cup.

As the record stands, the pouring out of the wine is not mentioned at all. It seems that Jesus took a cup which had already been filled. If He had intended to give a parabolic representation of the event of His death, He would have taken pains to fill one before their eyes. The fact that with both elements the giving to eat and to drink precedes the declaration of what the bread and the wine stand for, favours the view that this declaration deals primarily with the symbolism of the sacrificial meal. The words, 'This is my body,' then obtain the meaning: To partake of this bread signifies the partaking of My sacrificed body in a sacrificial meal; the words, 'This is my blood,' the meaning: To partake of this wine signifies the partaking of My sacrificial blood in a sacrificial meal. Thus we would reach the conclusion that the phrase 'blood of the covenant' has for its primary import: blood through the partaking of which participation in the covenant is assured. The Pauline-Lukan version, 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood,' cannot be quoted with conclusiveness in favour of either view. This version may either mean: this cup is by the blood it contains the new covenant, or: this cup is the new covenant, which new covenant consists in My blood. Each of these two renderings leaves open the two possibilities, that the shedding of the blood is represented as the source of the new covenant, or that the drinking of the blood is represented as the participation in the new covenant. To prevent misunderstanding, however, it should be stated once more, that the sacramental interpretation of the words has for its background the symbolic significance of bread and wine as exponents of the expiatory death of Jesus itself.

In conclusion, we must endeavour to define the place of the covenant conception thus interpreted within the teaching of Jesus as a whole, and its correlation with other important conceptions. Like the Kingdom of God, the Messiahship, and the Church, the Covenant idea is one of the great generalizing ideas of the OT, the use of which enables Jesus to gather up in Himself the main lines of the historic movement of OT redemption and revelation. From the Kingdom the Covenant is distinguished in several respects. The Kingdom conception is more comprehensive, since it embraces the eschatological realization of the OT promises as well as their provisional fulfilment in the present life, being on the whole, however, eschatologically conceived, the present Kingdom-powers and blessings appearing as so many anticipations of the final Kingdom. The Kingdom is also comprehensive in this other respect, that it covers indiscriminately the entire content of the consummate state, the external as well as the internal, the judgment as well as the salvation-aspect. Over against this the Covenant idea, while by no means pointedly excluding the eschatological state (in Hebrews the idea is used eschatologically, the new covenant coinciding with the αιών μελλων), yet is more characteristic as a designation of the blessings of believers in the present intermediate period. And among the manifold contents of salvation it pre-eminently designates the internal ones of forgiveness of sin and fellowship with God, as is already the case in the passage of Jeremiah.

If the word rendered by διαθήκη had in our Lord's mind the associations of the word 'testament,' and if the statement found in the context of Luke (22<sup>20-20</sup>), 'I appoint unto you (καθίσταμαι υμῶν), even as my Father appointed unto me a kingdom, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom,' may be understood as having been suggested to Him by this testamental sense of διαθήκη, then this would bring the Covenant idea much nearer to the Kingdom idea, inasmuch as in the latter saying the full content of the blessedness of the final state is the object of the δαρισεύσας. It is not certain, however, that the sequence of the narrative here in Luke is chronological, and that, therefore, these words were uttered immediately after the reference to the covenant-blood in the Supper. In Mt 19<sup>27-29</sup> words in part identical occur in a different connexion. In the Supper, God is the δαψίνορος, whereas here it would be Jesus. It is better, therefore, not to introduce the testamentary ideas into the words of the Supper, and to adhere to the distinction between the Kingdom and the Covenant from the point of view already indicated. According to the Pauline interpretation, the Supper, and with it the Covenant, belong to the pre-eschatological state, in which believers are during the present life, for the Supper is a proclamation of the death of Jesus 'until he come' (1 Co 11<sup>26</sup>). The sayings in Mk 14<sup>25</sup>, Mt 26<sup>29</sup>, Lk 22<sup>18</sup>,<sup>19</sup> also mark the Supper and the participation in the Covenant as belonging to a state distinct from the final Kingdom of God. Our Lord, however, does not place this second stage of the covenant-life of the people of God in contrast with the former stage from the point of view that it involves the abrogation of the OT legal forms of life, as St. Paul does in 2 Co 3 and Gal 3. If it is a new covenant, it is new simply for the positive reason that it brings greater assurance of the forgiveness of sin and closer fellowship with God.

From the idea of the Kingdom that of the Covenant is still further distinguished, in that it appears in much closer dependence than the former on the Messianic person and work of Jesus. In our Lord's preaching of the Kingdom, His Messianic person and work remain almost entirely in the background, at least so far as the verbal disclosures on this subject are concerned, while the matter comes to stand somewhat differently if the self-revelation contained in Jesus' Messianic acts be considered. The Covenant is explicitly declared to be founded on His expiatory death, and to be received by the partaking of His body and blood. This importance of the person and work of Jesus, both for the inauguration and the reception of the Covenant, agrees with the view that the Covenant designates the present, provisional blessedness of believers, for this stage is specifically controlled and determined by the activity of Christ, so that St. Paul calls it the Kingdom of Christ in distinction from the Kingdom of God, which is the final state. The Covenant idea shares with the idea of the Church this reference to the present earthly form of possession of the Messianic blessings, and this dependence on the person and work of the Messiah (cf. Mt 16<sup>18</sup> 18<sup>17</sup>). The difference is that in the conception of the Church, the organization of believers into one body outwardly, as well as their spiritual union inwardly, and the communication of a higher life through the Spirit, stand in the foreground, neither of which is reflected upon in the idea of the Covenant. The Covenant stands for that central, Godward aspect of the state of salvation, in which it means the atonement of sin and the full enjoyment of fellowship with God through the appropriation of this atonement in Christ.

GERHARDOUS VOS.
COVETOUSNESS.—This word (Gr. πλεονεξία) has the root-idea of greed, shown in a strong desire to acquire, even more than in a keen wish to keep. In the Gospels, as elsewhere in Scripture [see, however, Eph 4<sup>19</sup>], the term is confined to a reference to property; the verb (πλεονεξέω) is wider in sense. As the complexity of social life increases, so may the shapes the evil can assume. To ordinary avarice have to be added subtle temptations in the realm of rank and fashion, conventional ambition, cultured ease, or delight in successful activity unobordinated to ethical aims. The tinge of covetousness comes in wherever men so absorb their life in the temporal that they impair its high instincts for the spiritual. 'What is man profited, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?' (Mt 16<sup>26</sup>).

To the mind of Jesus what stands condemned is, characteristically, the possession of a certain spirit—the spirit of grasping selfishness. The forms assumed, the methods employed, are not minutely dealt with, and not matters for specific cure. Rather the one tap-root is to be cut, or a general atmosphere created in which the noxious weed must perish. And the almighty power to this end is the holy spirit of the gospel, which on the one hand is a spirit of loving trust towards God the Father in providence, and on the other a tender feeling towards fellow-mortals which prompts to ready sacrifice of all things to their good. The man with the great possessions (Mk 10<sup>21</sup>), who attracted Jesus, had yet one luxury to discover—that of doing good, giving to the poor, and so coveting wealth of the right kind. Not the coming to our hands of earthly good is condemned, but the absence of the one spirit which shall inform and vitalize its use. The triumph of religion is to turn it into 'treasure in heaven' (v.<sup>21</sup>).

A classical passage is Mt 6<sup>19-24</sup>, with which compare Lk 12<sup>32-34</sup> and 16<sup>13-15</sup>. The higher life being concerned with faith and godness and the things of the spirit—the realm revealed in the Beatitudes, it is clear inversion to be absorbed for their own sake in the things of time and sense. 'Moth and rust' are the emblems of their corruptibility; and they are unstable, like property exposed to 'thieves.' It is the mark of a pagan mind to be full of anxious and self-centred concern for meat and drink and raiment (v.<sup>25</sup>). Such persons reverse unconsciously Christ's principle that 'the life is more than meat' (Mt 6<sup>25</sup>); and the Pharisees, 'who were covetous' (Lk 16<sup>14</sup>), by their blindness to the true order of importance called forth essentially the same rebuke, 'that which is highly esteemed amongst men, is abomination in the sight of God' (v.<sup>15</sup>). Though they had one eye for religion, they kept the other for the world, hence inevitably their truly distorted views. In the last resort of psychological analysis 'no man can serve two masters' (Mt 6<sup>24</sup>), and the Pharisees are pilloried for evermore as the awful example of hypocrisy in this respect. With Jesus, in these passages, the first postulate of religious worth is, that people must be single-minded and whole-hearted in service—'Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also' (Mt 6<sup>21</sup>). And to only one quarter can the enlightened heart turn—'the kingdom of God and his righteousness' (v. 33). Coincident with that, as humble faith feels, all needed things shall be added unto us. With exquisite insight Jesus points to the fowls of the air and the lilies of the field as eloquent at once of the minuteness of Divine Providence, and the trust we may place in a Heavenly Father's care—'Are not ye, He asks, 'much better than they?' (v. 26). (Cf. as an enforcement of the lesson, Christ's own unworldliness of character, and trustfulness in earthly matters. And as a counter-illustration to the Pharisees, of the covert from their straitest sect, St. Paul, who having food and raiment learned therewith to be content, 1 Ti 6<sup>8</sup>, cf. Ph 4<sup>11</sup>).

On a question arising of family inheritance (Lk 12<sup>13-15</sup>), Jesus warns against covetousness, and for impressive depth nothing excels the summary there—'A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth' (v. 15). As one concerned with the spiritual domain, Jesus refuses to touch the civil matter of property. Wisdom lay in leaving questions of the law to lawyers, although the consideration is doubtless implied that even then there should be found a permeation of the Christian spirit. The point which Jesus presses is the falsity of the vulgar notion that it is 'possessions' which make life worth living. Devotion to the outward is, in His gospel, vanity; the loving and discerning soul has God for its possession, and from sheer sympathy of heart joys in His work amongst men.

A parable follows (Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup>), not necessarily associated originally with the foregoing incident, although in full affinity of theme. The Rich Fool is the personification of the successfully covetous man, and yet a revelation in almost the same breath of how little such success amounts to from the standpoint of eternity. He sowed only to the world; therefore he reaped inwardly no riches of the spirit. 'So is he,' saith Jesus, 'that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich towards God' (v. 21). There is affinity of teaching in the parable of Dives and Lazarus (which see).

COWARDICE.—Cowardice must be distinguished from a natural timidity in circumstances of danger, from the awe which, in the presence of the miraculous or the extraordinary, may so possess the mind as for the moment to paralyze its activities, and above all from the fear of God, His paternal love, power, and holy judgment, which may be the strongest antidote to all base and servile fear, and the source of the highest courage. The distinction is partly preserved in the words φόβος and δειλία. The latter word is 'always used in a bad sense' (Trench, Synonyms of the NT, p. 34). It expresses 'not the natural emotion of fear, but the cowardly yielding to it. It is the craven spirit which shrinks from duty, loses hope, abandons what it should hold fast, surrenders to the enemy, or deserts to his side' (Bernard, Central Teaching of Jesus Christ, pp. 188, 189). δειλία occurs only in 2 Ti 1<sup>7</sup>, but δειλιάω Jn 14<sup>27</sup>, and δειλός (EV 'fearful') Mt 8<sup>26</sup>, cf. Mk 4<sup>40</sup> and Rev 21<sup>8</sup>. But the line of distinction cannot be drawn hard and fast by the use of these words. In Mt 8<sup>26</sup> (cf. Mk 4<sup>40</sup>) the question of δειλός ἐρε, θάρσυνον, is not so much a serious imputation of craven fear, as the expression of 'personal fearlessness, to gain ascendancy over panic-stricken spirits' (Bruce, Expos. Gr. Test., in loc.). On the other hand, an ignoble fear in face of danger or difficulty, or the disapprobation and hostile sentiments of others, is sometimes in view when φόβος, φοβέσθαι are used (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>, cf. Lk 12<sup>31</sup>; Mt 25<sup>3</sup>, Jn 7<sup>18</sup> 19<sup>28</sup> 20<sup>19</sup>). When fear of physical consequences impairs fidelity to Christ, causing men to be ashamed of Him (Mk 8<sup>38</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup>), or even to go the length of denying Him (Mt 10<sup>33</sup>), it incurs His severest disapprobation (Mt 10<sup>33</sup>, cf. Rev 21<sup>8</sup>). It is not cowardice to fly from the rage of the persecutor. Jesus not only counselled flight in circumstances of peril (Mk 13<sup>14</sup>, Lk 21<sup>31</sup>), but Himself evaded the malice which would have brought His life to an end before His hour was come, and His mission completed (Lk 4<sup>30</sup>, Jn 8<sup>59</sup> 10<sup>39</sup>). It is only when the fear of man tempts to the compromise of truth, and the disowning of allegiance to Christ, that it becomes a snare and a sin. Cowardice is not ultimately evinced in feeling, but in action. It is cowardice when a man declines the task he was meant to render: 'I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth' (Mt 25<sup>25</sup>); when he turns away, however sorrowfully, from the path of self-sacrifice which the call of Christ points out to him (Mt 19<sup>22</sup>). (See Paget, Studies in the Christian Character, p. 104).

The antidote to cowardice lies in the fear of God, in His power over the soul as well as the body (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>), the μακροθυμία which drives out all baser fear; in the spirit of watchfulness and prayer that, in circumstances of trial, we do not fall into the temptation to forsake Christ or deny Him (Mt 26<sup>41</sup>); but most of all in faith (Mt 8<sup>26</sup>, Jn 14<sup>27</sup>). Faith in the Fatherhood of God—that the manifest duty, however difficult and dangerous, is His will; that from Him life has its appointed twelve hours, and in the path of obedience to Him there is no possible foreshortening of them (Jn 11<sup>9-10</sup>); that over all is His unsleeping and loving care—will save the soul from all base betrayals of itself and its Divine trust through fear. To this end was the Comforter promised and bestowed, that, co-operating with the spirit of men, He might brace them to consistent courage in action and endurance. And the effect of His presence and power is seen in the contrast between those who 'all forsook him and fled' (Mk 14<sup>50</sup>), denied Him (Mt 26<sup>74</sup>), 'gathered in an upper room for fear of the Jews' (Jn 20<sup>19</sup>), and the same men, not many months later, impressing the authorities by their boldness (Ac 4<sup>13</sup>), and displaying, in circumstances of severest trial, minds delivered from all craven fear, and inspired with the high and solemn courage of faith. CREATION.—The beginning of the world, as the earliest starting-point of time, is mentioned in Mt 24<sup>21</sup>, Mk 13<sup>34</sup>. The other Gospel references to this subject include one by an Evangelist and two by our Lord Himself. The first (Jn 1<sup>3</sup>) teaches that the Divine Word, who afterwards became incarnate in Jesus (v. 14), was the direct Agent in Creation (cf. Col 1<sup>16</sup>, He 1<sup>2</sup>; and see following art.). The second (Jn 5<sup>17</sup>) occurs in a discussion on the Sabbath. In the words 'my Father worketh hitherto,' Jesus shows that the Divine rest following the work of creation has been a period of continued Divine activity. His primary object is to justify His own works of healing on the Sabbath day, but He shows incidentally that the seventh 'day,' and therefore also the other 'days,' of Gn 1 need not be understood in a literal sense. In the third allusion (Mt 19<sup>at</sup>, Mk 10<sup>at</sup>) the words of Gn 1st 2nd, describing the original creation of man and woman, are quoted in support of Christ's ideal of marriage (cf. Eph 5th).

JAMES PATRICK.

CREATOR (CHRIST AS).—The Synoptic Gospels do not bring forward any specific teaching of Christ as Creator. Whatever Jesus may have taught on this subject, the controlling purpose of the writers of these Gospels did not require the inclusion of it. Hence it is that only by implication is any doctrine of Christ's creatorship introduced into the Synoptic Gospels. The implication, however, is striking and worthy of notice.

1. The assertion of original power, e.g. the healing of the leper (Mk 1st, Mt 8th, Lk 5th); the lordship of the Sabbath (Mk 2nd, Lk 9th, Mt 12th). The Sabbath is a Divine institution, and only the establisher of it could have power over it. The forgiveness of sins (Mk 2nd, Mt 9th) is a prerogative of Godhead.

2. The note of authority.—The people felt this in Jesus' teaching (Mk 1st, Lk 4th). He claims authority for Himself (Mk 2nd, Mt 9th, Lk 5th). He gives authority to His disciples (Mt 10th), and the unstated assumption is that it is by an original right inherent in Himself.

3. Miracles.—Jesus quiets the sea as one who has original power over it (Mk 4th, Lk 8th). This is the right of the Creator of it. He restores life to the dead (Mk 5th, Lk 8th 7th). To give life is the prerogative of Creatorship. It is an original right of the Creator. Jesus exercises this right in His own name. He creates directly in the miracle of the loaves and fishes (Mk 6th-8th, Mt 14th 13th).

4. Ownership.—Jesus calls the angels His own (Mt 24th). His lordship of the Sabbath implies ownership (Mk 2nd).

All these are clear, and the more significant because unsigned, narrations which imply the Creatorship of Jesus. If St. Paul held a supervisory relation to the Gospel of Luke, and St. Peter to the Gospel of Mark, as many of the best modern scholars believe, then we shall feel the corroborative evidence which is so outstanding in their Epistles for the Creatorship of Jesus.

This evidence in the Pauline Epistles lies in (a) the pre-existence of Christ (Ro 8th, 1 Co 10th, 2 Co 8th, Gal 4th, Eph 14, Ph 2nd, Col 1st, 2 Ti 1st). The self-improvement (kenosis) implies previous Divine fullness. If all things were created through (dia), in (en), and for (eis) Him, He would necessarily be pre-existent. The Pauline Christ of the Epistles is not merely the historic Christ, but more especially the Creative Principle both in the world and in man. (b) Creation is through Christ (Col 1st). He is the causal agent, according to the eternal purpose. (c) Creation is in Him, i.e. in the sphere of Christ, 'the creative centre of all things, the causal element of their existence' (Ellicott). Hence all things are to be gathered up in Him (Eph 1st). (d) Creation is for Him. He is the goal as well as the explanation of all creation. 1 Co 8th expands this idea, and makes Him both the source and the goal of all created things. (e) He is the bond which holds the whole fabric of men and things together. This is the doctrine of the Divine immanence (Col 1st), and sets forth Christ as the eternally existent Creative Principle in all things. All this teaching is an amplification of the teaching of the Synoptics, and sets forth the cosmic relations of Christ in Creation in order to show more clearly His cosmic relation in Atonement and Salvation.

There are two passages in the Petrine Epistles which teach the pre-existence of Christ (the Spirit of Christ in the prophets, 1 P 1st; and Christ before the foundation of the world, v. 20), but there is no direct teaching of Creatorship.

The Gospel of John opens at once into a circle of new and profounder conceptions of Jesus. He is the Eternal Logos who was in the beginning (1st). He is the eternal and immanent Reason manifesting creative activities. He mediates the creation of the universe (v. 3). The Prologue sets forth Jesus Christ in His fourfold mediation. (a) As the Eternal Logos, who was 'in the beginning with God, and was God' (1st). He mediates the creation of all things (v. 3). The whole process and product of creation lie inwrapped in the Logos. Neither angels nor other beings assisted. 'And without him was not anything made that hath been made' (v. 3, cf. 1 Co 8th). (b) As the Creative Logos, He mediates life for men. He is immanent in the Creation. 'In him was life' (v. 4), and 'He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not' (v. 10). He was the ground and source of life. St. Paul's saying, 'The world through its wisdom knew not God' (1 Co 1st), shows the amazing inability of the world to recognize its Creator who was the ground of its own life. Sin had indeed become darkness which was incapable of apprehending the light (Jn 1st). (c) As the Logos made flesh or incarnate, He mediates a revelation of God to man (vv. 14-18). The whole measure of revelation lies in the incarnate Logos. 'God manifested to men was manifested wholly in Jesus Christ. (d) As 'the only-begotten from the Father' (v. 14), He mediates an atonement or reconciliation, through His death, between a holy God and alienated sinners. This is the climax of His wondrous mediatorship, and makes Him the perfected Mediator. The historic Christ is brought forward in this Gospel only enough to explicate or illustrate the eternal Christ, but it was in the historic Christ that the eternal and cosmic Christ was first recognized. The transactional phases of the historic incarnation lead, in St. John's view, straight to the eternal Logos who mediated the whole creation. Christ, as Creator, is so wrought into the Cosmos which He made and sustains, that upon the entrance of sin into the world He becomes of necessity the mediator of new relations between the sinner and God. His mediatorship of redemption rests on the fact that He was 'in the beginning' the Logos who mediated the creation of all things. Christ, as Creator, is the fundamental idea of this Gospel. It is the starting-point of the whole history of the earth and the heavens, of man, his fall and his doom, of the redemption and the final glory. It is the interpretive key to the whole framework of the Fourth Gospel, whose author sees the designed correspondence between the Creator and the created, and that creation was primarily intended to be responsive to Him. 'He came unto his own, and they . . . received him not' (1st), expresses the failure of creation to fulfil the Divine purpose. St. John gathers up all that the Synoptists have taught, but adds new conceptions of Jesus in a profounder interpretation of Him. He teaches (a) the pre-existence of Christ (1st 3rd, 2nd 6th, 8th-14th 17th) more plainly and fully than the Synoptists; (b) His authority (17th); (c) His inherent power to work miracles (2nd 6th 11th); (d) His ownership of all things (1st). But new conceptions are added. (a) He is the source of an abiding or eternal life. He has power to give this life to whom He will (3rd 4th, 14 5th-24, 40 6th, 51 10th 11th 14th

But these conceptions of Christ, as well as those which St. John and the Synoptists have in common, rest on the fact of His having mediated the creation of all things. His rights in the whole creation, as well as the obligations which He has toward it, grow out of the fact of His Creatorship. The eternal and universal characteristics of both incarnation and reconciliation are grounded in the creational character of Jesus Christ.

CRITICISM.—4. A little more than seventy years ago (1835-1905), a turning-point was reached in NT criticism, the importance of which is generally admitted.* In the year 1835 David Strauss published his Leben Jesu (to be followed exactly ten years later by F. C. Baur's Paulus). The mythical theory was remorselessly applied by Strauss to the whole of the Gospel history.

It must not be forgotten that from the middle of the preceding century Semler had applied the word 'myths' to some of the OT narratives, as, e.g., to the exploits of Samson; and later on at the beginning of the 19th cent. de Wette had not hesitated to point out the important part which, in his judgment, was played both by myth and by legend in the writings of the OT.† At the same time he had not hesitated to accentuate, in language very similar to some of the utterances familiar to us to-day, the difference which lay between the application of the mythical and of the legendary theory to the OT and to the NT.‡ There were, indeed, two parts of our Lord's life, the beginning and the end, which his earlier criticism did not scruple to regard as shrouded in darkness, and to relegate to the same domain of myth or legend. The supporters of this kind of criticism were content, as Strauss himself expressed it, to enter the Evangelical history by the splendid portal of myth and to leave it by the weary paths of a natural explanation. This method of so-called natural explanation, which in its most crude form was characteristic of Paulus and the school which bore the name of Rationalists, a method which Strauss remorselessly attacked, became discredited and gave place to the mythical theory, which at least laid claim to thoroughness. But it is not too much to say that an explanation of the miraculous which is often akin to the crude exegesis of Paulus, meets us not infrequently in Strauss himself and in much more recent attempts to prove that miracles did not happen.§

But by another path of inquiry the way was being prepared for Strauss. In 1750, J. D. Michaelis published his Introduction to the NT, and in the fourth edition of that work he examined with caution and candour the origin of all the NT books. Michaelis was followed by Semler in his Treatise on the Free Investigation of the Canon, the very title of which seemed to mark the new principle of inquiry which was abroad. Semler has been recently called 'the father of criticism'; and if that title is not always appropriate to him, we may, at all events, speak of his epoch-making influence, and of the break which he caused between the traditional views of inspiration and the free examination of the authority and origin of each sacred book.¶ The new century was marked by Eichhorn's Introduction. This writer applied systematically the principle laid down by his forerunners, like Semler and Herder, and continued the attempt to read and examine the writings of the NT from a human point of view. His rule was that the NT writings are to be read as human books, and tested in human ways.*

But up to this time and even later, no systematic attempt, if any, was made, as by F. C. Baur, to place the NT in relation to the varying phases and circumstances of early Church history and life. Even de Wette, one of the best representative men of the period, who combined so remarkably deep evangelical piety with freedom from prejudices and with thoroughness of learning, was often undecided in his judgment, and his conclusions were vague and uncertain. The criticism characteristic of the time was carried on, as it were, piecemeal: one book was defended or attacked, or the alleged author was accepted or rejected, but there was no attempt to bring the books of the NT under one general conception.

There were henceforth two great critical movements proceeding side by side—the effort to interpret the Gospel narratives, and the effort to investigate the origin of the NT books.

To the former of these efforts Strauss stood in the closest relation, and he claimed to introduce a theory of interpretation which should be complete and final.† To the latter Baur stood in the closest relation, and he claimed to make good a theory which treated the books of the NT from the point of view not only of their origin, but of their purpose. Baur's book on the Pastoral Epistles, published in the same year as Strauss' Life of Jesus (1835), showed that his intention was to treat the NT books in connexion with their historical setting.

Some of the most successful attacks upon the first edition of Strauss' book were based upon the fact that he paid so little attention to the Gospel sources. A few pages are all that he devotes to the authorship of the Gospels, and it is no wonder that men like Tholuck rightly fastened on this weakness in their opponent's position, and that much of Strauss' own subsequent vacillation was due to the same cause.‡

But in 1864, apparently stirred by the reception given to Renan's Vie de Jésus, Strauss published his popular edition for the German people. And here he showed how thoroughly he was prepared to endorse Baur's view of the late dates of the Gospels, and to assimilate the methods and conclusions of the Tübingen school.§ But, as Dr. Matheson and other writers have so forcibly pointed out, the two theories of Strauss and Baur are incompatible. The conscious tendencies and the dogmatic purpose discovered by Baur in the composition of the NT books cannot coexist with the purely unconscious working of myth.¶

That which is mythical grows up unconsciously. But if our Gospels were constructed to meet or to modify certain special historical circumstances, if they are to be regarded as artistic creations, or as 'tendency' writings, they cannot be mythical, as Strauss maintained, nor can they be regarded as the spontaneous and unconscious workings of ¶ Baur saw in the NT literature the workings of a compromise between the two radically antagonistic parties of Judaism and Paulinism. In the exigencies of his theory he divided the period of literary development into three divisions—(1) Extending to A.D. 70, a period including the Hauptbriefe of St. Paul and the Apocryphes of St. John. Here the antagonism was at its height between the original Ebionitic Christianity and Paulinism. (2) Extending to about A.D. 140, in which period we have the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke, the former being Petrine, the latter (with the Acts) Pauline, but bearing marks of conciliation with reference to the above antagonism, and later the Gospel of St. Mark (also of a conciliatory type), whilst Ephesians and Colossians were invented by the Pauline party for the same conciliatory purpose. (3) Extending to A.D. 170, when the controversy was finally settled, and the conflicting extremes rejected by the 'Catholic' Church, a period marked by the Gospel and Epistles which bear the name of St. John, as also by the Pastoral Epistles assigned to St. Paul.

the human mind in its efforts to impart reality to its hopes. One cannot, in short, have the 'mythical' Gospels of Strauss and the 'tendency' Gospels of Baur.*

But while Strauss thus attempted to adapt this later work to some of the results and methods of the Tübingen school, he also came nearer to Baur in that he gave in this popular edition of his famous book an account of Jesus utterly incommensurate with the greatness of His influence and of the position which He achieved. Baur had taken little or no account of Jesus Himself and His Person, and now Strauss, by withdrawing what he had conceded in the second edition of his Leben Jesu as to the greatness and moral perfection of Jesus, was in a position no less impracticable than Baur's, so far as any satisfactory explanation of the work and person of the Founder of Christianity was concerned. We cease to be so much surprised that Strauss should regard the history of the resurrection of our Lord as a piece of colossal humbug, when the Jesus whom he depicted was so insignificant; or that Baur should regard this same account of the resurrection as a fact outside the province of historical inquiry, when he made no serious attempt to answer the question who Jesus was, or to understand Him and His life.

This supreme importance of the Person of Jesus had been rightly emphasized by earlier writers of the century. Paulus, with all his faulty method, had at least recognized that the miraculous in Christianity was Christ Himself, His Person. Schleiermacher had seen in Christ 'the greatest fact in history, the one only sinless and perfect Man, in whom the Divinity dwelt in its fulness.' Herder, of whom it has been said that his Christliche Schriften gave the first impulse to the immense literature generally known under the name of the Life of Christ, did not forget even in his constant denunciations of the corruptions of Christianity to hold up to admiration the Person of Jesus as the Prophet of the truest humanity.

This primary importance of the fullest consideration of the Person of Christ is nowhere seen more strikingly than in one of the earliest and most effective replies to Strauss' work, by G. Ullmann, a reply which so influenced Strauss that he modified his position, at least for a time, so far as to concede to Christ a place historically unique as a religious genius. As Ullmann insisted, Strauss was by his own fundamental philosophical assumptions debarred from doing justice to the Person of Jesus.† But if Strauss' position is correct, then it is impossible to understand why the disciples of Jesus should have regarded Him as the Messiah; for they could scarcely have done so, and with such surprising success, unless there had been something extraordinary about Him. The dilemma, therefore, which Ullmann proposed was really this—Did Christ create the Church, or did the Church invent Christ? If the former, Jesus must have been no mere Jewish Rabbi, but a personality of extraordinary power; if the latter, we have an invention which would make the history of Christianity quite incomprehensible. It was, of course, open to Strauss to reply that whilst the powerful personality of Jesus had created the Church, yet subsequently mythical hopes and conceptions might have been at work, transforming and magnifying the idea of the Christ.‡ But at all events for a time Strauss hesitated. He not only acknowledged the supremacy of Jesus in the sphere of religion, but he maintained that He possessed such power over the souls of men, to which there may have been conjoined some physical force like magnetism, that He was able to perform cures which were regarded as miraculous. He even went so far as to consider the Fourth Gospel as a possible historical authority.*

In face of all this confusion, and of the number of replies to Strauss and the position which they took up, it is easy to understand that the question of the sources of the Gospel history and a criticism of them assumed a growing importance. This importance Strauss had practically ignored, and now Baur's theory of early Church history and of the origin of early Christian documents was to be worked in to supply the want, and to be adopted by Strauss as a remedy for his own indecision or indifference as to the Gospel sources. Strauss felt, it would seem, the justice of Baur's reproof, viz. that he had written a criticism of the Gospel history without a criticism of the Gospels.†

But just as it may be affirmed that Strauss had started with dogmatic philosophical assumptions, so the same judgment must be passed upon Baur's starting-point. No one has admitted this more fully than Pfeiderer, so far as the first three Gospels are concerned (op. cit. pp. 231, 232).

Witke and Weisset had already proved, says Pfeiderer, the priority of Mark (and had thus, with Herder, anticipated much later criticism), and it could only have been the fact that Baur was wedded to his dogmatic method which prompted him to place Mark's Gospel at least as late as A.D. 130, and to see in it a Gospel consisting of extracts from Matthew and Luke.

The impossibility of separating any account of the Life of Christ from its sources became more and more evident in the succeeding literature.

2. Closely related in point of time to Strauss' popular book is that of the Frenchman Renan. To attempt any examination of the defects of this famous work would be beyond our province. But just as Strauss was blamed for his indifference to any treatment of the sources, i.e. the Gospels, so Renan was blamed for his half-and-half treatment of the same Gospels. For this he is severely taken to task by Schwarz.‡ He blames Renan for passing so lightly over the inquiries of a man like Baur as to the origin of our Gospels; and he points out that Renan's half-and-half treatment of these same Gospels, especially of the Gospel of John, avenges itself upon him, in that it leads him on from half-rationalistic explanations of the miracles to explanations which are adopted even at the cost of the moral perfection of Jesus. And in this connexion he refers, like other writers, to the explanation which Renan gives of the resurrection of Lazarus. Of course the earlier Renan placed the Gospels, the more difficult it was for him to account for the miracles which gathered around Jesus; and it is not too much to say that the earliest Gospel, St. Mark, the Gospel which Renan himself regarded as the earliest, is bound up with the miraculous. Renan's short and easy method was to declare dogmatically that there was no room in history for the supernatural. Like Strauss and Baur, Renan too had his assumption as to the historical worth of the Gospels; he too sets out with a general and comprehensive judgment as to their contents; for him the Gospels are not biographies, after the manner of those of Suetonius, nor are they legends invented after the manner of Philostratus; they are legendary biographies.

'I would compare them with the Legends of the Saints, the Life of Plotinus, Proclus, Isidorus, and other similar writings, in which historic truth and the purpose of presenting models of virtue are combined in different degrees.' It is not, perhaps, surprising that B. Weiss should speak of Renan's Vie de Jésus as not a history but a romance, and should add that, as our sources in their actual form were in many respects out of sympathy with, indeed almost incomprehensible to him, he could not escape the danger of rearranging them according to his own taste, or in a merely eclectic way.*

3. If we turn to Theodor Keim (1867-1872), to whom has sometimes been attributed the 'Life of Jesus' from a rationalistic standpoint, we notice that he too is severely taken to task by Pfeiderer for his unsatisfactory and fluctuating criticism of the Gospels as sources, and for his too close adherence to the views of Baur, especially in regard to the relation of the Synoptics to each other. St. Mark, e.g., is a compilation from St. Matthew and St. Luke, and St. Matthew's is regarded as the earliest Gospel. In comparing Keim's various works relating to the life of Jesus, we certainly find a strange fluctuation with regard to his statements as to the sources and their validity. Thus he actually places St. Matthew in its primitive form as early as A.D. 66, and supposes it to have been revised and edited some thirty years later; St. Mark he places about 100; and St. Luke, in which he sees a Gospel written by a companion of St. Paul, about 90.

But in 1873 Keim issued a book of a more popular character, and in this we find that the revision of St. Matthew is placed about 100, St. Mark about 120, St. Luke also about 100, while it is no longer referred to as a companion of St. Paul. Some years later (1878) Keim's position with regard to the Gospels was again differently expressed, and he seems to be prepared to make certain concessions to his opponents, and to attach more weight to the two-document theory as the result of a fresh study of Papias.† But it will be noticed that Pfeiderer has nothing but praise for Keim's treatment of the Fourth Gospel, which in 1867 he places between 100 and 117, and a few years after (1873) as late as A.D. 130. It must not, however, be forgotten that, as Dr. Drummond rightly points out, Keim's position with regard to St. John's Gospel marks a very long retreat in date from the position of Baur, whilst Pfeiderer himself is the sole critic of importance who still places the Gospel in question at the extravagant date, 170, demanded by the founder of the Tübingen school.

But with all these variations as to dates, and with the free concession of the presence of mythical elements in the accounts of the great events of our Lord's life, Keim takes up a very different position from Strauss and Baur, and at all events the early members of the Tübingen school, with regard to the importance of the Person of Jesus and of our knowledge of Him. Nowhere is this more plainly seen than in the remarkable stress which he lays upon St. Paul's references to the facts of our Lord's earthly life and upon his high Christology. Baur and his followers had fixed men's attention upon Paul, Keim insists upon the unique and supreme importance of Jesus, and he sees in Him the Sinless One, the Son of God.

But Keim's portraiture of Jesus is marred by many inconsistencies. Thus he is prepared to admit that the miracles of healing may have happened in response to the faith evoked by the personality of Jesus, or he is thrown back in his treatment of the miraculous upon the old rationalistic methods; the story, e.g., of Jesus walking upon the sea had its origin in the words, 'Ye know not at what hour of the night your Lord cometh.' In some respects it is not too much to say that even the moral sinlessness of Jesus is endangered, if not sacrificed. Keim rejects, it is true, the visionary hypothesis, but he finds no alternative except the conviction that nothing irrefutable can be known concerning the issue of the life of Jesus, an assertion equally unsatisfactory with that of Baur. He speaks sometimes of the early and Apostolic testimony rendered to the appearances of the risen Jesus, while at times he seems unable to realize the full force of this early testimony and its marked reserve. In his chronology we note another instance of Keim's arbitrary method, for he knows of no going up to Jerusalem before the last Passover, and the public career of Jesus is comprized within a single year.

In spite of much that savours of subjectivity, Keim, however, stands out as the writer who, in the 'Life of Jesus movement,' as Nippold has called it, has hitherto treated most fully of the Gospels as authorities, with the exception, perhaps, of Weizsäcker. We have seen how this need of a full treatment of the Gospels as sources had been felt since the days of Strauss' first edition of his Leben Jesu, and we shall see that this need is still further felt and emphasized.

4. Within a few years of the latest publication of Keim's work, two important Lives of Jesus, which are often mentioned together, issued from the press in Germany, viz. B. Weiss' Leben Jesu and Beyschlag's book bearing the same title. These books are of interest not only as important in the 'Life of Jesus movement,' but as further and valuable attempts to deal with our Gospels and their sources. Here it must be sufficient to say that they testify to the new importance which had been given to the Synoptic problem by H. Holtzmann's book, Die Synoptischen Evangelien, 1863.

5. Holtzmann's book gains its value not only by its rejection of the 'tendency' theories with regard to the composition of the Gospels, but also because, in its advocacy of the two-document hypothesis, as we now call it, it marks a new departure, and lays down a foundation for future study. Holtzmann's investigations had been published in the year before Strauss gave to the German people his popular Life of Jesus, in which, as we have seen, his account of the Gospels was still based upon the Tübingen researches; but Holtzmann's theory has a permanent interest for us to-day, while the author's subsequent statements of his views may be found in his published commentaries. It has indeed been said of the two-document theory that it may almost be reckoned to have passed out of the rank and number of mere hypotheses; † and at all events any account of the life and teaching of Jesus, or any investigation as to the historical character of the Gospels, will have to take note of it not only in itself, but in its many possible combinations with other sources.

This statement can be easily verified by a perusal of recent expositions of their views by representative writers. We turn, e.g., to Wendt's Die Lehre Jesu, and we see how he allows a connexion in all likelihood between the statement of Papias as to St. Mark being the interpreter of St. Peter, and the actual contents of our earliest Gospel, and how he finds in the Logia of St. Matthew an uncommonly rich and valuable material of Apostolic tradition, which may be placed by the side of St. Mark as a complementary source for a knowledge of the teaching of Jesus. Bousset, in his little but important book, Was wissen wir von Jesus?, is loud in his praises of the way in which modern research as to the original sources of the Synoptics harmonizes so strikingly with the famous statement of Papias. So, too, von Soden refers to the previous work of Weizsäcker and Holtzmann, and speaks of two Urevangelen (although he uses this term with some hesitation) which go back one to St. Peter and the other to St. Matthew, and he finds it possible to trace a connexion between the familiar statement of Papias and our Gospels of St. Mark and St. Matthew (Die wichtigsten Fragen im Leben Jesu, 1904, pp. 42, 62).‡

* See also J. Estlin Carpenter, The Bible in the Nineteenth Century, p. 301, and his remarks on the two-document hypothesis. He points out that the conclusion of Weizsäcker's investigations pointed in the same direction (cf. his Untersuchungen über die Evangelische Geschichte, 1869, 2nd ed. 1901).

† So, too, Deissmann, 'Evangelium und Urchristentum' in Beiträge zur Weiterentwicklung der christlichen Religion, p. 128. Deissmann seems inclined to attach some considerable weight to oral tradition and its trustworthiness, a very important consideration.

VOL. I.—25

It must, of course, be remembered that, like H. Holtzmann, these other writers referred to did not regard the two-document theory as alone sufficient to explain the origin of the Gospels. Other material was no doubt present in the Synoptics in addition to the two documents, as we can see in the case of St. Luke (cf. art. LUKE).*

And it must also be remembered that Holtzmann did not start with a belief that the sources of the first two Gospels, St. Mark and St. Matthew, must correspond with the two documents referred to by Papias. On the contrary, the investigation of the Gospels showed him that there were two sources at the base of our Synoptic writings, which closely resembled the statements of Papias with regard to the documents which he referred to St. Mark and St. Matthew.

6. But some half dozen years before Holtzmann's book was published, another, and in many respects a more serious, opposition to the methods of the Tübingen School, had made itself felt in the breaking away of Albrecht Ritschl from his former standpoint. In 1857 this final break was made, and for more than thirty years Ritschl was destined to be a great and growing factor of interest in the German theological world. Ritschl was keenly alive to the importance to be attached to the Person of Christ. In his treatment of the books of the NT he was to a great extent conservative, inasmuch as he accepted the traditional authorship of so many of those books, as, e.g., of the Gospel of St. John.

But, on the other hand, it is urged that Ritschl's own peculiar doctrine and the paramount stress which he laid on our experimental knowledge of Christ's power to confer spiritual freedom and deliverance, no doubt tended to make him independent of, if not indifferent to, the results of criticism. Ritschl and his distinguished follower W. Herrmann lay the greatest stress, and would have us lay the greatest stress, upon the impression made upon us by the 'historical' Christ. But it is not easy to ascertain what is meant by this 'historical' Christ, by loyalty to whom the true Christian is known. This is the favourite Ritschlian position, this insistence upon the impression which Christ makes upon the soul historically confronted with Him. But we naturally ask, From whence and from what is this impression derived? Not, surely, from the impression of the earthly life of Jesus alone, as Herrmann maintained, but from what Kähler has called the 'Biblical Christ'; the Christ of the NT is the Christ not only of the Gospels, but of the Epistles and of the Church.

It is urged, indeed, by the Ritschlians represented by Herrmann, that this faith in the historical Christ guarantees that, whatever criticism may effect, it cannot interfere with the truth

* The two-document theory is sharply criticized by M. Lepin (Jesus Messie et Fils de Dieu, p. xxvii, 1905), although he admits that it is adopted by a certain number of Romanist writers, e.g. Loday, Batiffol, Minocchi, Lagrange. M. Lepin's contention is that the theory in question is not in agreement with the most ancient testimony, which regards St. Matthew as the first of the Gospels, composed for the Jewish Christians of the first days, and as an authentic work of the Apostle. He admits at the same time (p. xxxv) that some Protestant writers claim to make this two-document theory accord with the full authenticity of the First Gospel (i.e. St. Matthew), and that admission is at least made of the semi-authenticity of this Gospel by those who claim to recognize in the primitive document, the Logia of Papias, the actual work of St. Matthew. He also observes that even Schmiedel allows that if St. Matthew was not the author of the Logia, he may at all events have been the author of a writing, more ancient still, upon which the Logia depended (Revue Bibl., art. 'Gospels', p. 189). See also Stanton, The Gospels as Historical Documents, pp. 17, 18, for the fact that the Gospel which bears the name of St. Matthew is the most often quoted of the Synoptics in early days; and it is difficult, as even Jülicher allows, to account for the attribution of a Gospel to an Apostle so little known as St. Matthew.

and power of the position already won, and with the response made by the human soul to the perfection of Christ presented to us in the Gospels. But whatever may have been the case with Ritschl himself, it can scarcely be said that his method has prevented those who claim in some measure to be his followers from dealing very loosely with the Gospel miracles, or with such events as the Virgin-birth and the Resurrection of the Lord. And it is difficult to see how this process of solution can fail to weaken the impression made by the 'historical' Christ, and our confidence in the revelation which we owe to His life.

Many of those who are classed as Ritschlians dismiss in a somewhat arbitrary fashion sayings and deeds of our Lord which seem to them to admit of difficulty. The manner, e.g., in which J. Weiss has dealt with the oldest Gospel, that of St. Mark, in his Das älteste Evangelium, cannot be said to inspire a conviction of the truthfulness of many of the most familiar Gospel narratives. Herrmann's own statements help us to see how subjective his method may become. He maintains, e.g., that through the impression which Christ makes upon us and our experimental knowledge of His power to confer freedom and deliverance, all uncertainty as to whether the figure of Jesus, which works thus upon us, belongs to legend or to history is in the nature of the case impossible.*

But it seems a curious argument to maintain that the impression which Jesus makes upon us is the positive revelation made by God in Christ, while the Gospels from which we derive that impression may or may not consist in this instance or in that of legendary and untrustworthy matter. Herrmann himself says that, in face of the seriousness of a desire for a salvation which means forgiveness of sins and life in spiritual freedom, the miracles in the NT necessarily become of minor importance. . . he who has found Jesus Himself to be the ground of his salvation has no need of those miracles (op. cit. p. 180). But if Jesus is 'found' through the portrait of His life presented to us in the NT, it is not too much to say that that life is inextricably bound up, from its beginning to its close, with the miraculous, and that the impression which that life has made upon the world has been made by a record from which the miraculous cannot be eliminated. Conviction of sin, e.g., must precede deliverance from it; and St. Peter's cry, 'Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord' (Lk 5), resulted not only from Christ's teaching, but also from the proof of His miraculous power.

7. It is in this attitude towards the miraculous, and in this effort to lessen its scope, that we may find a point of contact between what we may call the 'scientific' and the Ritschlian school. In a large and growing number of German critics who might be described as 'scientific,' if not as radical, there is an acceptance of the miracles of healing as due to the power of the personality of Jesus and to the response of faith which He evoked. We may see this in more or less degree in the statements of O. Holtzmann (Leben Jesu, pp. 58, 149, 166), or in those of Furrer (Das Leben Jesu Christi, pp. 129, 130), or in Bousset (Was wissen wir von Jesus?, p. 56). So, too, statements of a similar kind meet us again and again in the account of the miracles of Jesus given us in the series of popular little books on the religious-historical aspects of Christianity, which is now in course of publication in Germany (cf. Die Wunder im NT, pp. 32 ff., 51 ff., by Traub).† And in our own country we remember how decisively Dr. P. Gardner would discriminate between mere wonders of healing and 'miracles proper,' and how he describes Jesus as a healer of disease as historic.*

But at the same time it is evident how much there is which is arbitrary in this modern treatment of the miraculous. Thus Lepin justly criticises Schmiedel's attitude in this connexion.† Schmiedel distinctly affirms that it would be wrong in any investigation of the miracle-narratives of the Gospels to start from any such postulate or axiom as that miracles are impossible (Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Gospels,' col. 1376). But a few pages later in the same article (col. 1385) he writes that it is quite permissible for us to regard as historical only those cures of the class which even at the present day physicians are able to effect by psychical methods—as, more especially, cures of mental maladies (cf. also Harnack, Das Wesen des Christentums, p. 18). The same occasional power is ascribed to Jesus by Professor N. Schmidt, The Prophet of Nazareth, p. 264.

So, too, Schmiedel (op. cit. col. 1382) and Wendt (Die Lehre Jesu, p. 471) agree in interpreting the words in our Lord's message to the Baptist as referring to the spiritually dead, 'the dead are raised' (Mt 11<sup>3</sup>, Lk 7<sup>22</sup>), just as in their opinion the preceding words are to be interpreted of the spiritually lame and blind. But, in the first place, there is no proof that the previous clauses are to be interpreted in any such sense, and the Evangelists evidently did not so interpret them. It is urged that we can find a precedent for this spiritual interpretation in the familiar passage Is 35<sup>5</sup>; but nothing is said in Isaiah of the raising of the dead, a fact entirely ignored by N. Schmidt, who is at one with Schmiedel and Wendt in their interpretation (loc. cit. p. 236). Moreover, it is very open to question if there was any Jewish expectation that the Messiah would raise the dead, so that St. Matthew and St. Luke had no ground of general belief upon which to base the raisings of the dead which they so evidently attributed to Jesus of Nazareth. Even if there are isolated statements in Jewish theology which attribute to the Messiah the power of raising the dead, it would seem to have been far more generally believed that God would Himself raise the dead. Further, even in those passages which do attribute this power to the Messiah, it is most important to remember that they refer to the resurrection of all the dead, and that there is no allusion of any kind in Jewish writings to the raising by the Messiah of single individuals (cf. Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. p. 632).

But this attitude, maintained by some of Ritschl's followers and by the representative critics of the 'scientific' school, extends to a crucial question and a crucial miracle, viz. the Resurrection of our Lord from the dead. We may readily grant Ritschl's own acceptance of this fundamental historical fact of Christian belief.‡ But what is to be said of a large number of his followers? Some of them would no doubt allow that Christ awoke to a heavenly life with God, or they would labour to draw a distinction between the Easter faith and the Easter message; or they would allow that the Resurrection was a fact of religious faith, or that, whilst the traditional record is often doubtful, the essential contents of the record are, and mean, everything.§ But it is upon this question of the Resurrection that Feine rightly takes his stand, and upon the inclusion or exclusion of this fact in any satisfactory picture of the historical Christ.*

If we turn again to one of the most prominent critics who may be classed as Ritschlians, A. Harnack, we are not only met by his famous distinction between the Easter faith and the Easter message, but we also become aware that his classification of the Gospel miracles is not calculated to increase our belief and confidence in the character of the Gospel narrative. Harnack admits, indeed, that the spiritual power of Jesus was so great that we cannot dismiss offhand as an illusion the reports that He could make the blind to see or the deaf to hear. But, apart from these reports of surprising cures, Harnack would regard the stories of the miraculous which are connected with Jesus as arising from exaggerations of natural and impressive events, or from the projection of inner experiences on to the outer world, or from an interest in the fulfilment of OT records, or from various parables and sayings. In these and in similar ways the miraculous stories arose. And yet, after all is said, it will be noticed that there are narratives of miracles which do not fall under the above heads, and these Harnack comprises under one category as impenetrable stories, the secret of which we cannot solve.†

8. One other and important point in which the 'scientific' German theologians and the left wing of Ritschl's followers agree is in the rejection of the Apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel. And with this rejection there must needs be a serious weakening of the evidence as to our Lord's Deity, although no doubt this evidence may be substantiated from the Synoptists alone. The remarkable thing is that both Ritschlian and 'scientific' critics are alike impressed with the indications that in the Fourth Gospel we are dealing with a source or sources full of minute details and vivid recollections.

Thus Wendt, while he refers the Gospel to some Christian of Asia Minor, admits that this Evangelist, whoever he was, belonged to the same circle in which the old Apostle St. John had lived, and that he thus had access to written information and to oral tradition received from the beloved disciple (Das Johannesevangelium, p. 216 ff.). P. W. Schmidt, in his Die Geschichte Jesu (1904, p. 96), cannot help feeling the force of the exact and minute geographical references which the Fourth Gospel contains, although he rejects the Johannine authorship. Von Soden, although he refuses to rank the Fourth Gospel amongst the historical sources for a 'Life' of Jesus, admits on the same page that the writer of that Gospel had access to good traditions in his notices of place and time, in the small details which mark his recitals, and in his information as to various personalities (Die wichtigsten Fragen im Leben Jesu, 1904, p. 5). If we turn to English critics we find Dr. Percy Gardner inclined to follow Dr. Harnack's view that the Fourth Gospel was the work of John the Elder, who was a disciple of John the son of Zebedee. Dr. Gardner, too, is so impressed with the writer's precise local knowledge, that he thinks it may well have been derived from one of the Apostles, and very likely from John the son of Zebedee.‡

So far as English criticism is concerned, it cannot be said that anything which has been urged has broken down the strong lines of defence which we * Thus, in dwelling upon the contending parties and their disputes as to the 'historical' and the 'biblical' Christ, Feine writes: 'Die Streitfrage lief also darau hinaus, ob die Auferstehung Jesu mit in der Bild des geschichtlichen Christus einzubestehen sei oder nicht'; cf. Das Christentum Jesu und das Christentum der Apostel, 1904, p. 54.

† See especially the reply of Prof. W. Walther of Rostock to Harnack's Das Wesen des Christentums, 1904, pp. 47, 48. Harnack's last category is expressed by the word 'Undurchdringliches.' Reference should also be made to T. H. Wright's The Finger of God, 1903, p. 194, and his valuable Appendix on the view taken by Dr. Percy Gardner and by Dr. Harnack of our Lord's miracles, and also on early Christian and medieval miracles.

‡ See, further, Lepin, op. cit. p. 280. He rightly emphasizes the fact that Jülicher, in the last edition of his Einführung (p. 324), dismisses the attribution of the Fourth Gospel to a presbyter John as without value, and regards the Gospel as composed by a Christian, dependent upon the Apostle John, at the opening of the 2nd century.

owe to Lightfoot, Westcott, Sanday, and more recently to Dr. Drummond. As Dr. Stanton has rightly urged, there must have been good grounds for believing that the Fourth Gospel was founded upon Apostolic testimony, in order to overcome the prejudice which would be created by the contrasts between it and accounts which had been more generally received.*

9. But whilst, in the respects which we have mentioned, the position of the Ritschlian School is so unsatisfactory, we may welcome, with those who are not at all in sympathy with Ritschl's views or with the views of his followers, the witness borne by so many Ritschlians to a living Lord and the unique place which they assign to the Person of Christ in any account of Christianity.†

Among those, e.g., who are classed as Ritschlians we have on the one hand men like Troeltsch supporting strongly and ardently the value of the study of Comparative Religion for a right knowledge of Christianity, and maintaining that the religious-historical method should be applied to every department of theological thought; whilst Harnack, with Reischle, hesitates to follow, and is evidently alive to the fact that the method in question may be carried too far. Dr. Harnack's words on the subject are remarkable. He expresses his desire that the German theological Faculties may remain so for the pursuit of inquiry into the Christian religion, because Christianity is not a religion by the side of other religions, but the religion, and because Christ is not one Master by the side of other Masters, but the Master; the disciples were conscious that they possessed in Christ not merely a Master, but that they knew themselves to be men, new men, redeemed by Him, and that therefore they could preach Him as Saviour and Lord.‡ It is quite true that the American writer, Professor W. A. Brown, sees in some of Harnack's statements, and in his recognition of the gospel of Jesus as that which satisfies the deepest depths of humanity, the promise of a better understanding between the two parties in the Ritschlian ranks: 'With this recognition of the ancient nature of Christ, of a pre-existence for Christianity within the very nature of man, we find Harnack, even while insisting with Ritschl upon the originality of Christianity, admitting the contemporary truth for which the speculative school contend.'§

Unfortunately, however, the advocates of the religious-historical method, at least in its extreme form, show no disposition to confine themselves to the comparison of Christianity with other religions in respect to its inward witness alone; they extend the comparison to the historical facts of the NT, and they do so in a manner which savours of recklessness and extravagance.¶ The need of caution seems to be admitted even by Pfeiderer when he writes, 'Before all things, we must guard against the constant practice of imagining that the inward affinity of religious conceptions implies a connexion in their external history.'‡

And when we turn to the Ritschlians, it is evident that men like Reischle are well aware of the many safeguards with which the religious-historical method and its study should be guarded.** His criticism, e.g., that we should note not only points of likeness but points of unlikeness in any pursuit of the method in question, is endorsed by Heinrici and others, who have joined with Harnack in opposing the religious-historical study of

Mr. Conybeare has the boldness to assure us that any modern scholar who upholds the hypothesis of the Apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel is at least as wandering in perspective and insight as the much derided upholders of the view that the Pauline Epistles were only concocted in the 2nd cent. (Edinburgh Journal, July 1908, p. 493). But he takes no notice of Dr. Drummond's defence, and, whilst he is loud in his praises of the Abbé Loisy, it may be of interest to note that another liberal Romanist, Père Guissani, has now given us an admirable defence of the Johannine authorship, l'Évangile selon Saint Jean, 1908. Christianity as if it were only one of many religions. Thus Heinrici insists with great force that if the resurrection of Jesus is considered from the religious-historical point of view it is unique; and in the same manner A. Jeremias, in answer to Gunkel, insists that the resurrection of Jesus, as it is described as taking place, is without analogy in any other religion.* In the same pamphlet Reischle warns us against the danger of attaching too great value to analogies, and transforming them into relations of dependence. He does not deny that analogies exist between Oriental religions and Christianity, but he is keenly alive to the fact that their right and correct appreciation is a very difficult matter. He allows, e.g., the existence of Gnosticism in the Apostolic Age, but he regards as a fantastic hypothesis Gunkel's attempt to attach to this Jewish Gnosticism an important rôle in establishing points of connexion between Christianity and other religions (op. cit. pp. 30, 31). So, too, he rightly draws attention to the danger of over-valuing the form of an expression to the neglect of the actual meaning of its contents, and he quotes the aphorism, 'Si dicunt idem, non est idem' (op. cit. pp. 81, 83). He further illustrates this position by the use of the familiar formula, 'In the Name of Jesus,' of which Heintzler has made so much.† Such words might, no doubt, be employed as a magical or superstitious formula, but they might also be used as a confession of Christian faith in Jesus, or as an invocation to Him in prayer, or as an appeal to Him as the Mediator with God.

Once more, and above all, Reischle rightly insists upon the insurmountable limits which beset the religious-historical method in any endeavor to solve the problem of the personal religious life of great religious personalities. If this is difficult in the case of Paul, it is still more so, urges Reischle, in the case of Jesus (op. cit. pp. 42, 43).‡

10. But this acknowledgment of the marvellous personality of Jesus may not only be seen in the writings of the Ritschlian School and its various and variant members. We may recognize it—it is not too much to say—in German writers of every school and in German works which appeal to all sorts and conditions of men.

Amongst modern Church historians in Germany no name stands more deservedly high than that of Dobschütz. 'The Apologist,' he tells us in the concluding words of his work on Primitive Life in the Early Church, 'could point triumphantly to the realisation of the moral ideal among Christians of every standing. That was due to the power which issued from Jesus Christ, and actually transformed men. In the midst of an old and dying world this new world springs up with the note of victory running through it. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" And this is the victory which overcame the world, even our faith.' . . . Christianity possessed what the speculations of Neo-Platonism lacked, the sure historical basis of Jesus Christ's Person.‡ But the remarks of von Dobschütz are of further interest, because he again emphasizes the importance to be attached to the Person and work of Jesus, in his contribution to the 'Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher'; in the course of publication in Germany. Here, too, he dwells upon the Apostolic Age, and he points out that in it we do not only find Judaism with a strong addition of Messianic expectation; Jesus had transformed the stiff monotheistic belief in God into a living trust in God, and a joyous spirit of adoption as God's children had taken the place of Pharisaic self-satisfaction and timorous fear.§ Or we turn to another series of books, of a somewhat larger and more expensive kind, entitled Lebensfragen, and here, too, we meet with the same emphatic testimony. Thus Weinel tells us that the Hegelian philosophy hindered Strauss from estimating or understanding the greatness of the personality of Jesus (Jesus im neunzehnten Jahrhundert, p. 42, 1904). Again, a little later on (p. 64), in summing up the significance of modern criticism, he declares that no century has striven so earnestly to discover the features of the true historical Jesus as the nineteenth; and he points out that whilst almost all the witnesses whom he cites in proof of this occupy a critical standpoint in dealing with tradition, they show at least respect, and for the most part reverence, for Jesus of Nazareth, and have recognized the power of salvation in the gospel which He taught. And as this image of Jesus in its living reality and in its purity is placed before the eyes of men, he prophesies that it will win the heart of humanity until all men are more and more transformed into its likeness.

11. But then we have to face the remarkable fact that this picture of the wondrous personality of Jesus is most frequently derived by advanced critics from the Synoptics alone. The Fourth Gospel is ruled out of court, or at the best reduced to a testimony of secondary worth. The account, e.g., of the raising of Lazarus, if it is no longer treated after the manner of Renan as a flagrant deception to which Jesus lent Himself, is regarded not as historical but as allegorical.* But even in what is allowed to us of the Synoptic record, doubt is thrown upon our Lord's claim to judge the world, or upon His declaration that He would give His life as a ransom for many, to say nothing of the refusal to admit, as we have already noted, a large proportion of His miracles as historical.

In like manner the significance of St. Paul's testimony to the facts and teaching of the Gospels, as also the significance of his claim to work miracles in the power which Christ bestowed, is minimized, if not disregarded.

We thus owe this wonderful picture of a great personality mainly, if not entirely, to documents bearing the names of three writers of whom we are assured that we know very little, and whose claims to be the authors of the books (in their present shape at all events) which bear their names must be very largely and seriously discounted. And yet these obscure writers have given us the picture of a life and of a teaching the beauty and the excellence of which mankind has never ceased to acknowledge.

* Here, says a learned and cultured Jew, after allowing that the Synoptic Gospels do contain teaching which in comparison with average Judaism is both valuable and original, both new and true, 'we have religion and morality joined together at a white heat of intensity. The teaching often glows with light and fire. . . . The luminous juxtaposition of even familiar Old doctrines may be novel and stimulating. The combination of Mt 24 with Lv 19:11—the love of God with the love of man—in Mt 22:37 was surely a brilliant flash of the highest religious genius.' Elsewhere he speaks of 'the first-classness' of the Synoptics, and points out that there are one or two facts which still tend to weaken the effect of the Rabbinical teachings and sayings upon the average Jewish consciousness. The first fact is that 'these nobler sayings and teachings are buried in a mass of greatly inferior matter, so that they are difficult to unearth. They are not collected together in a lovely setting, united and illumined by the story of a noble life.' He further remarks that, suppose we make a selection of the great sayings and teachings of the Talmud and the Midrash, it must be admitted that the same 'powerful, driving, and emotional effect as the sayings and teachings of the Gospels' is not produced.

12. But we note that this picture is in many respects entirely opposed to current Jewish conceptions of the day. No one has emphasized this more strongly than Bousset in relation to the Jewish anticipations and expectations of the Kingdom of God. He insists, indeed, upon the Messianic consciousness of Jesus, without which he regards not only the whole work of Jesus, but the conduct of His disciples after His death, as unintelligible. But if Jesus regarded Himself as the Messiah, it is evident, continues Bousset, that He did so in a manner totally opposed to the predominant and current Jewish expectations. Spiritual conceptions of the Messiah were not altogether wanting, but political hopes always occupied the central place in the picture. In the sense of such hopes Jesus was not the Messiah, and would never have become so. He expected the sovereignty of God and not that of Israel, the victory of good and the judgment of evil, not the triumph of the Jew and the annihilation of the Roman; He preached a kingdom in which the vision of God was granted to the pure, and as the preparer for and the ruler in that kingdom He regarded Himself. But the Synoptists no less than St. John furnish us with another picture which was even more decisively opposed to the current conceptions of the Jewish nation, the picture of a suffering Messiah. It is not too much to say that 'the idea of the Messianic sufferings and death is one that wakes no echo in the heart of any Jewish contemporary of our Lord, not excepting even His disciples.*' In short, the words of Dalman are amply justified, 'Suffering and death for the actual possessor of the Messianic dignity are in fact unimaginable according to the testimony of the Gospels' (Words of Jesus, p. 265, Eng. tr.).

* Nothing could mark more strongly the contrast between Jewish Messianic notions and the picture of the Messiah as realized in our Gospels, than the following passage from the Jewish Encyclopedia: 'Jesus' word on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" was in all its implications itself a disproof of the exaggerated claims made for Him after His death by His disciples. The very form of His punishment would disprove those claims in Jewish eyes. No Messiah that Jews could recognise could suffer such a death.' †

This representation of a suffering Messiah which the Gospels presented so uncompromisingly, pressed hard for a solution upon the famous founder of the Tübingen School:

'Never was that which bore the outward appearance of ruin and annihilation turned into such signal and decisive victory, and so glorious a passage into life, as in the death of Jesus. Up to this time there was always a possibility that He and the people might come to agree on the ground of the Messianic faith. . . . but His death made a complete and irreparable breach between Him and Judaism. A death like His made it impossible for the Jew, as long as he remained a Jew, to believe in Him as the Messiah. To believe in Him as the Messiah after His dying such a death involved the removal from the conception of the Messiah of all the Jewish and carnal elements which were associated with it' (Church History, i. p. 42, Eng. tr.).

Baur's solution of the difficulty forms one of the most curious pages in the history of modern criticism. He allows that nothing but the miracle of the Resurrection could restore the faith of the disciples after such a death as that of the Cross, and yet he assures us in the same breath that the question as to the nature and the reality of the Resurrection lies outside the sphere of historical inquiry. What history requires is not so much the fact of the Resurrection of Jesus, as the belief that it was a fact.

In more recent utterances we seem to catch an echo of Baur's words, and his remarks anticipate Harnack's familiar distinction between the Easter faith and the Easter message. The Easter faith, according to Harnack, is a conviction which tells us that the Crucified has achieved an inward victory over death, and has entered into eternal life. But this so-called Easter faith appears, not unjustly, to many thoughtful minds to do away with the need of Easter altogether. The Crucified overcame death on Good Friday, so far, that is, as an inward triumph was concerned. On Good Friday, and not upon the third day, He entered upon eternal life. And if nothing special happened on Easter Day, there seems to be little sense or point in talking about 'Easter faith.' ‡

But, further, this contrast between the current ideas of the Messiah and the Messiahship of Jesus in the Gospels may be illustrated from the succeeding history of the Jewish nation and from the culmination of the Jewish hopes in the pretender Bar Cochba in the reign of Hadrian. The report was circulated that the Messiah had at last appeared, and fabulous numbers are said to have joined his standard in insurrection against the Romans. We know how the struggle ended in terrible disaster to the Jews, although for some few years they fought with all their characteristic stubbornness and desperation. But the chief actor in the drama, Bar Cochba, reveals to us only too plainly the kind of Messiah whom the majority of the Jews expected, and whom they were prepared to welcome: 'Jesus offered Himself unresistingly to death; the impostor died in arms . . . whatever Jesus Christ was not, this pretender was. Whatever this pretender was, Jesus Christ was not.' One feature in the new Messiah's career may be specially noted, viz. the absence of any attempt on his part to work miracles, although no doubt all sorts of exaggerated stories of strength and power gathered round his name.† But if, as we are told, there was an irresistible tendency to attribute miraculous powers to the Messiah, if, as Professor Percy Gardner asserts, there was every probability that whether actual or not the miracles would be reported, how is it that no such miracles gathered around the name of Bar Cochba? Is not the only explanation to be found in the fact that Jesus of Nazareth actually worked miracles, while the pretender worked none?‡ Nor must it be forgotten in this connexion that the Jews in early times never attempted to deny that our Lord wrought miracles; on the contrary, they admitted the miracles, whilst they referred them to Satanic arts or to a knowledge of the sorcery which Jesus had brought with Him from Egypt.§ In the same manner the modern Jews admit that our Lord gained His notoriety not merely from His teaching but from His miracles, specially from those which He wrought as a healer of the sick. 'It was not,' writes Dr. Kohler in the Jewish Encyc. vii. p. 167, 'as the teacher of new religious principles not as a new lawgiver, but as a new wonder-worker that Jesus won fame and influence among the simple inhabitants of Galilee in his lifetime.¶'

13. But there were other claims made by our Lord, in addition to the claim to work miracles, and of these great and supernatural claims it may be said that they cannot possibly be derived from the picture of the Messiah which meets us in the OT. Some words remarkable in their bearing upon this subject were uttered by Dr. Charles in speaking before the University of Oxford on 'The Messiah of the Old Testament and the Christ of the New Testament':

'As other claims which are without parallel in the Old Testament prophecy of the Messiah, we shall mention first His claim to judge the world; and next, to forgive sin; and, finally, to be the Lord of life and death. In the Old Testament these prerogatives belong to God alone as the essential Head of the kingdom, and appear in those prophetic descriptions of the kingdom which ignore the figure of the Messiah, and represent God as manifesting Himself among men. Here, then, we have the Christ of the Gospels claiming not only to fulfil the Old Testament prophecies of the various ideals of the Messiah, but also to discharge the functions of God Himself in relation to the kingdom.*'

 * Expositor, 6th series, vi. [1902] p. 258. In Jewish apocalyptic literature, it should be added, the Messiah is in many cases the agent of God in the judgment which takes place at the beginning or close of the Messianic reign; even in the final judgment He is represented as God's agent, and only in the later section of the Book of Enoch does He appear as the Judge at the last day. We may also contrast our Lord's own words as to His Parousia with the fantastic and grotesque descriptions of Jewish theology.

Nor can it be said with any justification that these Divine prerogatives are ascribed to our Lord late in time, or that they were simply Christian accretions. We need look no further than St. Paul's earliest Epistle, 1 Thess., to come across statements which can scarcely mean anything less than that our Lord was associated as Judge with God the Father; that He is the medium of salvation, and that we obtain life through His death; that the prayers of Christians are to be addressed to Him; that whether we wake or sleep our true life is in Him (cf. 1 Th 3rd 5th 10th). Nor is there any reason to suppose that in such statements to the Thessalonians St. Paul is putting forward a conception of Christ which differed from that entertained by the rest of the Church: 'The Son of God,' he writes to the Corinthians, 'who was preached among you by us (not by St. Paul himself alone), even by me and Silvanus and Timothy, was not yea and nay, but in him is yea,' 2 Co 1st (cf. 1 Th 1st). Moreover, in the expression 'the Son of God' St. Paul's teaching no less than that of the Gospels indicates a unique relationship between the Father and the Son; cf. e.g. Ro 8th 2nd. And if we ask whence St. Paul's conception was derived, it seems not unreasonable to maintain that it was derived from the statements and the teaching of our Lord Himself.

There is a famous passage contained in two of the Synoptic Gospels which so strongly resembles the phraseology of St. John that it has been called, and not unjustly, an serilite from the Johannine heaven: 'All things have been delivered unto me of my Father, and none knoweth the Son save the Father, neither doth any know the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him' (Mt 11th, Lk 10th). Dr. Harnack, although he does not deny that Jesus spoke these words, weakens their force and meaning, and it is well to turn for a criticism of his statements to Dr. Swete's remarks on 'The Teaching of Christ,' Expositor (6th Series, vii. [1903] p. 407):

'The knowledge claimed is that of a son, and it rests upon sonship; it is a strange misreading of the words which reverses this order, as Professor Harnack seems to do—it is not knowledge which makes Christ "the Son," but sonship which enables Him to know. He declares that He knows God as only a son can know his father, and that this knowledge is not a possession which other sons of God naturally share with Him, but one which belongs of right to Him alone, and to others only so far as He is pleased to impart it. This is to claim not only unique knowledge, but a unique Sonship. It is difficult to discover any essential difference between this statement of St. Matthew and the closing words of St. John's prologue.'

The Abbé Loisy does not allow that our Lord ever spoke these words, but affirms that they are derived from some primitive Church tradition; and he goes so far as to suppose that they were derived, in part at all events, from Sir 51.† But it is difficult to believe that such words could have found the place which they occupy in two of our Gospels unless they were spoken by our Lord. It should be remembered that they are regarded, not merely by conservative but by 'scientific' critics, as forming part of that 'collection of discourses' which probably comes to us from the Apostle St. Matthew. Indeed, Keim long ago affirmed that there is no more violent criticism than that which Strauss had introduced, viz. the repudiation of a passage so strongly attested. Moreover, the alleged dependences upon Sir 51 are in reality very superficial; in some particulars the alleged likenesses are such as might be found in the utterances of any Jewish speakers. It may also be noted that while the points of comparison are preserved, the points of contrast are entirely omitted. For example, Jesus the son of Sirach in his prayer thanks God because He has hearkened to him and delivered him from peril; our Lord in His prayer thanks the Father for revealing to babes that which had been concealed from the wise and prudent.*

But it should further be borne in mind that these statements in Mt. and Lk. do not stand alone; that the Gospel which is probably the earliest of the Synoptics speaks of 'the Father' and of 'the Son' absolutely, and that the words employed can only be fairly explained as assigning to our Lord a unique relationship to God: 'But of that day or that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father' (Mk 13<sup>32</sup>). If such words are suspected, we may fairly ask who would have been likely to introduce them? Dr. Schmiedel, who generously allows us to construct a 'scientific' 'Life of Christ' from five sayings and four incidents of the Gospels, does not attempt to deny that our Lord spoke these words; and although, of course, he uses them for his own purposes of exegesis, we may now take it that this representative of the most advanced criticism allows us to regard this verse in St. Mark's Gospel as an utterance of our Lord Himself.† Professor N. Schmidt refuses to accept even Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, and regards the words in question, 'whether the Son,' as probably an interpolation (The Prophet of Nazareth, pp. 147, 231). Such words presuppose, he thinks, such a doctrine of subordination as was cherished in the Church of the second century. But has he forgotten the doctrine of subordination in 1 Co 15<sup>28</sup>, a passage which even he dares not refuse to St. Paul?

In addition to Dr. Swete's remarks, to which reference has been made above, we may cite the following passage, as bearing closely on our subject, from the Dean of Westminster's Study of the Gospels, p. 109: 'Observe that the titles "the Father" and "the Son" are used absolutely (i.e. in Mt. and Lk. loc. cit.). We are familiar with this use from St. John's Gospel. But it occurs but once again in the Synoptic Gospels, Mark xiii. 32. . . . It is an important fact to be borne in mind in connexion with the Christology of John's Gospel, that this special mode of speech is attested once for St. Mark and once also for the non-Markan document. We could hardly have stronger evidence from the historical point of view, that our Lord Himself did thus speak of Himself absolutely as "the Son." It is not necessary to explain how unique is the claim which is put forward by this language.'

Professor N. Schmidt, indeed, has boldly argued against this uniqueness in His relation to the Father which our Lord claims, by asserting that He always availed Himself of the general expression 'Abba, Father,' and that the variants 'my Father' and 'your Father' were introduced by the Greek Evangelists.‡ But, as M. Lepin has pointed out in his valuable book, it is to be noted that a distinguished Aramaic scholar, Dr. Dalman, does not hesitate to affirm, in contradistinction to the § Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Son of God,' iv. 4096. This is one of the most painful articles in the whole of the four volumes, and we cannot be surprised that Professor Schmidt throws doubt upon our Lord's exact words, when at this time of day he can throw doubt upon St. Paul's authorship of 1 Thessalonians. More recently Professor Schmidt has repeated these arguments, and he appears to regard Mt 11<sup>26</sup>, Lk 10<sup>22</sup> as casting an undeserved reflection upon the character of Jesus' (The Prophet of Nazareth, p. 152). On Schmidt's denial that our Lord ever called Himself the Son of Man see Stalker's Christology of Jesus, p. 72, and Mitchell's Eschatology of Jesus, p. 148). If the Gospels were written as late as Schmidt believes, it is certain that the introduction into all of them of such a title as 'the Son of Man' would have been regarded with the gravest suspicion, and would have failed to gain acceptance in Christian circles where our Lord's Godhead was fully recognized.

assertions of Dr. Schmidt, that the unique position assumed by Jesus follows from the invariable separation which He makes between 'my Father' and 'your Father' (Words of Jesus, p. 281 [Eng. tr.]); and a few pages later Dr. Dalman writes: 'Nowhere do we find that Jesus called Himself the Son of God in such a sense as to suggest a merely religious and ethical relation to God, a relation which others also actually possessed, or which they were capable of attaining or destined to acquire' (p. 287).*

14. We must remember, too, that not only do a great number of English and German writers of note acknowledge the closeness of St. Paul's acquaintance with our Lord's life and teaching,† but that this testimony of St. Paul is materially and increasingly strengthened by the large number of Epistles which are now almost universally acknowledged to have been from his pen. Some sixty years ago (1845), F. C. Baur, the founder of the Tübingen School, published his 'Life' of St. Paul, and accepted only four of the Apostle's letters, in which he believed that he could discover the notes of a fundamental difference between Paul and the Twelve; to-day at least double that number of the Epistles which bear St. Paul's name is accepted by nearly all critics alike. It would be easy to point in proof of this to Dr. C. Clemens's statements in his recent Life and Work of St. Paul (see i. pp. 6-162). We must not forget that Professor Schmidt is prepared to accept only the Hauptbriefe and Philippians, and that he regards even the former as having suffered insertions; thus, 1 Co 15<sup>28-31</sup> is a later insertion (The Prophet of Nazareth, pp. 193, 200, 397). Colossians and even Philemon are rejected; and we are told, in the only reference to Bishop Lightfoot in the volume, that his is the ablest defence of these two Epistles, but that it fails to do full justice to the counter arguments (p. 194). It is not surprising after this that Professor Schmidt, following on the lines of Van Manen, rejects all the Epistles of St. Ignatius, and that he makes no reference to their acceptance by Lightfoot, Harnack, Zahn.

If we turn for a moment to the little books of a popular kind which are in course of publication in Germany, at the price of a few pence each, we find that to Professor Vischer of Basle (known to us in England first of all through Dr. Harnack) is committed the volume which treats of the Epistles of St. Paul. Vischer accepts all the Epistles, nine in number, which are accepted by Dr. Clemens; and even when he comes to deal with Ephesians (which Clemens rejects), he frankly acknowledges, with Erich Haupt in the latest edition of Meyer's Commentary, that the alleged objections are by no means decisive, and that more is to be said for St. Paul's authorship than against it. In cases, moreover, in which the traditional structure of the Epistles is questioned, as in 2 Cor., it is frankly allowed that the separate letter alleged to be found in chs. 10-13 is, no less than the rest of the Epistle, the work of St. Paul; and even in the case of the Pastoral Epistles, the existence of genuine Pauline fragments is constantly maintained (see, further, von Soden's Urchristliche Literaturgeschichte, 1905, pp. 28, 162).

* See also Lepin, Jesus Messie et Fils de Dieu, pp. 297, 300, 2nd ed. 1905.

† See, e.g., Zahn, Einleitung, ii. p. 163 ff., where references to (1) the history, (2) the words of Jesus, are drawn out at length; J. Weiss, Das älteste Evangelium, 1909, p. 23 ff.; Wind, Paulus, 1904, p. 246 ff.; P. W. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, p. 96 ff.; Headlam, Critical Questions, 1903, p. 161 ff.; and the present writer would venture to refer to the last lecture in The Testimony of St. Paul to Christ.

15. It has been recently said by Dr. Driver that 'the testimony to our blessed Lord's life and work is so much more nearly contemporary with the events recorded than can often be shown to be the case in the Old Testament, and also so much more varied and abundant, that by an elementary principle of historical criticism it is of proportionately higher value.'* This claim to be so nearly contemporary with the events of the Gospels may fairly be made for the testimony of St. Paul; and even if Dr. Zahn is right in refusing to follow the recent trend of criticism, which places the Apostle's conversion within a year or two of our Lord's death, it is certain that St. Paul must have been acquainted, at a very early date, with those who had known the Christ, and who had recognized and felt His power (Gal 1<sup>18-19</sup>, Ro 16<sup>7</sup>). Professor Schmidt has lately argued (The Prophet of Nazareth, p. 157) that as the distance of time increased between Jesus and the later Pauline literature, the term Son of God assumed more and more a metaphysical significance. But Professor Schmidt accepts Philipians as undoubtedly the work of St. Paul. How then does he deal with the great Christological passage, Ph 2<sup>6-7</sup>? We are simply informed that this passage may easily be an interpolation (p. 195 f.).

It seems to the present writer quite beside the mark to maintain that, in investigating the facts and beliefs which lie between A.D. 30-45, we have no contemporary documents, that, in fact, none exist, and that our only guide is inference based on later writings and developments.† We have already seen the inferences to be derived from the statements in one of St. Paul's earliest and practically undoubted Epistles, 1 Th., and that these inferences of necessity presuppose a preaching and teaching considerably anterior in time to the actual date of the Epistle mentioned.

Moreover, we may well ask, What is meant by the word 'contemporary'? General Gordon was murdered in the Sudan in 1884. If a man wrote an account to-day of the closing years of Gordon's life, we should scarcely refuse to give it the title of a contemporary record.‡ But we are separated from the death of Gordon by a longer period of time than that which elapsed between the conversion of St. Paul and his earliest written testimony to the belief and practice of the primitive Church.§

16. But, further, in any attempt to estimate, however briefly, the bearings of modern criticism, it must not be forgotten that the Gospels are now placed at a much earlier date than formerly.¶

* The Higher Criticism, 1905, pp. ix and 82; cf. also and esp. Dr. Driver's remarks in his LOP p. xi, where the same point is more fully elaborated: 'Viewed in the light of the unique personality of Christ, as depicted both in the common tradition embodied in the Synoptic Gospels and in the personal reminiscences underlying the Fourth Gospel, and also as presupposed by the united testimony of the Apostolic writers belonging almost to the same generation, the circumstances are such as to forbid the supposition that the facts of our Lord's life on which the fundamental truths of Christianity depend can have been the growth of mere tradition, or are anything else than strictly historical.' The same canon of historical criticism which authorizes the assumption of tradition in the OT forbids it—except within the narrowest limits, as in some of the divergences apparent between the parallel narratives of the Gospels—in the case of the NT.

‡ Prebendary Sadler (The Lost Gospel, p. 196), writing in 1876, well asks if we should refuse to describe an account of the Chinese War (1854-1860) as a contemporary history.

§ In this connexion we may recall Renan's words, 'Jesus is known to us by at least one contemporary piece of evidence, that of St. Paul' (Histoire du Peuple d'Israël, 1887, i. p. xviii).

¶ An excellent summary of data bearing out this in connexion with prominent critics is given by Lepin, op. cit. p. xxxi. Cf. also Deussen, 'Evangelium und Urchristentum,' in Beiträge zur Feststellung der Christlichen Religion, 1905; and also Harnack, Chron. i. pp. 664, 665. In this first volume Dr. Harnack (1897) places the Synoptic Gospels well within the 1st century, and A.D. 110 is assigned as the furthest limit for the Gospel of St. John with the Epistles of St. John and the Apocalypse. In this and in other respects great jubilation was raised at Strauss long ago maintained that the Gospel story would be impregnable if it was certain that it was written by eye-witnesses, or at all events by men who lived close to the events. And this hypothesis of Strauss has at least been verified to this extent in our day, by the acknowledgment that all three of the Synoptics rest in no small degree upon genuinely Apostolic sources. Even Jülicher, who places our First Gospel at the year 100 or thereabouts, admits that the writer used our Second Gospel and a collection of Logia made by St. Matthew; and in this Second Gospel he sees the work of John Mark, founded on reminiscences of the Petrine circle. And if, as is generally admitted, the writer of our Third Gospel employed Mark and the Matthean Logia among his chief means of information, he, too, must have based a great part of his work upon two Apostolic sources.*

The force of St. Paul's contemporary testimony we have already noted, and we are now able to point in addition to the Apostolic sources underlying our Gospels. And thus we have a twofold guarantee against the alleged process of idealization which magnified by degrees the deeds and sayings of Jesus, a theory which, as M. Lepin observes, is urged by writers in many respects so far removed from each other as Schmiedel and Loisy.†

17. And if modern criticism has strengthened the external evidence for the early date of our Gospels, may we not say that it has strengthened the internal evidence also? If we turn, for example, to the Gospel of St. John, we find a remarkable testimony in Furrer's well-known Leben Jesu Christi (1905), a testimony the force of which is increased when we remember the writer's close acquaintance with the geography of the Holy Land. Thus Furrer speaks of the definite and exact geographical notices which are scattered up and down the pages of the Fourth Gospel, many of which we know only through the author of the book, and which correspond so thoroughly to the actual conditions.‡ The narrator must thus have been a man who was acquainted with the home of Jesus by his own personal observation, so that we have the feeling that we are able to realize the scenes as it were with our own bodily eyes. If we consider the picture drawn by the Synoptists, we are again struck with its vivid reality, its truthful correspondence to the conditions, social and political, of the country, its acquaintance with the religious parties of the Jews and the Messianic hopes of the people, with its curious mixture of a foreign civilization and government with the hereditary customs and judicial procedure of the Jews. But the picture thus presented to us could not have been drawn except by the hands of men contemporary with the events which they purport at Dr. Harnack's conservatism; but he soon made it clear that the acceptance of the date or the authorship of a book by no means involves the acceptance of its contents. Huhn's series of 'Helps to the Understanding of the Bible,' which has had a large circulation in Germany, is not very satisfactory in relation to the Gospels. Huhn, however, admits that the 'Logia' which were used by Matthew, if not composed by him, date before A.D. 70. Of the author of the Gospel of Mark he holds that nothing definite can be known; but at the same time he speaks of Matthew as composed after 70, and of Mark as being of an earlier date. Luke is the latest of the three, and, like so many advanced critics, Huhn places Luke after 70 on the ground of 2:12-24. But it does not increase our confidence in Huhn's researches when he places St. John's Gospel at 135-140, and gives as one of his chief reasons the passage Jn 6<sup>8</sup>, in which he sees a reference to Bar Cochba (A.D. 132), who came 'in his own name,' and was recognized as the Messiah of the Jews (Das Neue Testament, 1904, p. 13 f.). In answer to Huhn's inference from 1k 2:13 see Blass, Philology of the Gospels, 1895, p. 41.

to describe. It would have been impossible after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and the entire bouleversement which that catastrophe caused, to recreate, as it were, the conditions which prevailed socially, politically, religiously before that capital event.* This impression of truthfulness which the contents of our Gospels cannot fail to make, is witnessed to even in quarters in which we might not altogether expect it. Thus Jülicher speaks of our Gospels as of priceless value as authorities for the history of Jesus; and even if much of their data may be uncertain, Jülicher nevertheless maintains that 'the impression of the Saviour which they leave on the reader's mind is a faithful one; if the total picture of Jesus which we obtain from the Synoptics displays all the magic of reality, this . . . is owing to the fact that they . . . painted Jesus as they found Him already existing in the Christian communities, and that their model corresponded in all essentials to the original.†

18. In concluding this article, it will not be unfitting, especially in a Dictionary devoted to the subject of 'Christ and the Gospels', to emphasize once again the importance attached to the Person of Christ in the current literature of to-day. It would be easy to refer in this connexion to the statements made by representative writers in England and America. We turn, e.g., to Professor Nash's History of the Higher Criticism, and we find him speaking (p. 25) of 'that Christ who is humanity's Amen to all the Divine promises'; or to Dr. P. Gardner's Historic View of the NT, and we find him maintaining (pp. 88-91) that the founder of Christianity stands above all other religious teachers.‡ Even Professor Schmidt can speak again and again of the wonderful personality of Jesus: 'While other teachers may and will do much for our modern world, the healing, purging, elevating influence of Jesus is of priceless value. No man can come into contact with him without feeling that life goes out of him' (The Prophet of Nazareth, p. 360).

At the Liverpool Church Congress, 1904, one of the speakers on NT criticism, Professor F. C. Burkitt, remarked at the close of his speech that the only time when Christians would have cause to be afraid was when the far off figure of Jesus Christ no longer attracted the critic and the student, but that there was no evidence that that day was within sight. The last statement finds ample corroboration in the English and German literature of to-day.§ We may look again at the little series of popular books to which reference has been made as in progress of publication for the German people. One of them is entitled Die Quellen des Lebens Jesu, by Professor Wernle of Basle, whose name is widely known in England for his works on the Gospels and the Beginnings of the Christian Religion. Here again we find this same primary importance attached to the Life and Person of Jesus, in spite of so much which betrays impatience of any definite dogmatic teaching. Whatever else, in Wernle's view, we may learn from St. Paul, we may at all events learn this, that in Jesus, notwithstanding the fact that He died a death of shame on the cross, St. Paul saw his own life and that of the world divided, as it were, into two parts—with Jesus, without Jesus. In Jesus we behold a man who helps us to understand aright ourselves, the world, and God; who accompanies us as the truest friend and guide in the needs and struggles of the present, and to whom we can entrust ourselves with all confidence for the future. In the same series Professor Pfeleiderer, who discusses the preparation for Christianity, finds in the sentence, 'The Word was made flesh,' the dividing line between the many and varied speculations of philosophy and the full and actual manifestation of the Divine Logos in the life of the Son of God (Vorbereitung des Christentums in der Griechischen Philosophie, p. 66). Another writer, Dr. Bousset, to whom reference has been made, and who is also well known to English readers, expresses himself in the little book Was wissen wir von Jesus?, which H. Holtzmann recommends as the best guide-book for the German laity, in almost rapturous language: 'Gradually there rises before us a Form in which the soul rejoices, the Form of the great liberator, the mighty opponent of all forms of Pharisaism, and at all times the great upholder of simplicity in religion. And more even than this: there stands before us the Form of Jesus the friend of sinners, the preacher of the forgiveness of sins, who in all the greatness of his own moral strength condescends with all the tenderness of a woman to the lost and the outcast, the Form of One who, conscious of victory, could unite His disciples to Himself by an everlasting bond when the last and night of His earthly life had come and death stood before His eyes.'

In this Personality Bousset finds the true origin of Christianity. Other factors no doubt contributed, but there was one factor above and beyond them all, the Person of Jesus. Jewish Messianic hopes, Greek philosophy, the social conditions of the Roman Empire, the organization and the spirit of the religious social clubs and of the mysteries, all these contributed. One by one, in a few graphic pages, Bousset passes them in review, and shows how each of them was insufficient alone, because each of them wanted the distinctive power which made Christianity all-sufficient and all-victorious, the power of a life-giving Personality, the possessor and the bestower of new spiritual agencies, the bringer of life out of death. In words of almost evangelical fervour Bousset proclaims the presence in history of this unique personal power. None can doubt the power of personality in the religious life, and all religions which occupy the foremost place in the world testify to this in some measure more or less.*

In face of such acknowledgments, we cease to wonder that von Soden in his recent Die wichtigsten Fragen im Leben Jesu, 1904, devotes so much of his book to a consideration of the Personality of Jesus (p. 82 ff.). Amongst other matters of varied interest, he points out that there is no evidence that Jesus was influenced in any direct manner by Buddha or Plato, or by Philo and his predecessors (p. 108). He was the child of His people and country, He knew no foreign literature (p. 109). He was far removed from any association with the hard and gloomy character of Pharisaic piety, but at the same time His life was in harmony with all that was best in the Jewish and

* This insistence upon the importance of the personal influence is again notably marked in one of the most recent of popular 'Lives' of Jesus by Dr. Furrer of Zürich. See, e.g., the closing page of his Leben Jesu, 1905, p. 261, in which, after insisting upon regarding Jesus as man, he ends, as he himself expresses it, with the confession of the centurion, 'This man was the Son of God.' Furrer's treatment of his theme is marked by reverence and sympathy, and he rightly points out that, until the heart is in sympathy, no justice can be done to the holiest portraiture of humanity (Vorwort, p. v).

‡ In a noteworthy passage (op. cit. p. 100) the same writer says, after referring to the fact that Jesus does not use the phrase 'Our Father in heaven' as including both Himself and His disciples: 'It would not show a want of the critical spirit to go further than this, and to maintain with Professor Harnack that Jesus assigned a special significance to His death in relation to the forgiveness of sins, claimed an unique dignity as King and Lord, regarded His death as a passage to glory, and anticipated a speedy return to the earth as Judge.' It is disappointing to read the next paragraph: 'Yet I cannot persuade myself that on strictly historical grounds these statements could be definitely established.'

§ See, e.g., Fairbairn, Christ in Modern Theology, pp. 18, 21; and Sir Oliver Lodge in Hilbert Journal, Apr. 1906, p. 644, where he 'accepts the general consensus of Christendom as testifying to the essentially Divine character of Christ.'

Greek types of humanity, and von Soden concludes his book (p. 111) by saying that this Personality which was beyond the invention of the Evangelists, and which is presented to us in a picture which knows no flaw, is an irrefutable, integral fact, and the wonder of wonders in the world's history rich in wonders. (See, further, the same writer's Urchristliche Literaturgeschichte, p. 5).

Once more; we turn to H. Wendt, another German well known in England, not only by his works on the Teaching of Jesus and the Gospel of St. John, but by two lectures delivered in this country in 1904. He speaks of the significance of Jesus in revelation (The Idea and Reality of Revelation, p. 28 ff.). Jesus is for him the highest revelation of God, although not the only one. At the foundation of all the forms of Christianity there is a reverence for Jesus Christ as Saviour and Mediator. And Wendt concludes by assuring us that a large number of the German theologians of to-day aspire to lead Christianity back to its original form, to the simplicity and sublimity of the primitive teaching of Jesus (p. 91). There is much in such acknowledgments which carries us back to the confession of A. Réville. For him 'Jesus is supremely great,' and he adds, 'Let us fear nothing as to the glory of the Son of Man. We owe it to Him, to the Divine ideal dwelling within Him, that we know ourselves to be the children of God; it is in His pure heart that love between God and man has been realized, and in this He possesses a crown which none can ever take from Him' (History of the Doctrine of the Deity of Jesus Christ, Eng. tr. p. 164).

In such utterances as these, which might be easily multiplied, although they fall very far short of the language of the Church and the Creeds, we mark how the interest of thoughtful minds in Germany, America, France, England is centred in the Person of Christ, and how also many of these writers whom we have mentioned admit that there was a relationship between Jesus and the Father so intimate as to be, if not metaphysical, yet at all events unique, and that this is conceded by critics who would depreciate St. Luke's opening narrative of the Gospel history or St. Peter's confession at Cæsarea Philippi (Mt 16<sup>16</sup>).

And as we listen to such utterances, sometimes full of hope and confidence, sometimes full of pathos and tender religious feeling, we are conscious that the old question, 'Lord, to whom shall we go?' has not lost its interest for the world or for ourselves, and we thankfully recognize the acknowledgment rendered even by the spirit of criticism and inquiry, as it searches into the will and the teaching of Him who alone is the Revealer of the Father, 'Thou hast the words of eternal life.'

This Gospel type, he adds, has found its expression in Apostolic times in many great passages of the Pauline letters, and above all in the First Epistle of St. John, which Wendt regards as the genuine work of the disciple who stood nearest to Jesus, the most beautiful record of a mind directly inspired by His words and life.

CROSS, CROSS-BEARING.—For the historical aspects of the literal cross, see CRUCIFIXION.

The English word 'cross' is from the Latin crux through the French croix, Old French and Middle English crois. But crux (from terrus) is not synonymous with crux, but was originally a wider term, and, like crux, meant a stake (Hom., Herod., Thuc., Xen.). In the NT, however (not present in LXX), it is used only in the sense of crux.

This article deals only with the figurative uses of the term in the Gospels or in relation to the death of Christ on the cross as interpreted in the Acts and Epistles. For the archeological and magical history of the sign of the cross outside as well as within the pale of Christianity, see Zöckler's Das Kreuz Christi (1875 [Eng. tr. 1878]), Gollet, d'Alviella's Migration of Symbols (1894), and his art. 'Cross' in Hastings' forthcoming Dictionary of Religion and Ethics. The true mysticism in the cross of Christ as conceived by St. Paul comes properly before us.

1. The use of the word by Jesus in the sense of cross-bearing.—On three separate occasions Jesus spoke of cross-bearing as essential to discipleship. The first is in Mt 10<sup>38</sup>, when He sent out the Twelve on a special preaching tour at the close of the Galilean ministry, just a little over a year before His death. Meyer, in  loco, considers this passage proleptically misplaced by St. Matthew, and thinks it should come after Mt 16<sup>24</sup>. But there is no need of this supposition, for the figure of bearing one's cross would be quite intelligible to Jews since the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, Alexander Jannæus, and Varus. Josephus (BJ v. xi. 1) even says that 'I'tus crucified so many that there were not places for the crosses, or crosses for the victims. The Jews themselves had not favoured crucifixion, save Alexander Jannæus, the 'Thracian' in spirit. Broadus (on Mt 16<sup>24</sup>) rightly denies that this saying of Jesus about bearing one's cross is an anachronism before His own crucifixion. He did bear His own cross (Jn 19<sup>17</sup>), perhaps the crosspiece properly speaking; but so did the criminals usually who were crucified, for Plutarch says: καὶ οὗτοι καθ' ἑαυτὸν τὸν αἰῶνα σταυρῶν (de Sera Num. Vind. 9). It is a general illustration that the disciples could have easily understood, though they were not yet able to see the evident prophetic allusion to Christ's own literal experience. It is not without special point that Jesus thus expressed the fundamental principle of self-sacrifice under the image of the cross. He did not plainly say that He would be crucified till shortly before His death (Mt 20<sup>18</sup>), but Jesus Himself is conscious of the death on the cross which 'He himself will be called upon to endure' (Meyer on Mt 16<sup>24</sup>).

The second time that Christ spoke of cross-bearing was when He rebuked Peter for playing the part of Satan (Mk 8<sup>34</sup>, Mt 16<sup>24</sup>, Lk 9<sup>23</sup>). On the first occasion the Master was giving directions to the disciples about their preaching, but here He addressed this vivid condition of discipleship 'unto all' (Lk 9<sup>23</sup>) as a 'deterrent in a high degree, suggesting a procession of furciferi headed by Jesus and consisting of His followers' (Sweet on Mk 8<sup>34</sup>). Many of the followers of Judas and Simon in Galilee had been crucified (Jos. Ant. xvii. x. 10). St. Luke adds 'daily,' though the aorist term ἀπαύω is used. The permanence of this cross-bearing is emphasized by the present tense of 'follow' (ἀκολουθεῖτω).

St. Luke alone gives the third use of the expression (Lk 24<sup>47</sup>), and it is in Jesus, not long before the raising of Lazarus from the dead. In this instance βαστάω, not ἀπαύω, is used, the only NT example of the figurative, as Jn 19<sup>17</sup> is the only NT instance of the literal, use of the verb with σταυρῶς (Plummer, Internat. Crit. Com. in loco).

2. The term 'Crucified' comes to be a favourite one with the name of Jesus. The angels at the empty tomb speak of 'Jesus the Nazarene, the Crucified One' (Ἰησοῦν ἰσραελῆ τὸν Ναζαρεθὶν τὸν ἐσταυρωμένον, Mk 16<sup>7</sup>, Mt 28<sup>9</sup>). St. Peter in his great address on the day of Pentecost charges the Jews with having crucified Jesus (Ac 2<sup>23</sup>). He repeats the charge when brought before the Sanhedrin (Ac 4<sup>10</sup>). St. Peter elsewhere always (Ac 5<sup>30</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>24</sup>) speaks of Christ as hanging on a tree (ξύλον); but this non-classical use of ξύλον as equal to gibbet or cross (the stocks in Ac 16<sup>24</sup>) is found in the LXX as tr. for Heb. ץ (Gn 40<sup>19</sup> etc.). St. Paul so uses the term also in Ac 13<sup>29</sup> and Gal 3<sup>13</sup> (quotation here from Dt 21<sup>22</sup>). Each example in the NT is a quotation from the LXX. But in the LXX ξύλον does not refer to crucifixion, but rather to the prohibited nailing up of unburied bodies after the manner of the heathen nations (1 S 31<sup>10</sup>). But St. Paul speaks rather of 'Christ crucified,' more properly, 'Christ as crucified' (predicate), Χριστὸν ἐσταυρωμένον (1 Co 1<sup>23</sup>), and once he sharply accents the idea by saying Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν καὶ υἱὸν ἐσταυρωμένον (1 Co 2<sup>2</sup>), in opposition to his Judaizing opponents. This was his method of openly setting forth (προεγράφη) Jesus as crucified (Gal 3<sup>1</sup>), like a public placard. The blindness of the enemies of Christ comes out in St. Paul's use of the term with the Lord of glory (1 Co 2<sup>8</sup>), and yet He was crucified in weakness (2 Co 13<sup>4</sup>). Rev 11<sup>8</sup> merely identifies Jerusalem as the city where Jesus was crucified.

3. The cross as the epitome of the gospel.—The disciples naturally passed to this idea when they came to understand the meaning of the death of Christ. The cross that had seemed the destruction of their hopes (Lk 24<sup>47</sup>) now became the symbol of the gospel of grace. 'But we preach Christ crucified' (1 Co 1<sup>23</sup>), says St. Paul, as opposed to Jewish spectacular apocalypitics and Greek philosophizing; and he preached nothing else, not simply at Corinth, for he had done so at Athens (Ac 17<sup>21</sup>), and this was the settled purpose of his ministry (1 Co 2<sup>2</sup>). It was not the example of Jesus that St. Paul preached, but Jesus as the crucified Saviour, who, and not Paul, was crucified 'in your behalf' (1 Co 1<sup>13</sup>). It was, in fact, by His death on the cross that Jesus made the sacrifice for our sins, in our behalf, and in our stead. We are under (ὁρῶ) a curse (Gal 3<sup>10</sup>), and Christ became a curse (κατάρα) for (ὅρα) us, and so redeemed us from (ἐκ) or out from under the curse of the Law (v. 13). He became the curse, and came between us and the overhanging law of God.

This conception of the cross reappears in Col 1<sup>20</sup>, where Jesus is said to have made peace and reconciliation with God possible according to the good pleasure of God 'through the blood of his cross.' The word 'blood' is probably used here to emphasize, against the early Docetic Gnostics, the reality of the human nature of Jesus. So in Col 2<sup>14</sup> by a vivid image the Law itself is represented as nailed to the cross with the body of Christ, and so taken out of the way and no longer binding on us as a means of salvation (cf. Ro 7<sup>4</sup>). In Eph 2<sup>16</sup> the cross is presented as the basis for a double reconciliation, both with God and so with each other, 'through the cross, having slain the enmity thereby.' So both Jew and Gentile have 'access in one Spirit unto the Father,' and the middle wall of partition is broken down. They form one body in Christ, the Church of all the elect of which Christ is head, and in which He dwells. The word of the cross' (1 Co 1<sup>18</sup>), then, is St. Paul's message to men. It was to proclaim this truth that Christ sent him forth (1 Co 1<sup>17</sup>); and this he will do by holding fast to the great essential fact rather than by fine-spun theories (1 Co 1<sup>17</sup> 2<sup>2</sup>), lest the gospel be emptied of all real power (κενωθῆ).

4. The shame of the cross.—It was a real shame that Jesus underwent when He suffered on the cross as a common malefactor. The Jews considered as accursed one whose dead body merely was hung upon a gibbet, and St. Paul recognized this shame as belonging to Jesus (Gal 3<sup>13</sup>). Jesus not only foresaw the fact and the character of His death, but was fully aware of the shame of the cross. This death, called by Cicero 'crudelissimum teterrimumque' (in Verr. v. 64), had its side of glory to Jesus, who saw the joy in store at the end (ἀπῆλ) of the race, and so consciously despised the shame (He 12<sup>2</sup>). Here σταυρῶς is used without the article, as in Ph 2<sup>8</sup>, 'in order to fix attention on the nature of the death' (Westcott). It is in Ph 2<sup>8</sup> that the cross is used to express 'the very lowest point of Christ's humiliation' (Vincent). Jesus became obedient μέχρι θανάτου, θανάτου δὲ σταυροῦ. It is the bottom rung in the ladder that led down from the throne of God. The cross was a real stumbling-block to the disciples themselves till they were convinced of the fact of the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. It remained to the unbelieving Jews an insuperable barrier. It was so when Jesus spoke of it before the event (Jn 12<sup>32-34</sup> 'Who is this Son of man?'). St. Paul found that Christ crucified was to the sign-seeking Jews a stumbling-block (1 Co 1<sup>23</sup>). The writer of Hebrews (13<sup>12</sup>) urges Christians to go outside the camp of Judaism, as Jesus suffered outside the gate, when it was clear that the two ways must part, 'bearing his reproach.' The follower of Jesus must not be ashamed of the shame of the cross. Some of the Judaizers, indeed, were not willing to 'be persecuted for the cross of Christ' (Gal 6<sup>24</sup>), but St. Paul did not seek to escape 'the stumbling-block of the cross' (Gal 5<sup>1</sup>). Indeed, some carried their dislike of the cross to the point of enmity (Ph 3<sup>18</sup>). These men would endure neither persecution nor self-denial. But the philosophical Greeks took the matter more lightly, and considered the preaching of the cross to be foolishness (1 Co 1<sup>18-23</sup>), though in truth the cross reveals the hitherto hidden wisdom of God (1 Co 2<sup>24</sup>).

While the Christian is to share the shame of the cross, he is not to add to the suffering of Christ by crucifying Him afresh (ἀνασταυρώσῃ, He 6<sup>9</sup>).

B. The triumph of the cross over the flesh and the world.—In a mystic, yet real, sense the Christian is crucified with Christ on the cross: Χαρτῶ σφεταίρουσαι, St. Paul said of himself (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>). It is 'a real crucifixion of heart and will' (Rendall). This spiritual crucifixion of the old man on the cross is the common experience of all genuine believers (Gal 5<sup>24</sup>, Ro 6<sup>6</sup>) who have died to sin and have entered into the new life in Christ as symbolized by baptism. In a word, the power of the world over St. Paul's fleshly nature is broken by the cross of Christ. There is a double crucifixion between him and the world (Gal 6<sup>14</sup>). The world in its sinful aspects is dead to him and he to it. Hence not only is St. Paul not ashamed of the cross of Christ, as the Judaizers are who are seeking to enslave the Gentiles to the ceremonial law (Gal 6<sup>12</sup>), but he finds his only ground of glorying in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ (Gal 6<sup>14</sup>). This sublime mysticism does not degenerate into magic and crucifixes. The true philosophy of the cross lies in the spiritual interpretation of man's victorious conflict with sin, which is made possible by the shameful death of the Son of God on the cross as the supreme expression of the love of the Father for sinful men, and as the propitiatory sacrifice on the basis of which the repentant sinner can find access to the Father. The 'blood of the cross' lies at the root of redemptive grace as set forth by Jesus (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>), by St. Peter (1 P 1<sup>2</sup>), by St. Paul (Ro 3<sup>24</sup>), by the writer of Hebrews (9<sup>14</sup>), and by St. John (1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup>).

Mention should be made of the ingenious theory of Prof. C. C. Everett in his Gospel of Paul, which denies the penal character of the death of Christ on the cross, and sees in this supreme event only the ceremonial defilement which Christians share who take Christ as Lord and who thus likewise become accused (Gal 3<sup>10</sup>), and so have the power of the Law over them removed. But this theory misses the deeper aspects of the whole problem, by overstraining an incidental truth connected with the death of Christ on the cross. See the matter well disposed of by Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, p. 184 ff.

CROWD.—In many passages of the Gospels we read of the rapid gathering of a crowd around Jesus. The healing of the man with the withered hand seems to have been the first occasion on which a great company was drawn to Him by curiosity or by the hope of healing. 'His fame went throughout all Syria.' The multitude was gathered from Galilee, Jerusalem, Judea, Idumea, and from the district round Tyre and Sidon; the whole country was moved (Mt 4<sup>23</sup>, Mk 3<sup>7-9</sup>, Lk 9<sup>10-11</sup>). When Jesus retired for quiet to a desert place after receiving the news of the death of John the Baptist, He was followed by a crowd of five thousand people (Mt 14<sup>14</sup>, Mk 6<sup>34</sup>, Lk 9<sup>11</sup>). The words used for 'crowd' are ὄχλος and πλῆθος (both usually rendered 'multitude' in EV, but in Mk 2<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>37, 39</sup>, Lk 8<sup>19</sup> 19<sup>8</sup>, ὄχλος is tr. 'press' [RV 'crowd']. In classical Greek πλῆθος means the common people, the plebs, as opposed to ὄχλος, the inchoate throng that comes together on any special occasion, the turba. But in the NT the distinction is not uniformly maintained; in Mk 3<sup>7-9</sup> the words are used interchangeably. St. Luke is more exact in his use of language, and in Ac 15<sup>20</sup> uses πλῆθος in a technical sense, common enough in the inscriptions, as meaning the membership of a political or religious association in its totality (Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr. 232). The question arises whether there were any special circumstances in those days that favoured the coming together of such masses of people upon very short notice.

1. The Messianic expectation was the motive of many such gatherings. The misgovernment under the Herods had cast the nation's thoughts back upon God, and the Messianic hope awakened with new power. The attention that John the Baptist attracted was due to the belief that he was the Messiah, a belief that he took pains to shatter. To John there looked at the outset of his ministry the people in the neighbourhood, but afterwards the movement reached the north and the infamous Galilee. Jos. (Ant. XVIII. v. 2) says that John was put to death because Herod feared lest the crowds he was gathering about him should 'put it into his power and inclination to raise a rebellion, for they seemed ready to do anything he should advise.' It was in consequence of a similar movement among the Samaritans that Pilate was recalled. The bloodshed with which the movement was checked led to an information being laid against him at Rome (Jos. Ant. xviii. iv. 2). It is clear from these incidents that the Messianic hope was very present with the people; and whenever the times raised up a man who seemed to have a distinctive message, the Jews were more than willing to flock to listen to him.

2. The splendid road system of Palestine facilitated the gathering of such crowds. The Romans made their roads partly on commercial grounds, and partly to permit of the passage of troops among the turbulent people. The commerce of the country must have been considerable in spite of the grinding taxation. Herod's annual income (Jos. Ant. xvii. xi. 4) was 900 talents, nearly £400,000 of our money. The regular raising of such a sum implies a settled trade, and much coming and going between different parts of the country. The excellence of the roads is borne witness to by the fact that the Roman procurator, who resided at Caesarea, could reach Jerusalem with troops by way of Antipatris in less than twenty-four hours. The distance is about sixty miles. Along these splendid roads the crowd would stream on the first hint of the appearance of one who might be the Messiah.

3. The small size of the country must also be remembered. Palestine bulks so large in spiritual significance that one is apt to forget how small it is. And yet from the shore of the Dead Sea one may view the glittering snow of Hermon, while from the hill above Nazareth may be seen on the one hand the ships in the Mediterranean, and on the other the rolling hills of Gilead. This land, only about 1/4th the size of England, was densely populated. To-day its population is a little over 600,000, but in OT and Roman times must have been very much larger. 2 S 24<sup>9</sup> implies a population of 6,500,000; and, while it may be questioned whether the land ever could have carried so great a population as this, it is clear, both from the notices in history and from the existing ruins, that the desolations of to-day were formerly densely peopled. The population in the time of Christ is generally reckoned to have been about 2½ millions (Sanday, Sacred Sites of the Gospels, p. 16). See, further, art. MULTITUDE. R. BRUCE TAYLOR.

CROWN OF THORNS (στέφανος ἐξ ἀκανθῶν or ἀκανθῶνος στέφανος, Mt 27<sup>29</sup>, Mk 15<sup>17</sup>, Jn 19<sup>2</sup>).—This was plaited by the soldiers and placed on Christ's head in mockery of His claim to Kingship, after Pilate had condemned Him to be scourged. It was a garland hastily twisted from the twigs of some thorny plant, which it is difficult now to identify. Tristram (Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 429) supposes it was the thorn-tree or noble of the Arabs, which is very common in the warmer parts of Palestine. It abounds near Jerusalem, grows to a great size; its twigs are tough and pliant, and the spikes very sharp and numerous. Others incline to think it was the Zizyphus Spina-christi, a spiny plant covered with sharp prickles. The purpose of the soldiers was rather, perhaps, mockery of the Jews than cruelty to Christ. Pliny speaks (HN) of 'the meanest of crowns, a thorny one.'

In the writings of St. Paul a crown is promised to faithful followers of Christ, and in many parts of the NT Christ Himself is spoken of as wearing a crown. Sometimes the word for a victor's wreath is used (στεφανος), and sometimes that for a royal crown (βασιλῆα).* The emblematic significance, afterwards seen by the Church in the crown of thorns, is possibly hinted at in He 2<sup>9</sup> 'crowned with glory and honour.' As a sacrificial victim, in being led out to death, often wore a garland of flowers, so Jesus, in the eyes of God and His own disciples, even in suffering the deepest humiliation, wears a crown of glory. In the death of Christ His Church sees mankind crowned with life, because the law of sin and death was thereby abrogated, and the Kingdom of heaven opened to all believers. The thorns with which a hostile world pierced the Saviour's brows are an emblem of the sin of man, the curse of thistles and thorns having been threatened after the Fall (see Dr. H. Macmillan's Ministry of Nature, ch. v., where this idea is finely worked out). But these wounds become the world's salvation. Through the sinful cruelty of man new life comes to a condemned world. God thus makes the wrath of man to praise Him. What was meant as derision is really a prediction of glory. See also art. THORN.

CRUCIFIXION.—Crucifixion was originally an Oriental punishment. It was practised by the Persians (Herod. ix. 122), by the Phœnicians and their colonists the Carthaginians (Valer. ii. 7), and by the Egyptians (Thuc. iv. 110). It was practised also by the Greeks, probably in imitation of the Persians (Plut. Alex. 72, § 2), and by the Romans, who, though Cicero ascribes its introduction to Tarquinius Superbus, probably learned it from their enemies the Carthaginians. Regarding it, however, as an ignominious doom, the Romans reserved it for slaves (whence it was called servile supplicium), the worst sort of criminals such as robbers (Sen. Ep. vii. 1), and provincials. To inflict it on a Roman citizen was reckoned an impiety (Cic. in Verr. v. 66). It was a horrible punishment. Cicero designates it crudelissimum teter-rimumque supplicium. The verb cognate to cruza, 'cross,' was cruciare, 'to torture' (cf. 'excruciat-ing').

There were two kinds of cross :

1. The cruza simplex, which was a single stake. Sometimes the victim was fastened to it by his hands and feet, the former being extended above his head. Usually, however, it was a sharpened stake (σκόλον), and the victim was impaled upon it. It passed through the length of his body, issuing from his mouth. Cf. Sen. Ep. xiv. : 'ad-actum per medium hominem qui per os emergat stipitem'; cf. de Consol. ad Marc. xx. The former method was called affixio, the latter infixio.

2. The cruza compacta, which was composed of two pieces. It had three forms: (1) The cruza decussata X, called also the cruza Andreana, because it is said to be the cross on which St. Andrew suffered at Patre. It was this form of cross that the Fathers had in view when in the crossing of Jacob's hands as he blessed Ephraim and Manasseh (Gn 48<sup>12-14</sup>) they saw a prophecy of the Crucifixion. Cf. Tert. de Bapt. § 8; Isid. Pel. Epp. i. 362. (2) The cruza commissa or St. Anthony's cross, resembling the letter T. Cf. Barn. Ep. § 9; Luc. Jud. Vocal. § 12. The upright was called stipes or stativulum, and the transom patibulum or catena. (3) The cruza immissa, which had the top of the upright protruding above the transom, †. From the middle of the upright there projected a peg, the seat (sedile) or horn (cornu), on which, to support its weight, the body rested as on a saddle. Cf. Iren. adv. Hær. ii. 36, § 2 : 'Ipse habitus crucis fines et summitates habet quinque, duos in longitudine et duos in latitudine, et unum in medio in quo requiescat qui clavus affigitur'; Just. Mart. Dial. c. Tryph. p. 318 C (ed. Sylburg.) : τὸ ἐν τῷ μέσῳ προεξέχον ὡς κέρατα καὶ ἀπὸ ἐξέχον ἑστίν, ἐφ' ᾧ ἐποχούσται οἱ τραπούμενοι.

It was generally assumed in early times that the cross on which Jesus suffered was a cruza immissa. Augustine (in Psalm. ciii. § 14) finds in Eph 3<sup>16</sup> a mystic allusion to the cross : 'breadth' being the transom on which His hands were outstretched; 'length,' the upright on which His body was fastened; 'height,' the head of the upright protruding above the transom; 'depth,' the lower end buried in the earth. And it is a confirmation of this opinion that the board inscribed with His name and accusation was put up over His head (Mt 27<sup>37</sup>), apparently on the projection of the upright.

The early Apologists fancifully defended the sacred symbol of the cross against the sneers of unbelievers by pointing to its appearance everywhere, as though nature and art alike did homage to it. It is seen in the quarters of the heaven, two transverse lines, as it were, running from N. to S. and from E. to W.; in a bird soaring upward with spread wings; in a man swimming or praying with outstretched hands; in the nose and eyebrows of the human face; in a ship's mast and yard; in a galley's oars projecting on either side; in the yoke of a plough and the handle of a spade; in the shape of trophies and Jasces.* See TAYLOR.

The cruciarivus was spared no circumstance of ignominy. He was required to carry the transom to the place of execution; † he was driven thither with goad and scourge along the most frequented streets, that the populace might profit by so signal an exhibition of the terrors of justice; and a herald went before, bearing a board whereon the victim's name and offence were inscribed. ‡ Thus burdened and tormented, Jesus went His sorrowful way from the Praetorium till He reached the gate of the city (Mt 27<sup>32</sup>); and there His strength failed, and He could go no farther. Tradition has it that He fell. The soldiers relieved Him of His burden, and, impressing Simon of Cyrene, laid it on his shoulders. Even then Jesus was unable to walk unsupported, and had to be borne along to the scene of His crucifixion. Cf. Mk 15<sup>22</sup> ἠέκοντο αὐτόν.

‡ Eus. HB v. 1; Lightfoot on Mt 27<sup>32</sup>.

On arrival at the place of execution (see GOLTHERA), four soldiers were told off by the centurion in charge to do the work (cf. Jn 19<sup>23</sup>). They proceeded in the customary way. First of all, the cruciarus was stripped naked, his garments being regarded as the rightful perquisites of his executioners.* Then he was laid on his back over the transom and his hands fastened to either end. Thereafter the transom was hoisted on the upright and his feet were fastened to the latter. Usually the hands were nailed through the palms and the feet were fixed either by two nails, one through each instep, or by a single nail transfixing both through the Achilles tendon; sometimes, however, the hands and feet were simply tied.† Though less painful at the moment, the latter was the more terrible method, since it protracted the victim's sufferings. He hung till he died of hunger and exhaustion, or was devoured by birds and beasts of prey.‡ The hands of Jesus were certainly nailed, but it seems that His feet were only tied (cf. Jn 20<sup>25, 27</sup>).§ The sole Evangelic authority for supposing that they were nailed is Lk 24<sup>39</sup> [40], which is probably assimilated to Ps 22<sup>14</sup>. From two circumstances, (1) that a soldier could reach the lips of Jesus with a short reed (Mt 27<sup>48</sup>=Mk 15<sup>33</sup>=Jn 19<sup>29</sup>), and (2) that wild beasts could tear out the entrails of the cruciarus as he hung,|| it appears that the cross was of no great height. It was enough if the feet cleared the ground.

There was a humane custom among the Jews, based on Pr 31<sup>6</sup>, that a potion of medicated wine should be administered to the cruciarus in order to deaden their sensibility. The merciful draught was provided by a society of charitable ladies in Jerusalem.¶ It was offered to Jesus ere the nails were driven through His hands, and He raised it to His thirsty lips; but on tasting what it was He would not drink it. What was His reason for rejecting it? It was not that the endurance of physical pain was necessary to the efficacy of His sacrificial death; ** nor was it merely that He had a sentimental repugnance to the idea of dying in a state of stupefaction.†† It was rather because He was bent on doing to the last the work which had been given Him to do. It was well for the penitent brigand that Jesus did not drink the potion.

It was usual for the victims of that frightful punishment, maddened by terror and pain, to shriek, entreat, curse, and spit at their executioners and the bystanders;‡‡ but Jesus endured the torture meekly. A cry broke from His lips as they were hammering the nails through His hands; but it was a prayer—not an appeal to them for mercy on Himself, but an appeal to God for mercy on them: 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they are doing.'§§ The transom with its quivering load was hoisted on the upright, and there He hung, conscious of all that passed around Him. It is said that St. Andrew, as he hung upon his cross at Patre, taught the people all the while;||| and Jesus also in His anguish was mindful of others. Two brigands had been crucified with Him, two of those outlaws who infested the steep road from Jericho to Jerusalem, and by their deeds of violence gave it the grim name of 'the Ascent of Blood' (cf. Lk 10<sup>30</sup>); and when one of them, recognizing the majesty of the meek Sufferer, turned to Him and prayed Him to remember him when He 'came in his kingdom,' He granted more than he sought, promising him a place that very day in Paradise. And He thought of His mother, as she stood by distracted with grief, and commended her to the care of the beloved disciple. While He hung, He was compassed with insults. The Jewish rulers, exulting in their seeming triumph, mocked Him, and the multitude joined in the poor sport. So did the soldiers who were charged with the duty of watching the crosses lest a rescue should be attempted.* Heated by their labour, they were refreshing themselves from their jar of posca, the vinegar which was the only drink allowed to soldiers on duty (see VINEGAR). Jesus was in their eyes a pretender to the Jewish throne, a rebel against the imperial government; and, hearing the gibes of the rulers, they joined in, and holding up their cups in mock homage, drank His Majesty's health (Lk 23<sup>36</sup>).

Crucifixion was a lingering doom. The victims sometimes hung for days ere they died of hunger, exhaustion, loss of blood, and the fever of their wounds,† unless they were despatched either by a spear-thrust or by the coup de grace of the crurifragium, a brutality which the Romans practised usually on slaves, beating the life out of them by shattering blows with a heavy mallet.‡ It was, however, contrary to the Jewish law (Dt 21<sup>22, 23</sup>) that they should hang overnight; and it was the more necessary that the requirement should be observed in this instance, since the next day was not only the Sabbath but the Sabbath of the Paschal week, a day of special solemnity (Jn 19<sup>31</sup>). Therefore the rulers waited on Pilate, and requested that Jesus and the brigands might be despatched by the crurifragium, and their bodies taken down from the crosses ere 6 o'clock that evening, when the Sabbath would begin. Pilate consented, and the soldiers set about the brutal work. They despatched the two brigands, but when they came to Jesus, He was already dead. There was no need to strike Him with the mallet; but one of them, to ensure that He was really dead, drove his spear into His side. See BLOOD AND WATER.

The prominent characteristic of crucifixion was the ignominy of it (cf. Gal 3<sup>13</sup>, He 12<sup>2</sup>). This constituted 'the stumbling-block of the cross' (Gal 5<sup>11</sup>) in Jewish eyes. Since it was expected that the Messiah would be a glorious and victorious King, it seemed incredible that one who was slain, and not only slain but crucified, should be the Messiah. In the eyes of the NT writers, on the contrary, its very ignominy constituted its supreme suitability to the Messiah. It identified Him utterly with sinners, making Him a sharer in the worst extremity of their condition. St. John recognized a providential dispensation in the enslavement of the Jews to the Romans, inasmuch as it brought about the Crucifixion (18<sup>31, 32</sup>). Had they been free, Jesus would have been stoned as a blasphemer; but since they were vassals of Rome, it was not lawful for them to put any one to death (Jn 18<sup>31</sup>). The Sanhedrin's sentence had to be referred to the procurator. It was invalid without his ratification, and it was executed by his authority after the Roman manner.

It is remarkable that, unlike the mediæval * Cf. Petron. Sat.: 'Cruciarus unius parentes ut viderent noctis laxatum custodiam, detraxerunt pendentes'; Jos. Vit. 7: 3 three cruciarus taken down; one recovered from his wounds. † Cf. Lips. de Cruce, II, xii. ‡ Cf. ib. xiv.

artists, who loved to depict the Man of Sorrows as He hung on the cross abused and bleeding, the Evangelists have drawn a veil over the scene, detailing none of the ghastly particulars, and saying merely: 'They crucified him.' They recognized in the Crucifixion not the triumph of human malice but the consummation of a Divine purpose—the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God (Ac 2<sup>23</sup>). At the moment all was dark to the disciples; but when their minds were illumined by the Holy Spirit, they saw not only 'the sufferings that befell Messiah' but 'the glories that followed these' (1 P 1<sup>11</sup>). Their Lord had never seemed so kingly in their eyes as when He 'reigned from the trees.'* In early days, according to some authorities, Lk 9<sup>31</sup> ran: 'They were speaking of the glory which He was about to fulfil at Jerusalem.'† So Chrysostom quotes the passage; and this is the constant conception of the NT. 'We look upon Jesus,' says the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, 'because of the suffering of death crowned with glory and honour' (2<sup>9</sup>; cf. Ph 2<sup>9</sup>).

Throughout His ministry Jesus recognized the inevitable necessity of His Passion. He had come to die. Cf. Mt 9<sup>12</sup>—Mk 2<sup>17</sup>—Lk 5<sup>26</sup>; Mt 16<sup>21</sup>—Mk 8<sup>31</sup>—Lk 9<sup>22</sup>; Mt 17<sup>22</sup>—Mk 9<sup>31</sup>—Lk 9<sup>44</sup>; Mt 20<sup>18</sup>—Mk 10<sup>33</sup>—Lk 18<sup>32</sup>. As early as the close of the 2nd cent. Celsus stumbled at the idea that Jesus foreknew and foretold all that happened to Him (Orig. c. Cels. ii. 13). Strauss pronounces these intimations mere sententiae ex eventu. A crucified Messiah was 'to Jews a stumbling-block and to Gentiles foolishness' (1 Co 1<sup>23</sup>); and the Apostles, eager to remove 'the stumbling-block of the Cross,' represented the Crucifixion as no ignominious catastrophe, but 'a link in a chain of higher knowledge, part of a Divine plan of salvation.' Keim, on the other hand, regards the announcement as 'the expression of a natural, reasonable, correct anticipation,' suggested by the fate of the Baptist and the difficulties wherewith Jesus was beset. The definite details, however, must be pruned away. In point of fact, the Lord's presence at the end is inextricably interwoven with the Gospel history. The cross was His goal, and He knew it all along.

CRUSE.—The word occurs frequently in the OT (generally as rendering of Heb. קרש), where it means a 'small earthen bottle or jar' in common use among the Hebrews chiefly for holding liquids, such as water (1 S 26<sup>11</sup>) or oil (1 K 17<sup>12</sup>). 'Cruse' (marg. 'flask') is substituted by RV for 'box' of AV in Mt 26<sup>7</sup> (|| Mk 14<sup>7</sup>, Lk 7<sup>37</sup>) as the designation of the ἀλάβαστρος used by the woman who anointed our Lord. See ALABASTER and ANOINTING.

CRY.—The term 'cry' occurs in the NT with various shades of meaning corresponding to different Greek words, which express sometimes articulate, sometimes inarticulate utterances; in some cases it connotes strong emotion, in others a more or less heightened emphasis is all that is expressed.

According to classical usage, the Gr. terms employed in the NT may thus be distinguished: 'αὐλῆν denotes "to cry out" for a purpose; βοᾶν, to cry out as a manifestation of feeling; κρῆναι, to cry out harshly, often of an inarticulate and brutal sound' (Grimm-Thayer, s.v. βοᾶν). κραυγῆς is the intensive of κρῆναι. The corresponding nouns are βοή, 'a cry for help,' and κραυγή, 'outcry, clamour' (both rare in NT). To these should be added the use of φωνή = 'to cry' (most freq. in Lk.).

In classifying the NT usage of the term, it will be convenient to group the instances in each case under the Greek equivalents.

A. (1) 'To cry' or 'cry out' (= κρῆναι, ἀνακρῆναι): (a) of articulate cries, followed by words uttered (often with 'saying' or 'and said' added): of joy, Mk 11<sup>9</sup> and ||; Mt 21<sup>15</sup> (children crying in the temple, 'Hosanna'); of complaint or distress, Mk 10<sup>48</sup> || Lk 18<sup>3</sup>, Mt 20<sup>16</sup> (Bartimeus); Mt 14<sup>30</sup> (Peter crying out while walking on the water); Mk 13<sup>11</sup> || Lk 4<sup>38</sup> (ἀνακραεῖν; Lk. adds 'with a loud voice'); Mk 9<sup>24</sup>, Lk 4<sup>41</sup> (demons crying out and saying), cf. Mk 3<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>7</sup>; of the angry cries of the multitude, Mt 27<sup>23</sup>, Mk 15<sup>12</sup>, 14<sup>1</sup> (cf. Ac 21<sup>28</sup>); in ref. to Jesus, of solemn and impressive utterance, Jn 7<sup>37</sup> (cf. 1<sup>38</sup> 7<sup>28</sup> 12<sup>41</sup>). (b) of inarticulate cries: with ref. to the possessed, Mk 5<sup>7</sup> (cf. Lk 8<sup>28</sup> ἀνεκράξας); Mk 9<sup>26</sup> || Lk 9<sup>39</sup>; of the disciples, Mt 14<sup>28</sup> ('and they cried out for fear'); with ref. to Jesus, of the cry on the cross (prot. inarticulate), Mt 27<sup>30</sup> ('cried . . . with a loud voice, and yielded up his spirit'). †

In this connexion the passage in Ja 5<sup>4</sup> deserves notice: 'Behold the hire of your labourers . . . crieth out (βοᾶται); and the cries (βοᾶι) of them that reaped have entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth.' Here the verb is used of crying for vengeance (cf. Hab 2<sup>11</sup>) and the noun (βοᾶ) of cries for help. The latter sense is esp. frequent in the Psalms (e.g. 54<sup>18</sup>, 41 etc.), corresponding to the Heb. בָּעַן and derivatives. This word is 'used exclusively of crying for help' (Driver) §. Though frequent in the Psalms (LXX and Heb.), it occurs rarely in the NT.

(b) of the inarticulate cries of the possessed, Mk 13<sup>11</sup> and the unclean spirit . . . crying with a loud voice'. (c) 'cry' = φωνή, esp. in the phrase φωνή μεγάλη, 'with a loud voice or cry,' added to verbs.

B. 'Crying' in He 5<sup>7</sup>.—This passage, which has direct reference to our Lord, calls for special notice here: 'Who, in his days of flesh, having offered up, with strong crying (μετὰ κραυγῆς ἰσχυρᾶς) and . . . Probably here should be added Mt 15<sup>22</sup> ('she crieth after us'), where articulate cries seem to be meant, though the words uttered are not given. † In 3 passages Lk 22<sup>31</sup> has ἰσχυρῶς λίγους, Jn 19<sup>30</sup> ἰσχυρῶς λέγοντες.

tears, prayers and supplications unto him that was able to save him out of death,' etc. The ref. is doubtless primarily to Gethsemane (so Delitzsch, Westcott), though 'a wider application of the words to other prayers and times of peculiar trial in our Lord's life' is not excluded. Schoettgen (ad loc.) quotes a Jewish saying which strikingly illustrates the phrase: 'There are three kinds of prayers, each loftier than the preceding: prayer, crying, and tears. Prayer is made in silence; crying, with raised voice: but tears overcome all things.' The conjunction of the terms mentioned often occurs in OT, esp. in the Psalms, e.g. Ps 39<sup>12</sup>:

'Hear my prayer, O Lord,
And give ear unto my cry (קוֹלִי);
Hold not thy peace at my tears.'

Also Ps 61<sup>2</sup>, and cf. Ps 80<sup>6-8</sup>. The close association of the idea of prayer with that of 'crying' or 'cry' may be illustrated from the Gospels, esp. perhaps in the case of our Lord's cries on the cross (Mt 27<sup>46-50</sup>, Lk 23<sup>46</sup>). According to Jewish tradition, in the solemn prayer for forgiveness uttered by the high priest on the Day of Atonement in the Holy of Holies, the words אֵלֹהִים רַחוּם 'O Lord, forgive,' were spoken with heightened voice, so that they could be heard at a distance.

CUMMIN.—Cummin (or cumin) is the seed of the Cuminum cyminum, an annual herbaceous umbellifer. It has a slender, branching stem, and grows to the height of a foot. The seeds, which are ovoid in form, are strongly aromatic, and have a flavour not unlike that of caraway, but more pungent. Cummin was used by the Jews as a condiment, and also for flavouring bread. It has carminative and other medicinal properties, and was employed not only as a remedy for colic, but also to stanch excessive bleeding, and to allay swellings. It is indigenous to Upper Egypt and the Mediterranean countries, but it was also cultivated from early times in Western Asia, India, and China. Cummin is mentioned twice in the Bible (Is 23<sup>23-27</sup> וְצִמְמוֹן, and Mt 23<sup>23</sup> κόμινον). In the latter passage Jesus rebukes the Pharisees, because they paid tithes of mint, and anise, and cummin, and omitted the weightier matters of the Law.

CUP (ποτήριον, in general significance corresponding to the Heb. כַּסֵּא and so used in the LXX; Vulg. equivalent is calice).

1. Literal.—A few references to the cup as a vessel in common use occur in the Gospels: Mk 7<sup>3-4</sup>, Mt 10<sup>4</sup> (= Mk 9<sup>4</sup>) 23<sup>34-35</sup> (= Lk 11<sup>30</sup>). The first of these passages is plainly an explanatory parenthesis furnished by the Evangelist for the information of readers unacquainted with Jewish customs. ποτήρια, he says, are amongst the things subject to 'washings' (βαπτισμοί)—which washings were not such as simple cleanliness required, but were prescribed by the decrees 'intended to separate the Jew from all contact with the Gentiles.' The Talmudic tractate Kelim names seven kinds of things requiring such ceremonial purification, and amongst them are earthenware vessels and vessels of bone, metal, and wood. Resting on such Levitical prescriptions as are to be found in Lv 11 and Nu 31, the purification of vessels was carried to the furthest extreme of stringent requirement by 'the tradition of the elders.' Vessels that had in any way come into contact with the common people ('am ha'arez) were on that account to be cleansed. (Maimonides, Yad. Mishkab and Moshab, 11. 11, 12, 18).

The words of Jesus in Mt 23<sup>34-35</sup> are simply an instance of the use of a homely figure to express hypocrisy.

2. Figurative.—Our Lord uses the familiar Heb. figure of a 'cup' to denote the experience of sorrow and anguish in two instances: (1) in His challenge to James and John, checking their ambition (Mk 10<sup>38-39</sup> = Mt 20<sup>22-23</sup>), 'Are ye able to drink the cup which I drink?'; and (2) in connexion with His Passion, both in His cry of agony (Mk 14<sup>36</sup> || in Mt. and Lk. 'this cup'), and in His calm rebuke of Peter's hasty attempt to defend Him against His captors (Jn 18<sup>11</sup> 'The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?'). In each case there is the same reference to His singular experience of bitter sorrow which was no mere 'bitterness of death.'

It is noticeable that in the Gospels the use of this figure occurs only in connexion with trouble and suffering. In the OT the use is much wider. Experiences of joy, blessing, and comfort are thus expressed (e.g. Ps 108 2<sup>9</sup> 116<sup>8</sup>, Jer 16<sup>7</sup>), as well as those of trembling, desolation, and the wrath of God (Is 51<sup>17</sup>, Jer 25<sup>16</sup>, Ezk 23<sup>32</sup>, Zec 13<sup>7</sup>). Rabbinic writers exhibit the figurative use of 'cup' for trouble and anguish (Ges. Thes. s.v. כּוֹפֵּת). The kindred expression, 'taste the taste of death,' is also to be met with (Buxtorf, Lex. s.v. טַעַם). The conception of death as a bitter cup for men to drink underlies it. (Note the Etymologicon Σκουρος gives ποτήριον . . . σημαίνει καὶ τὴν θάνατον). Instances of this phraseology in the Gospels are (in the words of Jesus) Mt 21 (= Mt 16<sup>28</sup>) and (in the words of the Jews) Mt 22. Cf. also He 9<sup>17</sup>.

3. In the institution of the Lord's Supper.—There are strong inducements to see in the cup in the Last Supper one of the cups which had a place in the later ceremonial of the Paschal feast. But was the supper the usual Passover? This is a much-debated question; but on the whole the weightier considerations seem to support the view presented in the Fourth Gospel, the account in which may be intended, as some suggest, to correct the impression given by the Synoptics. That is to say, the supper was not the Passover proper, and it took place on the day previous to that on which the Passover was eaten. It might still be held that it was an anticipatory Passover. St. Paul, it is true, speaks of the Eucharistic cup as 'the cup of blessing' (1 Co 10<sup>16</sup>), and one is inclined to make a direct connexion with the third cup at the Paschal celebration, which was known as the Cup of Benediction (כּוֹפֵּת טַעַם), and is often referred to in the Talmudic tractates (e.g. Berakoth, 51a). If St. Luke's account of the Last Supper were to be received without question, it would be tempting to trace three out of the four Paschal cups, viz. the one mentioned in Lk 22<sup>17</sup>, the one common to the Synoptics—the cup of blessing, and the fourth, or Hallel cup, suggested by Sussurares (Mk 14<sup>26</sup> = Mt 26<sup>26</sup>), taking the hymn referred to as none other than the second part of the Hallel (Pas 115-118), with which the Passover was usually closed. Lk 22<sup>20-21</sup>, however, is not above suspicion; and on other grounds we cannot definitely connect the cup of the institution with the ceremonial of the Paschal feast.

But the cup was an important feature in other Jewish festivals and solemn seasons besides the Passover. And even though the institution took place at the close of an ordinary meal, the bread and the cup were accompanied with the due Jewish graces (Mt 26<sup>26</sup>, Mk 14<sup>22</sup>, Lk 22<sup>17-19</sup>), and in the after-view the cup thus used, and with such significance, might well stand out as par excellence the Cup of Blessing.

The words of Jesus regarding the cup are given with some noticeable variation. Mk. gives τὸ ποτήριον τὸ ἡμέτερον καὶ τὸ ὑμῶν τὸ ἐκδοῦναι τὸ ἕνα τὸ αὐτὸ (14<sup>23</sup>); and Mt. reproduces this with but slight changes, possibly of a liturgical character (292<sup>b</sup>). The wording in Lk 22:17 makes no reference to the 'blood,' whilst 22:20 (referred to above) appears to be but an interpolation, clumsily (ἡ τοῦ αἵματος . . . ἡ . . . ἡ εὐχαριστία) combining the form in St. Paul with that in St. Mark. The solemn expression, 'my blood of the covenant,' or 'my covenant-blood,' can be explained only by reference to Ex. 24:8. St. Paul's phrase, ἡ αἰμαὶ διαθήκης . . . ἡ τοῦ αἵματος εὐχαριστία (1 Co 11:25), introduces no important difference of meaning as compared with the Marcan formula. To lay stress on the idea of a 'new covenant' is all in keeping with the Pauline standpoint. One other point as regards the words of the institution alone remains to be mentioned. As with the bread so with the cup, St. Paul alone represents our Lord as saying οὗτος οἶνος αἵματι τοῦ καινοῦ διαθήκης (1 Co 11:25, 26). Is it possible, then, that no permanent sacramental rite was contemplated by Jesus in doing what He did at the Last Supper? Is the conception of a memorial celebration due rather to St. Paul as a prime factor in the development of Christianity? Obviously this is not the place to deal with this important question, and the attitude of historical criticism respecting it. We have assumed that what took place at the Last Supper was an 'institution.' See art. COVENANT, LORD'S SUPPER.

4. In the Eucharist.—(1) From the first the common usage in administration no doubt gave the cup after the bread, in accordance with the order observed in Mark, Matthew, and Paul. St. Luke in his shorter (and better supported) account (22:17-19) exhibits a noticeable divergence in placing the cup first in order. This may be due, as Wright suggests (Synopsis of the Gospels, p. 140), to some 'Jewish Eucharistic use.' The Didache (ch. 9) also puts the cup first; but the fact as to the general established usage remains unaffected.

(2) As to the cup used in the communion there would at first be no difference between it and such vessels as were in ordinary use, and the materials of which the Eucharistic vessels were made were by no means of one kind. Zephyrinus of Rome, a contemporary of Tertullian, speaks of 'patens of glass,' and Jerome (c. 398 A.D.) speaks of 'a wicker basket' and 'a glass' as in use for communion purposes. Cups of wood and of horn also appear to have been used in some cases. We find certain provincial councils in the 8th and 9th cents. prohibiting the use of such, and also of leaden vessels. Cups were sometimes made of pewter, and bronze, again, was commonly used by the Irish monks, St. Gall preferring vessels of this material to those of silver. At the same time the natural tendency to differentiate in regard to vessels devoted to such a special service must have begun soon to manifest itself. Where it was possible, at an early period the cup was made of rich materials, such as gold and silver. Similarly as regards form and ornamentation. Tertullian (de Pudicitia, 10) speaks of the cup as being adorned with the figure of the Good Shepherd. In the course of time we get chalices of great price and wonderful workmanship, corresponding to the rare and costly Passover and other festival cups which Jews similarly cherish as art treasures.

It is needless to mention particularly the several kinds of chalices which came to be distinguished as the Eucharistic rites were made more elaborate. Our own times, again, it may just be noticed, have given us the 'individual communion cup,' which, on hygienic grounds, finds favour in some quarters. Though in some respects a modern institution, perhaps it may claim a precedent in the most primitive usage. The use of separate cups might be inferred from 1 Co 11:25-26. Nor is the hygienic objection to the common chalice wholly new. The difficulty was felt in medieval times when the plague was so rife. In the 14th cent. special 'pest-chalices' were in use for sick cases.

(3) The custom of mixing water with the wine in the chalice, to which Justin Martyr makes a well-known reference (Apol. i. 67), accords with Jewish precedent. Speaking of the Jewish use, Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. on Mt 23:7) says, 'Hence in the rubric of the feasts, when mention is made of the wine they always use the word mizgu, they miz for him the cup.' Maimonides (Hamez umaz, T, 8) assumes the use of water. If the cup our Lord gave to His disciples were one of the ceremonial Paschal cups, we may take it that it contained a mixture of water and wine. And if it were not, nothing is more likely than that the Apostles, in observing the rite, would follow the Jewish custom of mixture. A passage in the Talmud (Bab. Berakhoth, 50, 2) suggests that water was thus added to the wine for the sake of wholesomeness and in the interests of sobriety.

In the course of time various fanciful suggestions came to be made as to a symbolic purpose in connexion with the mixed chalice in the Eucharist, ignoring its simple origin in an earlier Jewish custom. Thus it was variously held that in this way the union of Christ and the faithful was signified; that the water from the rock was represented; that the water and the blood from the pierced side of the Crucified were commemorated. At last it was affirmed that the water was added to the cup 'solely for significance'; and so the addition of a very small quantity of water (a small spoonful) came to be considered sufficient. 'One drop is as significant as a thousand' (Bona, Rev. Liturg., ii. ix. note 3.—'Cum vero aqua mysterii causa apponatur vel minima gutta sufficiens est').

(4) Was wine from the first invariably used and regarded as obligatory in the Eucharist? Harnack ('Brod u. Wasser,' TU vii. [1892]) holds that it was not so up to the 3rd cent., and traces the use of bread and water (but see, in reply, Zahn, 'Brod u. Wein,' ib.; Jülicher's essay in Theol. Abhandlungen; and Grafe, ZThK v. 2). It would be difficult to maintain that the genius of the sacrament vitally depended on the use of wine; but in its favour we have the great preponderance of custom and sentiment. In modern times there are those who, for one reason and another, feel a difficulty regarding communion wine, and are disposed to use substitutes of some kind. Such might be disposed to welcome a sort of precedent in the use permitted by Jewish regulations in certain cases as regards their festival cups. In northern countries, e.g., where wine was not accessible as a daily beverage for the mass of the Jews, syrup, juice of fruits, beer or mead, etc., are named as instances of allowable substitutes. Such substitutes are curiously included under the common appellation 'the wine of the country.' (See Shulhan Arukh, Orak Hag. 182. 1, 2).

(5) The withholding of the cup from the laity in the Communion, which came into vogue in the Western Church, and is still a Roman Catholic usage, may be briefly referred to. It is admitted by Romish authorities that communion in both kinds was the primitive custom for all communicants. Cardinal Bona, e.g., says: 'It is certain, indeed, that in ancient times all without distinction, clergy and laity, men and women, received the sacred mysteries in both kinds' (Rev. Liturg., ii. xviii. 1). The practice of withholding the cup does not come into view before the 12th century. The danger of effusion was offered as a reason for it. Short of this, as an expedient against effusion, we find slender tubes (astute) or quills brought into use, the communicants drawing the wine from the chalice by suction. Another intermediate stage towards communion in one kind was the practice of intinction, i.e. administering to the people the bread dipped in the wine. This practice, however, was condemned in the West, but it remains as the custom of the Eastern Church still, the sacred elements in this form being administered to the laity with a spoon (agbit). Ultimately the rule of communion in one kind was ordained in the West by a decree of the Council of Constance in 1415; and the reason assigned for the decree was that it was 'to avoid certain perils, inconveniences, and scandals.' This momentous change, however, was not brought about without much demur and opposition. The decree of Constance itself did not immediately and universally take effect; for after this time there were even in Rome cases where the cup was administered. The great Hussite movement in Bohemia, contemporaneous with the Council of Constance itself, offered determined opposition to the withdrawal of the cup; and the kindred Utraquist Communion in that country continued for two centuries their protest as Catholics who claimed the celebration of the Lord's Supper in both kinds, after the primitive usage. The badge of the Utraquists, a large chalice together with a sword—significant conjunction—bespoke the sternness of the conflict.

What really lay at the root of this prohibition of the cup was the tremendous dogma of transubstantiation, with all its implicates, together with a hardening of the distinction between the clergy and the people. The growth of this Eucharistic custom proceeded pari passu with the development of the dogma. Naturally, therefore, the restoration of the cup to the people was a necessary part of the Reformation claim. It is also worthy of remembrance that even in the Tridentine Council there were not wanting Romanist advocates of this as well as other reforms; but 'no compromise' counsels prevailed, and the rule in its fullest rigidity was reaffirmed.

How strange to look back over the welter of controversy and the many saddening developments connected with but this one point of Eucharistic observance, away to that simple evening meal which took place 'in the same night that he was betrayed'!

CURES.—The details of medical knowledge possessed by the Jews of our Lord's time and of current medical practice can only be gathered piecemeal from various sources, and relate largely to what is known of these in OT and in post-Biblical times. It is not unreasonable to believe that from these sources one can with fair accuracy gather what was the knowledge and practice of our Lord's own generation. In the NT references are made to physicians in Mt 8<sup>4</sup>, Lk 8<sup>4</sup>. The value of diet and the use of oil and wine in cases of bodily injury are indirectly referred to in Lk 8<sup>30</sup> 10<sup>34</sup>. Visitation of the sick is a Christian virtue, and was warmly commended by Jesus (Mt 25<sup>36</sup>, 43), in terms implying that it was practised; but the Talmud, which also recognizes the virtue, makes an exception in cases where visitation might aggravate the disorder. The balm of Gilead had an ancient reputation for healing virtue, and the Pools of Siloam and Bethesda and the springs at Tiberias and Callirrhoe were reputed to be curative. Medical theory among the Jews was almost entirely borrowed empirically, and no system of medical training and education existed in Palestine in Bible times. Prevention of disease by sanitary precautions was more emphasized, and it has even been suggested that the whole Levitical legislation was based upon hygienic considerations, so far as these were understood. The priestly class were the depositaries of such medical knowledge as was possessed, although Solomon is said to have known about the use of drugs, and various references in the Talmud attribute to him a book of cures which was said to have been withdrawn from the people by Hezekiah.

In the time of Jesus medical practitioners would be in possession of such medical lore as was held and practised in former generations, and would therefore be familiar with the art of midwifery, and possibly had attained to considerable skill in its practice, though there are few references to surgical operations. Probably an aversion existed to surgery, as to the practice of bleeding, on account of the national belief concerning the blood; but later this aversion was overcome, and Jewish physicians fell into line with the leading classical schools, which freely employed bleeding as a remedy. The Talmud (e.g. Belchoroth, 45a; Nazir, 32b) bears witness to some anatomical knowledge possessed by post-Biblical practitioners, and from this and other Rabbinical sources the common maxims of the physicians, and indications of their principles and methods, may be not obscurely learned. The Talmud mentions myrrh, aloes, cassia, frankincense, cinnamon, spikenard, and camphire as having medicinal properties. Dietetic rules and sanitary regulations were also carefully enjoined, and many bodily disorders were treated by homely remedies. Wunderbar (l.c. infra) gives examples of the application of drugs and the like to various ailments, but also plainly shows that occult methods, involving astrology, and the wearing of parchment amulets or charms, were with more confidence prescribed. Various incantations were in use to prevent miscarriage, and to ward off the machinations of evil spirits from the cradle of the newborn. Drugs and magic were, in fact, generally employed, the chief reliance being placed on the latter.

With these methods our Lord's action in the healing of disease had no affinity. Necromantic or superstitious observances were entirely foreign to His spirit. He never taught that sicknesses were the result of the action of evil spirits (on Lk 11<sup>19</sup> see below, and art. IMPRESSION). And it is equally clear that He had no recourse to such medical knowledge as was familiar to the physicians of His time, and that He was not endowed with knowledge of disease and of the curative art in advance of His own generation. In the cures recorded in the Gospels He employs nothing beyond His word, addressed either to the patient or to a parent or friend, and sometimes a touch. For use of saliva, see art. SIGHT. The method of Jesus must be sought on an entirely different line.

In every process of healing, whether in the time of Jesus or in our own day, there are two elements: the physical, and the mental or psychical. On the one hand, the disturbing and enfeebling causes, functional or organic, in the bodily tissues and organs, are gradually removed by the action of drugs or other medical treatment. On the other, a new tone and vigour are restored to the unseem and intangible but essentially real 'life' of the patient. The two are most intimately and vitally connected with each other, and neither element can be ignored. Mind and body are mutually interpenetrative, and although the relations between them are in many respects still profoundly obscure, yet advancing knowledge only makes more certain what is already firmly established, that this interdependence and mutual influence are of the closest character. The uncertain and incalculable element in every sickness or feebleness, passing beyond all power to adequately diagnose, is the psychical. The physical condition may clearly point to a particular issue of the infirmity—recovery or death—and, so far as the physical goes, this might be determined with considerable accuracy; but the action of the incalculable element remains, cannot be predicted, and may produce most surprising results. These are matters of common knowledge, and amount to commonplaces. But they must be steadily borne in mind when cases of restoration—those in process to-day, and those recorded in the Gospels—are considered.

The action of Jesus was upon the complex personality, body and spirit, but upon the body through the spirit. His power went directly to the central life, to the man, the living person, and this may be traced in all His dealing with disease and infirmity both of body and of mind (see LUNATIC). The Divine power was, through His life, at one with itself, brought to bear with living energy on the unseen springs of the being. Consideration of the actual phenomena of our Lord's working in the restoring of the sick will make these facts more manifest.

1. Our Lord's own dependence upon the Divine power.—Not only did He declare this close, trustful dependence (Jn 5<sup>14-20</sup>, 9<sup>28</sup>, 10<sup>25-27</sup>, 14<sup>10</sup>), but it is evinced spontaneously in His action (Mk 7<sup>7</sup>, Jn 11<sup>41-42</sup>). The customary association of prayer with His works of healing was proof of His uttermost dependence upon God. The power of prayer, which He marked as the condition of all human victory, He indicates as vital also to His own action (Mk 9<sup>29</sup>). The prayer He desiderates is no slack and formal petitioning of a far-distant Deity, but a close absorption of life in a very-present Helper. And this was the quality of our Lord's own dependence upon God. He cherished the largest expectations from the power of the Living God, of which He was so conscious. He felt the throbbing in His own life of that Mighty Will and Love which animated all being, and therefore He intimated that the true value of prayer, for Himself and for mankind, was that it established in man a close sympathy with, and an absolute dependence upon, the Source of all healing and life.

2. His healings were an expression of intensest sympathy with suffering humanity. Compassion was the moving cause of many of His beneficent actions (Mt 15<sup>22-28</sup>, Mk 8<sup>7</sup>, Lk 7<sup>13</sup>). True sympathy is a mighty human energy in which the Divine power is at work, and even on the lower levels of our feeble personal force it has a continuous tendency towards healing. Experience multiplies the evidence of this fact as the years pass. And we are led to conceive in some measure the vast resources of power in the full compassion of Him who was morally one with the Source of all love and pity. His sympathy was never vitiated or weakened by personal imperfection, and so it possessed the power of self-identification with God and man. The healing of the Issue of Blood (see article) shows that this sympathy with distressed humanity worked even apart from His direct will.

3. His conviction that disease and suffering were not part of the right and natural order of things. This feature is seen in all His actions, but found its clearest expression in the case of the woman who could in no wise lift up herself (Lk 13<sup>11-17</sup>) (see IMPOTENCE). 'Ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo these eighteen years, to have been loosed from this bond on the day of the Sabbath?' In addition to our Lord's antagonism to the pedantry and inhumanity of His critics, the underlying note is heard that humanity ought not to be held in bonds of sickness and infirmity. Disease and suffering and untimely death are not part of the natural, i.e. the right and Divine, order of things. And all the power of right is on the side of those who labour to set man free and to enable him to stand erect in body, mind, and soul before God and his fellows.

4. A clear feature in our Lord's healings was His sense of the need of dealing with the sin which often lay at the root of the sickness and infirmity. Jesus very carefully guards against the unwarranted assumption made by the friends of Job, and by the disciples (Jn 9<sup>2</sup>), that sin was the secret cause of all suffering and pain. Other and Diviner reasons might account for much of the deprivation and trouble of man (Jn 9<sup>3</sup>). But in two cases (Mk 2<sup>2-10</sup>, Jn 5<sup>14</sup>) He not obscurely marks the sin as the deepest cause of the weakness (see art. PARALYSIS and IMPOTENCE). Sin is the violation of the whole nature of man, body, mind, soul, as well as disobedience to the Holy Will of God. It depresses the springs of personal vitality, and therefore continually makes for sickness and feebleness of body.

5. Faith was required on the part of the one to be healed. Faith must be clearly distinguished from mental assent and from credulity, which vainly arrogate to themselves that august word. Faith, as Jesus conceived it, was the noblest activity of man's being; the triumphant assertion of the essential and Divine part of his nature against all that dwarfs, disfigures, and oppresses it, and this faith our Lord most keenly desired to see. The absence of it, even the fear of its absence, chilled and dismayed His spirit (Jn 4<sup>48</sup>, Mk 9<sup>22-23</sup> RV). He marks faith as the truly favourable condition for His healing power to be efficacious (Mt 9<sup>2</sup>, Mk 10<sup>9</sup>, Lk 17<sup>9</sup>, 18<sup>22</sup>, Jn 5<sup>7</sup>). Apparent exceptions to this connexion between healing and faith may be traced in Mt 9<sup>1-8</sup>, 12<sup>9-13</sup>, Lk 13<sup>11-17</sup>, 14<sup>1-6</sup>, 22<sup>20-21</sup>, but in all these cases the details are not reported, the fact of the healing being in these instances less prominent than other features of the narrative, such as the controversy of Jesus with the cold critics in the synagogue, and the personal characteristics of the Saviour in His beneficent action with respect to Malchus. It has also been thought that demoniacs as such were incapacitated from the exercise of faith in Jesus. But while this is in part true, it is significant that our Lord does in these instances seek to gain access to the true personality and to set it free from the oppression of all alien powers (see ILLUSION).

6. Jesus laboured to produce this faith.—Not only does He ask for it as a condition of healing, but He spends Himself in the effort to evoke it. His careful treatment of the blind man (Mk 8<sup>22-26</sup>), the deaf and dumb (Mk 7<sup>31-37</sup>), the blind and imbecile (Jn 9<sup>1-7</sup> and 5<sup>7</sup>) is best understood as the effort of our Lord to produce the essential conditions of receiving His healing virtue. In each case the means used, as well as the words spoken, are adapted to the particular case. We have not one set of means used indiscriminately. The ears and the tongue of the deaf-mute are touched, the blind man in one case is led out of the town, saliva is applied to his eyes, and the touch of the Lord's hand; in the other the eyes are anointed and the patient is sent to a distant point in the exercise of faith. The labour is to set free the patient from all unnatural conditions of mind and spirit and from hopelessness, which is the most unnatural of all to men to whom God is so near.

This effort in Jesus produced weariness. It involved a deep expenditure of nervous, physical, and spiritual energy, and often in the Gospels we read of the spent, tired worker seeking refreshment in rest and in solitude, and most of all in fellowship with God. 'He went out into the mountain to pray' (Mt 14<sup>23</sup>, Mk 6<sup>46</sup>, Lk 6<sup>12</sup>).

7. Several of our Lord's cures were wrought while He was at a distance from the patient: the Syro-Phoenician's daughter (Mt 15<sup>22-28</sup>, Mk 7<sup>24-30</sup>), the nobleman's son (Jn 4<sup>46-54</sup>), and the centurion's servant (Mt 8<sup>5-13</sup>, Lk 7<sup>1-10</sup>). Difficulty is felt by many on the ground that the power of a unique personality which they acknowledge in Jesus could not be active in these cases. Dr. Abbot discusses the third instance (Kernel and Husk, Letter 18), and, excluding any 'bona fide miracle,' he inclines to regard the story as due to an exaggeration or to the influence of the knowledge of his friend's intercession with Jesus, 'with a sentimental reserve in favour of brain-wave sympathy.' Since the time Dr. Abbot wrote, telepathy has become a recognized fact in psychical research, and we have no need to deny its possible action in these cases. But the explanation given of all His works by our Lord goes beneath all such conjectures and hypotheses. He ascribed His healing to the Divine power with which He was able to bring men into living communication. That Divine all-pervading Life which informed His humanity was not at a distance from any human life. Space and Time are to the Infinite Power non-existent, and only our bondage to the limited human ideas can present any difficulty.

8. In the three above cases and in the case of the demoniac boy (Mt 17<sup>14-21</sup>, Mk 9<sup>14-29</sup>, Lk 9<sup>37-42</sup>) our Lord significantly seeks the co-operation of parent and friend in the work of healing; and the fact is most significant of the closeness of human sympathy, and most of all of that most vital and mysterious sympathy lying in the life-bond between parent and child, and the intimate dependence of these ties upon the life-giving power of the Almighty. These deep-lying sympathies that bind parents to their own offspring are essentially allied to the Divine power. They 'consist' by its indwelling, and Jesus desires this power to be informed by a living faith, and so be at once at its highest point of energy and also in living union with God.

9. In some of the cures effected by Jesus a process is observable in the recovery. The nobleman's son was first set free from the fever, and from that decisive time began 'to amend.' The crisis was safely passed, and the rest was left to nature's gentle action. The Syro-Phoenician's daughter was delivered from her besetment and left 'thrown upon the bed,' physically prostrate, and requiring rest and care. The daughter of Jairus was ordered rest and food, and the blind man at Bethsaida was only by degrees restored to perfect sight. These indications, casually given, and probably not understood by the narrators, lead us to think that a similar process would be manifest in the other cures were they fully and adequately reported, and it is always a salutary reminder that our Gospels are only most fragmentary. It was a principle of Jesus not to do anything by extraordinary which could be accomplished by ordinary means.

10. The healing power of Jesus went out freely among the suffering multitude (Mt 8<sup>16, 17</sup>, 14<sup>34-36</sup>, 15<sup>30, 31</sup>, Mk 12<sup>34</sup>, 6<sup>53-56</sup>, Lk 4<sup>40, 41</sup>, 9<sup>11</sup>). The contagious influence of a multitude, in producing an atmosphere in which remarkable psychical phenomena are manifest and the result is seen in healing of the sick, is not uncommonly recognized in modern times. In this way are explained the miracles of which some genuine cases undoubtedly happened around the tomb of Becket, the healings that are associated with Lourdes, and many of the similar results that we may believe were gathered round famous saints like St. Francis of Assisi and St. Theresa. A contagion of expectation is initiated and spreads rapidly through a whole countryside, and this condition of expectation and hope is one which the most prosaic science recognizes as favourable to the production of real cures, especially of ailments a large element of which is nervous. We have seen that the working of Jesus did not disdain to utilize these and all other forces in human nature which make for healing; and by reason of His unique and perfect alliance with the Divine Source of all life and health, He was able to bring instantaneous and permanent relief and restoration to whole companies of sufferers.

11. Our Lord's method has considerable affinity with modern medical science. The power of the mind over bodily ailments, in the maintenance and restoration of health, is being increasingly acknowledged. Dr. Schofield says truly that most remedies, if not all, are partly psychical in their operation. Not only such prescriptions as change of occupation, environment, and climate, physical and mental shocks and emotional incentives, ethical and religious influences, travel, study, ambition and social influences, but also drugs, changes of diet, baths and waters, minor operations, depend much for their efficacy on their psychical action; while the personality of the doctor—in some cases the unintelligibility of his prescription and the magnitude of his fee—are valuable therapeutic agents. In this way full recognition is given to the influence of any power which can set free the mind from its hopeless condition, its lethargy and depression, as a most potent force in the work of healing. Schmiedel (art. 'Gospels' in Encyc. Bibl.) says of our Lord's miracles: 'It is only permissible to regard as historical that class of healings which present-day physicians are able to effect by psychical methods.' But he overlooks the influence of mental action in the cure of all kinds of disease, and not only of mental diseases to which the above observations point.

Psychical methods, intelligently and of set purpose applied to the cure of bodily ailments, are as yet in their preliminary stages. On the same line, if on no other, much greater possibilities remain for human knowledge and power to achieve. No limit can be laid down beyond which the occult forces of human life may not be taken advantage of for the healing not of nervous diseases only, but of purely physical. Dr. Osgood Mason gives abundant evidence, from his own knowledge and practice, of the influence of suggestion, with or without hypnosis, in the healing of many physical ailments. And the Christian faith, based upon the suggestions found in the Gospels as they describe, without at all understanding them, our Lord's methods, is that Jesus Christ, by His commanding action upon the human mind and spirit, and by the Divine power dwelling in Himself, was able to control physical and physiological processes in the human body so as to produce curative effects of a permanent character.

CURSE.—Two widely different words are in AV translated 'curse.' It will be sufficient to trace their meaning, so far as the ideas represented by them are found in the Gospels.

אָרָבָה, arabaha, 'an accursed (AV) or devoted (RV) thing.' (a) In its higher application this word signifies a thing devoted—wholly or in part, permanently or temporarily, voluntarily or by Divine decree—to a use (or an abstinence) exclusively sacred. This is not a curse at all in the modern sense of the word; it corresponds more nearly to the nature of a vow. With this extension of meaning we may see a genuine instance in the special consecration of John the Baptist (Lk 1<sup>16</sup>, 7<sup>26</sup>), and a corrupt instance in the system of Corban (Mk 7<sup>11</sup>). (b) In its darker application it denotes an extreme and punitive ban of extermination. This is of frequent occurrence in OT, but in the Gospels no clear case is found, unless, indeed, under this head we include all the death-penalties of the Jewish law (Jn 1<sup>18</sup>), especially the punishment attempted (Jn 8<sup>20</sup>, 10<sup>31</sup>) and finally inflicted upon Christ Himself on the charge of blasphemy (Mk 14<sup>64</sup>, Jn 10<sup>31</sup>). It is well to notice, in connexion with this kind of anathema, the strong expression used by Christ in addressing the Canaanitish woman, as one descended from a 'devoted' race (Mt 15<sup>26</sup>). It may be added that profanity, in the special form of self-cursing, seems to have adopted language derived from this ban; see Mt 23<sup>34</sup>, Mk 14<sup>27</sup> (κατακαθήσεται and ἀποκαθήσεται). Ro 9<sup>3</sup> naturally suggests itself as a verbal illustration; in other respects it is a complete contrast.* (c) The ban of excommunication gave place, under certain conditions, to the remedial discipline of excommunication; that is to say, a temporary 'cutting off from the congregation'; referred to, as a Jewish institution, in Jn 9<sup>33</sup> 12<sup>24</sup> 16<sup>2</sup>, and, as a Christian (apparently), in Mt 18<sup>17</sup>. (See also Westcott on 1 Jn 5<sup>19</sup>).

2. καθήσεται, 'curse.'—(a) This is the word regularly used to denote a curse in the general sense, as the natural antithesis of a blessing; it is not charged (as 'anathema' essentially is) with sacred associations; its quality, which is capable of all degrees, from Divine to devilish, is to be decided by the context. (b) The disappearance of cursing in the NT marks very forcibly the contrast between the spirit of the New dispensation and that of the Old; for in the OT its presence is at times painfully prominent. See Lk 9<sup>46</sup>, where even the unauthorized additions of some MSS are undoubtedly a true comment. Such instances as are found or are alleged in the Epistles are judicial in tone, not irresponsible and malevolent. The exceptional case which occurs of a curse uttered by Christ (upon the fig-tree [see art.], Mt 21<sup>19</sup>, Mk 11<sup>13</sup>) is probably to be taken as a sign given to impress His warning of impending judgments (Mt 21<sup>41</sup> 23<sup>37</sup> 24<sup>21</sup> 25<sup>32</sup> etc.). It is a reminder that we may not so exaggerate the goodness of God as to leave no place for His severity. Christ applies the words 'ye cursed' to those who shall be on His left hand at the Last Day (Mt 25<sup>41</sup>). (c) Christ became a 'curse' (Gal 3<sup>13</sup>, see Lightfoot, ad loc.). It belongs to the Epistles to unfold the bearing of this truth; but the fact is implied in the measures taken by the Jews, after the Crucifixion, to avert its consequences (Jn 19<sup>7</sup>, cf. Dt 21<sup>22</sup>). In the Roman view the shame of crucifixion, in the Jewish view its accursed nature, formed the special sting of such a death. Hence in the matter of salvation, which 'is from the Jews' (Jn 4<sup>22</sup>), the curse must necessarily be involved in the Death's redemptive efficacy.

CUSHION.—In NT only in Mk 4<sup>8</sup> RV [AV 'pillow'] for πυρροεφάλακτα, a cushion for the head, but also for sitting or reclining upon (see references in Liddell and Scott, s. v.). By πυρροεφάλακτα LXX renders מַרְרָה of Ezk 13<sup>18</sup> where the Arabic equivalent is mekhaddeh. Mekhaddeh (sing.) is just the word used by the Sea of Galilee fishermen for the cushion they place in the hinder part of their fishing-boats for the comfort of the passenger to-day. These boats are probably similar to those used by our Lord and His friends, and on just such a cushion the present writer has often rested in crossing the same waters.

The cushions universally used to support the head or the arm in reclining on the divan are in size about 24" x 15" x 5". They are usually made of straw—less frequently of cotton or hair—sewn into strong canvas, and covered with coloured print or silk. The larger cushions for the seat of the divan, and employed in the boats, are of the same material. See FILLOW. W. EWING.

CUSTOM.—See TRIBUTE.

CYRENE (Κυρήνη) was a Greek settlement on the north coast of Africa, in the district now called Benghazi or Barca, which forms the E. part of the modern province of Tripoli. It was founded B.C. 632. It was the chief member of a confederacy of five neighbouring cities; hence the district was called either Pentapolis or Cyrenaica. Under the first Ptolemy it became a dependency of Egypt; was left to Rome by the will of Ptolemy Apion, B.C. 96; was soon after formed into a province, and later, perhaps not till 27, united with Crete, with which under the Empire it formed a senatorial province, under an ex-prator with the title of proconsul. It was noted for its fertility and for its commerce, which, however, declined after the foundation of Alexandria. It produced many distinguished men, such as the philosophers Aristippus and Carneades, the poet Callimachus, and the Christian orator and bishop Synesius.

Jews were very numerous and influential there. The first Ptolemy, 'wishing to secure the government of Cyrene and the other cities of Libya for himself, sent a party of Jews to inhabit them' (Josephus, c. Apion, ii. 4). Cyrenian Jews are mentioned in 1 Mac 15<sup>24</sup>, 2 Mac 2<sup>28</sup> (Jason of Cyrene). According to Strabo (op. Jos. Ant. xiv. vii. 2), the inhabitants of Cyrene were divided into four classes—citizens, husbandmen (i.e. native Libyans), sojourners (μέτοικα), and Jews. The Jews enjoyed equality of civil rights (Ant. xvi. vi. 1, 5). An inscription at Berenice, one of the cities of Cyrenaica, of prob. B.C. 13, shows that the Jews there formed a civic community (πόλις) of their own, under nine rulers (CIG iii. 5361). The Cyrenian Jews were very turbulent; Lucullus had to suppress a disturbance raised by them (Strabo, l.c.); there was a rising there at the close of the Jewish war, A.D. 70 (Jos. BJ vii. xi.; Vita, 76); and a terrible internecine war between them and their Gentile neighbours, under Trajan (Dio Cass. lxxviii. 32; Euseb. HE iv. 2).

Simon of Cyrene (the father of Alexander and Rufus [wh. see]), who was impressed to bear our Lord's cross (Mt 27<sup>32</sup>, Mk 15<sup>21</sup>, Lk 23<sup>26</sup>), was doubtless one of these Jewish settlers. Other NT references to Cyrenian Jews are: Ac 2<sup>10</sup> (at Pentecost), 6<sup>9</sup> (members of special synagogue at Jerusalem, opposing Stephen), 11<sup>13</sup> (preaching at Antioch to Greeks [or Hellenists]), 13<sup>1</sup> (Lucius of Cyrene, probably one of these preachers, a prophet or teacher at Antioch).

DAILY BREAD.—See LORD'S PRAYER.

DALMANUTHA.—Mk 8<sup>10</sup> only. The textual and geographical problems involved in this name have not found as yet a satisfactory explanation. After the feeding of the 4000, Jesus embarked with His disciples, and came, according to Mt 15<sup>9</sup>, εἰς τὰ ὄρη Μαγδαλά (TR) or Μαγαδάρ (all critical editions); according to Mk 8<sup>10</sup> εἰς τὰ μέρη Δαλμανουθά.

In Mk. the variations are few and unimportant, except the difference between Magdala and Magadan. For mag we find occasionally mag, mag (with following magdalala), mag. Cod. D places mag before the proper name. Μαγαδάρ is the reading of MS B (D<sup>1</sup> →), Μαγδαλά of B<sup>2</sup>; the Old Latin has Magadala, Mageda, an, Magidalam; Vulg. Magadan; syr<sup>sin</sup> ܡܘܕܢܐ, ܡܘܕܢܐ, ܡܘܕܢܐ, ܡܘܕܢܐ (Magda); so also the Arabic Tatlian. Most uncials and cursives Μαγδαλά; CM 33. 102, etc., Μαγδαλά. In Mk. τὰ μέρη is replaced by τὰ ὄρη in D<sup>2</sup>.

εἰς τὰ ὄρη, 28, syr<sup>sin</sup>; but in the latter the addition of a dot makes the plural; syr<sup>sin</sup> is missing; B has the spelling Δαλμανουθά, 474 Δαμανουθά, 184<sup>m</sup> Δαμανουθά; Vulg. Dalmanutha (with unimportant variations); an, Dalmanutha. But this is now replaced by: Μαγδαλά (not Μαγδαλά as read by Stephanus) in D<sup>1</sup>. Μαγδαλά (not Μαγδαλά as printed by Tischendorf) in D<sup>2</sup>. Μαγδαλά in B<sup>2</sup>, 81. Μαγδαλά in L. 13. 61. 69, etc.

Syr<sup>sin</sup> ܡܘܕܢܐ, syr<sup>pal</sup> ܡܘܕܢܐ, Got. Magdalan, Old Lat. Mageda, an, an, Magidan. It is a natural supposition that in Mk. all readings differing from mag Δαλμανουθά are due to assimilation to Mt, perhaps under the influence of Tatian. The confusion of mag and mag (mag) must be very early, and has its parallels in many passages of the OT, from Jos 11<sup>8</sup> 15<sup>1</sup> to Est 11<sup>9</sup>. Mal 1<sup>2</sup>. On its occurrence in syr<sup>sin</sup> see especially Chase, The Syro-Latin Text of the Gospels, p. 97, esp. n. 3, where he justly remarks: 'This reading of the Sinaitic raises two questions: (a) Was there an early Greek Harmony of the Gospels? . . . (b) What is the relation of Sin to Tatian?' On the Cod. 28 which supports the reading of syr<sup>sin</sup>, see WH II. 242 ('which has many relics of a very ancient text').

That Magadan, not Magdala, is the true reading in Mt. is probable (independently of the witness of MSS) on internal grounds; for it is difficult to explain how a name like Magdala, which was well known through Mary Magdalene, should have become Magadan. The introduction of both forms into MSS of Mk. points to the fact that there were several stages in the revision of our MSS. Both the readings, Magidan and Magdala, may, however, go back to the same Heb. ܡܘܕܢܐ, as is shown by Jos 15<sup>7</sup>, where B has Μαγδαλά 15<sup>7</sup> for Μαγδαλά 15<sup>7</sup> of A. Even for Dalmanutha such an explanation has been attempted by Dalman (Gramm., p. 133; change of g into g, and transposition of syllables Δαλμανουθά from Μαγδαλαλά = ܡܘܕܢܐ. But in the 2nd ed. p. 168 he has left out this note and all references to this word).

That τὰ ὄρη in Mt. and τὰ μέρη in Mk. are almost identical expressions, is shown by Mt 15<sup>9</sup> εἰς τὰ μέρη Σιδῶνος καὶ Τύρου compared with Mk 7<sup>24</sup> εἰς τὰ ὄρη (TR μεθρία) Τύρου (καὶ Σιδῶνος), and by the fact that in the OT 4 of the 11 Heb. equivalents for ἄρον (7, 12, 14, 17) reappear among the 22 Heb. equivalents of μέρον. The next supposition is therefore that Magadan (or Magdala) in Mt. = Dalmanutha in Mark. But how is this possible?

Many explanations have been started. The one proposed by Dalman may be dismissed at once, as it is given up by himself; cf. also Wellhausen's remarks on it (Ev. Marc.). Lightfoot and Ewald derived Dalmanutha from peby by the supposition of an Aramaic or Galilean pronunciation. Keim (Jesus of Nazara, Eng. tr. iv. 238) explained it similarly as 'Shady Place.' Schwarz (Das heilige Land, p. 189) derived it from the cave Telman (pe'le), which cave, however, according to Neubauer, was in the neighbourhood of Herod's Caesarea. J. W. Donaldson (Jashar: fragmenta archetypa carminum Hebraicorum, editio secunda, 1840, p. 16) suggested: 'Δαλ- istud residuum esse veri nominis Μαγδαλά scil. ܡܘܕܢܐ, μουουθά autem re-presentare pluralem vocis ἄρον pars, portio, quam in Graeco μέρον conversam habemus.' A similar idea was struck out independently by R. Harris (Codex Bezae, p. 188) and the present writer (Philologica Sacra, p. 17; ExpT ix. 45), that Dalmanutha is the transliteration of the Aramaic equivalent of eis τὰ μέρη, which by some form of dittography took the place of the proper name. Against Harris see Chase, Bezan Text of Acts, p. 145, n. 2; and against the whole suggestion, Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 66 f. Dalman doubts whether ἄρον in Aramaic meant anything else but 'portion.' But in the Syriac Bible at least it is frequently used for the allotted portions of land (Jos 14<sup>2</sup> 15<sup>1</sup>, Is 57<sup>9</sup>). N. Herz saw in the word an Aramaized form of the Greek ἄρον 'harbour' (ExpT viii. 533, ix. 95, 423). Others, finally, give no explanation, and consider Magadan and Dalmanutha as the names of two different places near each other, neither being very well known. But this leads to the topographical problem.

Eusebius in his Onomasticon has but one paragraph on a name beginning with M immediately after names from the prophet Jeremiah (Mephaath, Maon, Molchom, 48<sup>m</sup>, 29 49<sup>m</sup>). It runs (in Klostermann's edition, p. 134 [= Lagarde, OS p. 282]):

Μαγδαλά (Mt 15<sup>9</sup>). εἰς τὰ ὄρη Μαγδαλά ἢ Χερτίου ἰσθμίου, εἰς ἢ Μαρτάνου, καὶ ἢ Μαγασὶ δὲ τὴν Μαγδαλά μανουθῶν, καὶ ἴσως εἰς ἢ Μαγδαλά τῆς τῆς Ἰσραήλ.
In Jerome's translation:
Magadan, ad cuius fines Mattheus evangelista scribit dominum pervenisse, sed et Marcus eiusdem nominis recordatur, nunc autem regio dicitur Magadena circa Gerasam.

The unique MS, in which the work of Eusebius is preserved, writes Μαγδαλά (as D*) and Μαγδαλά. Eusebius may have been reminded of the name by the occurrence of Μαγδαλά beside Μέρη in Jer 61 (44), which he quotes a few lines before (ed. Klost. p. 134. l. 15). At all events it follows from the entry, that Eusebius did not find Dalmanutha in his text of Mark, and that he sought the place on the eastern side; but Gerasa seems too far from the Lake, unless we are to suppose that it had some sort of enclave on its shores.

A strange identification is that with the 'Phiala' Lake mentioned by Jos. BJ III. x. 7 as one of the sources of the Jordan. See the Maps published by Röhricht, I. (ZDPV xiv. 1891):

'Hunc fontem Josephus appellat Phialam, Marcus Dalmanutha, Mattheus Magadan, Sacerdoti Madin. Hinc est verus ortus Jordan; unde palcos hic missis recipiuntur in Dan subterraneo meatu ducte.'

Furrer (ZDPV ii. 59) identified Dalmanutha with Khân Mînyeh, which name he connected with mensa (the table where Jesus sat with the Twelve, first mentioned in the Commonitorium, A. D. 808), and this with (Dal)manutha; but see against this Gildemeister (ib. iv. 197 ff.). Thomson (LB 393) suggests a ruined site up the Yarmuk half a mile from the Jordan called Dalhania or Dalmania (Robinson, BBP III. 264, 'Dalhemiyeh'); Tristram, a site one and a half miles from Migdal; Sir C. Wilson, a site not far from the same. The aged Prof. Sepp in a recent paper, 'Die endlich entdeckte Heimat der Magdalena' (Völkerschau, iii. 3, pp. 199-202, 1904), argued for Miqdal Gador or Magdala Gadara, a Jewish suburb of Gadara (Jerus. Erubim v. 7). Wellhausen has no doubt that it must be sought on the eastern shore, in the neighbourhood of Bethsaida (Mk 8<sup>2</sup>), if this town itself did not belong to it. For he holds 8<sup>m</sup>, 10 to be identical with 8<sup>10</sup>, the object ἀπό τοῦ of ἀπέτι in 8<sup>13</sup> being the ἐχλοί, not the Pharisees, and ῥῶλον he regards as a harmonistic insertion. He believes that 8<sup>13</sup> originally followed immediately upon 8<sup>23</sup> καὶ ἐρχοῦναι εἰς θῆβαιδάς.

Thus not even the geographical problem is solved. If the suggestion on the origin of Dalmanutha, as put forward by Donaldson, Harris, and the present writer, were to turn out correct, it would have important consequences for the Synoptic Problem. For then this reading cannot well have had its origin in oral tradition, but presupposes a written (Aramaic) document as the basis of our Second Gospel.

UH.), an Egyptian origin).

DANCING.—1. Manner.—The Oriental dance was performed either by an individual man or woman, or by crescent lines of men dancing together and holding each other's hands, or of women by themselves performing similar movements. The one at the end of the line waved a scarf and acted as choregos, or dance-leader. At times also a line of men and women, with hands joined, circle and another similar line, and the dance consisted in their alternate advance and retreat, accompanied by the hand-clapping of the onlookers beating time to the music, by the scarf-waving and occasional shout, and, at regulated intervals, the resounding tread of the dancers. In the case of the individual, the abrupt muscular actions were artistically relieved, as in the contrasting lines of male and female stilt in the Western dance, by the soft and swaying undulations of the dancer's figure. The accompaniment of song, hand-clapping, and musical instruments served to control the energy and secure unity of movement.

2. Places.—On the occasion of a wedding in a peasant's house a space was kept clear near the door, and into it one after another stepped forward and danced, and retired among the shadows; the dancing of the bride receiving especial attention and applause. For dancing in companies, the flat roof, or any level space beside the house, was resorted to. In the cities and in the houses of the rich, the large reception room, or the open paved court, into which all the apartments opened, was available for the purpose. In festive processions the male or female performers, singly or in couples, stepped to the front and danced with sword and shield, and then gave place to others.

3. Occasions.—In the East, dancing has never been regarded as an end in itself and promoted as an entertainment chiefly for those actively taking part in it, but rather as a demonstration of feeling due to some special incident or situation. In family life this was principally the event of marriage (Mt 11<sup>17</sup>, Lk 7<sup>33</sup>); and a similar expression of feeling often attended the birth of a son, recovery from sickness, return from a journey, or the reception of a guest whose presence called for such a manifestation of grateful rejoicing. Birthdays did not usually receive such notice, as they lacked the element of relief from danger, recompense and rest after hardship, or the introduction of something new into the family conditions. Herod's birthday feast (when Salome danced before the guests, Mt 14<sup>6</sup>, Mk 6<sup>21</sup>) was an imitation of Gentile customs. More general occasions were the founding of a building, the ingathering of harvest, and the religious festivals of the year.

The prevalence of such a custom, embracing old and young, and including all classes, indicated a simple life, in which the feeling of the moment found hearty and uncritical expression. The view of life was one that recognized the easy and rapid interchange of joy and grief (Ps 30<sup>5-11</sup>, La 5<sup>13</sup>, Ec 3<sup>1</sup>). Further, it implied a very close connexion between mental and physical states. As there was a union of mirth and dancing, so there was an equally natural correspondence between sorrow and sighing (Is 35<sup>10</sup>). Even in places dedicated to relaxation and delight, by the rivers of Babylon, it was impossible for captive exiles to sing the songs of the Lord's deliverance (Ps 137<sup>3-4</sup>). The elder brother could take no part in mirth and dancing of which the occasion was so affronting and offensive to himself (Lk 15<sup>25-28</sup>). Hence among a people marked by mobility of temperament and prone to extremes of feeling, the children in the market-place might well reproach their companions who heard the wedding music without rising to the dance, and the wail of bereavement without being moved to pity (Mt 11<sup>17</sup>, Lk 7<sup>33</sup>).

DANIEL.—The influence of Daniel on the Apocalyptic conceptions of the Gospels is profound (see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE). For the possible influence of Dn 7<sup>13</sup> see SON OF MAN. The only passage in which the book is explicitly mentioned is Mt 24<sup>15</sup>, where the phrase τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως ('the abomination of desolation') is quoted. See art. ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION. It is to be noted that in the corresponding passage in Mark (13<sup>14</sup>), no mention is made of Daniel. In view of the accepted priority of Mark and his closer fidelity, and also of Matthew's fondness for OT references, the absence of the clause raises the suspicion that it is not part of the original utterance, but a comment added by the latter Evangelist. In that case it would not be necessary to assume that Jesus meant to use the phrase in the same sense as it is used in Daniel. He may have only adopted or borrowed it as a current popular expression to describe some minatory event which He foresaw portending the forthcoming calamity.

Generally 'darkness' is used in a metaphorical sense, but with slightly different significations. Darkness is the state of spiritual ignorance and sin in which men are before the light of the revelation of Jesus comes to them (Mt 4<sup>16</sup>, Lk 1<sup>7</sup>, Jn 8<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>35-36</sup>). This darkness the presence of Jesus dispels, except in the case of those who love the darkness and who therefore shrink back into the recesses of gloom, when the light shines, because their deeds are evil. Those who have a natural affinity to the light, when Jesus appears, follow Him and walk no longer in darkness.

But there is the deeper darkness that comes through incapacity of sight (Mt 6<sup>23</sup>, Lk 11<sup>35</sup>). This state results from long continuance in evil (Jn 3<sup>19</sup>). It is the judgment passed upon the impenitent sinner. To love the darkness rather than the light is to have the spiritual faculty atrophied, and this is the Divine penalty to which he is condemned. The light that is in him has become darkness. The gospel contemplates for the human soul no more dire calamity.

And the final fate of the impenitent sinner is to be cast into outer darkness (Mt 8<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>13</sup> 25<sup>30</sup>). There is a kingdom of darkness which wars against the light, and which has power at times to prevail (Lk 22<sup>53</sup>). This is the darkness of sin, chosen and loved as sin, the instinctive hatred, wrought with what is radically evil, of the Divine purity and light. It is the negative of all good—outer darkness, the darkness that has ceased to be permeated or permeable by any ray of light.

Darkness is twice used of secrecy or privacy (Mt 10<sup>7</sup>, Lk 12<sup>3</sup>). In these cases, however, a metaphorical use of the word is also implied. In the former passage the reference is to the darkness of perplexity and sorrow; in the latter, to the darkness of sin. See also LIGHT, UNPARDONABLE SIN.

In the later mystical theology there is a use of the term that may be here referred to. There is a 'Divine darkness' which is the consummation of the experience of the purified soul—the darkness that comes from excess of light. The pseudo-Dionysius speaks of the 'luminous gloom of the silence' which reveals the inner secrets of being, and in which the soul is raised to the absolute ecstasy. It is an attempt to express the infinitude of the susceptibility of the human soul to emotions of either joy or anguish. From the outer darkness to the light which is above light, and therefore inconceivable, the soul of man is capable of responding to every shade of experience.

DATES.—The chronological sequence of the Gospels is quite as important as that of the Epistles to the student of the beginnings of Christianity, and forms an essential branch of the study of the development of our Lord's revelation and His Messianic consciousness. The difficulties in the way of forming an exact time-table of the dates in the Gospels are due (1) to the indifference of the early Christians, as citizens of the heavenly city, to the great events that were taking place in the world around them; (2) to their lack of means of ascertaining these events, and their obliviousness of the important bearing they might have on the evidences of the faith; (3) to the fact that, the early Christian traditions being recorded in the interest of religion and not of history, the writers confined their attention to a few events, which were arranged as much according to subject-matter as to time sequence. The result is that there are many gaps which can be only approximately filled up by strict inference from casual remarks. The author of the Third Gospel is the only one to give parallel dates of secular history in the manner of a true historian, and to profess to relate things 'in order' (καθ' ἑξῆς, Lk 1<sup>9</sup>). There are many inferences as to time to be drawn from statements in Mt, but they are of an accidental character. St. John marks points of time of significance in his own and in his Master's life, but his purpose is to trace the development of the drama of the Master's passion, not to suggest its chronological relation to the history of the world.

The early Fathers, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Africanus, and Hippolytus, were the first to attempt to arrange the events of the Gospel in chronological sequence. But these attempts are not always to be relied upon, owing to the difficulties of ascertaining many of the dates of secular history, to which reference has already been made, and which were still further increased in their case by the different ways of reckoning the years of reigning monarchs and of calculating time in the different eras. For example, Lk 3<sup>1</sup> 'in the 15th year of the reign of Tiberius' may be reckoned from Augustus' death, Aug. 19 A.D. 14, or from the time when Tiberius was associated with Augustus in the empire by special law; but that law, again, is variously dated, being identified by some with the grant of the tribunicia potestas for life in A.D. 13, but assigned by Mommsen (after Velleius Paterculus, ii. 121) to A.D. 11. So that we have to choose between A.D. 29, 28, and 26. Furthermore, the Roman calendar began on Jan. 1, so that the imperial year might be adjusted to the civil year (1) by counting the fractional year as a whole, and by commencing a second imperial year on the first New Year's Day of each reign.—Light-foot (Ignatius, ii. 398) mentions the practice of Trajan and his successors of beginning a second year of tribunicia potestas on the annual inauguration day of new tribunes next after their accession, —or (2) by omitting the fractional year altogether, and calculating the emperor's reign from a fixed date, like Eusebius, who seems to commence each emperor's reign from the September following his accession (see art. 'Chronology' in Hastings' DB i. 418). The Julian reform of the Roman calendar, by which the year B.C. 46 was made to contain 445 days, in order to bring the civil year into line with the solar year, adds to the complications.

Furthermore, the Jewish calendar bristles with problems. Originally the Paschal full moon was settled by observation, but that became impossible when the people were spread over distant lands, and was also hindered by atmospheric causes; and, in any case, the beginning of the month was determined not by the astronomical new moon, but by the time when the crescent became visible, about 30 hours afterwards, the first sunset after that event marking the beginning of the new month. A fresh difficulty was created by the 13th month, Veadar, which was intercalated whenever the barley was not within a fortnight of being ripe at the end of the month Adar; but this was forbidden in sabbatical years, and two intercalary years could not be successive. The lunar year was correlated with the solar by the rule that the Paschal full moon immediately followed the spring equinox. There were also various calculations of the equinox, Hippolytus placing it on March 18, Anstolius on March 19, the Alexandrians on March 21.

And with regard to chronology in general it is to be noted that in the East the year almost always began with September. The Jewish civil year began in Tishri (Sept.); the religious and regal in Nisan (April) (Jos. Ant. i. iii. 3), the order of months beginning with the latter, that of the years with the former. The Alexandrian year began on Aug. 29; the era of the Greeks started from Sept. B.C. 312, the Olympiads from July B.C. 776. In the Christian era, also called the Dionysian after Dionysius Exiguus of the 6th cent., 753 A.U.C. = 1 B.C., and 754 A.U.C. = 1 A.D.

The points of chronology in our Lord's life which have to be settled before any table of dates can be drawn up are (1) date of nativity, (2) age at baptism, (3) length of ministry, (4) date of crucifixion. While no one of these can be verified with anything like precision, it is certain that the accepted chronology, based on the calculations of Dionysius Exiguus in the 6th cent., is erroneous.

Dionysius started, seemingly, from Lk 3<sup>1</sup>, the 15th year of Tiberius, placed the public ministry of our Lord one year later, and counted back 30 years, on the strength of Lk 3<sup>2</sup>. This gave 754 A.U.C. for the year of Christ's birth. Following Hippolytus, he fixed on Dec. 25 in that year, and, according to the usual method for reckoning the years of monarchs, counted the whole year 754 as 1 A.D. (see Ideler, Handbuch, ii. 381). That his views need correction will be proved in the course of this article.

1. Date of Nativity.—This may be fixed somewhat approximately by its relation to (a) the date of Herod's death (Mt 2<sup>19-22</sup>), (b) the enrolment under Quirinius (Lk 2<sup>2</sup>), and by (c) Patristic testimony.

(a) Herod's death, the terminus ad quem of the Nativity, is generally settled by the Jewish chronology in Ant. and BJ. in which are found indications of the dates of Herod's accession and death, and of the dates of his predecessor Antigonus, and of his immediate successors, Archelaus, Herod Philip, and Herod Antipas. For notice of Herod's death see Ant. xviii. viii. 1, 'having reigned, since he had procured the death of Antigonus, 34 years, but, since he had been declared king by the Romans, 37 years.' The death of Antigonus is noted in Ant. xiv. xvi. 4. 'This destruction befell the city of Jerusalem when Marcus Agrippa and Canidius Gallus were consuls at Rome, Olymp. 185, in the 3rd month, on the solemnity of the fast, like a periodical return of the misfortunes which overtook the Jews under Pompey, by whom they were taken on the same day 27 years before.' The consuls mentioned held office B.C. 37, and 27 years from B.C. 63 (consulship of Cicero and Antonius), when Pompey took Jerusalem (Ant. xiv. iv. 3), allowing for the three intercalary months of B.C. 46, gives practically the same date, B.C. 37, for the confirmation of Herod in his kingdom. Herod's death might therefore be placed in the month Nisan (see below) B.C. 4 (Sivan 25 B.C. 37 to Nisan B.C. 4, according to the method of counting reigns, being 34 years).

Of Herod's successors (1) Archelaus, ethnarch of Judaea, was banished in the consulship of Lepidus and Arruntius (A.D. 6), in the 10th year of his reign (Ant. xviii. xiii. 2), or in the 9th (BJ. ii. vii. 3), and therefore would have come to the throne B.C. 4, being probably banished before he celebrated the 10th anniversary of his accession. (2) Herod Philip died in the 20th year of Tiberius, having been tetrarch of Trachonitis and Galilee 37 years (Ant. xviii. iv. 6), and would have commenced his reign B.C. 4-3.

There are two more data to help us to fix the year of Herod's death: the eclipse of the moon which preceded his last illness (Ant. xvii. vi. 4), and the Passover which followed soon after (xvii. ix. 3). The lunar eclipses visible in Palestine during B.C. 5-3 were those of March 23 B.C. 5, Sept. 15 B.C. 5, March 12 B.C. 4. As it is quite possible that the final scene of Herod's life and his obsequies did not cover more than one month, we might, with Ideler and Wurm, fix on the eclipse of March 12 B.C. 4 (Wieseler, Chron. Syn. p. 56), which is also indicated by the Passover that immediately followed. B.C. 4, Herod's death, would therefore be the terminus ad quem of the Nativity.

But how long before B.C. 4 Jesus was born cannot decisively be said. The age of the Innocents, ἀπὸ θιερούς καὶ κτωρέων (Mt 2<sup>9</sup>), would give B.C. 6 as the superior limit and B.C. 5 as the inferior, as this clause is qualified by the diligent investigation of Herod (κατὰ τὸν χρόνον ὃν ἐπέβουρε παρὰ τὸν πάτριον). This massacre, quite in keeping with the growing cruelty and suspicion of Herod, who had recently procured the murder of his two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, was secretly carried out and seemingly of small extent, not being mentioned by Josephus, and being apparently limited to children to whom the star which the Magi saw in the east, at least six months before, might have reference. Although Mt 2<sup>11</sup> τὸ παιδίον does not suggest an infant babe, the stay of the Holy Family in Bethlehem, where the Magi found them, cannot have been long, the presentation in the Temple following 40 days after the Nativity. B.C. 5-5 would then be approximately the date of the Nativity.

Of the star in the east it cannot be said with truth that 'the star shines only in the legend' (von Soden in Enop. Bibl. art. 'Chronology'), for the appearance of a striking sidereal phenomenon between the years B.C. 7 and B.C. 4 has been proved by Kepler and verified by Ideler and Pritchard. Kepler suggested that a conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter in the zodiacal sign of the Pisces, similar to that which took place in Dec. 1603, took place in B.C. 7. But this would be too early for the star that stood over Bethlehem. Wieseler (l.c. p. 67) therefore, elaborating another suggestion of Kepler, held that a brilliant evanescent star, similar to that which appeared in Sept. 1604 between Jupiter and Saturn, and waned in March 1606, may have appeared then. The Chinese tables mention such an appearance in A.C. 4. Ebersheim (Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah) suggests that the conjunction in A.C. 7 first attracted the attention of the Magi, and that the evanescent star of B.C. 4 stood over Bethlehem. Two Jewish traditions, one that the star of the Messiah should be seen two years before his birth, and the other that the conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter in Pisces portended something of importance for the Jewish nation, might be mentioned. The former is found in the Midrashim, the latter in Abarbanel's Comm. on Daniel (16th cent.). While no theory could be established on such a basis as this appearance, yet it may support a theory founded on more certain data. If the coming of the Magi took place shortly after the death of Herod's sons Alexander and Aristobulus (B.C. 7) and the mission of Antipater, his heir, to Rome (B.C. 6), their question, 'Where is he that is born king of the Jews?' would, indeed, be startling to Herod.

(b) The enrolment under Quirinius (Lk 2<sup>2</sup> ἀστὴρ ἢ ἀπογραφὴ πρώτη ἐγένετο ἡγεμονεύοντος τῆς Συρίας Κυρηνίου, 'this enrolment took place for the first time when Quirinius was governor of Syria'; cf. Πρεσβύτερος ἐκλογιστὴς ἀπογραφῶν γυναικῶν [Siron. i. 147]). A Roman census took place in A.D. 6, after the deposition of Archelaus, and caused the revolt of Judas of Gamala (Ant. xviii. i. 1), who in consequence became the founder of the Zealot party, which resisted Gentile taxation and authority. This taxing (xviii. ii. 1) was concluded in the 37th year of Caesar's victory at Actium (A.D. 7). To this enrolment the author of Ac 5<sup>26</sup> refers. But it cannot be the enrolment of Lk 2<sup>2</sup>. And Josephus should not be accused of having ascribed to A.D. 7 what took place in B.C. 6-5, as the census he mentions was made after and in consequence of the removal of Archelaus. Mommsen and Zumpt suggest that Quirinius held office in Syria. And his, indeed, might be the name wanting in a mutilated inscription, describing an official who was twice governor of Syria under Augustus. But Saturninus was governor B.C. 9-7, and Varus B.C. 7-4, being in power after Herod's death; so that no place can be found for the rule of Quirinius before B.C. 4, the terminus ad quem of our Lord's birth. He may have come, B.C. 3-2, and completed a census begun by his predecessor. And there is also the possibility of his having received an extraordinary military command by the side of Varus. The Annals of Tacitus (ii. 30, iii. 22, 48) describe him as a keen and zealous soldier (impiger militiæ et acerbis ministeris), who had obtained a triumph for having stormed some fortresses of the Homonadenses in Cilicia, but who was distinctly unpopular on account of his friendship with Tiberius, his sordid life and 'dangerous old age.' Such an officer would have been a most useful agent for Augustus in preparing the document called by Suetonius (Aug. 28) the rationarium imperii, which contained a full description of the 'subject kingdoms, provinces, taxes direct and indirect' (regna, provincie, tributa aut vectigalia, Tac. Ann. i. 11), made out by the emperor himself, especially as Varus was slack, and inclined to favour Archelaus. Certain riots mentioned in Josephus (Ant. xvii. ii. 4), in which the Pharisees appear, may have been due to the census. Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 34, 46; Dial. c. Tryph. 78) appeals to the ἀπογραφὰ made in the time of Quirinius, whom he styles 'the first ἐπιτροπος or procurator in Judæa.' For until Palestine became a Roman province in A.D. 6 there could be no procurator in the strict sense of the term. Previous to that, if Q. did hold office, it would be as a military officer of Syria, and so he might be well described by the vague ἡγεμονεύοντος, although the word is also applied (Lk 3<sup>1</sup>) to Pilate, whom Tacitus styled procurator (Ann. xv. 44). With regard to the census, of which no mention is made in contemporary history, it is to be noted that there is evidence that periodic enrolments, ἀπογραφὰί, were made in Egypt (Class. Rev., Mar. 1893). Prof. Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?) builds on these. It is quite possible that a series of periodical enrolments in a cycle of 14 years were initiated by Augustus, an indefatigable statistician, in other parts of the empire, and that the first of these may have taken place in the days of Herod, who would have carried it out according to Jewish tastes, and so without much disturbance (unless the riots of Ant. xvii. ii. 4, BJ i. xxiii. 2 might be connected with it), whereas the later census was conducted according to Roman ideas, and provoked a rebellion. If this be true, the first census would occur B.C. 7-5, just where it would be required. Some hold that it is possible that St. Luke made a mistake in the name Quirinius (C. H. Turner), and also in the census (von Soden).

(c) Patristic testimony, as represented by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Hippolytus, and perhaps based upon Lk 2<sup>2</sup>, favours a date between B.C. 3 and B.C. 2. Irenæus wrote, 'Our Lord was born about the 41st year (B.C. 3, reckoning from the death of Julius Cæsar B.C. 44) of the empire of Augustus' (Her. iii. 21. 3). Clement stated, 'Our Lord was born in the 28th year (B.C. 3, counting from battle of Actium, B.C. 31) of the reign of Augustus, when first they ordered the enrolments to be made' (Strom. i. 147). Hippolytus said, in his Com. on Daniel, 'Our Lord was born on Wednesday, Dec. 25, in the 42nd (B.C. 2) year of the reign of Augustus.'

With regard to the month and day of the Nativity, no data exist to enable us to determine them at all. Farrar (Life of Christ, p. 9) inferred from the presence of the shepherds in the fields that it was during winter, but Lewin (Festi Sacri, pp. 23, 115) argues for August 1 as the approximate date. The date of the Annunciation is given in Lk 1<sup>26</sup> as ἐν δὲ τῷ μνηί τῷ ἑκτῷ—'in the sixth month,' which is generally referred to Lk 1<sup>26</sup> ὄψως μὲν ἔσται ἀβίας, i.e. this month is sixth with her, but which may with equal probability refer to the sixth month of the Jewish calendar, Ἐλὺλ, or to both dates, both terms of six months running concurrently. The date of the service of the course of Abia, the eighth in order (I Ch 24<sup>10</sup>), for the year 748 A.U.C. (B.C. 6) has been calculated from the fact that the course in waiting on Ab 9 A.D. 70, when Jerusalem was taken, was the first, Jehoiarib (Taanith on 'Fasting,' p. 29a; BJ vi. iv.). This would give courses of Abia for 748 A.U.C., B.C. 6, April 18-24, and (24 weeks later) October 3-9. Six months from the latter date would give a day in March as the date of the Annunciation and a date in December for the Nativity; but six months from the former date would give Elul, or the sixth month of the Jewish year, beginning about Sept. 19, for the Annunciation, and the third month, Sivan or June, for the Incarnation. Elul was the month of the constellation Virgo, who holds in her hand the spica Virginis, which may be 'the offspring of a Virgin.' The fourth month belongs to Cancer, among two stars of which is a group called 'The Manger.'

Patristic tradition.—Hippolytus is the first to give Dec. 25 for the date of the Nativity. On his chair in the library of St. John Lateran in Rome his celebrated table is given. The second year of the cycle has April 2, γένεσις Χριστοῦ, evidently the conception, the calculation being made on the strength of Lk 1<sup>26</sup>, which seems to imply an interval of 6 months between the conception of our Lord and that of the Baptist, and on the popular presumption that Gabriel appeared to Zacharias on the great Day of the Atonement, the 10th day of the seventh month. This would bring the conception of our Lord to the 14th day of the first month, or the Passover full moon. Hippolytus afterwards, in his

Com. on Daniel, in order to allow for two additional years in our Lord's life, altered the date April 2 to March 25, on which the Church has always celebrated the conception, and consequently the Nativity was assigned to Dec. 25. Eidersheim (The Temple, p. 293) suggests the influence of the feast of the Dedication of the Temple, held on the 25th of Chislew.

2. The Baptism of Jesus might be settled, but not very approximately, by (1) the statement (Lk 3<sup>2</sup>) that He was δὲκετὶν τριάκοντα ἔτη (at the beginning of His ministry); (2) the date of the Baptist's preaching, Lk 3<sup>1</sup> 'Now in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar . . . the word of God came unto John the son of Zacharias in the wilderness'; and (3) by the retort of the Jews in Jn 2<sup>22</sup> 'Forty and six years was this temple in building.'

(1) This is an elastic expression, which gave the Valentinian Gnostics a basis for their belief that Jesus was in His 30th year when He came to His baptism (Her. ii. 25. 5). But as Irenæus, in his reference to Jn 8<sup>57</sup> 'Thou art not yet fifty years old,' pointed out, 40, not 30, is the perfect age of a master (cf. Bab. Aboda Zara); and on the strength of this statement the presbyters in Asia Minor, who misled Irenæus, ascribed an age of 40 or 50 years to Jesus. Again, while the maximum age of a Levite was 50 years, the minimum varied between 20 (I Ch 23<sup>24-27</sup>, where the change is ascribed to David), 25 (Nu 4<sup>3-47</sup> LXX), and 30 (Nu 4<sup>3-47</sup> Heb.). This latitude, added to the general sense of δὲκετὶν ('about') and the vague ἔτη, which is omitted in Syr. Sin., makes this indication of our Lord's age indefinite, and capable of meaning either two years over or under 30.

(2) The preaching of the Baptist is the terminus a quo of the baptism of Jesus, and is assigned to the 15th year of Tiberius. Dating that reign from the death of Augustus, Aug. 19 A.D. 14, the 15th year corresponds with A.D. 28-29. B. Weiss and Beyschlag, however, count from A.D. 12, when Tiberius was made co-regent with Augustus. W. M. Ramsay has pointed out that on July 1 A.D. 71, during the life of the Evangelist, Titus was similarly associated in the empire with Vespasian, which would give A.D. 26-27 as the first year of the Baptist's work. This would agree with the office of Pilate, who could hardly have arrived much sooner than A.D. 27, as he held office for 10 years, and was on his way to Rome in A.D. 37, when Tiberius died (Ant. xviii. iv. 2). We might, therefore, if it is permitted to follow Weiss and Beyschlag, fix on A.D. 27-28 for our Lord's baptism.

(3) Jn 2<sup>22</sup> τεσσαράκοντα καὶ ἕξ ἔτεσις κτίσθη τὸ ναὸς οὗτος (cf. Ezr 5<sup>16</sup> κτίσθησιν καὶ οὐκ ἐτελέθη). The Jews do not refer, therefore, to the completion of the restoration, which took place much later (Ant. xx. ix. 7). This work was begun in the 18th year of Herod (Ant. xv. xi. 1, reckoning from B.C. 37, death of Antigonus), in the 15th (BJ i. xxi. 1, reckoning from B.C. 40). This gives B.C. 19-18, from which to A.D. 28 is 46 years. The Passover of A.D. 28 would be a likely date for the events of Jn 2<sup>13-22</sup>. The time of Jn 1<sup>19-23</sup> has yet to be settled. Prof. Sanday (art. 'Jesus Christ' in Hastings' DB ii. 609) gives the time as 'Winter, A.D. 26.' Now there are certain indications of the time of year in which our Lord was baptized which show that His visit to the Baptist may have synchronized with the preparations for the Passover in the month Adar (cf. Jn 11<sup>55</sup> 'And the Jews' passover was at hand, and many went out of the country up to Jerusalem before the passover to purify themselves'), while His sojourn and fast in the wilderness, of which St. Matthew and St. Luke give details, may have been due not only to a desire to be alone to reflect upon His mission, but also to the feeling of the necessity of a great self-restraint in order to check the urgings of His Messianic consciousness to manifest Himself to the Passover crowds in His connexion with His country as its Redeemer, with the Temple as the Son of God and its Priest, and with the world as its King. It was on His return from the desert that He was pointed out by the Baptist, when the marks of the recent struggle and fasting on His brow would have given additional point to the Baptist's remark, 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 1<sup>29</sup>), which has a true Passover ring (cf. 'Christ our passover [or Paschal lamb, τὸ πάσχα] was sacrificed for us,' 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>). Passover time would also account for the presence of so many Galileans in Judaea, while the atmosphere of the scenes of the baptism of Jesus and of His interviews with His first disciples in Jn 1 is spring, the budding life of the year, in the buoyant sunshine when men's hearts are most ready for a change of life. Nathanael, an Israelite without the guile of Jacob, at the feast exclusively for Israelites, is meditating under a fig tree, most likely on the story of Jacob. Passover seems a favourite time for baptism. It was after the Passover of Jn 2<sup>13</sup> that Jesus and His disciples baptized in Judaea, while John was baptizing in Aenon near to Salim (Jn 3<sup>23</sup>). And it is most improbable that Jesus would have stayed away from the Passover.

On the other side may be urged the fact that Bethabara, for which the best MSS. read 'Bethany,' has been identified by Conder with a ford called 'Abrah, N.E. of Bethshean, a site as near to Cana as any point on the Jordan, and within a day's journey' (art. 'Bethany' in Hastings' DB). On the other hand, Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Bethany' follows Sir G. Grove and Sir C. W. Wilson (Smith's DB, s.v. 'Bethnimrah') in holding that on the east of Jordan, opposite to Jericho, is the place meant. Beth-nimrah, now known as Yimrith, is 'beyond Jordan,' τῆς ἐξ ἰσραήλου (Jn 1<sup>28</sup> 29); it is well supplied with water, and accessible both from Jericho and Jerusalem, and may have produced the variants 'Bethabara' and 'Bethany.' Origen advocated Bethabara because he could find no Bethany beyond Jordan. But the variant Βεθαβαρα for Βεθανυα is found in his text. That variant and the traditional site of our Lord's baptism, Makhadet Hayita, are strongly against Col. Conder's suggestion, while tradition connects our Lord's temptation with the district of Quarantania, named from His 40 days' fast; and something must be allowed for tradition in such matters. 'The third day' of Jn 2<sup>13</sup> may possibly be counted from Jn 1<sup>29</sup> 'On the day after.' But it is probable, in fact it is to be inferred from His mother's information of the exhausted wine, that our Lord was not present on the first day of the marriage festivities, which generally extended over a week, and were concluded with a supper (art. 'Marriage' in Hastings' DB), and it was quite possible for Him and His disciples to have accomplished the journey from the vicinity of Jericho to Nazareth (about 60 miles) in three or four days; so that there is no necessity to select a site for His baptism within one day's journey of Cana. Again the favourite time for such marriages was March (Wetzstein in Zischr. f. Ethnol. v. (1873)). So that we have another indication of the early season of the year, which supports the hypothesis of a baptism at the Passover preceding the Passover of Jn 2<sup>13</sup>, a period of time required for the preparation and selection of the disciples, and for the nursing of their nascent faith by miracles, of which one, a typical sign, as are all the seven signs in the Fourth Gospel, is narrated in Jn 2<sup>1-12</sup>. To this faith reference is made in v. 13 'And his disciples believed in him.' Nor does the Master's change of manner (v. 24 'But Jesus would not trust himself to them') suggest the beginning of a mission.

The order in St. Mark's Gospel is of little service here. For Mk 1<sup>14</sup> ('Now after that John was put in prison Jesus came into Galilee preaching') refers to an event, the imprisonment of the Baptist, which was clearly later than Jn 4<sup>1</sup>, and is, therefore, to be taken not as a note of time, but as a general introduction to the Galilean ministry, which forms the subject of the Second Gospel. The selection of the disciples (Mk 1<sup>16-20</sup>), the missionary work of Mk 1<sup>28</sup> Ἐρχομαι εἰς τὰς πόλεις κωμωπόλει, a portion of Mk 1-3, and apparently Lk 5<sup>1-11</sup> (the scene with Peter on the lake), may belong to the Galilean work previous to Jn 2<sup>13</sup>. On this hypothesis, which fills in the awkward gap between the 13th and 14th verses of Mk 1, the baptism of Jesus would fall on the Passover of A.D. 27.

3. Length of the Ministry.—If the date of the beginning of the ministry be approximately fixed, the year of its close will vary according to the estimate we form of its length. Prof. von Soden (Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Chronology') reduces it to a one-year basis, while Prof. Sanday (art. 'Jesus Christ' in Hastings' DB ii. 610) requires nearly 2½ years for his scheme of our Lord's ministry. This difference is due to the fact that St. John seems to extend that ministry over three Passovers, while the Synoptists mention but one Passover.

(a) In the Second Gospel there seem to be three data for a chronology. (1) Mk 2<sup>23</sup> mentions ears of corn (τῶν ἀλωνῶν τῶν σπείρουσιν). As the earliest barley was in April, the latest in June, it is believed that the point of time we have here is Passover, which was of old associated with 'ears of corn'; the name of the month in which it was held being formerly Ἀβὶβ ἡρῶ or 'ear of corn.' (2) Mk 6<sup>4</sup> describes the miracle of the feeding of the 5000, in the course of which we read that the people were arranged in companies, πρῶται πρῶται (a phrase suggestive of garden-plots), and seated ἐπὶ τῷ χλωρῷ χόρῳ, an indication of early spring. (3) Mk 11, final Passover. In these data Turner ('Chronology of NT' in Hastings' DB) sees a suggestion of a two years' ministry. But it is evident that the arrangement of this Gospel is according to subject-matter, not to time. The time relation of the episode of the ears of corn cannot be satisfactorily settled with regard either to the events it precedes or those it follows in the narrative. It is, therefore, quite possible that it preceded the Passover of Jn 2<sup>13</sup>. In St. Luke's Gospel it occurs shortly after the scene with St. Peter on the Lake (Lk 5<sup>1-11</sup>), which must have preceded Jn 3<sup>2</sup>, where Jesus and His disciples go into the land of Judaea and continue baptizing there; and in both the Second and Third Gospels it directly follows the question, 'Why do the disciples of John and of the Pharisees fast, and thy disciples fast not?', which occasioned the Parable of the Bridegroom and the Children of the Bridechamber, which seemingly but not really corresponds with the discussion in Jn 3<sup>28</sup> between the disciples of John and a Jew about 'purifying,' which evoked from the Baptist the rhapsody on the bride and bridegroom. For the questions are quite different, and belong to distinctly different contexts; that in the Synoptists being caused by the feast of Levi and perhaps indirectly by the feast at Cana of Galilee, while that of the Fourth Gospel arose in connexion with the work in Judaea after the Passover of Jn 2<sup>13</sup>.

No fresh light is thrown on the passage by the disputed point of time ἐν σαββάτῳ δευτεροπρωτῆς, which Wetzstein explains as the first Sabbath of the second month, Scaliger as the first Sabbath after the Feast of Unleavened Bread, Godet as the first Sabbath of the ecclesiastical year. The ripeness of the wheat suggests the month of Iyyar or May. And it is quite possible to conceive our Lord in that month (called in the old style Ziv (v) or the 'month of flowers,' and in the new style Iyyar (vii) or 'the bright and flowering month'), teaching the people in the plain and on the hill to 'consider the lilies of the field, how they grow' (Mt 6<sup>28</sup>). It seems not impossible, therefore, to reconstruct the Second Gospel on the basis of a single year following the Passover of Jn 2<sup>13</sup>, with a year or greater part of a year previous to that Passover. (b) St. Luke's Gospel is divisible into two parts. The second (9<sup>20</sup>-19<sup>28</sup>) containing matter peculiar to him, being devoted to the doings and teachings of the Master as the days of His assumption were being fulfilled (9<sup>21</sup>), seems to restrict the Lord's ministry to a single year, 'the acceptable year of the Lord' (4<sup>18</sup>; cf. Is 61<sup>1</sup>). The reference to 'three years' in the parable of the Fig-tree (13'), which suggested to many (Bengel among others) the beginning of a third year of ministry, is a vague expression to which 13<sup>22</sup> ('to-day and to-morrow, and on the third day') might be a parallel. In 4<sup>14-29</sup> there is but one apparent reference to any work outside the Galilee, Ἰουδαίας (NBCL) of 4<sup>14</sup> being a variant for Γαλιλαίας. But 'Judaea' in the days of St. Luke included all Palestine (cf. 23').

(c) The Fourth Gospel has seven notes of time between the Baptism and the Crucifixion:

- (1) 2<sup>13-22</sup> 'And the Jews' passover was at hand, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem . . . And he was in Jerusalem at the passover during the feast.'
- (2) 4<sup>35</sup> 'Say ye not, There are yet four months (τετράμηνος), and then cometh harvest? behold, I say unto you, Lift up your eyes, and consider (θεωρεῖτε) the fields that they are white already to harvest.'
- (3) 5<sup>1</sup> 'After these things there was a [or the] feast of the Jews, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem.'
- (4) 6<sup>4</sup> 'Now [the passover, ἡ πάσχα, uncertain] the feast of the Jews was nigh.'
- (5) 7<sup>2</sup> 'Now the Jews' feast of tabernacles was at hand.'
- (6) 10<sup>22</sup> 'Then the dedication took place in Jerusalem.'
- (7) 13<sup>1</sup> 'Jesus then, six days before the passover, came to Bethany.'

Jn 4<sup>35</sup> (α) οὐχ ὄψεσθε λέγετε ἑνὶ ἐτι τετράμηνος ἔσται καὶ ὁ θερισμὸς ἔρχεται; (β) ἰδοὺ, λέγω ὑμῖν . . . ἐτι λευκαὶ εἰσὶν πρὸς θερισμὸν, is a difficult note of time. The simplest interpretation is to take a literally of a harvest still remote, and β spiritually of a harvest already ripening. Origen, however, held that it was already the middle or end of harvest when these things happened (in Joan. tom. xiii. 39, 41); but it is evident that our Lord made no long delay in Judaea after His disciples and John's, and it would not be long before the popular Baptist, with his great following, would hear of his greater Rival (Jn 3<sup>25</sup>), or before the Pharisees would note the falling off of the Baptist's followers. The fact that the impression His works in Jerusalem had made on the Galileans was still fresh (Jn 4<sup>45</sup>), and that He did not tarry more than two days, possibly only one (μερὰ ἓν ἦν ἐκεῖ ἡμέρας, Jn 4<sup>45</sup>), among the kindly and believing Samaritans, and that He was wearied with the journey (4<sup>6</sup>), points to no long interval between 2<sup>13</sup> and 4<sup>35</sup> and to no leisurely mode of travelling. Again, the word ἐτι has a touch of reality, which suggests the natural interpretation of τετράμηνος against those who would read the passage proverbially: 'Is it not a saying that there are four months between sowing and reaping?' There is nothing, however, to prevent one taking the lateness of the Galilean harvest into account, and reading the passage thus: 'Say ye not, ye men of Galilee, where the harvest is later than in Judaea, where Jeroboam held his feast of ingathering on the 15th day of the eighth month (1 K 12<sup>25</sup>) instead of on the 15th day of the seventh (Lv 23<sup>24</sup>), that harvest is yet four months off?' If these words were spoken towards the end of Nisan, the four months referred to would be Nisan (March-April, end), Iyyar (April-May), Sivan (May-June), and Thammuz (June-July, beginning). This would be in keeping with the fact that the harvest naturally varied not only with season, but also with elevation, etc., and that, while it commenced in the lowlands of the Jordan Valley in April, it ended on sub-alpine Lebanon in August (see art. 'Wheat' in Hastings' DB).

Jn 5<sup>1</sup> 'And there was a feast of the Jews, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem' (with alternative readings, ἑορτῆ and ἡ ἑορτῆ, the latter being supported by the Alexandrian type of text, doubtless through the influence of Eusebius, who maintained a three years' ministry with four Passovers). What this feast was cannot definitely be said. Irenæus regarded it as a Passover. The early Greek Church identified it with Pentecost. Westcott (ad loc.) suggests Trumpets (September), as 'many of the main thoughts of the discourse—Creation, Judgment, and Law—find a remarkable illustration in the thoughts of the festival.' But Ex 19<sup>1</sup> states that it was in the third month (i.e. after Passover) that the Law was given on Sinai. This would correspond with Pentecost, which is described in the later Jewish liturgy as 'the day of the giving of the Law' (Saalschütz, Das Mos. Recht, p. 42a), and by Maimonides (Moreh neb. ih. 41) as dies ille quo lex data fuit. Furthermore, the strict regulations and calculations of the Sabbaths of the harvest period between Nisan 16 and Pentecost, the Feast of Weeks, add point to the controversy concerning the Sabbath day (Jn 5<sup>10-18</sup>). The voluntary nature of the cure, a contrast with the signs of 2<sup>1</sup> and 4<sup>34</sup> performed by request, suggests that this act was in accordance with the Pentecostal regulations of Dt 16<sup>19</sup>, a free-will offering of His own hand, and according to Lv 23<sup>22</sup> the gleanings of His harvest for the poor.

There is a useful indication of time in Jn 5<sup>35-36</sup>, where the Baptist, whose popularity is waning in 4<sup>1</sup>, and whose utterance in 3<sup>25-26</sup> seems to contain a presentiment of doom—'He must increase, but I must decrease'—is referred to as a lamp that no longer shines. 'He was the burning and shining lamp, and ye were willing for a time to rejoice in his light.' It is probable that Herod Antipas, who was jealous and suspicious of the Baptist's influence (Ant. xviii. v. 1), seized the opportunity of his decreasing popularity to have him betrayed (παράδοθῆναι, Mk 1<sup>14</sup>) and arrested. The report of that arrest may have reached our Lord on His journey through Samaria to Galilee (Jn 4). If so, the Synoptic statements of Mk 1<sup>4</sup>, Mt 4<sup>12</sup>, regarding His work in Galilee as connected with the imprisonment of the Baptist would be suitably introduced by the healing of the nobleman's son at Capernaum (Jn 4<sup>46-54</sup>).

The interval allowed by the Synoptists between the arrest and the death of the Baptist, in which room is found for an extended work of Jesus in Galilee (Capernaum especially, Mt 11<sup>20-24</sup>), for the Baptist's mission to Jesus (11<sup>2</sup>), and for Herod's procrastination with the Baptist, whom he feared, tried to keep safe, and for whom he did many things (Mk 6<sup>20</sup>), is also allowed in the Fourth Gospel. In it Jesus is represented as walking in Galilee (7<sup>1-29</sup>) before the Feast of Tabernacles, nearly five months (Sivan 8-Tishri 15) after the Feast of Pentecost (5<sup>1</sup>), but not afterwards,—a fact which is in agreement with the Synoptic account (Lk 9<sup>10</sup>, Mt 14<sup>13</sup>, Mk 6<sup>21</sup>), which describes our Lord withdrawing from the jurisdiction of Herod Antipas to Bethsaida Julius, Caesarea Philippi, and other districts of Herod Philip—the best of all the Herods—in consequence of the former's identification of Him with the Baptist, whom he had beheaded (Mk 6<sup>14</sup>).

With regard to the date of the Baptist's execution, Keim, Hausrath, Schenkel, and others, on the strength of Josephus' account of the defeat of Antipas by Aretas (A.D. 36), in connexion with his narrative of the Baptist's death, which the Jews regarded as divinely avenged in that battle, have held that the divorce of Herod Antipas' wife cannot have been long before A.D. 36. But Josephus notes also a dispute about boundaries in Gamalitis (Ant. xviii. v. 1) as subsequent to the divorce of the daughter of Aretas, which he describes as 'the first occasion' of the bitterness between him and Herod. And there is nothing in the annals of the Herods to controvert the date A.D. 28 for the scene in the castle of Machærus as described in the Synoptics. In fact, A.D. 28 would be a more suitable date for the elopement of Herodias, and the description of her daughter Salome as τὸ κοπάσιον (Mk 6<sup>22-28</sup>), than A.D. 36. Herodias was the sister of Agrippa I, who (Ant. XIX. viii. 2) was 54 years old when he died in A.D. 44, and was, therefore, born B.C. 10. Herodias must have been born shortly before or after, as she was betrothed by Herod the Great (Ant. XVIII. i. 2), after the death of her father Aristobulus (B.C. 7), when quite a child, to Philip his son by Mariamne II, daughter of Simon the high priest, whom he married in the 13th year of his reign, c. B.C. 24 (Ant. XV. ix. 3). Herodias would, therefore, be about 37 years old, and her husband 52 in A.D. 23, and her daughter Salome not more than 18, as Herodias was married 'when arrived at age of puberty' (Ant. XVIII. v. 4). In A.D. 36 she would be 45 years of age, and Salome 26. The former age is, therefore, more probable. The fact that retribution was connected with the defeat in A.D. 36 proves nothing, as retribution is proverbially long delayed.

- 4. The fourth point of time is Jn 6<sup>4</sup>. The difficulty in it is the reading τὸ πάσχα. By many it is retained; by others omitted. If it is retained, there are three Passovers mentioned in Jn. (2<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>4</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>), making the ministry extend over two years. But if it is removed, this feast of the Jews becomes identified with the Feast of Tabernacles of 7<sup>2</sup>. And the chronology of the ministry can be reckoned on the basis of a year and several months previous.

10<sup>2</sup>. Dedication in Chislew (November-December).

11<sup>5</sup>. Passover in Nisan (March-April).

Hort urges the omission of τὸ πάσχα, which is supported (1) by documentary evidence; (2) by the fact that τὸ πάσχα of Jn 6<sup>4</sup> apparently = τὸ πάσχα of Mk 6<sup>22</sup>; (3) by the note (Jn 7<sup>1</sup>), 'After these things Jesus walked (περιεπατήσεν) in Galilee,' which implies some interval between the events of chs. 6 and 7, but on the Tabernacles hypothesis sufficient time would not be allowed, as the same feast was 'near' in 6<sup>4</sup> and in 7<sup>2</sup>; and (4) it is said that St. John, who was writing for Christians who had holy associations with Passover and Pentecost but not with Tabernacles, would hardly have spoken of that feast as 'the Feast' (see 16<sup>21</sup>). On the other hand, it is more than probable (1) that Irenaeus would have mentioned 6<sup>4</sup> among the Passovers, if he knew of it, even though ostensibly he was merely recording the Passovers at which our Lord went up to Jerusalem, as his main object was to confute the Gnostics, who held that Jesus suffered a year after His baptism (Her. II. 22. 3); (2) that τὸ πάσχα is a vague term allowing for comparative nearness, and our Lord did not hurry Himself for the feast, arriving only in the middle of it (7<sup>14</sup>); (3) that Origen's Comm. on St. John clearly postulates the omission of a Passover between 6<sup>2</sup> and 7<sup>2</sup>; (4) that St. John wrote as one familiar with Jewish feasts and feasts, and Josephus (Ant. VIII. iv. 1) calls the Feast of Tabernacles ἐπέτειον τῶν σκηνῶν καὶ τῶν ἑσθίων ἐπιπέτειον καὶ ἑσθίων, and it is in OG sometimes called 'the Feast' (1 K 8<sup>2,5</sup>, Ezk 43<sup>2</sup>); (5) that the tradition of the Gnostics might have been more easily confuted by Irenaeus by a reference to a Passover in Jn 6<sup>4</sup> than by an attempt to identify the feast of 5<sup>1</sup> with a Passover; (6) that the Alogi, according to Epiphanius (Her. 51. 22), found in Jn. only a Passover at the beginning and another at the end of His ministry; (7) that the words τὸ πάσχα might have easily been suggested by the discourse on the sacrificial feast and the 'barley' loaves (ἀρτους ἀβύσσου), which, however, has a nearer reference to the offerings (two leavened loaves of the best wheat, etc.) and customs of Pentecost, which was distinguished by thank-offerings (7<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>-ἀρτοποιήσασθε) and festive gatherings for the poor (Ev. 24<sup>2</sup>); (8) that the insertion of a Passover here would break the unity of the plot and interfere with the development of the drama from Jn 2<sup>13</sup> to 12<sup>1</sup>, creating a gap between chs. 4 and 6 out of all proportion to the other intervals in the Gospel after Jn 2<sup>13</sup>. These reasons are not conclusive, but they are sufficient to prove the possibility of τὸ πάσχα being an early gloss on 6<sup>4</sup>.

The interval between the Feast of Tabernacles (Tishri, A.D. 28) and the Passover (14 Nisan, A.D. 29) is sufficiently ample to allow for the work in the towns of Caesarea Philippi (Mk 8<sup>27</sup>), the preparation of the disciples for His death (Lk 9<sup>22</sup> = Mk 8<sup>31</sup>), His Transfiguration six days after (Mt 17<sup>1-8</sup>). His slow progress to Jerusalem, preceded by the Seventy (Lk 10<sup>1</sup>), 'when the days were well-nigh come that He should be received up' (Lk 9<sup>51</sup>), the visit to Jerusalem at the Feast of Dedication (Jn 10<sup>22</sup>), His work in the Peraea (Jn 10<sup>46</sup>, Mk 10<sup>1</sup>), and in the wilderness of Judaea (Jn 11<sup>19</sup>). A ministry from Passover A.D. 27, when He was baptized, to Passover A.D. 29, is quite long enough to allow for the development of the life of the Master, and for the many journeys and missionary tours in a district as small as Wales, and where the festivals at the capital were so frequent. The details would be distinctly meagre for a longer mission.

3. Date of the Crucifixion.—The procuratorship of Pontius Pilate and the high priesthood of Caiaphas roughly indicate the date. Josephus (Ant. XVIII. ii. 2) notes the appointment of Valerius Gratus by Tiberius (c. A.D. 14-15), his return to Rome after 11 years (c. A.D. 25-26), and the appointment of Pilate in his place. In Ant. XVIII. iv. 2 we read that 'Pilate when he had tarried 10 years in Judaea, made haste to Rome; but before he could reach Rome, Tiberius died' (A.D. 37). His office might be, therefore, dated A.D. 26-36. Pilate at the trial of Jesus seems to have already had trouble with the Jews and Galileans and Herod. His yielding to them in the present instance through fear of their accusing him to Tiberius, and his release of 'a notable prisoner' (ὁ ἄριστος ἐρμηνεύς, Mt 27<sup>14</sup>), 'who for a certain insurrection made in the city and for murder' (Lk 23<sup>19</sup>) 'was lying bound with them that had made insurrection' (Mk 15<sup>7</sup>), imply at least part of the 10 years of cross purposes which marked Pilate's rule, but need not be ascribed to the tenure received from Tiberius, c. A.D. 33, on account of the vote shields (Philo, Legat. ad Caesarem, § 38), as he had in his very first year of office experienced the inflexibility of the Jews (Ant. XVIII. iii. 1). A Passover earlier than that of A.D. 28 would hardly suit.

The high priesthood of Annas, referred to in Jn 11<sup>49</sup> 18<sup>24</sup>, is a terminus ad quem of the Crucifixion, his deposition occurring about the same time as the death of Philip's death. It is assigned by Josephus (Ant. XVIII. iv. 3, 6) to the 20th year of Tiberius. The latest possible date of the Crucifixion would thus be A.D. 34, the earliest A.D. 26.

As it is hard to believe that such an event would not be exactly chronicled by the Church, it is quite possible to regard Lk 3<sup>1</sup>—'in the fifteenth year of the Lord'—as an indication of the 'acceptable year of the Lord' which terminated on the cross, whether with Bratke (SK, 1892) we regard that acceptable year as terminating in the 15th, or with von Soden (Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Chronology') in the 16th of Tiberius. A well-known tradition of the Church assigns the Crucifixion to the consulship of the Gemini, L. Rubellius and C. Rufius, A.D. 29, which year, according to the strict method of computation from Aug. A.D. 14, would correspond with Tiberius 15, but, counting as a year the semester Aug. A.D. 14-Jan. A.D. 15, when the consuls dated their term of office, would be Tiberius 16.

Among Patristic authorities for the year of the Crucifixion the following are chief—Clement of Alexandria: 'With the 15th year of Tiberius and 15th of Augustus so are completed the 30 years to the Passion' (Strom. i. 147). Origen: 'If you examine the chronology of the Passion and of the fall of Jerusalem . . . from Tiberius 15 to the raising of the temple are 42 years' (Hom. in Hebraeos, xix. 18). Tertullian: 'In the 15th year of the reign Christ suffered . . . in the consulship of Rubellius Geminus and Rufius Geminus' (adv. Jud. 8, but authorship doubtful); and Hippolytus, who in his work on Daniel stated: 'Our Lord was born on Wednesday, Dec. 25, in the 42nd year of the reign of Augustus. . . . He suffered in the 33rd year, on Friday, March 25, in the 15th year of Tiberius, and the consulship of Rufus and Rubellio,' evidently attempting to combine a three years' ministry with Lk 3<sup>1</sup>. In his Chronicle the length of our Lord's life is estimated at 39 years. Dr. Salmon in Herodotus, No. xviii, suggests that Hippolytus altered the chronology of the latter work in A.D. 234, on discovering that St. John's chronology was incompatible with a one year's ministry. In the tables of Hippolytus the Passion is assigned to the 32nd year of the cycle, which, reckoning back by cycles of 112 years from A. D. 22, the first year of the cycle, is A. D. 29, which may have been suggested by the consulship of the Gemini, whose names he gives erroneously with or after the Acta of Pilate as Rufus and Rubellio. Other authorities who may be cited are Julius Africanus, who seems to hover between Tiberius 16 (in the Greek of Eusebius, Dem. Zeugis), and Tiberius 15 (Latin of Jerome's Com. in Dan. ix.); Lactantius, who wrote: 'In the 15th year of Tiberius, that is, in the consulship of the Gemini' (Div. Inst. vi. x. 13); the Libertian Chronicle, which has, 'Under Tiberius, the two Gemini consuls, March 25'; and Augustine (de Civ. Dei, xviii. 54): 'Consuls the Gemini, March 25'. A. D. 29 is therefore well supported by Christian tradition. The note of the annalist Phlegon, referred to by Origen (de Cels. ii. 38), and the Chronicle of Eusebius (under Cl. 222, 4 = A. D. 29-33), which mentions the earthquake in Bithynia and the darkness at the sixth hour of the day, obviously comes from some unreliable Christian source.

(a) Day of week and month.—Some indications of the day of the week are found in Scripture. The general belief that the Crucifixion took place on Friday is founded on inference from the fact that He rose 'on the third day,' τῆ τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ (1 Co 15<sup>4</sup>), the Jews counting their days inclusively. Westcott, however, held that it took place on a Thursday, on account of the 'three days and three nights' of Mt 12<sup>40</sup>, a saying found only there, and evidently equivalent to 'on the third day' (Gn 42<sup>17, 18</sup>, Est 4<sup>16</sup> and 5<sup>1</sup>).

(b) Day of month.—The question is, Did the Crucifixion take place on the Passover, Nisan 15, or on the day preceding, Nisan 14? This question also concerns the relation of the Passover to the Last Supper; for while, strictly speaking, both events took place on the same day, on the Jewish reckoning from evening to evening, according to the ordinary Roman method the Crucifixion fell a day later than the Supper. Sanday (Authorship and Historical Character of the Fourth Gospel), Westcott (Introduction to the Gospels), and many others maintain that it took place on Nisan 14. The principal champion for Nisan 15 is Edersheim, who holds that the Last Supper synchronized with the Passover, and that the Pascha of which the Jews desired to partake was the Chagigah or festive offering of the first festive Paschal day. The Synoptists in some places identify the last meal with the Passover, but in others give indications of an opposite view; while the Fourth Gospel gives unqualified support to the opinion that the feast of which our Lord partook had a quasi-Paschal significance, and preceded in order to supersede the Jewish Passover. A list of passages from the Gospels for both views makes this clear:

- For Nisan 15, the Passover—*
 Mt 26<sup>17</sup> 'The first day of the feast of unleavened bread the disciples came to Jesus, saying unto him, Where wilt thou that we prepare for thee to eat the Passover?'
 Lk 22<sup>7</sup> 'Then came the day of unleavened bread, when the Passover must be killed.'
 Mk 14<sup>12</sup> 'And the first day of unleavened bread, when they killed the Passover.'
 Lk 22<sup>8</sup> 'With desire I have desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer.'
For Nisan 14—
 Jn 13<sup>1</sup> 'Now before the feast of the Passover.'
 Jn 13<sup>28</sup> 'And they themselves went not into the pratorium, lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the Passover.'
 Jn 13<sup>29</sup> 'Buy that we have need of for the feast.'
 Jn 13<sup>34</sup> 'And it was the preparation of the Passover.'
 Jn 19<sup>31</sup> 'Since it was the preparation, and that Sabbath day was a high day.'
 Mt 26<sup>24</sup> 'Then assembled together the chief priests . . . and consulted that they might take Jesus by subtlety and kill him. But they said, Not on the feast day, lest there be an uproar among the people' (cf. Mt 14<sup>2</sup>).
 Mt 27<sup>62</sup> 'Now the next day, that followed the day of the preparation.'
 Lk 23<sup>54</sup> 'And that day was the preparation, and the Sabbath drew on.'

Other incidents in the Synoptics point to Nisan 14, such as the holding of the trial on the feast-day, the purchase of linen and spices, the arming of Peter, the coming of Simon 'from the field' (Mk 15<sup>21</sup>), the unseemly hurry with the trial, the execution and the final dispatch of the victims, the sword of Peter (14<sup>27</sup>), the armed multitude with Judas (14<sup>40</sup>), it being unlawful to carry arms on the feast day. It is to be noticed that Mt., Mk., and Jn. represent the Crucifixion as taking place on the Paraskeue, which is distinctly Friday in Jn 19<sup>14</sup>, being mentioned in connexion with the Sabbath, and in Mk 15<sup>42</sup>, where it is defined as παρασκευή. St. John in 19<sup>14</sup> describes it as 'the preparation of the passover,' but as the weekly Paraskeue in 19<sup>31</sup>, and 19<sup>42</sup> referring to the removal from the cross and the hasty entombment says 'for it was the preparation' and 'because of (δὴ = because it was) the preparation of the Jews.'

Against all these passages there stands one expression common to all the Synoptists, 'the day of unleavened bread,' for Lk 22<sup>16</sup> may merely indicate the Paschal nature of the Last Supper. That expression is, therefore, to be reckoned with.

Chwolson (Das letzte Passamahli Christi, p. 31.) maintains that the Synoptists start with an error, for 'from the Mosaic writings down to the Book of Jubilees . . . indeed, down to the present day, the Jews have always understood by the phrase "the first day of the feast of unleavened bread," only the 15th and not the 14th, so that it would be a contradiction in terms to say with Mk 14<sup>12</sup>, "on the first day of unleavened bread when they sacrificed the Passover." Ewald (Antiquities of Israel, p. 328-2) treats the Passover, which he shows from Ex 12<sup>14</sup> was originally fixed for the 10th of the month when the Paschal lamb was to be selected, as the preparatory expiatory festival of the Spring Feast of Unleavened Bread, just as the Day of Atonement, on the 10th day of the 7th month, preceded the great autumn festival of Tabernacles. 'Not till the 14th day, during the last three hours before and the first three hours after sunset, was the sacrificial animal slain and eaten. . . . It was always appointed for the 14th, and in the earliest times at least the view was strictly upheld that the Feast of Unleavened Bread did not begin till the following morning.' Philo distinguished the crux of Nisan 14 from the crux of Nisan 15-21. Mk 14<sup>12</sup> unites without confusing them. τῆ δὲ τοῦ ἁγίου καὶ τοῦ ἁγίου πατρὸς τοῦ ἁγίου.

It would seem that some technical error was committed by the Synoptists, which may have been due to (1) St. Peter's inexact knowledge of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, and probable identification of it with the removal of leaven before noon on Nisan 14 (Ex 12<sup>15</sup>); (2) the custom of the Galileans, who, unlike the people of Judea, who worked until the noon preceding, abstained from work the whole morning preceding the Passover, which was reckoned from evening to evening, and consequently would make their preparations after sunset on Nisan 13 (Students' Com. on Mt 26<sup>17</sup>); (3) some verbal confusion between the Syriac words for 'before' (kedām, Mt 8<sup>29</sup>) and 'first' (ἀρτιπρωτῆ, Mt 26<sup>19</sup>) owing to Peter's broad Galilean accent, which may have caused St. Mark's mistake; (4) a comparative use of Gr. πρωτος (cf. Jn 1<sup>15</sup> πρωτος μου, 'before me'; 15<sup>18</sup> εμπρωτος υμων, 'before you'), in which case Mt 26<sup>17</sup> would mean 'on the day before the Feast of Unleavened Bread'; (5) a difference in the mode of reckoning the days adopted by St. John, who, according to Westcott (Jn 19<sup>14</sup>), used the Western method of counting from midnight to noon, and by St. Mark, who adhered to the legal reckoning from evening to evening (Mk 15<sup>42</sup>); (6) a natural confusion of the preparation of the Passover (Jn 19<sup>14</sup>) on Nisan 13 with the weekly Paraskeue on Nisan 14 (Mk 15<sup>42</sup>), or of the day when leaven was removed from the houses (Ex 12<sup>15</sup> [LXX ἀπὸ τῆς ἡμέρας τῆς πρώτης]) with the Festival of Mazzoth, which commenced after the Passover day. The argument that the expression 'not on the feast' (οὐκ ἐν τῇ ἑορτῇ, Mt 26<sup>19</sup>) cannot refer to Passover has to reckon with Ex 12<sup>14</sup>, where the Passover is called 'feast' (ἑορτή, LXX).

Support for Nisan 14 as day of Crucifixion in NT and tradition (Christian and Jewish).—(1) 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup> τὸ πρῶτον ἡμῶν ἐστὶν Χριστός, identifies Christ with the Paschal lamb slain between 'the two evenings'; and 1 Co 15<sup>20</sup> identifies the Risen Christ with the First-fruits of the 2nd day of the Feast of Mazzoth, ἀραρχὴ τῶν κεκοιμημένων. decimans, among whom was Polycarp, held a fast on Nisan 14 as the day of Crucifixion (letter of Irenaeus to Victor). (3) Jewish tradition fixes the Crucifixion on the 'erebh Pesah or Passover eve, and the Greek Church always used leavened bread in the Eucharist. (4) Apollinaris of Hierapolis (c. A.D. 180) pointed out that the 14th is connected with the Crucifixion. (5) Clement of Alexandria said that Christ did not eat the Passover, but suffered on the 14th. (6) Hippolytus of Portus declared that Christ ate a supper before the Passover, 'for He was the Paschal lamb who had been promised and was sanctified on the appointed day.' (7) Tertullian (adv. Jud. 8—a doubtful work) suggests Nisan 14. (8) Irenaeus (Har. iv. x. 1), discussing Moses' prediction of Jesus, says, 'The day of whose Passion he did not ignore, but foretold it in a figure, calling it Pascha.' This is not very decisive, but suggests a memory of 1 Co 5'. This view of Nisan 14 may be said to be the best supported in the first two centuries.

Tradition in support of Nisan 15.—Origen, in his comment on Mt 26<sup>7</sup>, follows the Synoptic tradition: 'Jesus celebravit more Judaico pascha corporali.' Chrysostom declares (Hom. in Mt. 82) that the new feast appointed by Jesus superseded the Passover. Ambrose, Proterius and others follow on the same side. This view seems more recently popular than the other. But the controversy of Apollinaris in repl. rot. d'Arca logos shows that there were some in the 2nd cent. who connected Nisan 14 with the Supper, and therefore Nisan 15 (according to Roman reckoning) with the Crucifixion.

The cumulative evidence of St. John, St. Paul, and the early Fathers, joined with the incredibility of Jesus having been arrested, tried, and executed on the great Sabbath of the Jewish Year, and the statement of the Synoptists that that day was the Paraskeue, seem to turn the scale in favour of Nisan 14 as the day of the Crucifixion. See also Last Supper. Nisan 14, A.D. 29, is the date to be now tested by other evidence.

Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 147) notes the various views of the Basilidians. 'With regard to the Passion, some, after precise calculations, say it took place in the 16th year of Tiberius on Phamenoth 25 (March 21); others on Pharmuthi 25 (April 20); others, again, on Pharmuthi 29 (April 24). March 18 and March 25, however, are the best supported. Epiphanius (Har. i. 1) had seen copies of the Acts of Pilate which gave March 18 as the date, but the Quartodecimans kept March 25 on the strength of these Acts; this is evidence of some hesitation between these dates. Hippolytus (Com. on Dan.) gives March 25. With regard to this date, also given in the Paschal Cycle, Dr. Salmon says (Hermathena, No. xviii. p. 175): 'We can therefore regard the date March 25 as inseparably connected with the sixteen years' cycle of Hippolytus.' As the Easter full moon was on March 26 in A.D. 221, and, working on the principle that after 16 years full moons return to the same day, Hippolytus trusted his cycle that it must have been on the same day in A.D. 29. But, as Dr. Salmon shows, in that year the full moon really fell on March 18, a week previous.

An interesting confirmation of the date March 18 is given by the Jewish calendar of Paschal moons, from which it would appear that Friday, which is generally accepted as the day of the Crucifixion, could not have fallen on Nisan 14 or 15 in the years A.D. 28, 31, 32, so that we are left to choose between 29, 30, 33, and of these A.D. 29 answers all the required conditions best, as the 14th day of the moon would fall in that year on Friday, March 18 (so C. H. Turner, 'Chronology' in Hastings' DB).

Dr. Salmon, in the article cited, said it was doubtful if Hippolytus had any historical authority for fixing on the year 29 over and above the reason 'that the day which his cycle exhibited as the Crucifixion Day should be a Friday,' and that 'the only years he would find fulfilling this condition were 26, 29, 32, and of these 29 is chronologically the most probable.' Baron H. von Soden prefers A.D. 30, in which Nisan 15 would fall on Friday April 7, and opposes A.D. 29 on the ground that Nisan 15 fell on April 16 in that year. But the previous lunation, March 4-5, with 14th on March 18, would be more in keeping with the ripening of the barley harvest, and would have a prior claim.

The following table of dates is based on the arguments in the preceding pages, the years, months, and days especially, in each case, being offered as merely approximate.

TABLE OF DATES OF EVENTS IN THE GOSPELS.

Herod's reign . . . . .	c. 37-4.
Restoration of temple commenced . . . . .	c. 19-18.
Star in the east . . . . .	c. 7-5.
Courses of Abia in temple . . . . .	c. 6, April 18-24, Oct. 3-6.
Conception of Elisabeth . . . . .	c. 6, Oct. [or April (25)].
Annunciation (6 months after) . . . . .	c. 5, March (25) [or Sept. (19)].
Birth of Baptist . . . . .	c. 5, June (24) [or c. 5, Jan. 1].
Birth of the Christ at Bethlehem during an enrolment . . . . .	c. 5, Dec. (25) [or c. 5, June].
Circumcision . . . . .	c. 4, Jan. (1).
Visit of Magi . . . . .	c. 4, Jan. (3 circa ).
Presentation in temple 40 days after Nativity . . . . .	c. 4, Feb. (2 circa ).
Herod plans massacre . . . . .	c. 4, Feb.
Flight into Egypt, apparently from Jerusalem . . . . .	c. 4, Feb.
Death of Herod . . . . .	c. 4, March (before Passover).
Archelaus ethnarch of Judaea . . . . .	c. 4-A.D. 6.
Herod Antipas tetrarch of Galilee . . . . .	c. 4-A.D. 37.
Return of Holy Family to Nazareth . . . . .	c. 3.
The child Jesus in temple (12 years old) . . . . .	A.D. 7.
Annas high priest . . . . .	A.D. 7-15.
Calaphas high priest . . . . .	A.D. 34-34.
Pontius Pilate procurator of Judaea . . . . .	A.D. 26-36.
Preaching of the Baptist (15th year of Tiberius) . . . . .	A.D. 26-27.
'beyond Jordan', in the Peraea, 'where John at first baptized' (Jn 10 <sup>40</sup> ), 'the country about Jordan' (Lk 2 <sup>10</sup> ) . . . . .	A.D. 27 (Passover).
Baptism of Jesus in Bethabara, John's second sphere of work . . . . .	A.D. 27-28 (Passover).
Selection and training of disciples, and work in Galilee, with Nazareth for a time as headquarters (Mt 4 <sup>13</sup> ) (early chapters of Mt. and Mk. and Jn 1 <sup>20-21</sup> ) . . . . .	A.D. 28, Passover; March 30-April 6.
Purification of the temple and work in the city during the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Jn 2 <sup>13-22</sup> ) . . . . .	April 7-14 ( circa ).
Work in Judaea broken by conflict between His disciples and the Baptist's (Jn 3 <sup>22-36</sup> and 4 <sup>1-4</sup> ) . . . . .	April.
Arrest of the Baptist by Herod (Mk 6 <sup>17</sup> , Mt 14 <sup>10</sup> ) (probably at Enon near to Salim, his third sphere of work) . . . . .	April 14-18 ( circa ).
Departure of Jesus into Galilee through Samaria (Jn 4 <sup>43-49</sup> ) . . . . .	April 18-May 14.
Work in Galilee, with Capernaum as centre (Jn 4 <sup>46</sup> , Mk 14, Mt 4 <sup>12-13</sup> , where His departure from Nazareth is noted; see also Lk 4 <sup>16</sup> ) . . . . .	May 20 ( circa ).
Jesus at Feast of Pentecost in Jerusalem (Jn 5) . . . . .	October.
Miracles in Galilee (Nain), and consequent fame (Lk 7 <sup>11-17</sup> ) . . . . .
Injunctions to the Twelve, and their mission (Mt 10, Mk 6, Lk 9) . . . . .
Jesus at Feast of Tabernacles (Jn 7) . . . . .
Execution of the Baptist (Mt 14, Lk 9, Mk 6) . . . . .
Herod hears the fame of Jesus (Mt 14) . . . . .
Return of the Twelve with this and other news (Mk 6 <sup>29</sup> ) . . . . .
Jesus, in consequence, departs finally from Galilee (Mk 6 <sup>31</sup> , Mt 14 <sup>13</sup> , Lk 9 <sup>10</sup> ) . . . . .
Work in Tyre and Sidon, Decapolis, and villages of Caesarea Philippi (Mk 7 <sup>24-31</sup> , Mt 10 <sup>23</sup> ) . . . . .
The confession of St. Peter (Mt 16 <sup>16</sup> , Mk 8 <sup>29</sup> , Lk 9 <sup>20</sup> , Jn 6 <sup>28-29</sup> ) . . . . .
The Transfiguration, 'six days after' (Mt 17 <sup>1</sup> , Mk 9 <sup>2</sup> ), 'about an eight days after' (Lk 9 <sup>28</sup> ) . . . . .
Prediction of death (Mt 17 <sup>22</sup> ) . . . . .
The great Journey, which may be described as a tour, whose final objective was Jerusalem, commences 'when the days were well-nigh come that he should be received

 Rejected by a village of Samaria (Lk 9<sup>52</sup>)
 Mission of the Seventy before His face (Lk 10<sup>1-17</sup>) [in Samaria, where He was in Roman territory, safe from Herod, Samaria having been added to the Province of Syria after the banishment of Archelaus, Jos. Ant. xvii. xiii. 5]
 Sentence on Galilee and Capernaum (Lk 10<sup>18-16</sup>, Mt 11<sup>24-29</sup>)
 At the Feast of Dedication in Jerusalem A. D. 28, Dec. 10 (civitas).
 Returns to Judaea for the raising of Lazarus at Bethany (Jn 11<sup>7</sup>) Withdraws to Ephraim (Jn 11<sup>54</sup>) in wilderness of Judaea
 Final journey towards city

The chronology of the last six days is still further complicated by the difference between the Second and Fourth Gospels regarding the Anointing at Bethany. Mk 14<sup>1-9</sup> gives the account of the Anointing apparently in connexion with the date 'after two days was the feast of the Passover and the unleavened bread,' while Jn 12<sup>1-3</sup> gives the account of the Supper seemingly under the note of time, 'Then Jesus six days before the Passover came to Bethany.' Two ways of getting out of the difficulty are (1) by referring the note of time in Mk. to the events of v. 1-9, as giving the connexion of the conspiracy of the chief priests against Jesus, and the offer of Judas, and regarding the scene of the Anointing as an intrusion of strange matter similar to Mk 6<sup>14-29</sup> 7<sup>23-30</sup>; (2) by restricting the application of the note of time Jn 12<sup>1</sup> to the arrival at Bethany. The notice of the day of the entombment (την ημεραν του εταφιασμου, v. 7) would come more appropriately on the date given in Mk 14<sup>1</sup>, the reason of the mention of the feast in connexion with the date of Jn 12<sup>1</sup> 'six days before,' etc., being, perhaps, the fact that Jesus and His disciples made the house of Lazarus and his sisters the headquarters of His last mission to the city. Against this it may be urged that it is equally probable that this feast, which was attended by many out of curiosity to see not only Jesus but Lazarus whom He had raised (v. 9), occasioned on the one hand the splendid reception given to Him by the multitude, and on the other the malignant opposition of the chief priests, who made plans to procure the death of Lazarus also (v. 10). And the anointing of Jesus' feet in so lavish a style would be in keeping with His entry as the Messiah, the Anointed, into the city, which follows in the Fourth Gospel. St. Mark's order of events, however, is quite different. Our Lord proceeds straight from Jericho to Jerusalem by way of Bethphage and Bethany (Mk 11<sup>1</sup>), and when He entered the temple and looked round on all things, the hour being late (οψιμα ηδη εσσην της ωρας, v. 13), He withdrew to Bethany with the Twelve. The cleansing of the temple, which immediately follows the entry in Mt 21 and Lk 19, is thus reserved for the next day, and the banquet for the last evening spent in Bethany. May it not be possible that there were two banquets, and two similar acts of homage paid by women to Jesus, one at the beginning of His last mission, when His feet were anointed, and the other at the close of His mission, when His head was anointed, the former being recorded by St. John (12<sup>3-8</sup>), who marks the commencement of the year's work by the purification of the temple, the latter by the Synoptists, St.

Matthew and St. Mark, who signalize its closing scenes with a similar act?

In the week itself there are three difficult notes of time. (1) 'Then Jesus six days before the Passover came to Bethany' (Jn 12<sup>1</sup> επι ημερων του παρχα, cf. Am 1<sup>1</sup> LXX επι δυο ετων του σεισμου [עֲרֵב יְמֵי שֵׁשֶׁת יָמִים], 'two years before the earthquake'). Six days before Friday, Nisan 15, that is, according to Jewish reckoning, six evenings before the evening that followed the sunset of Nisan 14, would give the evening that directly followed the sunset of the Sabbath of Nisan 9, in which case the Supper would take place in the evening that was the close of the Sabbath. Or if, as Westcott held, the Passion fell on Thursday, the arrival at Bethany took place on a Friday, in which case the Sabbath would be kept as a day of rest, and would be followed by a feast on the next evening. (2) 'After two days is the Passover' (Mt 26<sup>1</sup>), or 'After two days was the Passover and the unleavened bread' (Mk 14<sup>1</sup>). This date, including the day on which the words were spoken, but excluding that of the Passover, points to Wednesday, Nisan 13, the Crucifixion falling on Friday, Nisan 15. Bengel allows an interval of one day only, 'biduum a feria quartâ ad quintam quae Paschatos et azymorum dies erat'; cf. Mk 8<sup>1</sup>, where μετα τρεις ημερας = τη τριτη ημερα. (3) 'On the first day of the unleavened bread the disciples of Jesus came to him, saying, Where wilt thou that we prepare for thee to eat the Passover?' (Mt 26<sup>17</sup>). Strictly speaking, that day would be Nisan 16, this feast commencing on the evening after the close of Nisan 15, the Passover, and lasting seven days. But this note of time refers probably to the legal beginning of the 14th day, the evening following the sunset of Nisan 13, or may be due to a confusion with the day Nisan 14 on which leaven was removed.

With regard to the method our Lord followed in His mission, see Luke 21<sup>27</sup>. 'And during the days he was teaching in the temple; but during the nights going forth to the mount that is called the Mount of Olives, he used to abide (ηστανε) there; and all the people came to him at early dawn (εσπρωσεν) in the temple to hear him'; cf. Lk 22<sup>39</sup>. 'And he came out and went κατα το εθος to the Mount of Olives; and his disciples followed. And when he was at the place' (επι του ορους, evidently some familiar locality [see Jn 18<sup>2</sup>]. 'Jesus went forth with his disciples beyond the brook Kidron, where was a garden, into the which he entered, and his disciples. And Judas also, which betrayed him, knew τον ορον']). It would seem then that the night was generally spent in prayer on the mountain side during this mission. But the evening after the Triumphal Entry was spent in Bethany (Mk 11<sup>11-12</sup>); yet evidently the greater part of night and morn was spent in prayer in the open air ηστανθη εκει (Mt 21<sup>17</sup>). This fact would explain His hunger on the morrow from missing the morning meal. For His practice of going out to pray 'a great while before day' see Mk 14<sup>35</sup>.

The following is a provisional arrangement of the days and occurrences of the Last Mission:

Sabbath, Nisan 9,	(Arrival in Bethany (Jn 12 <sup>1</sup> ),
6th Day before	Supper in the evening (12 <sup>3</sup> ),
Passover,	The Anointing of His feet,
First Day of Week	Triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Mk

Third Day of Week, Tuesday, Nisan 13, 8th Day before Passover.	Returns early (εσως) past the withered fig-tree (Mk 11<sup>9</sup>). Combination of foes, chief priests, Sadducees, Pharisees, Scribes, Herodians. Day of Questions and Answers touching the authority of Jesus, the baptism of John, the tribute money, the brother's wife, the first commandment of all. 'What think ye of Christ? Whose son is he?' (Mt 21, 22). 'From that day forth no man dared ask him any more questions' (22<sup>6</sup>). Woens on Pharisees (23-30). Jesus in Treasury, the widow's mite (Mk 12:41-44). The visit of Greeks, and parable of Seed-corn (Jn 12:20-36). Final Rejection (12:57). Lament over Jerusalem (Mt 23:37-39). Prediction of the destruction of the Temple, and final scenes of the coming of the Son of Man (24, 25). Council of Caesarea (Mt 28:2).	Between the evenings [בין הערביים] Ex 12<sup>1</sup>, as the Paschal lambs were being sacrificed in the Temple, Jesus gave up the ghost. The Removal from the Cross ensued, Pilate marvelling if He were already dead (Mk 15:44), καθ' ἑσπρας (after 3 p.m.), the women following to the sepulchre and returning to prepare spices and ointment (Lk 23:55, 56). Friday, Nisan 15 (March 18). The Passover, also the Weekly Preparation, επαγεσηναι or επιπροβαλλειν (Mk 15:45). First Day of Unleavened Bread, coincided with weekly Sabbath. 'The day of that (κενης) Sabbath was an high day' (Jn 19<sup>1</sup>), or 'that (κενης) day of the week was a high day.' 'And (the women) rested the Sabbath day according to the commandment' (Lk 23:56). This was a day of holy convocation in which no servile work should be done. Visit of Sanhedrin to Pilate, καὶ οἱ ἱεροδυναστεὶς ἐστὶν ἡμερᾶς τῆς ἑβδομάτης (Mt 27:62). In the Grave.
Fourth Day of Week, Wednesday, Nisan 14, 2nd Day before Passover.	'After two days is the Feast of Unleavened Bread' (Mt 26<sup>2</sup>). It is supposed that our Lord remained all this day in Bethany, not returning to the city openly after Jn 12:36. The Anointing of His head at the Supper in the evening. The Bargain of Judas. The morning was occupied by disciples with preparations for the Supper (Mt 26:15), by Jesus in prayer. (A) The events of the evening may be arranged according to the four Roman (as distinguished from the three Jewish) watches, ἡμέρας (6 p.m.-9 p.m.); μεσημερίας (9 p.m.-12); ἀναστροφῆς (12-3 a.m.); πρωῆς (3 a.m.-6 a.m.), used in the Gospels (Mk 13:35, Mt 14:23, Mk 6:4).	After the Sabbath (ἀναστροφῆς καὶ ἐπὶ ἑσπρας) Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James, and Salome, brought spices for the anointing (Mk 16:1). It was still dark, ὥρα ἦν σκοτίας (Jn 20:1), in early dawn, πρωῆς ἡμέρας (Lk 24, cf. Mt 28), very early after sunrise (Mk 16:7), when they came to the sepulchre, bringing the spices they had prepared (Lk 24:1). Jesus rose early, ἀνεστῆκεν πρωῆς (Mk 16:7). The first-fruits of them that slept, ἀναστῆκεν πρῶτος ἀναστραφῆς (1 Co 15:20). 'Vision of angels to the women' (Mt 16:7-7). Visit of Peter and John to the Sepulchre (Jn 20:3-10). Appearance of Jesus to Mary Magdalene (20:11-18); appearance to St. Peter (Lk 24:34).
The Day before the Passover, Thursday, Nisan 14, Fifth Day of Week, παρασκευή (Mt 26:17), 'the first day of unleavened bread' evidently being identified with the first day on which leaven was removed (Ex 12:15), the bread of Passover being unleavened (Dt 16:3).	The Supper with the Twelve, ἡμερᾶς τῆς παρασκευῆς (Mt 26:17). Mk 14:17). The washing of feet after Supper (καὶ ἔσθην τὴν ἑσπέραν καὶ ἠλκίσθησαν) (Jn 13:2). Departure of Judas. Institution of Lord's Supper. Upper Room Discourses (13:2-14:3). Departure from Upper Room (14:3). Parable of Vines (Jn 15). Promise of the Holy Spirit (16). Prayer for disciples (17). Gethsemane (18, Mt 26:37-46, Mk 14:33-36, Lk 22:41-46). Agony, 'one hour' (Mk 14:47). Arrival of Judas, Arrest of Jesus (Jn 18:1-3). Preliminary trial before Annas (18:13). Peter's denial; ἀκράτως ἠρῶν (18:27). Jesus sent to Caiaphas (18:24). Trial before Sanhedrin ἐν ἱερῷ ἑταίρου (Lk 22:66). σκωπὸς τῆς παρασκευῆς (Mt 27:1 loosely), ἡμέρα τῆς παρασκευῆς towards the morning watch (Mk 15:1 more precisely).	Nisan 16, Saturday. Nisan 17, Sunday. The First Day of Week and Second Feast of Mazzoth, on which wheat of new corn was presented as first-fruits ἀπαγορεύεται ἡμέρας (Mk 16:7, καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν ἡμέρα ἀπαγορεύεται (Mk 16:7), ἡμέρα τῆς παρασκευῆς (Mt 28:1). Sunday Week, Nisan 24. Further appearances recorded by Evangelists:—To seven Apostles on the shore of the Sea of Tiberias (Jn 21). To the Eleven Apostles on a mountain in Galilee (Mt 28:16-20). To the Apostles in Jerusalem (St. Luke in Ac 1). Ascension from Bethany forty days after Passion and ten days before Pentecost (Lk 24:42, Ac 1:6-12). LITERATURE.—Josephus, Ant. and J.; Irenaeus, adv. [There is no need to suggest a corruption of F for I or vice versa to explain the difference of Mk 15:25 and Jn 19:14, as the former hour marks the crucifixion and the latter the hour of sentence, between which some interval must have elapsed.] 9 a.m.-12.—Jesus on the Cross. 12-3 p.m.—And when the sixth hour (12) was come there was darkness over the whole land until the ninth hour (3 p.m.) . . . and at the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, 'Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani?' Although the word applies to married women in general, its associated idea is that of youth. Hence its antithesis with νεμερῆς, the mother-in-law (Mt 10:3, Lk 12:52). The son usually brought his bride to his father's house, where she was subject to his father's wife, as was the son to the father and the daughter to the mother (Mt 10:38, Lk 12:53). HENRY E. DOSKER. DAVID.—For the student of the Gospels the most important OT passage concerning David is 2 S 7. David expressed to Nathan a strong desire to build a temple for Jehovah in his new capital, a wish indicative of worldly wisdom as well as piety on the part of the king. Jehovah denies David's request, but promises to build for him an everlasting house, a dynasty without end. David's throne is to stand for ever. Pss 2 and 110 are founded on this notable promise, and the author of Ps 89 in a far later time, when David's throne had been overturned by the heathen, reminds Jehovah of His ancient promise, and pleads earnestly for the speedy passing of His wrath. The early prophets, Amos (21st Hosea (2<sup>d</sup>), Isaiah (9th 10th 37th), unite with the author of Kings (1 K 2<sup>d</sup> 6th etc.) in the expectation that the promise made to David in 2 S 7 will not fail. The prophetic hopes for the future of Israel spring from Nathan's message as branches from the trunk that gives them life. Jeremiah (23rd 30th 31st) carries forward the work of his predecessors of the 8th cent. a.c., asserting the perpetuity of David's dynasty in most emphatic terms. Ezekiel (34th 37th) cheers the discouraged exiles with the picture of a glorious restoration of the throne of David. The great ruler of the future will be a second David. In the period after the return from Babylon, the author of the last section of Zechariah (12-13) describes the glories of the coming time in connexion with the Davidic dynasty: 'The house of David shall be as God, as the angel of Jehovah before them.' The Messianic hope in the inter-Biblical period, like that of the OT, attached itself to David. The author of Ecclesiasticus (47th) reminds his readers that the Lord exalted David's horn for ever, entering into a covenant and promising him a throne of glory in Israel. About a century later the author of 1 Mac. (37th) says, 'David for being merciful inherited the throne of a kingdom for ever and ever.' Most important for the student of the Gospel history is Ps 17 of the Psalms of Solomon, a collection of patriotic hymns belonging to the period immediately following Pompey's capture of Jerusalem (63-48 B.C.). Ps 17 is a notable Messianic prophecy, prayer and prediction being freely intermingled after the fashion of the OT prophets and poets. The Messianic King is to be David's son (74th). Jehovah Himself is Israel's King for ever and ever (74th); but the Son of David is His chosen to overthrow the heathen, and institute a righteous reign in Israel (17th 42nd).

The four Evangelists unite in the view that the Messiah was to come from the seed of David (Mt 1st, Mk 10th, Lk 2<sup>d</sup>, Jn 7th). 'The Son of David' was synonymous in the time of our Lord's earthly ministry with 'Messiah' or 'Christ.' Both the scribes and the common people held this view. When the children cried in the temple, 'Hosanna to the Son of David' (Mt 21st), both the rulers and the multitude looked upon the words as a distinct recognition of the Messiahship of Jesus. The Epistles (Ro 1st, 2 Ti 2<sup>d</sup>) and the Revelation (5th 22nd) concur in calling attention to the Davidic origin of Jesus. The interest of NT writers in David is confined almost exclusively to his relation to our Lord Jesus as His ancestor and type.

Jesus refers to one incident in the life of David in reply to the accusation of His enemies as to His observance of the Sabbath (Mk 2<sup>d</sup>, cf. 1 S 21st). This incident is said to have taken place 'when Abiathar was high priest.' [On the difficulties created by this statement see art. ABIATHAR.]

During the week preceding our Lord's crucifixion, perhaps on Tuesday, He asked the Pharisees a question which put them to silence and confusion. Having drawn from them a statement of their belief that the Christ would be the son of David, He at once quoted David's words in Ps 110th to show that the Messiah would also be David's Lord (Mt 22nd). Jesus wished to show His foes and the multitude that the orthodox view of the time overlooked the exalted dignity of the Messiah. He was to be far greater than David, for He was his Lord. See, further, Brodus on Mt. ad loc., and, for the meaning of 'David' and 'Moses' in our Lord's citations from the OT, art. MOSES.

DAY.—1. Literal.—The length of the 'day' among the ancients was reckoned in various ways: thus, from morning to morning (Babylonians), from sunset to sunset (Athenians), from noon to noon (Unbrians), from midnight to midnight (Egyptians), and from dawn to dark by the common people, ordinarily (see Plin. HN ii. 79). The early Israelites seem to have regarded the morning as the beginning of the day (cf. Gn 1st 5th), but they likewise (due to the influence of the new moon) reckoned it from 'even unto even' (Lv 23rd). In Lk 22nd also the new day began after sunset (cf. 4th). In the NT hēmera was employed to express: (1) the period of light in opposition to night (Lk 6th 'and when it was day,'—a frequent phrase in St. Luke's writings, cf. 4th 22nd, Ac 12th 16th 23rd 27th ss. 28; also Jn 9th, 2 Co 11th); (2) the natural day, including the periods both of light and darkness (Mt 28th επισημοῦν, cf. Lk 22nd); (3) an indefinite period of time (Lk 1st 2<sup>d</sup> ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις ταύταις, 'in those days'; St. Luke is fond of this expression, it is not found in Jn., and occurs but four times in Mt. and the same number of times in Mk.; cf. Lk 21 4th, Ac 2<sup>d</sup> 3rd 7th etc., also Mt 21 3rd, Mk 1st 8th 13th in true Hebraistic style).

Except the Sabbath, the days of the week were numbered by the Israelites, not named. Nor had the Hebrews any precise subdivision of the day, for they had no word for 'hour'; even the Aramaic ḥā, which occurs in Dn 4th 5th, has no exact connotation. Like the Greeks, they seem to have learned from the Babylonians how to divide the day into 12 hours—a division first met with in the NT: 'Are there not twelve hours in the day?' (Jn 11th, cf. Ac 2<sup>d</sup>, Mt 20th 27th etc. etc.). The length of the hour, however, was for a long time a variable quantity, depending, as it did, upon the season of the year, for it was always reckoned as the twelfth part of the light period. It therefore ranged from forty-nine to seventy-one minutes, according to the calendar. The more common divisions of the day among the Hebrews were morning, noon-day, and evening (Ps 55th); but they frequently spoke of 'sunrise' and 'dawn' (Mk 16th, Jn 20th, Rev 22nd), 'the heat of the day' (Mt 20th), 'noon' (Gn 43rd, Dt 28th), 'the cool of the day' (Gn 3rd), and 'between the two evenings,' i.e. towards evening (Ex 12th 16th, cf. Ac 3rd 10th 20th). The time of incense, and of cock-crowling (wh. see) was in the morning (Mk 14th 7th, Lk 1st); the time of the 'meal-offering' was in the middle of the afternoon (1 K 18th 26th), while the time that women go out to draw water' was towards evening (Gn 24th).

2. Figurative.—Figurative and metaphorical uses of the word 'day' are also frequent in the NT: e.g. the day of Christ's appearance, i.e. of His apocalypse, or self-revelation (Lk 17th 'in the day that the Son of Man is revealed,' ἀποκαλύψεται, a technical expression: cf. Lk 17th, Jn 8th 12th 19th 20th, Ro 13th, 1 Co 1st 5th, 2 Th 1st, 1 P 1st 12th 4th); 'the day of his Parousia' (Mt 7th 24th, Mk 13th 14th, Lk 21st, 2 Th 1st, 2 Ti 1st, He 10th); the days of His death and departure (Lk 5th ἀνεσθαιῖν δὲ ἡμέρας, 'But the days will come,' i.e. days very different from the joyous days of wedding festivity); the Last, or Judgment day (Jn 6th 11th 12th, Mt 11th, 1 Jn 4th, 1 Th 5th, 2 Ti 3rd, Ja 5th, and by contrast 1 Co 4th τὸ ἀνθροπίων ἡμέρας, which describes human judgment as opposed to Christ's day of final account, ἡμέρας τοῦ κυρίου); His day of the offer of salvation (2 Co 6th, Jn 9th 11th); 'the day of Christ' (Ph 1st); 'the day of the Lord' (2 Th 2<sup>d</sup>, Ro 2<sup>d</sup>, 2 Co 1st, Rev 6th); 'the day of God' (2 P 3rd); 'the Lord's day,' ἡ κυριακὴ ἡμέρα (Rev 1st); the day of the gift of the Spirit (Jn 14th); the day of completed salvation (Ro 13th); 'the evil day,' of trial and temptation (Eph 6th); 'as children of the day,' i.e. as sons who abstain from doing evil (1 Th 5th, Ro 13th); a day of fuller knowledge (2 P 1st); and, lastly, the somewhat enigmatical passage, 'Give us this day (τῆς ἡμέρας) our daily (τὸν ἑωσθητικόν) bread' (Mt 6th, Lk 11th); the latter expression (see art. LORD'S PRAYER) is not found in classical Greek, and seems to have been specially coined by the Evangelists to convey in this single context the idea of 'needful' or 'the coming day's'; the Vulgate has superstantialem

DAY OF ATONEMENT (עֲוֹנוֹת אֲדָמָה [עֲוֹנוֹת אֲדָמָה], יוֹם הַכִּפּוּרִים [יוֹם הַכִּפּוּרִים]).—The chief OT passages bearing on it are Lv. 16, 23<sup>28-29</sup>, but some further details are given in Ex 30<sup>10</sup>, Lv. 25<sup>9</sup>, Nu 29<sup>7-11</sup>. An earlier and simpler form of the ceremony is prescribed in Ezk 45<sup>18-20</sup>. The day is not mentioned in the Gospels, but it is referred to as ἡ ἡμέρα in Ac 27<sup>9</sup> (also Ep. Barn. 7<sup>2,4</sup>, Jos. Ant. XVII. vi. 4).

1. It is not necessary in the present article to describe fully the ritual and worship of the day; only the salient features are here touched upon which offer some analogy with the Christian Atonement. The more important parts of the ceremony were, briefly, as follows:—

(a) The high priest procured and brought before the Tent a bullock as a sin-offering for himself, and two goats upon which lots were cast, one being destined as a sin-offering for the people, and the other to be 'for Azazel.' He sacrificed the bullock, and carried its blood into the Holy of Holies, where, after enveloping the mercy-seat with a cloud of burning incense, he sprinkled the blood before it. He then came out and sacrificed the goat for the people, and, re-entering the Holy of Holies, sprinkled its blood before the mercy-seat. He next sprinkled the blood of each animal on the altar of incense in the Holy Place; and, lastly, he sprinkled the mingled blood of bullock and goat on the brazen altar in the outer court. Thus the blood (the life) of the animals, representing the life of priest and people, was offered before God; and they, and the three parts of the Tent polluted by their presence during the preceding year, were cleansed, and atonement was made for them.

(b) The goat for Azazel was then brought near. The sins of the people were confessed over it, and it was led into the wilderness. The two goats were intended figuratively to represent one and the same being, who, though sacrificed, was yet living, and able to carry away the sins of the people. In the Mishna (Yoma vi. 1, cf. Ep. Barn. 7<sup>2</sup>) this thought was afterwards emphasized by the regulation that the goats must resemble each other as closely as possible.

(c) The high priest offered two rams as a burnt-offering for himself and the people, signifying the complete offering up of the worshippers' lives and persons to God.

(d) The skin, flesh, and dung of the bullock and the goat, whose blood had made atonement, were burnt outside the camp.

2. The great spiritual truths typified by this ceremony are to a certain extent drawn out in He 9<sup>7-14</sup>, 11-28, 10<sup>10-12</sup>.

(a) The high priest entered 'into the second [part of the Tent] once a year' (ἀναβαίνων εἰς τὸ δεύτερον τῆς σκηνῆς ἅπασι τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἅμα ἅμα, i.e. on one day in the year), 9<sup>7</sup>. But Christ entered into 'the Holies' once for all (ἐξάρας, v. 12); and see v. 24, 10<sup>14</sup>. Thus His blood—i.e. His life freed for eternal uses by death—is perpetually presented before God.

(b) The earthly 'holies' are 'made with hands,' 'types corresponding to the real ones' (ἀρτίφωτα τῶν ἀκράτων). But Christ entered into 'heaven itself,' 9<sup>24</sup>.

(c) The high priest entered 'in the blood of another' (9<sup>25</sup>), 'with the accompaniment of [by means of, &c.] the blood of goats and calves'; Christ, with His own blood, 9<sup>25</sup>. And the Tent, 'the copies (τυπογραφαί) of the things in the heavens,' must be purified with the former: but the heavenly things with better sacrifices than these, 9<sup>25</sup>. With regard to the meaning of this, Westcott says: 'It may be said that even "heavenly things," so far as they embody the conditions of man's future life, contracted by the Fall something which required cleansing. Man is, according to the revelation in Scripture, so bound up with the whole finite order, that the consequences of his actions extend through creation in some way which we are unable to define.'

(d) The sacrifices of the Day of Atonement (and other sacrifices—'the ashes of an heifer,' see Nu 19) can effect only the purifying of the flesh; i.e. outward ceremonial cleansing. But if they can effect that, a fortiori the blood of Christ can purify our consciences from the defiling contact of dead works, 9<sup>25</sup>.

(e) The high priest entered alone; which fact signified that while the first Tent continued to have a standing among men (ἐξολογῆς ἔρανον), the way for all men into 'the Holies' was not yet manifested, 9<sup>7</sup>. But now 'we have confidence which leads us to enter into the Holies in the blood of Jesus by a new and living way which He inaugurated for us, through the veil, that is to say [the way] of His flesh,' 10<sup>19</sup>.

The main truths, then, at which the writer of the Epistle arrives by direct reference to the Day of Atonement are: that Christ is both Priest and Victim; that His sacrifice is eternally efficacious, and that it is being eternally presented by Him in Heaven; that its effects are not ceremonial but spiritual; and that we now have free access to the Father.

3. But other points of analogy and contrast suggest themselves, some of which are partially supplied by the Ep. to the Hebrews.

(a) The high priest offered a bullock for the atonement of his own sins. 'The law appoints as high priests men possessed of weakness,' He 7<sup>28</sup> 5<sup>14</sup>. But the Son was 'such an high priest as was fitting for us, holy, guileless, undefiled,' 7<sup>26</sup>. And the sinfulness of the high priest appears to have been the reason of his causing a cloud of burning incense to hide the mercy-seat from his sight. He was unfit, until atonement had been made for his sins, to look upon the place of God's Presence. But now that Christ has 'procured eternal salvation for us,' not only our High Priest but we ourselves may 'come boldly unto the throne of grace.'

(b) An obvious contrast between the Jewish and Christian Atonement is afforded by the fact that the former was possible only in the case of unwitting offences (ἀγνοήματα, He 9<sup>7</sup>), sins committed 'in ignorance' (Lv. 4<sup>2, 17, 22, 25</sup>, Nu 15<sup>22-28</sup>, contrast Nu 15<sup>22</sup>). If Christ's Atonement were thus limited, our faith were vain, we should be yet in our sins.

(c) It is important to notice that the Jewish sacrifice was very different from those of the heathen. Its purpose was not to appease—to buy the goodwill of—a cruel and capricious deity. The offerings did not originate with men; they are represented as commanded and appointed by God Himself. They were due to His own loving initiative; He showed the way by which men, who were hostile by reason of their sins, might be reconciled to Him. So likewise 'God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son' (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>). Nay more; Christ the Victim voluntarily offered Himself (Jn 10<sup>11</sup>, Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, Mk 10<sup>45</sup>). Scripture nowhere speaks of God being reconciled to man; see Ro 5<sup>10</sup> 11<sup>12</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>18-20</sup>. God is not hostile to us, although by His very nature He must be angry with sin and punish it; but we are hostile to God (Lk 19<sup>42</sup>, Ph 3<sup>18</sup>, Col 1<sup>21</sup>, Ja 4<sup>4</sup>).

(d) The ceremonies performed by the high priest were not a mere opus operatum, the magic of a medicine man. The whole congregation had morally to take an active part. The Day of Atonement was to be a day of cessation from work, like a Sabbath, and a day when every man must afflict (נָחַ) his soul—i.e. render his soul contrite and penitent by means of fasting, self-humiliation, and confession of sins. It is true that Is 58<sup>8-9</sup> denounces the outward expressions of this 'affliction of the soul' when they are unaccompanied by the necessary moral fruits, as Christ Himself does (Mt 6<sup>16</sup>); but Lv 23<sup>29-32</sup>, Nu 29<sup>7-11</sup> clearly imply that real penitence is necessary for atonement. The Mishna also recognizes that, while the ceremonies of the day are effectual for Israel as a whole, individuals must appropriate the results by repentance. 'If a man says, "I will sin and (then) repent, I will sin and (then) repent," Heaven does not give him the means of practising repentance; and if he says, "I will sin, and the Day of Atonement will bring atonement," the Day of Atonement will bring no atonement' (Yomá viii. 8, 9). And similarly a Christian's faith in the atoning death of Christ is not merely an intellectual acceptance of the fact that He died for each and all. Faith, as the NT teaches it, involves a conscious co-operation with Christ's work. That work was not accomplished to free us from the necessity of doing anything. The atoning work of the God-Man is in living union with the longings and strivings of men for atonement, and thereby makes them effectual. But if a man does not repent,—does not wish to be free from sin,—for him the Atonement brings no atonement. The results of Christ's death are 'a power of God, leading to salvation' (Ro 1<sup>8</sup>), but the energy remains potential and useless until the human will renders it kinetic by deliberate appropriation.

(e) And this truth was foreshadowed in the Jewish atonement not only by the fasting of the people, but in the ceremony which formed the centre and kernel of it all. The killing of an animal and the shedding of its blood contained a meaning which far transcended that of mere death. The body is 'the expression of life in terms of its environment'; the blood represents the life set free from its limiting environment for higher uses (Lv 17<sup>11</sup>). When Christ, therefore, entered heaven 'with his own blood' (He 9<sup>12</sup>), 'to appear in the presence of God for us' (v. 24), He began 'the eternal presentation of a life which eternally is "the life that died."' But 'we reckon that one died on behalf of all; in that case all died' (2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>); and as the high priest offered the blood of the goat which symbolized the life of the whole people, so 'the life that died' is our life, in complete union with Christ's (He 10<sup>10</sup>). The same truth is expressed in another form in He 10<sup>1-10</sup>. Christ's voluntary self-offering consisted in absolute obedience to the Father's will, an obedience having its seat in a body prepared for Him. 'In which will we have been sanctified through the body of Jesus Christ once for all.' But that is rendered possible only because of His living union with us which makes us part of His body. 'The Church is the extension of the Incarnation.' And this vital union is strengthened and perpetuated by the faithful appropriation of it in the Sacrament of His body and blood.

(f) It has been said above that the goat 'for Azazel' (AV 'scape-goat') was considered figuratively to be the same animal as the goat that was sacrificed. Its blood was shed for the atonement of the people, and, at the same time, it took upon itself the burden of their sins in order to carry it away. There is no distinct reference to the scape-goat in Hebrews, but a possible allusion occurs in 9<sup>28</sup>, where the writer quotes Is 53<sup>10</sup>. Christ was 'once offered to bear (ἀνεχέειν) the sins of many.'

The verb seems to contain the double thought of 'offering up' and 'taking up upon oneself' as a burden; cf. Jn 1<sup>9</sup>.

(g) After the atonement was completed and the sins carried away, there followed the sacrifice of the rams as a burnt-offering. It is peculiarly significant that in Lv 16<sup>21</sup> the high priest is bidden to 'offer his burnt-offering and the burnt-offering of the people, and make an atonement for himself and for the people.' The great atonement in the sanctuary, though complete, was only an initial act which needed the continued burnt-offering to render its effects permanent. This symbolizes the sequel and corollary of the truth which formed the subject of (c) and (e). Our own life having been offered upon Calvary in union with Christ's, we 'died with him,' and we are 'alive unto God' through Him. That being so, we are bound to make an active appropriation of our part in His eternal presentation of the offering in heaven; we are bound to render permanent the effects of the great Atonement by yielding up our whole spirit and soul and body as a perpetual burnt-offering. See Ro 12, 1 P 2<sup>2</sup>, He 13<sup>14</sup>.

4. The above suggestions are those dealing with the more fundamental points, but they are, of course, far from being exhaustive of the analogies which may be drawn. The isolation of the high priest when he entered the sanctuary suggests a comparison of He 9<sup>7</sup> (μόνος) with 7<sup>26</sup> (εξερχόμενος). His double entrance, first for himself and then for the people, seems to foreshadow the two entrances of Christ into the Unseen, once when He entered it at death, from which He returned victorious, and again when He entered it by His resurrection and ascension 'to appear before the face of God on our behalf' (He 9<sup>24</sup>). Again, the return of the high priest to the people in the outer court at the close of the ceremony recalls the words of He 9<sup>28</sup>, 'a second time without sin shall he appear to them that wait for him.' And, finally, the burning of the sacrifice outside the gate is used as yet another type of Christ (He 13<sup>14</sup>).

DAY OF CHRIST.—This is the general expression used by certain of the NT writers to indicate that moment in time in which Jesus the Christ shall reappear to establish His Messianic kingdom. It marks the beginning of that new age which Jews and Christians expected would follow the present evil one. The term thus lacks the precise reference of the Day of Judgment (wh. see), and is also more general than the term Parousia; but all three of these terms refer to the same point in time, and represent different phases of the same event. It is spoken of indiscriminately as the 'day of Christ' (Ph 1<sup>10</sup>), 'day of the Lord' (1 Th 5<sup>2</sup>), 'day of Jesus Christ' (Ph 1<sup>6</sup>), 'day of our Lord Jesus Christ' (1 Co 1<sup>8</sup>), and 'day of our Lord Jesus' (2 Co 1<sup>14</sup>). It is generally thought of in connexion with the great assize which is to be established by the reappearing Christ (1 Th 5<sup>2</sup>, Ph 1<sup>6-10</sup>). It was then that the process of sanctification was to reach its real completion (Ph 1<sup>6</sup>) and salvation be con-summed (1 Co 5<sup>2</sup>). It was to come unexpectedly (1 Th 5<sup>2</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>10</sup>), but was to be preceded by certain premonitory conditions which had not been fulfilled at the time of the writing of 2 Thessalonians (2 Th 2<sup>1-2</sup>). There is no reference in the NT to an identification of the Fall of Jerusalem with this day, and all such interpretations must be read into it. In order to grasp its real significance, it is necessary to remember that the early Christians did not believe that Jesus had done strictly Messianic work during His earthly career, and that they looked forward to His return as the time when He would take up the work of the Messiah pictured in the apocalypses. This work was to be inaugurated with the resurrection of the dead, the establishing of judgment, and the conquest of His enemies. In the Apocalypse (Rev 6<sup>2</sup> 15<sup>14, 15</sup> 19<sup>11-13</sup>) this period of conquest is prominent, but not in other portions of the NT. Here also there is to be noticed a distinction drawn between the 'day of Christ' and that 'great day of God' which follows the one thousand years' reign of Christ on earth. Such a view, however, is not clearly presented in other portions of the NT, the nearest approach being 1 Co 15<sup>23, 24</sup>, in which Jesus is spoken of as giving over the kingdom to God the Father. See, further, DAY OF JUDGMENT, PAROUSIA.

DAY OF JUDGMENT.—I. IN THE TEACHING OF JESUS.—1. The Day of Judgment is one of the concepts inherited by Jesus. Its origin is to be sought in the religious beliefs common to practically all primitive peoples, in a tribal deity who would punish the enemies of the tribe. This elemental concept gained varied forms in the development of different peoples. In some cases it was never carried over into the field of individual ethics, and in others it shared in the moral growth of its possessors. In the case of the Hebrews it is to be seen in the 'Day of Jahweh,' which formed so large and important an element of the prophetic message. In its earliest forms the expectation of this day involved simply the punishment of the enemies of Israel by Jahweh the God of the nation. As the moral content of prophetism developed, however, this punishment inflicted by Jahweh was foretold to include the punishment of the Hebrew nation. Amos and the great prophets who succeeded him warned a luxurious nation that it had grown guilty and degenerate, and would be destroyed as an indication of Jahweh's righteousness (Am 2<sup>6-8</sup> 3<sup>6-13</sup> 5<sup>10-12</sup> 6<sup>1-3</sup>). After Amos the Day of Jahweh never lost its religious colouring, but its use was extended until it included in its scope not only wicked Israel but a wicked world (Zeph 1<sup>2-18</sup> 2<sup>1-16</sup> 3<sup>14-20</sup>). Ezekiel conceived of it as a day of battle in which Jahweh would conquer Israel's foes (Ezk 30<sup>24</sup> 34<sup>12</sup> 39<sup>25</sup>); but Malachi foretold the fearful punishment of all the wicked, Jews and Gentiles alike. It was this extension of punishment, and the increase in the number of the condemned, that gave particular force to the idea of the remnant which was to be saved.

Obviously the formal concept here is that of the Oriental monarch who establishes a court of justice, and decrees rewards and punishment. Jahweh was never conceived of by the prophets in terms of natural law, but always in terms of this analogy. In fact it would be probably truer to say that the monarchical concept of God was not an analogy but something more. It was this concept which conditioned teaching as to punishment throughout the entire Biblical period. Subsequent to the prophetic era, under the influence of Persian dualism, there was a marked tendency to extend the range of judgment to nature as well as to men, and the God who sat upon the throne was more than a mere national deity judging the enemy of a particular people. This extension of the idea is to be found in the apocalypses, which in so many ways lie behind the Judaism current in the time of Jesus. In these apocalypses the Day of Judgment became one of the most essential elements in the Messianic scheme. The Day of Judgment of Messianism is the prophet's Day of Jahweh given new content by the appropriation of certain elements from the cosmic myths of Babylon, and new colour because of the new literary vehicle, the apocalypse. As a part of the more highly developed Messianism, it sometimes ceased to represent a single judicial act on the part of the sovereign Deity, and with something like a recurrence to the picture of Ezekiel, came to stand for the period of struggle in which the Messiah was to overcome and punish the enemies of a righteous nation. In its new form the thought of the day became increasingly transcendental, and joined to itself the idea of hell newly derived from the older belief in Sheol. In fact it would be difficult to understand the full force of the Day of Judgment, as it appeared both in Jewish and Christian literature, without reference to the fate of the dead. In the place of a penalty consisting of national punishment, there grew up during the Greek period of Jewish history a tolerably elaborate belief as to punishment inflicted upon individuals after death.

It is difficult to know just when this idea of hell as a place of punishment, as over against Sheol as the fate of the disembodied dead, was first brought into relation with the Day of Judgment, but by the time of the apocalypses we find the correlation complete (Eth. Enoch 27<sup>2, 3</sup> 48<sup>9</sup> 54<sup>1, 2</sup> 62<sup>12, 13</sup> 90<sup>26, 27</sup>). In fact the punishment inflicted upon men is distinctly recognized as adjusted to the conditions of their life in Eth. Enoch 22<sup>14</sup>.

Thus the Day of Judgment as a form of the Day of Jahweh became the central point in Messianic eschatology and the nomistic morality of Judaism. Different teachers elaborated its details in different ways, but, by the time Judaism was fairly developed, the Day of Judgment was conceived of as involving the examination of the records of each individual (Dn 7<sup>10</sup>). More or less literally, books were believed to be kept in heaven, generally by one of the seven angels, in which the deeds of men were recorded (Eth. Enoch 89<sup>1</sup> 90<sup>14-23</sup> Ascens. Isaiah 9<sup>21</sup>). In the final assize these books were opened and balanced, and the future of the individual was determined according to the preponderance of his good or evil deeds (Eth. Enoch 51<sup>1, 2</sup> 89<sup>10</sup> 90<sup>1, 2</sup> Pirke Aboth 3<sup>24</sup> Ascens. Isaiah 9<sup>22</sup>; cf. Lk 10<sup>20</sup>, Rev 8<sup>3</sup> 13<sup>8</sup> 17<sup>3</sup> 20<sup>12</sup> 21<sup>27</sup>). The difficulty in such a mechanical basis of judgment was to some degree mitigated by the introduction of something approaching the later doctrine of supererogation, by which the merit of the patriarchs could be transferred to the Jews. This particular doctrine, however, it is difficult to trace distinctly in the days of Jesus, although later the transfer of merits from the patriarchs is distinctly recognized. From this idea of the assize, in which sentences were formally passed by the judge, arose the two opposing concepts of condemnation and acquittal. These two concepts are the two foci of much of the NT teaching concerning the outcome of conduct.

While Jesus opposed the mercantile conception of rewards and punishment, the Day of Judgment occupied a central position in His teaching. With Him as with all men of the prophetic type, the Judgment stretched across the horizon of human destiny. No action in life was morally neutral. A man would give account at the Judgment for the very words which he spoke (Mt 12<sup>36</sup>). It was through the outcomes of life that Jesus estimated conduct, and these outcomes converged into what the Gospels designate the consummation of the age; that is, the great catastrophe in which the present evil age comes to a close and the new Messianic age begins.

2. The terms which the Gospels represent Jesus as using to indicate the Day of Judgment are various.

(a) Sometimes the great event which would determine the final destinies of men is called expressly 'the day of judgment' (Mt 10<sup>15</sup> 11<sup>22</sup> 24 12<sup>36</sup>), or more simply 'the judgment' (Mt 5<sup>21</sup> 22 12<sup>41-42</sup>). These two terms are essentially the same.

(b) In one instance (Mt 13<sup>29</sup> 25) the 'judgment of Gehenna' is mentioned, but this refers not so much to the Judgment-day itself as to the punishment inflicted upon hypocrites and sinners (cf. 23<sup>33</sup>).

(d) 'The day of the Son of Man' as a precise expression is found only in Lk 17<sup>34-35</sup>, where the thought of Judgment is immediately related to the eschatological reappearance of Jesus as Christ. A similar, although not a precise, reference is to be found in other passages speaking of the Parousia, notably Mk 13<sup>37</sup> 14<sup>62</sup> and their parallels.

(e) 'The last day' is a favourite expression of the Fourth Gospel, to denote the day on which men were to be raised from the dead (Jn 6<sup>39</sup> 44 54 11<sup>51</sup>). That this day of resurrection is to be identified with the Day of Judgment appears not only from the entire drift of the Messianic expectation current in the time of Jesus, but also expressly in Jn 12<sup>35</sup>.

3. The time of the Day of Judgment was not precisely fixed by Jesus, and in fact He is said to be ignorant concerning it (Mk 13<sup>32</sup>); but the Gospels represent Him as announcing its coming before His contemporaries die (Mk 13<sup>36</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>, Mt 10<sup>23</sup>, cf. Jn 21<sup>20-22</sup>), and this was the expectation of the Apostolic Church in general. Notwithstanding the indefiniteness of its coming, the day is one for which all should be watching (Mk 13<sup>33</sup> 27 14<sup>32</sup>, Lk 12<sup>37</sup> 21<sup>34</sup>), and its nearness can be argued from the signs of the times (Mt 16<sup>3</sup>) as well as from various portents described in the phraseology of prophecy and apocalyptic.

Whether Jesus Himself regarded the Judgment-day as involving the fall of Jerusalem, or whether He regarded the inevitable destruction of the Jewish State as one of the forerunners of the Judgment, will remain a matter of dispute until the critical composition of Mk 13 is more precisely fixed. On the whole, however, in view of Jesus' forecast of the punishment to come upon the Jewish people both in Galilee and in Jerusalem, it seems probable that He did in some precise way correlate the fall of Jerusalem with the eschatological judgment. But it would be a serious mistake to regard that destruction of Jerusalem as exhausting the content of His expectation of His Parousia. The punishment inflicted was to be universal, not Jewish. Had the disciples regarded the fall of Jerusalem as in any true sense the Judgment of the Parousia, it is inconceivable that the Fourth Gospel and the other portions of the NT written subsequent to A.D. 70 should have given no hint of such interpretation. In them as in the Synoptics the Judgment is not a process but a single event, future, eschatological. At the same time it is to be borne in mind that the Fourth Gospel appreciates the truth to which attention must be presently called, namely, that while the Judgment is eschatological (Jn 5<sup>22</sup> 27 28 20 16<sup>3</sup>), a man does not need to wait until that event to fix his destiny. That is already determined by the acceptance or rejection of Jesus (Jn 3<sup>18</sup> 14 12<sup>31</sup>). Such passages as contain the teaching are, however, not to be interpreted as indicating a loss of belief in the coming of the Judgment-day as a point in time, but rather as the Johannine equivalent and supplement of the Apostolic doctrine of justification by faith.

(Mt 20<sup>21</sup> || Mk 10<sup>37</sup>). The Fourth Gospel represents Jesus as expressly denying (Jn 8<sup>16</sup> 12<sup>47</sup>), and also as affirming that He is the Judge (Jn 5<sup>22</sup> 27 28 8<sup>10</sup>). But such inconsistency can be resolved either by considering that Jesus at one time is thinking of His historical and at another of His eschatological duties, or by a reference to the general position of the Evangelist that the mission of the Christ in His historical ministry was for the purpose of salvation rather than for condemnation (Jn 3<sup>17</sup>).

5. The subjects of the Judgment are men at large, with particular reference to those who have come in contact with the historical Jesus, including His disciples. The question as to whether those who never heard of Jesus are to be subject to this Judgment is not distinctly raised or settled in the Gospels, but the universality of the Judgment seems inevitable from Christ's warnings, notably in the parable of the Taxes (Mt 13<sup>35-36</sup> 23-24 47-50). These passages further indicate that at the Day of Judgment mankind will be gathered together before the Judgment-throne by the angels—a further utilization by Jesus of a conventional Messianic expectation.

7. There is a critical question as to whether many of these sayings concerning a Messianic Judgment-day may not be a reflexion of the Apostolic hope rather than the express teaching of Jesus. This is particularly true in the case of all passages quoted from Mt 25<sup>1-46</sup>. It is not possible, however, so to explain all the teaching contained in the Gospels. Objective criticism must decide that many, if not a great majority, of these sayings come from Jesus Himself. The only ground upon which they can be rejected as genuine logia is the dogmatic presupposition that Jesus was superior to, and independent of, current Messianism. Such a position is difficult, however, in view of the relation of Jesus to His times, and His undoubted expectation that He would return with completed Messianic dignity. It is an unsafe method of criticism which determines first what Jesus could or could not have said, and then makes this determination the critical criterion by which to decide His relation to the current of developing Messianism. His superiority to the apocalyptic expectation of His contemporaries is no more marked than His use of certain elements of their hope for the coming of the eschatological Messianic era. Yet it is to be borne in mind constantly that here, as in so much of the teaching of Jesus, a new content is given by Him to current vocabularies and concepts. The standards of judgment are no longer those of the apocalyptic writers. Ethnic prerogatives are swept away. A man's destiny is to be settled not by his relation to Abraham, but by his relation to God. Not even those who called Him 'Lord,' but those who did God's will, were to enter the kingdom of heaven. Care bestowed upon a poor disciple was an assurance of the bliss of heaven. Such a change of moral values carries Jesus over into something other than a mechanical doctrine of rewards and punishments and of statutory merit. Instead of a balancing of good deeds and bad, it is evident from both the Synoptics and the Fourth Gospel that He recognized in eternal life the summum bonum, which is quite other than the sensuous joys of Enoch and some of the Rabbis. Eternal life with Jesus is not an artificial reward, but rather the consummation of personality which is determined by faith and relationship with God, and includes the resurrection of the body. The Day of Judgment, however else it may be used by Jesus, is primarily a pedagogical point of contact with morals and religion. It is an integral point of His teaching, not in the sense that it was an opportunity for God to wreak vengeance upon the enemies of the Jews, but in that it expressed the outcome of life, which is always to be lived in view of an impending eternity. The imagery with which He clothes this fundamental idea is Jewish, and must be treated in the same method as all prophetic imagery. But in such treatment it is impossible to deny that Jesus distinctly teaches that the final destiny of mankind is a matter that lies beyond death, and is conditioned by one's life before death. Any constructive use of the concept of the Day of Judgment, as it is described in the Gospels, is accordingly subject to the general considerations which must obtain in the constructive use of the entire Messianic scheme of Judaism as it appears in the NT. So far as Jesus Himself is concerned, this is one of the inevitable problems of His position as a revelation of God in terms of a historically conditioned individuality. The truth of Christianity in this, as in others of its phases, does not rise and fall with the finality of its expository and pedagogical concepts. Within the concept of the Day of Judgment lies the profound recognition on the part of Jesus of the fact that a man's ultimate destiny will be fixed in accordance with the immutable laws of God. To be saved is something more than to win the blessings of an acquittal at the judgment-day of Judaism. It is rather to possess a quality of life due to the soul's relation with God through faith, which will eventuate in those blessed results which are pictured by the Gospels in terms of the apocalypse.

ii. IN THE TEACHING OF THE APOSTLES.—In the teaching of the Apostles the Day of Judgment has a position quite as central as in the teaching of Jesus. But even more important is it in what may be called their system of teaching. With them as with Jesus, the chief end of faith is the achievement of salvation, that is, eternal life; but their thought is more formally concentrated on the events of the great day. St. Paul draws out the logical relations of these elements more elaborately than any of the other NT writers, but it is easy to see that there is no radical difference at this point between him and them. All alike held that there was no escaping the Judgment of God (Ro 2<sup>2</sup>, cf. He 9<sup>27</sup>, Gal 1<sup>8</sup>, 2<sup>12-13</sup>).

1. The term 'day of judgment' does not occur in the Pauline teaching, and in fact only in 2 Peter and 1 John. The day is commonly denominated 'the judgment,' and even more frequently is referred to in specific phrases as 'that day' or 'the day' (1 Co 3<sup>13</sup>). With this must be identified also the 'day of Christ,' although the term has a somewhat wider connotation (see DAY OF CHRIST) (1 Co 1<sup>8</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>4</sup>, Ph 1<sup>10-12</sup>), or 'day of the Lord' (1 Th 5<sup>2</sup>). In one or two instances also it is called 'the great day' (Jude<sup>6</sup>, Rev 6<sup>17</sup>). The belief in the same great assize is to be seen lying behind the idea of condemnation (epiμa) which is so frequently met with in the NT.

2. It is around this Day of Judgment, as one of the elements in the establishing of the Messianic era, that the 'judgment' of the Apostles continually circles. All of them referred to it as one of the things to be assumed as believed in by all Christians (He 6<sup>2</sup>, epiμa). It might seem strange to the heathen (Ac 17<sup>31</sup>), but it was one of the elementary expectations of all Jews and proselytes.

It was to come within the lifetime of men living during the first age, and its awards would be final for the eternity which then began. Its subjects were to be all mankind, as St. Paul elaborately argues in the opening chapters of Romans. They were to be both the living and the dead. This, of course, implies the bringing of the dead from Sheol, and therefore accounts for the exceptional expressions which speak of the 'resurrection of judgment' (Jn 5<sup>29</sup>, cf. Ac 10<sup>42</sup>, Rev 20<sup>12-13</sup>). Such a resurrection of the dead must be treated as something other than the acquisition of the body of the resurrection, which was to be a part of the great reward of the believer. In accordance with the apocalyptic literature, angels were also to be judged, and that, too, by the saints (1 Co 6<sup>2-3</sup>).

3. This universality of the Judgment lay at the bottom of much of the discussion concerning justification by faith. The Christians believed that they, as well as others, were to stand before the Judgment-seat of Christ to give an account of the deeds done in the body. The conditions of acquittal at the Judgment were conceived by the Jerusalem Church as including participation in the blessings promised exclusively to Jews as sons of Abraham. In the case of the party of the circumcision, at least, it was the belief of the Jerusalem Church that believing Jews and proselytes alone were to be acquitted in the Day of Judgment. The Pauline position, that any one who had accepted Jesus as Christ was to be acquitted, was exposed to certain misapprehensions. On the one hand, St. Paul insisted that it was not necessary for those who believed in Jesus as Christ to be subject to the Law as a statutory enactment; on the other hand, he was aware that the Christian life was far enough from being in absolute conformity with the will of God. How then could believers hope to be acquitted? His reply is that they know they are to be acquitted because they have the Holy Spirit, the first instalment of the heritage of salvation.

His answer to the consequent question why a man who no longer feared condemnation at the Judgment of God should be good, constitutes one of the most vital of his ethical teachings. It amounts to this: Realize in conduct the moral possibilities of the regenerate self. His answer to the more particular question as to what should happen to erring Christians at the Judgment is equally profound. In 1 Co 3<sup>13</sup> he argues that the foundation of faith in Jesus Christ must always abide, but that the building which each believer erects upon this foundation may be worthless. His figure clearly teaches that the Christian is subject to the Judgment as truly as any one else, and that although he will be given the body of the resurrection and the other blessings of salvation, he will also suffer certain losses. At this point, therefore, there is to be seen the rudiments of a logical doctrine as to rewards and punishment which is far enough from the mechanical expectation of the apocalypses. And, further, it must be added that the early Church believed that it was possible even for those who, so far as could be judged by ordinary standards, had accepted Jesus as Christ, to fall away and be ultimately lost. Christians were always in danger of committing sins which at the Judgment would shut them out of the kingdom of God (Gal 5<sup>4</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>9-10, 11</sup>, Ro 13<sup>3-4</sup>). It is clear, therefore, from such teaching, that St. Paul moved over into the moral as distinct from the purely formal field. The Judgment-day is something other than the time of registering the arbitrary decrees of God, and becomes the time when the ultimate destinies of men are determined by their actual moral conditions, these conditions including, rather than being supplanted by, faith in Jesus.

4. The details of the day are not clearly worked out by the Apostles. In their case, as in that of Jesus, there is the double expectation that both God and Jesus will be the Judge. In the Apostolic thought, however, the recognition of Jesus as Judge (assisted, as has already been pointed out, by the saints, 1 Co 6<sup>2</sup>) is very distinct. He is to sit upon the throne, and mankind is to stand before Him, and bow to Him, and be subject to Him. At the same time the correlation between His position and that of God is distinctly made (Ro 2<sup>13</sup>). He is to be God's agent, and at 'the end' is to give over the kingdom to the Father (1 Co 15<sup>24</sup>).

5. In the Apocalypse there are two Judgment-days spoken of. The first, which is established at the appearance of Jesus, is confined to the worldly powers, and Satan is then bound and shut up in the abyss (Rev 20<sup>1-3</sup>). Then follows the reign of Christ on earth for a thousand years, which is ushered in by the resurrection of the martyrs (20<sup>4-6</sup>). At the end of this period of one thousand years the great day of God (16<sup>19</sup>) comes, in which all those believers who survive and the members of the one thousand years' kingdom are carried up to heaven, and all the dead are raised to stand before the Judgment-seat of God (20<sup>12-13</sup>). Here again there must be a distinction drawn between the idea of the ascension from Sheol and the acquisition of the body of the resurrection. At this final Judgment the evil are sent to the lake of fire (21<sup>8</sup>), where they continue in endless misery. In this last Judgment it may be noticed also that one's future is determined by the records in the books of the Judge (20<sup>12, 13</sup>).

6. As in the case of the teaching of Jesus, the award at the Day of Judgment for the wicked is eternal condemnation, which is described in a variety of ways, chief among which are 'destruction,' 'fire,' and 'death,' the general term for such misery being the anthropomorphic expression 'wrath of God.' For believers there is, on the other hand, salvation which, in the resurrection of the body, marks the completion of that eternal life already begun in the earthly life of the believer through the presence of the Spirit in the believer's heart.

7. It is improbable that the Church of the NT times ever ceased to think of the Day of Judgment as a distinct point in time, and of the coming of Christ as a definite event of the future (Ac 24<sup>15</sup>, Ro 2<sup>5</sup>). See PAROUSIA. Such late books as Jude and 2 Peter are particularly emphatic as to His coming, although the writer of 2 Peter is obviously perplexed at the delay in the return of Jesus (2 P 3<sup>3</sup>).

8. It is at this point, however, that one realizes more clearly than ever the impossibility of treating any one of the particular elements of the Christian eschatological Messianic hope apart from the others. The reason for this lies in the origin of the hope. In so far as it is not the outcome of the historical facts of Jesus' life, death, and resurrection, it is the bequest of Judaism to the Christian Church. As such, its component elements are really phases of one hope, and are so inextricably combined as to make it almost impossible to separate them. The Parousia, the Day of Christ, the Day of Judgment, the resurrection of the dead, are all alike different aspects of the same great event toward which the whole creation moves. They all embody the fundamental expectation of early Christianity, that the Christ who had been crucified would shortly return to establish His Messianic kingdom. In such an establishment there was involved the punishment of all those who were the enemies of God and of His Christ, as well as the rewarding of those who were His loyal subjects. Its terrors were as far as possible from being figurative to the early Christians.

From the time of Pentecost onwards men were first warned of the approach of the Judgment which all Jews expected, and were then told how by faith in Jesus as Christ and Lord they might gain acquittal in that Judgment. It is further noteworthy that in all matters relating to the future condition of mankind and the method of escaping punishment and winning salvation at the Day of Judgment, all the Christian writers are essentially at one. Differences in emphasis and methods of presentation should not be permitted to obscure this identity in essentials.

Such an expectation embodies both permanent and transitory elements. Those are transitory which depend upon an impossible cosmology and a literal monarchical conception of God's relation to the world. Those are permanent which embody the immutable laws of the moral world and the facts of the historical Jesus (including His resurrection). To distinguish between these two groups of elements is not difficult for the historical student, and will result in a larger appreciation of the fundamental truth of an apocalyptically conceived Judgment-day. See also ESCHATOLOGY.

LITERATURE.—This is voluminous, but it is often dogmatic and apologetic in character. The unhistorical method of treatment will be found set forth in all the old treatises on theology. On the Day of Jahweh see J. M. P. Smith, 'The Day of Jahweh,' AJTh, 1901, p. 501 f. Views of Judaism may be found in Bonser, Relig. des Judentums, 245, 248; Weber, Jüd. Weiss (Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes); Wernle (Beginnings of Christianity), Feilig (Der Menschensohn, Leck, IV.), and Baldensperger (Das Selbstverständnis Jesu) treat the subject from the point of view of Judaism, and of Jesus' teaching concerning His relation to the Kingdom of God. Teichmann (Die Paulin. Vorstellungen von Auferstehung und Gericht), Koenig (St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things), Rabisch (Eschatol. des Paulus) discuss the teaching of St. Paul on the subject. DAY (THAT).—It was near the close of His ministry that the Lord began to speak especially of the Last Things. At an early stage we find a reference to 'that day' (Mt 7<sup>2</sup>). The hypocrites will plead in vain, in that day, how they had professed Christ. The day is the Day of Judgment, the day of the sealing of citizenship in the Kingdom of heaven. There is also a reference to 'that day' in the Commission to the Apostles. It will be more tolerable for Sodom in that day than for a city that will not receive them (Lk 10<sup>12</sup>). Here the parallel denunciation in the First Gospel gives 'in the day of judgment' (Mt 10<sup>15</sup>). Thus 'that day' is a phrase to denote the terrible day which is ever imminent, the day of Christ's coming to judge the world and inaugurate His universal reign. But among His last words the Lord included warnings of the fate of Jerusalem as well as of the doom of the world. These messages about the end of the city and the end of the world are intertwined in the Synoptic records of the close of His ministry. Reasonable care should not fail to disentangle the threads. The expression 'in that day' is used, for instance, to refer quite plainly to the fall of Jerusalem (Lk 17<sup>34</sup>; in Mk. and Mt. 'those days'). But then the phrase has its usual significant euphemistic use for the day of Christ's coming in judgment in all three Gospels where they recount the Lord's solemn warnings to be ready (Mt 24<sup>36</sup>, Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, Lk 21<sup>36</sup>). 'That day' is in the foreknowledge of God alone; it will come on the whole world as a surprise to the unready. It may be immediate in its coming (Lk 12<sup>36</sup>), and it will be quick as lightning when it does come (Mt 24<sup>27</sup>). Evidently 'that day' is an epoch; not an era, but the beginning of one era and the end of another. 'That day' of the revelation of the Son of Man will be as sudden and final as the experiences of Noah and Lot appeared to each (Lk 17<sup>29</sup>). As the end of this present age is the beginning of the reign in glory of Christ and His redeemed, the allusion to 'that day' at the Last Supper may be understood in the same sense as hitherto. In 'that day' the Kingdom shall be established, and all things shall be new, and the King will drink the new wine first again in 'that day' (Mk 14<sup>25</sup>, Mt 26<sup>29</sup>). On this pathetic promise of the Saviour on the eve of His crucifixion Irenaeus comments: 'promisit . . . ostendens, et hereditatem terra in qua bibitur nova generatio vitis, et carnalem resurrectionem discipulorum Ejus' (v. xxxiii. 1).

St. John's references to 'that day' are to an era, however, rather than to an epoch (Jn 14<sup>20</sup> 16<sup>22, 23</sup>). 'In that day' the disciples shall recognize their Lord's Divinity, and pray to the Father in His name. In the Fourth Gospel, therefore, the phrase describes the era which had its beginning at Pentecost when the Holy Spirit was bestowed so fully upon the Church.

DAYSFRING.—The dawn or beginning of the day; cf. for the word 1 S 9<sup>25</sup>, Job 38<sup>12</sup>; in NT only Lk 1<sup>78</sup> (ἀνατολή), but cf. the prophecy quoted Mt 4<sup>18</sup> (φῶς ἀνατείλει ἀπ' αὐτοῦ). Zacharias saw, in the remarkable events taking place, the coming of the new day and the dawning of hope for Israel: 'the Lord, the God of Israel, hath visited and wrought redemption for his people' (v. 68); 'the dayspring from on high shall visit us' (RV fut. NB). Ἀνατέλλει is often used for the rising of the sun (Mt 13<sup>43</sup>, Mk 16<sup>7</sup>, Jn 1<sup>11</sup>) and stars (Nu 24<sup>17</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>10</sup>), and ἀνατολή, either in sing. or plur. form, for the East (Mt 21<sup>2</sup> etc.). In Rev 7<sup>16</sup> φῶς is added, and there RV substitutes 'sunrising' for AV 'east.' In LXX ἀνατολή occurs for the rising of the moon (Is 60<sup>1</sup>). Light frequently stands for salvation and deliverance (Is 58<sup>10</sup> 60<sup>1</sup>, Mal 4<sup>2</sup>, Lk 23<sup>3</sup>), and was specially applied to the Messiah, cf. Jn 1<sup>9</sup> etc., Eph 5<sup>14</sup> (see Edersheim, Life and Times, ii. 166). For ἀνατολή ἔξ ὑψους in Lk 1<sup>78</sup> Vulg. has oriens ex alto. ἔξ ὑψους, 'from on high,' presents some difficulty, as dawn does not come from on high; perhaps the ref. to a bright shining star is more in keeping (Meyer): 'He is the Daystar from on high, bringing a new morning to those who sit in the darkness and death-shadows of the world' (Liddon, Bamp. Lect. p. 248). Godelt would connect these words with ἐκασφύρα ('it is from the bosom of Divine mercy that this star comes down, and it does not rise upon humanity until after it has descended and has been made man'), but this seems hardly necessary; ἔξ ὑψους represents 'from God,' and ἀνατολή ἔξ ὑψους is simply 'God's Messiah' (Dalman, The Words of Jesus, pp. 223, 224).

A different translation is based on the fact that ἀνατολή in LXX stands several times for πῦρ, a 'shoot' or 'branch,' one of the prophetic names of the Messiah (Jer 23<sup>5</sup>, Zec 3<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>12</sup>; cf. Jer 40<sup>37</sup> Theod.). So Edersheim: 'Although almost all modern authorities are against me, I cannot persuade myself that the expression rendered "dayspring" is not here the equivalent of the Heb. πῦρ 'branch' (op. cit. I. 158 n.). But it seems a fatal objection that none of the other expressions in the passage correspond ('to shine upon' ἰσχυροῦμαι, 'to guide' κατευθύνω); and ἔξ ὑψους causes much greater difficulty (cf. Is 11). Best wishes to combine the two meanings by supposing a play of words on the sprouting branch and the rising star; no Hebrew word will bear the double meaning, but LXX comes near identifying this Messianic name with the appearance of light when it renders Is 42<sup>6</sup> ('in that day shall the branch (πῦρ) of the Lord be beautiful and glorious') by ἰσχυροῦμαι ἡ ἑστὴ ἐν βροχῇ μετὰ ζῆλου. If the source of Lk. be Aramaic, ἀνατολή may stand for some other word; cf. its use for πῦρ 'brightness' (Is 60<sup>1</sup>), and in one MS, Q<sup>22</sup>, for πῦρ 'rising' (Is 60<sup>1</sup>). See the Comm. of Godelt and Plummer, loc. cit.

W. H. DUNDAS.

DEAD, THE (cf. νεκροί).—1. The reverence and regard due from the living to the dead, according to the ideas which the Jews shared with other nations, are clearly illustrated in the Gospels. All honour is paid to the corpse in preparation for burial: it is anointed with spices and unguents (Mk 16<sup>1</sup>, Lk 23<sup>56</sup>, Jn 19<sup>39</sup>; cf. what Jesus says in Mk 14<sup>8</sup>), and wrapped in fitting cerements (Mk 15<sup>46</sup> etc.). Reverent burial is given, the funeral train following the body borne unconfined upon a bier (Lk 7<sup>14-15</sup>). The omission of any mention of burial in the case of Lazarus in the parable (Lk 16<sup>22</sup>), as contrasted with the case of the rich man, who 'had a funeral,' bespeaks a poor abject. The dead are bewailed by kinsfolk (Jn 11<sup>31, 32</sup>), by sympathetic neighbours, and by hired mourners (Mk 5<sup>38</sup>, Mt 9<sup>23</sup>). Jesus in the noteworthy saying in Lk 9<sup>60</sup> (=Mt 8<sup>22</sup>), 'Let the dead bury their dead,' overrides a chief charge on filial affection, the burial of a father, as He emphasizes the paramount claims of discipleship. Such observances are not only the expression of natural grief; they involve belief in the continued existence of the dead, as is also the case with other forms of duty to the dead such as are insisted on in the Talmud. E.g. their wishes are to be respected and fulfilled (Git. 14b), they are free from all obligation (Shab. 30a), it is unlawful to speak evil of them (Berakh. 19a)—cf. the familiar proverb, De mortuis nil nisi bonum.

2. The teaching of Jesus concerning the dead.—Whatever may be gathered from the words of Jesus touching the state of the dead is to be regarded in the light of the current Jewish beliefs of His day, to see how far He sanctions such beliefs, and in what respects He corrects and modifies them. The tenets of the Sadducees, denying the resurrection, future retribution, and indeed any continuance of personal being after death, constituted a sectarian opinion from the standpoint of later Judaism. The Sadducees, it is true, seemed to adhere to the older teaching of the OT, wherein for the most part nothing is allowed concerning the dead (רִשְׁפְּהֵימ) but a thin, shadowy existence in Sheol. They were, however, influenced in this respect by Hellenism and their affection of culture rather than zeal for the earlier Jewish faith (Schürer, HJP ii. ii. 38 f.). The common belief, illustrated in the later literature of Judaism, was virtually that of the Pharisees, who held that the soul is imperishable, that rewards and punishments follow 'this life under the earth' (cf. Lat. Apocry.), that for the wicked there is an eternal imprisonment, but for the righteous a resurrection to eternal life (Jos. BJ ii. 8; Ant. xviii. 1). This resurrection is connected with the glory of the Messianic kingdom.

Jesus definitely repudiates the Sadducean view (Mk 12<sup>24, 27</sup>), and endorses, as to its substance, that of the Pharisees. (For a different view, cf. E. White, Life in Christ, ch. 16). In His dealing with the Sadducees and their catch-question on this subject (Mk 12<sup>27-28</sup> and parallels), He teaches that the dead are really alive and in a state of consciousness. So also in the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>), with a sharp distinction between experiences of misery and bliss as entered upon by souls after death. This parable also favours the belief in the soul's direct and immediate entrance upon this new conscious state, as do our Lord's words in Lk 23<sup>42</sup> 'To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise.' We are not, however, to allow a literal interpretation of His language in this connexion to dominate our appreciation of what the Gospels afford as regards belief concerning the state of the dead. The expression 'Abraham's bosom,' e.g., is of no dogmatic value to us, though suitable and significant to the men of our Lord's day. Similarly with the other pictorial elements; they are only of the same order as the imagery with which other faiths have invested ideas concerning the hereafter. The matter of abiding importance here is the teaching that at death a judgment already takes effect, the portion of the soul in the after life being determined with direct reference to the life lived in the present world, with results that may be in startling contrast to the estimates of a man and his condition formed by his fellow-men here. This conception seems to find expression in a symbol found on early Christian tombs in Phrygia, viz. an open book or set of tabellae, which Ramsay explains as 'indicating death and the judgment of God after death; the tablets are open to indicate that the process of judgment has begun' (see art. in Expositor, March 1905, p. 223).

Such a representation of the condition of the dead in Hades is not, however, to be understood as excluding a remoter crisis in the soul's history, such as is suggested by the prominent NT conception of 'the judgment' and 'the day of judgment.' As Weiss says, the retribution thus set forth as befalling a soul in Hades 'does not exclude an ultimate decision as to its final fate' (Theol. of NT, I, p. 156 note, Eng. tr.). 'Abraham's bosom' or 'Paradise,' moreover, does not denote a final and 'perfect consummation and bliss,' in the eschatological views of the Jews in the time of Christ. The resurrection lies beyond. Jesus in His encounter with the Sadducees uses the language of His time, and speaks of the resurrection as a transition and crisis awaiting the dead (Mk 12<sup>28</sup>, Mt 22<sup>32</sup>). The wording of the Lukan account (20<sup>38</sup>) is particularly noticeable—οὐ δὲ καραϊσθησὶς τοῦ αἵματος ἐκείνου τυχεῖν κ. τῆς ἀναστάσεως τῆς ἐκ νεκρῶν. There is an 'age to come' (rather than 'world,' see Dalman, Works Jesus, Eng. tr. p. 183), which is to be attained by those that shall have been deemed worthy of it, an age evidently to be thought of as ushered in by the resurrection from among the dead. That age (= 'the kingdom' elsewhere), embodying the highest hopes of the Jews for the hereafter, answers to all the highest conceptions as to human destiny found amongst people of other faiths. And evidently it is not immediately attained at death, according to the language of Jesus. If, then, an accumulation of weighty considerations seems to some to support the doctrine of an intermediate state for those who have passed from this life—a doctrine already familiar to the Jews in our Lord's time (see Salmond, Chr. Doct. of Immortality, p. 345 f.)—the teaching of the Gospels offers no definite opposition. A state, i.e., not simply of vague gloom or attenuated being, but of vivid consciousness; for the blessed dead 'a condition in fellowship with God, containing in itself the germ of an everlasting heavenly life towards which it tends' (Wendt, Lehre Jesu, Eng. tr. i. p. 223), with progress and growth from more to more; and in the case of others, a state affording room for the hope that there a solution is to be found for a multitude of otherwise inscrutable life problems in regard to man's salvation. Such comfortable words as Jn 14<sup>2-3</sup> 17<sup>24</sup> do not conflict with this conception as regards the state of the blessed dead, and they are to be thought of as being 'with Christ' in a manner which is 'very far better' (Ph 1<sup>23</sup>) than what may be known in the present life.

Salmond (op. cit. ch. 6), arguing on the whole against the doctrine of an intermediate state, relies mainly on the fact that no positive doctrine of this kind is found in Christ's words, and observes that towards this subject 'His attitude is one of significant reserve'; but this repression à priori of itself tells just as much one way as the other. Those who maintain that death brings irrevocable doom to all and admit immediately to full and final destiny, are hard pressed by manifold difficulties. What expedients they are driven to in order to mitigate these are illustrated, e.g., in Bandier After Death. The author eagerly urges how much is possible in the way of repentance and pardon even in articulo mortis. 'After all intercourse between the dying and their friends has ceased, a saving work of God proceeds'; 'repentance and faith, pardon and sanctification, may proceed with speed and power such as were never evoked in previous years' (p. 260 f.). Gladly to the credit of his heart, in anxiously maintaining his position he also advances considerations which lead, he thinks, to the conclusion that 'the proportion of the finally lost to the saved will be about as the proportion of the criminal part of England's population to all the rest' (p. 244 f.). The consideration of the solemn subject of final destiny lies beyond the scope of this article.

3. Christ's figurative use of the term 'dead.'—The use of the term as descriptive of a certain spiritual condition, unperceiving, unresponsive, is illustrated in the saying of Lk 9<sup>60</sup>, quoted above. In Lk 15<sup>24</sup> it occurs as tantamount to 'lost.' The dead spoken of in Jn 5<sup>21-29</sup>, to whom the Son gives eternal life, are so described in virtue of their condition prior to their believing on Him.

DEAF AND DUMB.—1. Link between deafness and dumbness.—(a) It appears impossible to separate these two maladies of deafness and dumbness, whether one approaches them from the standpoint either of the scientist or of the student. The consequence of the former disease is that the sense of hearing is diminished or abolished; the consequence of the latter is that the power of articulating sounds is defective or impossible. There is, indeed, no physiological connexion between the maladies; but the acute stage of either leaves the patient now with a correspondent incapacity of hearing, now with a correspondent incapacity for speaking. The acutest form of these maladies is seen when congenital; then the link is observed at its closest: the maladies, so to speak, draw into one, and the remedies which surgery or treatment, and the artificial aids of hand, or lip, or sign language can afford, are invariably applied as if these maladies had some common source and a unity of their own.

(b) This conception of an inherent unity between deafness and dumbness is curiously illustrated by the Greek adjective with which this article is chiefly concerned. κωφός is derived from the root κωρ, i.e. that which is smitten, crushed, or blunted, opposed to ἄξος, 'sharp,' 'keen.' Thus κωφός is used in Homer of a blunt weapon,* of the dumb earth † [cp. Lat. bruta tellus], and, with a wonderful picturesqueness, of the noiselessness of a wave before it crashes upon the shingle. ‡ It is thus only by a slight metaphorical turn that the adjective stands to describe the impairment or loss of powers of the mind or body; and so of vision, of hearing, and articulating.

2. Evidence in the Gospels.—In the Gospels κωφός (the word is not found outside them in the NT) is applied only to the two maladies under discussion, i.e. to describe the dwarfed and blunted powers of the deaf and dumb. Indeed, as it furnishes a common description of both maladies, a less careful student would be in danger, at least in the chief characteristic passage (Mk 7<sup>31-37</sup>), of mis-rendering, or rather misapplying, the adjective, which plainly signifies 'deaf.' But later in the same Gospel (9<sup>2</sup>) κωφός probably means 'dumb.' This free transference of the adjective by the same writer, as descriptive now of the one malady and now of the other, is clearly not due to any scientific knowledge of the Second Evangelist; it was enough for him that it connoted the crushing, maiming character of both diseases. It is curious to note that even St. Luke the physician, in the three passages in which the word occurs, uses κωφός in this double application (1st 11th of dumbness, 7th of deafness). St. Matthew again uses the expression indifferently as applicable to deafness (11th) or dumbness (9th).

It is, of course, mainly on our Lord's works of healing that the interest of the question turns. A glance will be sufficient at the striking passage in the opening of St. Luke's Gospel (1st 14th) in which the announcement of the birth of the Baptist was made to the aged Zacharias. It is significant to observe that Zacharias was on this occasion the victim not merely of lack of faith in the angel's message, but of real alarm at the vision. The penalty for this lack of faith was temporary speechlessness. Its infliction was indeed pronounced by Gabriel, but it may well be supposed that it was brought about by natural causes. There are many instances in which sudden emotion has brought on deafness or dumbness, and, strangely enough, there are instances on record in which a sudden emotion, like terror, has led to the restoration of lost powers of this character. The medical faculty always regard hopelessly patients who have become suddenly deaf or dumb from these instantaneous causes, and it may be assumed that neither Zacharias himself nor his friends regarded the visitation as permanent, apart from Gabriel's consoling limitation of its consequences.

Two miracles recorded by St. Mark have suggestions about the deaf and dumb which are full of interest, and to which only inadequate commentary is possible within the space of this article. The former is that wrought by the Lord, on the edge of the Holy Land, upon an unnamed sufferer (Mk 7th 31-37). He is described as deaf, and as having an impediment in his speech. The strange term here employed (ν. 7), which does not occur elsewhere in NT and is found only once in LXX (Is 35th), indicates at once the closeness of link between the two maladies which has been already emphasized, and also declares that the man was not so dumb as he was deaf. He spoke, but only with difficulty; a trial, no doubt, to others as to himself. In this narrative, given by St. Mark with such extraordinary vividness of detail,—the taking aside, the mysterious remedies applied, the sigh, the word spoken, not of magic but of power,—in all these we see the Divine figure of the Son of Man as traced by St. Mark, in His compassion for suffering humanity, in His teaching as significant by action as by word, in His sublime confidence that He had that to give, for which He looked not in vain from heaven. St. Mark puts in simple, unscientific terms the record of the cure. The sufferer's ears were opened, his tongue was no longer a prisoner, speech came back orderly and intelligible to those around.

The other miracle, also recorded by St. Mark (9th 17-23), is upon one whose dumbness was linked with demoniacal possession. An examination of the passage shows how the case had baffled Christ's disciples. The father of the possessed felt that he had in the Great Teacher his final resort. Our Lord's question elicited the reply that the malady, aggravated by demoniacal suggestion, was congenital. The man's dumbness was of the acutest form. The narrative of the miracle is not out of line with the experience of the medical faculty. It is not only that deafness and dumbness are allied, but the patient at his worst and unhappiest suffers some form of dementia or idiosyncrasy. With the former instance, which lacked the distressing epileptic symptoms, our Lord dealt directly. In the latter He faces an evil, hostile power, 'Thou speechless * and dumb spirit, come out of him, and enter no more into him.' The former cure was calmly, quietly brought about. This was accompanied by awful convulsions. But the issue in both was the same, neither physical defects nor demoniacal agency resisted the word of pity and of power.

It is to be observed that none of our Lord's miracles excited such interest or won such admiration as those wrought upon the deaf and dumb. This would answer to common experience. The restoration of sight to the blind, for it is none other than this which special treatment in Germany seems now and again to have brought about, and of which one marvellous instance is known to the present writer, would not cause such astonishment as the recovery of a deaf or dumb friend. Blindness does not interrupt personal relationship as deafness and dumbness do, and, the moment hearing and speech are recovered, the results and consequences are communicable to others. It is no wonder, therefore, that the astonishment of the multitude passed into praise. Its verdict was, 'He hath done all things well' (Mk 7th).

3. Spiritual applications of deafness and dumbness.—The senses of which these human bodies of ours stand possessed are so wondrous in their character and operations, that one would expect to find in Holy Scripture lessons drawn from them of great spiritual import. And so it is. The open eye, clear, candid, trustful, is a figure of faith throughout both Testaments (Ps 119th 121st, Pr 20th, Mk 8th, Jn 12th, Ro 11th). With equal force the open ear is significant of obedience. Students of the Father and of the Prophets will bear in mind the denunciations poured, both for spiritual deafness and dumbness, upon a people which refused to listen to the voice of Jehovah, and which was silent when the Divine Name and His praise were concerned (Ps 81st etc., Is 6th). On the other hand, again, through both Testaments, from Samuel to St. John the Divine, a commendation and blessing has ever attended the ear willing to receive, the lips open to prayer and to praise. It is in and through the combination of these that the message of the Gospel can be disseminated (Ro 10th 17). And so of all the spiritual gifts, most dear to Apostolic men was ἰσακροῦν (Eph 6th), born of the courage of conviction and marking a mind and temper capable of standing at the last before the Son of Man. B. WHITEFOORD.

DEATH.—It belongs to the profoundly spiritual character of our Lord's thinking that He says comparatively little on the subject of physical death. His attitude towards it is indicated in the words, 'She is not dead but sleepeth' (Mt 9th = Mk 5th, Lk 8th). He recognized that man's true being was something apart from the mere bodily existence, and death thus resolved itself into a natural incident, analogous to sleep, which broke the continuity of life only in seeming. The idea is presented more definitely in the charge to the disciples, 'Fear not them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do,' etc. (Lk 12th = Mt 10th), where it is expressly declared that life resides in the soul, over which God alone has power. The accident of death, of the separation of the soul from its material body, can make little difference to the essential man.

* The rare word κωφός is used in vv. 37, 38.

The three recorded miracles of raising from the dead are, in the last resort, concrete illustrations of this side of our Lord's teaching. The Johannine account of the raising of Lazarus is indeed bound up with a more complex theological doctrine; but the Synoptic miracles, in so far as they are more than works of compassion or exhibitions of Divine power, are indicative of the transient nature of death. Jesus awakens the daughter of Jairus and the youth of Nain as if from ordinary sleep. The life which to outward appearance had ceased, had only been withdrawn from the body, and could be reunited with it at the Divine word.

Attempts have been made to connect these miracles and the whole conception of death as sleep, with the contemporary Jewish belief that for three days the soul still lingered in the neighbourhood of the dead body. The earliest stage of death might therefore be regarded as a condition of trance or slumber from which the spirit could yet be recalled. It is in view, probably, of this belief that St. John emphasizes the 'four days' that had elapsed since the death of Lazarus, whose soul must thus have finally departed from his body when Jesus revived him. But we have no indication that our Lord Himself took any account of the popular superstition, much less that He was influenced by it. His conception of death as a passing sleep was derived solely from His certainty that man, being a child of God, was destined to an immortal life. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob cannot be permanently dead, for God is not the God of the dead but of the living (Mt 22<sup>31</sup>=Mk 12<sup>26</sup>). In virtue of their relation to God they must have passed into a more perfect life through apparent death.

The traditional view of death as something evil and unnatural had therefore no place in the thought of Jesus. He nowhere suggests the idea which St. Paul took over from the OT and elaborated in his theology, that death is the punishment of sin. This prevailing Jewish belief is indeed expressly contradicted in the words concerning the slaughtered Galileans and the eighteen on whom the tower of Siloam fell (Lk 13<sup>31</sup>). Jesus there insists that death, even when it comes prematurely and violently, is not to be regarded as a Divine judgment. Sin is punished, not by physical death in this world, but by a spiritual death hereafter. This is doubtless the true interpretation of the warning, 'Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.' Destruction is in store for all sinners; and the punishment cannot therefore consist in death by violence, which falls on few. Much less can it consist in natural death, from which the good can escape no more than the wicked.

While thus regarding death as nothing but one of the incidents in man's earthly existence, our Lord anticipates a time when it will be done away. In the perfected Messianic Kingdom 'they cannot die any more' (Lk 20<sup>36</sup>). Those who survive until the Son of man returns in glory 'will not taste of death' (Mt 16<sup>28</sup>), since they will have entered on the new age in which it is abolished. Even in such passages, however, it is not suggested that death is an evil. The idea is rather that it forms part of a lower, imperfect order of things, and that this will give place entirely to a higher. Those who inherit the kingdom cannot die, 'because they are equal unto the angels' (Lk 20<sup>36</sup>), and have so entered on another condition, governed by different laws. The cessation of death is conjoined with that of marriage (rv, 35<sup>26</sup>). As the marriage relation is natural and necessary to man's earthly state, but has no place in the life of higher spirits, so with death.

Jesus, it is thus evident, has broken away from the Jewish conception, according to which the death of the body possessed a religious significance as the effect of sin. His own idea of its spiritual import is of an altogether different nature, and can be gathered with sufficient clearness from certain explicit sayings. (1) The willingness to endure death for His sake is the supreme test of faith (cf. 'Can ye drink of the cup that I shall drink of?' etc. [Mt 20<sup>22</sup>=Mk 10<sup>38</sup>]; 'If a man hate not . . . his own life also,' etc. [Lk 14<sup>26</sup>]). (2) Death is the fixed limit appointed by God to all earthly pleasures and activities. The thought of it ought therefore to guard us against over-anxiety about the things of this world, and to keep us always watchful, and mindful of the true issues of life ('This night thy soul shall be required of thee' [Lk 12<sup>20</sup>]); parable of Rich Man and Lazarus [Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>]). (3) Above all, death marks the beginning of the true and eternal life with God. This higher life can be obtained only by sacrificing the lower, and surrendering it altogether, if need be, at the call of Christ ('He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it' [Mt 10<sup>39</sup>=16<sup>25</sup>, Mk 8<sup>35</sup>, Lk 9<sup>30</sup>]).

In several Synoptic passages Jesus speaks of a death which is spiritual rather than physical. He recognizes that the mass of men are in a condition of moral apathy and estrangement from God, and out of this 'death' He seeks to deliver them. His message to John the Baptist, 'The dead are raised up' (Mt 11<sup>5</sup>=Lk 7<sup>7</sup>), would seem, in the light of the context, to bear this reference, as also the charge to the disciples, 'Raise the dead' (Mt 10<sup>8</sup>). The same thought is expressed more unmistakably in the saying, 'Let the dead bury their dead' (Mt 8<sup>22</sup>=Lk 9<sup>60</sup>), and in the words of the parable, 'This my son was dead and is alive again' (Lk 15<sup>24</sup>). Such allusions are not to be explained as simply figurative. As 'life,' to the mind of Jesus, consists in moral obedience and communion with God, so in the opposite condition He perceives the true death. It involves that 'destruction both of soul and body' which is far more to be feared than mere bodily death.

The view represented by the Fourth Gospel gives a further development to this aspect of our Lord's teaching. Death as conceived by St. John is something wholly spiritual. The idea is enforced in its full extent that physical death is only a 'taking rest in sleep,' and in no wise affects the real life (Jn 11<sup>11-14</sup>). Lazarus, although he has lain four days in the tomb, has never truly died; for 'he that believeth in me, when he is dead, continues to live' (11<sup>25-26</sup>). The miracle by which he is 'awakened out of sleep' is meant to show forth, under the forms of sense, the inward and spiritual work of Jesus. He is 'the resurrection and the life.' He has come to raise men out of the state of death in which they find themselves, and to make them inheritors, even now, of the life of God.

To understand the Evangelist's conception, we have to remember that here as elsewhere he converts into present reality what is future and apocalyptic in the Synoptic teaching. Jesus had spoken of life as a reward laid up in 'the world to come,' and had contrasted it with the 'casting out' or 'destruction' (ἀπώλεια) which is reserved for the wicked. These ideas reappear in the Fourth Gospel, divested of their pictorial, eschatological form. Life is a spiritual possession here and now, and has its counterpart in 'death,' which is likewise realized in the present world. St. John, indeed, contemplates a future in which the life, and by implication the death, will become complete and final (8<sup>51-54</sup>); but they will continue the same in essence as they already are on earth.

Death is thus regarded not as a single incident but as a condition, in which the soul remains until, through the power of Christ, it passes into the opposite condition of life. It is not, however, a state of moral apathy and disobedience, or at least does not primarily bear this ethical character. Life, in the view of St. John, is the absolute, Divine life, in which man, as a creature of earth, does not participate (see LIFE). His natural state is one of 'death,' not because of his moral sinfulness, but because he belongs to a lower world, and the life he possesses is therefore relative and unreal. It is life only in a physical sense, and is more properly described as 'death.' The work of Christ is to deliver men from the state of privation in which they are involved by their earthly nature (3<sup>o</sup>). As the Word made flesh, He communicates to them His own higher essence, and makes possible for them the mysterious transition 'from death unto life' (5th).

In this Johanne doctrine Greek-philosophical ideas, transmitted through Philo, have blended with the original teaching of Jesus as recorded in the Synoptics. The simple ethical distinction has become a distinction of two kinds of being,—earthly and spiritual, phenomenal and real. Jesus 'raises the dead' in the sense that He effects a miraculous change in the very constitution of man's nature. At the same time the ethical idea, while not directly emphasized, is everywhere implied. It is assumed that the state of exclusion from the true life is also a state of moral darkness, into which men have fallen 'because their deeds are evil' (3<sup>o</sup>). The 'recess' which Jesus promises is described in one passage (in which, however, the borrowed Pauline ideas are imperfectly assimilated) as freedom from sin (5<sup>th-26</sup>). In the great verse, 'God so loved the world,' etc. (3<sup>o</sup>), the ethical conception almost completely overpowers the theological. Men were 'perishing through their estrangement from God, and from this death God sought to deliver them by His love revealed in Christ.

DEATH OF CHRIST.—I. IN THE GOSPELS.—The aim of the present article is to examine the place of the death of Christ in the moral order of the world. What is the moral order of the world? The question may be answered as follows:—The will and purpose of God are in the way of coming to realization in the individual and social life and destiny of humanity. They are still very far from having attained to universal realization, but they are destined to reach it in the perfected kingdom of God. This is what is here understood as the moral order of the world. It began to exist and to be evolved on the earth with man's appearance as a being with a moral nature and created for a moral destiny. Its evolution is still very incomplete, but it is certainly though slowly making for a predestined end in which all men in Christ shall be morally perfect as God is; and in the moral relations of God to men, and of men to God and to one another, an order of perfect moral unity and universality shall reign for ever.

In this order of things, then, and its evolution, the death of Christ occupies a place of the highest importance and value. It is only from the point of view of this moral order of things and its evolution that the essential merits of His death can be properly understood. A consideration of it from the same point of view is called for by the methods of modern thought and inquiry. And it is only thus that the cultured Christian conscience can find true, adequate, abiding moral satisfaction. But it is necessary, in order to prevent confusion of ideas, to mark the important distinction that exists in the nature of things as they now are in man's moral history, between the moral order of the world and the moral course of the world. The moral order of the world as just defined is only one of the constituent factors of the world's moral course. Besides it there are two more. There is, on the one hand, the factor which consists of all those facts or phenomena in the individual and social life and history of mankind which fall under the designation of sin or moral evil; and, on the other, the moral government of God, which presides immanently, persistently, and universally over the relations between sin and the moral order of things or the order of righteousness. These three factors constitute that actual moral course that the world is ever following; and the predestined end of their relation to one another will be realized in the complete and eternal victory and triumph of righteousness over sin, through the unerring and all-sufficient administrative judgments of God's moral government of the world (Mt 13<sup>th-45</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>th-28</sup>). It is the moral course of the world as so understood that explains the nature and methods of the historical revelation, contained in the Bible, of God's will and purpose in their relation to man's moral life and destiny. The course of the world as so understood occupied a determinative place in our Lord's conceptions of man's moral life and destiny (see PROGRESS). And it was from the point of view of Sin, Righteousness, and Judgment that He contemplated the fullest and profoundest significance of His obedience unto death. It was on the place of His death in the moral order of the world, and as therein related to man's sin and God's governmental judgment, that He depended for the victory and triumph of Righteousness over Sin in the dispensation of the Spirit (Jn 17<sup>th-19</sup>). From the point of view here raised His death may be considered in various aspects.

1. He was put to death on the Cross. How did this happen? What were His leading thoughts about it as so viewed? He lived and died without sin. He fulfilled all righteousness in the course of His obedience unto death, freely and perfectly uniting Himself and all the activities of His will and life with the will and purpose of God, and with Him His Father was well pleased. This means that although He appeared and lived and died in the moral course of the world, He was not of the world, had absolutely no fellowship with it in so far as it was under the domination of sin. He loved sinners in their character as moral beings with perfect love. But sin He hated with perfect hatred; and He lived and died to save men and the moral course of the world from it. His life of perfect union with His Father's will and purpose in all things implied not only that He lived entirely on the side and in the interests of the moral order of the world, but also that the latter found in Him, for the first time on earth, the One Individual moral Being in whom it had secured its perfect form of manifest realization, in so far as this was possible in one life in human form. It was this fact, on the one hand, and the hatred of the men over whom the world's sin had gained complete domination on the other, that determined His way to His destiny on Calvary. This conjunction of righteousness and sin, and their creative influence on His earthly history and experience, affected Him in three ways, each of which should have a regulative effect on every one's thoughts as to the meaning and value of His death.

(1) He regarded the existence of the sin that arose and developed in increasing antagonism against Himself and His mission, in the course of His ministry, as a thing that ought not to be. Saying after saying of His, bearing on this point, seems almost to convey the impression that He must have regarded this sinful and guilty opposition, without which He would not have been put to death, as not required by the interests and objects of the moral task which He had come into the world to accomplish (Mt 23<sup>33-36</sup>, Lk 13<sup>31-35</sup> 23<sup>32-37</sup>, Jn 7<sup>18</sup> 8<sup>21-29</sup> 15<sup>17-27</sup> 19<sup>10, 11</sup>). (2) Then, again, His own words show that the inward 'moral' struggles and agonies of His life arose out of the prospect and contemplation of the development of the manifestations of the world's sin and unbelief against Him and against His claim to be entirely identified with His Father's will and purpose in all His words and deeds. His experience of inward crushing sorrow, arising from the cause alluded to, reached its culmination in the Garden of Gethsemane. But before the hour which He spent there in anguish and bloody sweat, He had foretastes of the terrible bitterness of the Passion which He knew was awaiting Him as His destiny (Mt 20<sup>28</sup> 26<sup>38-42</sup>, Jn 12<sup>27</sup>). (3) In spite of these two facts as to our Lord's thought and experience in connexion with His death, He always cherished perfectly optimistic confidence and hope as to the issues of the latter. Through the discipline of experience and through prayer He became strong enough to be obedient even unto death. He had perfect faith in His Father as the Lord of heaven and earth. He knew that all the future interests and objects of His mission and work on earth were absolutely safe in His hands. He knew before He died that His death could not hinder, but would be made to further these objects and interests (Jn 12<sup>34</sup> 18<sup>37</sup>), and the first word He spoke about His death after He had risen from the dead was, 'Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?' (Lk 24<sup>26</sup>).

2. The question now arises as to the nature, meaning, and value of our Lord's unique achievement on earth, which reached its perfect accomplishment in His death on the cross. This achievement from beginning to end was made by Him in His position as internally related to the moral order of the world, and through it to the world in its character, aspirations, and activities as under the domination of sin. His achievement, as so viewed, consisted in the perfect realization of His Father's will and purpose in His unique moral individuality, and in all the manifestations of the latter in His relations with God and with men. It is to be observed, then, for one thing of highest importance, that this achievement of His, in its nature, meaning, and value, was purely, entirely, exclusively moral. There are two considerations which place this fact in the region of absolute certainty.

In the first place, the fact has its validity in the established nature of the moral order of the world and in Christ's own place in this order. This is an order of things which has its foundations in the moral nature of God; in the moral nature of man as made in the image of God as a Moral Being; in the fact and in the nature of the moral relations between God and men and between man and man; and also in the fact that Christ as the Son of God came into the world to qualify Himself for occupying His momentous position of mediation within the sphere of the moral relations of God to men and of men to God. These are all indisputable facts, and they make it certain that the essential nature and objects of our Lord's earthly achievement, which culminated in the manner in which He met His death on the cross, were absolutely and exclusively moral. That it was so in our Lord's own way of conceiving of the nature, meaning, and value of His life of obedience unto death, is manifest from His own words, e.g., in Jn 16<sup>7-11</sup>.

But, secondly, the same conclusion follows from His attitude of resistance to the whole system of legalism which He found Judaism had developed and set up, as an order of fixed and unchangeable conditions, in the relations between God and men — between Him and them as individuals, and between Him and the Jewish nation at large as His own peculiar covenant people. The effect of this system, as being both theoretically and administratively legal, was conceived and opposed by our Lord as subversive of that moral order of things in which inward, direct, universal, and eternal relations are established between God and men (Mk 7<sup>1-23</sup>). And it is a fact written broadly and deeply in all the Gospels, that if there was anything that He ever attempted more manifestly, strenuously, uncompromisingly, and more persistently than another, it was this, viz.: to overthrow completely and for ever the entire order of ideas which rested upon the stupendous error that the direct relations between God and men are legal, that they are founded on legal conditions, that they are to be maintained, administered, and mediated by legal means, and that, therefore, they are not inward but external (Mt 5-7, 15<sup>1-20</sup> 23, Lk 11<sup>28-34</sup>, Jn 5<sup>2-17</sup> 7<sup>27-33</sup> 8<sup>21-29</sup> 12<sup>37-40</sup>). What, then, does His attitude of unreserved and bold antagonism to the legal system of Judaism imply in the point of view here considered? (1) It implies that in His position in the moral order of the world He stood on the eternal fact and truth that the direct relations between God as a Moral Being and men as moral beings are inward and therefore essentially moral. (2) It implies, again, that He stood upon the predestined fact and truth that His position and work of mediation within the domain of these relations were also essentially moral and therefore anti-legal.

3. But, further, it follows from the nature of our Lord's earthly task that the achievement of it in the manner in which He lived and died was a moral unity. His personality or moral individuality was a unity. His will was a moral unity, and the entire series of the manifold inward and outward free moral activities of His life until His last moment on the cross, were related to one another as a perfectly consistent order of moral unity. He came into the world, as He Himself always represented, on one entirely homogeneous moral undertaking; and when this undertaking was fulfilled, He spoke of it in terms which show that He regarded the finished task as one homogeneous moral result (Jn 17<sup>4</sup> 19<sup>30</sup>). In other words, our Lord's obedience in His manner of living and dying followed the law of moral continuity. His obedience unto death was regulated, on His part, by one determinative moral principle; but there was diversity of incidental moral significance and value in the various positions in which His moral vocation summoned Him to act, and to be faithful and loyal to this principle.

(1) What was the principle which constituted the perfect moral unity of His obedience unto death? It was perfect love, manifesting itself in perfect self-sacrifice and service, and in doing this, ever paying perfectly wise and loyal regard to the moral requirements of human life and destiny on the one hand, and to the moral requirements of God's holy will and purpose in relation to those human requirements on the other (Mt 20<sup>28</sup> 26<sup>39</sup>, Mk 10<sup>45</sup>, Jn 10<sup>17-18</sup> 13<sup>1-17</sup> 3<sup>16-21</sup> 4<sup>34</sup> 5<sup>17-24</sup> 8<sup>28, 29</sup>, 14<sup>22</sup> 17<sup>1-7</sup>, 24, 26). From such sayings of our Lord's as are here referred to, it is obvious that the principle which regulated all the moral activities of His life was, in effect, of the nature and compass just defined. There are no words of His reported in any of the Gospels which justify the making of any essential distinction between the nature of His obedience or moral achievement during the time of the Passion, and the nature of it prior to the hour when He allowed Himself to fall into the power of His enemies. The period of His Passion was indeed unique in two things as regards His own part in it.

From the moment that He began to pray in Gethsemane till the moment when He said 'It is finished,' on the cross, He endured unspeakable suffering, physical and moral, altogether unparalleled in His antecedent experience. Again, it was precisely during this period of His extremest suffering that all His powers of moral activity were subjected to their severest strain, and that they, under this strain, reached the highest possible point of their morally victorious, triumphant achievement. But these two facts, so distinctive of His Passion, made no real breach in the moral continuity and unity of the moral achievement of His life as a whole. His moral suffering did not begin with the last tragic hours of His life. There was an element of moral suffering in the compassion with which He was so often moved. He had looked forward to His predestined 'hour'; and His words, 'I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished' (Lk 12<sup>50</sup>), suggest that, in anticipation of His cross, He may have spent an hour or more in painful moral wrestling, in view of His destiny, long before His anticipations began actually to be realized. In any case, it may be taken as certain that there was no form of inward moral activity called forth in Him during the hours of His Passion, which had not been evoked many times over in previous situations of His life. But on the cross these moral activities of His, in the superlative degree of their strenuousness and in the transcendent magnitude of their victory over sin and temptation, eclipsed all the moral achievements of His past life. And yet in reality He died, in the sense of all that was essentially moral, as He had lived. He lived and died determined by the same moral principle, in the same spirit of love and self-sacrifice and service, and in the same spirit of perfectly wise and loyal regard to all the demands of God's will and purpose on Him, and to all the demands on Him of the world's moral needs.

This view of the moral unity of the achievement of Christ's earthly activities is the truth as it was in His own thought. His thought was this: 'Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life (ἐγὼ τίθημι τὴν ψυχὴν μου), that I might take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father' (Jn 10<sup>17-18</sup>). Now there is absolutely nothing in these words to justify any theologian in limiting the application of them to what our Lord did during the hours of His Passion. What He did then, in the exercise of His powers of moral activity, was to submit, in a way perfectly pleasing to God, to the sort of death predestined for Him. Again, for Him who was in God, and who had God in Him, 'it was not death to die.' He never was more alive, in the highest and deepest sense of the word as applied to a perfect moral being, than in the very moment on the cross when He cried with a loud voice, saying, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit' (Lk 23<sup>46</sup>). He did indeed lay down His life in submitting to His death, which He indisputably contemplated in the same way as St. Peter did in the words, 'Him . . . ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain' (Ac 2<sup>23</sup>, cf. Mt 16<sup>21</sup>, Jn 7<sup>19</sup> 8<sup>27</sup>). But how did it come to pass that He was able to lay down His life in dying, doing so in such a manner that His Father loved Him in the doing of it and for the doing of it? It so came to pass because He had never done anything else but lay down His life (ψυχὴ) in living. All the moral powers of holy love, self-sacrifice, and service that were individualized in Him as the incarnate Son of God and man's Redeemer,—these powers, which were His life, He laid down, consecrated, employed, every moment and in every situation of His life of free activity, in order perfectly to fulfil His life's vocation as determined for Him by His Father's will and purpose, and by the moral necessities of the world which He had come to save. And it was because He did all this in living that He was able so successfully and triumphantly to do it all in dying. And the effect of this truth is neither to dim the moral splendour nor to detract from the moral value of our Lord's death, but rather to reveal how great was the moral splendour and value of all the activities, words, and deeds of His life.

(2) But if His life prepared Him for dying, His death on the cross raised the moral splendour and value of His whole life to its highest powers of revelation and effect in the human soul and in the moral history of the world. The supreme distinction of the cross, as our Lord Himself understood it and trusted and hoped in it, as related to man's redemption, was the unique, stupendous, tragic conjunction of sin and righteousness and judgment, a moral tragedy of which the cross was but the outward visible symbol. The complex event for which the cross stands is the most momentous and the most creative moral event in the history of the world's moral course. In the tragic moral truth of this event God and Christ and man, God's righteousness and love in Christ, man's sin and salvation, and eternal judgment, were and are all directly concerned in the highest degree. The fact of Christ's death is thus pregnant with all the inexhaustible powers necessary for the moral regeneration of the individual human soul and of the human race. Out of this fact springs the inspiration necessary to illumine the human conscience with divinest moral ideas, and to make it live in the divinest power of moral sentiment. And it is in this internal moral renewal and its manifestations that the soul finds its true redemption and its highest life; so Christ Himself evidently thought (Jn 16<sup>21</sup>).

4. It now remains to note, from the standpoint of the moral order of the world, some features of our Lord's place and work therein, as the Mediator between God and men. His work of mediation in the flesh ended with His death on the cross, and it was preliminary to His mediation in the Spirit (Jn 14<sup>17-26</sup> 16<sup>7-11</sup>). His mediation in the Spirit, which will be continued until the Kingdom of God is perfected, is dependent for its existence and efficiency on the moral and historical conditions provided in His earthly life of obedience unto death, and in the revelation of sin, righteousness, and judgment in which the completion of His work in the flesh issued. What, then, are the nature, the objects, and the methods of our Lord's mediation?

(1) Its general object is to save individuals from their sin by reconciling them to God, to perfect them as individuals in their moral nature and life, and to unite all who are thus saved in a life of eternal oneness with God, and with one another in Him.—(2) The sphere within which the mediation of Christ is carried on with a view to that end is that of the inward and immediate moral relations of God as a moral Being to men, and of men as moral beings to God. It was so even during the time of His earthly life and ministry in so far as His mediation took real saving effect in the moral nature and life of any of His disciples. It is so still in the current dispensation of the Spirit by whose agency His mediation is brought to saving effect in souls. All the methods of the Spirit's work and all the moral effects that result from it imply the existence of internal, direct, living, moral relations between the soul and God in Christ.—(3) The mediation of Christ, as brought to effect by the Spirit's work, is in every case a relation of His mediation to the individual. For the Spirit cannot work in any number of individuals as a body unless in so far as He works in the moral nature and life of each.—(4) The mediation of Christ operates through the Spirit's agency by means of moral illumination and power—and moral illumination is always moral power.—(5) The moral means in question consist in the revelation of the holy gracious love or righteousness of God as realized by Christ, and manifested in His life and death of perfect self-sacrifice for the world's salvation. The best name for all this is 'grace'—the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, or the grace of God in Christ, which was and is no other thing than the sum of the living activities of God as holy love, evoked by man's need of salvation from sin—men as moral beings. And this grace of God in Christ is moral. It is the highest and grandest form of the self-manifestation of God as a perfect moral Being.—(6) Hence it is only by means of appropriate moral conditions, existing in the individual's own moral nature and inner life, that he can enter into and abide in a saving relation to the grace of God as mediated by Christ through the work of His Spirit. And these internal moral conditions are repentance, faith, and the spirit of free and loyal obedience to Christ or to God, all of which are essentially related to one another, in every one of which the whole of the individual's moral nature comes to forms of manifestation in harmony with the will of God, and all together have the effect of uniting the individual directly and inwardly with God in Christ.—(7) This internal, immediate union of the individual with Christ, and therefore with God, is the true way of salvation and life for man (Jn 14). This secures not only forgiveness, but every moral or spiritual blessing that the individual needs for this world and the next, every blessing that God has to give or that it is possible for Him to bestow in Christ and through the work of His Spirit in the heart. The inward, direct union of the individual with Christ through repentance, faith, and the spirit of obedience, means that the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has made him free from the law of sin and death (Ro 8<sup>1-9</sup>). This law of the Spirit of life in Christ is the law of eternal righteousness. Thus the moral regeneration of the individual through his entrance into a state of union with Christ, and with God in Him, is a new life, which carries in it the whole principle of eternal righteousness; and his union with Christ, his dependence on Christ, his fellowship with Him in the love that is of God, are guarantees that the law of righteousness will eventually receive complete fulfilment through his walking not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. And what is the law of the Spirit of life and righteousness in Christ but the law of that moral order, through which Christ Jesus, by means of His mediation, first in the flesh and then in the Spirit, is establishing and perfecting all the moral relations of individual men to God and to one another in Him? This is the new creation that Christ is evolving in the moral course of the world by means of His mediation. And, having made peace by the blood of His cross. He will continue His mediation until He has reconciled all things in heaven and on earth unto Himself, and therefore to God (Col 1<sup>20</sup>).

II. IN THE EPISTLES.—In keeping with the amount of space devoted in the Gospels to the story of Christ's Passion is the place assigned to our Lord's death in the Epistles, and the significance evidently attached to it. The material is so abundant that it is impossible to give it in full detail. All that can be attempted is a brief sketch covering the chief epistolary groups, in which, however, the Apocalypse may be included, as containing the 'Letters to the Seven Churches,' and forming an important part of the Johannine cycle. Two distinct features come before us: (1) the place given in the Epp. to the death of Christ; (2) the meaning assigned to it.

1. The place given to the death of Christ.—Beginning with 1 Peter, we see the prominence which the subject occupied in the Apostle's mind when we find him in his very first sentence speaking of 'the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ' (1<sup>2</sup>), and thereafter referring repeatedly to those sufferings of Christ on our behalf (1<sup>10</sup>, 2<sup>24</sup>, 3<sup>18</sup>, 4<sup>1</sup>) of which he himself had been a witness (5<sup>1</sup>).

Coming to St. Paul, we have not only the fact, apparent to every reader, that he set Christ's death in the forefront of all his teaching, but his testimony that in doing so he was following the example of the earlier Apostles and the primitive Church. 'I delivered unto you first of all,' he writes, 'that which also I received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures' (1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>). And St. Paul's preoccupation with the death of Christ was not a passing phase of his religious experience. We find him speaking of it in the first and last chapters of his earliest Epistle (1 Th 1<sup>10</sup>, 5<sup>10</sup>). In the great Epistles of his middle period it is his dominating thought. The Ep. to the Galatians is a passionate apologia for the gospel which he preached (1<sup>2</sup>), a gospel whose substance he sums up in the words 'Jesus Christ . . . crucified' (3<sup>1</sup>), and with regard to which he exclaims, 'God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ' (6<sup>14</sup>). In 1 Cor. he declares that when he came to Corinth he determined not to know anything there save Jesus Christ and Him crucified (2<sup>2</sup>); and further assures his converts, in a passage already referred to, that in proclaiming Christ's death 'first of all' he was only maintaining the Christian tradition as he had received it (15<sup>3</sup>). In this same Epistle he hands on (11<sup>2</sup>) the special tradition of the institution of the Lord's Supper, refers to that rite as the central purpose for which the members of the Church came together (cf. v. 13 with v. 26), and says that in the observance of this great solemnity of the Christian faith we 'proclaim the Lord's death till he come' (v. 26). 2 Cor., besides many other references, contains the great classical passage in which Christ's death is set forth as the convincing proof of His love and the basis of the ministry of reconciliation (5<sup>14</sup>). In Romans the expressions 'Christ died' and 'his death' occur more frequently than in all the rest of St. Paul's Epistles put together. 'Christ died for the ungodly; we read (5<sup>8</sup>); 'while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us' (v. 8); 'he died unto sins once' (6<sup>10</sup>); 'it is Christ Jesus that died, yea rather that was raised from the dead' (8<sup>34</sup>). Similarly, the Apostle writes, 'We were reconciled to God through the death of his Son' (5<sup>10</sup>); 'we were baptized into his death' . . . 'buried with him . . . into death,' 'united with him by the likeness of his death' (6<sup>4-6</sup>). And when we pass to the last group of the Pauline writings, although we find that in two of them, Colossians and Ephesians, the writer has a larger outlook than before, and thinks of Christ's work now as having a cosmic and not merely a human significance (Col 1<sup>20c</sup>, Eph 1<sup>10c</sup> 2<sup>20c</sup>), he still exalts Christ's death as the very core of the work He did. It is 'the firstborn from the dead' (Col 1<sup>18</sup>) who is 'the firstborn of every creature' (v. 15). 'He is before all things, and by him all things consist' (v. 17); but it is 'through death' (v. 20), 'through his blood' (v. 14), 'through the blood of his cross' (v. 20), that He brings peace and redemption and reconciliation (cf., further, Eph 1<sup>10c</sup> 2<sup>20c</sup> with 2<sup>12c</sup> 5<sup>2c</sup>).

Very different views have been taken of the relation in the mind of the author of Hebrews between the incarnation and the death of Christ. But in any case it is agreed that it is upon the latter subject that the writer's attention is especially fastened. It is in what he has to say about the death of Christ and its purpose that we find the real message of the work. It is to elucidate and illustrate this great theme that the author draws so freely upon his intimate acquaintance with the sacrificial rites and ministering priesthood of the OT Church (1<sup>3</sup> 2<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>27</sup> 9<sup>25c</sup> 10<sup>10c</sup> 11<sup>2</sup> 12<sup>2</sup> 13<sup>17</sup>).

With regard to the Apocalypse, it is noteworthy that at the very beginning of the book Jesus Christ is introduced to us as 'the firstborn of the dead,' and that the ascription immediately follows, 'Unto him that loveth us, and loosed us from our sins by his blood' (1<sup>9</sup>). And very significant surely is the constant recurrence, throughout the book, of the figure of the Lamb, a figure the meaning of which is made clear when the Lamb is described as 'the Lamb that was slain,' the Lamb by whose blood men of every nation have been 'purchased unto God' (see esp. 5<sup>9c</sup> 7<sup>14</sup> 12<sup>11</sup>). 1 Jn. is a treatise not on the death of Christ but on the 'word of life' (1<sup>1</sup>). Jesus is conceived of as the manifested life (1<sup>2</sup>), and union with Him through faith as the source of eternal life to men (3<sup>15</sup>). And yet the condition of our transition from death to life is the fact that Christ 'laid down his life for us' (3<sup>16</sup>), and a Christian life which can be described as a 'walk in the light' is secured only by the fact that Jesus Christ the righteous is 'the propitiation for our sins,' and that His blood 'cleanseth us from all sin' (1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>1-2</sup>).

2. The meaning assigned to the death of Christ.

—Having established the place given in the Epp. to Christ's death, we must now consider the meaning which is assigned to it. (1) The fundamental thought in all the groups is that the death of Christ is a manifestation of the love of God. 'God commendeth his own love toward us,' says St. Paul, 'in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us' (Ro 5<sup>8</sup>). This Pauline keynote is one that is constantly struck. In 1 Peter 'the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ' is brought into immediate connexion with 'the foreknowledge of God the Father' (1<sup>2</sup>)—a view of the Father's relation to the death of Jesus which must not be lost sight of when the Apostle exclaims in the next verse, 'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his great mercy begat us again unto a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead' (v. 3). The author of Hebrews declares that it was by the grace of God that Jesus tasted death for every man (2<sup>9</sup>), and that it was by the will of God that we were 'sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all' (10<sup>10</sup>). In 1 Jn. we have the great utterance, 'Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins' (4<sup>10</sup>).

In all these writers, then, the grace of the Heavenly Father is the source of the redemption which is bound up with the death of Christ. In the case of St. Paul the attempt is frequently made to show that his teaching on the subject of Christ's death as a necessary sacrifice for sin is inconsistent with the utterances of Jesus Himself (e.g. in the parable of the Prodigal Son, Lk 15<sup>20c</sup>) with regard to the Father's spontaneous love for sinners. But whatever St. Paul said as to the propitiatory character of the death of Christ, it is evident that he never felt that he was compromising the love of God in any way. On the contrary, he saw in God's love the original motive of Christ's sacrifice (2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>), and in that sacrifice the commendation of the Father's love (Ro 5<sup>8</sup>).

(2) Further, the death of Christ is uniformly represented as the supreme expression of the love of Christ Himself. With St. Paul this is a central and constantly recurring thought. 'The love of Christ constraineth us,' he exclaims in one of his greatest passages, 'because we thus judge, that one died for all' (2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>). 'Christ also,' says St. Peter, 'suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God' (1 P 3<sup>18</sup>). In the view of the author of Hebrews, Jesus 'offered himself' (through His death, viz., as the preceding phrase, 'the blood of Christ,' shows) to purge the human conscience (9<sup>14</sup>). And St. John writes, 'He' (i.e. Christ) 'laid down his life for us' (1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup>).

The Father and the Son are thus represented as working together in Christ's death for man's salvation, and working together from motives of love. As St. Paul expresses it, 'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself' (2 Co 5<sup>19</sup>). But Christ is not the involuntary instrument of the Father's love for men; He is Himself a willing sacrifice. He is the 'Lamb of God,' indeed, as the Baptist said (Jn 1<sup>29</sup>); but He is not 'brought as a lamb to the slaughter,' as in the dim figure of the OT prophet. Rather, as in the conception of the writer of Hebrews, He is the High Priest who makes the offering, even more than the Lamb that is laid on the altar (9<sup>14</sup>). St. Paul sums up the matter apart from the imagery of the Tabernacle and the Temple, and in the simple dialect of the heart, when he says, 'The Son of God loved me, and gave himself up for me' (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>).

(3) But while springing from the Divine love, the death of Christ is represented in the Epp. not less clearly as a propitiation for sin. According to St. Paul, as we have seen, it was the initial article of the primitive tradition that 'Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures' (1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>). And this part of the primary deposit of Apostolic testimony reappears in the witness of all the different epistolary groups. It reappears so constantly that no reader of the NT will challenge the statement that Christ's death is invariably associated with the putting away of sin (cf. 1 P 1<sup>19c</sup> 2<sup>24</sup> 3<sup>18</sup> Gal 1<sup>4</sup> 3<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>14</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>, Ro 3<sup>25c</sup> 4<sup>25c</sup>, He 9<sup>26c</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>2</sup> 4<sup>10</sup>). The discussion of the precise nature of the relation between these two magnitudes—the death of Christ and the sin of man—belongs properly to the doctrine of the Atonement (see ATONEMENT, RANSOM, RECONCILIATION, REDEMPTION). But this at least may be said, that however the matter may appear to those who deal with it from the point of view of a philosophy of the Atonement, any interpretation of the mass of NT evidence seems difficult and forced which does not recognize that, in the view of these writers, Christ's death was really our death in a vicarious and propitiatory sense—that Jesus Christ died on our behalf that death which is the fruit of sin, taking upon Himself the Divine condemnation of sin, so that there might be no condemnation to those who are found in Him. That this is the Pauline teaching is generally admitted (see Ro 3<sup>25c</sup> 4<sup>25c</sup> 5<sup>8c</sup> 8<sup>3</sup> and passim). But it seems not less the teaching of the other Epistles, if we take the language of the writers in its general connexion and natural sense. Is not this what St. Peter means when he says, 'Who his own self bare our sins in his body on the tree, that we, having died unto sins, might live unto righteousness' (1 P 2<sup>24</sup>); and when he says again, 'Because Christ also suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God' (3<sup>18</sup>)? Is it not the meaning of the author of Hebrews when he finds in the sacrifices of the Old Covenant types and shadows of the sacrifice of Christ, and speaks of Him as 'having been once offered to bear the sins of many' (9<sup>26</sup>)? And is it not the Johannine view also, seeing that we find 'Jesus Christ the righteous' described as 'the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the whole world' (1 Jn 2<sup>2</sup>, cf. 4<sup>10</sup>; see also Rev 1<sup>5</sup> 8-12)?

(4) Once more, the death of Christ is set forth in the Epp. as a death from which there springs a life of holiness. These writers relate the death of Christ to the power as well as to the guilt of sin; they conceive of it not only on the side of its propitiatory effect, but as bringing a mighty regenerating influence into the life of man. St. Peter connects the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ with sanctification of the Spirit and obedience (1 P 1<sup>2</sup>), and His death upon the tree with our living unto righteousness (2<sup>24</sup>). The author of Hebrews, who says that Christ offered up sacrifice for sins 'once for all, when he offered up himself' (7<sup>27</sup>), also says that the blood of Christ, by cleansing the conscience from dead works, sets us free 'to serve the living God' (9<sup>14</sup>). St. John, writing of those who are already Christians, declares that the blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth them from all sin (1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup>). But it is above all in the Epistles of St. Paul that we find a full treatment of this idea of Christ's death as the secret spring of a new life in the Christian himself, of a crucifixion with Christ whereby the very life of the Son of God flows into the heart (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>); of a burial with Christ which leads to a walk in newness of life, and a union with Him by a likeness to His death which carries with it the promise and the potency of a likeness to His resurrection (Ro 6<sup>4-5</sup>).

There are some modern writers who insist that there is a duality in St. Paul's view when he approaches the subject of Christ's death in its relation to sin, and who distinguish between what they call his juridical and his ethico-mystical doctrines of reconciliation. The former is sometimes represented as nothing more than the precipitate of the Jewish theology in which the Apostle had been trained, while the latter is accepted as the genuine and immediate product of his personal experience (Holtzmann, NT Theologie, II, 117f.). The common tendency among such writers is to hold that the Apostle had two quite distinct theories, which lay side by side in his mind in an entirely unrelated fashion. He set himself, it is supposed, to the high argument of showing how God and man could be reconciled, but never took the trouble to attempt to reconcile his own thoughts about the efficacy of Christ's death. This, however, seems less than just to St. Paul. His theology as a whole hardly warrants the conclusion that he had no gift of systematic thinking, or that he would be content to allow his ideas on justification and regeneration respectively to lie together in his mind without concerning himself as to any possible connexion between them. It seems in every way more reasonable to think, for example, that in Ro 6<sup>10</sup> the Apostle is not suddenly introducing a set of entirely new conceptions, connected with the sacrament of baptism, about a mystical fellowship with Christ in His death, considered as an archetypal dying unto sin, which conceptions stand in no sort of relation to all that has been said in 3<sup>20-21</sup> about justification through faith in the propitiating blood of Christ. Rather it appears natural to hold, in Professor Denney's words, that the justifying faith of which St. Paul speaks in the earlier passage 'is a faith which has a death to sin in it' (Expositor, 6th ser. iv, [1901] p. 306), so that when by faith we make Christ's death our own, sin becomes to us what it is to the Sinless One Himself—we died to it as He died, and in dying to sin become alive unto God.

J. C. LAMBERT.

DEBT, DEBTOR.—The Jews, being an inland people, and not directly interested in the world's trade, were slow to gain touch with the credit-systems of more commercial communities. But by Christ's day their business ideas, modified already in part by the Phœnicians, are seen overlaid and radically affected by Roman domination. The people, on the one hand, as they listened to the reading of the Law in public, had the OT ideal before them, which was one of notable mildness, backed by humanitarian ordinances. Debt in their old national life had been regarded as a passing misfortune, rather than a basal element in trading conditions. In the popular mind it was associated with poverty (Ex 22<sup>26</sup>), a thing that came upon the husbandman, for instance, in bad seasons (Neh 5<sup>7</sup>). Being thus exceptional, and a subject for pity, little or no interest was to be exacted (Ex 22<sup>26</sup>), and a strict tariff excluded many things from the list of articles to be taken in pledge (Dt 24<sup>6-7</sup>, Job 28<sup>7</sup>, Am 8<sup>1</sup>, etc.), while in the Seventh or Fallow year (Ex 23<sup>10-11</sup>, Lv 25<sup>1-7</sup>), and again amid the joys of Jubilee (Lv 25<sup>39-42</sup>), the poor debtor had ample reason to rejoice. There was harshness in the tone, on the other hand, of the Roman methods, which were developed more on the lines of modern commerce. Often the more impoverished the debtor, the greater the exaction, as Horace expressly puts it (Sat. I, 2, 14), 5 per cent. a month (60 per cent. per annum) being cited by him as a rate of interest not unknown.

In the Gospels we have suggestions of the money-customs of the day at Mt 2<sup>12-13</sup>, Mk 11<sup>12-13</sup>, Lk 19<sup>46-47</sup>, and Jn 8<sup>20-21</sup>. There are pictures of indebtedness in the parables of the Two Debtors (Lk 7<sup>41-42</sup>), the Talents (Mt 25<sup>14-30</sup>), and the Pounds (Lk 19<sup>12-27</sup>). Lending and repaying are seen in practice at Lk 6<sup>34</sup>; also a credit system at Lk 16<sup>5-7</sup>, if the reference there be to merchants, and not simply to those who paid rents in kind. Imprisonment for debt appears in Mt 5<sup>25-26</sup>, and in unmitigated form in the story of the Two Creditors (Mt 18<sup>23-35</sup>), with selling into slavery, accompanied by the horror of 'tormentors' (v. 34), although the whole passage is to be interpreted with caution, because Jesus in the fancied features of His tale may be reflecting, not the manners of His own land, but the doings of some distant and barbaric potentate. Enough that in the time of Christ there was seizure of the debtor's person, and the general treatment of him was cruel.

But whatever the law and custom, it was not the manner of Jesus to attack it. The civil code was left to change to higher forms in days to come. The exhibition of a certain spirit in face of it was what His heart craved, a spirit which should do justice to the best instincts of a true humanity. We can transcend in loving ways the milder aims even of bad laws; and it was the evasion of clear duty in this respect, by those in the high places of the religious world, which moved Jesus most. He was the champion of the merciful essence of the old enactments (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>), while others around Him, prating of orthodoxy the while, were harsh to those unfortunately in their power (Mt 23<sup>4</sup>), all in the name of an ancient law whose real inwardness they missed. The Sadducees, whose love of money was whetted by enjoyment of the Temple dues, were not the men to show mercy to a debtor, nor were the Pharisees behind them, more Puritanic in zeal, and rigidly enforcing the letter of their writs. 'An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth' (Mt 5<sup>38</sup>), as an old catchword, would infect the spirit in which, in the name of 'righteousness,' they complacently sued. Jesus lays down no outward rules such as might bear upon the modern business world. There fair and square dealing must be a first postulate; but, in the light of His gospel, men should be keener than they are to note hardships, and their hearts warmer towards cases of distress. In the spirit of the Golden Rule (Mt 7<sup>12</sup>, Lk 6<sup>31-32</sup>) merciful dealings will show themselves in undefined ways; and the love of brothermen should counteract the love of money which prompts to stern exactions in every case alike. The soul saved by Christian feeling from sordid views of life adds to its true treasure by making the circumstances of unfortunate ones an exercise-ground for tender, pitying grace. The metaphors of Jesus in Mt 18<sup>23</sup> are exceeding bold, and the generous treatment the incensed may seem almost incredible, not to say subversive of social order; but the enlightened heart will recognize at once the kindly and sacrificing spirit meant to be strongly emphasized. The dynamic in the whole matter, with Jesus, is the remembrance of the pitiful nature of our own plight before God, to whom on the strict requirements of law we are indebted in countless ways. The more this inward situation is brought home to us, the more we shall outwardly be compassionate in turn. Here comes in the moral grandeur of the Beatitude on mercy (Mt 5<sup>7</sup>), a principle which melts into prayer when we connect it with the tender breathing of the Spirit on forgiveness (Mt 6<sup>12</sup>). The humble and the contrite heart holds the key to magnanimity. See, further, art. 'Debt' in Hastings' DB.

Debtor.—There remains the question of debt as the emblem of moral short-coming (ἀφειδήματα, Mt 6<sup>2</sup>). See LORD'S PRAYER, and the Supreme Creditor's way with men in this regard, especially as depicted in certain well-known parables. The image is natural which pictures the Deity sitting like a civil judge, to try men for defaults; and while some think more of the majesty of the law, and what must be exacted to satisfy the interests of order, others love to dwell on the prerogative of mercy, and favour judgments which are ameliorative as well as punitive. No reader of the Gospels can fail to see the latter characteristic strong in the teaching of the Master. Pardon befits the royal clemency, and God is known in the kingdom for sovereign displays of grace. Yet due weight is given to the other aspect of the image also—the satisfaction of the law; for Jesus teaches that it is only the pure in heart who see God (Mt 5<sup>8</sup>); the holiness that avails must be inward, not that of the legalist (v. 20), and only they who are merciful obtain mercy (v. 7). But what is characteristic in the Gospel treatment of the subject is not any dwelling upon absolute judgments—these are left to the Searcher of Hearts; rather we are taken by Jesus to the sphere of proximate evidence, and shown that in the individual life the presence or absence of the forgiving spirit is sure token of the presence or absence of the Divine condescension as regards the person himself. In other words, principles discovered in the relations of men with each other are fortiori valid for their relationship to God (Mt 6<sup>19-21</sup>).

illustrates the point; representing as he does the Pharisaic type of mind—common in all ages and pronouncedly so in the time of Jesus—which complacently fancies itself well within the Kingdom, but shows by its harsh attitude to fellow-mortals that it is inwardly not right with God. The elder brother is pictured, not without point, as remaining outside the banquet-hall, so long as he continued in his implacable mood.

The story of the Two Debtors (Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup>) shows the vital contrast of the matter in the persons of the Woman who was a Sinner—truly gracious in her doings, because full now of penitence and faith and love—and Simon, hide-bound and censorious like his class, with no disciplined sense of having been humbled like her before God. The latter, like the debtor of the trivial fifty pence, had little reaction of wholesome feeling in his mind; the former had manifestly much, like the man overjoyed to find himself relieved from a financial peril ten times greater. This is a concrete instance of the method of the Master. Certain visible acts of the woman at the banquet bespoke the inward action of God's Spirit, and argued a state of reconciliation with Him. From the scanty graciousness of Simon, on the other hand, one inferred just as truly a heart imperfectly attuned to goodness, and knowing little of the joy of pardon. 'To whom little is forgiven, the same loveth little' (v. 47). As to which is the root and which the fruit, rival systems of theology may battle; but the fact is, the two graces are eternal co-relatives, and either may be first in the order of thought when neither is entitled to absolute precedence in fact. See FORGIVENESS.

The parable of the Two Creditors (Mt 18<sup>23-35</sup>) shows the other side of the shield from the Woman's case, in a person of downright inhumanity concerning whom it is equally clear that he had no saving experience of God's mercy himself. The story, as a story, is remarkable for simple force; we feel the horror of the implacable attitude of the servant forgiven for a great indebtedness, who failed to show goodwill in turn to a subordinate for a default infinitely less. Nemesis descends (v. 34) when he finds he is not forgiven after all—he loses that which he had seemed to have (v. 37). 'So likewise shall my Heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses' (v. 35).

Jesus saw many around Him glorying in fancied privilege and very zealous for the Law, yet omitting its essential matters—justice, mercy, faith. To such especially this Gospel message was addressed; broadening out in what for Him was the supreme truth, that love to God is seen and tested in love to man. To be sympathetic, sacrificing, generous, is not only the pier from which the heavenward arch springs, but the pier to which it returns. The forgiving God cannot possibly be seen in those who hide themselves from their own flesh (Lk 6<sup>9</sup>).

GEORGE MURRAY.
DECAPOLIS.—A league of ten Greek cities (ἡ Δεκάπολις) in eastern Palestine, which was probably formed at the time of Pompey's invasion of Palestine, 64-63 B.C. By the Greek cities Pompey was hailed as a deliverer from the Jewish yoke, and many towns elevated Pompey's campaign to the dignity of an era. The coins of Gadara, Canatha, Pella, Dion, and Philadelphia use the Pompeian era. At first the league must have comprised just ten cities. According to Pliny (HN v. 18), these were Scythopolis (Beisân), Hippos (Susieh), Gadara (Umm Keis), Pella (Fahil), Philadelphia (Amman), Gerasa (Jerash), Dion, Banatha (Kanawât), Damascus, and Raphana. The formation of a confederation of Greek cities in the midst of a Semitic population was necessary for the preservation of Hellenic civilization and culture. From the days of Alexander the Great, who sought to Hellenize the Orient by founding Greek cities throughout the conquered lands, there were Greek cities in Palestine. The Seleucid kings of Antioch and the Ptolemies encouraged the immigration of Greeks into this region. Among the cities occupied before 198 B.C. by the incoming Greeks were Pella, Dion, Philadelphia, Gadara, and Abila in the region east of the Jordan. Hippos and Gerasa are first named in the early part of the 1st cent. B.C. (Jos. BJ i. iv. 8). Among the cities liberated by Pompey from the Jewish yoke, Hippos, Scythopolis, and Pella are expressly named; and Gadara, which had been destroyed by the Jews, was rebuilt (BJ i. vii. 7). Pompey annexed these cities to the province of Syria, but conferred upon them municipal freedom. All the cities of the Decapolis had in the Roman period the rights of coinage and asylum, and were allowed to maintain a league for defence against their common foes.

The first references in literature to the Decapolis are found in the Gospels. On our Lord's first journey through all Galilee, He was attended by crowds from all parts of Palestine, among whom were persons from Decapolis (Mt 4<sup>20</sup>). Most likely these were Jews, who formed a considerable part of the population even in Greek cities. The fierce Gerasene demoniac, whom our Lord healed, published in the Decapolis what things Jesus had done for him (Mk 5<sup>20</sup>). The presence of two thousand swine on the eastern shores of the Lake of Galilee would of itself suggest the presence of a Gentile population in that vicinity. When our Lord returned from Tyre and Sidon to the Sea of Galilee, He crossed the upper Jordan and passed south through the district governed by the tetrarch Philip to the eastern shore of the Lake. In order to reach the Sea of Galilee, He went 'through the midst of the borders of Decapolis' (Mk 7<sup>31</sup>). Hippos lay just east of the Lake, Gadara a few miles to the south-east, and in full view from the southern end; Pella and Scythopolis were not far to the south; while the other cities of the Decapolis lay to the north-east, east, and south-east of the Lake. Our Lord visited the Jewish population of Perea in His later ministry, but He seems never to have made a tour to the great cities of the Decapolis. His rebuff in connexion with the destruction of the herd of swine was rather discouraging (Mk 5<sup>17</sup>).

Two famous writers of the latter part of the 1st cent. A.D. speak of the Decapolis. Pliny not only preserves the names of the ten cities (HN v. 18), but also praises the small olives of the region (15). Josephus refers to Decapolis repeatedly. In the 2nd cent. A.D. Ptolemy (v. xv. 22) names eighteen towns as belonging to the league of Decapolis. He omits Raphana from Pliny's list, and adds nine, most of the new members of the confederation belonging to the district just south of Damascus. In his day Hellenic civilization and commerce in the region beyond the Jordan were at their zenith. The modern traveller, wandering over the ruins of temples, theatres, and baths at Gerasa, Philadelphia, and Gadara, is impressed with the glories of the Grecian life in Palestine during the period of our Lord's earthly ministry and for some centuries afterwards.

DECEIT, DECEPTION, GUILT.—

1. Words and references.—Mk 7<sup>22</sup>, Jn 1<sup>47</sup> (δίκαιος, 'bait', 'stratagem', 'guile', 'craft', 'treachery'; cf. Ro 1<sup>28</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>16</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>3</sup>, Rev 12<sup>9</sup>); Mt 13<sup>35</sup> (ἀποκάλυψις, 'trick', 'trick', 'deceit'; cf. Eph 4<sup>22</sup>, Col 2<sup>8</sup>, He 3<sup>13</sup>); Mt 24<sup>4</sup>, Jn 7<sup>12</sup> (πλάνη, 'lead astray', 'deceive'; πλάνη, 'deceiver'; πλάνη, a 'leading astray', 'cheating'; cf. 1 Th 2<sup>3</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>8</sup>).

2. Pfeiderer in Early Christian Conception of Christ (1905) devotes a chapter to the subject of Christ as the Conqueror of Satan.—'that old serpent, called the Devil, which deceiveth the whole world' (Rev 12<sup>9</sup>). His aim is to find parallels to Christ in various nature myths and heathen religions, and by so doing to explain the Gospel story as only a special embodiment of a universal tendency. While rejecting Pfeiderer's theory, we admit that one of the most suggestive aspects under which the life of our Lord may be considered is to regard it as a deadly conflict between the Divine Representative of the Truth, and the instruments and agents of the spirit of deception and guile. Such a conflict was inevitable. The coming of One who had the right to say, 'I am the light of the world,' 'I am the truth'; 'every one that is of the truth heareth my voice' (Jn 8<sup>12</sup>, 14<sup>18</sup>), was bound to stir into bitter hostility all the forces of untruth and craft. The antagonism is set forth in universal terms in Jn 8<sup>12-21</sup>. At every stage of the Divine drama we see that those 'who loved darkness rather than light'—the men of perverted mind and crooked ways—turned from Jesus with aversion and sought His destruction. The whole significance of the struggle may be said to have been summed up and symbolized in our Lord's conflict with the Pharisees. Their hostility to Him began in self-deception. Wedded to their own ideas and standard of character and duty, they resented His teaching. They could not conceive the possibility of a revision of life in the light of a larger and nobler ideal of righteousness. But the vision of moral beauty must either enlighten or blind. Before long the Pharisees brought down on themselves the severest denunciations for their moral obtuseness, duplicity, and hypocrisy (Mt 23, Jn 8<sup>12-29</sup>). The estrangement was complete. To destroy Jesus they now 'planned up their wile in double knavery' (Luke). In almost every glimpse we get of them they are moving in a murky atmosphere of craft, intrigue, and hate. They do not hesitate to resort to every artifice and stratagem which unscrupulous cunning could suggest. They endeavour, by subtle questions, to entangle Him in His talk (Mt 22<sup>29</sup>); they attempt to deceive the people as to His true character (Mk 3<sup>22-30</sup>, Jn 9<sup>24</sup>); they plot together as to how He may be put to death (Jn 11<sup>53</sup>); they enter into a covenant with Judas to betray Him (Mt 26<sup>14, 15</sup>); they set up false witnesses, and pervert and misrepresent His teaching (Mt 26<sup>59-61</sup>, Lk 23<sup>1</sup>). It was by deceit and guile that they obtained Pilate's permission to crucify Him (Jn 19<sup>12</sup>).

3. We gain a heightened impression of their character and conduct by contrast. While the men of deception and guile hated the Light, we see another class attracted by it. From the beginning of His ministry, Jesus drew to Himself the sincere, the childlike, the men of 'honest and good heart' (Lk 8<sup>15</sup>). The first Apostles of the Lord were by no means exempt from serious faults and frailties of character; but, with the exception of Judas, they were singularly honest and upright men; men with a genuine enthusiasm for goodness. One of them drew from Jesus on His first approach the suggestive exclamation, 'Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile' (Jn 1<sup>47</sup>). In the teaching and training of these first Apostles and disciples, our Lord especially emphasized the necessity of those virtues of character in which the Pharisees were so singularly deficient (Mt 5<sup>2</sup> 71-4 10<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>2</sup> 13<sup>2</sup>, Lk 12<sup>2-3</sup>). In this connexion it is of vital importance to bear in mind Mt 23<sup>2-23</sup>. There are various degrees and stages of deception and guile, beginning with over-intellectual refinement, and passing finally into deliberate fraud and treachery. But in every case it means the lack of the 'single eye,' of perfect sincerity, and simplicity of nature. And, therefore, if Christian men and women are to keep themselves free, not merely from 'fleshy lusts,' but also from the more subtle forms of 'spiritual wickedness,' they must be continually testing and reviewing their ideals and conceptions of character and conduct in the light of their Master's life and teaching. Unless they do this, the light that is in them will turn to darkness.

"There is, I believe," says Bishop Gore, "nothing to which in our time attention needs to be called more than to the fact that conscience is only a faculty for knowing God and His will. It is certain, unless it is educated, to give wrong information, and the way to educate it is to put it to school with the 'Lights of the world.'" Alas! there must be multitudes of respectable and self-enlightened people of whom it is true that the light which is in them is darkness (The Sermon on the Mount, p. 147). The testimony of the late Dr. Dale is not less emphatic: "I doubt whether most of those who have been formed by the faith and traditions of the Evangelical movement are sufficiently impressed by the necessity of educating the conscience. . . . This partly explains how it is that some Christian people are worse men—morally—than some who are not Christians. The faculty of conscience requires a great deal of education if we are to distinguish between the right and the wrong in all the details of life" (The Evangelical Revival, p. 98).

DECREE (Gr. dykua, Lk 2<sup>1</sup>).—In the Gospel of Luke, the birth of Jesus at Bethlehem is traced to the fact that a census of the people of Israel was being taken, which made it necessary that Joseph and Mary, who were both of Davidic descent, should go up from their home at Nazareth to the City of David. This census was brought about by the issue of a decree of Cæsar Augustus, that the Roman world should be taxed or registered. Historians find much to question here as to St. Luke's accuracy. Was it likely that Herod's independent kingdom would be included in such a decree? Is there any evidence that such an order on so great a scale was then issued? As to Cyrenius (Quirinus), in whose governorship of Syria this census is said to have taken place, can it be proved that he was twice governor of Syria? He was governor, some 10 years later, when the census took place, which caused the rebellion under Judas of Galilee, in 760 A.U.C. The researches of Wieseler, Zumpt, and W. M. Ramsay (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?) have shown, however, that St. Luke's statement is capable of a good defence, and may turn out to have full corroboration. Such a plain historical note, put in, with evident intention, by St. Luke, we should be slow to reject from one who is generally so well informed. See AUGUSTUS, BIRTH OF CHRIST, QUIRINUS.

DAVID M. W. LAIRD.

DEDICATION, FEAST OF (ἡ ἑυαλινα).—This Feast was kept by the Jews on 25 Chislew and throughout the week following. The dedication commemorated in it was the dedication of a new altar by Judas Maccabæus in B.C. 164 (1 Mac 4<sup>5-9</sup>, 2 Mac 10<sup>1-8</sup>, Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 6, 7). The old altar of Zerubbabel's temple had been defiled in B.C. 167, when 'an abomination of desolation' was erected upon it (1 Mac 1<sup>24</sup>), and the climax was reached on 25 Chislew, when sacrifices were offered upon this idol-altar standing on the altar of God (v. 23). For three years this state of profanation had continued, but when the third anniversary of the desecration came round, the heroic efforts of Judas Maccabæus and his companions had reached such success that they were able to cleanse the Holy Place and to set up a new altar in place of that which had been defiled, spending a week in special services for its dedication; and, in order to commemorate this, Judas Maccabæus ordained 'that the days of the dedication of the altar should be kept in their seasons from year to year by the space of eight days, from the five and twentieth day of the month Chislew, with gladness and joy' (1 Mac 4<sup>59</sup>).

The Feast is mentioned once in the Gospels (Jn 10<sup>22</sup>) as the occasion of a collision between our Lord and the Jews in the temple, when He made the claim, 'I and the Father are one,' and the Jews took up stones to stone Him. The occasion of the incident is full of significance. When the Holy Place was being cleansed in B.C. 164, the question had arisen as to how the old altar ought to be treated, seeing that it had suffered from heathen pollution, and the conclusion reached was that it should not be used any more, but a new one dedicated in its place, and that the old one should be pulled down and its stones stored in a convenient place 'until there should come a prophet to give an answer concerning them' (1 Mac 4<sup>44-46</sup>). On the anniversary of this event, some two centuries later, there stood Christ in the temple courts, and in effect, though not in so many words, the question was actually put to Him whether He was the prophet foretold. 'How long dost thou hold us in suspense?' they asked, 'If thou art the Christ, tell us plainly' (Jn 10<sup>24</sup>). It was, indeed, a fitting occasion on which to raise the question, since the whole Festival breathed hopes connected with the national deliverance of Maccabæan times, looking forward to another deliverance in the future such as would come with the Messiah. Unhappily the questioners were not sincere, and would not receive the testimony of our Lord, not even when He referred them to His works as proving His claims; and so the matter ended where it began. Had they listened, they would have found the Deliverer whom they were expecting and incidentally also they would have learned the solution of the old difficulty about the stones of the desecrated altar—that these might lie where they were, being needed no more, for there was being dedicated another Temple to supersede the old (cf. Jn 2<sup>19</sup>).

It is not quite clear how much of St. John's narrative belongs to Dedication, whether the incidents of Jn 9<sup>1-10<sup>21</sup></sup> happened then, or whether they belong to the Feast of Tabernacles (7<sup>2</sup>). These two Feasts had much in common; in fact, it appears that Dedication was to some extent modelled on Tabernacles (2 Mac 10<sup>6</sup>, cf. 1<sup>9</sup>). In particular, the ritual of both included a special illumination, which was so marked at Dedication that, according to Josephus (Ant. XII. vii. 7), the Festival was actually called 'Lights.' In either case, therefore, there is special point in our Lord's announcement in Jn 9<sup>5</sup> 'I am the light of the world,' in which He pointed to the brilliant illuminations of the Temple and Jerusalem generally, whether at Tabernacles or Dedication, and claimed that, while these lamps and candles made the city full of light, He Himself was giving light to the whole world.

DEFILEMENT.—See PURIFICATION.

DELIVERANCE (ἀφεσις).—The English word does not occur in the Gospels, except in a quotation from the OT (see below), but the Gr. word is found 8 times (in Mt. 26<sup>28</sup>, Mk 14, Lk 3<sup>17</sup> 24<sup>28</sup> it is rendered 'remission' [of sins]; in Mk 3<sup>29</sup> 'forgiveness'; in Lk 4<sup>18</sup> 36<sup>10</sup> (a) 'deliverance' [AV], 'release' [RV], (b) [to set] 'at liberty'; while the fact of deliverance underlies all that is recorded of Jesus, and has coloured the entire thought of Christianity. To think of Christ is to think of Him as Saviour. In such utterances as 'The Son of Man is come to save that which was lost' (Mt 18<sup>11</sup>), and 'the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them' (Lk 9<sup>35</sup>), we have the keynote of Christ's mission. He sounds it in the beginning when, preaching in the Nazareth synagogue (Lk 4<sup>18</sup>), He declares His work to be, in the words of Is 61<sup>1</sup>, 'to preach deliverance to captives.' His days are passed in saving men from every slavery that binds them to the transient. This is at the root of all His acts of deliverance—even the healings. When He gives physical renewal to the lame, the diseased, the dumb, the blind, the paralyzed, it is always that they may the easier find spiritual perfection. Moral and spiritual deliverance are often associated with a bodily purification—greatly to the confusion of contemporary traditionalists. They are astonished that He should say to the one sick of the palsy, 'Thy sins be forgiven thee' (Mk 2<sup>5</sup>), or to the leper, 'Thy faith hath made thee whole' (Lk 17<sup>19</sup>). In the typical prayer taught to His disciples there is no word about life's miseries, poverty, or pain; the petition is simply 'Deliver us from evil' (Mt 6<sup>13</sup>, Lk 11<sup>4</sup>): the soul's need being eternal outweighs the need of mind and body. And we can hardly doubt that, as He looked upon that long and sad procession of the bodily wrecks that came to Him 'at even' (Mk 13<sup>2</sup>), the heart of the Missioner in Christ was kindled by the vision of souls that would be set free to fulfil better their purpose of life when the mangled or tortured body was given rest and cure. Conscious of the necessities of daily life, He, better than all others, knows how temporary they are, and lifts His voice continually against the soul's voluntary bondage to things material. 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God' (Lk 12<sup>31</sup>); 'Lay up treasure in heaven' (Mt 6<sup>20</sup>); 'Beware, and keep yourselves from covetousness' (Lk 12<sup>15</sup>); 'If thou wouldst be perfect, go, sell that thou hast, and give to the poor . . . and come, follow me' (Mt 19<sup>21</sup>)—such phrases indicate the deliverance from the world and its anxieties which culminates in the invitation of Jesus—'Come unto me . . . and I will give you rest' (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>).

The highest of the self-chosen titles ring with deliverance. Jesus calls Himself the Good Shepherd, who will even give His life for the sheep (Jn 10<sup>11</sup>); He is the Way, the Truth, and the Life (14<sup>6</sup>), leading from earth and time to heaven and eternity; He is the Light of the World (8<sup>12</sup>), to bring all wanderers safely from darkness and danger to light and safety. The Christian Church has always read in His titles, His words, and His actions this moral and spiritual significance. Christ has been, and is, the Saviour of men from sin and evil rather than from pain and suffering. See FORGIVENESS. E. DAPLYN.

DEMON, DEMONIAL POSSESSION, DEMONIACS.—1. The demonology of the Gospels is based upon beliefs which were current among the Jews previous to the time of Christ; these beliefs arose gradually, and were ultimately stereotyped in the Talmud. For the proper understanding of Gospel demonology some insight into these Jewish beliefs is indispensable. But the demonology of the Jews was profoundly influenced and coloured, at different times, by Babylonian, Egyptian, Persian, and Greek teaching on the subject, while the beliefs of these highly cultured peoples were developments of the much earlier conceptions of man in a very much lower stage of civilization,—conceptions which are practically universally prevalent among savage races at the present day. To deal with the subject, therefore, in all its bearings would be impossible here; it must suffice to give references to a few of the many works which deal with the different branches of this vast subject. Details of Jewish demonology must, however, be given, for it will be seen that they are necessary for a proper understanding of Gospel demonology; added to these will be found some few references to the earlier beliefs upon which they are based.

2. THE OLD TESTAMENT.—The demonology of the OT is probably somewhat more complex than is sometimes assumed.† The analogy of other races would prima facie support the inference that the Israelites also had their beliefs in demons (see Literature below). Much weight cannot be laid on the (not frequent) occurrence of δαίμων and δαίμονιον in the LXX, as they stand for varying words in the original; but there are a number of Hebrew expressions which must be connected with demons, at all events as far as the popular imagination was concerned; these are: רוח רע 'evil spirit,' Jg 3<sup>2</sup>, 1 S 16<sup>14</sup>; רוח פקדו 'spirit of perverseness,' Is 19<sup>14</sup>; שׂוֹטְטִים 'demons,' Dt 32<sup>2</sup>, Ps 106<sup>7</sup>; שׂוֹטְטִים 'satyrs,' Lv 17<sup>7</sup>, Is 13<sup>2</sup> 34<sup>14</sup>; שׂוֹטְטִים 'destruction,' conceived of as due to demoniac power, see the whole verse, Ps 91<sup>2</sup>; שׂוֹטְטִים 'female blood-sucker,' Pr 30<sup>15</sup>; שׂוֹטְטִים 'night-hag,' Is 34<sup>15</sup>, 14; שׂוֹטְטִים, Lv 16<sup>8</sup>. 'Azazel,' a desert spirit. This last instance clearly shows how firmly embedded in popular imagination was this belief in evil powers of the solitude.* It is true that Babylonian influence during and after the Exile was responsible for much of this;† but that the Israelites from the earliest times, like every other race, peopled the world with innumerable unseen powers, cannot admit of doubt. According to OT conceptions, the evil spirits are not the subjects of some supreme ruler; in the earlier books they are represented as fulfilling the commands of Jehovah in doing harm to men, but later on they seem to enjoy complete independence, though even here the conceptions are not consistent (cf. Job 1<sup>st-2<sup>d</sup></sup>). When we come to the Apocrypha, we find that an immense development has taken place; see, e.g., To 3rd 8 7, 17 8th, Bar 4th 35, Wis 2<sup>d</sup>, Sir 21st; cf. as regards other late literature the Book of Enoch 15. 16. 19. 53. 3. LATER JUDAISM.‡—The following are the Talmudic words for demons: שטן, היול, כיקצן, אטו, אטוה (אטוהא), רוק טוקא, אטוה אטוהא (אטוהא אטוהא), אטוה אטוהא (אטוהא אטוהא). See further below. While it is abundantly clear that external influences have left their marks on Jewish demonology, it is certain that much of the latter was of indigenous growth; the whole system, so immense, so intricate, and in many respects so puerile, is stamped too plainly with the Judaic genius for this to be questioned. Only a very brief summary of the main points can be here indicated.§

† There are a number of works on Comparative Religion in which the beliefs in demons and the like are incidentally dealt with; but a detailed list of these would be inappropriate here. † It is singular that the OT is so free from demonology, hardly containing more than one or two examples thereof (F. C. Conybeare, loc. cit. above).

(a) Origin of demons.—As has not infrequently been found to be the case with Jewish tradition, there are varying accounts; in this case two distinct traditions exist. According to the one, it is said that the demons were created by God before the world was made; Satan, ¶ who is identical with the serpent, is the chief of the demons. They were of both sexes, and their species was propagated through cohabitation with Adam and Eve during a period of 130 years after the Creation. The other tradition is based on Gn 6th 2 (cf. 2 P 2<sup>d</sup> 4); two angels, Assael and Shemachsal, loved the daughters of men, and, forsaking their allegiance to God, descended from heaven to earth; one of these angels returned to heaven and did not sin, but the other accomplished his desire, and his offspring became demons.

(b) The nature of demons.—The general name for all demons is mazzikin (מזיקין), and this indicates their nature, מַזִּיק=‘one who does harm.’** The head of * Cf. Whitehouse in Hastings' DB I, 591<sup>a</sup>.

† By this is meant the period during which the Talmud was in process of formation; it was not completed until about A.D. 500, but the traditions concerning demons and the general teaching on the subject (even in the latest portions) embody conceptions of much earlier date.¶

§ The details here given have been gathered from a large number of sources which cannot be individually specified; see the literature at the end of this article.

¶ It is their supposed creation on a Friday which makes this day one of ill-omen.

** Satan, according to another account, was created at the same time as Eve; Cain was their offspring (cf. Gn 4th where the Heb. רוּחַ is not the usual word for begetting). ‘Baal-zabul’ is also regarded, in the Talmud, as a prince among demons, and is looked upon as the most evil of all evil spirits.

*** This is illustrated in Jn 8th 44: 44 ‘Ye seek to kill me . . . ye do the works of your father . . . ye are of your father the devil.’

them is Satan (שָׂטָן=‘the adversary’); it is his aim to mislead men into evil, and then to accuse them before God, hence the further name מַאֲרִי־יוֹסֵפִים=‘accuser’ (cf. Zec 3rd). He is at liberty to enter the Divine presence at all times (cf. Job 1st); Atonement is he refused admittance. As the angel of death, he is identical with Sammael, who is known also as ‘the head of all the Satans.’ The kingdom of Satan (cf. Mk 3rd) consists of himself, as head, and an innumerable horde of angels or messengers (מַאֲרִי־יוֹסֵפִים) who do his will;* this is the exact antithesis of the kingdom of God † (see, further, SATAN). These constitute the first grade of demons, those who were created before the world was made; these were originally in the service of God, but rebelled against Him (cf. Lk 10th).

There are also demons of a lower grade, those, namely, who came into being during the 130 years after the Creation, and who are semi-human; ‡ they occupied a position between God and man.§ They have the names (besides those given above) of shedim, אטוה and rāhīb (Aramaic; Heb. ראָהִיב**); the first of these is their commonest name. The head of these lower-grade demons is Asmedai †† (Asmodeus, To 3rd, cf. 6th 8th); they have the power of becoming visible or invisible at will; they have wings, and fly all over the world ‡‡ for the purpose of harming men; in three respects they resemble man, for they eat and drink, they are able to propagate their species, and are subject to death; they also have the power of assuming various forms, but they usually choose that of men, though with the difference that their feet are hens' feet, and they are without shadows; they are very numerous (cf. Mk 5th)—74 millions is said to be the number of them, while elsewhere it is stated that every man has ten thousand on his right hand, and a thousand on his left (cf. Ps 91st 7). They live mostly in desert places (cf. Lk 8th), where their yells can be heard (cf. Dt 32nd 10 ‘howling wilderness’); also in unclean places, where their power is great, e.g. in the טכא מ"ג; in waterless places (cf. Lk 11th), for water is the means of cleansing; §§ and among tombs ¶¶ (cf. Mk 6th), dead bodies being unclean; ††† they are most dangerous to the traveller, more especially if he travels alone; they tend to congregate together (cf. Lk 11th 28-30); at certain times they are more dangerous than at others, viz. at mid-day, when the heat is intense, and from sunset to cock-crowing (cf. Ps 91st 6, Mk 14th, Jn 13th 30), after which they return to their abode. Unlike angels, who understand only Hebrew (the

* The very term ‘the angel of Satan’ is used, cf. אטוהא אטוהא, 2 Co 12th.

† Cf. the dualistic system of the Persians, which has influenced Judaism here.

‡ Among the Greeks the demons stand between men and gods, and all the elements of mythology that were derogatory to the character of the national deities were referred to the demons. Greek influences, therefore, stimulated the growth of Hebrew angelology and demonology (Hastings' DB, art. ‘Demons’).

§ According to another tradition, these semi-human demons originated thus: God had created their souls, but before He had time to create their bodies the Sabbath dawned; they were thus neither men nor angels, and became demons.

¶ A loan-word from Assyr.-Bah. šidu=‘good or evil genius.’

** They are also known under the general term יָדוּי (דמונים טכא); Blau holds that originally the יָדוּי were the spirits of the departed, see Das altjüdische Zaubereisen, p. 14.

†† This is one of the chief signs of Persian influence; Asmedai is borrowed from the Persian demon of lust, Asmadaya.

‡‡ Cf. ‘the prince of the power of the air’ (Eph 2<sup>d</sup> 2). It was a Persian belief.

'holy tongue' <sup>שׂוֹפָרִים</sup>), demons can understand all languages, for they are active among the Gentiles as well as among the Jews, whereas angels restrict their activity among men to the children of Abraham. The power for harm of the demons is greatest among the sick, among women in childbirth, among brides and bridegrooms, mourners, and those who are about to become teachers; further, those who travel by night, and children who are out after dark are specially subject to their attacks. There is one demon, Shabriri, who makes people blind (cf. Mt 12<sup>22</sup>), and there is a special demon of leprosy, and a demon of heart-disease. As emissaries of the angel of death, Samael (the 'full of eyes,' of the Greek Argus), men are in constant dread of them (cf. He 2<sup>14-15</sup>). It was also believed that demons were able to transfer some of their powers to men, and especially to women; so, for example, the secret of magic drinks, which could harm people in various ways (cf. Mk 16<sup>18</sup>), and change them into animals; they could also endow men with the faculty of exercising the 'evil eye' (cf. Mk 7<sup>22</sup>, see also Sir 31<sup>13</sup>, and cf. 14<sup>10-16</sup>, To 4<sup>10</sup>), by means of which the good fortune of others could be turned to evil; there is a special formula for use against the 'evil eye.'* There are certain animals in league with the demons (cf. Lk 8<sup>32</sup>), such as serpents (cf. Mk 16<sup>18</sup>, Ac 28<sup>3-5</sup>), bulls,† donkeys,‡ and mosquitoes. The shedim are male demons; female demons are called lilin, 'night-spirits,' from the queen of the demons, Lilith (cf. Is 34<sup>14</sup>); they have long flowing hair, and are the enemies of children, for which reason special angels have charge of children (cf. Mt 18<sup>10</sup>, He 1<sup>14</sup>).

(c) Safeguards against demons.—God is the only ultimate protector against demons; but He sends His angels to counteract their deeds, and to help men to withstand their attacks (cf. Mt 13<sup>41</sup>, Mk 1<sup>35</sup>). At the same time, God has given to man various means whereby to nullify the machinations of demons. First among these is the saying of the Shema (i.e. the Jewish profession of faith contained in Dt 6<sup>4</sup>), because the holy name occurs in it; then, prayer to God (cf. Mk 9<sup>29</sup>). There are also special formulas which are effective, either for warding off an attack or for throwing off the demoniacal influence, e.g. 'The Lord rebuke thee, Satan' (cf. Zec 3<sup>2</sup>, Jude 9); Ps 91 is recommended for recitation before going to sleep; a demon may be chased away by repeatedly calling out his name, but uttering one syllable less each time; obedience to certain commands is also a safeguard, e.g. fixing the mezuzah,† and wearing the

4. THE GOSPELS.—Demons are designated by various names in the Gospels, viz. δαίμονες Mt 10<sup>1</sup> (δαίμων is sometimes found, it would imply more definite personality), πνεύμα Lk 9<sup>39</sup>, πνεύμα ἀκάθαρτον Mt 10<sup>1</sup> (ῥὸ ἀκάθαρτον πνεύμα Mt 12<sup>45</sup>), πνεύμα πονηρὸν Lk 7<sup>35</sup>, πνεύμα σατανᾶ Mt 12<sup>24</sup>, πνεύμα ἀκαθάρτου Lk 4<sup>34</sup>, πνεύμα ἁδύων Mk 9<sup>7</sup>. In Matthew δαίμονες is almost always used; in Mark both δαίμονες and πνεύμα ἀκάθαρτον occur frequently, though the latter predominates; in Luke there is a more varied use; in John the few references to a demon (the plural does not occur) are always in relation to Christ, and the word used is always δαίμων. In the vast majority of cases these expressions are used in the plural form.

(a) Origin of demons.—The existence of demons is taken for granted in the Gospels, and nothing is said directly concerning their origin; however, as is shown below, Satan, Beelzebub, and the 'prince of the demons' are one and the same, and Christ speaks of His having seen Satan falling 'as lightning from heaven' (Lk 10<sup>18</sup>). This last passage would seem to imply that Satan was in existence before the world was made, which would agree with the one rational tradition on the subject preserved in the Talmud. There are, moreover, also one or two indications in other NT books which support this, e.g. 1 Jn 3<sup>8</sup> the devil sinneth from the beginning, Rev 20<sup>2</sup> the old serpent which is the Devil.

(b) The nature of demons.—That possession often takes the form of a purely physical disorder is clear; yet from the expressions used to designate demons, given above, they were undoubtedly regarded as being morally evil. On the one hand, possession is frequently mentioned in the same category as ordinary sickness (e.g. Mt 10<sup>1</sup>), dumbness is said to be due to possession (Mt 9<sup>33</sup>, Lk 11<sup>14</sup>), so too epilepsy (Mt 17<sup>15</sup>) and blindness (Mt 12<sup>22</sup>); demons are spoken of as taking up their abode in a man without his having, apparently, any choice in the matter (Mk 5<sup>10</sup>); it is, moreover, noteworthy, that the wicked (i.e. Pharisees, publicans, and sinners) are never spoken of as being possessed (e.g. Lk 11<sup>19</sup>, 15<sup>1</sup>), and the possessed are permitted to enter the synagogue (Mk 1<sup>23</sup>, Lk 4<sup>43</sup>), which would hardly have been the case had they been regarded as notoriously evil; another fact which should be taken into consideration in this connexion is our Lord's words to the demons (see below). On the other hand, the evidence is still stronger for possession having been regarded as a moral as well as a physical disorder. Demons are directly referred to as evil (Lk 7<sup>21</sup> 8<sup>2</sup>); there are degrees of badness among them (Mt 12<sup>45</sup>), some are merely malignant, some do more physical harm than others (Mt 12<sup>29</sup>, where κακῶς δαίμων (εἶρα) implies some specially virulent form of possession), some are referred to as being morally as well as physically harmful (Lk 8<sup>2</sup> πνευμάτων πονηρῶν, 11<sup>26</sup>);† in one case a demon is such that it can only be expelled by prayer (Mk 9<sup>29</sup>),‡ which implies that in * The superstition of the 'evil eye,' the possession of which is regarded as being due to the indwelling of an evil spirit, both in animals and in human beings, is still universally prevalent among the peasantry of all European countries; the writer has personally met with some curious instances in the country districts of Lower Austria.

† This is due to Assyro-Bab. influence: Satan is believed to dance between the bull's horns.

‡ This is due to Egyptian (Typhon-worship) influence; according to Plutarch the ass was considered demoniac (δαίμων) in Egypt, because of its resemblance to Typhon (de Is. et Os. 30).

§ In the Talmud there is no word for 'possession'; it is true that an 'evil spirit' is once spoken of as 'dwelling' in a person, but this is the same word as is used for the Shekima 'taking up its abode with someone'; Shekima, however, in the Talmud is not a personality, but rather an inspiration. A demon, or evil spirit, is said to take hold of a man to injure him, or to speak to him; there may be one or two possible exceptions, but, generally speaking, demoniacal action is all external to those who are under its influence. This is in striking contrast to the Gospel accounts.

¶ See the use of a 'name' in Stube, Jüd.-bab. Zaubertexte, p. 20, and many further details in Bian, Des talism. Zauberwesen, pp. 61 ff., 156 ff.; cf. To 6<sup>10</sup> 88. Exorcism of demons, to whom all sickness was ascribed, was very ancient in Egypt.

••• Head-ornaments: small leathern cases, containing Ex 13<sup>10</sup> 11<sup>18</sup>, Dt 6<sup>8</sup> 11<sup>18</sup> written on parchment; these are bound round the head and left arm by means of long leather straps. This was done in obedience to the command in Dt 11<sup>18</sup>. The Greek name (phylacteria) shows that they were regarded as safeguards, i.e. against demons (cf. Mt 23<sup>5</sup>). Both this and the custom just mentioned are observed by all orthodox Jews at the present day.

‡ The addition of καὶ προσεύχομαι is not well attested.

the generality of cases this was not necessary, and indeed, we find this to be the case, since in every other recorded instance the word was sufficient. Then, again, Beelzebub, the prince of the demons, is identified with Satan (Mt 12<sup>24-30</sup>, Mk 3<sup>22-30</sup>, Lk 11<sup>16-19</sup>, cf. Rev 16<sup>4</sup>), and Satan himself is by name reckoned among the demons in Lk 10<sup>17-20</sup>; and he is the originator of sin in man, as shown by the temptation, the parable of the Tares (Mt 13<sup>39-42</sup>), and the sin of Judas (see especially Lk 22<sup>3</sup>). The demons are intangible, incorporeal,* and (if one excepts those passages in which Satan is represented as having been seen, e.g. Lk 10<sup>16</sup> 46<sup>a</sup>.) invisible; 'the NT writers believed that the physical constitution of a spirit, whether holy or impure, was akin to vapour.' The demon enters (εἰσέρχεται) a man at will, and he goes out (ἐξέρχεται) at will (Lk 11<sup>24</sup>), but in most cases he goes out only on compulsion (ἐκβάλλειν); he is also able to take possession of animals (Mk 5<sup>13</sup>); there are good grounds for the supposition that a storm-fiend was believed in, as will be seen by comparing the phraseology of the two following passages: Mk 4<sup>39</sup> ἐπετίμησεν τῷ ἀνέμῳ καὶ εἶπεν τῇ θαλάσσῃ Σιώνα, περίμωσο; Mk 12<sup>28</sup> ἐπετίμησεν αὐτῷ ὁ Ἰησοῦς λέγων Βουδάβα. . . † Desolate places, such as the desert (Lk 8<sup>22</sup>), or mountainous regions (Mk 5<sup>1</sup>), or among tombs ‡ (Mk 5<sup>1</sup>), and waterless places (Lk 11<sup>24</sup>), i.e. places to which men come only in small numbers or singly, are those for which demons have a preference. They are represented as congregating together (Mk 5<sup>13</sup>, Lk 8<sup>28</sup>), sometimes in seven§ (Lk 8<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>26</sup>, cf. Rev 1<sup>14</sup>); for this reason the plural form is usually employed. In Mk 5<sup>13</sup> the demons beseech Christ not to send them out of the country; they are thus able to speak, or, at all events, so to overmaster their victim as to make his faculties their own (Mk 1<sup>26</sup>). Nothing is said in the Gospels, directly, as to where the permanent home of the demons is, ‖ but the 'abyss' is spoken of as, apparently, a place whence they could not return if once banished there; this would, at all events, account for their entreaty not to be banished thither in Lk 8<sup>31</sup>; ¶ they clearly realized that a time of torment was in store for them (Mt 8<sup>29</sup>), and that this torment might take place before the appointed time (Mk 5<sup>1</sup>, Lk 8<sup>29</sup>), and so the sight of Christ filled them with dread.

There is nothing in the Gospels to show that demons were believed to be the unquiet spirits of the wicked departed, and the belief that they were heathen gods is equally absent (cf., on the other hand, 1 Co 10<sup>14-22</sup> 28).

(c) Demoniacal possession, demoniacs.—The usual term for this is δαιμονίζεσθαι (e.g. Mt 4<sup>24</sup>), but a number of other expressions for it are found in the Gospels, viz. δαιμονιῶν (Mk 5<sup>13</sup>, Lk 8<sup>28</sup>), ἀνθρώποι ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτων (Mk 12<sup>28</sup> 5<sup>2</sup> ἐν= 'in the power of'), ἔχον δαίμονια (Lk 8<sup>27</sup>), ἀνθρώποι ἔχον πνεῦμα δαιμονίου ἀκαθάρτου (Lk 4<sup>41</sup>), ἐνοχλοῦμενοι ὑπὸ πνευμάτων ἀκαθάρτων (Lk 6<sup>18</sup>), ἐλαυνόμενοι ἀπὸ τοῦ δαιμονίου (Lk 8<sup>28</sup>), σκληραῖσθαι (Mt 4<sup>24</sup>).

With but few exceptions those who are said to be possessed are grown-up men; the exceptions § Companies of seven evil spirits are not infrequently mentioned in Assyrian incantations, e.g. 'there are seven wicked sons of the abyss,' which occurs in an incantation to fire; see Budge's Assyrian Incantations to Fire and Water; cf. also the 'seven wicked spirits' in ancient Babylonian belief (Sayce, op. cit. iii.).

‖ The 'eternal fire' is, according to Mt 25<sup>41</sup>, reserved for the devil and his angels; but there is no mention of these in Lk 10<sup>22</sup>, where the flame in Hades is spoken of.

¶ In the parallel passages there is no mention of the abyss (cf. Mt 8<sup>31</sup>, Mk 5<sup>10</sup>).

are: certain women who had been healed of evil spirits, and Mary Magdalene (Lk 8<sup>2</sup>); the woman who had been bound by Satan for eighteen years (Lk 13<sup>11-13</sup>); Peter's wife's mother (see below, Lk 4<sup>39</sup>); a boy (Lk 9<sup>39</sup>); and the little daughter of the Syro-Phœnician woman (Mk 7<sup>25</sup>). It is, however, probable that others, besides men, are included in such passages as Mk 13<sup>33</sup>, Lk 7<sup>11</sup>. The signs of possession may be thus summarized: dumbness (Mt 9<sup>32</sup>, Mk 9<sup>17</sup>), dumbness and deafness (Mk 9<sup>32</sup>), blindness and dumbness (Mt 12<sup>22</sup>), savage fierceness (Mt 8<sup>28</sup>, Mk 5<sup>4</sup>, Lk 8<sup>29</sup>), abnormal strength (Mk 5<sup>4</sup>, Lk 8<sup>29</sup>), falling into the fire and water (Mt 17<sup>15</sup>), convulsions (Mk 1<sup>26</sup> 9<sup>20</sup>, Lk 4<sup>40</sup>), raving (Mk 6<sup>5</sup>), grinding the teeth (Mk 9<sup>18</sup>), foaming at the mouth (Lk 9<sup>39-42</sup>). These are all signs of epilepsy (σκληραῖσθαι); in Mt 4<sup>24</sup> the σκληραῖσθαι are distinguished from the δαιμονίζεσθαι.* Fever would also appear to have been regarded as a sign of possession, for Christ is said to 'rebuke' (ἐπετίμησεν) the fever, the identical word which is frequently used by Him when addressing demons, e.g. in the next verse but one to the passage in question (Lk 4<sup>41</sup>). One other sign of possession must be noted, a man who is 'mad,' in the modern sense of being out of his mind, is said to have a demon; this is said of John the Baptist (Mt 11<sup>18</sup>), and of Christ (Jn 10<sup>20</sup>).

A demoniac is spoken of as the dwelling-place of a demon (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>), and a number of demons can dwell in one person (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>, Mk 5<sup>13</sup>, Lk 8<sup>29</sup>). Sometimes the demon is differentiated from the man possessed (Mk 1<sup>24</sup>), at other times the two are identified (Mk 3<sup>11</sup>); striking in this respect is the passage Mk 5<sup>1-20</sup>; † differentiation is strongly marked when an expression such as that in Lk 6<sup>18</sup> is used: οἱ ἐνοχλοῦμενοι ἀπὸ πνευμάτων ἀκαθάρτων. Lastly, the same outward signs are at one time spoken of as possession, at another as ordinary sickness (cf. Mt 4<sup>23</sup> 17<sup>15</sup> etc.).

(d) Christ and the demons.—One of Christ's chief works on earth was to annihilate the power of demons; the demons themselves realize this (Mk 1<sup>24</sup>, Lk 4<sup>34</sup>, and cf. 1 Jn 3<sup>8</sup>); the destruction of their kingdom was necessary for the establishment of the Kingdom of God. Christ's attitude towards demons may be briefly summed up as follows:—With two exceptions (viz. the case of the woman 'bound by Satan' for eighteen years, Lk 13<sup>11-13</sup>, and that of Peter's wife's mother, Lk 4<sup>39</sup>) no instance is recorded of His laying His hands upon, or in any way coming in direct contact with one who is possessed by a demon. On the other hand, His words are never severe when addressing the possessed; very remarkable, moreover, is the fact that even when He speaks to the demon itself, Christ's words are never angry; He 'rebukes' the demon (Mk 1<sup>25</sup>, Lk 4<sup>35</sup>), but the words of rebuke are simply: 'Hold thy peace and come out of him,' or a command that He should not be made known ‡ (Mk 3<sup>12</sup>, but cf. Lk 8<sup>29</sup>); on one occasion the request of demons is granted (Mt 9<sup>32-33</sup>—Mk 5<sup>12-13</sup>—Lk 8<sup>28</sup>). The power which Christ has over demons is absolute, they are wholly subject unto Him, and are compelled to yield Him obedience (Mk 1<sup>27</sup>, Lk 4<sup>41</sup>); that it is an unwilling obedience is obvious, and this is graphically brought out, e.g. when it is said of a demon that before coming out of a man it threw him down in the midst (Lk 4<sup>34</sup>). § The recognition of Christ by demons is of a kind which

† What in the demoniac strikes us most is the strange confusion of the physical and the psychical, each intruding into the proper domain of the other (Trench, Miracles, ad loc.).

‡ For the reason of Christ's not wishing to be made known see Sander in JTS, v. p. 321 ff., and Wrede, 'Zur Messiaserkennnis der Dämonen bei Markus,' in ZNTW v. [1904] p. 169 ff.

§ Cf. also, in the preceding verse, the exclamation of displeasure, 'Εε (= ἦν?)

is very striking, for He is not only recognized as Jesus of Nazareth, i.e. as one born of men, but is also addressed as the 'Holy One of God' (Lk 4<sup>8</sup>), and as the 'Son of God' (Lk 4<sup>4</sup>), i.e. as one of Divine nature, and this latter title is emphasized by their knowledge of His power to cast them into the abyss (Lk 8<sup>35</sup>), which also accounts for their fear of Him. The power of Christ over demons is regarded as something new* (ἀδελφὴ καινή, Mk 1<sup>7</sup>); this was because the method of exorcism which was familiar to the Jews hitherto was the pronouncing of a magical formula over the possessed. In the Gospels, as a rule, the casting out of a demon is stated without specifying by what means it was done (Mk 1<sup>34</sup>, Lk 7<sup>24</sup> 8<sup>2</sup>), but we learn this from a number of other passages: λόγῳ (Mk 8<sup>2</sup>), ἐν ὀνόματι θεοῦ (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>), ἐν δυνάμει θεοῦ (Lk 11<sup>20</sup>), ἐπιουσιῶν (Mt 17<sup>18</sup>), ἰσχύει (Mt 8<sup>26</sup>), ἐξέλθε (Mk 5<sup>8</sup>, Lk 4<sup>35</sup>); on one occasion the words are addressed to the mother of a child who is possessed: γεννηθήτω σοι ὡς θέλει (Mt 15<sup>23</sup>, Mk 7<sup>29</sup>), the possessed child not being in His presence (Mk 7<sup>26</sup>), so that His power did not depend on His visible personality.† Christ transfers this power of casting out demons (Mt 10<sup>1</sup>, Mk 3<sup>14</sup>); when His disciples cast them out it is by virtue of His name‡ (τῷ ὀνόματι δαίμονα ἐξβάλλουσιν, Mt 7<sup>22</sup>, Lk 10<sup>17</sup>), but they are not able to do this without faith (Mt 17<sup>20</sup>); we read, however, in Mk 9<sup>28-29</sup> of one who was not a follower of Christ, but who was, nevertheless, able to cast out demons in His name (cf. Mt 12<sup>27</sup>, Lk 11<sup>19</sup>). In Mk 3<sup>22</sup> the scribes say of Christ that 'he hath Beelzebub,' and in 3<sup>30</sup> occur the words, 'because they said, He hath an unclean spirit.' That Beelzebub the 'prince of the demons' and 'unclean spirit' are synonymous with 'demon' cannot be disputed. Christ is thus declared to be possessed; nevertheless, it is not this which calls forth His words, 'whosoever shall sin against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness' (v. 29), but the fact that He was accused of being in league with Beelzebub; this is important, as it would seem to support the theory, which is elsewhere adumbrated in the Gospels, that possession was not necessarily, per se, a moral disorder; there is also reason to believe that at least some forms of possession were regarded as mental derangement: Christ speaks of John the Baptist having been looked upon as possessed (Mt 11<sup>18</sup>, Lk 7<sup>33</sup>); he was so regarded, because there seemed to be something eccentric about his behaviour; in Jn 7<sup>20</sup> Christ is said to be possessed by a demon, because He said they sought to kill Him; in 8<sup>48-49</sup>, where it is said: 'Thou art a Samaritan and hast a demon,' points to the fact that a man who was possessed was despised because he spoke what was deemed nonsense; also, the supposed connexion between possession and mental derangement is pointedly brought out in Jn 10<sup>20</sup> 'He hath a demon and is mad.' While fully realizing that the Fourth Gospel stands by itself, it must be conceded that it contributes one very important consideration, especially as the idea of possession found there is not without parallel in the Synoptic Gospels, as shown above. The belief that possession was a species of mental derangement, wholly unconnected with the question of morality, is what the Fourth Gospel teaches; but then it must be remembered that 'the devil' and 'Satan,' who are identified|| (as in the Synoptic Gospels), are differentiated from 'demon'; whereas, according to the Synoptics, all belong to the same category, Satan being the chief (Mt 12<sup>24</sup>). The passage Jn 10<sup>20</sup> receives additional significance in the light of the Heb. equivalent, compared, e.g., with Hos 9<sup>7</sup> 'the man that hath the spirit is mad' (מְרִירָה עֲרִיבָה). Delitzsch (NT in Heb. renders Jn 10<sup>20</sup> δαίμονιον ἔχει καὶ μαινοται, by מְרִירָה עֲרִיבָה, the last words of which should be compared with the rendering of the Pesh. מְרִירָה עֲרִיבָה.

|| e.g. Gospel demonology may, therefore, be briefly summed up thus:—

- (1) Demons are under a head, Satan; they form a kingdom. (2) They are incorporeal, and generally, though not necessarily, invisible. (3) They inhabit certain places which they prefer to others. (4) They tend to live in groups. (5) They have names, and are sometimes identified with their victims, at other times differentiated from them. (6) They are the cause of mental and physical disease to men, women, and children. (7) They can pass in and out of men, and even animals. (8) More than one can take possession of a man at the same time. (9) Christ made it one of His chief aims to overthrow this kingdom, and set up His own in its place. (10) He cast out demons through His own name, or by His word. (11) He could delegate this power, which was regarded as something new. (12) He never treats the possessed as wilful sinners, which is in strong contrast to His words to the scribes and Pharisees. (13) Only on the rarest occasions does He come into direct contact with the possessed. (14) His Divine and human natures are recognized by demons. (15) At His second coming the members of this kingdom are to be condemned to eternal fire.

5. In endeavouring to reach some definite conclusions on this difficult subject of Gospel demonology, it is well to place certain considerations in juxtaposition. On the one hand, the history of mankind shows that a superstitious belief in evil-disposed demons, to whom every imaginable untoward circumstance is attributed, is universal; there is a remarkable similarity, in essence, in the demonology of all times; it stretches, from the earliest times to the present day, like a great chain along the course of human history. The demonology of the Gospels shows itself, in many respects, unmistakably akin to this universal superstition. It is impossible to ignore the fact that, in its broad outlines, Gospel demonology is in accordance with the current Jewish beliefs of the time. It will, moreover, have been noticed, from the details given above, that the data in the Gospels themselves are inconsistent. Again, the way in which in the Gospels much is attributed to the action of demons (deafness, dumbness, etc.), looks naive to modern eyes. There is also this further consideration which conspires in discrediting the Gospel accounts on the subject, viz. that those who at the present day believe in the continued activity of demons are almost invariably such as are on a low stage of civilization, or they are peasants in country districts who have but rare opportunities of coming into contact with cultured people. And, lastly, account must be taken of the fact that very few could be found nowadays who would claim to point to any instance in their experience of the existence of demoniacal possession; thus the only parallels to Gospel demonology would have to be sought among the acknowledged super-

* The Syro-Hex., following the LXX, has a doublet, but the idea of madness is brought out in both.

* The method was new; cf., as regards Christ's general teaching, Mt 7<sup>28-29</sup> 'They were astonished at his teaching; for he taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes.'

stitutions of the Middle Ages, and the like. These considerations tend to the conclusion that the Gospel accounts of demons cannot be regarded as essentially different from the innumerable accounts from other sources.

But there is a second set of considerations, and to ignore these would be most unscientific. When the whole chain of demonology, from primitive times to the present day, is considered, it is quite impossible for an unbiased mind to be blind to the fact that, in spite of many points of similarity and even of essential identity, the demonology of the Gospels offers something sui generis; one becomes conscious of the fact that this link in the long chain is very different from all the other links. Another thing that strikes the student of the subject as very remarkable is, that Gospel demonology and the current Jewish belief are not more alike than is the case; they agree in so many respects, that one feels that only the existence of some extraordinary factor prevents their being wholly identical. But more than this, the dissimilarity between the two is just as striking as their points of similarity: in the one there is nothing eccentric, nothing done for effect, or for self-glorification,* there is no casting out of demons for the sake of exhibiting power, there is none of the 'wonder-working' which characterizes other systems; one object, and one only, runs through the whole of the accounts of the casting out of demons, namely, the alleviation of human suffering. To give in any detail the points of difference between the general subject of demonology and Gospel demonology would be impossible here, but, when the great mass of facts has been studied, the contrast between the two can be compared only to the contrast between folly and seriousness. Another conviction to which one is compelled in contemplating Gospel demonology in its broad outlines is that it is connected in the closest possible manner with the subject of sin; the symptoms of the 'possessed' in the Gospels are such as are common to humanity, and nobody doubts the accuracy with which these are described; the real crux arises when their cause has to be determined; this is ascribed by the compilers of the Gospels to the action of demons, i.e. to an evil agency; nowadays the same symptoms are ascribed to different causes—broadly speaking, to 'natural causes'; but may it not be that behind both theories there lies a deeper cause, the principle of Evil, occupying a vacant place in individuals which they themselves have provided by the abandonment of their self-control? There are cases in the Gospels to which this would not apply, but it is worth taking into consideration in contemplating the subject as a whole. It is well also to remember that the advance of Modern Science, especially in the domain of Psychology, has revealed problems whose most important result is to show how extremely little we know about such things as 'secondary personality,' the 'subliminal self,' 'change of control,' etc. etc.—in a word, how hidden still are the secrets of the region of the supersensuous.

Upon a subject that bristles with so many difficulties nobody would wish to dogmatize; no conclusion that has been reached is free from serious objections, and the same is the case with that here offered:—

Christ saw in the case of every 'possessed' victim a result of sin, not necessarily through the co-operation of the victims; † sin He saw embodied in 'Satan,' who is identified with 'demon' (see above); he was the personification of the principle of Evil, which was manifested in men in a variety of ways. When Christ 'exorcized' a 'demon'; He, by His Divine power, drove the evil out, and at the same time obliterated the visible results of sin. When the words and acts of Christ came to be written down, they were not always understood; * they were, no doubt, in their broad outlines, correctly reproduced; but what more natural than that they should be told in accordance with the ideas then current? Not the essence but the form differed from the actuality.

For the subsequent beliefs and superstitions about demons prevalent during the Middle Ages, and even up to the present day, a few references may be given out of a large number of works dealing with the subject:—

In the arts, in a 'Q&A' by Mr. Conybeare, already referred to, there is an admirable survey of the beliefs of the Church Fathers (viii. pp. 594-608, ix. pp. 56-72). Another work of Mr. Maury, who is one of the chief authorities on the subject, is his Crimes et légendes du moyen-âge, Paris, 1896. Andrew Lang deals with the psychology of the subject in his Making of Religion, mentioned above; so too Deltzsch, System, . . . also referred to above. Two other books are, Nevins' Demon Possession and allied Themes, New York, 1895; and Wall's Devils, a popular sketch of demons in ecclesiastical art, with good illustrations (London, 1904).

DEN (Mt 21<sup>18</sup> = Mk 11<sup>18</sup> = Lk 19<sup>46</sup> στέφανος [Nevins]; elsewhere in the Gospels only Jn 11<sup>18</sup> to describe the tomb of Lazarus, τὸ στέφανον).—In estimating the meaning of our Lord's declaration that the Temple had been made a den or cave of robbers, the immediate occasion of the words must be kept in view. It was the feast of the Passover, and the Temple courts were crowded by those who sold sheep, oxen, and pigeons, while the money-changers also carried on their trade. As no trace is found in the OT of such a market existing, it may be supposed it sprang up some time after the Captivity. It would plead for justification the needs of the new condition of the nation. Foreign Jews would thus be able to obtain on the spot both the Temple half-shekel required by the Law (Ex 30<sup>3</sup>), and also animals necessary for sacrifice, probably with the additional advantage that the latter would have an official guarantee of Levitical fitness for sacrifice, which must be obtained for any animal purchased elsewhere.

The profits from these sources were enormous. It has been calculated that the annual income derived from money-changing can hardly have been less than £8000-£9000, while the sale of pigeons is specially referred to as furnishing alone a large annual income. These profits appear to have been largely, if not entirely, appropriated by the priests. Certain booths are frequently mentioned as belonging to the 'sons of Hanan' (Annas), and appear to have existed until about three years before the destruction of Jerusalem, when they were destroyed. Besides the mere fact that the Temple was made a house of merchandise (Jn 2<sup>16</sup>), many passages in the Rabbinical writings appear to indicate that the Temple market was notorious for dishonest dealings, upon which passages it has been remarked (Speaker's Com. in loc.) that the spaces in the court were probably let out to traffickers at an exorbitant rate. The remembrance of this state of things gives new force to the quotation from Jer 7th here used by our Lord.

Josephus (Apion, ii. 24) writes: 'The Temple ought to be common to all men, because He is the common God of all'; but, far from its being thus, it had become the possession of a few. 'Ye gather together here money and animals, as robbers collect their booty in their den' (Fritzsche, quoted by Lange).

Those who ought to have been the first to teach others the sacredness of the place had seized upon it, as robbers would seize some den or cave in the mountains, in which they might maintain their unity for the purpose of spoil. See, further, art. TEMPLE in vol. II.

DENARIUS.—See MONEY.

DENIAL.—The verb ἀρνεῖσθαι, 'to deny' is used in contrast with ὁμολογεῖν, 'to confess' (Mt 10<sup>22</sup>; Lk 12<sup>8</sup>, where ἀπαρνεῖσθαι is also employed; cf. 2 Ti 2<sup>12</sup>, where ἀρνεῖσθαι is used specially of the verbal denial of Christ, due to fear of suffering). As confession of Christ (wh. see) is the outward expression of personal faith in Him, so denial of Him is (1) the withholding, (2) refusing, or (3) withdrawing such confession. In the first of these categories are included those who, like some members of the Sanhedrin (Jn 12<sup>6</sup>), believed on Christ, but did not confess Him; in the second, those who did not believe on Him, and as a natural result did not confess Him; and, in the third, those who have confessed Him, but, through fear of men, deny Him in times of persecution. It is the third class to which reference is made in Mt 10<sup>33</sup> 'Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven.' Open disavowal of faith in Christ ('before men') is taken as a clear indication of the offender's attitude towards Him, and eventuates in his exclusion from the blessings of the perfected kingdom in heaven. Such disavowal must be deliberate and persistent, and is to be distinguished from a momentary lapse of personal weakness, like that of Simon Peter, which by timely repentance became the means of strengthening his character, and enabling him to strengthen others (Lk 22<sup>62</sup>). In the narrower and stricter sense, therefore, denial means public apostasy from faith in Christ, the guilt of which is visited with a punishment in exact correspondence with it.

1. The discourse in which the great warning against denial is found (Mt 10<sup>33-35</sup>), and which was addressed to the Twelve in view of their Apostolic mission after the Resurrection, evidences its lateness by the serious situation depicted, in which exposure to the severest forms of persecution is contemplated, including punishment in the synagogues, arraignment before Gentile tribunals, and death itself. It must belong at earliest to the period of growing opposition, and has been assigned to as late a date as the close of the ministry. The Second Evangelist places a portion of it in the eschatological discourse spoken on Olivet to the four disciples on the Wednesday or Thursday of Passion-week (Mk 13<sup>32-35</sup>). Christ no doubt foretold almost from the outset of His ministry that His disciples would be exposed to reproach and obloquy (Mt 5<sup>11</sup>), but the first intimation of serious opposition synchronizes with the first plain intimation of His own death (Mk 8<sup>31</sup>). It was in prospect of the undisguised hostility awaiting them in connection with their Apostolic mission that Christ cautioned His disciples against the danger of denial.

If He suffered death for claiming to be the Messiah (Mk 14<sup>61-64</sup>), it is evident that those who afterwards proclaimed Him as such must run the risk of sharing a fate like His.

2. Due stress must be laid on the fact that the object of denial is the person of Christ, not simply His message or His words, which in any case derive their ultimate authority from His person. It is admitted that 'His earlier demand that men should fulfil the condition of participation in the Kingdom of God by repentance and trust in the message of salvation, became narrowed down afterwards to the demand that men should unite themselves to Him as the Messiah, and cleave fast to Him in trust' (Wendt, Teaching, ii. 308). But the force of the concession is quite destroyed by the further representation that 'union to the person of the Messiah is nothing else than adherence to the message of the Kingdom of God brought by Him' (p. 310). This is to reduce the person of the Messiah to a compendious formula for His teachings, and ignores the fact that, after the great confession at Caesarea Philippi, Christ grounded on His Messiahship a claim to absolute self-surrender and self-sacrifice (Mk 8<sup>34</sup>). Devotion to Himself is henceforward made the supreme test of discipleship, and the withdrawal of such devotion seals the doom of the offender hereafter.

We are in a region where personal relations and obligations are everything; where the injury done by denial is not measured by the rejection of a message merely, but by the wound inflicted on One who has rendered unparalleled services.

3. It is the rupture, though but for a moment, and without deliberate intention, of tender, intimate, personal ties by the act of the disciple, that renders the great denial of the chief Apostle so affecting an incident (Mt 26<sup>69-75</sup>, Mk 14<sup>64-66-72</sup>, Lk 22<sup>64-67</sup>, Jn 18<sup>15-18, 25-27</sup>). His fall is the more surprising by reason of Christ's clear announcement of it beforehand, and Peter's strong protestations of fidelity (Mt 26<sup>34</sup>; Mk 14<sup>29</sup>, Lk 22<sup>32-34</sup>, cf. Jn 13<sup>37-38</sup>). Deep as the fall was, however, care must be taken not to exaggerate its criminality. That the thrice-repeated denial was due to want of faith or devotion on the Apostle's part, there is nothing to show. It was indeed ardent attachment to Christ that led him, after his hasty retreat, to follow at a distance, and seek admission to the house of Annas, before whom the preliminary examination of Christ took place. He was determined to keep near his Master, and it was doubtless this very determination that betrayed him into sin. When challenged in the porch by the maid who kept the door, he gave an evasive reply (Jn 18<sup>17</sup>, Mk 14<sup>68</sup>), fearing that to own his discipleship would lead to his exclusion from the premises. When taunted later on with being a disciple by the rough servants gathered round the fire in the courtyard (Jn 18<sup>25-27</sup>), he denied it in more categorical fashion, hoping thereby to evade further remarks, and avoid the summary ejection which would have followed the detection of his previous falsehood. Having travelled so far on the downward path, it became well-nigh impossible to turn back, and on being charged by one of the kinsmen of Malchus with having been with Christ in the garden at the moment of the arrest, overcome by fear that he might be called to account for his rash act, he denied his Master for the third time, and backed up his denial with oaths and curses (Jn 18<sup>28</sup>, cf. Mt 26<sup>74</sup>). It has been suggested that his falsehoods would sit lightly on his conscience, on the ground that he felt justified in giving no kind of information about himself or his Master which might compromise a movement which he imagined was but temporarily arrested. He probably experienced no scruples in deceiving his Master's enemies, especially as this seemed the only way of carrying out his purpose to keep as near to Christ as possible without risk of detection. But when all due allowance is made for the excellency of his motives, his conduct is utterly indefensible. When he affirmed so confidently that he was ready to go to death, what he thought of was a public testimony to Christ, for whom he counted no sacrifice too great. 'A great deed of heroism is often easier than loyalty in small things,' and Peter, who had courage enough to defend his Master at the cost of his life, displayed lamentable weakness in a minor emergency. The sound of cock-crow, announcing the approach of dawn, was a painful reminder that he had proved lacking in genuine fidelity, and false to the pledges so recently given. But that his love to Christ still remained the same, was abundantly evidenced by his subsequent act of sincere contrition.

DEPENDENCE.—1. W. S. MONTGOMERY. The feeling which impels men to look up to, and depend upon, a Power higher and other than themselves is essentially human, universal, and, in the position which it occupies in their lives, most prominent. It supplies them with an intuitive hope, which is quickened by their sense of need and helplessness, that this Power will supply their wants, and fill the mysteriously void places of their being. This hope finds expression in the universal desire for communion with that Power by prayer, worship, sacrifice, and so on in the most diverse forms. The psalms which breathe out of the Psalms of the Jewish Church are the outcome of men's longing after and dependence upon God (cf. Ps 42. 73<sup>21-28</sup> 108. 139, etc.); and when the Psalmist sings 'My soul cleaveth (σπνν) LXX εκολληθη) after thee' (Ps 63<sup>1</sup>), he is putting into words, suited to his own individual experience, the same idea which St. Paul says, in his address to the assembled Athenians, is universally human (γεννν εν τνν οδνν, Ac 17<sup>27</sup>). A direct relationship, which is personal, is everywhere in the OT postulated (cf. e.g. Gn 5<sup>22-24</sup> 6<sup>9</sup>, Mal 2<sup>8</sup>, Am 2<sup>8</sup>) as existing between Jehovah and His people. On the one side is the Supreme Personal Will which projects itself into a world of created intelligences, either in the form of law objectively revealed (Dt 5<sup>1</sup>, cf. the prophetic formula, 'Thus saith the Lord'), or in that form which, in the words of the writer of the Fourth Gospel, 'coming into the world lightens every man' (Jn 1<sup>9</sup>, cf. Ro 2<sup>13</sup>, Jer 31<sup>33</sup>). On the other, there is the being made in 'His own image' (Gn 1<sup>26</sup> 5<sup>1</sup> 9, cf. 1 Co 11<sup>7</sup>, Ja 3<sup>9</sup>, Sir 17<sup>7</sup>, Wis 2<sup>23</sup>), whose life, touching His life at all points, owes its existence to the continued exercise of His will (cf. Ac 17<sup>28</sup>).

We have here, not the antithesis of eternal and temporal, finite and infinite, so much as an emphatic synthesis effected by a close personal relationship, in which we may say consists all that is essentially true in religion. The error into which Schleiermacher, for example, fell when he made religion consist in a feeling of dependence (Abhngigkeit) on a Higher Power is obviously an error of defect, as it leaves out of account the element of Personality just referred to (see his Christliche Glaube). At the same time it would be a mistake no less fatal to eliminate this feeling from the domain of man's spiritual life; for it is one of the ultimate realities of our being, finding expression in a variety of ways according to the individual life which is lived.

2. The sense of dependence upon God is seen most clearly and fully in the life of Jesus Christ. It is focussed, as it were, in the story of the Incarnation, and in the circumstances in which the Incarnate life was passed from childhood onwards. In this, as in other respects, that life is the epitome of all that is true in the life of man. The time when the foreordained 'mystery of God' (1 Co 2<sup>1</sup>, cf. Eph 3<sup>3-6</sup>, Col 1<sup>26</sup>) should be revealed, depended on the wisdom and will of the Father (Gal 4<sup>1</sup>, cf. Mk 1<sup>15</sup>). The manner of its revelation was conditioned by the laws of motherhood ('made of a woman, made under law,' Gal 4<sup>1</sup>, cf. Lk 2<sup>7</sup>, where the natural law of parturition is referred to explicitly), and the safety of the Divine Child's life depended on the vigilance of Joseph (Mt 2<sup>13-18</sup>) no less than on the maternal tenderness and love of His mother. His education was that of a Jewish child in a pious Jewish home, where the language spoken was the current 'Hebrew' or Palestinian Aramaic (see a very useful article, 'The Dialects of Palestine in the time of Christ,' by Ad. Neubauer in Studia Biblica, vol. i. pp. 39-73 [Oxford]); with this we may compare a similar discussion by J. B. Mayor in his Epistle of St. James, which was Jesus' mother-tongue (cf. Mk 3<sup>17</sup> 5<sup>41</sup> 7<sup>34</sup> 14<sup>36</sup> 15<sup>34</sup>, Jn 1<sup>42</sup>, Mt 5<sup>22</sup>). In point of fact, it is not too much to say that He was governed in His earthly life, physical and intellectual, by the ordinary laws of nature. If He violated these laws, even in the interests of His work, He had to pay the penalty which nature inexorably demands (cf. Mt 4<sup>2</sup>=Lk 4<sup>2</sup>, Mk 11<sup>12</sup>=Mt 21<sup>18</sup>, Jn 4<sup>6</sup> 19<sup>23</sup>, and Mt 8<sup>34</sup>).

In the moral sphere we observe the same phenomenon, which finds a prominent place in the Christological teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Even as we are, so is He, 'compassed with infirmity' (5<sup>2</sup>). Like ourselves in all things, 'apart from sin,' He suffered from the assaults of temptation (4<sup>15</sup>, cf. 2<sup>18</sup>). He had, as we have, to learn slowly and with pain the moral virtue of obedience, notwithstanding the unique character of His Sonship (5<sup>8</sup>). In Him also the law, by which alone progress is assured, exacted implicit submission, although the lesson was hard (2<sup>18</sup>, cf. 5<sup>7</sup>, 7<sup>28</sup>). That Jesus was fully conscious of the necessity of this bitter experience is seen from His own saying, in which He defies the threatened persecution of Herod, and which contains the same verb as is used in Hebrews, to denote the final cause of His sufferings (τελευτνν, Lk 13<sup>33</sup>).

Even in the sphere of His mental life we find Him depending on the laws which govern intellectual growth universally. Side by side with His physical growth, as the Lukan narrative tells us, there was a corresponding expansion of His intellectual and spiritual faculties (τοσοτνν προεκοσσανεν τνν σοφνν και φωννν και χυφννν κ.τ.λ., Lk 2<sup>52</sup>, with which we may compare the words in v. 40, where the participle εληροσμενον in conjunction with σοφννν is a distinct assertion of continuous and gradual development). Nor have we any just reason to suppose that the operation of this law ceased at any given stage in His life. On the score of credibility it will be found as difficult to believe that gradual growth along these lines ever found a place in Jesus' life, as to believe that it entered so completely into the warp and woof of His experience that it accompanied Him all through His life, even to the very end (cf. art. 'The Baptism, Temptation, and Transfiguration: A Study,' in Ch. Quart. Rev., July 1901). There is no period in the life of Jesus when we can say, 'at this point He ceased to learn, or to advance towards perfection' (τελειωσνν, cf. 'Additional Note' on He 2<sup>10</sup> in Westcott's The Epistle to the Hebrews). His lesson was only finally 'learned' in its entirety when, yielding Himself unreservedly into His Father's hands, He became 'obedient unto death, yes, the death of the cross' (Ph 2<sup>8</sup>), and 'the author (αυτοσ) of eternal salvation' (He 5<sup>9</sup>) to all who are so far partakers of His Life that they too learn the meaning of perfect obedience (υπακοφνν). See art. ACCOMMODATION, p. 15.

In close connexion with what we have been saying is the repeated disavowal by Jesus of all intention to assert His own will (cf.  $\tau\acute{\alpha}$   $\theta\upsilon\lambda\acute{\alpha}\sigma\alpha\iota$   $\tau\acute{\alpha}$   $\epsilon\gamma\omega$ , Jn 6<sup>30</sup> 6<sup>38</sup>, see also Mt 23<sup>23</sup> 42=Mk 14<sup>36</sup> =Lk 22<sup>42</sup>). His complete dependence on the will of His Father—life than His continuous insistence in setting that will, as it were, over against and above His own. At the same time we must remember that by this differentiation He deliberately reminds us, again and again, how complete His subordination, in the sphere of His human existence, has become, not only in word and deed, but also in His inner life of thought and intention. He has laid aside the power of doing anything 'of himself' (Jn 5<sup>30</sup>), because the will of His Father is for Him the object of thought and loving service ( $\sigma\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon$ , . . .  $\sigma\epsilon$   $\theta\upsilon\lambda\acute{\alpha}\sigma\alpha\iota$   $\epsilon\upsilon\theta$   $\pi\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\upsilon\sigma\iota$   $\mu\epsilon$ ). The accomplishing of the work (4th) which that will has put before Him is the nourishing sustenance ( $\beta\omicron\sigma\iota\sigma\mu\acute{\alpha}$ ) which is necessary for the building up of His life. 'The will of God' ( $\tau\acute{\alpha}$   $\theta\upsilon\lambda\acute{\alpha}\sigma\alpha\iota$   $\tau\acute{\alpha}$   $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ ) is the sovereign objective of Jesus' life, and perfect conformity to it in every point is the goal of His life's work. Looking over the uses of the word  $\theta\upsilon\lambda\acute{\alpha}\sigma\alpha\iota$  in the NT, we find that it is almost universally used of His carrying out by others of the purposes of God, the accomplishment in the world of that which the Divine will ordains for execution (for other usages of this word, see Jn 1<sup>4</sup>, Lk 22<sup>42</sup>, etc.). It is in this sense pre-eminently that the word is used in connexion with Jesus' work (cf. Jn 6<sup>38</sup>, where the will of God, in the redemption of humanity, is the object of the Incarnation, and furnishes the work which Jesus avowedly sets Himself to accomplish). We are thus not surprised at the transference of the words of Ps 40 to the work of Christ by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (13<sup>17</sup>  $\theta\upsilon\lambda\acute{\alpha}\sigma\alpha\iota$   $\tau\acute{\alpha}$   $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$   $\epsilon\upsilon$   $\theta\upsilon\lambda\acute{\alpha}\sigma\alpha\iota$   $\tau\acute{\alpha}$   $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ , He 10<sup>6</sup>), who sees in this passage the aptest illustration of the object of Jesus' life.

3. This protracted and willing subordination on the part of Jesus had its final reward in that perfect harmony between His own and His Father's will, which left no room, in the sphere of His human activity, for anything but the most complete community of interests. Looking at this side of His life, we can appreciate the element in His teaching, so constantly emphasized, which insists on the lowliest and most complete self-surrender in others. He, the Man Jesus, succeeded in bringing His human will into absolute conformity with that of His Father, and so He teaches men to pray, 'May thy will be done . . . on earth' (Mt 6<sup>10</sup> cf. 23<sup>39</sup>=Lk 22<sup>42</sup>). Our right to participate in the privileges of that family relationship which Jesus is not ashamed to own (He 2<sup>11</sup>) depends on the fidelity with which we enter, by our actions, into the spirit guiding His own work (see Mt 12<sup>50</sup>). This is the touchstone by which men shall be ultimately tested, and by which their right of entry into the Kingdom of heaven shall be decided (Mt 7<sup>21</sup>).

4. Nor must we forget that this phenomenon is observable in Jesus' relation to His fellow-men. And here it is significant to note that, although always willing to exercise the prerogatives of His Divine Sonship in favour of the distressed, yet He never works a miracle on His own behalf. If He is hungry or thirsty, He trusts to the kindness and goodwill of others (Jn 4<sup>7</sup> 19<sup>28</sup>, Mt 21<sup>18</sup>, 4<sup>2</sup>, Mk 13<sup>21</sup>). The lack of sympathy has a marked effect on the power of His ministrations ('And he could there do no mighty work,' Mk 6<sup>5</sup>), and He recognizes that, in certain cases at least, the exercise of His power of miraculous healing may be marred or promoted by the absence or presence of a sympathetic trust on the part of those with whom He is dealing ('All things are possible to him that believeth,' Mk 9<sup>23</sup>, see Mt 9<sup>24</sup>, with which we may also compare a remarkable extension, in the application of this rule to the sufferer whose friends stand sponsor, as it were, for his faith and trust [ $\tau\eta\upsilon$   $\pi\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\upsilon$   $\alpha\lambda\theta\epsilon\upsilon$ , Mt 9<sup>24</sup>]). Indeed, the presence of a capacious spirit in His hearers moved Him, on more than one occasion, to indignation or grief (cf.  $\mu\epsilon\tau'$   $\sigma\theta\upsilon\lambda\eta$ , Mk 3<sup>5</sup>;  $\epsilon\mu\beta\omicron\upsilon\lambda\epsilon\upsilon\sigma\tau\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$ , Jn 11<sup>38</sup>), feelings which were also aroused in His breast by any action tending to stifle in others the expression of their trust in, and sympathy with, His work and Person (cf. the emphatic verb  $\eta\gamma\gamma\alpha\delta\epsilon\tau\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$ , Mk 10<sup>14</sup>).

Mt 26<sup>10</sup>, Mk 8<sup>17</sup> 21 etc.). It appears sometimes as if, in His eagerness to discover the smallest germs of spiritual reciprocity, He would gaze into their very hearts. In all the four Gospels the word  $\beta\alpha\lambda\epsilon\upsilon\sigma\iota$  (with compounds) is used to denote this anxiety on the part of Jesus (cf.  $\epsilon\gamma\omega$   $\beta\alpha\lambda\epsilon\upsilon\sigma\iota$   $\alpha\lambda\theta\epsilon\upsilon$ , Mk 10<sup>14</sup>;  $\beta\alpha\lambda\epsilon\upsilon\sigma\iota$   $\alpha\lambda\theta\epsilon\upsilon$ , Mk 10<sup>17</sup>, Mt 19<sup>23</sup>; see also Jn 14<sup>22</sup> and the pathetic use of the same verb in Mk 22<sup>51</sup> [ $\beta\alpha\lambda\epsilon\upsilon\sigma\iota$   $\epsilon\upsilon$   $\tau\eta\upsilon$ ]). For the use of the verb  $\epsilon\mu\beta\omicron\upsilon\lambda\epsilon\upsilon\sigma\iota$ , which is almost confined to St. Mark, compare Mk 3<sup>5</sup>=Lk 6<sup>10</sup>, Mk 3<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>23</sup>. Even when dealing with the question of the profound, vital union of Himself with those who believe in Him, Jesus is fully conscious that His work is conditioned by their attitude to Him. The imperative clause 'abide in me' (Jn 15<sup>4</sup>) is supplemented by another clause, which may be interpreted as containing a contingent promise, 'I will on that condition abide in you, or, more probably, as a complementary imperative, 'permit me to abide in you.' In either case it is true to say that Jesus here recognizes and teaches the doctrine that 'the freedom of man's will is such that on his action depends that of Christ' (see Plummer's 'St. John' in Cambridge Greek Testament, in loc.).

5. Not the least remarkable feature in the teaching of Jesus is that on which the writer of the Fourth Gospel lays particular stress. The union between Him and the Father is so complete, that He describes it as a mutual indwelling or co-existence (Jn 10<sup>38</sup> 14<sup>19</sup> 20). He derives from the Father, as the ultimate source of each (Jn 16<sup>32</sup>), both the terms of the message He delivers (Jn 8<sup>23</sup> 7<sup>14</sup>  $\eta$   $\epsilon\mu\theta$   $\delta\iota\delta\alpha\chi\eta$ , 12<sup>46</sup>) and the power which renders His work 'coincident and coexistent with that of the Father' (Jn 5<sup>19</sup>, see Westcott's Gospel of St. John, in loc.). Jesus refuses to claim the right or even the ability to act separately from the Father, and the character of His works is determined by the fact that it is not He Himself who is the author of them, but the Father dwelling in, speaking and acting through Him (cf. Jn 5<sup>19</sup> 14<sup>10</sup>). It is quite true, in a very real sense, to say with Westcott that 'Christ places His work as co-ordinate with that of the Father, and not as dependent on it'; at the same time it is true in a sense no less real that 'the very idea of Sonship involves . . . that of dependence,' as will be seen if we refer to such phrases as  $\alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{\alpha}$   $\epsilon\mu\alpha\sigma\tau\acute{\omega}$  (2<sup>3</sup>),  $\epsilon\zeta$   $\epsilon\mu\alpha\sigma\tau\acute{\omega}$  (12<sup>48</sup>). What this phraseology implied, in the mind at least of the writer of the Fourth Gospel, will perhaps be better understood by observing his use of it in other connexions (cf. e.g. Jn 11<sup>51</sup>, where the 'prophecy' of Caiaphas is made to depend for its validity on the  $\epsilon\upsilon\lambda\omicron\gamma\omicron\mu\alpha$  inherent in the high priestly office; see also 15<sup>1</sup> 16<sup>32</sup>, where the deeds done and the words spoken are relegated to a higher source than to the energy possessed by the actors).

6. Another side of Jesus' self-revelation as to the condition of dependence in which His spiritual life on earth was lived, is to be found in His doctrine of our dependence upon Him. Just as He can do nothing 'of himself,' but traces the source of His manifold activities to the mutual indwelling of the Father and Himself, so He tells His disciples they are powerless for good if they are 'apart from' Him ( $\chi\omega\pi\iota\varsigma$   $\epsilon\mu\omicron\upsilon$   $\omega\delta$   $\delta\iota\delta\upsilon\sigma\tau\epsilon$   $\pi\omega\sigma\epsilon\iota$   $\omega\beta\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\iota$ , Jn 15<sup>5</sup>). He is the derived source of their vital energy in the same sense that the tree is the source of the fruit-bearing life of its branch. It is significant that this writer uses the same verb and preposition ( $\mu\epsilon\tau\epsilon\upsilon\iota$   $\epsilon\upsilon$ ) to express the nature of the union of the Father and Jesus, and that of Jesus and those who believe in Him (cf. 14<sup>19</sup> 15<sup>4</sup> etc.). The words of St. Paul to the Athenians, 'In him we live and move and have our being' (Ac 17<sup>28</sup>), are as true of Jesus as they are of all the children of men, 'for both he that sanctifieth and they that are sanctified are all of one' ( $\epsilon\zeta$   $\epsilon\upsilon\theta\epsilon\upsilon$ , He 2<sup>11</sup>). It is this very likeness ( $\homon\epsilon\iota\sigma\mu\alpha$ , 1<sup>h</sup> 2<sup>7</sup>, cf. He 2<sup>17</sup>) of nature which makes interdependence, in the sphere of active work, between Christ and believers a prominent feature in all sound Christologies (cf. Mk 16<sup>16</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>1</sup>). The well-known Pauline  $\epsilon\upsilon$   $\chi\alpha\sigma\tau\epsilon\upsilon$  (cf. 2 Co 5<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>2</sup>, Col 1<sup>2</sup> etc.) is balanced by the no less Pauline  $\alpha\pi\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\varsigma$   $\epsilon\upsilon$   $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$  (Ro 8<sup>14</sup>, Co 1<sup>3</sup>, cf. Eph 3<sup>17</sup>, Gal 2<sup>20</sup>).

Life in Christ is the normal condition of redeemed humanity (1 Co 15<sup>22</sup>). As the head is the seat of the vital functions in the human body, and without the head the body is helpless and lifeless, so Christ is the source of the Church's life and energy (Eph 4<sup>15</sup>, Col 1<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>9</sup> etc.). Her capacity for development springs directly from Him, considered in relation to His place in her constitution (Eph 2<sup>21</sup>), and it is impossible even to conceive of the Church apart from this relationship (1 Co 3<sup>11</sup>). 'The Head,' 'the chief corner-stone,' 'the foundation,' are the principal Pauline formulae used by the Apostle to picture the mysterious nature of a union upon which the very existence of the Church depends. The symbol of the marriage relationship, with all the consequences involved, is not only found in the Johannine idealism (Rev 19<sup>7</sup> 21<sup>2-9</sup>), but discovers itself underlying St. Paul's ideas as to the nature of the tie which binds the Church to Christ, in its aspect both of loving equality (Eph 5<sup>21</sup>) and of dependent subordination (Eph 5<sup>24-33</sup>).

Relative to what we have been saying, it may not be amiss to recall the difficult words of St. Paul, which emphasize this side of a mysterious truth.—Now I . . . fill up on my part that which is lacking of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for His body's sake, which is the Church' (Col 1<sup>24</sup>, cf. the strange translation of this sentence in Moffatt's The Historical New Testament). It is as if the Apostle said that Christ is still, in a certain sense, subject to His Father's disciplinary control (cf. Ac 9<sup>4</sup>, Jn 15<sup>1</sup>), where the Father, as the husbandman, prunes the branches, and consequently the tree out of which the branches grow. The tribulations and disappointments which the Church experiences from age to age are manifestations of the same spirit of unbelief and opposition encountered by Jesus during His work on earth (Jn 15<sup>3</sup> 17<sup>4-19</sup>). Nor can we be surprised if we observe this continued display of hostility in one form or another, because Jesus Himself knew that it would be so, and that He was the object of opposition. He said that the world would hate to accept the directing influence of that body which professes to derive its life directly from His life (cf. Lk 6<sup>22</sup> 21<sup>7</sup>, Mt 10<sup>22</sup> 24<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>21</sup> 41<sup>6</sup>).

The other side of the same truth is not forgotten by Jesus, who taught that the conscious recognition of His claims over the lives of His followers, and the consequent acts of goodwill towards the latter, will not escape His notice (cf. ἡ ἀγαπήν ἡν ἔκτισεν ἡμεῖς, Mk 9<sup>4</sup>, and ἡ ἄγνητος ἀνάμνησις, Mt 10<sup>4</sup>). See also Mt 24<sup>45</sup> 46, where, in His solemn parable of the judgment Day, Jesus emphasizes the great truth of His self-identification with all who have their lives grounded in Him (cf. ἐστέον ὡς ἡ ἀγάπη μου ἡν ἔκτισεν ἡμεῖς, v. 46).

7. We must not close our consideration of this subject without referring to a feature of the Christian life which is supplementary to and dependent upon the foregoing. The life of the believer is not bounded by his own immediate interests, although as an individual that life is immeasurably enriched and ennobled by its personal contact with, and share in, the Incarnate Life of Jesus Christ. In the parables of the Vine and the Good Shepherd He leads to the conclusion that all His disciples stand in a relationship to each other of the closest kind. There is an interdependence between them which springs out of their common relationship to Christ their Head. This truth is especially dwelt on by St. Paul in his reasoning on the variety of work but unity of purpose which characterizes the lives of professing Christians considered in their corporate capacity, and as constituent parts of a great whole. No individual life can be considered as self-centred in the sense of its being independent of the lives of its fellows. However unconscious one may be of the fact, it nevertheless remains true that no single member of 'the body of Christ' (σῶμα Χριστοῦ) is unaffected by the fortunes of its brethren. Various as are the functions of the parts, vital as is the dependence of each on Him in whom their common life has its roots, it is still the truth that the fulness of the life of every individual is affected by the joy or the sorrow, the strength or the weakness, of every other (cf. 1 Co 12<sup>26-28</sup>, Gal 3<sup>26</sup>, Col 3<sup>4</sup>, Eph 3<sup>10</sup>). The recognition of this common share in the one higher life is necessary as affording scope for the exercise of the greatest of all human virtues (ἡ ἀγάπη, 1 Co 13<sup>13</sup>).

The incapability of fully appreciating this feature of Jesus' teaching, which is ultimately bound up with His ideals and aspirations, will largely account for the signal failure of Christendom to realize that spiritual as well as visible unity of life and purpose to which He looked forward in the later stages of His ministry. Oneness is just the characteristic which cannot be predicated of the Christian community. More especially is this the case if we consider the nature of the oneness aspired after by Jesus for His followers—a oneness which has its roots in the Divine life, and 'in which each constituent being is a conscious element in the being of a vast whole' (ὅσα ὄντα περιελαμβάνονται εἰς ἓν, Jn 17<sup>21</sup>, cf. vv. 11, 21, 22, Ro 12<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>27</sup>; see also Westcott's Gospel of St. John, p. 246 f.).

The opening years of the twentieth century give promise of a profounder realization of this Divine idea; and the craving after unity, in some sense at least, may issue in a truer conception of the inter-relations of Christian people, in a real synthesis of the individual's freedom and his subordination and dependence as a member of that which is essentially one whole (cf. ὅτι εἰς ἓν ἦσαν, ἐν ὅσῳ αἱ πολλοὶ ἐγένετο, 1 Co 10<sup>17</sup>). Perhaps it is not without significance that, in recording the prayer of Jesus for His Church, St. John uses the present tense of the verbs πιστεύω and γινώσκω (Jn 17<sup>21, 22</sup>), which points to the ultimate, albeit gradual, acquirement by 'the world' of that faith and knowledge which the spectacle of a union so vital and so profound is calculated to impart.

J. R. WILLIS.
DÉRELICION.—Mt 27<sup>46</sup> = Mk 15<sup>34</sup>. About three o'clock in the afternoon, when Jesus had hung for six hours on the cross, the bystanders were startled by a loud cry from the meek Sufferer: Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' It was a sentence from that psalm which, says Tertullian,† 'contains the whole Passion of Christ.' What was it that wrung from His lips that exceeding bitter cry? The Evangelists have not drawn the veil aside and revealed what was passing in the Redeemer's soul, and it becomes us to refrain from curious speculation, and recognize that there is here an impenetrable mystery. Yet it is right that we should seek to enter into it so far as we may, if only that we may realize its greatness and be delivered from belittling thoughts.

An explanation has been sought mainly along two lines. (1) Jesus was standing in the room of sinners and enduring vicariously the wrath of God. This opinion is at once unscriptural and irrational. It was indeed possible for God to inflict upon Jesus the punishment which is due to sinners; but it is inconceivable that He should have transferred His wrath from them to Him—as it were saying, 'I will be angry with Him instead of them.' Jesus never endured the wrath of God. 'We do not suggest,' says Calvin, 'that God was ever His adversary or angry with Him. For how should He be angry with His beloved Son in whom His mind rested?' At every step of His progress through the world He was the beloved Son, and He was never so well pleasing to the Father as in that hour when He hung a willing victim on the cross, 'obedient even unto death' (Ph 2). His sacrifice for the sin of the world was not merely His death; it was His entire life of unspotted holiness and vicarious love (cf. He 9<sup>14</sup>). His death was not the whole of His sacrifice, but the consummation of it. He bore the sin of the world from Nazareth to Calvary, and, if God was angry with Him at the last, He must have been angry with Him all along.

(2) Jesus was not really forsaken by God, but His soul was clouded by the anguish of His flesh and spirit, and His faith, hitherto victorious, gave way. 'We have here,' says Meyer, 'the purely human feeling that arises from a natural but momentary quailing before the agonies of death, in every respect similar to that which had been experienced by the author of the psalm.' It was a 'subjective feeling,' and there was no 'actual objective desertion on the part of God.' This explanation is very inadequate. At the ninth hour the worst was over, and the end was at hand. It is incredible that He should have faltered then after enduring the sharpest pangs with steadfast fortitude. Whatever His dereliction may have meant, it was no mere subjective feeling, but an objective reality, and it came from God.

According to the Wolfsb. Fragm., the cry of Jesus was a despairing confession that His cause was lost; God had failed Him. But He had foreseen the cross all along. See CRUCIFIXION. According to Renan, it was wrung from His lips by the ingratitude of men: 'He repented suffering for a worthless race.' The logion is indubitably authentic; it is one of Schmiedel's 'absolutely credible passages' (Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Gospels,' § 139).

If Jesus was indeed the eternal Son of God, 'bearing our sins in his body on the tree' (1 P 2<sup>24</sup>), it is in no wise strange that His experience at that awful crisis should lie beyond our ken; but some light is shed upon the mystery by the profound truth, so often reiterated in the NT, that it was necessary for Him, in order that He might redeem the children of men, to be identified with them in every particular of their sorrowful condition. That He might 'redeem us from the curse of the law' it was necessary that He should be 'made a curse for us' (Gal 3<sup>13</sup>); 'it behoved him in every respect to be made like unto his brethren, that he might prove a merciful and faithful High Priest'; and it is because 'he hath himself suffered, having been tempted,' that 'he is able to succour them that are being tempted' (He 2<sup>17-18</sup>). The uttermost strait in human experience is the passage through the valley of the shadow of death, and nothing but the sense of God's presence can relieve its horror (cf. Ps 23<sup>4</sup>). Had Jesus enjoyed the consciousness that God was with Him in that dread extremity, He would have been exempted from the most awful experience of the children of men, and His sympathy would have failed us precisely where it is most needed. And therefore the sense of the Father's presence was withheld from Him in that awful hour.

It was not necessary to this end that the Father should be angry with Him. When the eternal Son of God became man, He was made in every respect like unto His brethren; and what differentiated Him from them was the closeness of His intimacy with God and the singular graces wherewith God endowed Him. He had a unique acquaintance with the Father's purposes, but He had this because the Father showed Him all things which He did (Jn 5<sup>20</sup>); He had marvellous wisdom, but it was the Father's gift (7<sup>16-17</sup>): 'the word which ye hear is not mine, but the Father's that sent me' (14<sup>23</sup>); He wrought miracles, but of Himself He could do nothing (5<sup>20</sup>); 'the Father abiding in me doeth his works' (14<sup>10</sup>). 'God,' says St. Peter, 'anointed him with the Holy Spirit and with power,' and 'he went about doing good, and healing all that were under the tyranny of the devil; because God was with him' (Ac 10<sup>38</sup>). Had the Father at any moment refrained from His ministrations and left Him alone, Jesus would have been even as the rest of the children of men. And thus is revealed something of the mystery of the Dereliction. That He might be one with the children of men in their uttermost strait, the communion of God was withheld from His beloved Son, and He passed through the valley of the shadow of death alone, without that presence which had hitherto cheered and supported Him (cf. Jn 16<sup>28</sup>).

DESERT.—See WILDERNESS.

DESIRE.—Our nature corresponds to our external condition. Without this correspondence there would be no possibility of any such thing as human life and human happiness: which life and happiness are, therefore, a result from our nature and condition jointly: meaning by human life, not living in the literal sense, but the whole complex notion commonly understood by these words' (Butler's Analogy, pt. i. ch. 5, § 1). This is one of the observations of Bishop Butler in which he anticipates the conclusions of modern science. The nature of man corresponds to external nature; organ and environment, faculty and its sphere of operation are in correspondence. Man is in relation to the world in which he lives, and his whole life is a process of adaptation to the life of the Universe. All the endowments of his nature, whether intellectual, emotional, or volitional, whether they are bodily or mental, may fruitfully be looked at as teleological, as a means towards the great end of living. The teleological relation begins in the individual ere consciousness awakens in him, and he is so constituted that he acts in relation to the environment ere he can consciously adapt himself to it. Even consciousness may be looked at as part of a process of adaptation. Bishop Butler also remarks that 'the several external objects of the appetites, passions, and affections, being present to the senses, or offering themselves to the mind, excite emotions suitable to their nature' (l.c. ch. 4, § 1). In his view there is not only a general correspondence between man and his environment, but a special adaptation between the several aspects of nature and the particular characteristics of man. Appetites have their objects, and these objects excite emotions in man suitable to their nature. Passions and affections have also their objects and their suitable emotions. Every external object makes its own appeal, and the inward nature of man makes a response in correspondence with the appeal. Nor does the Bishop limit the meaning of the word 'object' to those things which appeal to man directly through his senses, and which are presented to him, as it were, ready made. That there are such objects it is not necessary to affirm. But the objects which appeal to man are not limited to those which nature presents to him. Within the range of his interests are included not only the world as it is presented to perception, but the world as it has been transformed by human reflexion, as it is filled with the achievement of the ages, and pervaded by the life, the imagination, and the reflexion of man. Objects are not merely what is presented to the senses, but what is presented to man as constituted by the experience of the race, by the education of the individual, by the results of art, science, poetry, philosophy, and theology,—in short, by all the wide interest with which man has invested the world of his experience. Appetites have their respective objects, though even the appetite of a rational being has something which transcends sense, and even into appetite may enter that element of infinity with which a rational being invests all his objects.

Coming more closely to the subject, we take a description of Desire from Professor Mackenzie: 'In the case of what is strictly called desire, there is not merely the consciousness of an object, with an accompanying feeling of pleasure and pain, but also a recognition of the object as a good, or as an element in a more or less clearly defined end' (Manual of Ethics<sup>3</sup>, p. 46). Three elements appear in this description. There is, first, the consciousness of an object; there is, second, the feeling of pleasure and of pain; and there is, third, the recognition of the object as a good, or as an element in a defined end. If all these elements are involved in Desire, then Desire can be experienced only by beings who live a reflective life. They must be conscious beings; they must have the consciousness of an object, and be able to associate that object with pleasure and pain; and they must be able to reflect on the object, and judge it to be a good, or an element in a defined end. It may be well to have a term the meaning of which is such as has been defined by Professor Mackenzie; but is Desire such a term? Is it so in the ordinary use of language, or is it so in the accepted use of psychological writers? What of those writers who define the good in terms of pleasure and of pain? If we were to accept the definition of the term Desire as it is set forth by Professor Mackenzie, we should be constrained to say that the presence of Desire always involves the action of reflective judgment, the presence of ideas or trains of ideas to consciousness, and a comparison of possible processes which might lead to the accomplishment of a wished-for end. As a consequence, we should be compelled to shut out from the region of Desire not only all the lower forms of life, but also all those people who do not live a reflective life. It seems, then, that the definition of Desire given by Professor Mackenzie is an ideal one. It describes Desire as it is felt by a fully developed, reflective consciousness, a consciousness in possession of trains of ideas, and of the world as built up of such mental attainments and experiences. Along the whole course of mental growth, from the first beginnings of conscious life up to the complete attainment of self-mastery, Desire may be considered to be present, and to afford a ground of action. As a definition of life must include all living things, so a definition of Desire must include every feeling which in common language can lay claim to be a desire. There is an element of desire in every case in which there is subjective selection, or rejection of one object and the preference of another. In the simplest mental experience, even in those in which the living being reacts against the environment, whether it means the avoidance of pain or the attainment of pleasure, there is the germ of desire. Movements that result in pleasure attract attention. Movements which procure the removal of pain, and become inseparably associated with that result, are elements in the making of a world, and that world grows into the world of Desire. It may be that reactions against the environment correspond to stages in the growth of mind, so that we might properly ascribe Desire to movements for the attainment of objects of which the organism is aware through the senses; but it is not necessary for us to enter into the discussion of that topic. As Dr. Ward says, 'Provided the cravings of appetite are felt, any signs of the presence of pleasurable objects prompt to movements for their enjoyment or appropriation. In these last cases we have action determined by perceptions. The cases in which the subject is incited to action by ideas as distinct from perceptions, require a more detailed consideration; such are the facts mainly covered by the term "desire"' (art. 'Psychology,' Encyc. Brit.<sup>9</sup> vol. xx. p. 73f.).

Without entering on the question as to whether action can be determined by perceptions, or the further question as to whether there can be perceptions apart from something like ideation, we are disposed to contend that where there is awareness of an object, and a movement towards the appropriation of it, there must be the rudiments of Desire. It is not necessary, however, to discuss the matter, for it is not to be questioned that by ideas, and trains of ideas, and ideas, as Dr. Ward points out, 'sufficiently self-sustaining to form trains that are not wholly shaped by the circumstances of the present—entirely new possibilities of action are opened up' (p. 74). Ideas and trains of ideas form elements in shaping a world of desire. It is not possible to mark off the area where these properly begin, any more than we can delimit the sphere of intellection, and say where it begins. But for our purpose it is sufficient that the presence of reflective thought does mark a terminus; on one side there is mental action of a simpler sort, and on the other side the fullness of a reflective life. But apparently there is desire on both sides.

Taking the definition of Professor Mackenzie as a goal and an ideal, we ask, In what ways have thinkers looked at Desire in the past, and what is the view they take of it in the present hour? To set this forth with fullness would be a great task. For Desire, the analysis of it, and the place assigned to it, mark off the schools of philosophy from each other, and, according as they view it, it gives the keynote to different systems of ethics. From the time of the beginnings of Greek thought down to the present time, the attempt to find a sufficient definition of Desire has ever been renewed, and at present the old controversy between Plato and the Sophists has its counterpart in the controversy between Green and his supporters on the one hand, and Sidgwick and the various supporters of Hedonism on the other. Both the theory of knowledge and the theory of conduct are involved in the discussion of the question.

One of the many debts which the world owes to Socrates is the introduction of the conception of a supreme end of life. That there is one end which all men seek, and that every action must be judged by reference to that end, brought unity into man's conception of human life. Up to the time of Socrates men had thought of conduct as obedience to certain practical rules, useful from the point of view of prudence. But Socrates showed that men's thoughts and actions must be guided by their desire for something which they regarded as desirable. Rules were simply the ways by which the desirable end could be obtained. Illustrations of this principle abound in the statements ascribed to Socrates. A religious man desires to win the approbation of the gods; a just man is persuaded that the practice of justice will bring satisfaction; a man seeks knowledge because it is a satisfaction to know. Thus, in all departments of life there is some desirable end, and the thought of a desirable end actually defines Desire as it appears to Socrates.

While a great advance was made when the thought of a supreme end of life dawned on the human mind, yet the question arose as to the nature of the end, and it received different answers. Is the end pleasure, or a pleasurable state of feeling? Is it the avoidance of pain, or is it indifference to, or superiority over, both pleasure and pain? Is pleasure—pain, or indifference to pleasure—pain, or any other description of the end of life something to be referred to and determined by the individual man, or must we bring the thought of common life to bear on the solution of the problem? If we refer to the individual man the power of deciding what is the end of life and what is desirable as a means to that end, are we to think of the end in terms of pleasure as it appears to the cultured man, a man who is familiar with ideas and trains of ideas, or are we to think of pleasure as it appears to the natural man? All these questions were keenly debated in the schools of Greece, and all of them have a bearing on the definition of Desire.

Nor is it easy to say what are the views of the great masters of Greek thought on the question of desire. It is perhaps comparatively easy to say what were the views of Aristippus or of Epicurus, but not so easy to say what were the views of Plato or of Aristotle. Still a brief description may be useful. We quote from Dr. Jowett, "Plato, speaking in the person of Socrates, passes into a more ideal point of view, and expressly repudiates the notion that the exchange of a less pleasure for a greater can be the exchange of virtue. Such virtue is the virtue of ordinary men who live in the world of appearance; they are temperate only that they may enjoy the pleasure of intemperance, and courageous from fear of danger. Whereas the philosopher is seeking after wisdom and not after pleasure, whether near or distant: he is the mystic, the initiated, who has learned to despise the body, and is yearning all his life long for a truth which will hereafter be revealed to him. In the Republic (ix. 582) the pleasures of knowledge are affirmed to be superior to other pleasures, because the philosopher so estimates them; and he alone has had experience of both kinds. In the Philebus, Plato, although he regards the enemies of pleasure with complacency, still further modifies the transcendentalism of the Phaedo. For he is compelled to confess, rather reluctantly, perhaps, that some pleasures, i.e. those which have no antecedent pains, 'claim a place in the scale of goods' (Jowett's Plato, vol. iv. p. 29 f.). Plato rejects the view that pleasure is necessarily preceded by pain. 'True pleasures are those which are given by beauty of colour and form, and most of those which arise from smells; those of sound, again, and in general those of which the want is painless and unconscious, and the gratification afforded by them palpable to sense and unalloyed with pain' (Philebus, 51 A, Jowett's tr.). He prepared the way for the fuller analysis of pleasure and desire which we owe to Aristotle, for he showed that pleasures which accompany the active discharge of function are pleasant in themselves; the pleasures which are truly desirable are the pleasures of the wise, all others are a shadow only (Rep. 583 B). Thus Plato rejects the earlier theories of movement and replenishment, distinguishes pleasures that are preceded by pain and want as pleasant only by contrast, and as it were by accident, from those pleasures which accompany active discharge of function; and he sets forth as the only true pleasure the pleasure of the good man. Pleasure, according to Plato, is always a process towards the normal condition of a subject, and is never in itself an end. The absence of finality from pleasure proves that pleasure taken by itself could never be the end of life. The treatment of pleasure and pain is conducted by Plato always from a moral point of view.

While Aristotle builds so far on the results of the analysis of Plato, yet he is dissatisfied with the argument that pleasure cannot be the summum bonum because it is a mere process towards an end. Pleasure, he contends, is an ἐπέγγρα; it arises from the unimpeded operation of our faculties; it arises when an organ which acts perfectly comes into contact with its appropriate object, just as pain is the outcome of thwarted action on the part of either a sensitive or an intellectual faculty (Eth. Nic. vii. 12, 1153. 13). The moral value of the feelings of pleasure and pain arises, says Aristotle, out of the fact that by means of them man passes from a state of a merely cognitive and intellectual being, and becomes a moral and active being. 'It is when the sense perceives something as pleasant or painful that the mind affirms or denies it, pursues or avoids it' (iii. 7. 2, 431. 8). Aristotle has ever before him the unity and wholeness of human nature. He is never merely intellectual, and is never wholly practical. He always lays stress on the correspondence between the speculative and the practical sides of human nature. Truth and error in the intellectual sphere become good and evil in the moral sphere. What the mind affirms as truth and error in the intellectual sphere becomes pursuit and avoidance in the practical sphere. In both spheres the mind is active. Impressions in the cognitive sphere become, through the activity of the subject, objects of cognition; feelings of pleasure and pain, through a similar activity of the subject, are translated into objects of desire or aversion; become motives to action.

Two main factors, according to Aristotle, enter into the conative nature of man. It is difficult within our limits to expound this fully. But, briefly, it is that Desire and Reason must co-operate in order that a moral conclusion may be carried into effect. Moral choice or προαιρεσις may be described as νοῦς ὁρμητικὸς, reason stimulated by desire, or βούλη δαιμονική, desire guided by understanding. The significant part of the view is that both the irrational and the rational elements must act together; desire and reason are constant elements in distinctive moral action. For the merely logical understanding never leads to action. Reason, as mere reasoning, is powerless to shape the will, and mere appetite is quite as powerless. In order to cause action, pleasure and pain must be translated into the higher forms of Good and Evil. Desire must always have an object (ὁρμητικὸν ἢ οὐκ ἔχει φαντασίας (433<sup>b</sup>. 28)); but the object of desire determines conduct only when thought has marked it out, defined it, and in a word constituted it (τὸ ὁρμητικὸν κινεῖ ὁ νοηθῆναι ἢ φαντασθῆναι (433<sup>b</sup>. 12)).

'The true object of consciousness in this union of desire and reason is not two objects,—one of desire, another of reason,—it is one single common force which finally becomes the principle of action. And when we ask how this object of our final wish is framed, the answer must be, that it is so through the agency of reason. Ultimately, and transcendently in fact, there is no difference between the object of thought and the object of wish; the βούλησις and the νοῦς are merely different aspects of one and the same great generality. Even in our own experience it is thought which determines desire; and the principle and starting-point of conduct turns out to be an exercise of reason. And when Aristotle proceeds to state more definitely what is this object of perfect wish which thus determines and regulates our natural desires, he becomes still more of an idealist. For while the object of wish to any individual is but the apparent and relative good, still to a perfect man it is the absolute ideal good; and the aim of life comes to be an attempt to make our practical views in life elevate themselves to the full height of the absolute ideal of goodness. . . . The same writer who reproduces Plato's idea of good as the constructive reason which gives both knowledge and reality to things, now finds the determining aim of conduct in an absolute ideal which constitutes the pattern to which morality must raise itself' (Aristotle's Psychology in Greek and English, with Introduction and Notes, by Edwin Wallace, M.A., Introduction, p. cxxiii f.).

We quote from Mr. Wallace, whose work represents the high-water mark of Aristotelian exposition, as it sets forth in brief space an interpretation of Aristotle which deserves study. It may be that Mr. Wallace has read Hegel into Aristotle, but in the present case he is right in saying that for Aristotle the world of desire is a rational world, and that the ground of conduct is the union of desire and reason. In short, the view of Aristotle corresponds to the definition of desire set forth by Professor Mackenzie. 'It is then,' says Aristotle, 'on good grounds that people have viewed as springs of action these two faculties of desire and practical intellect: for the faculty of desire has itself a motive force, and the intellect excites to action just in so far as the object of desire supplies it with a starting-point: just as, similarly, imagination when it moves to action does not do so independently of desire. The spring of action thus resolves itself into one single thing, viz. the object of desire' (Wallace's tr. p. 179).

As to the question whether animals can have desires, Aristotle decides that 'no animal can have the faculty of desire unless it have imaginative power' (Wallace, p. 183); but then, as imaginative power is connected with the reason or the senses, so animals may have the imaginative power connected with the senses, and thus have what can be designated desires. But they do not possess the kind of desire which forms itself as the conclusion of syllogism, so that their desire is destitute of any faculty of deliberation. 'In the case of men, however, sometimes the images of sense overcome and move the rational volition; sometimes, as in incontinence, two things overcome and stir up one another desire thus following on desire, much as a ball that players toss about; but the normal and natural course is always that in which the superior course of reason is the more supreme and stimulates to action' (pp. 184-185). Desire thus, according to Aristotle, implies deliberation, choice, the use of means towards an end. In a significant passage in the Nicomachean Ethics he says (we quote the paraphrase of Sir A. Grant): 'If the object of purpose is that which, being in our power, we desire after deliberation, purpose will be a desire of things in our power. After deliberating we decide, and form a desire in accordance with our deliberation' (Grant's Aristotle's Ethics, vol. ii. p. 23). Desire ranges, according to Aristotle, through all life. Wherever life is in presence of an object there is rudimentary desire. The animal world feels it in presence of an object present to its senses. A self-conscious being feels desire in proportion to its realization of self, and to its realization of the objects as existing in an ordered world. It is possible to regard the teaching of Aristotle as containing in itself the fuller analysis of desire as that analysis has been conducted by English Hedonists and by the English Neo-Hegelians.

Were there space, it would be instructive to trace the analysis of desire, or rather the description of desire, in subsequent philosophical speculation. But that would far exceed our limits. Nor is it necessary, for there is not much to be added to the result won by Aristotle until we come to the Utilitarian school of England. Some valuable remarks occur in Spinoza's Ethics, but the current of modern speculation on the topic was set agoing by Hobbes. For the history of the process, readers may be referred to Professor Watson's (Kingston, Canada) Hedonistic Theories, and to Dr. Albee's (Cornell University) A History of English Utilitarianism. In addition to the account of the main ethical theory known as Utilitarianism, and a criticism of it, there will be found in these able books a particular account of that doctrine we have immediately in hand. In the posthumous work of Professor Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, there is a lengthened and incisive analysis of Desire; and in the posthumous work of Professor Sidgwick, The Ethics of T. H. Green, Herbert Spencer, and J. Martineau, as also in the various editions of the Methods of Ethics, we find a criticism of Green. These two works represent the most recent, as they also represent the most searching, accounts of Desire which can be found in the whole range of philosophical speculation.

In the analysis of Desire, as in the analysis of Knowledge, the work of Locke was epoch-making. He stated the problem in a form which occupied the thoughts of all his successors in England. Berkeley, Hume, Hartley, Tucker, Stuart Mill, and Spencer are in the succession, and all of them attack the problem of the will from the point of view of pleasure and desire. We take the statement of Locke's position from the admirable work of Professor Watson, Hedonistic Theories (p. 111 f.):

'Why does the same man will differently on different occasions? The reason is to be sought in the character of Desire as the imagination of pleasure. To different persons, or to the same person under different circumstances, one pleasure presents itself in his imagination as preferable to another. Under the impulse for knowledge one man will forget his bodily wants until hunger drives him to his meals; another man will neglect study, and live for the pleasures of sense, unless he is driven to change his course by the stronger impulse of shame. But as each man's desire is determined not by him but for him, and the desire determines the will, what he prefers in any case is that which alone he can prefer, and freedom is a word without meaning.'

This, then, is the problem which the majority of English ethical thinkers had before them. A man's desires are determined for him not by him, and the desire determines the will. Nor is much added to the solution of the problem from the time of Locke to that of Stuart Mill. Hume had tried to prove the utilitarian doctrine of the particular virtues, and Stuart Mill, using the same argument, sought to prove the general principle of Utility.

'The sole evidence, I apprehend, it is possible to produce that anything is desirable, is that people do actually desire it. If the end which the utilitarian doctrine proposes to itself were not, in theory and in practice, acknowledged to be an end, nothing could ever convince any person that it was so. No reason can be given why the general happiness is desirable, except that each person, so far as he believes it to be attainable, desires his own happiness' (Utilitarianism, ch. iv.). Farther on in the same chapter he identifies pleasure and desire. 'Desiring a thing and finding it pleasant, aversion to it and finding it painful, are phenomena entirely inseparable, or rather two parts of the same phenomena.' Thus Mill would find it necessary to show that people never do desire anything save pleasure or happiness. On this Sidgwick remarks: 'As a matter of fact, it appears to me that throughout the whole scale of my impulses, sensual, emotional, and intellectual alike, I can distinguish desires the object of which is something other than my own pleasure' (Methods of Ethics, p. 45).

In truth, the Hedonistic account of Desire, from Locke to Mill, and including Sidgwick in some measure, is inadequate, because it is too exclusively psychological. Psychology, as it is usually conceived, cannot give a full account of Desire. For psychology deliberately limits itself to a description of mental processes, events, and occurrences, taken in abstraction from the self whose mental states are, and from the outer world. An analysis of mental states can never give a complete account of the system to which the self belongs, and of the interests and values which are such because they are referred to the self. Thus the psychological account of Desire, and its relation to will, set forth by English Hedonism, is defective, not psychologically, but in reality. It is the merit of Green, and specially of those who with him have so fruitfully worked at ethical problems under the inspiration of Kant and Hegel, to point out that mental and moral values cannot be appraised, and cannot be the objects of desire, if we look at them in abstraction from the self, and from the world-system. In the Prolegomena to Ethics and in the Introduction to Hume, Green has brought the self in its concrete reality within the vision of English thinkers. He has been ably helped by such writers as Professor Muirhead in his manual The Elements of Ethics, by Professor Watson in Hedonistic Theories, and Professor Mackenzie in the Manual of Ethics. Other writers mentioned, but these will suffice to show the significance of the new departure in Ethics, and of the introduction of the self into English philosophy. Desire, according to Green, involves consciousness of self and of an object, and is to be distinguished from instinctive impulse, which implies only the feeling of self. A consciousness of self is something beyond self-feeling, is really a transformation of self-feeling. Self-consciousness being also a consciousness of objects, is thus the basis of desire and of knowledge. Even in the desire for food, what is desired is really some ulterior object, not the mere pleasure of eating. But most of our desires are for objects which are not directly dependent on animal susceptibility at all, or which, even where so dependent, are transformed by the addition of new elements derived from self-consciousness itself. There is a real unity in all our desires, only it is the unity of the self, not the unity of desire.

'There is one subject or spirit, which desires in all a man's experiences of desire, understands in all operations of his intelligence, wills in all his acts of willing; and the essential character of his desires depends on their all being desires of one and the same subject which also understands, the essential character of his intelligence on its being an activity of one and the same subject which also desires, the essential character of his acts of will on their proceeding from one and the same subject which also desires and understands' (Prolegomena to Ethics, p. 138).

It is well to have an emphatic statement of the unity of the thinking, willing, feeling subject placed on record; for up to Green's advent we were allowed to see thinking, willing, feeling, but the self was altogether out of sight. At the same time, while Green lays stress on the unity of the self in all its activities, and rightly so, there seems to be a defect in his analysis. He seems to take for granted that the self-conscious self, in its conscious apprehension of objects as desirable, will always act wisely, prudently, and rightly. But does not the self-conscious being, in making a choice, sometimes choose unwisely and wrongly? As Sidgwick points out, 'It seems to me to be fundamentally important to distinguish between choice (even deliberate choice) and judgment as to choice-worthiness, since they may diverge' (The Ethics of T. H. Green, etc. p. 30). Are we to hold that a man, following out what he thinks self-interest, clearly seeing the end in view and choosing appropriate means for its accomplishment, if he acts self-consciously, is always acting rightly? For Green in his description of the self-conscious subject does not seem to contemplate the possibility of wrong or vicious action. He takes for granted that the process of the self-conscious being on his way towards the appropriate action, towards the satisfaction he will feel when the object is attained, will always be right. But may there not be all the characteristics of the action of the self-conscious being, as these are described by Green, present in the course of conduct of a man who wades through slaughter to a throne? In truth, there is needed a further analysis, leading us beyond the mere processes of a self-conscious being, in order to find a justification for man's action. We need a better description of the desirable than any that can be found in Green. All that he sets forth with regard to Desire and the self-conscious subject and its action may be true, and truly realized in the case of the man who has an unworthy end in view. He may identify himself with his object, he may find satisfaction in the attainment of it, and yet the choice may not be worthy.

It is the experience of mankind that a man may make an unworthy choice, may form a wrong ideal, may be mistaken, and yet may all the time act as a self-conscious being. So a further criterion is needed in order to guide men in their choice, in order that it may be a worthy choice. True, the values of life lie in their relation to the self. And the realization of the self is one of the great ends of life. But the self has to grow in relation to the ideal, and the ideal has to grow as well. How shall a man learn to recognize the true ideal, and to desire it? Here we ought to enter into the religious experience of man to realize the fact that man has formed wrong conceptions of life, has worshipped false ideals, and desired unworthy ends. One might pass into the sphere of that religious experience which has had its highest expression in the Scriptures. There, too, we are in a universe of desires, and the task of Scripture is to teach man what to desire. Scripture recognizes the possibility of wrong desire leading to wrong action, and it also recognizes that towards the making of desire all the faculties of man contribute. What it teaches is largely the reversal of human ideals: it puts last what men have put first, and it places in the front place, as the best and mightiest, what men have despised and forgotten. The self-conscious being has to be taught something which it would never have learnt through the mere exercise of self-conscious activity. It is not necessary to enter into an analysis of Scripture terms, or to trace the history of the term 'desire' through the Scriptures. For Scripture proceeds on the fact that men have had wrong desires, false ideals, and have pursued wrong objects; so it proceeds to teach them what is the really good, the true ideal; and, further, to give to men the power to recognize the good, the true, and the beautiful, and to desire them. We need this education, and the world of desire cannot be really described until we bring in the revolutionary power of religion, and learn to know that reversal of human judgments inaugurated by Christ.

Here, too, the strongest influence in this education is the commanding power of personality. It is not without significance that in the last resort Plato and Aristotle were driven back to the concrete standard of the 'good man.' Through the influence of personality men learn to recognize ideals and to love them. Around personalities cluster the thoughts, emotions, aspirations, tendencies which help to form the world of desire. It is so in the OT, where it is said of their devotion to the living God of Israel: 'Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee' (Ps 73<sup>9</sup>); or, 'To thy name and to thy memorial is the desire of our soul' (Is 26<sup>9</sup>). It is recognized that there is a world of wrong desires, objects which the self-conscious man may desire, long for, strive after; and the story of the Bible is the attempt to implant in these self-conscious beings the power to free themselves from that world of false desire. In the NT the first step towards that freedom is to bring men into contact with a living personality, in whom is sphered all perfection, whose service is perfect freedom, and through whom they may learn what to desire and what to long for, and what to attain. The laws of desire, as these are in human nature, and as they are disclosed to us through research and reflexion, rule in this sphere; but then they have new material to illustrate their working.

Illustrations of the working of Desire abound in religious experience. To enter into them would occupy us too long. It need only be said that attachment to a pure and holy Personality, love to One who is the ideal of human life, purifies the world of desire and intensifies the power of action. Men who have felt the expulsive power of a new affection and the intensive power of a holy love are lifted into a new world, and those who love Christ learn that the world of their desires is formed by Him; they learn to love what He approves, and to hate what He hates. The world in which they live, the universe in which their desires terminate, are constituted by the Person and by the Love of Christ. See art. IDEAL.

Use of the term 'desire' in the Gospels.—In AV of the Gospels the word 'desire' is of frequent occurrence. As a noun it is found only once (Lk 22<sup>19</sup>), as the equivalent of ἐπιθυμία, but in the verbal form it represents no fewer than 8 verbs in the original—ἐπιθυμῶ (Mt 13<sup>17</sup>, Lk 16<sup>17</sup>, 17<sup>22</sup>), θέλω (Mk 6<sup>52</sup>, Lk 5<sup>28</sup>, 10<sup>24</sup>, 10<sup>26</sup>), αἰτέω (Mt 20<sup>27</sup>, Mk 13<sup>11</sup>, 14<sup>18</sup>, Lk 23<sup>22</sup>), ἔπειρω (Lk 22<sup>21</sup>), ἑρωτάω (Lk 7<sup>28</sup>, 14<sup>21</sup>, Jn 12<sup>21</sup>), ἐρωτάω (Mt 16<sup>1</sup>), ζητέω (Mt 12<sup>46</sup>, 47, Lk 9<sup>9</sup>), παρακαλέω (Mt 18<sup>23</sup>). Twice we have the adj. 'desirous' (Lk 23<sup>8</sup>, Jn 16<sup>19</sup>), but in both cases the vb. θέλω is used in the Greek. In RV, however, αἰτέω, ἔπειρω, ἑρωτάω (except in Lk 7<sup>28</sup>), and ἐρωτάω are rendered by 'ask', ζητέω by 'seek', and παρακαλέω by 'beseech'; so that ἐπιθυμῶ and θέλω are left as the two verbs which in a more exact use of language have the meaning of 'desire.' When we distinguish between them, ἐπιθυμῶ may be regarded as denoting the desire of the feelings (θυμῶς), θέλω the desire of the will. In the latter the element of purpose and resolve is usually more strongly present (cf. Jn 8<sup>44</sup> αἰτέουσαι τοὺς σαρδῶν ἡγεῖρας πνεύσιν). Sometimes, however, θέλω is used where a distinction from ἐπιθυμῶ can hardly be pressed (see the parallel passages Mt 13<sup>17</sup>, Lk 10<sup>24</sup>).

In the language of Christ and the Gospels, desire in itself is, properly speaking, neither good nor bad, its quality depending altogether upon the subject who experiences it or the object to which it is directed. The scribes 'desire' to walk in long robes (Lk 20<sup>4</sup>); while many prophets and righteous men have 'desired' to see Christ's day (Mt 13<sup>17</sup> || Lk 10<sup>24</sup>). The Prodigal 'desired' (ἐπιθυμῶν, EV 'would fain') to fill his belly with the husks that fed the swine (Lk 15<sup>16</sup>); and Jesus said, 'With desire I have desired (ἐπιθυμία ἐπιθυμῶν) to eat this pass-over with you before I suffer' (Lk 22<sup>15</sup>). But owing to the corruption of the human heart, 'desire' tends to have a predominantly bad meaning, and so ἐπιθυμία comes to denote the sinful 'lusting' of a sinful will. In Mk 4<sup>19</sup> ('the lusts of other things') the word is already passing over to this fixity of a dark connotation; the 'other things' may not be evil in themselves, but as they are allowed to choke the word and render it unfruitful, they have to be classed as 'thorns.' In Mt 5<sup>28</sup> ἐπιθυμῆσαι expresses 'lust' in the specific sense in which it has come to be used in modern speech, as unholo sexual desire. In Jn 8<sup>44</sup> ἐπιθυμῶν denotes the very 'lusts' of the devil as they are seen reappearing in his children.

According to the teaching of Jesus, impure desire, apart altogether from overt acts of sin, is itself a transgression of the Divine law (Mt 5<sup>28</sup>). This is the point at which Christ's ethical teaching so immeasurably transcends that of all other masters, and specifically the 'righteousness' of the scribes and Pharisees of His day. He taught that goodness and badness essentially lie not in the outward conduct but in the will and the heart, and that it is by the evil thoughts and feelings which issue from within that a man is defiled (Mt 15<sup>18</sup>). It is this same teaching with regard to ἐπιθυμία, now used definitely in the sense of 'lust' or sinful desire, that we meet again in characteristic forms in the writings of St. Paul and St. James. St. James (1<sup>14</sup>) in his powerful figure shows how a man, seduced by his own ἐπιθυμία, begets the sin which issues finally in death. St. Paul (Ro. 7<sup>5</sup>) tells how the commandment οὐκ ἐπιθυμῶσιν stirred up in his heart πάσας ἐπιθυμίας, and forced him at length to understand that nothing but the law of the Spirit of life could set him free.

DESOLATION.—The history of Israel had given to this word in the time of Christ a peculiar and sinister significance. To nearly all the prophets the idea of a wasted and depopulated land, such as is given in the graphic description of Is 1<sup>1</sup>, is familiar. When Jeremiah and Ezekiel, who most frequently use the words, mention נָחַשׁ or נָשַׁח, they always have one thing in their mind—the vision of a once peaceful and flourishing place which by fire and sword has been laid waste, and is left uninhabited. Few countries have suffered so much as Palestine from the havoc wrought by civil war and foreign invasion. To understand the full force of the term 'desolation,' we have to add to the features of war, as known to us, something which was then the frequent accompaniment of conquest—the carrying away of a whole population captive. And to the bitter memory of bygone devastation we have to add the apprehension of what might at any time happen if the country were swept by the Romans, of whose methods their own historian wrote, 'they make a solitude and call it peace' (Tac. Agricola, 30). The word 'desolation,' then, understood in the sense in which it was used when the AV was made ('I desolate—I make a country uninhabited,' Palsgrave, A. D. 1530), gives the exact sense of both the Hebrew and the Greek (ἐρημωσις). It is in this sense that the word is used in the passage where Jesus pronounces doom upon Jerusalem (Mt 23<sup>38</sup>, Lk 13<sup>32</sup>). The words, 'Your house is left unto you desolate,' are a reminiscence of Jer 22<sup>7</sup> (LXX—ἐἰς ἐρημωσῶν ἔσται ὁ οἶκος οὖτος), and it makes little difference whether ἐρημωσις stand in the text or not; the general idea is that the house (i.e. the city, not the temple) is 'abandoned.' There is not necessarily in this passage any prediction of the fall of Jerusalem, though the context may seem to suggest this. The idea is rather that, the glory of Jerusalem consisting in her being the city of the great King, she loses all when He abandons her. If she rejects Him, and He departs, she is a forsaken city (cf. the passage in Bunyan's Holy War where Emmanuel leaves Mansoul; also Jos. B. J. VI. v. 3). Grimm-Thayer interprets 'desolate' here as 'bereft of Christ's presence, instruction, and aid.' Contrast with this the promise to the disciples in Jn 14<sup>18</sup>, which the AV renders, 'I will not leave you desolate' (ἀφῆρατός).

In another passage (Mt 12<sup>25</sup>, Lk 11<sup>17</sup>), 'Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation,' Jesus uses as a forcible illustration that fatal tendency to faction and internal discord which had so often brought His countrymen to ruin (cf. e.g. Jos. Ant. XIV. iv. 2). See also art. ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION.

J. ROSS MURRAY.
DESPISE.—1. ἀφαιρεῖν.—(1) The primary signification of the word is to render or consider invalid (ἀπορῶ), to set aside something laid down (ἀπορῶ τῷ), to bear oneself toward a thing as if it were not, to ignore: Mk 7<sup>9</sup> ἀπορῶ τ. θεοῦ (AV and RV 'reject'), to set aside the command of God, replacing it by tradition, and thus to deprive it of its force, by teaching and practice (cf. Is 24<sup>3</sup>, Jude 4). Hence (2) to thwart the efficacy of anything: Lk 7<sup>28</sup> τ. βουλήν τ. θεοῦ (AV and RV 'reject'), to set at naught as superfluous and invalid (cf. Gal 2<sup>21</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>, He 10<sup>29</sup>). Hence (3) of persons, to ignore, bear oneself towards them as if they were not, or as if they need not be regarded or honoured: Mk 6<sup>22</sup> ἀπορῶ (AV and RV 'reject'), break faith with, and then disappoint (Field, Old. Nov., in loc.; cf. Ps 14(15)<sup>7</sup>, Lk 10<sup>13</sup> (RV 'reject'), to ignore, to treat with contempt as deserving no recognition (cf. 1 Th 4<sup>8</sup>). To ignore the messenger is to ignore the Son whose message he bears, and this is to ignore the Father who has sent the Son (Jn 12<sup>24</sup>, AV and RV 'reject'). To ignore Christ and refuse His word is not to escape responsibility, or to disprove His claims. Denial is not disproof. 'The word cannot be banished. It still clings to the hearer as his judge. Spiritual judgment is a consequence involved in the rejection of the revelation; it is self-fulfilled: it cannot but be carried out.' Though rejected now, 'the word of Christ must justify itself' (Westcott); cf. Is 33<sup>1</sup>.

2. ἐξουθεῖν (-δειν, -δεινόν [see WH, App. p. 106]), to hold or treat as of no account, despise utterly, set at naught: Lk 18<sup>7</sup> (RV 'set at naught'). The Pharisees 'invented the most high-flown designations for each other, such as "Light of Israel," "Glory of the Law," etc., but they described the vast mass of their fellow-countrymen as "accursed" for not knowing the Law (Jn 7<sup>48</sup>), and spoke of them as empty cisterns' (Farrar, in loc., cf. Ro 14<sup>10</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>, Gal 4<sup>10</sup> etc., Fr 7). The same word tr. by both AV and RV 'set at naught,' is used of the contempt and mockery with which Jesus was treated by the rulers (Mk 6<sup>23</sup> ἡ ἐξουθενήσῃ; Lk 23<sup>11</sup> ἐξουθ. αὐτῶν ὁ ἱερῶν), where the special significance of the word is that He was treated not even as a criminal, deserving examination of his case and righteous judgment, but as a mere cynic, to be utterly despised; cf. Ac 4<sup>11</sup>, Ps 21(22)<sup>6</sup>, Is 53<sup>9</sup> [Symm.], Ezk 22<sup>2</sup>.

3. καταφρονεῖν, to look down upon from a position of superiority, whether assumed or real, to think lightly of, to neglect, to disdain, with more or less actively hostile design (cf. Herod. i. 5. 96, viii. 10). Mt 6<sup>22</sup> || Lk 16<sup>12</sup>: two masters, with opposing interests, cannot be served by the same person, the esteem in which they are held will vary according to the reward offered; one will be actively honoured and diligently served, the other will be thought lightly of and his interests will be neglected. Mt 18<sup>10</sup>: αἱ ποταῖοι are not to be held in disdain. (1) They are under the special care of God. Adopting the current Jewish doctrine of angels as guardian spirits, our Lord tells His hearers that children have friends in the court of heaven, in close nearness to the King Himself, whose 'Face' they always see; there they are not thought lightly of, here they must not be despised. (2) Accepting the order of the verses, there is a close connexion between 'despising' and 'offending.' No hostile action must be taken towards them, even unconsciously, no carelessness as to conduct or example which might hurt them; 'hindrances' to the life of young disciples, 'despised' because of their weakness, are sins against His love to them. (3) If the connexion with vv.<sup>14</sup> is original, the young are not to be 'despised,' because the childlike disposition is the true way to eternal life; the humility which is essential for entering into the Kingdom of heaven has its symbol in the consciousness of weakness and imperfection that belongs to children, who are therefore not to be 'despised' but 'received' (cf. Fr 13<sup>2</sup>, Gn 27<sup>13</sup>).

The active hostility implied in the word is seen in Ro 24 τ. μακροθυμίας παρανομίας: God's long-suffering not only treated with contempt, but also opposed by being sinned against (cf. 1 Th 4<sup>9</sup>). In its 12<sup>2</sup> αἰσχροῦ μακάριον, the simply passive sense is given—enduring with the resignation that arises from the disdain of real superiority. 'What men count shame was seen by Christ in another light. From His position, raised infinitely above them, He could disregard their judgment' (Westcott, in loc.).

ἀφρονεῖν and ἐξουθεῖν are not used by classical writers. καταφρονεῖν is in constant use from Herodotus onwards.

R. MACPHERSON.

DESPONDENCY.—Despondency fills so frequent and serious a place in human life that we could hardly have felt that our Lord was 'tempted in all points like as we are' (He 4<sup>15</sup>), if He had not experienced it. But the profound depression in the garden of Gethsemane, even if it were alone, and the memorable word, 'My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death' (Mt 26<sup>38</sup> || Mk 14<sup>34</sup>), testify that He had such experience. What was the cause of this depression in Gethsemane? Was it due to bodily exhaustion, the body affecting the mind and making it more sensitive to sad surroundings? Was it due to the mental strain of publicity and opposition, or to loneliness and the pain of failure? ('He came unto his own, and his own received him not,' Jn 1<sup>11</sup>). All these were elements in the despondency of Elijah when he sat under the juniper tree, and requested for himself that he might die (1 K 19<sup>4</sup>). And we may not say that such influences were wholly without effect on our Lord; but in His case, as we learn from His own words, the great cause of despondency was the pressure on His spirit of what He saw near before Him, His cross—that death in which He was (in St. Peter's language) to bear our sins in His own body (1 P 2<sup>24</sup>), or (in St. Paul's) to be made sin for us (2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>), and in which He was to endure that sense of separation from God which was so new to the experience of the well-beloved Son. But why was the depression so great now in Gethsemane when He had looked forward to this from the beginning of His ministry, saying in an early stage of it, 'The Son of man must be lifted up' (Jn 3<sup>14</sup>)? Part of the answer to this question must be that our Lord's mind, being truly human, was liable to those often mysterious alternations of feeling which, in common men, we call changes of mood. As He drew nearer the accomplishment of the great work of atonement, we find Him sometimes hastening eagerly towards it, full of great purpose, even of joy, and at other times foreseeing the darkness of the experience and shrinking from it. At one of the stages of His approach to that event, and of His own inward acceptance of it, namely after the dismissal of Judas, this joyful anticipation was expressed by Him in language even of exultation—'Now is the Son of man glorified, and God is glorified in him' (Jn 13<sup>31</sup>). At another stage He speaks in quite a different manner, 'Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour' (Jn 12<sup>27</sup>).

Dr. Maclaren has finely illustrated this alternation of feeling. 'Like some great pillar elevated on a mountain, when the thunder-clouds fill the sky, it stands out grim and dark; and then, in a moment, the strong wind sweeps these away, and the sunlight smites it, and it shines out white and lustrous. With such swift alternations . . . to Jesus Christ the Cross was dark and the Cross was radiant' (Last Shores, 27).

The Gethsemane experience was perhaps that in which our Lord felt most profoundly the dark and heavy pressure of the anticipation of the Cross. How dark and heavy that was appears in the 'sweat as it were great drops of blood falling down upon the ground' (Lk 22<sup>44</sup>), in the 'strong crying and tears' (He 5<sup>7</sup>), and perhaps as much in these words of His prayer, 'if it be possible'—in His seeking a possibility of the cup passing from Him, although

DESTRUCTION

He had said long before, 'The Son of man must be lifted up' (Jn 3<sup>14</sup>), and was to say soon after, 'For this cause came I unto this hour' (12<sup>27</sup>). See, further, art. AGONY. J. ROBERTSON.

DESTRUCTION.—The AV and RV tr. of ἀπόλεσις in Mt 7<sup>13</sup>. In Mt 28<sup>28</sup> and in the parallel passage in Mk 14<sup>4</sup> ἀπόλεσις is translated 'waste' in both Versions, and in Jn 17<sup>13</sup>, the only other instance where the word is used in the Gospels, both render it 'perdition.' In Mt 7<sup>13</sup> our Lord speaks of 'destruction' as the opposite of life eternal. In profane authors ἀπόλεσις invariably means, as its derivation from ἀπώλλω implies, extinction, annihilation; and this fact has been largely used by the advocates of the Conditional Immortality theory in support of their contention. Still the 'destruction' spoken of by our Lord in Mt 7<sup>13</sup> has been held by expositors with practical unanimity from the first to mean a continued life, whether endless or not, of misery after death. All the same, it has been admitted generally, e.g. by Cremer, that eternal misery as a meaning of ἀπόλεσις 'is a signification peculiar to the NT, and without analogy in classical Greek.' There appears, on the whole, to be general agreement that whether 'destruction' means a terminable or interminable life of misery after death, it does, at any rate, mean a prolongation of existence: it is exclusion from salvation, whether final or not. Whether or not there is a term to the duration of misery hereafter—presuming that there is a continuance of life after death for those who go in the way of destruction—does not enter into the scope of this note (see ETERNAL PUNISHMENT), but it may be remarked as significant that the 'lost sheep' are spoken of by our Lord as being found again, and that the word for 'lost' is the participle of ἀπώλλωμι. This is one of the considerations that have made many feel warranted in holding 'the larger hope' even for those who go meanwhile in 'the way that leadeth to destruction.'

DEVIL.—See DEMON and SATAN.

DEVOTION.—The word does not occur in the Gospels, but the idea is present everywhere, as marking the attitude of the man Jesus towards God, and thus providing a standard for imitation by every other man. Intrinsicly the word denotes the act of presenting solemnly some gift or service to a deity, or to any one invested in thought for a time with some of the qualities or claims of a deity; but its use has been extended to cover alike such service itself, and even the psychological condition from which the act springs. As such, a correct analysis must find blended in devotion each of the three elements—thought, emotion, and volition—which are the mutually dependent fragments of the unit of personality, expressing itself as a whole in the exercises often called devotions. The intellectual element is a recognition of the dignity and patient grace of God, the sensitive a feeling of gratitude and desire to please, the volitional a strong resolve to carry out that desire; and these three pass together quickly into appropriate action, the whole man in the harmony of all his powers indicating by praise or service the depth of his loving regard.

In some definitions, too much prominence is given to the will, and devotion is confused with religion generally; as in Aquinas, Summa, II. 2. lxxvii. 1: 'Devoitio nihil aliud esse videtur, quam voluntas quaedam prompte tradendi se ad ea, que pertinent ad Dei famulatum.' In certain phrases the word is used as a synonym for worship, or even for a form of worship, as when devotion to the Sacred Heart is spoken of; and in others, as 'fests of devotion,' it acquires an entirely technical sense, implying the absence of express obligation, with an appeal only to the discretion and good feeling of the worshipper. But in the better use internal devotion is contrasted with external worship (Atterbury, Sermons, iv. 213), and may be resolved into four principal constituents. The self-conscious determination of the will towards God is followed by the actual exaltation of the soul to God and its suffusion with the reverent sense of His nearness and mercy. This is exhibited in various loving acts and exercises, such as prayer and praise. And the whole is effected in the heart under the influence of the Holy Spirit.

1. In the case of Christ each of these phases of devotion is represented in the Gospels. (a) Though but a mere lad, He indicates already a habitual Godward set of His will (Lk 2<sup>29</sup>, He 10<sup>7</sup>); and afterwards He speaks of His purpose, sometimes with quiet assurance (Jn 5<sup>30</sup>, 7<sup>7</sup>), sometimes with a certain glow of satisfaction (4<sup>34</sup>, 17<sup>4</sup>). Hindrances and sore temptations, in which the play of a natural and useful instinct may be traced, did not divert Him (Lk 9<sup>21</sup>, 22<sup>29</sup>). Glad, complete conformity with the will of God, such as is an integral of every right conception of heaven, is set forth as on earth the aim of every disciple (Mt 6<sup>10</sup>), reached at once and maintained without defect, though not without effort (cf. Harnack, What is Christianity? 129 f.), by Him alone who could say, 'I and the Father are one' (Jn 10<sup>30</sup>).

(b) Instances of the exaltation of His soul in the calm sense of security because of the accord of His will with that of the Father, occur in the impression His fearlessness made at the cleansing of the Temple (2<sup>14</sup>), in His endowment with 'honour and glory' at the Transfiguration (2 P 1<sup>17</sup>)—in the strengthening ministry of angels after the Temptation (Mt 4<sup>11</sup>), and the Agony (Lk 22<sup>28</sup> RVm). The joy of Mt 11<sup>28</sup> and Lk 10<sup>21</sup> is another instance, as is also the outburst of triumphant relief at the retirement of Judas (Jn 13<sup>37</sup>). Nor should His perfect repose in the midst of peril (Mk 4<sup>39</sup>), and in the presence of angry or eager mobs (Lk 4<sup>28</sup>, Jn 8<sup>29</sup>, 10<sup>34</sup>, 6<sup>14</sup>), be overlooked. Partial and auxiliary explanations may be found in the exhaustion of fatigue or the mastery of His nerves; but the real cause was moral and not physical, and should be sought in the self-consciousness of Jesus, in the stable correlation of His will and God's. The two streams of volition, human and Divine, met and merged in Him; and thus He becomes for men at once an example of perfect devotion and a pledge of perfect grace.

(c) The exercises appropriate to devotion, which, however, so far from confining itself to them, enriches the entire nature and affects every relation of life, are praise and prayer (see sep. art.), with the addition of meditation, and occasionally of fasting or some form of self-discipline. The prayer and praise are not exactly such as accompany public worship, but assume rather the character of communion or reverent conversation, the element of specific supplication being often, not always, absent. In the case of Christ the praise is illustrated in such passages as Lk 10<sup>21</sup>, the practice of meditation and prayer in the lonely night-watches and the desert in Mk 6<sup>46</sup>, Lk 5<sup>16</sup>, whilst the supplication becomes more specific in Lk 6<sup>12</sup> in Gethsemane, and perhaps also on the Mount of Transfiguration. Of actual fasting by Jesus as a definite process of devotion, there is no certain case in the Gospels; but there is no reason to suppose that He did not follow the usage of His country on the Day of Atonement. Fasting, too, is associated with the Temptation (Mt 4<sup>2</sup>), of which one lesson is that a pure conscience and an ideal conformity with God can be attained or retained only by self-discipline and hard steadfastness under testing. And even in the Sermon on the Mount the practice is guarded from abuse, and implicitly commended in Mt 6<sup>16</sup>; and the supposition is warranted that our Lord was prepared to exemplify in His own person whatever He recommended to His disciples. His life, as well as His teaching, shows that fasting in itself has no devotional or any other religious value, but is serviceable only when and in so far as it promotes the closeness of communion with God. See FASTING.

(c) The plenary presence of the Holy Spirit with Christ is an implication of the NT, which, however, is comparatively reticent as to the Spirit's influence in the interval from the Temptation to the eve of the Passion. The action of the Spirit at the Temptation is referred to by all the Synoptists (Mt 4<sup>1</sup>, Mk 1<sup>12</sup>, Lk 4<sup>1</sup>), and His aid must be regarded as part of the explanation of Christ's sinlessness on this and all subsequent occasions. Not only were His miracles wrought in the power of the Spirit (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>, Lk 4<sup>14-18</sup>), but His oneness with the Spirit made His life uninterrupted devotion, and 'through the eternal Spirit' He 'offered himself without blemish unto God' (He 9<sup>14</sup>). The rapture of His soul is attributed to the influence of the Spirit in Lk 10<sup>21</sup>, though this particular is omitted in the corresponding narrative of Mt 11<sup>25</sup>. And the devotion of Christ is an example for man, not only because it exhibits human triumph over temptation and human fellowship with God, but also because of the similarity of the means and aids. His complete union is the promise and measure of the anointing available to every one.

2. In the case of man, devotion appears in the Gospels as an act or state of the entire personality, with all its powers harmoniously and intensely engaged. Prominence is given to the same elements as are traceable in the devotion of Christ Himself, whilst ample safeguards against error and fanaticism are provided. The great rule of Dt 6<sup>5</sup> is adopted by Christ, and applied in each of the Synoptics (Mt 22<sup>37</sup>, Mk 12<sup>29</sup>, Lk 10<sup>27</sup>) with little variations of phrase that add to the uncompromising vigour. In the Sermon on the Mount the exclusiveness of devotion, as admitting no rival claim and absorbing supreme affection, is recognized in Mt 6<sup>21-24</sup>; so in another connexion in Lk 16<sup>21</sup>. And in the closing discourses Christ puts Himself forward as actually and solely central to the life of His disciples (Jn 14), the source of all their strength, the right object of their trust and love (15<sup>5-11</sup>, 16<sup>26</sup>), with the recurring refrain, emphasized by its modifications, 'Abide in me' (15<sup>4-5</sup> et al.). Fruitfulness in the graces of personal character, and then secondarily in obedience and service, results from the deliberate regarding of Christ as 'all in all,' as so filling up the sphere of thought and desire as to control everything else therein. The last clause in Jn 15<sup>5</sup> means by implication that possibilities to the disciple are proportionate to the closeness of his devout union with his Lord; and that union may, and should, reach a stage of completeness, in which the indwelling Christ becomes the unquestioned ruler of all within the heart, and the whole life in the flesh is lived 'in faith, the faith which is in the Son of God' (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>). It is the crown of Christian devotion, not the joint sovereignty of Christ and the ego, but the loving and eager retirement of the ego that Christ may be substituted, appropriating its functions and reigning in its stead. Thus Christ Himself teaches in one of the most sacred parts of Scripture: 'I in them' (Jn 17<sup>21-23</sup>) is the final and fullest blessing and privilege conceivable in that hour of vision for those whom He loved 'to the uttermost' (13<sup>1</sup> RVm).

(a) Specifically, as might be expected before Pentecost, the Gospels give more prominence to the action of the human will as a condition of discipleship than to its subsequent concentration as the condition of progress and perfecting. But the example of Christ Himself is, in this matter, a sufficient safeguard and sanction, and is enforced by teaching of at least two types. 'If any man willeth to do his will' (Jn 7<sup>17</sup>), supplies the key not only to the knowledge of the things of the Kingdom, but also to the fulfilment in personal character of God's purpose of sanctification, Bengel's suaavis harmonia being both a cause and the effect of insatiable yearning. Again, glad consent, with persistency of will, is an important element in our Lord's frequent exhortations to His disciples to 'abide' in Him or in His word (Jn 15<sup>8</sup> et al.). One of the characteristics of the Johannine setting of the Gospel, as of the prophecies of Jeremiah in the OT, is the emphasis laid on the sustained determination of the will towards God.

(b) The exaltation of spirit, accompanying and enriched by this firmness of purpose, receives more adequate expression in later times, but is far from being left entirely without illustration. Such passages as Jn 12<sup>32-33</sup> speak of a magnetic influence on the part of Christ, to which the response was at the beginning more than that of admiration, and soon deepened into supreme and rapturous attachment. The Magnificat (Lk 1<sup>46-49</sup>) and the Nunc Dimittis (Lk 2<sup>29-32</sup>) anticipate the exaltation of men, partly at the accomplished work of Christ, partly at the abundance and the effect of His grace to the individual; and the self-forgetfulness of grateful and passionate devotion is illustrated in Lk 7<sup>37-48</sup>. Mary's 'Rabboni' (Jn 20<sup>16</sup>) and Thomas' 'My Lord' (Jn 20<sup>28</sup>) express absorbed attachment as well as conviction. In the parables the joy is occasionally festive and general, but sometimes becomes that of personal and assured possession (Mt 13<sup>44-46</sup>), or is even lifted up into likeness to the Saviour's own joy, incapable of dimness or of eclipse (Jn 15<sup>11</sup>, Mt 25<sup>21</sup>). The disciple in his Lord's bosom (Jn 13<sup>23-25</sup>) is a type and guarantee.

(c) The loving acts and exercises in which the devout spirit beneficially expresses itself are of almost infinite variety in their character, and, though their most ingenious exhibition is met with subsequently, they are not left without trace or starting-point in the Gospels. Beyond the example of the Saviour, an encouragement to quiet meditation may be found in Mk 6<sup>31</sup>, a commendation of private prayer in Mt 6<sup>6</sup>. Self-discipline, as removing the occasions of sin and as aiding the communion of the human spirit with God, is enjoined in such passages as Mt 5<sup>28-29</sup>, though in others the object becomes the avoidance of conduct that might offend or imperil the souls of the weak.

That self-discipline is in itself and apart from its motives meritorious, is nowhere taught by Christ, and such a notion is quite contrary to the genius of Christianity. Christ's treatment of fasting is an illustration. He evidently looked forward to its practice by His disciples not only in their association and in times of general calamity and mourning (Mt 9<sup>14-15</sup>, Mk 2<sup>18-19</sup>, Lk 24<sup>36</sup>), but individually under the prompting of personal need and as a preparation for personal blessing. That an excess of spiritual power might thereby be secured is a legitimate inference from Mt 17<sup>21</sup> and Mk 9<sup>29</sup>, though textual evidence is against any specific reference to fasting in these verses, the corruption of which may well have been due to the incorporation of a devotional gloss. In Mt 6<sup>16-18</sup> it is assumed that disciples will fast; injunctions are given with a view to secure purity of intention, and the good effect is guaranteed in the 'recompense' of the Father. Hence private fasting as an observance is distinctly recognized by Christ. According to His rule, invariable except in the case of prayer (where, moreover, the prescription is that of a model rather than a form), He does not prescribe forms. He puts in its right place of control the object of pleasing the Father, who sees in secret, and knows the whole heart and way of a man. And with this implicit injunction of fasting, and protection against its misuse and perils, He leaves every disciple to determine for himself the best application of the principle in the interest of the well-being and enrichment of the soul.

(d) Before Pentecost the action of the Holy Spirit in human devotion is, for the most part, anticipatory and a matter of promise, but as such is none the less important. His presence is that which will prevent the disciples from becoming 'desolate' and without resource (Jn 14<sup>19</sup>) on the departure of their Master; and, being present, He will act in them as the Father's Paraclete (Jn 14<sup>15</sup> et seq.), advocating the cause of God and promoting all Godward impulse and desire. Specifically, He will guide 'into all the truth' (Jn 16<sup>13</sup>), bringing the disciples into right relation, both intellectual and practical, with saving truth, and maintaining within them a condition of composure and serenity (Lk 17<sup>2</sup>). The power to do 'greater works' is associated with the return of Christ to His Father (Jn 14<sup>23</sup>), and therefore, by implication, with the mission of the Spirit; and if the complaint is sometimes just that those greater works are not being done, the cause is to be found not in the inadequacy of opportunity or resource, but in the defectiveness of personal devotion. Its degree is commensurate with that of right volition on the part of the disciple, and with that of possession on the part of the Spirit; and these two, again, are mutually dependent. 'In the Spirit' by fixed and abiding purpose, is the law on the one side; the Spirit in the disciple is the correlated privilege, with the absolute harmony between Christ and the Spirit as the only limit of possible human experience, and as its inspiration and pledge.

DIDRACHM.—See MONEY.

DIDYMUS.—The alternative name of the Apostle Thomas, given in three passages in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 11<sup>16</sup> 20<sup>24</sup> 21<sup>2</sup> Θωμάς ὁ λεγόμενος Δίδυμος). The adj. δίδυμος is regular Greek from Homer onwards, with the meaning 'twofold'; hence δίδυμος as subs. = 'a twin.' Δίδυμος is the translation, as Θωμάς is the transliteration, of κνήρη=εὐνή 'a twin.'

Why St. John calls special attention to this name is not clear. Westcott suggests that Thomas may have been familiarly known in Asia Minor among the Gentile Christians as Didymus. Jn 4<sup>25</sup> ('Messiah . . . which is called Christ') shows that Thomas was not called Didymus as an additional name. See THOMAS. E. H. TITCHMARSH.

DINNER (ἀπείρον, Mt 22<sup>4</sup>, Lk 11<sup>38</sup> [RVm 'breakfast'] 14<sup>12</sup>).—In the East there is no meal properly corresponding to our breakfast. Even the guest is allowed to depart in the morning without 'bite or sup.' Eating and drinking early in the day are held to be marks of effeminacy and self-indulgence, and are regarded as bad for the system. Many, especially when on a journey, are content with one meal in the twenty-four hours, taken after sunset. In general, however, a light meal is eaten about the middle of the day, consisting of bread, olives, fruit, leben (sour curded milk), cheese, etc.; but the principal meal is in the evening. Eating at other times is quite casual and informal. It is probably correct to say that in NT ἀπείρον and δείπνον correspond respectively to our luncheon and dinner. See, further, art. MEALS.

DISCIPLE.—1. In the NT 'disciple' (sing. and plur.) occurs very frequently in the Gospels and Acts, but not elsewhere in NT. In every case it represents the Gr. μαθητής=(1) 'learner,' 'pupil,' in contrast to 'teacher,' as Mt 10<sup>24</sup>; and (2) 'adherent,' one who is identified with a certain leader, or school, and adopts a corresponding line of conduct, as Mk 2<sup>16</sup>. Why do John's disciples and the disciples of the Pharisees fast, but thy disciples fast not? cf. Jn 9<sup>2</sup> 'Thou art his disciple; but we are disciples of Moses.' Our Lord Himself points to and discourages a loose use of the term 'disciple,' according to which it meant no more than 'hearer,' when He says, 'If ye abide in my word, then are ye truly my disciples' (Jn 8<sup>31</sup>, cf.

His statement of the conditions of discipleship, Lk 14<sup>28, 27, 33</sup> and Jn 15<sup>2</sup>). As used by the Evangelists, 'disciples' has sometimes a broader and sometimes a narrower significance. For the former, see Lk 6<sup>18</sup> 'a great multitude of his disciples,' Ac 6<sup>2</sup> 'And the twelve called the multitude of the disciples unto them,' cf. 4<sup>2</sup>. It is evident that to St. Luke τῶν πιστευόντων and τῶν μαθητῶν were equivalent expressions. Hence, when we read in Ac 19<sup>4</sup> of 'certain disciples,' who when they 'believed' heard nothing of the gift of the Holy Ghost and were baptized 'into John's baptism,' we must understand thereby Christian disciples, though in an 'immature stage of knowledge' (see Knowling's note on the passage, Expos. Gr. Test.). For 'disciples' in the narrower sense—the inner circle of the followers of Jesus, 'the Twelve,' see Mt 8<sup>23</sup> 11<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>28</sup> 26<sup>18</sup>, and frequently. Thus, as applied to the followers of our Lord, 'disciples' is a term of varying content. It is of interest in passing to note the various appellations by which the disciples address the Saviour, expressing divers aspects of the relation which they held to subsist between themselves and Him. He was to them (1) Teacher (διδάσκαλος), Mk 4<sup>38</sup>, Jn 13<sup>34</sup>; (2) Superintendent (ἐπιστάτης), only in Lk.: 5<sup>26</sup> 9<sup>33</sup> 9<sup>34</sup>; (3) Lord (κύριος); from Lk 6<sup>46</sup> we should gather that this was the designation most usually adopted by the disciples; (4) My Teacher (καθητήρ), Mt 26<sup>25</sup>, Mk 9<sup>2</sup>, Jn 4<sup>31</sup> 11<sup>5</sup>.

2. Restricting ourselves to the more limited sense in which 'disciples' is used of the followers of our Lord, we may note the composition of the Twelve. The Synoptics and Acts provide the following lists:—

Simon.	Simon.	Simon.	Peter.
Andrew.	James.	Andrew.	John.
James.	John.	James.	James.
John.	Andrew.	John.	Andrew.
Philip.	Philip.	Philip.	Philip.
Bartholomew.	Bartholomew.	Bartholomew.	Thomas.
Thomas.	Matthew.	Matthew.	Bartholomew.
Matthew.	Thomas.	Thomas.	Matthew.
James of Alphaeus.	James of Alphaeus.	James of Alphaeus.	James of Alphaeus.
Thaddeus (Lebbaeus).	Thaddeus.	Simon the Zealot.	Simon the Zealot.
Simon the Cananean.	Simon the Cananean.	Judas of James.	Judas of James.
Judas Iscariot.	Judas Iscariot.	Judas Iscariot.	Judas Iscariot.

Comparing these lists, it is apparent that common to them all is the division of the Twelve into groups of four. The sequence of the groups is the same in each list. Within the groups the order of the names varies, save as regards the first name of each of the three groups, which in all the lists is the same—the first, fifth, and ninth places being occupied in all by Simon (Peter), Philip, and James of Alphaeus respectively. See, further, art. APOSTLES, p. 103<sup>f</sup>, and the separate articles on the above names.

3. The calling of the Twelve.—If this phrase be taken quite strictly, there is no difficulty in determining when and under what circumstances the call to which it refers was given. The Synoptic accounts are in virtual accord. They show that it was not at the outset of His ministry that our Lord increased the company of His immediate followers until it numbered twelve. That increase took place when the fame of His teaching and words, as He went through the towns and villages of Galilee, 'preaching the gospel of the kingdom, healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness' (Mt 9<sup>35</sup>), both attracted to Him the attention of the populace, and so excited the resentment of the scribes and Pharisees that they began to take counsel with the Herodians 'how they might destroy him' (Mk 3<sup>6</sup>). The need for more labourers was evident, and not less evident to Jesus the signs that the time for training such labourers might be short. St. Matthew tells, immediately before he records the calling of the Twelve, that when Jesus 'saw the multitudes he was moved with compassion for them, because they were distressed and scattered, as sheep not having a shepherd. Then saith he unto his disciples, The harvest truly is plentiful, but the labourers are few. Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he send forth labourers into his harvest' (Mt 9<sup>36</sup>). That summons to prayer becomes more urgent and pressing in the light of St. Luke's record, that immediately prior to His choosing the Apostles our Lord 'went out into the mountain to pray; and he continued all night in prayer to God. And when it was day, he called his disciples, and he chose from them twelve' (Lk 6<sup>12</sup>). The immediate purpose of the call is expressed by St. Mark thus: 'And he appointed twelve that they might be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach, and to have authority to cast out devils' (Mk 3<sup>14</sup>). On the question whether some of the Twelve had not received a previous call, or perhaps more than one previous call, to be followers of Jesus, and if so, in what relation these earlier callings stand to the appointment of the Twelve, see art. APOSTLES.

4. The training of the Twelve.—When St. Mark tells us (3<sup>14</sup>) that Jesus 'appointed twelve that they might be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach,' he discloses the characteristic and the all-important feature of the method of their training. They were to see the works of the Saviour and to hear His words, and in addition to that they were to be constantly in contact with His personality: they were to be with Him (see above, p. 107).

That 'course of instruction,' as Keim calls it, which contact with Jesus secured to His disciples, was maintained with very slight interruption from the calling of the Twelve until the Betrayal. The chief intermission, of which we have any word, of the intercourse of Jesus with His chosen followers, was occasioned by that mission on which the Twelve were sent quite soon after their call (Mt 10<sup>2</sup>). The interval occupied by the mission was probably not more than a few days—'at least a week' (Latham, Pastor Pastorum, p. 301). That mission was a testing of the Apostles themselves, not less than an act of service to those to whom they were sent; and the test was so endured that it needed not to be repeated. The Twelve went forth under the conditions which Jesus prescribed: they delivered the message He bade them, and they used freely the power to heal with which they were entrusted. No similar service separated them again from their Master,—unless, indeed, they had part in that mission of the Seventy of which St. Luke tells (10<sup>42</sup>). The time would yet come for them to deliver their testimony and to fulfil their ministry. Meanwhile the Saviour jealously guards for them the precious opportunities which remain for free intercourse with Himself. He leads them away from the crowds, taking them now to 'a desert place' (Mk 6<sup>9</sup>), and again to the remote 'parts of Cæsarea Philippi' (Mt 16<sup>13</sup>). We gain the impression that as the brief spell of His own earthly ministry neared its term, our Lord concentrated Himself increasingly upon the inner band of His followers. Ewald is true to the indication of the Gospel narratives when he says that 'the community of His friends' was to our Lord 'during the last year and a half the main object of His earthly labours' (HI, vol. vi. 417).

Should it be asked more particularly what was the instruction of which the Twelve were the recipients, a full answer would require a recapitulation of all the teaching of Jesus. This much may be said here, that the Twelve shared the instruction given to 'the multitude,' with the added advantage of the explanations which they sought, and which our Lord freely accorded them, 'when he was alone,' 'privately.' See Mk 4<sup>2</sup>, on which Swete (Gospel according to St. Mark, p. 84) comments: 'Exposition now regularly followed (ἑρμηνεία) the public teaching.' Furthermore, the Gospels contain records of discourses addressed only to the inner circle of the disciples. Among such discourses should be reckoned in all probability part at least of the group of addresses known as the 'Sermon on the Mount'—notably the part contained in Mt 5, which bears all the marks of a discourse to more immediate followers. Not, however, that the more immediate followers are in this particular connexion to be restricted to the Twelve, since the discourse in Mt 5 must—in spite of the position St. Luke gives to his version of it (6<sup>12</sup>),—be placed earlier than the calling of the Twelve: it 'has throughout the character of an early and opening discourse.' None the less it is to be accounted among our Lord's less public utterances: it is 'Jesus' address of welcome to His band of disciples' (Keim, op. cit. 286-290). Again, in Mt 10<sup>2-42</sup> we have what appears at first sight to be a sustained address to the Twelve in reference to their mission. But on a comparison with Mk 6<sup>7-11</sup> and Lk 9<sup>2-5</sup> it seems likely that only vv. 2-14 were spoken with direct reference to the mission, and that vv. 15-42 are grouped with them, though coming from a later time, because they contained sayings of Jesus in reference to a kindred topic—the future missionary labours of the Apostles. Yet further must be added to the discourses delivered to the Twelve alone, the apocalyptic discourse Mt 24 (cf. Mk 13 and Lk 21), with its parabolic sequel in ch. 25; and the discourse in the upper room on the night of the Betrayal (Jn 14-16). And when we endeavour to tabulate the instruction imparted more privately to the Twelve, we may not omit the signs, each so full of teaching for them, of which they alone—and in one case but three of their number—were the spectators. The Walking on the Sea, the Transfiguration, the Cursing of the Barren Fig-tree, the Feet-washing in the Upper Room, the Miraculous Draught of Fishes (Jn 21<sup>6</sup>),—these all surely formed part of the lessons most indelibly impressed on the Twelve.

Our Lord Himself has characterized for us the purpose and the content of the teaching He imparted to His followers. It was that to them might be given 'the mystery of the kingdom of God' (Mk 4<sup>11</sup>). 'As given to the Apostles it was still a secret, not yet to be divulged, nor even except in a small degree intelligible to themselves' (Swete, op. cit. p. 72). The Kingdom, the characteristic of its subjects, its laws, its service, and, finally, its Lord reigning through suffering—such in broad outline was the course of the instruction imparted by Jesus to the Twelve. It moved onward from the simpler to the more profound. 'At first, sayings are given them to remember; latterly, they receive mysteries on which to meditate. In the Sermon on the Mount men are told plainly what it is desirable for them to know; afterwards, the teaching passes through parables and hard sayings up to the mysteries conveyed by the Last Supper' (Latham, op. cit. 120). But no teaching, not even the teaching of Jesus Himself, could overcome the reluctance to believe that it behoved that the Christ should suffer, or arouse anticipations of the glories that should follow. The crucifixion and death of our Lord found the Eleven unprepared, and ready to despair, though they still held together in the bonds of a love they had acquired in the school of Jesus. It needed the actual fact of the Resurrection, and converse with the risen Saviour, and the illumination of the Spirit, to bring them to a true understanding of all that reiterated teaching concerning His death and His rising from the dead which Jesus had given 'while He was yet with them.' But once that understanding was attained by the disciples, the truth against which their minds had been stubbornly closed became central in their proclamation. There is abundant evidence that the Apostles were slow learners—men with no special quickness of insight, and with the hindrance of strongly developed prejudice. It is also evident that their slowness and prejudice have for us an apologetic value (see esp. Bruce, Training of the Twelve, p. 482: 'They were stupid, slow-minded persons; very honest, but very unapt to take in new ideas. . . . Let us be thankful for the honest stupidity of these men, it gives great value to their testimony. . . . We know that nothing but facts could make such men believe that which nowadays they get credit for inventing'). It concerns us yet more to recall the evidence which their training affords of the patience and transforming power of Him who now, not less truly than in the days of His flesh, calls weak men to Himself that they may be with Him, and that He may send them forth to bear witness on His behalf, ending them with His Spirit, that their testimony, like that of the Apostles, may not be in vain. DISCIPLESHIP.—In the Gospels no word expressive of 'discipleship' occurs, although they are full of the living reality which it expresses. This is not surprising, for it is never God's way to teach abstract truth, but truth embodied in actual life. From the concrete and the living facts it is left to us, by the exercise of our natural faculties, to abstract the generalization or induction which presents the idea in its purity. Christ always followed the Divine method; and, accordingly, while He made disciples, and trained them in discipleship, He hardly made any attempt to define or describe what this involves; nor did He give much instruction which represented with any directness the ideal that He had in view. From these negative facts themselves the primary truth on this subject may be learnt: Discipleship, in the Christian sense, is essentially a matter for living realization rather than for psychological analysis or formal compliance.

If for His followers later the making of disciples began with preaching the gospel, for the Lord Himself it commonly began with the authoritative appeal, 'Follow me.' There were, of course, times when this summons called a man literally to arise and go with Jesus to some new place and duty; as when the first among the Twelve 'left the nets and followed him' (Mk 1:18, 20). But the same summons was still employed by the Lord after His resurrection, when it could have no such literal signification (Jn 21:19). And there is a group of instances (Mt 10:37, Jn 12:25) in which 'bearing the cross' and 'disowning oneself' are conjoined with the call to follow Him, where it is clear that 'following' has wholly a spiritual sense. The fact that we speak of 'following an example' too often leads to the misinterpretation of this pregnant call to discipleship which was so characteristic of the Lord Jesus. It is no injunction to copy Him, though, of course, the imitation of Christ must enter into the aim of every disciple. That, however, belongs to a rather later stage of discipleship, while the summons to 'follow' is its initiation. The choice of this word rests upon the ancient metaphor of a 'way of life' which Christ adopted for Himself when He affirmed 'I am the Way,' and which underlay and coloured not a little of His language. So the call, 'Follow me,' is an appeal to trust His guidance, and venture oneself along the track that He explores into the unknown regions of life, with the need of 'bearing the cross' and 'losing life to find it.' 'Come on! Fear not to go through the valley of the shadow of death with me in the quest of life. "He that is near me is near the fire; he that is far from me is far from the kingdom."' Thus at the threshold of discipleship lies the requirement which He always made of those to whom He rendered service,—the requirement of courageous trust or 'faith.' And for such as are ready to obey this first appeal to 'follow' He opens 'a new and living way through the veil' which hides so much of the realms of life from our eyes. And this way is 'human to the red-ripe of the heart,' and fit for human feet to travel, for the way is 'His flesh,' His mortal life, His human nature—what for us men and for our salvation He came down to make His own.

There are some few sayings in which the Lord delineates the features of discipleship under one or another of its aspects. E.g. 'A disciple is not above his master . . . it is enough for the disciple that he be as his master. . . . If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more them of his household?' (Mt 10:24). And in close connexion with this stands the reiterated teaching, 'Whosoever he be of you that renounceth not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple' (Lk 14:33-35). Elsewhere He emphasizes not the outward lot, but the inner character of discipleship: e.g. 'Come unto me all ye that labour. . . . Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am gentle and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls' (Mt 11:28). The same gentleness and lowliness which are ever ready to render loving service are again taught as characteristics of discipleship in the action of washing the disciples' feet on the last evening, when, having sat down again, He said, 'Perceive ye what I have done to you? Ye call me Teacher and Lord; and ye say well; for so I am. If I then, the Lord and the Teacher, washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet. For I gave you an example that ye also should do as I have done to you' (Jn 13:12, cf. also Lk 22:26-29, Mk 9:35-37, Mt 23:7-10). What the disciple must learn is not mainly 'teaching'; he must 'learn Christ.' 'Truth is in Jesus,'—'the Truth and the Life,'—and the disciple must grow 'in the knowledge and love of God and of His Son Jesus Christ our Lord.' So love is what must be learnt above all else, and affords the test of true discipleship. 'By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another' (Jn 13:35). And the Lord traces discipleship down to its roots when He declares, 'No man can come to me except the Father which sent me draw him. . . . It is written . . . They shall all be taught of God. Every one that hath heard from the Father, and hath learned, cometh unto me' (Jn 6:44).

A large proportion of the Lord's teaching bears, of course, upon the nature of discipleship and the character of the disciple, even when it is not cast in the form of dealing with this directly. E.g. the Beatitudes (Mt 5:3-12) are, under one aspect, all so many facets of discipleship; metaphors like 'the salt of the earth,' the 'light of the world' (Mt 5:13-14), 'a little flock' (Lk 12:32), 'the branches of the vine' (Jn 15:1), 'every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted' (Mt 15:13), and many another, including those developed into parables,—all sketch some features of discipleship, as do such sayings as that one must be reborn, and much of the teaching concerning the Kingdom.

The final charge which the Lord laid upon the disciples whom He had trained and tested Himself was, 'Going forth, make ye disciples of all the nations' (μαθητεύσατε πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, Mt 28<sup>19</sup>). Discipleship for all is thus set forth as His own ultimate aim. In reading the words one must carefully guard against the lamentable imperfection of rendering in the AV, and borrowed thence in some of the language of the Book of Common Prayer; also against the faulty punctuation of the sentence which is found alike in the AV and the RV. 'Teaching' is no translation of μαθητεύσατε, which means far more; while a colon ought to replace the comma after 'nations'; and only commas, or at the most semicolons, should separate the succeeding clauses. Without attention to this, the great importance of this passage must be missed. Rightly read, it gives the Lord's own interpretation of how discipleship is constituted. The whole commission is 'Make disciples of all'; and three steps are then indicated in so doing, which answer to three essential factors in discipleship—(1) Baptizing into the Name; (2) teaching to observe all commands; (3) the constant spiritual presence of Christ. There is no complete discipleship without these three elements. The first is the portal of discipleship, the admission to a new destiny; at once the begetting of a new life on the part of God, and the profession of a new hope and purpose on the part of those whom He claims as His children. The second is the training needed to make the promise good; for only in the course of life's discipline can character be formed or resolutions realized,—it is 'in our endurance that we must win our souls.' The third is the pledge that none shall ever be left to face the stress of life's probation alone, but that for every disciple union with Christ is a support which may be securely trusted, the Divine Incarnation working itself out for ever till the goal shall be reached, when 'God shall be all in all' (1 Co 15<sup>28</sup>). The first disciples understood the charge which had been given them, and acted on the lines laid down from the earliest day on which they began to 'make disciples' for their Lord. So when, on the day of Pentecost, those who had been touched by Peter's preaching put the inquiry, 'Brethren, what shall we do?' the answer of the Apostle was explicit: 'Repent ye . . . be baptized . . . ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit' (Ac 2<sup>37-38</sup>). Here are the same three elements of discipleship; for 'repentance' (μετάνοια) is the form which 'observing all things commanded' necessarily takes to start with in those who are passing from walking in their own ways to following the way of Christ; while the Holy Spirit is, of course, the Spirit of Christ present permanently with those whom He unites to Himself. E. P. BOYS-SMITH.
DISCIPLINE.—The Gospels reveal a twofold discipline—that which Christ Himself experienced, and that to which He subjects His servants. It will be convenient to treat these separately.

1. The discipline to which Christ submitted.—The NT teaches clearly that even our Lord required to be 'perfected' (τελειωθῆναι) in order to ensure the consummation of the work for which He had become incarnate. Such a τελειωσις consisted in His being brought 'to the full moral perfection of His humanity, which carries with it the completeness of power and dignity' (Westcott); and its necessity is recognized, not by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews alone (He 2<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>26</sup> etc.), but also by Christ Himself (Lk 13<sup>32</sup>).

It is taught with equal clearness that our Lord attained His 'perfection' through the discipline which He voluntarily endured. This included several elements. (1) Among the most important was the discipline of temptation (Mk 1<sup>13,14</sup> || He 2<sup>18</sup>); and in this connexion it is important to remember that His testing was not only searching in its strength, but repeated in its assaults (note plur. Lk 22<sup>28</sup>, and cf. Mk 14<sup>38</sup> || He 4<sup>15</sup>). (2) A second element in His discipline was that of delay. The incarnate Son, with His love eager for the completion of His saving work, must have exercised no ordinary self-restraint, as, amid the opposition of foes and the misconception of friends, the stages of its progress passed slowly by (Lk 12<sup>50</sup>; cf. the probable force of the temptation in Mt 4<sup>8</sup>) and of επιβουλεύατο τῷ πνεύματι in Jn 11<sup>32</sup>; cf. also 2 Th 3<sup>3</sup>). (3) The discipline of sorrow was also included in this 'perfecting' of Christ. His experience of sorrow was limited to no single kind. He felt the force of all the ills that vex our human life. In a most suggestive citation one sacred writer shows in how real and literal a sense He took our human sicknesses upon Him (Mt 8<sup>16,17</sup>, cf. Mk 5<sup>20</sup>). He knew no less the pang of regret with which a pure man views opportunities wasted by those for whom he has cherished high ideals (Lk 19<sup>41</sup>—note ἐκλαυσε). His, too, were the tears shed over a family bereaved and a 'loved one lost' (Jn 11<sup>35</sup>). (4) The last aspect of Christ's discipline of which mention must be made was that of pain and suffering. Of this there is no occasion for offering detailed illustration. The story of His sufferings is the story of His life (for a few examples see Mk 8<sup>31</sup> || Lk 9<sup>55</sup> || 12<sup>50,51</sup>; He 1<sup>9</sup>; note the use of παθεῖν in Lk 23<sup>34,25</sup>).

The experience of this discipline, revealing itself under different aspects and affecting His human nature at different points, was necessary to the fulfilment of our Lord's mission. It was in virtue of His 'perfection' through suffering that He reached His absolute sympathy with humanity, and in consequence His complete qualification to be its Saviour (He 2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>15,16</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>). See PERFECTIO.

2. The discipline which Christ imposes upon His followers.—Discipline is an essential part of the Christian life, and the NT points out several forms under which it is to be experienced. In some of these it is restricted to a certain number of those who call themselves by the name of Christ.

(1) There is, for example, a discipline to which Christians are rendered liable by falling into error (1 Co 11<sup>30</sup>, esp. note παθεῖν in v. 32; see also παθεῖν in Rev 3<sup>3</sup>). (2) The discipline of persecution also does not of necessity come to all Christians. At the same time, as both record and exhortation prove, it is no uncommon experience. It certainly befell our Lord's early followers (Mk 13<sup>9</sup>; Mt 10<sup>23,24</sup>; Jn 15<sup>18,19</sup>; cf. the Epp. passim, and see esp. He 12<sup>10</sup>, where παθεῖν is cited in this reference), and He Himself attributed a special blessedness to those who found a place in its honoured succession (Mt 5<sup>10-12</sup>). (3) In a third aspect, however, discipline falls to the lot of every Christian. No man can be a true follower of Christ who is not willing from the first to practise the discipline of self-renunciation. Such self-renunciation, indeed, is one of the conditions of entering His service (Mk 8<sup>34</sup> || Mt 10<sup>38</sup>). And there is to be no limit to the sacrifice required. It must be endured even to the severance of earth's closest ties (Mt 10<sup>37</sup>) and the loss of life itself (24<sup>21</sup>; Jn 16<sup>2</sup>). Few things are more impressive than the manner in which, from the very beginning of His ministry (cf. Mk 1<sup>17,18</sup>), our Lord assumed His right to claim from His followers that utter self-repudiation, and confidently expected on their part a willing response to His demand (Mt 9<sup>19</sup>).

One particular aspect of this Christian self-denial calls for separate consideration. The Gospel teaching affords little support to those who have sought to express self-renunciation in the form of morbid asceticism. Christ's own example, in suggestive contrast with that of His forerunner, leads us to the very opposite conception of religious discipline (Mt 11<sup>18</sup>). Along the pathway of poverty (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>) and persecution (Jn 7<sup>19</sup> 8<sup>27</sup>) to which He called His disciples, He Himself walked; yet alike in His own life and in His thought for them (Mt 9<sup>14</sup>, cf. 1 Ti 5<sup>22</sup>) ascetic discipline received no prominence. There appears to be just a hint of it in one of His sayings (Mt 19<sup>21</sup>, cf. 1 Co 7<sup>29</sup>), but even there it is distinctly stated less as a rule for the many than as an ideal for some few to whom a special call might come. In Christ's view the 'fasting' consequent upon real sorrow was so inevitable, that any merely formal anticipation of it was to be deprecated rather than approved (Mt 9<sup>15</sup>). See, further, art. ASCETICISM.

For ecclesiastical 'discipline' see art. CHURCH.

DISCOURSE.—No attempt is here made to discuss in all its bearings the general theme of the discourses of Jesus. His Teaching, Parables, Sermon on the Mount, etc., receive attention in special articles. All that is here undertaken is to mention in some sort of classification all the discourses, and to append a brief outline of their principal characteristics.

i. CLASSIFICATION AND MENTION.—The difficulties of any attempt at classifying the discourses of our Lord are apparent at a glance. They arise alike from the forms in which the discourses are recorded and from their character and contents. Considering the fact that our Lord did not write anything, or even cause His discourses to be exactly reported; considering, too, the great variety of occasions which called forth His utterances, and His own easy freedom and mastery of method in dealing with these occasions; considering, further, the differences in length, form, contents, and yet the cross-similarities and repetitions which the discourses exhibit, we see at once that a scientific and satisfactory classification is impossible. Yet there are obvious advantages for study in mentioning the discourses in some sort of orderly way. For our purpose it will not be necessary to take account of critical questions concerning the differences between the Fourth Gospel and the Synoptics, or between the Synoptics themselves, or to pay attention to matters of harmony and chronology, though under each grouping the commonly accepted order of events is followed. The classification proposed runs upon the general principle of audiences, and groups the discourses according as they were delivered to (1) individuals, (2) a select few, or (3) the public. Subdivisions will be apparent under these general heads.

1. Interviews with individuals.—Leaving out colloquies with particular persons in presence of others, there are to be mentioned under this head only (1) the discourse with Nicodemus on Regeneration (Jn 3<sup>1-21</sup>), and (2) the discourse with the woman of Samaria on Worship and Salvation (4<sup>7-26</sup>).

2. Talks with a few.—These may be subdivided as follows: (1) Discourses with others than the disciples. At these we cannot be sure of the absence of disciples, but their presence is not stated or certainly implied, and the words were not specially addressed to them. To this class belong: the discourse on Forgiveness, with the parable of the Two Debtors, given at the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup>); the beginning of the discourse on Tradition (eating with unwashed hands), though later 'he called the multitudes,' and the disciples came unto him' (Mt 15<sup>1-29</sup>, Mk 7<sup>1-29</sup>); the Denunciation of the Pharisees and Lawyers at the house of a chief Pharisee (Lk 11<sup>27-54</sup>); the discourse at another Pharisee's house, where He discussed Modesty, Giving Feasts, and spoke the parable of the Great Feast and Excuses (Lk 14<sup>1-24</sup>); finally, the discourse at the house of Zaccheus, with the parable of the Pounds (Lk 19<sup>1-27</sup>).

(2) Discourses with the disciples and others. Here the audience consisted in part of the disciples and in part of others, the presence of both classes being either distinctly stated or clearly implied. As to the numbers present, the circumstances seem to restrict them somewhat, though it is difficult to say just to what extent, and therefore how far these should be regarded as properly public discourses. To this class belong: the discourse on Fasting (Mt 9<sup>14-17</sup>, Mk 2<sup>18-22</sup>, Lk 5<sup>28-30</sup>); the response to objectors on Sabbath Observance (Mt 12<sup>1-8</sup>, Mk 2<sup>23-28</sup>, Lk 6<sup>1-5</sup>); responses about Following Him (Mt 23<sup>2-28</sup>, Lk 9<sup>57-62</sup>); response to the lawyer about Eternal Life, and parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>25-37</sup>, cf. v. 25); on Divorce (Mt 19<sup>8-12</sup>, Mk 10<sup>2-12</sup>); response to the Rich Young Ruler, with discourse on the Perils of Wealth and on Forsaking All and Following Him (Mt 19<sup>16-30</sup>, Mk 10<sup>17-31</sup>, Lk 18<sup>18-30</sup>); the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard (Mt 20<sup>1-16</sup>); response to the request of certain Greeks, with remarks on His Death and Glory (Jn 12<sup>20-33</sup>). Other discourses of the last Passover seem to have been given in presence of the crowd, though directly addressed to smaller groups.

(3) Discourses with the disciples alone. These contain some of the most notable of our Lord's utterances. In some cases others than the Twelve were present, but usually the audience was all, or a portion of, the Apostles. It will not be necessary to observe this distinction in the enumeration. This group of discourses may be subdivided into two kinds. (a) Short occasional discourses: the explanation of the Parable of the Tares, with the short parables that follow (Mt 13<sup>36-43</sup>); the caution against Pharisaic Leaven (Mt 16<sup>4-12</sup>, Mk 8<sup>13-21</sup>); remarks about His Church upon Peter's confession (Mt 16<sup>13-28</sup>, Mk 8<sup>27-30</sup>, Lk 9<sup>18-22</sup>); the immediately following discourse on His Death and on Self-Denial (Mt 16<sup>21-28</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31-91</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22-27</sup>); talk after the Transfiguration (Mt 17<sup>9-13</sup>, Mk 9<sup>9-13</sup>); a second foretelling of His Death and Resurrection (Mt 17<sup>22-23</sup>, Mk 9<sup>30-32</sup>, Lk 9<sup>33-35</sup>); discourses at the Mission and Return of the Seventy (Lk 10<sup>1-24</sup>); teaching as to Prayer, with parable of the Friend at Midnight (Lk 11<sup>1-13</sup>); parable of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16<sup>1-13</sup>); teaching as to Offences, Faith, Service (Lk 17<sup>1-10</sup>); third prediction of His Death and Resurrection (Mt 20<sup>17-19</sup>, Mk 10<sup>32-34</sup>, Lk 18<sup>31-34</sup>); talk about Faith suggested by the Withered Fig-tree (Mt 21<sup>20-22</sup>, Mk 11<sup>20-22</sup>); talk following the Washing of the Disciples' Feet (Jn 13<sup>12-20</sup>); institution of the Lord's Supper (Mt 26<sup>26-29</sup>, Mk 14<sup>22-25</sup>, Lk 22<sup>19-20</sup>); after the resurrection, talk with the Two Disciples on the way to Emmaus (Lk 24<sup>17-27</sup>); with the Apostles, Thomas absent (Lk 24<sup>36-48</sup>, Jn 20<sup>19-29</sup>); talk with some of the Apostles at the Sea of Galilee (Jn 21<sup>4-22</sup>); the Great Commission (Mt 28<sup>16-19</sup>).—(b) Extended discourses. Probably some of those mentioned in the preceding group were longer in reality than in report. But of the longer discourses with the chosen few we have the following: the Mission and Instruction of the Twelve (Mt 10<sup>1-42</sup>, Mk 6<sup>7-13</sup>, Lk 9<sup>1-6</sup>); on Humility, Offences, Forgiveness (Mt 18<sup>1-35</sup>, Mk 9<sup>33-39</sup>, Lk 9<sup>46-50</sup>); discourse on the Mount of Olives on His Second Coming and the Final Judgment (Mt 24-25, Mk 13, Lk 21<sup>7-36</sup>); the Farewell Discourse and Prayer (Jn 14-17).

3. Public addresses.—Of these we may again in a general way distinguish three groups, according to the extent either of the actual discourse or of the form in which we have it. (1) Discourses mentioned with some general description or remark, but with little or no detail of contents. Here we have: the beginning of His ministry (Mt 4<sup>17</sup>, Mk 1<sup>14-15</sup>, Lk 4<sup>14-15</sup>); the sermon at Nazareth (Lk 4<sup>16-30</sup>); the first preaching tour in Galilee (Mt 4<sup>23-24</sup>, Mk 1<sup>29</sup>, Lk 4<sup>41</sup>); at Capernaum (Mk 9<sup>2-4</sup>, Lk 5<sup>17</sup>); the second preaching tour in Galilee (Lk 8<sup>2-3</sup>); at Nazareth again (Mt 13<sup>54-58</sup>, Mk 6<sup>1-6</sup>); the third preaching tour in Galilee (Mt 9<sup>35-38</sup>, Mk 6<sup>6</sup>); a tour alone after sending out the Twelve (Mt 11<sup>1</sup>); teaching and journeying (Lk 13<sup>10-22</sup>, cf. Mt 19<sup>1</sup>, Mk 10<sup>1</sup>); teaching in the Temple (Mk 11<sup>17</sup>, Lk 19<sup>47</sup>, cf. 21<sup>17, 28</sup>).

(2) Short occasional discourses. Of these there are a great number and variety, spoken sometimes to great multitudes, sometimes to groups, but publicly: on Blasphemy (Mt 12<sup>22-27</sup>, Mk 3<sup>22-28</sup>); on Signs (Mt 12<sup>28-32</sup>); latter part of discourse on Eating with Unwashed Hands, and Traditions (Mt 15<sup>1-20</sup>, Mk 7<sup>1-23</sup>); on Signs again (Mt. 16<sup>1-4</sup>, Mk 8<sup>11-12</sup>); on Demons and Signs again (Lk 11<sup>14-20</sup>); on Confession, Worldliness, Watchfulness (Lk 12); on Repentance, with parable of the Barren Fig-tree (Lk 13<sup>1-9</sup>); on the Good Shepherd (Jn 10<sup>1-30</sup>); on His Messiahship and Relations with the Father (Jn 10<sup>32-38</sup>); Sabbath Healing, parables of Mustard Seed and Leaven (Lk 13<sup>10-21</sup>); on the Salvation of the Elect (Lk 13<sup>22-30</sup>); Lament over Jerusalem (Lk 13<sup>34-35</sup>); on Counting the Cost of Following Him (Lk 14<sup>28-33</sup>); reproof of the Pharisees, with parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>1-13</sup>); on the Coming of the Kingdom (Lk 17<sup>20-27</sup>); on Prayer, with parables of the Importunate Widow, and of the Pharisee and Publican (Lk 18<sup>1-14</sup>); the colloquies with His critics in the Temple, on His Authority, on the Tribute to Caesar, on the Resurrection, on the Great Commandment, on the Son of David (Mt 21<sup>24-22</sup>, Mk 11<sup>27-12</sup>, Lk 20); remarks on Belief and Unbelief (Jn 12<sup>44-50</sup>).

(3) Extended discourses. Only a few of the great discourses of our Lord are reported in extenso: the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5-7, Lk 6<sup>17-49</sup>)—in a sense public, though addressed primarily to the disciples; discourse at the feast in Jerusalem on His Relations with the Father (Jn 5<sup>19-47</sup>); on John the Baptist and suggested topics (Mt 11<sup>7-30</sup>, Lk 7<sup>34-35</sup>); the first great group of parables, the Sower, etc. (Mt 13<sup>1-52</sup>, Mk 4<sup>1-34</sup>, Lk 8<sup>4-38</sup>); discourse in the synagogue at Capernaum on the Bread of Life (Jn 6<sup>25-58</sup>); colloquy in the Temple on His Mission (Jn 7, 8); second great group of parables, the Lost Sheep, etc. (Lk 15<sup>1-17</sup>); last public discourse, Denunciation of the Pharisees (Mt 23<sup>1-39</sup>, Mk 12<sup>38-40</sup>, Lk 20<sup>45-47</sup>).

ii. SOME CHARACTERISTICS.—A survey of the discourses of Jesus presents in a general way some of their characteristics, which may be summarily outlined as follows:

1. Their great variety. (1) Of occasion. (2) Of contents. (3) Of form.
2. Their wonderful charm. (1) Of personality—even in the report: how much more in His presence! (2) Of sympathy. (3) Of manner.
3. Their authority. (1) Consciousness of God. (2) Self-assertion.
4. Their power. (1) Magnetism—personality, demeanour, tone. (2) Thought—then and evermore.

i. CURRENT PRECONCEPTIONS IN TIME OF CHRIST.—Two ideas respecting disease had a powerful influence on conceptions current in our Lord's day: (1) The belief that all sickness and physical disease and pain were penalties imposed as the result of sin; (2) the idea that demonic agency was concerned with all human suffering. These kindred and allied ideas have been common among ancient peoples, and were strongly developed among the Babylonians, Persians, and Greeks.

Sayce, in his Hobart Lectures (310, 324-5), gives evidence of the ancient Akkadian belief that disease and sickness were caused by specific malevolent spirits which possessed the person. The demons had been eaten with the food, drunk with the water, or inhaled from the air; and until the evil power had been expelled the victim had no chance of recovery. Exorcism was effected by the sorcerer-priest, the intermediary between mankind and the spiritual world, using magic spells consisting of the names of deities, the name signifying the personality of the god, who was compelled by this use of the name to attend to the exorcist.

Among the Semites any mysterious natural object or occurrence appealing strongly to the imagination or exciting sentiments of awe and reverence was readily taken as a manifestation either of Divine or of demonic life (W. R. Smith, ES 119 ff.). The demons, if offended, avenged themselves by sending various forms of disease. Indications are found in the Gospels that such ideas were not extinct in the time of Christ. The old Semitic strain of conception was modified and quickened by contact with Babylonian, Persian, and Grecian peoples, and prevailed with considerable force in the later Judaism. The NT reflects the ideas of a time when the older conceptions were breaking up, but had not yet disappeared.

Our Lord gives no sanction to any such thought of disease, and when the disciples betrayed their mode of thought (Jn 9<sup>2</sup>) He took occasion to combat the ancient superstition. Although He did frequently mark sin as the cause of much physical weakness and disease (see art. IMPOTENCE), yet He denies that all sickness was penal in character. Other ends were in the Divine purview besides the punishment of personal sin (Jn 9<sup>2</sup>). In St. Luke's Gospel high fever seems to be attributed by implication to an evil agency, and Jesus is said to have rebuked (επετίμησεν) the fever (Lk 4<sup>38, 39</sup>); but probably this must be explained as a reflexion of the current preconceptions. In Lk 13<sup>16</sup> no reference is necessarily made to sin having given power to Satan to afflict the woman. Demons were associated with disordered conditions of human life, as disease and infirmity: with dumbness (Mk 9<sup>17</sup>, Lk 9<sup>40</sup>), with deafness and dumbness (Mk 9<sup>18</sup>), with blindness and dumbness (Mt 12<sup>22</sup>), and with epilepsy (Mk 1<sup>29</sup>, Lk 9<sup>38</sup>). These physical defects are not necessarily manifestations of demonic influence, but are regarded as in close alliance with them. In St. Luke's Gospel, also, it is noteworthy that a distinction is recorded as made by Jesus between the exorcism of demons and ordinary cures (ἐκβάλλω δαιμόνια καὶ λέωσθε ἀνορεῖα, Lk 13<sup>16</sup>). * See, further, art. DEMON.

* Hobart (Medical Language of St. Luke) and other writers claim to trace in the writings of the Third Evangelist the influence of a medical training. But the argument may be easily pressed beyond the truth. St. Luke's style and vocabulary have many affinities with classical Greek, and many of the medical expressions he uses occur in the LXX, and may have

ii. REFERENCES IN THE GOSPELS TO SICKNESS AND DISEASE.—

(1) ἀσθένεια, literally want of strength (a priv. and σθένος), primarily denoting weakness, and usually 'infirmity' or 'infirmities'; in Ac 28<sup>9</sup> tr. 'diseases' (ἐκ τῶν ἀσθενειῶν); in Mt 21<sup>17</sup> tr. 'infirmities', and associated with νόσος; in Jn 11<sup>4</sup> AV and RV 'sickness'; elsewhere [Lk 6<sup>18</sup> 23<sup>11</sup> 14, in 56] 'infirmity'; associated with νόσος in Lk 4<sup>40</sup>.

(2) κατακλιεῖν (κατάκλιω, 'soften') denotes: (a) softness or effeminacy, as well as sickness; (b) periodic and chronic sickness and consequent languor of body. The word is used in Mt 4<sup>23</sup> 24 28 10<sup>1</sup>, where it is associated with νόσος. The first named passage is one in which the various ailments that our Lord healed are enumerated and apparently discriminated (cf. AV and RV).

(3) νόσος (from νό 'not', and νόσος 'sound' (?) is employed to indicate more acute and violent seizures than κατακλιεῖν; found in Mt 4<sup>23</sup> 28 31<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>10</sup>, Mt 13<sup>1</sup> 39, Lk 4<sup>40</sup> 6<sup>17</sup> 7<sup>21</sup> 24. In the Marikan and Lukan (exc. Lk 4<sup>40</sup>) passages the diseased are distinguished from the demonized.

(4) νόσος, a disease or sickness, Jn 5<sup>4</sup> (only).

(5) νόσος κακῆ, ἐχθρῆς is a frequent expression for those that were sick, and in Mk 1<sup>34</sup> we have the fuller expression καλλῶν κακῶν ἐχθρῶν πανθλας νόσων.

Of the presence of specific diseases much fuller indications are more or less distinctly given in the OT than in the NT. Instances of these may be understood as included in the miscellaneous cases of sickness and disease which our Lord repeatedly dealt with. Among them are various forms of skin disease, which were and are very common in the East; also of fever and allied disorders, extending to plague and pestilence; diseases of the digestive organs; infantile and senile diseases; affections of the brain or other parts of the nervous system; and disordered conditions of the psychical side of human nature. All of these are referred to in the OT with some amount of definiteness as to symptoms.

The diseases mentioned in the Gospels, and dealt with in direct and Divine fashion by Jesus (see art. CURES), include cases of physical defect; fevers and kindred diseases; skin diseases, notably that of leprosy; a solitary case of dropsy; ailments and infirmities that were nervous in character; and others which were a combination of nervous and psychical disorder. These various afflictions are not always to be certainly identified with particular forms of disease with which modern medical science is familiar. The description of the cases is, for the most part, far removed from being scientific, but yet enables us to broadly distinguish them from one another and to classify them with fair exactitude.

1. Diseases resulting in physical defect, or incapacity.—(1) Defect in the organs of speech.—The case of the dumb man recorded in Mt 9<sup>32,33</sup> was associated with features of mental disturbance leading the people to attribute the dumbness to demonic possession. "When the demon was cast out, the dumb spake," as though no physical defect existed apart from the psychical disturbance. Interesting cases are known in which mental derangement has been manifested in an inhibition of one of the senses. Ray (Factors of an Unsound Mind) gives an instance in which the patient was unable to see the Column in the Place Vendôme in Paris, and believed it to have been removed. A similar inhibition, resulting from psychical rather than physical causes, might be applied to the organs of speech.

(2) Defect in the organs of sense.—Among defects notably common in the East is that of blindness (see art. SIGHT, B). Deafness is usually accompanied by dumbness, being indeed often the main cause of it—the term deaf-mute thus accurately describing the limitation. See DEAF AND DUMB.

panied by dumbness, being indeed often the main cause of it—the term deaf-mute thus accurately describing the limitation. See DEAF AND DUMB.

(3) Defects in the organs both of sense and speech.—In Mt 12<sup>22</sup> blindness and dumbness are combined, together with mental disturbance. In this case the restoration is not spoken of as a casting out of the demon, but as a healing (ἰεράπευεν), indicating that there was serious physical defect to be remedied. Mt 17<sup>14-21</sup> = Mk 9<sup>17</sup> = Lk 9<sup>37-43</sup> records a case in which both deafness and dumbness were found along with epilepsy and periodical mental derangement. Mt. and Lk. do not give the features of deafness and dumbness, but confine themselves to the mental features, which they do not describe so fully as Mark. Mk 7<sup>32-37</sup> is a peculiarly interesting instance of deafness combined with incapacity of speech. The description is κωφὸν καὶ μωγῖλλον. The deafness might give rise to the stammering, and the fact that total dumbness had not resulted rather points to a comparatively early stage of the affliction. The signs employed by Jesus in the healing are exactly adapted to reach the intelligence of such a defect-bound soul (see art. CURES).

2. Fever and allied diseases.—Various diseases of a kindred nature to fever were common in the East from the earliest times, and were probably not very rigorously distinguished from each other: fever, ague, and a wasting disease resembling Mediterranean fever. The NT speaks of πυρετός, 'fever,' in Lk 4<sup>38</sup> and Jn 4<sup>46</sup>. The term in Mt 8<sup>14</sup> and Mk 1<sup>30</sup> is πυρεσσουσα; while in Lk 4<sup>38</sup> the illness of Peter's wife's mother is spoken of (possibly with a reference to the division made by the Greeks into greater and lesser fevers) as one in which the patient was συνεχόμενῃ πυρετῷ μεγάλῳ, indicating a continued and probably malignant fever, rather than an intermittent feverish attack such as characterizes ague. The supernatural feature of the healing consisted in the immediacy of the recovery without the regular debility following the disease. The ailment described in the Gospels was probably a form of malarial fever which prevailed in the valleys of Palestine and round the Sea of Galilee.

3. Skin diseases.—The OT bears witness to the prevalence in Palestine of many forms of cutaneous disease, and the writings of travellers and eye-witnesses testify to the fact that these are still fearfully common, being perhaps the most characteristic malady of the East. These varieties of skin disease are not referred to in the NT, the only one in evidence there being that most dreaded affection of the skin, which was also in the worse forms a serious constitutional malady affecting the whole organism, which bears the name leprosy (wh. see).

4. A solitary case of dropsy is recorded in Lk 14<sup>2</sup>, described as ὄδηστικὸς. No account is given of the trouble, the controversy with the Pharisees regarding the right use of the Sabbath being the main interest. No indication is given as to the seat of the disease which caused the dropsy, whether kidneys, heart, or liver.

5. Diseases of the nervous system.—Out of 22 cases of healing wrought by Jesus upon individuals, 8, and most probably 10, are to be classed among nervous disorders, either with or without the complication of psychical disturbance. The general exorcisms which mark our Lord's career are of the same order, and among the general healings of sickness and infirmity which are recorded some may reasonably be supposed to be of the same character, and possibly many of them were purely nervous or hysterical afflictions. Disease of brain centres or of the nerve may also account for some of the cases of blindness.

The attempt, however, to show (1) that our Lord's healings may be all reduced to cases of hysteria and of temporary nervous disorder, such as readily yield to treatment by known therapeutic remedies, and (2) that these are the best attested of the miracles, signally fails (see art. MIRACLES); and yet it may be freely recognized that many of the ailments cured by Jesus belonged to the nervous category. It still remains that those who desire to minimize to the fullest extent the super-normal powers of Jesus are not helped by these facts, for in order to deal effectively with these troubles He must not only have removed the disturbing cause in the psychical nature, but also brought a Divine power to bear on the whole nervous system, dispersing in some cases organic defect and disease.

Under this head are included—

(1) Paralysis or Palsy (see art. PARALYSIS).
 (2) Epilepsy. The cases in the NT of this distressing nervous malady are complicated with forms of mental disturbance (see art. LUNATIC). But it may be supposed that among those who were regarded as possessed and whose restoration was included under the general exorcisms, some were cases of simple epilepsy (wh. see).

(3) Probably the two cases of general impotence must be included here—mentioned in Jn 5<sup>2</sup> and Lk 13<sup>10</sup> (see art. IMPOTENCY).

(4) In all likelihood also the man with the withered hand was one nervously afflicted. The case is recorded in Mt 12<sup>13</sup>, Mk 3<sup>1-5</sup>, Lk 6<sup>5-11</sup>. The incapacity and wasting might be due to (a) infantile paralysis, the disease arresting the development and growth of tissue, leaving the limb shrunk and withered; or (b) it may have been congenital; or (c) it might be due to some direct injury to the main nerve of the limb, preventing its proper nutrition.

Among the halt and withered of Jn 5<sup>2</sup> probably there were cases of chronic rheumatism, joint diseases, and other wasting ailments, in many instances complicated with nervous exhaustion and weakness, if not with positive disease.

6. Nervous and psychical diseases.—Cases of lunacy, of epilepsy combined with insanity and perhaps those allied with idiocy, and others generally described as instances of demonic possession are given in the Gospels, and are to be recognized as having a twofold causation, on the one side physical, on the other psychical; and the problem as to which of these is primary in any particular case is not to be lightly determined. In this connection arises the outstanding question as to the possibility of a genuine spiritual possession (see art. LUNATIC), a matter which may well remain with us for some time yet as a challenge both to medical and to theological investigation. The science of anthropology may throw much light upon it, and possibly in the course of further inquiry some of the conclusions of that science may be found in need of serious modification.

DISH.—1. The only place in the NT (EV) where this word is found is in the record of the betrayal of Jesus given by two of the Synoptists (Mt 26<sup>23</sup>, Mk 14<sup>20</sup>).

The form of the Greek equivalent (τροπέλιον, Vulg. catinum [Mk 14<sup>20</sup>], but in Mt 26<sup>23</sup> Vulg. has paropos, for which see below) is that of a diminutive, although there is no example of a cognate or simpler form (see Liddell and Scott, s.v.). With it we may compare the diminutive ψωμίον (Jn 13<sup>27</sup>) in the latest Apostolic account of the same period of Jesus' life. The use of this word, as well as of another (μαζάρτιον) occurring in the same context, by these two authors would seem to prove beyond doubt a close literary relationship between their writings—not, indeed, a relationship of direct inter-dependence (cf. Wright's Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek, p. 140), but rather one of common dependence upon the same or kindred sources oral or written (cf. the 'anonymous fragment' μῆτρι ἐν τῷ τῆμα, μαζάρτιον; Mt 26<sup>23</sup>).

A comparative study of the four records which tell of Jesus' reference to His impending betrayal brings to light some not unimportant minor differences, and at the same time reveals the agreement of all the writers in the belief that He knew of the intentions of Judas, and warned the latter against the dark deed. To the Markan account which makes Jesus answer the anxious question of His disciples (μῆτρι ἐν τῷ; ) by the vague statement, '(it is) one of the twelve who is (now) dipping with me in the dish,' which is equivalent to the previous ἀσπίδιον περ' ἐμοῦ (τ. 13) on this, however, cf. Gould's St. Mark, ad loc., St. Matthew not only adds a more distinct note by employing the aorist (μαζάρτιον) instead of the present Middle (μαζάρτιμενος), by which he evidently intended to convey the idea of time, but he also informs us that Jesus gave a direct affirmative reply (ἀσπίδιον) to Judas' question. On the other hand, St. Luke agrees with St. Mark in leaving out all reference to an indication of the traitor beyond the statement that one of those present at the meal (ἐν τῷ τραπέζῳ, Lk 22<sup>21</sup>) was guilty, while the author of the Fourth Gospel agrees with St. Matthew in making Jesus, by a sign (ἐκείνῳ ἔτερεν τὸ ἐπιδοπάειν τὸ ψωμίον καὶ δόξα αὐτοῦ, Jn 13<sup>26</sup>), point him out to his fellow-disciples.

One thing seems to emerge clearly from the fourfold account, there was but one τροπέλιον on the table, and each one dipped his bread into it as he ate (see O. Holtzmann's Leben Jesu, Eng. tr., p. 468). This dish contained a sour-sweet sauce (πικρῶν), which was composed of 'a cake of fruit beaten up and mingled with vinegar' (see Encyc. Bibl. art. 'Passover', § 17<sup>a</sup>; cf., however, B. Weiss' The Life of Christ, iii. p. 279). Into the sauce pieces of unleavened bread and bitter herbs were dipped and handed round by the chief person of the assembled party, which was evidently preliminary to the general partaking of the dish (cf. περ' ἐμοῦ, Mt 26<sup>23</sup> = Mk 14<sup>20</sup>). It seems that this was a custom of late introduction into the Passover rite, and that it was intended to enrich the meaning of the feast by a symbolic reference to the brick-making period of Israel's Egyptian bondage (see art. 'Passover' in Hastings' DB iii. p. 691).

Most scholars have sought to establish the relative positions of Jesus and Judas at this Passover feast from the incidents referred to by all four Evangelists (cf. Edersheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, ii. pp. 493-507; art. 'Apostle John' in Hastings' DB ii. p. 681<sup>a</sup>; Farrar's Life of Christ, ii. 284 ff. etc.). The variety of conclusions arrived at shows how impossible it is to settle a question of the kind. If, indeed, opposite each τροπέλιον at the table there had been a τροπέλιον, then the answer of Jesus to His disciples' questions would show clearly that Judas reclined immediately on His left. This, however, as we have already intimated, is not probable; and the only data by which an approximately correct impression may be received lie in the words spoken by Jesus to Judas himself, and recorded partly by St. Matthew and partly by St. John (cf. Mt 26<sup>23</sup> and Jn 13<sup>27</sup>). It seems more than probable that the traitor reclined somewhere in close proximity to Jesus, that their hands met as both dipped together into the dish (cf. the use of the Middle voice by St. Mark; see Bengel's Grammon of NT on Mk 14<sup>20</sup>).

and that in this way Jesus was able to convey privately to Judas the fact that He knew of the latter's intention.

2. A very good example of the way in which the didactic sayings of Jesus were caught up and handed down by His different hearers is afforded by the Matthean and Lukan versions of the words by which He denounced the legal quibblings and Pharisaic hypocrisy of His day (Mt 23rd, Lk 11th). There is just sufficient identity both in language and sense to guarantee the genuineness of the teaching. At the same time there is a marked variety in details as to locality, wording, and even as to the particular objective of Jesus' remarks. According to St. Luke, Jesus denounces the Pharisees, while a guest in the house of one of their number, for their punctiliousness in keeping the outside of their vessels clean, their own hearts all the time being full of uncleanness. The contrast is between the outside of their utensils (τὸ ἔξωθεν . . . τῶν πιάτων) and their own inner lives or characters (τὸ εἰς ἑαυτοὺς ἴδωτε, Lk 11th). Here we may notice that the word translated 'platter' is the word used to denote the flat dish (EV 'charger') on which (ἐν τῷ πιάτῳ) the Baptist's head was sent to Herodias (Mt 14th 11 = Mk 6th 28). On the other hand, St. Matthew makes Jesus utter this discourse to 'the multitudes and to his disciples' in the Temple (Mt 23rd, cf. 24th). The denunciation is more sustained and rhetorical, as becomes the situation. When the writer comes to the contrast spoken of above, he makes Jesus institute one between the outside of the dish and its contents, looked on as the outcome of rapacity and gluttony (ἐξ ἀπαργῆς καὶ ἀσπατίας). This is again more suitable to the word he employs, which is the only place in the NT where it is found (τὸ ἔξωθεν . . . τῆς τραπέζης stands opposite to ἐσθῆς = τὸ εἶδος . . . τῆς τραπέζης, see Mt 23rd; cf., however, WH's text in Mt 23rd).

The word trapezitis was originally, in Attic Greek, used of entrées or dainties (see Liddell and Scott, s.v.). It afterwards came to be applied to the four-cornered ('quadrangulum et quadrilaterum vas,' see art. 'Mesa' in Encyc. Bibl. iii. 236, n. 1) dish in which they were served; and, lastly, it became a name for dishes generally used at table.

In both these cases of variation it is possible to see the hand of the editor carefully compiling and arranging his materials before their publication in permanent form. J. R. WILLIS.

DISPERSION (διασπορά).—The word (RV of Jn 7th, Ja 1st, 1 P 1st) is a collective term denoting either the Jews resident outside their native country, or the lands in which they lived.

1. The Pharisees and chief priests sent officers to arrest our Lord, and He told them that in a little while He would go where they could not find Him or be able to come to Him. The Jews who were present asked where He could possibly go that they could not find Him. Would He go to the 'dispersion among the Greeks' (εἰς τὴν διασπορὴν τῶν Ἑλλήνων)* and teach the Greeks? i.e. would He make the dispersed Jews a starting-point for teaching the Greeks? Narrow-minded Jews, distinct from 'the people' (ὁ λαός) of vv. 21, 22, they would not dream of defiling themselves by going out and mixing with Gentiles, and they sarcastically suggested that that was the only way in which Jesus could escape them.

2. It is unnecessary in this article to deal fully with the history and fortunes of the Dispersion; but a very brief sketch may be useful. In the time of Christ the Jews of the Dispersion were to be found in six main colonies: Babylonia, Egypt, Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, and Rome.

(a) Babylonia.—The Jews in the far East were the descendants of those who remained when small bodies returned under Zerubbabel and Ezra. And their numbers were afterwards increased by a transportation of Jews to Babylonia and Hyrcania under Artaxerxes III. Ochus (358-338). Many have thought that 1 P 5th refers to a community of Christians among the Jews in Babylonia; but this is improbable (see Hort, 1 Peter, pp. 5 f., 167-170). From Babylonia, Jews moved in many directions to Elam (cf. Is 11th), Persia, Media, Armenia, and Cappadocia. The Babylonian Jews were the only portion of the Diaspora which maintained its Judaism more or less untouched by the Hellenism which permeated the West. Their remoteness, however, did not prevent the loyal payment of the annual Temple-tax, which was collected at Nehardea, and Nisibis and sent to Jerusalem (see below).

(b) Egypt.—Jews had migrated to Egypt as early as 586, when Johanan son of Kareah conducted a small body of them, including Jeremiah, to Tahpanhes (Jer 42, 43). Jews also settled (Jer 44) in Migdol, Noph (Memphis), and Pachtos (Upper Egypt). The great majority of the colonists in Alexandria must have settled there early in the period of the Ptolemies, in which case they may have been among the earliest inhabitants of Alexander's new city; and they undoubtedly received special privileges (Jos. c. Apion, ii. 4; BJ ii. xviii. f.). The kindness which they received in Palestine from Ptolemy I. Soter induced numbers of them to migrate to Egypt during his reign. And many more may have been transported as prisoners of war during the subsequent struggles between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids. Philo (in Placc., ed. Mangey, ii. 525) less than ten years after our Lord's death says that two entire quarters of Alexandria were known as 'the Jewish,' and many more Jews were sprinkled over the rest of the city. Another congregation of Jews was formed at Leontopolis in the nome of Heliopolis on the Eastern border of the Nile delta. The high priest Onias, son of Simon the Just, was granted permission by Ptolemy VI. Philometor to settle there when he fled with some adherents in 173 or 170 from his enemies Antiochus IV. Epiphanes and the sons of Tobias. He built a fortress, and within it a temple where the worship of Jehovah was carried on. This continued till A.D. 73, when the temple was destroyed by order of Vespasian (Jos. Ant. xiii. iii. 2, xiv. viii. 1; BJ i. ix. 4, vii. x. 2-4).

(c) Syria.—The Egyptian Diaspora had been formed largely owing to the increased facilities for travel and intercourse resulting from Alexander's conquests. And the same causes operated in Syria. Damascus had received Israelite colonists in very early times (1 K 20th). In Nero's reign there were, according to Josephus (BJ ii. xx. 2), no fewer than 10,000 Jews in the city. Antiochus IV. Epiphanes conceded to the Jews the right of free settlement in Antioch; and, owing to the successes and prestige of the Maccabees in Palestine, the neighbouring provinces of Syria received a larger admixture of Jews than any other country (BJ vii. iii. 3).

(d) Asia Minor.—Through Syria Jews passed to Asia Minor and the neighbouring islands, Cyprus, Crete, etc., where from B.C. 130 and onwards they flourished under Roman protection. See Hort, 1 Peter, Add. note, pp. 157-184, and Ac 13-20.

(e) Greece.—It is related in 1 Mac 12th that the Spartans sent a letter to the high priest Onias saying 'it hath been found in writing concerning the Spartans and the Jews that they are brethren, and that they are of the stock of Abraham.' This, though legendary, implies that there was at least an acquaintance between members of the two races. Jewish inscriptions, moreover, have been found in Greece; and there were firmly established Jewish communities in Thessalonica, Beroa, and Corinth when St. Paul visited them (Ac 17, 18).

* It is convenient to use the term, although its first known occurrence is in Orosius (Hist. i. 2, 26), A.D. 417. He speaks as though it were his own coinage: 'Asia regio vel, ut proprie dicam, Asia minor.'

(f) Rome.—The first contact of the Jews with Rome was in the time of the Maccabees; embassies were sent by Judas and Jonathan, and a formal alliance was concluded by Simon in B.C. 140 (1 Mac 14<sup>24</sup> 16<sup>24-25</sup>). A few Jews probably reached Rome as traders; but the first large settlement dates from the capture of Jerusalem by Pompey, B.C. 63. Julius and Augustus admitted them to a legal standing throughout the Empire (see the series of enactments in Jos. Ant. XIV. viii. 5, x. 1-8); the latter allowed them to form a colony on the further side of the Tiber, but they soon gained a footing within the city, and had synagogues of their own. Tiberius in A.D. 19 banished 4000 to Sardinia. In the early days of Claudius the Jewish cause was upheld at court by the two Agrippas; but before 52 'Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome' (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>)—impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes' (Suet. Claud. 25). Under Nero the Jews in Rome once more gained ground.

3. The Jews dispersed in these various settlements did not entirely cut themselves off from their national centre, Jerusalem. Even the Jews at Leontopolis, though their worship was strictly speaking schismatical, did not allow their religious separateness to quench their national feeling. They embraced Cæsar's cause in Egypt, contrary to their first impulse, because of the injunctions of Hyrcanus the high priest at Jerusalem, and Antipater the Jewish general (Jos. Ant. XIV. viii. 1; BJ I. ix. 4).

There were two important links which bound the Diaspora in all parts of the world to their mother city.

(a) The annual payment of the Temple-tax (the half-shekel or didrachm), and of other offerings. One of the privileges which they enjoyed under the Diadochi and afterwards under the Romans was that of coining their own money for sacred purposes. [It was this sacred coinage that foreign Jews were obliged to get from the money-changers in exchange for the ordinary civil money, when they came to Jerusalem for the festivals, Mt 21<sup>12</sup>, Mk 11<sup>15</sup>, Jn 2<sup>14</sup>. And it was this variety of coinage that enabled our Lord to give His absolutely simple but unanswerable decision on what the Jews thought was a dilemma; deep spiritual meaning, no doubt, underlay His words, but their surface meaning was sufficient to silence His opponents; 'Render to Cæsar the civil coin on which His image is stamped, and render to God the sacred coin which belongs to Him and His Temple worship,' Mt 22<sup>1</sup>, Mk 12<sup>17</sup>, Lk 20<sup>25</sup>]. The sacred money was collected at different centres (cf. Mt 17<sup>24</sup> οὐ τὰ δίδραχμα λαβέτωσιν) and carried under safe escort to Jerusalem (Philo, de Monarch. ii. 3). Josephus relates (Ant. XVI. vi.) that the Jews in Asia and Cyrene were ill-treated, and that the Greeks took from them their sacred money; but that decrees were issued by Augustus, Agrippa, and two proconsuls to the effect that the sacred money of the Jews was to be untouched, and that they were to be given full liberty to send it to Jerusalem. The Babylonian Jews made use of the two strong cities—Nehardea and Nisibis to store their sacred money till the time came to send it to Palestine. 'The Jews, depending on the natural strength of these places, deposited in them the half-shekel which everyone, by the custom of our country, offers to God, and as many other dedicatory offerings (אֲבֹתָא) as there were: for they made use of these cities as a treasury, whence at the proper time they were transmitted to Jerusalem' (Ant. XVIII. ix. 1). Such priestly dues as consisted of sacrificial flesh, which could not be sent to Jerusalem, were paid to any priest if there happened to be one at hand (Chullin, iv. 7-9, 11; Yadain, iv. 3; Chullin, x. 1; Terumoth, ii. 4).

(b) The pilgrimages made to Jerusalem by immense numbers of foreign Jews at the three annual festivals—Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles. Josephus says that Cestius Gallus had a census made during the Passover, and the priests reckoned 2,700,000 people (BJ VI. ix. 3), in round numbers three millions (id. II. xiv. 3).

In reading the Acts it is evident that, had there been no foreign dispersion of the Jews, the rapid progress of Christianity could not have been what it was. At the feast of Pentecost there were gathered Jews from the four quarters of the Diaspora—the far and near East, Europe, and Africa; and soon afterwards Jews received Apostolic teaching at many centres, and when converted helped to spread it throughout the known world. But it is important to remember that before that time One greater than the Apostles came, more than once, into immediate contact with the masses of pilgrims who visited Jerusalem for the festivals. As a boy of twelve He first met them (Lk 2<sup>42</sup>), and He probably attended many festivals in the 18 years which intervened before His ministry (see v. 45). At a Passover He displayed to them His Divine indignation at the desecration of God's sanctuary (Jn 2<sup>13-17</sup>), and many believed on Him when they saw His miracles (v. 23). It would seem as though the longing seized Him to bring all these thousands of foreigners to His allegiance at one stroke, by revealing to them His true nature. If we may say it reverently, it must have been a temptation to Him to send them back over many countries to tell all men that God had become man. But His own Divine intuition restrained Him (vv. 24<sup>c</sup>). Immediately before another Passover He saw the crowds moving along the road on their way to Jerusalem; and they came to Him, and He fed them (Jn 6<sup>1-13</sup>). Here, again, the temptation offered itself in their wish to make Him king; but He resisted it, and was able to persuade them to leave Him (6<sup>14</sup>). At a feast of Pentecost (so Westcott) He suddenly appeared in their midst at Jerusalem, and many believed Him to be the Messiah when they heard His preaching (Jn 7<sup>25-26-27-28-29-30-31-32</sup>). Yet again at a Passover the crowds of pilgrims gave Him another opportunity of becoming king (Mt 21<sup>1-9</sup>, Mk 11<sup>1-10</sup>, Lk 19<sup>28-29</sup>, Jn 12<sup>12-19</sup>), but He chose rather to gain His kingdom through death. It was for their benefit that the inscription upon the cross was trilingual—Aramaic, Greek, and Latin (Jn 19<sup>20</sup>). A Jew from Africa, on his way into the city, was forced to perform an office which few envied him at the time, but which has never been forgotten by the Christian Church (Mk 15<sup>7</sup>). Thus time after time the accounts of His miracles and preaching, and finally of His patient suffering and His death, and perhaps also reports of His resurrection, would be carried back by wandering Jews into 'every nation under heaven.'

4. One colony of the Diaspora possesses a special importance in connexion with Christianity. Among the Alexandrian Jews originated the Greek translation of the OT—the version used by our Lord, the Apostles, and the great majority of the early Church. It remained in almost complete supremacy among Christians until it was superseded by the Vulgate. See art. SEPTUAGINT. The importance of Alexandria in connexion with the Fourth Gospel would be enormous if the contention of some writers were true, that St. John derived his doctrine of the Logos from Alexandrian philosophy. The doctrine, however, has affinities rather with Jewish than with Alexandrian thought. The most that can be said is that St. John may have employed the term because it already had a wide currency among both Jews and Greeks (see Westcott, Gospel of St. John, pp. xv-xviii, and art. 'Logos' in Hastings' DB).

LOGOS.—Besides the authorities cited in the article, see art. 'Diaspora' in Hastings' DB (Extra Vol.), 'Dispersion' in Encyc. Bibl. (with the literature there), and in Smith's DB. Much illustrative matter may be gathered from Jewish histories, especially Schürer, HJP. See also E. R. Bevan, The House of Seleucus; J. F. Mahaffy, The Empire of the Ptolemies.

A. H. McNEILL.

DITCH (βίβλος, Mt 15<sup>14</sup>, Lk 8<sup>9</sup>; rendered 'pit' Mt 12<sup>11</sup>).—The parabolic language of our Lord in the first two parallel passages is suggested by the frequency of danger from unguarded wells, quarries, and holes. Into these the blind easily fell; and the risk increased if the leader of the blind were himself blind. The metaphor has been interpreted as referring to Gehenna; more probably it refers simply to danger of hurt, or even ruin, from wilful or careless perversion of the truth leading to moral wandering and fall. For the idea, cf. Pr 19<sup>27</sup> 'Cease, my son, to hear the instruction that causeth to err,' and St. Paul's taunt of the Jew as 'a guide of the blind' (Ro 2<sup>14</sup>). R. MACPHERSON.

DIVES.—The Latin adjective for 'rich,' commonly employed as a quasi-proper name for the rich man in our Lord's parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>). This use of the word Dives, derived, no doubt, from the Vulgate, is common in English literature, and can be traced back at least to the time of Chaucer, who, in The Summoner's Tale, lines 169, 170, says:

'Lazar and Dives l'iveden diversly,
And dives gerdoun hadden they ther-by.'

Compare also Piers the Plowman, passus xvi. lines 303, 304:

'And Dives in his deyntes lyuede
And now he buyeth his ful bifere' he is a beggers of helle.'

Although we are not concerned in this article with the interpretation of the parable as a whole, we may yet appropriately refer to the various opinions which have been held as to who was intended by our Lord under the figure of the rich man.

The noticeable circumstances that in this alone of all His parables our Lord names one of the characters, i.e. Lazarus, while the other chief character, the rich man, is significantly nameless, and that the parable has no prefatory introduction, such as 'He spake another parable,' or the like, have given rise to the conjecture that this is not a parable pure and simple, but that it is either a narrative of facts, or that persons more or less known are alluded to in the story.

1. Some, as Tertullian and Schleiermacher, have supposed that in Dives allusion was made to Herod Antipas, and that Lazarus represents John the Baptist, who is referred to in v. 24, cf. also v. 18, where our Lord speaks about adultery. This, however, is surely an extravagant notion which scarcely needs refutation.

2. Another equally improbable suggestion, put forward by Michaelis, is that Dives represents Caiaphas, son-in-law of Annas, and that Lazarus is Christ; and so the five brethren of the rich man are explained as the five sons of Annas (Jos. Ant. xx. ix. 1).

3. Closely connected with this opinion is another which has the support of Ambrose, Augustine, Teelman (quoted by Trench, Parables), and others, according to which, while Lazarus is Christ, Dives is the Jewish people who despised and rejected

Him who for their sakes was poor and afflicted. This, however, is an allegorizing of the parable which, though attractive at first sight, will not bear close examination.

4. Another interpretation, supported by Aphraates, Augustine (as an alternative), Gregory the Great, and Theophylact, and widely held in all sections of the Universal Church, is, that Dives represents, as in the last case, the Jewish people, but that Lazarus represents the Gentiles. Bleek, Godet, and Alford reject this view, the two latter saying that the very name Lazarus (i.e. a Jewish name) is against it. Yet, though not the primary, this may be a true application of the parable, and is not lightly to be set aside.

5. According to a tradition alluded to by Theophylact and Euthymius Zigabenus, Dives and Lazarus were actual persons known at the time, and our Lord, while honouring the poor man by naming him, passes over the guilty rich man's name in merciful silence.

6. The interpretation which best suits all the facts of the case is, that the rich man is a typical instance of the religious leaders of the people, Pharisees and Sadducees, and that Lazarus is a representative of the despised publicans, or of the neglected 'common people.' If this is the primary significance of Dives and Lazarus, then we can see, as stated above, that interpretation 4 is not lightly to be set aside; for if Pharisees and Sadducees despised and neglected those of their own nation, much more would they contemptuously overlook 'sinners of the Gentiles.' Under this head it has been debated whether Dives is a typical Pharisee or a Sadducee. Didon (Life of Christ), Mosheim, and Wetstein hold that he is a Sadducee, since the Pharisees were not characterized by luxurious living or by unbelief; but if, with the majority of expositors, who say that the connexion of the parable with what precedes requires it, we hold him to be a Pharisee, he is at least a Pharisee who, as Stier says, 'lives as a Sadducee.'

As to the special sin of Dives, opinions have differed. All, however, concur in pointing out that he is not accused of any positive crime,—his sin is negative. It may be, indeed, that our Lord in the parable glances back at what is said in vv. 12-16; yet Dives' chief sin most evidently was that he left undone the things which he ought to have done. He is an instance, in fact, of one who did not make to himself friends of the mammon of unrighteousness. Doubtless the cause of this was his virtual unbelief in a kingdom of God here implying a brotherhood of all men, and a kingdom of God hereafter implying a retribution.

Euthymius says that some asserted that, according to a tradition, the rich man was called Ninevis; and Tischendorf (Gr. Text. in loc.) quotes a scholion εἰς τὴν διὰ τῆς κατὰ τὸν εὐαγγέλιον τῆς ἀποστολῆς Νινυθίου Νινυθίου. Further, the Sahidic Version adds the mention of the rich man: 'whose name was Nineue.' It has, however, been suggested (Rendel Harris, Expositor, March 1900) that this name may have been evolved from the words 'his dives,' or 'en dives,' accompanying some ancient pictorial representation of the parable. Harnack (ib.), however, has thought that the word may be a corruption of Φινεῖς (Phineus in pseudo-Cyprian, de Pascha Computus, c. 17), and 'that since in Nu 25<sup>1</sup> Phinehas is said to be the son of Eleazar, an attempt has been made to suggest that the poor man . . . was the rich man's own father.' See art. LAZARUS.

I. PRELIMINARY CONSIDERATIONS.—4. The mystery of Christ.—The historic question of Jesus to His disciples, 'Who do men say that I the Son of Man am?' (Mt 16<sup>13</sup>, Mk 8<sup>27</sup>, Lk 9<sup>18</sup>), was put not to confound, but to reveal, by awakening the desire for knowledge. The intelligent answer to the question preserves the precious truth, which is nothing less than God's age-long secret about Himself. The disciples had been nurtured on a religious literature in which the whole national and individual future was seen blending in one anticipation, the coming of God to His people to deliver and save. One like the Son of Man comes, and there is given to Him dominion and glory and a kingdom which shall not pass away. This was the figure in which the Jewish imagination clothed the Jewish hope. Modern criticism dwells upon the factors in history which determined the form in which this hope took shape. The Hebrew religion, we are assured, was wrought out under constant pressure of disaster. It was the religion of a proud, brave people, who were constantly held in subjection to foreign conquerors. Hence came a quality of intense hostility to those tyrannous foes, and also a constant appeal to the Divine Power to declare itself. The hostility and the appeal inspire the Messianic Hope. Was there nothing more? Surely behind the history and the imagination lay elemental forces of the soul. What lend essential and abiding worth both to the Hebrew hostility to Gentile oppression and the Hebrew appeal to Jehovah's righteous right hand are a faith and a passion which, if quickened into power by the vicissitudes of history, were themselves underived from history, and native to the spirit of the nation. Nor in this high conviction do the Hebrews stand alone. Everywhere, wherever thought has advanced sufficiently near its Object, it has come to a yearning, at times poignant, for closer contact. The numerous idolatries of the lower religions are simply the objectification of this desire. The no less numerous conceptions of Divinity in more cultured peoples are due to the same stress. There has been a ceaseless demand of the human race for an embodiment of Deity. The demand is a product of the hungry human heart for closer communion with God and larger loyalty to Him.

The existence of an instinct so universal is the guarantee of its fulfilment. The two considerations, that the Hebrew race had worked out the conception of the Messiah, and that the ethnic peoples were quite familiar with Divine incarnations, processes both present admittedly to the mind of the Early Church, furnish no evidence to the contrary. In themselves they prove nothing against a true Incarnation historically manifested, if it can be shown that its historical manifestation is not wholly traceable to naturalistic origins in the Hebrew and ethnic genius. The presence, in particular, of many myths parallel to the Christian story need not mean that the Christian story is itself a myth. As has been well said, 'If the Christian God really made the human race, would not the human race tend to rumours and perversions of the Christian God? If the centre of our life is a certain fact, would not people far from the centre have a muddled version of the fact? If we are so made that a Son of God must deliver us, is it odd that Patagonians (and others) should dream of a Son of God?' (Chesterton, Religious Doubts of Democracy, p. 18). False beliefs live by the true elements within them. A persistent belief occurring in many false forms is likely to be true, and may reasonably be expected to occur in a true form. Each redeemer of heathenism is a prophetic anticipation of the satisfying of human desires in Jesus Christ, precisely as the Messianic disclosures of the OT were to the people of whom according to the flesh He came. They are anticipations only: since neither the pagan foregleams nor the Hebrew forecasts offered sufficient data for a complete or consistent delineation of an actual Person.* The earlier experiences of men made the gospel intelligible, but they had no power to produce it. It satisfies and crowns them, but does not grow out of them. The Person, when He came, did more than satisfy the old instinct by which men had hope, He reinforced and extended it: His advent not only accomplished the past promise, it gave earnest of greater things to come. He thus represented human ideals indeed, but still more Divine ideas. The highest prophecies of His appearance reveal, amid the circumstantial details, the element of mystery; that mystery is not eliminated when the Life appears. It is the singular significance of Jesus Christ that both in the anticipations of Him and in His actual appearance the details always lead on to inquiry as to what is not detailed, the facts to something beyond themselves; the Man and His words and works to the question 'Who is He? and Whence is this Man?'

2. The movement 'Back to Christ.'—The question is prominently before the present age. The modern mind asks it with revived interest. Modern knowledge in its several departments of philosophy, history, science, has developed along lines and in obedience to principles which appear able to dispense with the old theistic axioms. God and Conscience are not so vividly active. And yet, on the other hand, the ancient instinct of the race for communion with God is assertive as ever. It turns for comfort almost exclusively to the Christian tradition. The Christian tradition, however, it is convinced, needs revision; and here the central necessity is the treatment and true understanding of the Person of Christ. The cry is 'Back to Christ.' It is a cry dear to all who desire a simpler gospel than that set forth in the Creeds; all who are wearied with speculation on the elements of Christian truth, or are distraught with the variety of interpretation offered of it; all who are eager to embrace the ethics and as eager to abjure what they term the metaphysics of the Christian system. The movement referred to is natural; and its plea so plausible as to merit attention. The aim is nothing short of recovering the image of the original Founder of the Faith, expressed in His authentic words and acts; to bring back in all the distinct lineaments of a living Personality the great Teacher whom we now see in the Gospels 'as through a glass darkly.' It seeks by a study of the original records in the light of all the historical and critical aids now open to us, and guided by the modern idea of evolution, not only to bring us face to face with Jesus of Nazareth, to listen to His direct words of wisdom, but to trace all the steps of His spiritual advance, all the steps by which He grew into the Messiah of Israel and the Ideal of humanity, giving the deepest interpretation to the prophetic dream of His nation.

* Cf. Westcott, Gospel of Life, pp. 236-237.

and so lifting it into that higher region in which the freely accepted Cross became the necessary means to the deliverance of man. The 'Jesus of history,' it is argued, has been buried in the 'Christ of dogma'; the Church in handing down the Saviour has presented Him with adoring hands and in idealized form. The more we throw off her encrustments, the nearer we get to the original, the nearer we are getting to the real Jesus, and, in Him, to the truth of our religion.

However natural the hope of such minds, it is based on illusion. It proceeds on erroneous ideas as to what we may learn from the past. 'What has been done,' says the adage, 'even the gods themselves cannot make undone.' All that historical reverions can do is to suggest that in the onward movement something precious has been left behind which it were well to recover before going further. There is no such Christ, no such Christianity in the first century as is sought for: a Christ and a Christianity purely invariable and true for all time and in every place. That is a conception which, the more it is studied, the more it will be found to be a pure abstraction to which no concrete in rerum natura corresponds. The absolute value of the Christian Faith, the real stature of the Christ, cannot be established by merely dropping the historical surroundings or setting of the traditional truth. The old truth that lived spiritually in the minds of those who first livingly apprehended it, and that, as it were, was the Christian historical process, has to be caught up again, realized in its essential vitality, and formulated anew in harmony with the modern spirit. We have to ask, Was the Christian Idea given in itself apart, in isolation, abstractly, and may this, as the 'essence, substance, or soul of the gospel, be rediscovered? Or, on the contrary, was the Christian Idea planted as a Life in a company of believers who manifested its power in their lives, so that it cannot be reduced to an invariable essence except by an unreal process of abstraction? Cf., further, art. BACK TO CHRIST.

3. Certain results of the movement.—The effort to 'rediscover Christ' (the phrase is Dr. Fairbairn's) is important less in its avowed aim than in its subsidiary results. Through them it yields a real contribution to theological progress. We proceed to indicate three such results: (1) a new idea of the nature of Christian doctrine; (2) the insistence on the distinction between primary and variable elements in doctrines; (3) the deepened consciousness of the extent of variation.

(1) The same divines who have busied themselves in the search for the Christ of history have been instrumental in exhibiting Christian thought on His Person as a process. In that sphere of thought they have rigorously applied the idea of development, not indeed for the first time (since John Henry Newman, fifteen years before Darwin's Origin of Species was published, had fascinated their fathers by his use of the idea), but with a more thorough insight than Newman, and with better tests, furnishing in consequence widely different results from his. They are enabled to distinguish between Creed and Doctrine, between articles of faith and the whole process of reflexion, even of a conflicting character, by which articles of faith are reached and defined. By them interest is transferred from the result to the process. The forces entering into the process are minutely analyzed. It is discovered that theology has a history; that its history is mixed up with general history; that it has been moulded by a vast deal external to the subject-matter of theology; and not only so, but even, as some (notably Harnack) contend, has been substantially and in its inner essence modified, if not perverted, in the process.

It is seen that Christian dogmas were once inchoate; passed through many stages under influences social, political, intellectual; and that they have a constant tendency so to do in adapting themselves to their environment—that, in short, they are not dead formulas, but a living organism.

(2) The emergence of so many factors merely accidental has brought into clearer perspective the reality immanent in the process. Besides the soil and the influences on growth, there is the seed, the Divine Truth on which human thought and earthly event exercised themselves. It is traceable to the teaching and life of Jesus and His Apostles. Only fragments of His utterances have been preserved to us, but the brief discourses and conversations that we read in the Gospels stand unique in spiritual power among the utterances of the world. They represent a large body of teaching, lost to us in form but preserved in its fruits; for out of His spiritual wealth there poured throughout His ministry an abundance of spoken truth that remained to perpetuate His influence and serve as the foundation of Christian doctrine. Together with His life they formed and still form Truth, not simply in a definite invariable quantity, but as a constant fountain and source of truth, ever open and flowing for them who believe. He gave a new light on all things to men; and by an inevitable necessity they proceeded to apply, and still must apply, what He has shown, to the interpretation of all they thought and knew. Thus Christian doctrine bases itself ultimately on two sources: (a) the Facts as to Christ's teaching and life; and (b) the Experience of believers in Him interpreting life and its problems in the light of those facts. Christian doctrine has grown up as a vital thing in the soil of actual life; in the experience of Christian living; Jesus generated among men and lived and taught. He gave the Truth by what He was, by what He said, by what He did. Words, Works, Personality: all preached. This rich and various utterance fell into the hearing and the hearts of men and women who became His followers. Into their very being it entered with transforming power, making them 'new creatures.' By and by it filtered through their minds and life, and expressed itself in the form which their own experience gave to it. It is this reproduction of the truth Jesus brought that constitutes Christian doctrine. Its fundamental elements are to be kept clearly in view—viz. the Christian Facts and the Experience of Believers.

(3) The origin of variation in doctrinal belief immediately becomes manifest. Believing experience cannot be expected to be invariable. Still less the expression of experience. Variety of views enters. There are differences of mind, of education, of disposition and degrees of sympathy, of ability to apprehend and explain: differences all of them, when given free scope, likely to lead to mixed results. Present-day religious thought is profoundly impressed with the fact and with the necessity of it. And if in consequence the theological mind is infected with a certain sense of insecurity, there is compensation in the new breath of freedom. Obviously it is gain to be able to review the doctrinal process and results of the past, to disentangle the Divine Truth from its temporary formulation, and to elaborate it anew in such wise as will subserve the highest interests of men to-day, as well as do justice to its own ever fresh wealth of content. (Cf. the interesting exposition in Dr. Newton Clarke's What shall we think of Christianity? Lect. II.)

II. BASES OF CHRISTOLOGICAL BELIEF.—1. Primarily a new experience.—The new methods found early application to the doctrine of Christ's Person. That doctrine is central in the Christian system. It is by Christ, His Person and Work, that salvation is mediated. Historically and experimentally the Church learned it so. A study of the NT and of the two subsequent centuries is chiefly a study of one great fact or truth, to the understanding and interpreting of which the mind and life of the period were devoted, and devoted with absorbing interest—the Person of Christ. That problem soon became at once the impulse and the starting-point of an entire science of God, of man, and of the essential and final relation between God and man. But primarily the question at issue was simply that of His Person. It was provoked by Christ's own questions and by His claims. Its urgency was enhanced by the experience of believers. Their experience was unprecedentedly novel. Unlike that of Hebrew faith, its ground was individual and personal.

Its origin lay in the revolutionary impression His presence created in the heart, an impression which came as a thing incomparable, and remained as the most precious fact of life. It grew as a new power in the soul to resist and overcome sin, assuring not the promise only but the potency of real holiness, imparting to the latent faculties of the changing heart an increasing plenitude of spiritual force making for righteousness. Concurrently with this feature in the new experience went another, or two others. Awakened by the sense of power in the inner life imparted by Christ, men came to understand what the evil is from which God seeks to save them, and what the good is which He seeks to impart to them. In Christ moral goodness, the righteousness of God, laid its inexorable claims upon man's life, determining feelings and shaping resolutions as does the real entrance of God into our hearts. The impression of Christ was thus seen to be the power of God. A further step was won when reflexion forced forward the question how it could be so, in what mode the nature of Christ's Person must be regarded in the light of the above experiences. But the root of the matter was reached when the fact was realized that the more the strength of His character overwhelmed them, the more undeniable was made the reality of God to them. That was reached, however, at the very outset. It was the primary conviction which entitled to the name of believer, and confession of it meant salvation. It formed the fundamental basis of Christological belief. Jesus comes acting on human hearts with winsome gentleness, with a soul-moving sorrow for sin, and with a great enabling power. The high demands He brings raise no fear, for He who demands approaches with the means of fulfilling, which He is ready to impart. Herein rests the real originality of His message, by which His gospel differentiates itself from all other religions on the one hand, and from all merely philosophical or ethical Idealisms on the other; in virtue of which also all interpretations of His Person on humanitarian lines prove inadequate. On this point a clear understanding is indispensable. It is to be insisted that the 'Christ of History' and the 'Christ of Experience' were not separable to the mind of the disciples; they were one and indivisible. Their Christ is not the Teaching of Jesus alone, or His Works alone; or both together alone, but both together along with what they revealed regarding the inner life of Jesus, and what they created in the inner life of believers. It is impossible to separate the last from the first. It is illegitimate to seek to resolve it into a creation of the religious idealizing faculty of believers in Him. The thought of the Apostles consciously felt itself engaged not in evolving dreams and speculations of its own, but in striving to receive and appreciate a truth which was before, above, independent of them. By no single fact in His biography does His message, in this view, stand or fall, but by Himself whom the facts reveal; the facts come embedded, and are vital because thus embedded, in one cardinal fact, Himself. He came to them not as a prophet, although He had much in common with the prophets; nor as a culture-hero, the offspring of spiritual imagination; but as an inner force of life absolutely unique; an inner experience in which God entered into their hearts in a manner heretofore unparalleled, being borne in on them rather than presented to their imitation, leavening them practically with Himself, and demonstratively in such a way that henceforth to their very existence in God, He, the Revealer, must belong. In the NT we move amid scenes where the common has been broken up by vast events. God from the Unseen has struck into history a fresh note, and a new era has opened. The whole suggestion is of possibilities and resources waiting to be disclosed. (Cf. Wernle, Beginnings of Christianity.) The beginning of Christianity is neither a theological idea nor a moral precept; it is an experience of a Fact, the Fact of Christ, revealing and imparting the life of God.

The impression Christ made on those who saw and heard Him is a solid fact which no criticism can upset. Is it possible to get behind this fact? The effort is strenuously made by many. What was He who produced the impression reported in the Gospels? Better still, What was He who produced not this or that impression, but the resultant of actual and permanent impressions which He has made upon the world? In seeking an answer, historical and critical research has been lavished on every aspect of the question. Christ's teaching, career, personality, have been studied as never before. The result is that He is better known to us than to any previous age. It is at the same time being increasingly felt that a naturalistic reconstruction of His life is not possible. Candid students of the anti-supernaturalist camps (e.g., in history, Keim [Jesus of Nazara]; in philosophy, Ed. Caird [Evolution of Religion]; in science, Sir Oliver Lodge [Hilbert Journal, III. i.] and Prof. James [Varieties of Religious Experience]) practically confess the failure of past attempts, and succeed in evading the postulate of Divinity only by attributing to the human life so ample a magnificence as to make it embrace all that Christian thought understands by Divinity. The new rationalism shows how decidedly the old materialism has spent its force. Of special interest is its frank recognition of the presence and vitality of experiences on which hitherto naturalism has set taboo. The more the new criticism endeavours to revivify the dead past and live over again the life of the disciples who enjoyed the personal communion of Christ, the more it sees it must combine in itself all the qualifications necessary for seeing and understanding all that He really was. This conviction, however, involves the finding of a place for criteria for the adjudging of Christ, specifically extra-naturalistic, but not extra-scientific, and spiritual; and where this happens without prepossession, the irresistible sense of Christ's transcendence impresses. His mystery remains (cf. Contentio Veritatis, Essay II.; also Rashdall, Doctrine and Development, v. and vi.).

2. Analysis of the experience.—But if we cannot go behind the fact in the sense of reaching something more ultimate, we may analyze its elements. It will be found in content to comprise at least four constituents: His teaching and works; His growing consciousness of His own nature; His response to prophetic promise; His appeal to deeper personality.

(a) Of these the most obvious is the third, the contemporary conviction of His Messianic dignity. "That Jesus is the Christ" is one of the dominating ideas of the Gospels and Epistles. More than one recent writer (Martineau, Meinhold, Wrede, etc.) have sought to show that Jesus did not accept the title of Messiah; but not even these deny its attribution to Him by the disciples, and that as their main view of His Person. Careful analysis indicates that in whatever respects the Synoptics differ in their representations,—and they are not absolutely harmonious,—they yet represent a general agreement of view, and set forth what the primitive belief was. In that belief Jesus stands forth as Messiah, Himself accepting as appropriate what they attribute; a sublime figure, not merely human, or exalted to Messiahship only by self-mastery and self-dedication, but by peculiar nature and special appointment. The endeavour to reduce the Evangelic description of Messiah to human dimensions is ludicrously inadequate to the facts. If it be the case that His disciples 'caressed Him in the most familiar manner as a fellow-human being' (Crooker, NT Views of Jesus, p. 25), the statement is crudely one-sided, since the familiar fellowship He vouchsafed, as is very evident, is but the framework of an intimate disillusionment on His part. We can trace the stages by which the higher idea was unfolded to them. It came in a series of disappointments, intended, probably, to wean them from the popular ideas of what the Messiah should be. There is first the death of the Baptist, the prophet of Messiah. Then there is the refusal to commit Himself to the enthusiasm of those who would have made Him a king (Jn 2<sup>4</sup> 6<sup>15</sup>). Again, Christ avoids or evades the challenge to manifest Himself to the world (Jn 7<sup>4</sup>). Lastly came the crisis, as it were, the open challenge to prove His Messiahship by a sign and legitimate His claim, a challenge refused (Lk 22<sup>27</sup> 23<sup>30</sup>). Hand in hand with this progressive disillusionment of all that was contrary to His thought in current Messianic ideas went the progressive revelation of the true Messiah,—a revelation which became at once a testing and a discipline of the character of the disciples, and an unfolding of undreamt of forces in His; so that at last they fell at His feet and worshipped, while others acknowledged Him as 'Lord and God' (Jn 20<sup>28</sup>); and still others plainly felt that He was 'ascending to the Father' (v. 7). That Jesus claimed to be the Messiah, and gave His sanction to the belief on the part of His disciples is certain* (see next sect.); no less certain (and admitted) is it that the disciples believed Him to be the Messiah. The point of importance for the present is, how the belief originated with the latter. It is a practice among many scholars to reverse the actual facts. They argue as if the belief had been first formulated and officially offered, so to speak, for their acceptance, a formal external idea taken up because it had been put forth by Jesus as a scheme in which to frame His person; in the light of which they are to regard His life and words; exercising a prodigious influence on, and lending a force to, His words and a sanctity to His person beyond that which, but for it, they could possibly have had (cf. such writers as Mackintosh, Nat. Hist. of Christ. Relig.; Percy Gardner, Historic View of NT, ch. iv.; Estlin Carpenter, First Three Gospels, chs. ii., iii.). The actual facts of Christ's career, i.e., are conformed in the NT narratives to already existing Messianic traditions. And because of this the accumulated sanctities of the old religion were laid claim to by the new, whereby the latter maintained itself in face of the opposition which it encountered at the first and found a soil prepared for its reception. The contention cannot be sustained. It may receive some countenance from the circumstance that the writers of the NT never record any fact or incident merely as fact or incident, but as part of the substance of the gospel, illustrating and conveying spiritual principles. But the very ease with which the NT method of presenting historical circumstance might be turned to account under the influence of Messianic bias becomes valuable evidence against that hypothesis. For although the NT history is presented with a bias, as bearing and bodying forth a Person, the presentation, whether that of the Synoptics, or of the Fourth Gospel, or of St. Paul and the others, cannot with any measure of success be wholly identified with or wholly summed up in that of the Messiah. The Messianic claims of Jesus may be made (as they are made) to rest on the facts; but the facts are not exhausted in those claims, even in the immensely enriched and original form in which Jesus made them. There are other portraits of Jesus in the NT besides that of Him as Messiah; and even those writers who set forth to portray Him solely as Messiah cannot be restrained from bursting through their self-imposed limits, in fidelity to the facts, and portraying Him as more than they meant. Moreover, the same writers convey to us the explicit assurance that they have not apprehended all the truth about His Person. Subsequent theology accepted the assurance, departed widely from the purely Messianic portraiture, yet claimed, and with perfect justice, that the new departures were in no sense new additions to the original Gospel, but fresh interpretations, designed to recover and vitalize truths discernible in the Gospels, but imperfectly understood by the Gospel writers.

* The inquiry into the Messiah-consciousness of Christ has led so far to little agreement. Opinions multiply. The main points under consideration are: (1) Did the Messiah idea enter into His ministry at all? (2) If it did, when? From childhood? at baptism? at some later point in His ministry? and from what causes? (3) How did He conceive of His Messiahship? Was His conception complete at first, or the subject of development? (see art. MESSIAH). Probably it is true to say that the present popular study of Christ's self-consciousness is less fruitful for the interpretation of His Person than the older method of studying His God-consciousness. His life is not so much a self-witness as a revelation of the Father.

(b) What has been adverted to finds illustration in another source of Christological idea, the self-consciousness of Jesus. In the most noteworthy discussion of this subject, that of Baldensperger (Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu), only about one half of the work is taken up with determining the sense in which Jesus regarded Himself as Messiah; the second part is devoted to other aspects arising out of His self-designations, His teaching as to the Kingdom, etc. Withal, much that cannot be excluded from Christ's self-revelation is not even touched upon. Any adequate exposition of Christ's idea of His own nature will include the following features: His interior life, His method in teaching, His moral perfection, His oneness with the Father.

(c) The true secret of Christ's life is not open. Who can ever know His intimate mind? Could He have revealed it even if He would? We know His words and deeds; we distinguish the forces He set agoing in the world's history; we venture on assertions of growth both of idea and of action in His life; but where was the source of these? or what the process? or when the great choices and decisive operations of His marvellous soul? What were the supremely triumphant and supremely terrible moments of His life? What were the events in which He 'found Himself'? His abounding energy implies a rich self-consciousness; the completest self-consciousness rests on a plenitude of interior self-relationships. That these last existed in Him we are certain. But in what manner or in obedience to what impulses, who can discern? The records give results not processes, and just at those points where our curiosity is most eager, the limitations of our power to perceive are most urgent. We see but a few things. We observe the self-indulgence of His own consciousness again and again. We have glimpses of its exercise in solitary communings with God, in a life of intercourse with men, in the collision with incident and event. Above all, we know it in its great occasions,—Baptism, Temptation, Discussion with the Doctors, Transfiguration, Agony in the Garden, Resurrection, Ascension,—all of which are equally discoveries of His nature to Himself and revelations to His disciples. Because the meaning of these events seems to lie on the surface, we must be careful not to give them a superficial reception. They must be so received when regarded as parts of a religious idea, and not, as they are, experiences of a real Person. They constitute events which were no mere form gone through to proclaim a spiritual truth to men or to certify to them by wondrous signs a new relation opened for them with God. They were not dramatic: they were as personal to Him as they are instructive for us. He did what He did because He was what He was—from a deeper necessity than any deliberate persuasion that His disciples needed this or that teaching at this or that time. These events are far from summing up His inner life. They are but flashes out of a deep darkness. They reveal a life that is really human, in constant communion with a source of sustenance beyond the human, receiving the fullness of that source and translating it into earthly relations, yet with a self-possession and self-knowledge, i.e. a consciousness differentiated and personal. But the revelation does not uncover all the secrets of that life, leaving nothing to elude or bewilder. There are reservations in the knowledge given (cf. Dale, Atonement, pp. 45, 47). And these are not to be identified with the necessary inscrutabilities inherent in all finite personality. They are the intimations of a glory in His nature which separates it from all common natures, signs that in Him there are abysses of impenetrable splendour into which finite natures may not enter, however closely they may touch.

(β) Christ's method in teaching was characteristic. He taught neither as the scribes (Mt 7<sup>29</sup>), nor as a prophet (Mt 11<sup>9</sup>). And this because of His own nature and the nature of His message. He came not as a teacher; compelling assent by the complete answer to every difficulty, silencing dispute with arguments. He was more personal and spiritual. His teaching did not profess to offer an absolute intellectual proof of itself which must convince all sufficiently intelligent persons. It claimed the belief of all men, but not on the ground of its incontrovertible evidence; on the ground rather that all men were created to be good, and to know the truth, and would know it if their perceptions were not dulled and distorted by sin. It convinced only by a process which at the same time purified. He made His message not an argument but a force.

Hence His method was both declarative and suggestive; both thought and incentive to further thought. At times He is clear and authoritative; His words are such that men may refuse them but cannot mistake them. At other times He shrouds His doctrine in parables, and, pointing to principles, leaves them to work and unfold their purport as men are found ready to receive them. This was so, because the teaching was not simply of truths but Truth, infinite, inalienable, imperishable; the fulfilment of all partial truths. His 'Verily I say' asserts His belief that it was so. The 'mind of Christ' which the teaching offers is not mere neutrality but soul, personality—back to which the teaching goes for justification. He appeals to no higher sanction than Himself. For Himself also He assumes a right to revise the law of Moses (Mt 5<sup>21</sup>), and claims authority over every individual soul (Mt 19<sup>28</sup>). For this reason it is futile to found an argument against the final and the revealed character of His message on its fragmentariness or its want of originality, futile also to limit His teaching to any detached portion of its recorded whole, e.g. the Sermon on the Mount. The fragments are numerous enough to enable us with ease to trace His mind. They form a unity which is not a new edition simply of anything preceding. That some of His thoughts and precepts were anticipated by Jewish and ethnic men of wisdom does not detract from His originality (see art. ORIGINALITY), because that consists, not in isolated truths, but in the remarkable sum of truth in which they take their appropriate and articulate place. That doctrine again explains the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount more fully than the Sermon sums up the doctrine. The method of Christ challenges reflexion and suggests as origin of His teaching His own statement 'from God' (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, Jn 7<sup>19</sup>).

(γ) What is meant by the moral perfection of Christ is at times misconceived, yet embodies a difference in His nature as compared with ordinary men that is perfectly realizable. Ullmann in a treatise of great power has made it familiar under the term 'sinlessness' (Sinlessness of Jesus, P. & P. Clark). The term has been objected to as a negative conception, the negative absence of evil, a negative difficult to prove from the limited induction available in a life of a few years. To give the conception a concrete expression may be impossible; but the term is of value as pointing to the stainless purity of Christ. His moral self-witness is in the highest degree positive.* It implies not simply the consciousness of flawless conduct, but the consciousness of perfect character as well as the assurance of power to create in others perfect character. Man may fail to meet his moral obligation in three ways: by falling short of his ideal of duty, by forming lower ideals than he ought, by direct transgression. And the witness of the ordinary conscience is that man has failed in all three, and has reason to fear God. The peculiarity of Christ's moral life is that all suspicion of this is wholly absent. He never confesses sin. He never fears any consequences of His acts either from God or from men. He seeks forgiveness, but only for others. He dreads sin, but not for Himself. He claims to be apart from it. He gives the impression of breathing an atmosphere in which sin cannot be. He is possessed with a holy energy, constant and powerful. Yet His moral life finds exercise not in abstracts but within conditions of earthly existence. He fought His way through those experiences which make goodness difficult. For this reason His goodness is both provable and imitable. The crux of the proof must rest less in special pleading for particulars of conduct than in a central view of His moral personality. Particulars have been contested. He has been charged with harshness to His mother (Jn 2<sup>4</sup>); with petulance

* The passage, 'Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one, that is God' (Mt 10<sup>18</sup> ff.), is still a difficult question of criticism and interpretation. That it is a self-deprecatory word is the least tenable explanation. That, as a self-deprecatory saying it is the only certainly authentic word of Christ with reference to His moral nature (Schmidel, Ensep. Bib. ii. 1881), is perverse (cf. Marcus Dods, The Bible, its Origin and Nature, p. 205).

(Lk 2<sup>9</sup>); with brusque contempt (Mt 7<sup>5</sup>); with discourtesy and personal bitterness (Lk 11<sup>27-28</sup>); with violation of property rights (Mk 5<sup>12-14, 16</sup>); with underrating family duty and affection (Mt 10<sup>37</sup>, Lk 14<sup>26, 28</sup>); with defective and impracticable theories as to civic virtue, wealth, almsgiving, non-resistance, etc. (For these and others cf. such writers as Voysey, Dole, Philip Sidney, Goldwin Smith, and the tendency of younger Unitarians). Charges on particulars cannot be met except in the light of character. The above are all defensible consistently with the character of Jesus as that character appears in the record. Nor need we resort to the plea (Martineau) that the blemishes are due to the fault of the delineators. Christ's moral nature is a unity. It is a unity in virtue of that principle by which He knew Himself to be always doing the will of God. He knew Himself to be in the activity of spirit and will what God in nature gave Him to become. In this respect He felt Himself solitary among men, and acted on the feeling. His perfection thus consists, first, not in any completeness of precepts given or concrete relations sustained in conduct—these flow from it; but in the possession of that spirit and of those principles which not only supply all due regulation as occasion requires, but give unity, consistency, and purity to the moral life. In the light of this consideration we argue for His constant maintenance of moral supremacy in particular acts. His moral consciousness penetrated all His thought and feeling, and all expressions of both. It was the secret, further, of His power over sin, both in the world (cosmic) and in man: His power 'to overthrow sin' and 'to forgive sins.' He did not disregard sin. He inherited the teaching of His race as to sin, a teaching characteristically striking and comprehensive. He appropriates all its truth, and develops it in His own original spirit. He did this just because He was so pure. Sin was the haunting dread of His days. In meeting its malign force and subduing it, He broke His life. Against it He put forth all His strength, and in so doing rose to the fulness of stature we know, 'being raised up by God to his right hand.' More by what He did against sin than by what He declared of sin or of His own goodness did He prove His sinlessness. He did what He was. His presence raised the disciples, as His story raises us, to a level which, like Him, knows no sin (1 Jn 3<sup>6, 9</sup>).

(3) His equality with God* connects itself chiefly (in the Synoptics) with the thought of His sinlessness and His power to forgive sins (Mt 9<sup>1-6</sup>, Mk 2<sup>10</sup>, Lk 5<sup>20-22</sup>). Less unquestioned is Mt 28<sup>18</sup>, where He includes Himself in the unity of the Divine name). St. John's Gospel is full of the idea (5<sup>21</sup>, 8<sup>38-39</sup>, 8<sup>42-46</sup>, 9<sup>24</sup>, 10<sup>11</sup>, 14<sup>6-9</sup>, 15<sup>26-27</sup>), and to this point attacks have in consequence been directed with vigour (cf. in particular Martineau's Seat of Authority; and for an effective rejoinder, Forrest's Christ of History and Experience, Lect. I.).

(c) As remarkable a factor as any in the spell Christ laid on man's spirit has been His appeal to the deeper forces of personal being. There have been those whose presence seemed to lower for the time being the vitality and intelligence of those who came into contact with them, and so acted as to destroy their self-possession. Some men overawe and paralyze others who come within the field of their influence. The power of Christ acted contrariwise. It empowered. He revealed men to themselves in revealing Himself to their inner sense. In receiving Him into their hearts new powers therein arose, reserve forces showed themselves; His influence was that of reason begetting reason, love begetting love. In fellowship with Him men came to higher ideals. From Him, in fact, mankind has learned to know itself as it ought to be, and to estimate its own best possibilities. He has lifted up human aspiration more than any other. The reason of this may be found in the fact that He appealed persuasively to human instinct. To appeal to such instinct is often to create it. When a child is told a story of heroism, when rough untainted natures are softened by the beauty of tenderness seen or pictured, there is a creation of courage or gentleness where it was not before. When the instinct is quickened we know that it is native. The movement Christ initiated has proved of unrivalled creativeness in the history of human instinct and in every direction of human activity. 'The idea of Jesus is the illumination and inspiration of existence' (Phillips Brooks, whose Bohlen Lectures, 1879, are an eloquent exposition of Christ's creative influence, in moral, social, intellectual, emotional life). The first perception of this fact glows through the NT writings; not one of the writers fails to make us understand that the One he writes about is One who has opened new powers in, and disclosed new horizons to, his own soul. This is their witness—a witness corroborated by every succeeding age—that He called them, and in communion with Him, He made them 'a new creation,' disciplining and elevating character, calling out a higher faith, creating new founder emotions, inspiring with ever-increasing reverence, and bringing into play those higher and more creative faculties of the soul that see the things of God in a wide perspective impossible to the reason.

(d) The specialities of Christ's teaching and works may be briefly indicated. Their speciality has been challenged. The opinion of a recent Gifford lecturer is shared by many, that 'it is difficult, if not impossible, to select any special article of religious faith which is in its general aspect a doctrine peculiar to Christianity. Its uniqueness lies rather in what some would call the personality of the founder' (Wallace, Lectures, iii.). That is true; but its suggestion is not true, that there is no uniqueness in the teaching of Christ. The uniqueness of the Teacher draws with it uniqueness in the teaching; and that both in its method (see above) and in its substance. Similarly His works exhibit higher potency than the ordinary human. A strong feeling to this effect is resulting from the minute analysis which at the present time both the 'Words' and the 'Miracles' are undergoing (cf. Wendt, Teaching of Jesus; Dalman, Words of Jesus, et al.). His dependence on others, His anticipations by others, are less confidently asserted. It is difficult, if not impossible, to discover any form of Gentile culture which is likely to have entered into the formative influences of His mind. From Greek philosophy He probably lived remote as much by natural temperament as by patriotic interest. He was not beyond its range, but then as now the Jew had a wonderful power of living in the fire without suffering the smell of it to pass upon his garments. Every Jew appeared in his own eyes to stand morally and intellectually on a higher level than the Gentile; his system of education seemed less destitute of vivifying and invigorating ideals. He was nurtured on the history, the scenery, the religion of his land, all of them of exquisite interest, stimulating the fresh mind in the highest degree to habits of independent wisdom (cf. Ramsay, Education of Christ, ch. 3). Of Jewish sects and teachers three have been suggested as contributory forces: the Pharisees, the Baptist, the Essenes. The first proved His worst foes; they had an influence, but it was solely negative. The second is remarkable for his consciousness of his own inferiority, of Christ's higher range in mission and of higher rank in Person. Of the third let Hausraath judge: 'From the Essenes His whole conception of the world separated Him.* There can be little question that the impulse to reflexion was fostered in Christ by study of the sacred books, the Law and the Prophets, under the usual Rabbinical direction. The master-words of His teaching are drawn thence. The substance of His teaching, in numerous details, is defined negatively by contrast with the comments of the scribes and positively by 'fulfilment' of the Law through a clearer discernment and profounder enrichment of the proper principles of the Law. The substance of His teaching in its main positions is intrinsically so separate from even its closest approximations in previous prophecy as to be justly entitled to the claim of originality. The source of its originality was in Himself. Christ's teaching is His own exposition of the Divine life which was revealed in Himself† (Mt 11:27). 'Out of a perfect relation with God flows His teaching like a crystal stream.' Its form is drawn from the religious vocabulary of the time; its matter from His own mind. In this connexion the following is admirably put, and meets a common objection:

'It is not enough to show that particular statements of our Lord may be found embedded in earlier writings which consist mainly of foolish superstitions and childish conceits. It would be strange indeed if, with the theories in their hands, the great teachers of Israel never said, or never uttered in pregnant phrase, any of those lofty spiritual truths which shine forth from the pages of the prophets. But if we find, on referring to contemporary literature, that such references are only like rare jewels shining among vast heaps of error and superstition, that they are only like flashes of lightning in an all-suffusing night, then their occurrence in no wise diminishes our wonder. The problem only takes another shape. How is it, we ask, that out of all this spiritual lumber the soul of Jesus only selected what was good and great, and rejected all the rest? How is it, e.g., that from the teaching of Hillel He took (if, indeed, He took anything directly thence) only what was eternally true, rejecting at the same time all the frivolous ritualism and puerile casuistry in the consideration of which Hillel spent his life? Remember again that it detracts in no wise from our Lord's claim to originality, that even His master thought had been partially or casually expressed by those who went before Him. The question to be decided in our Lord's day was this, which of all the thoughts about God that have passed through the mind of saints and prophets should become the master-thought of religion, which should condition and determine all the rest? It would not be true to say that Jesus selected one, as though He had been passing all in review and comparing them. No, the truth is that Jesus laid hold of one by His Divine intuition, in virtue of His direct insight into the nature of God' (Moorhouse, Teaching of Christ, p. 661).

When we add that Christ's teaching was given, so to speak, casually; not systematically, in no ordered or finished statement; that the whole is comparatively small, and yet that it is easy to draw up from the scattered sayings a sum of doctrine coherent, self-consistent, and completely satisfying to the needs of the soul, further cogency is lent to the witness, 'Never man so spake' (Jn 7:46), and point to the question, 'Whence hath this man this wisdom?' (Mt 13:54). See art. ORIGINALITY and UNIQUENESS.

To His words have to be added His works. His ordinary doings were those of a good man (Ac 10:38). His miracles proved a special presence of God with Him (Jn 3:3). There is a crude view of the Gospel wonders which has made many see in them an unimportant part of the Gospel story, and even feel it desirable to do without them. So long as they are looked upon as thaumaturgic signs or violations of Nature's sequence, so long will both religion and science reject them. If, however, they are considered as indications of laws which embrace and in a sense unite the seen and unseen worlds, it is of immense importance to Christianity that they should occur in connexion with the foundation of that faith. As a matter of fact, in face of all attempts to explain them or explain them away, a certain robust sense of the general mind has refused to concur in any view that denies their reality or their essential place in the history. They reveal Christ no less than His doctrine. They constitute warrants of His Divine power: they also form part of the Gospel. They stand as a real item in the list of testimonies to His impression. They are one of the modes in which His life found utterance, 'an authentic element of the original gospel offered to faith' (A. B. Bruce, Apologetics, p. 376; Miraculous Elements in Gospels, chs. vi. and viii.). In this respect they are on a different plane from the prodigies credited to pagan heroes. That men might see the will of God at work, Jesus did the works of His Father. A reckless historical scepticism evaporates the miracles partly into odd natural events, partly into nervous healings, partly into gradually growing legends. Sane criticism, however, admits their congruity with the record, their naturalness to His Person, and their value to faith. The supreme miracle of the Resurrection (wh. see) is of primary import.

* It hardly comes within the scope of this article to consider the alleged influence of Buddhism or Mithraism.
† Cf. Perowne's Hulsean Lects. pp. 93, 94.

§ Validity of the experience.—The lines thus traced converge in one picture. Their effect is striking, and of the cumulative kind. They may not produce infallible certainty of the truth of Christ's Divinity. But no infallible certainty can be given. The Christ they portray is not absolute in the sense of abstract; He is absolute in the sense of the fullest concrete; all the elements, therefore, which go to make up this impression of His Person contribute to the proof of its power: by exhibiting what He is they testify to Him: their witness is, 'This is the Son of God.'

It was men's experience of Christ as Divine that gave them the right to affirm His Divinity. Is the witness true? The contention here made is that what we know along many lines as the Christian experience is a new and distinctive development, and demands a new and unique factor introduced to the human consciousness. Is the contention verifiable? The witness is an interpretation: can we trust it? Has the impression an exact equivalent behind it of objective fact? What were the dimensions of the objective fact capable of producing this inner effect? The answer must be that the same law of rationality holds here as in other parts of knowledge. The effect must have an adequate cause. What the soul realizes as the highest in its inner feeling is proof of reality that the reason may recognize. If the soul attains the vision of a Reality whose authority over it is absolute and from whom it receives a power that masters all other powers, then it knows the meaning of God. The finality of such experience cannot be questioned, when its source is personality (personality being the only full reality of which we have knowledge), and its seat the moral disposition and not individual temperament. Now to these conditions the impression of Christ recorded in the Gospels conforms. Behind the records He stands, greater than themselves, and that by their own showing; and because of this they furnish to their readers a vision which does not fade but grows, a power that is new and permanent, a command from which the conscience cannot dissent, a mastery that sets free. He Himself had this effect on men as they companied with Him; the record of their intercourse with Him has the same effect. The effect is a fact of continuous experience fundamentally identical in kind throughout the Christian centuries. Both are the envelope that enwraps Truth transcending time and place. Only the universal and everlasting can transcend the limitations of our separateness and speak in the same manner to thousands of different souls. The phenomena of Christian history are so diverse in kind from those of other historic faiths as to require the supposition of a supernatural origin (cf. Illingworth, Personality Human and Divine, p. 200). The witness that God Himself is here stepping into the history of the race must be accounted true.

III. BEGINNINGS OF THE DOCTRINE OF CHRIST'S PERSON IN THE NT.—1. General character of the doctrine.—It has been necessary to make the above analysis of the bases of belief in Christ as presented in the Gospels and to justify it, because it is only by understanding them fully that we gain any test by which to determine the character and worth of the belief itself, or reach the point of view for appreciating aright its beginnings and its growth. It is a doctrine that has no finality. It is based on an experience which cannot rest, but must grow with the growth of all life, and pervade all other experience of life. It is a doctrine therefore that has a history down to the present, and which is destined to continue beyond the present.

We are now in the midst of a new growth of its meaning. In moving on we can purchase security only by retracing our steps, unravelling the web of the past and weaving it over again. Recurrence to the original will reinvigorate like the touch of earth to the feet of Anteus. In the first expression there is a universality which is apt to be lost in the divisions of later opinion; there is an implicitness in the beginning which is not completely represented in any subsequent stage. To that beginning we now advert. In the conviction that 'in Christ' they were 'a new creation,' 'partakers of a Divine nature' (2 Co 5<sup>7</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>4</sup>), the Apostles must seek expression of their conviction. The expression runs over into every phase of their thought and life. It breeds in them a sense of new relation to Christ akin to that felt towards God, originating a new thought of His Person. We see it in the Names they give to Him, in the Properties and Attributes they ascribe to Him, in their acceptance of wonders attending His Origin and His passing from sight, in the relations they proceed to institute between Him and previous history as well as future ages. The NT idea of His Divinity is not to be built up as an induction from these particulars; these, on the contrary, are the reflexions, inevitable and faint, of the experience of His Divinity; they are the inward seeking utterance.

It is an utterance that is quite spontaneous. It is the outcome of religious faith not of philosophic interest. The speculative instinct is wholly secondary to the spiritual facts. But while this is so, the philosophic interest is there, and that of necessity. While the Person hidden behind the life of the NT is vaster than the NT record of Him, it remains true that if that Person were to survive and His impression, they must be shown to ring true to the intellect. What happens to the emotions suggests problems to the mind. Proved facts, even those 'deep-seated in our mystic frame,' have to formulate themselves in thought. And so the moral life created by Christ furnished material for new great convictions fitted to be at once its expression and its safeguard. The doctrine of His Person was the necessary correlate of the impression of His Personality.

In the facts thus noted is to be found the answer to two inquiries of rationalism. On the one hand, it is asked, Why is He never called God? and on the other, Why such diversity of view among the writers? Take the latter first. The criticism here has been carefully made by Dr. Martineau (Seat of Authority, p. 361) and others, who urge that Jesus was construed successively into (1) the Jewish ideal or Messiah, (2) the Human ideal or Second Adam, (3) a Divine Incarnation. This construction of theories is asserted to be only a fanciful achievement of early Christian thought. 'The personal attendants of Jesus worked out the first; the Apostle of the Gentiles, the second; the school whence the Fourth Gospel proceeded, the third.' In reply it may be affirmed that such criticism holds its ground only by (a) doing violence to the facts on which it seeks to rest, by subjecting them to a narrowly subjective standard: the facts include those in which Christ is represented as accepting the name of Lord; by (b) an arbitrary application of the idea of development to the narrative. It is possible to prove the alleged constructions to have been made successively only by a series of unwarranted eliminations. The Synoptists are not without knowledge of (2) and (3), nor is (1) unknown to St. Paul and the Fourth Gospel. The facts, when viewed without prepossession, point to no such clear-cut theories. They do, however, indicate both movement and diversity of belief, changes constantly going on in the opinions respecting Christ's nature, and very material differences in individual emphasis and interpretation, a movement and diversity only less remarkable than the unmistakable unity pervading them. It was natural that men of the character and training of St. James and St. Peter should discover in OT conceptions of the Messiah approximate lines of thought wherewith to describe their experience of Christ. Temperamental and other causes led St. Paul and St. John as naturally to give representations of their experience such as they have done, the former anthropological and practical, the latter contemplative and mystical. As types these three are distinguishable, but not exclusively of each other. There are others also, as, e.g., that of the Ep. to the Hebrews, of Ephesians and Colossians, of the Apocalypse. These expressions differ among themselves, and differ in precisely the manner that is natural and desirable. The variety is that of life and reality. These all represent differences that are not separate developments of substance in the doctrine so much as precious elements constitutive of a richer fulness than any one of them or all of them; a fulness of necessary mysteriousness. They represent no signs of a struggle to assert Divinity in opposition to a bare humanity: of such a struggle there is not a trace in the NT.

As to the second point of criticism, it is possible with some reason to maintain that the term θεός is never applied to Christ. The matter is still in dispute among scholars. The crucial passages are (not taking into account Jn 1: 20<sup>30</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>19</sup>, He 1<sup>8</sup>, Ro 9<sup>5</sup>, Tit 2<sup>13</sup>, Ac 20<sup>28</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>, Ph 2<sup>6</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>1</sup>, Col 2<sup>9</sup>). In 2 P 1<sup>1</sup> the rendering, 'Our God and the Saviour Jesus Christ,' is not excluded; similarly Tit 2<sup>13</sup>. In Ro 9<sup>5</sup> the doxology may be regarded as referring to God. In 1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup> the true text is θεός; not θεός. In Ac 20<sup>28</sup> the AV reading is probably correct ('God'). Col 2<sup>9</sup>, Eph 5<sup>7</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>10</sup>, Tit 2<sup>13</sup> have been adduced as proofs that St. Paul speaks of Christ as God; but erroneously. The two strongest passages are Ph 2<sup>6</sup>, Col 2<sup>9</sup>. But if the texts are not unambiguous, that does not affect the truth of the Divinity of Christ. It was scarcely natural for a Jew to use the Divine Name in any connexion (cf. Dalman, Words of Jesus, § vii., also p. 233). If it were used, it applied to God in His absolute being. Cf. Westcott, Ep. of St. John, p. 172. God manifesting Himself in Christ was affirmed in a variety of other modes. The Apostles were not so much concerned to 'prove His Divinity' as to persuade men to accept Christ as their Saviour. The question whether He was God or not was in this view a subordinate question. They wrote about Him as they preached, in His human manifestation and in His Exalted Glory. From that point of view they neither missed the consciousness of His Godhood nor failed abundantly to declare it. The declarations they make are of One who, they were persuaded, was absolutely unique in position, in character, in work; One whose relationship to God was perfect, who was the Saviour, Light and Life of men. Are such declarations consistent with anything short of His Divinity?

2. Divine designations applied to Christ.—Of the names implying distinctiveness of nature assigned to Christ in the Gospels and Epistles, there are four of supreme import: (a) 'Son of Man,' which stands by itself; (b) 'Son of God,' with which may be set as allied in significance, 'Son of the Highest,' 'Only-begotten Son,' 'My beloved Son' (or 'My Son, my Chosen'), and 'The Son'; (c) 'Christ'; (d) 'Lord.' Others are the 'Word of God' and 'the Word'; 'Son of David,' with which may be placed 'Root and offspring of David,' and perhaps 'Prince of life' and 'Prince'; 'Saviour'; 'Image of God'; 'Second Adam'; 'First and Last'; 'The Holy, Just One.'

Son of Man.—To this title there attaches a peculiar interest, which is reflected in the amount of discussion it has excited. Controversy circles round its use, its source, its meaning. It occurs in all the four Gospels. It is the one name Christ is represented as reserving for His exclusive use. That He did so is plainly implied in the narratives.

His use of it has been denied (cf. Bruno Bauer, Volkmar, Oort, Lietmann, etc.). One of the most capable of recent critics (Wellhausen, Das Evangel. Marc.) argues that the term, if used at all by Christ, was not made current by Him but by the Christian community, and its use in the following manner. The early Christians believed that Jesus had prophesied His Parousia. They hesitated to make Him say so outright, and hence represented Him as saying only that the 'Man' of Daniel should appear with the clouds of heaven. He could say that without meaning Himself. But the Christian interpretation soon read Him into the announcement, then used the title in the prophecies of the Passion and Resurrection, and finally as a simple equivalent of the first person singular on the lips of Jesus. The position, in this and other forms, fails to account, inter alia, for two facts: (a) the term is not found in St. Paul or elsewhere in NT, but almost solely on the lips of Jesus (instances to the contrary are in 129, Ac 7:56); (b) if a coinage of the Early Church, how does it—a term denoting lowliness—harmonize with the evident endeavour to portray a glorified Christ?

The expression occurs in previous Hebrew and Aramaic literature. The references of importance are in Ezekiel, Daniel (7<sup>13</sup>), and Enoch, in all of which the Messianic significance is not indisputable (see Schmidt, art. 'Son of Man' in Encyc. Bibl., who inclines to refer even Dn 7<sup>13</sup> to Michael, not Messiah). In what sense is it to be understood? The commonly accepted view (e.g. Beyer-schlag-Weidt) may be thus stated: Christ was desirous of being recognized as the Messiah. He was not desirous of fulfilling the current expectations of what the Messiah should be and do. He therefore did not apply the current designations of Messiah to Himself, but, finding one term, 'Son of Man' (in Daniel), employed it as expressing (1) Messianic character, and (2) much more than the expected Messianic character, viz. the generically human character.

Dalman (Words of Jesus) has adduced grave considerations against this view. It is a view, he holds, started by the Greek divines, and has no basis in primitive Christian thought. He maintains that Christ adopted it from Dn 7<sup>13</sup>, and used it of Himself in its original sense, a sense which was not widely prevalent in His time as applicable to the Messiah. There 'the emphasis rather lies on the fact that in contrast with the winged lion, the devouring bear, the four-headed leopard, the fourth beast with ten horns terrible exceedingly beyond its predecessors, he appears unarmed and inoffensive, incapable through any power of his own of making himself master of the world; he is only as a son of man. If ever he is to be master of the world, God must make him so.' The 'Son of Man,' on this view, is not the son of man in the sense of being a man like other men, but as being a man distinct from other men, in the sense that God has given him to be what he is. The expression intimates less his human nature than his Divine. 'Son of Man' denotes 'that member of the human race, in his own nature impotent, whom God will make Lord of the world.'

To indicate results, it may be taken that there is a fair consensus of agreement on the following points: (a) that the use of the title, as applicable to Himself is due to Christ; (b) that a wider source than the passage in Daniel is probable; (c) that in meaning it embodies a composite conception, combining various OT suggestions, and these the most rich and salient; the seed of the woman, the one like a son of man, the suffering Servant of Jehovah, the ideal people, the recipient of special privilege, the apportioner of judgment, of celestial origin. In wealth of content the expression stands alone. It was thus peculiarly appropriate as a self-designation of Christ. In it there met the two divisions of Messianic reference, those pointing to the glory and those pointing to the humiliation of the Messiah, comprising elements seemingly incongruous and irreconcilable, yet in essentials capable of being unified in a single character. In the course of His ministry He was to manifest Himself as the conqueror of Satan, as perfect man, as concentrating His race in an intense personal life, as conscious of a special mission from God, of absolutely intimate relation to God, of perfect dependence upon God, and as sharing with God in the judgment of the world, characteristics all of them Messianic, and impossible to be included in any of the terms of Messianic intention more fully than in this, the 'Son of Man.' Its meaning on His lips goes further than even the fulness of Messianic intention; so that it is not at once intelligible ('mystifying title' of Weiss and others is not justified), a feature it shares with Him whom it designates and the hopes it unified. In it these features find place: much contemporary Messianic belief of a familiar kind; less prominent ideas that had before this time passed into the background; novel functions in Christ's conception, such as the life of the Son of Man as a life of service, and His death as necessary to redeem men; and the combination of all these in a new synthesis which was not simply a mosaic of old data or gathering up of the disparate details of earlier expectation, but which was reached by the entrance of a new thing that made the fulfilment infinitely more glorious than the promise might have seemed to warrant (cf. art. SON OF MAN).

Son of God ('the Son,' 'My Son'). This title, like the former, belongs to the OT writings, being found in Gn 6<sup>8</sup>, Ex 4<sup>22</sup>, 2 S 7<sup>14</sup>, Ps 27 82<sup>8</sup>, Job 1<sup>9</sup> 38<sup>7</sup>, Hos 1<sup>10</sup> 11<sup>1</sup>, and there applied in various connexions: to offspring of the gods, to angels, to judges, to Israel as a people serving Jehovah, to individual Israelites, to the theocratic king, to the Messiah (Dalman and others object to 'Son of God' as a Messianic title). The expression 'Son of God' (or 'My Son') occurs in the Synoptics 27 times, and 'the Son' 9 times. In St. John 'Son of God' occurs 10 times and 'the Son' 14 times. Both occur in St. John's First Epistle, in several of St. Paul's, in Hebrews, in Revelation. In the Gospels they are applied to Christ by the Father, angels, demons, Himself (rarely, and only in St. John), disciples (N.B.—St. Peter's confession, Mt 16<sup>16</sup>), elders, high priest, centurion. In determining its meaning, we may exclude the idea of pagan influence. There is little probability that the cult of the Roman emperors suggested either the word or its idea. Its application to believers (Mt 5<sup>42</sup>, Lk 6<sup>26</sup>, Eph 1<sup>5</sup>, Jn 1<sup>12</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>1-2</sup>, Ro 8<sup>14-15</sup>, Ph 2<sup>10</sup>) does not necessarily confine its import to the merely human sphere. Its previous usage in the OT could not fail to prepare the way for a connotation of special relationship to God.

That the term contains Messianic reference is contested by few. In line with it are to be explained the testimony of the demoniacs (Mt 8<sup>22</sup> || Lk 4<sup>41</sup>), and the heavenly voices at the Baptism and the Transfiguration (Mt 3<sup>17</sup> 17<sup>5</sup>). Here, too, possibly lies the reason for Christ's use of the term in debates with the Jewish leaders (Jn 3<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>36</sup>, 8<sup>40</sup>). The Messianic sense is obvious in St. Peter's confession (Mt 16<sup>16</sup>); less so in that of the centurion (Mk 15<sup>39</sup>). The answer to the high priest's question was treated as blasphemy (Mt 26<sup>68</sup>), because by it He claimed more than Messiahship. St. John's statements enhance the feeling of the Synoptists. He points clearly to Christ's use of the term and in the solitary sense. He is careful in his use of names, and would hardly put into Christ's mouth a self-designation without some warrant of sanction from His personal usage. But the Synoptists are not without traces of the same clearness. In Mt 22<sup>4-6</sup>, Mk 12<sup>28-27</sup>, Lk 20<sup>41-44</sup>, the inference is inevitable that the Messiah is the son of One more exalted than David.

What meaning did Christ attach to the term? The above passage is significant. He is not denying Davidic descent. He affirms it (see on the other side Wellhausen, Evangel. Marci). By His descent from David He satisfies one condition expected in the Messiah. That fact, however, does not preclude Him from satisfying further conditions not included in the Messianic prophecy, evincing a power in Him which points to another and higher origin. This further scope in His filial relation is intimated in such passages as Mt 11<sup>27</sup> 16<sup>17</sup>, Lk 10<sup>22</sup>, Mt 3<sup>21</sup>, Mk 4<sup>21</sup>, Lk 8<sup>16</sup>, Jn 8<sup>28</sup>, 38 15<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>4</sup> etc.). He taught the disciples to call God 'our Father,' and called God His own Father in a special sense. He asserts that He alone adequately reveals and knows God. He suggests a special sonship in the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen (Mk 12<sup>8</sup>). The double strain is present in His consciousness. He is Son in the Messianic sense. He is also Son in a Divine sense: of absolute oneness with the Father. He has the mission of the former with its dignity: He has the infallible knowledge with perfect obedience of the latter. Both features emerge in the Synoptics as in the Fourth Gospel. Both are not justly interpreted in such a sense as suggests a merely ethical relation to God, a relation which others may actually possess or are destined to attain. In them there is the basis of the ethical but of the essential as well. The Sonship of Christ is human and historical yet solitary and transcendent.

St. Paul corroborates the Evangelic positions. The earlier Epistles contain a large amount of teaching as to the Person of Christ. We have lucid references to the Sonship: 1 Th 1<sup>10</sup>, Ro 8<sup>3-32</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>4</sup>, Ro 1<sup>4</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>18</sup>, Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, Eph 4<sup>13</sup>, Ro 1<sup>4</sup>, Gal 1<sup>4</sup>, where, through the position assigned to Him on the one hand, and on the other the special Spirit dwelling in Him, equality with God is asserted and Divine functions attributed. In one passage, 2 Th 2, Christ, while not named 'Son,' is regarded in His capacity as the opponent of Antichrist as a consubstantial representative of God. This idea in another context we have in Col 1<sup>15-18</sup>, He 1<sup>3</sup> etc.

A survey of the texts reveals a complex conception, including (1) a Messianic predicate asserting the place of Christ as the complete antitype of the theocratic king; (2) an ethical identity in the realization of Divine holiness in a stainless life; (3) a spiritual unity revealing itself in a perfect harmony with the mind of God and a perfect obedience to His will, which were as much innate properties of His personality as achievements of His moral self. In addition, the conviction of His pre-existent glory* and of His cosmic agency necessitates (1) a physical descent from Deity by a creative act of the Divine Spirit (see ANNUNCIATION and VIRGIN-BIRTH); and (2) an equality of essence in virtue of which Divine acts and qualities are ascribed to Him. Cf. further, art. SON OF GOD.

Christ ('the Christ'), King of the Jews, Lord, may all be taken together. 'Christ' is the Greek equivalent of Messiah. Both words signify 'the Anointed.' While applied in the OT to prophets (Ps 105<sup>15</sup>, 1 K 19<sup>16</sup>) and high priests (Zec 4<sup>14</sup>), the name is specially identified with the kings, from the passage (Ps 2<sup>7</sup>) implying that they were under the special protection of Jehovah, and exercised righteous government. Later, when Israel had come under Gentile rule, the idea entered into the name that the Messiah would overthrow the secular might and liberate the people, i.e. be at once the Saviour of the faithful and the Prince or King of the saved. In the NT the name is accorded to Jesus everywhere. It is practically His surname, a circumstance remarkable when it is remembered that He forbade its use in His earthly life. He is greeted also as 'King' and as 'Son of David'; recognitions of Him as Messiah. That He Himself accepted the rôle appears from the following: (a) His sanction of the terms 'Son of Man' and 'Son of God' as applicable to Him; (b) His consciousness of being endowed with the Spirit of God (Lk 4<sup>18</sup>), a mark of the Messianic King (Is 11<sup>2</sup>) and of the Servant of Jehovah (Is 42 61<sup>13</sup>); (c) His self-witness as to His being the Son and Heir of God (Ps 2<sup>7</sup>); (d) His assurance of the reference in Ps 110 to Himself, where the King in Zion is in His view the Messiah; (e) He spoke of the building of the Temple in the same sense in which the Messiah is the builder of the Temple (cf. Mt 26<sup>28</sup>, Mk 14<sup>58</sup> with Zec 6<sup>12-13</sup>); (f) He spoke of His kingdom and therefore Messianic rank; (g) He described Himself as Judge of the world—a Messianic function; (h) He commended St. Peter's confession (Mt 16<sup>17</sup>); (i) He acknowledged His Messiahship before His judges (both Sanhedrin and Pilate); (j) He was put to death as 'King of the Jews.' Messiahship, it has been said, is not Divinity (Otdley, art. 'Incarnation' in Hastings' DB). True, but Messiahship as enriched by Christ is. The new features with which He fulfilled the old conception, suffering and resurrection, brought it as near Divinity as was possible for the Hebrew mind. In them was concentrated the work of salvation, always assigned in OT to Jehovah Himself, in the NT always and in all its parts assigned to Christ. The step is but a short one from the unhesitating acknowledgment of the Divinity of Christ's work to that of the Divinity of His nature.

The step is taken when He is called Lord. Christ refers to Himself as 'your Lord' (Mt 24<sup>42</sup>). There is evidence of growth in the meaning of Lordship in NT usage. Resch has shown that the name was interchangeable in instances with 'Master' and 'Rabbi.' Between that stage and the view of the Epistles that Christ is Lord over Nature, the Universe, the Church (Col 1<sup>18-19</sup>, Ph 2<sup>9</sup> etc.), there is a wide gulf. The transition was probably effected in Hellenistic circles, and aided by the use of 'Lord' as a title of the Roman Emperor and associated with the divine honours paid to him.

The Second Adam (the Man from Heaven) is a designation peculiar to St. Paul. In idea it is more speculative than the foregoing. The impulse to its construction is to be found in the Apostle's conversion through the glorified appearance of the Risen Christ on the way to Damascus. On the ground of that experience he contrasts men, as he finds them, subject to sin and death, and this man exalted over both (1 Co 15<sup>45-49</sup>, Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup>). The religious and moral destinies of the human race are traced to the action of two typical men, the first Adam, 'a living soul,' and the second Adam, 'a quickening spirit.' In so thinking, he gives an original turn to his Messianic views. The ordinary Messianic hopes of his nation he shares. He is acquainted also with the tradition of the life and teachings of Christ. But neither his intellect nor his conscience, endowed with fresh vision and power by Christ risen, could rest satisfied with those. He departs from them, but not to supersede, rather to develop. He regards Christ as the foretold of the prophets (Ro 1<sup>5</sup>), His ministry as a manifestation of the righteousness of God (2<sup>1</sup>). His death and resurrection as the fulfilment of foreshadowings in the OT Scriptures (1 Co 15<sup>3-4</sup>). He shares with the Synoptists and Acts the position that Christ is the Saviour and bringer-in of the kingdom of righteousness; with them he applies to Christ the names 'Son of God,' 'Christ,' etc., in a sense of exceptional dignity. What they had reached by a gradually increasing insight he won by the vision (Gal 1<sup>16</sup>), and from the point of view of his spiritual intuition he reads the Person of Christ. What he had seen colours all his thought, which is essentially a Christology centring in the idea of 'the Lord of Glory.' The term signified, of Christ's work, relief from the oppression and burden of sin and the law and death, with hope of regeneration for himself and all men; it signified, of Christ's Person, that He was Spirit (2 Co 3<sup>17</sup>); man, 'in the likeness of sinful flesh' but 'the man from heaven' whom the heavenly principle made perfect (5<sup>2</sup>), pre-existent (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>4</sup>, Gal 4<sup>4</sup>) and 'head of every man' (1 Co 11<sup>2</sup>), human nature in its archetypal form, particularly in creation (8<sup>3</sup> etc.). That He of whom all this was affirmed was not conceived to be an ordinary human personality in His intimate nature, goes without saying. Taken in conjunction with other terms used, the 'Lord of Glory' declares Divinity. In the later Epistles, Eph., Col., Ph., Ti., Tit., the Divinity is explained in the same directions with greater precision and fulness, and exemplified in fresh relations.

The fact that these writings contain a more developed Christology than that of the undated Epistles has been made a ground for discrediting them. But without good reason. The later thought is in organic line with the earlier; both fix attention on what Christ did and does, and not on what He taught; both rise to the thought of the glorified Christ through the work of Christ on earth. The later illustrates and emphasizes rather than increases the heavenly dignity of Christ, assigning an increment of function rather than of rank (cf. Lightfoot, Col., p. 120).

In the Ep. to the Hebrews there is a remarkable type of doctrine which has not yet been definitively located. It has very little in common with the NT writings generally, or even with the Pauline. Its conception of Christ's Person is characterized by significant differences in substance and expression. After a prologue (almost in the manner of the Fourth Gospel and the Apocalypse, which looks like a summary of previous thought) it proceeds to its main thesis, the superiority of the New Covenant over the Old. In the first seven chapters Christ is presented as the Son, the Revealer, and the King-Priest. As the Son, He has been prepared for in Israel (1<sup>1</sup>), has participated in the creation and is its consummation (1<sup>2</sup>), is the manifestation of the Father's glory as its effulgence (ἀπαύρασμα), and the expression of the Divine essence (ἰσότης) as its embodiment (χαρακτήρ) (1<sup>3</sup>), and is now at the Father's right hand. As the Revealer, He is superior to angels and Moses; while yet a 'partaker of flesh and blood' (2<sup>14</sup>), wherein He has done away with sin and death, establishing and vindicating His glory by His sufferings. As the King-Priest He realizes in perfection the qualifications of the priesthood imperfectly met in the OT system. In his exegesis the author applies to Christ two series of OT texts, the one having in view in their original meaning the Messiah (1<sup>3</sup>, cf. Ps 2<sup>7</sup>; 1<sup>4</sup>, cf. Ps 45<sup>7-8</sup>), the other relating to God (1<sup>5</sup>, cf. Ps 97<sup>7</sup>; 1<sup>10-12</sup>, cf. Ps 102<sup>26-27</sup>). All three aspects point to such pre-eminence of Christ as makes Him incomparable with men, to be equalled with God alone. It is at the same time a pre-eminence appropriated in His human experience, made His own by obedience—a point insisted on. These two form the idea of Christ: He is God who by a Divine Incarnation fulfils Himself in man; and He is man who by a human faith and endurance realizes himself in God. If the terminology is less Hebraic than in St. Paul or the Synoptists, the motive is the same, viz. to express in the terms available the new contrasts and special aspects of Christ's Person impressed on the author's mind by his independent experience of Christ.

The Logos ('the Word') is the term distinctive of St. John (Jn 1<sup>1-14</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup>, Rev 19<sup>13</sup>). It is introduced in a way which indicates that it was familiar to the writer and his readers. As a term it is traceable in both Palestinian and Alexandrian thought. Its idea is Hebraic not Philonian, and to be taken in connexion with 'the Only-begotten.' It is no impersonal abstract Idea. The Logos is, as in the Targums, personal and active as the equivalent of God manifesting Himself (1 Jn 1<sup>2</sup>). He is an historical human life (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>1-9</sup>), a fact not to be minimized. Yet His coming within the conditions of humanity was the coming of One who had been pre-existent with God in and from the beginning (1<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>13-21</sup> 6<sup>2</sup>), sharing in the life of God and in the Divine acts of creation and preservation, and operative in previous history as an illuminating and quickening potency in the hearts of the righteous (1<sup>4</sup> & 1<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>25</sup> 11<sup>2</sup>). Complementary is the thought of the Apocalypse of His eternity or semi-eternity in nature, the Alpha and Omega, and in redemptive activity—'Lamb slain from the foundation of the world,' and of the perfect and perpetual adoration accorded to Him with God in heaven. The recital of the work of the Logos, so brief, covering the vastest realms, cosmic, historical, personal, in the most summary space, is majestic. The absence of any line of intermediate beings between God and man is notable. The identification of the Word with God (θεός) is deliberate. The description gives no plausibility to the view that here we have a category taken from philosophy and applied loosely to the facts. There is nothing in the Synoptic representation of the human character and consciousness of Christ which unites it or renders it inadequate for the Logos conception; equally there is nothing in the Logos conceived as becoming incarnate in the man Jesus which contradicts or impairs the reality or the completeness of His humanity as portrayed in the Synoptics.

The two are adequate and congruous to each other. They are also necessary to each other, each being a torso without the other. The source of the doctrine was the actual experience of the author, but it is the experience of a mind of profound spirituality and devout idealism. He gives the impression of having been determined in the particular cast he gives his doctrine by contemporary circumstances. A specific method is apparent. It is not that he seeks to prove that 'Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God' (Jn 20<sup>31</sup>); it is the special manner of his proof that differentiates his record, and above all the specially intense feeling towards Christ that pervades it, characteristics that have led some to assert that he sees Christ as primarily Divine and less human than the Synoptists see Him. It is truer to say that he sees Christ both as more Divine and more human than the Synoptists; driven beyond them by deepened experience of Christ on the one hand, and that richer reflexion on the other hand to which he was incited by the increasing Gnostic licence of the age. Gnosticism was a subtler foe than current Messianism. Its sophisms could be met only by a simpler and profounder—simpler because profounder—truth. The Fourth Gospel gives that truth. It attempts a portrait of Christ corresponding to the most intimate and overwhelming sense of His power conceivable, at once wholly revealing God and the Divine revelation of the whole nature, life, and destiny of man. Hence to the historian it is an enigma, to the devout a poem. Its outline is simple and free because so broad and high. Its structure is less of the historic than of the spiritual sense. The test of its genuineness, like that of art, is not in its technique but in the dim and powerful feeling of infinite meaning it throws upon the reader. It is in consequence the most fruitful of all the sources of subsequent thought.

3. Divine properties attributed to Christ.—We may note, to begin with, the ascription to Christ of what had been ascribed by OT prophets to Jehovah (cf. Ps 45<sup>6</sup> with He 1<sup>8</sup>, 1<sup>7</sup> with Ps 110<sup>1</sup>, Mt 1<sup>2</sup>; Jer 23<sup>6</sup> [where the 'Branch of David' is called the 'Lord our righteousness'] 33<sup>6</sup> with the NT term 'Root of David' applied to Christ; Mal 3, where the messenger about to come to his own temple is called 'Lord,' with Mk 1<sup>2</sup>, Lk 1<sup>7</sup>). Again, the tempting of Jehovah (Nu 14<sup>22</sup>, Ps 95<sup>8</sup>) is the tempting of Christ (1 Co 10<sup>9</sup>). In He 1<sup>10</sup>, 11 what is attributed to Jehovah in Ps 102<sup>26</sup> is attributed to Christ. In Jn 12<sup>40</sup> it is asserted that the language of Isaiah (69<sup>19</sup>) concerning Jehovah refers to Christ. Is 45<sup>22</sup>, compared with Ro 14<sup>10</sup>, 11, shows that the judgment-seat of God is that of Christ. From Jn 2<sup>22</sup> and Ro 10<sup>13</sup> the name of Jehovah is the name of Christ.

Christ (1 Co 1<sup>2</sup>, Ac 9<sup>14</sup>). Distinctively Christian belief is the confession that Jesus is the Messiah, or that He is the Son of God (Ro 10<sup>9</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>19</sup>). Baptism is into His name (Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>16</sup>), the Lord's Supper is significant of His Death and its specific virtue, new life (1 Co 10<sup>16</sup> 11<sup>29</sup>).

A patient study of the texts cited in the two preceding sections will set in relief several facts as to Apostolic reflexion on Christ's Person. The beginnings lie unquestionably in the Messianic hope and in Christ's claim to be the Messiah. The first proclamation of the gospel we have in the discourses in Acts, the one burden of which is the Messiahship of the Master. The Apostles there speak out of an experience whose roots lie in the nation's past, and which are renewed into fresh growth by Christ. The proof they offer is the evidence of facts and of what the facts point to. They detail three distinct orders of facts: the life and works of Christ, the death on the Cross, the resurrection and exaltation. They emphasize the peculiar and wondrous power revealed in all three, and especially in the last, in which they find the key to the whole—the Risen Lord. Traces of transcendental interest are not absent (Ac 5<sup>31</sup> 3<sup>15</sup>, 20 10<sup>4</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>2</sup> 4<sup>9</sup> 11<sup>2-3</sup>, Ja 2<sup>6</sup> 8<sup>9</sup> 11<sup>21</sup>), the perception of dignity and powers beyond the Messianic attainment. This type of thought is common to St. Peter, St. James, St. Jude. It is a simple, objective, practical presentation of Christ, yet with features of its own so specifically new as to make it impossible to identify it with the existing religious schools. The other writings base themselves upon those beginnings, the Synoptics most obviously. They give the facts with fulness which are given in the Acts discourses in sum. They show the process of the movement, of which Acts gives the results. There are, however, important differences. The conviction of the higher nature of Christ is more prominent; it in fact pervades them; it is not imposed on their substance as an after-thought or under the stress of polemical tendency; it is part and parcel of the whole. Their portraiture is the portraiture of One who is man yet stands apart from men in character, and takes the place of God in the heart. Of speculation there is no sign. The growth of conviction is gradual, indeed, but comes in natural course by contact with facts. With the Synoptics we place the Apocalypse. Speculative features appear in St. Paul (earlier and later Epistles), the Fourth Gospel, Epistle to Hebrews, in the doctrines of 'the Man from heaven,' 'the Second Adam,' the Logos, and the 'Revealer,' and 'High Priest of the New Covenant' respectively.

There is a wide cleavage of opinion on questions as to the source and worth of the aforementioned factors. Were they due to the influence of the Hellenistic schools, or did they descend in the Palestinian tradition? Are they alien accretions to be cast aside, or are they of the essence of the Christian message? Much ingenuity has been expended in trying to prove that the original facts have been largely worked over in the Synoptic and in the Pauline and Johannine doctrines.

In the former case, it is maintained, there was a twofold process of adapting prophecy to suit the facts of the life, and of adapting the facts of the life to suit prophecy; in the case of the latter the facts of the life are interpreted in the light of some of the fundamental ideas of the Greek cults and philosophy, taking on along with the forms much of the substance of Greek religion. Thus originated the scenery of hyper-physical events that surrounds the life in the one instance, and the Logos Christology in the other. Both, it is alleged, changed the true character of the gospel, and are entirely inappropriate to its inner spirit.

Such contentions have certainly not yet been made good. They have nevertheless served to discover deep affinities existing between Apostolic thought and the higher mind of that age, affinities not directly derived from each other. Considerations are constantly increasing to vindicate the real independence of the Apostolic mind, and its essential continuity with the fundamental religion of the Hebrew race and the religious consciousness of Jesus. It is not intrinsically different from them. Its novel constituents are not alien; they do not arrive from without, they are perceived within, as the result of the life and teaching of the Founder of their faith and still more as the effect of His character. There is a freedom both in previous Jewish religious ideas and in the religious consciousness of Jesus which assured to them a vast future vitally and organically related to them, to which the above theory does scant justice, and which suggests the warrant of truth to the Apostolic developments.

IV. SUBSEQUENT DEVELOPMENT OF NT IDEAS.—
1. History of the doctrine.—The Logos idea became the centre of a remarkable theological growth which engrossed the intellectual energy of the first five centuries. During that period the subtle Greek mind left its mark so substantially on the current forms of Christian belief as to render it problematical how far the definitions of the great Councils really embody the essence of the original faith. The naturalness of the development is acknowledged. Its necessity was created by certain obvious causes due to the historic character of the Church, and its presence as a living organization in the world. The age which witnessed the dissolution of paganism and the triumph of new ideals of thought and duty was one of missionary zeal and mental anguish. The early propaganda was extensive and intense. It had to confront the corruption of pagan morals and the medley of heathen beliefs. It had to justify its own novel convictions. Its final purpose was practical: to make men like Christ. A faithful delineation of what He was and did became imperative; still more a consistent conception of what made Him what He was. The Church offered a new life, whose experiences were of profound interest, created and sustained by Christ, to a world of almost feverish intellectual curiosity. The mystery of Christ which had revived Hebrew devotion began to fascinate and excite the Gentile mind. Speculation was stimulated, and increasing effort made to bring the potential elements of Christ's teaching within the scope of men's understanding. The new world was at its best in reflection, it yielded to Christ only after understanding Him.

Something to be understood there was. The whole process is intelligible only on the assumption of the unhesitating acceptance of belief in Christ's higher nature. The problem to the Jews had been, Is this rabbi more than the Messiah? The problem to the Hellenic world now was, Is this Word more than our Logos? and before the problem was solved to its satisfaction, Greek thought passed through an experience as recreative and revolutionary as Jewish aspiration had done in the Apostolic age. The answer, further, preserved the best ideal of classical culture, and translated it into a constituent treasure of the Christian consciousness. The result was the conquest of the older conceptions of deity, whether of prophets or philosophers, by a new conception, a monotheism identical with no previous form, the richest hitherto reached, and one which eventually proved capable of imparting a spiritual unity to men of vastly more educative value than any system of organized culture before or since.

(a) Patristic age.—At first (up to A.D. 300) the process is slow and uncongenial. There are parties of practical outlook only and others of conservative instinct which fail to comprehend the new situation. But in the better representatives of the Christian movement there is a readier courage and a more vigorous intellect. They manifest, indeed, no lapse from Apostolic attainments. The desire to keep to what is primitive is with them, as with the others, passionate, but in no narrow spirit. They are eager to search into the implications of their doctrine. But they plainly exhibit a want of equipment for the task. They are always vague, often conflicting. A clear theory cannot be gained from their writings. Both facts, the existence of sects which refused to theorize and the uncertainties of those who did, are alleged by some historians as a ground for denying to that age any assured belief in Christ's Divinity. The material for judgment is not too abundant, but there are certain guiding facts. Christ is everywhere worshipped as God. Cf. Pliny's well-known letter to Trajan; the Vesper hymn of the Eastern Church, the Gloria in Excelsis, the Tesnakus, all in use in the 2nd century. Lucian's satire betrays a series of characteristic traits of Christians, including the worship of 'the crucified sophist.' There is the witness of the martyrs who preferred death to replacing Christ by the Emperor in their adoration. The baptismal professions of the period, too, maintain unimpaired the NT practice of combining the Son with the Father and Spirit. We distinguish between the popular belief embodied in the foregoing, and explanations of the belief in face of the Greek mind. The former was general—the latter were but tentative. The efforts of the Father Fathers and Apologists were neither profound nor precise. They were directed towards three aims, (1) to justify the worship of Christ, (2) to define aright the relation of the Son to the Father, and (3) to elucidate the operation of the Word in creation. Their discussions have in view three types of opposition, of which the first refused to recognize Christ as the equal of God (Ehionism); the second denied His perfect manhood (Docetism); while the third, prepared for by Docetism and embracing an embarrassing mixture of tendencies known as Gnosticism, conceived amiss the relation between God and the Universe. The Christian thinkers were profoundly moved by this threefold antagonism. They keep their faith firm, but their apologetics are uncertain and incautious. An adequate philosophy is beyond their power. Let it be remembered, however, that the views they repel are also chaotic and crude; moreover, all of them represent some sort of a faith in Christ as a Being of a higher order. By the controversy conducted by writers such as Barnabas, St. Ignatius, Hermas, in particular, Church doctrine attains at this stage a certain measure of self-consciousness, especially over against Judaism, and to a slighter extent over against the abstract notions of heathen speculation.

Around the problems raised by the latter, thought in the next period deepens immeasurably, the seeds of all future discussion are planted, both of orthodox and heretical opinion. A succession of writers, interesting and copious in suggestion, including such names as Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, develop the Christian positions in various directions with dialectical skill and considerable spiritual insight: (1) the nature of our knowledge of God as relative and our knowledge of the nature of God as wholly separate from the created world, spiritual and immaterial; (2) our knowledge of the nature of the Logos as immanent in the Divine nature and expressed in the world of created things, as eternal and manifest in time; (3) our knowledge of the identity of the Son with the Father as one in essence as in will, related by generation, and of the identity of the Son with the human race as its 'recapitulation' or archetype, leading to affirmations of a real Fatherhood in the Godhead and the conception of the Divine Unity as a life of moral relationships. The stress of the argument came to concentrate itself in the third of these points, against the Adoptionists on the one hand, who secured the unity of God by confining Christ within the limits of humanity, and against the Sabellians on the other hand, who secured it by treating the distinctions of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit as simply modes of the one God. By the beginning of the 4th cent. this long interior process of conflicting reflexion was ready for a final issue.

It came in the Arian disputes, which for a century—to A.D. 451—filled the Christian world and passed through several phases. Arius was incited to action by the teaching of Alexander the bishop of Alexandria, who taught the eternal generation of the Son ('there never was a time when He was not'). He maintained that as a father must exist before his son, therefore the Son of God did not exist eternally with the Father; that not being eternal He was created, but before time began; that being created, He is in all things unlike the Father. The Council of Nicea (A.D. 325), convened by the Emperor for the settlement of peace, decided against Arianism, and defined the authoritative doctrine to be that the Son is 'of one substance' (ousia) with the Father; that He was 'begotten, not made,' that 'there never was a time when He was not,' that 'He was not created.' The Nicene Creed was established largely by the brilliant advocacy of Athanasius, subsequently bishop of Alexandria. It was a signal triumph in favour of the essential Divinity of Christ as distinct from a merely moral likeness to God. There can be little doubt that Arian contentions propagated themselves over a wide area; and that partly through the ability of the Arian leaders to gather into association with themselves much floating dissatisfaction with the deeper currents discernible and now becoming dominant, and partly by the aid of political and secular methods. It is unquestionably the case, however, that the Arian position had a vitality of its own which the Athanasian dogmatics never wholly quenched, and which has burst out again and again in subsequent thought. It is the natural standpoint of all minds that, in seeking to appreciate Christ, start from the idea of God rather than the fact of Christ; its main interest is not religious but theistic, a theoretical deduction, not the statement of an inner experience. Athanasius met it on the basis of that Christian experience which initiated the problem, and from the beginning had determined its development. His instinct was justified; for although the Arian agitation protracted itself all through the 4th cent., it was gradually deserted by the more religious adherents, whom the Athanasian divines took pains to conciliate by removing false impressions, by deepening their thought, and by popularizing it with illustrations.

The second great Council, that of Constantinople (A.D. 381), saw practically the death of Arianism. It reaffirmed the Nicene dogmas against various novelties, and especially that offshoot of Arianism which denied the Divinity of the Holy Ghost (Macedonians). The third Council, at Ephesus (in 431), and the fourth, at Chalcedon (in 451), dealt with other three consequences of Arian doctrine, known as the Nestorian, Apollinarian, and Eutychian heresies. The three have reference to the constitution of Christ's Divine-human Person. Jesus Christ being Divine in the Nicene sense, in what sense could He also at the same time be human? It had been determined that He was primarily Divine; not a man like other men, who became Divine, but the personal Logos of God manifesting Himself through the human person with whom He had entered into union. According to this view, He was necessarily two distinct natures, to one of which it seemed impossible to render all the significance of its proper functions, viz. the human nature. In particular, Was His knowledge limited? Had He a true body and a reasonable soul? Was His Person single?—problems which enlisted the most earnest interest of Athanasius, the Gregorys, Cyril of Alexandria, Leo of Rome, and, above all, Augustine of Hippo. Briefly the answers were: (1) as to Christ's human knowledge, that omniscience belongs to the Godhead of the Word, but that the human mind which the Word took was limited; (2) as to Christ's body, that it was a true body, really born of Mary, and passible in the experiences of life; (3) as to the union of the Divine and human natures, that these two were each perfect, without confusion, and united in one Person; 'although He be God and man, He is not two but one Christ.' In the words of Chalcedon, He is—'One and the same Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, the same being perfect in Godhead and the same being perfect in manhood, truly God and truly man, the same having a rational soul and a body; of one substance with the Father according to the Godhead, and the same being of one substance with us according to the manhood, in all things like unto us except sin only, and the same Christ, Son, Lord, only-begotten, acknowledged in two natures, without fusion, without change, without division, without separation; the difference of the two natures having been in no wise taken away by the union, but rather the property of each nature being preserved, and combining to form one person and one hypostasis.'

Or, in the words of the last of the great Creeds, the so-called 'Athanasian,' which fairly represents the theology of the 5th century:

'He is not two, but one Christ; One; not by conversion of the Godhead into flesh, but by taking of the manhood into God; One altogether; not by confusion of substance, but by unity of Person.'

(b) Medieval period (5th to 15th centuries).—The conciliar definitions remained undisturbed as the official formulas of the Church right through the Middle Ages up to the present; and without important modification or advance. To account for this prolonged acquiescence of the medieval mind is not at once simple, for the Nicene system is both uncritical and incomplete. The Church had to address herself to new and arduous tasks, chiefly of organization. She had assumed the external equipment of the Roman empire for practical efficiency in educating the multitude of peoples brought within her pale. Her paramount requirements were unity and a working belief. All available spiritual forces were ranged in a practical order for a practical end. The effect on the doctrine of Christ's Person is observable in the following results: (1) the less speculative and more practical discussion of the older problems, especially those concerned with the effect of the Incarnation on Christ's knowledge and will; (2) the consideration of Christ's Person in association with the soteriological aspects of His Work; (3) the systematic co-ordination of the several parts of Christological science into a connected whole, and of the whole with other doctrines such as those of God and the Church; (4) the more lucid realization of the nature and principles of this doctrine in line with the elaboration of the doctrine of transubstantiation and the Mass; (5) the popular illustration of its truth, mainly in its place as part of the Trinitarian conception, by analogies drawn from outward nature, and still more from the human mind. Two subsidiary streams are not to be omitted, noteworthy because of their influence in helping to discredit the methods of the Schoolmen and in preparing for the Reformation; viz. (6) free and fruitless inquiry into 'quæstiones,' i.e. questions arbitrarily suggested and only remotely affecting religious interests or fundamental truth; and (7) the rise of mystical and pietist communities cherishing an emotional, sometimes sentimental, contemplation of the Saviour in His purely human qualities. Scholasticism has often been criticised; but it taught the thoughtful theologian at least one great lesson, that it is unsafe to develop the theological consequences of any doctrine without continual reference to the proportion of the whole. It effectually awakened also the more religious minds to return for that reference to the primitive sources in the Scriptures and the Fathers.

(c) Modern (from Reformation era, 16th cent., onward).—The new spiritual experiences in which the Reformation originated brought out into clearer relief the disparity between the matter and the method of the Scholastic disputations. A religious Reason began to assert itself independently of the Scholastic process. It gave the intellect a new freedom to question the authority and relevancy of the old; one of whose first utterances expressed dislike of further speculation as empty. It blessed only those energies which made religion inward and personal. As the previous centuries had deepened the mind sufficiently to speak for itself, so now the age was dawning which should so completely sanctify the moral nature as to make its instincts supreme. In Luther pre-eminently, but not less in Calvin, Zwingli, and others, the ethical interpretation of spiritual facts takes rise. Hence the immense importance ascribed to that act of faith by which the individual soul connects itself with Christ (justification by faith), in a union not of intellect but of heart. Out of the experiences of this inner union we reach the true knowledge of Christ (and also of God). 'The man now who so knows Christ that Christ has taken away from him all his sin, death and devil, freely through His suffering, he has truly recognized Christ as the Son of God' (Luther, Werke, xvii. 265). And when we thus know Christ, we 'let go utterly all thoughts and speculations concerning the Divine Majesty and Glory, and hang and cling to the humanity of Christ. . . and I learn thus through Him to know the Father. Thus arises such a light and knowledge within me that I know certainly what God is and what is His mind' (xxx. i. 161). It is in the experience of redemption that we know the Redeemer. Modern religious theory has been one long endeavour to appropriate this position. It has sought to explicate its principles (1) by a more radical and penetrating criticism of the past; (2) by the application to the problems of Christian theism of other categories than that of the Nicene ousia or substance; (3) in particular by insistence on moral personality as the determining principle of theological construction.

When we look back at this great historical development, it is impossible not to be struck by the parallel between the age of early Christianity, the beginning of the Middle Ages, and the Reformation. The bankruptcy of the pagan world was not its defect but its merit. It had generated a universal need and a universal mode of feeling which were incompatible with the highest culture which had generated them, but which were destined ultimately to combine that culture itself with something beyond, viz. the new Christian experience. The so-called Dark Ages were brought on by a new possibility and a new necessity, the necessity of disciplining the mass of believers to appreciate that combination and apprehend its elements of culture and faith,—a discipline which, when it had accomplished its ends, left its subjects with a deeper experience than ever, and a more positive possession of its substance. The first Reformers were clear on the central fact of this new experience. Their successors were forced by the exigencies of their ecclesiastical situation to limit themselves to simple defence of the fact. Later thinkers, with more freedom, and under the impulse of vast movements of philosophy and science, have gone on to unfold and organize its content. There is much that is still obscure. But we may venture to state these convictions, that although (1) the analysis of the forces that have entered into the development of Christian doctrine in the past, popular at present, has by no means vindicated beyond appeal its own presuppositions; nor (2) has it yet been proved that the predominant impulses of the modern spirit are sufficient adequately to mould anew all the facts and truths of the inherited faith; yet (3) it is indubitable that broad and abiding foundations are being laid for a system of religious thought at once expressive of the religious ideals of the age, and consistent with its historical and scientific temper. In elaborating that system it is already clear that two of its fundamental postulates must be these: (a) the principle that Christian truth is not the creation of the human intellect, nor are the forces of human reason and emotion sufficient to explain it; and (b) the principle of the absolute value of Christ's Person as the norm of all religious experience. The Christological impulse is central. In the moral personality of Christ, men are seeking better answers to the old problems. The past answers are not wrong; it is that they are not relevant. And this because of the growth, not of science but of conscience. The type of religious experience and emotion has changed, the experience is deeper, the emotion richer. The modern mind stands less awe-struck, perhaps, before the Deity of Christ, but it is more conscience-struck before the perfection of His human character, within the sacred processes of which it wistfully looks for the mystery of His Divinity and the secret of God.

2. Denial of the doctrine of Christ's Divinity.—(a) History and motive.—Christianity has in all the stages of its evolution been accompanied by rationalistic hesitation. Based on experience, it has never commended itself to the reason unenriched by that experience. A strong undercurrent of antagonism runs through the centuries. It is possible to indicate special periods when the antagonism becomes more pronounced. Such periods will be found, on the whole, coincident with the points of transition in the advance of the doctrine. It may well be, as modern Unitarians argue, that Christ was regarded at first as a man simply, 'a prophet mighty in deed and word' (Lk 24<sup>9</sup>); but their contention that this is the point of view of the NT cannot be sustained. The Epistles, even the earliest, start from the Risen Christ, and the Gospel narratives are not to be comprehended apart from the initial experience of His higher dignity. Both sets of books owe their origin to the new sense as to His Person created by the new sense of power with which He possessed them. Their ostensible design is to set Him forth as 'Christ,' or 'Lord,' or 'Saviour,' or 'Word,' etc., i.e. as something more than man, to whom, as such, worship is paid. They show their authors busied with problems as to the constitution of His Person. Those problems emerged from the first, and among Jewish Christians who had to make clear to themselves Christ's true position if, in His lordship over them, they were no longer required strictly to follow the law of Moses, and were now required to conceive of the transcendence of God permitting fellowship with Him. But those were problems which could never have emerged at all unless from the conviction of His suprahuman rank. The opposition, Ebionism, was not so much concerned with denial of His superior dignity as directed to affirm the supremacy of the Father. Its protest was immensely strengthened when the conflict with Gnostic theories necessitated an alien apologetic with an unscriptural terminology, derived from Greek philosophy, both obnoxious (and probably bewildering) to the pious Jew.

The second serious outburst of hostility was occasioned by the Nicene theologians. In Ebionism the Jewish temper found vent. In Arianism it was the heathen intellect. Amid Gentile surroundings christological ideas had never ceased to grow. Tradition, Scripture, experience, combined to deepen the conviction of Christ's Divinity, and to enlarge the range of its problems. Hellenic rationalism confronted the Church at every point. It could not tolerate the thought of two Gods; and it had not yet grasped the unity of God as embracing eternal distinctions facing inward on each other. It revolted from an Incarnation in time and human form. It therefore denied to the Son coequality with the Father. Yet everything short of the full deity it was ready to acknowledge. For the Arian Christ is no mere man: He is much more than man, only not God, but a kind of demi-god, the loftiest of all creatures, to be imitated and worshipped. The idea, from its wide acceptance in that age, must have embodied certain prevalent tendencies of the time. Its plausibility depends on the idea of God which it conceives, viz. that of an abstract, otiose Being, beyond interest in human things. It is an idea as far removed from modern modes as from the Gospel facts. It is more beset with difficulty than the conception it opposed. In later times it has been often revived, but never effectively, and mainly in individual opinion.

The sincere emphasis laid on the proper Divinity of Christ throughout the Middle Ages has been continued in the Churches of the Reformation. The opposition has been correspondingly sincere and continuous. Its course manifests remarkable variation. In the earlier stages it was determined chiefly by the common study of the Scriptures now distributed to the multitudes. Almost every phase of former heresy was reproduced, but without real advance in thought or real influence on orthodox opinion. Afterwards the special developments of Reformed theology, notably in the doctrine of the Atonement, created, both by natural evolution and by reaction, the powerful contrary movement of Socinianism. The Socinian argument, assuming that the Infinite and the finite are exclusive of each other, maintained the Incarnation to be impossible, rejected the pre-existence, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, asserted the essential moment of His person to be His human nature, rendered free from sin by the Virgin-birth, and free from ignorance by special endowments of knowledge. Socinians did good service by bringing into clear relief the Docetic elements in the traditional doctrine, and in preparing for a deeper appreciation of the humanity of Christ in the work of salvation. The reverent recognition of this last (finisimum capax vestitus), that the human is capable of embodying forth the essence of the Divine nature as distinct from merely being the bearer of the Divine attributes, is the greatest step that has been taken since the Nicene definitions. It has incited to a speculative ardour, and secured a place for the application of scientific method, in dealing with the contents of Christian thought, that are rapidly working out its complete reorganization and reconstruction. To discern and describe the ideal unity of the higher spiritual life which will exhibit the Divine-human principle of Christ's Person in its fulness, is the task of the modern Church. The spiritual potentialities of the human mind are earnestly and perseveringly investigated. It is a complex process, building as largely on religious induction as on religious insight, and sustained by a magnificent confidence in the native powers of reason and conscience. But the same forces which have impelled to new Christological affirmations have infused new vigour into Christological doubt. The representatives of Unitarianism have been active and influential. They stand for a much more humanitarian view of Christ than either Arians or Socinians. But their phrase, 'the pure humanity of Jesus,' covers much diversity of conviction. Some are almost Trinitarians, approaching Christ on the Divine side, and affirming, in a real if unorthodox sense, His pre-existence, uniqueness, sinlessness, and spiritual authority. Others contemplate the human side, believe that He was naturally born, and endowed with qualities and gifts differing in degree and not in kind from those which all men enjoy; that His character was a growth, and that by degrees He rose out of temptation and error into the serene strength of a pure and noble manhood; that He became a providential teacher and leader of men to a higher spiritual development. The Unitarian polemic killed popular Calvinism; in its higher forms it is rich in ethical appeal.

(b) Failure.—Unitarianism has at all times failed to lead. It has uniformly won a certain measure of popularity by successfully representing the dominant forces pulsating in the spirit of the age. But it is by not being an average that a man becomes a guide. Deniers of the Divinity have flourished in times of utter confusion, when whoever would attain some coherence of life and thought must let drop much that is held in solution, and show the path of progress by manifesting the direction of change. By this law Catholic theology has stood; to representative insight it has added prophetic foresight. The sense of its insufficiency, when brought home, has only driven it the deeper into the inner secrets of that experience which yielded its original impulse, and so it has escaped becoming a prey to the narrower reason and limited emotion of the Unitarian schools. A. S. MARTIN.

DIVORCE.—The teaching of Christ on this subject in the earliest Gospel, that of St. Mark, is clear and decisive. It is given in 10<sup>1-2</sup>. The Pharisees came to Him with the question, Is it lawful for a husband to divorce a wife? The Pharisees themselves could have had no doubt upon the point thus broadly stated, as they believed, sanctioned and legalized by Dt 24<sup>1-4</sup>. But they debated about the scope and limits of divorce (cf. Bab. Gittin, 90a, where the views of the Schools of Hillel and of Shammai are given. The former allowed divorce for trivial offences, the latter only for immoral conduct). In putting the question to Christ, the Pharisees therefore had an ulterior object. They came, says St. Mark, 'tempting him,' knowing probably from previous utterances of His that He would reply in words which would seem directly to challenge the Mosaic Law (cf. His criticism of the distinctions between 'clean' and 'unclean' meats, Mk 7<sup>1-23</sup>). Christ answers with the expected reference to the Law, 'What did Moses command?' They state the OT position: Moses sanctioned divorce. Notice how nothing is said as to grounds or reasons for divorce. Christ at once makes His position clear. The law upon this point was an accommodation to a rude state of society. But a prior and higher law is to be found in the Creation narrative, 'Male and female he created them' (Gn 1<sup>27</sup> LXX), i.e. God created the first pair of human beings of different sexes that they might be united in the marriage bond. Further, it was afterwards said that a man should leave his father and mother and cleave to his wife, and that he and his wife should be one flesh. In other words, married couples were in respect of unity, as the first pair created by God, destined for one another. The marriage bond, therefore, which may be said to have been instituted by God Himself, must be from an ideal standpoint indissoluble. 'What God joined, let not man sunder.'

In answer to a further question of His disciples, the Lord enforces this solemn pronouncement. A man who puts away his wife and marries another commits adultery. A woman who puts away her husband and marries another commits adultery. Upon this point Christ's teaching passes beyond the ordinary conditions of Jewish society. No woman could divorce her husband by Jewish law. But that is no reason why the Lord should not have expressed Himself as Mk. records. There were exceptional cases of divorce by women in Palestine (cf. Salome, Jos. Ant. xv. vii. 10: 'She sent him [Costobar] a bill of divorce, and dissolved her marriage with him, though this was against the Jewish laws'). And there is no reason why He may not have been acquainted with the possibility of divorce by women in the West, or why, even if He had not this in view, He may not have wished to emphasize His point by stating the wrongfulness of divorce, on either side, of the marriage bond.

With this earliest record of Christ's teaching the fragment in the Third Gospel (Lk 16<sup>3</sup>) is in agreement: 'Every one who puts away his wife and marries another commits adultery, and he who marries a divorced woman commits adultery.' That is to say, the marriage bond is indissoluble. The husband who divorces his wife and remarries commits adultery. And the man who marries a divorced wife commits adultery, because she is ideally the wife of her still living (first) husband.

In the First Gospel, however, we find this plain and unambiguous teaching, that divorce is inconceivable from an ideal standpoint, modified in a very remarkable way. In Mt 5<sup>32</sup> occurs a saying parallel in substance to Lk 16<sup>3</sup>, but with the notable addition of the words, 'except for the sake of unchastity' (παρεκτός λόγου πορνείας). Thus modified, the Lord's teaching becomes similar to that of the stricter school of Jewish interpreters. The supposed sanction of divorce in Dt 24<sup>1-2</sup> is practically reaffirmed, the clause וְיָרָץ, which formed the point at issue in the Jewish schools, being interpreted or paraphrased as παρεκτός λόγου πορνείας, by which is probably meant any act of illicit sexual intercourse. In other words, Christ here assumes that divorce must follow adultery, and what He is here prohibiting is not such divorce, which He assumes as necessary, but divorce and consequent remarriage on any other grounds. It might further be argued that the words παρεκτός λόγου πορνείας affect only the first clause, and that remarriage after divorce even on the ground of adultery is here prohibited. But if this were intended, it would surely have been explicitly expressed and not left to be inferred. And such teaching would seem to be illogical. Because, if adultery be held to have broken the marriage tie so effectually as to justify divorce, it must surely be held to leave the offended husband free to contract a new tie.

In view, therefore, of Mk 10<sup>1-2</sup> and Lk 16<sup>3</sup>, it must appear that Mt 5<sup>32</sup> places the teaching of Christ in a new light. So far as Lk is concerned, we might, with some difficulty, suppose that the exception 'save for adultery' was assumed as a matter so obvious that it needed no explicit expression. But in view of the disputes in the Jewish Schools, this is very unlikely. And Mk 10<sup>1-2</sup> with its criticism of the alleged Mosaic sanction of divorce, leaves no room for doubt that on that occasion at least Christ pronounced marriage to be a divinely instituted ordinance which should under no circumstances be broken by divorce. It would not, of course, be difficult to suppose that on other occasions the Lord Himself modified His teaching. We might suppose that He taught His disciples that, whilst from an ideal standpoint, marriage, for all who wished to discern and to obey the guidance of the Divine will in life, ought to be an indissoluble bond, yet, human nature and society being what they are, divorce was a necessary and expedient consequence of the sin of adultery. But a careful comparison of Mt 5<sup>32</sup> with Mk 10 and Lk 16 irresistibly suggests the conclusion that the exception in Mt. is due not to Christ Himself, but to the Evangelist, or to the atmosphere of thought which he represents, modifying Christ's words to bring them into accordance with the necessities of life. This conclusion seems to be confirmed when we compare Mt 19<sup>1-2</sup> with Mk 10<sup>1-2</sup>. It is on many grounds clear that the editor of the First Gospel is here, as elsewhere, re-editing St. Mark (see Expos. Times, Oct. 1903, p. 45, and 'St. Matthew' in the Internat. Crit. Com.). Contrast with the logical and consistent argument of Mk. stated above, the account of the First Gospel. The Pharisees are represented as inquiring, 'Is it lawful for a man to put away a wife on any pretext?' Christ answers, as in Mk., that marriage from an ideal standpoint is indissoluble. The Pharisees appeal to the Law against this judgment. In reply we should expect the Lord, as in Mk., to state the accommodating and secondary character of the legal sanction of divorce, and to reaffirm the sanctity of marriage. But instead He is represented as affirming that πορνεία constitutes an exception. Thus He tacitly takes sides with the severer school of interpretation of Dt 24, and acknowledges the permanent validity of that Law thus interpreted in a strict sense, which immediately before He had criticised as an accommodation to a rude state of social life. This inconsistency shows that Mk. is here original, and that κατὰ ῥέαν αἰτίας and μὴ ἐπὶ πορνείᾳ are insertions by the editor of Mt. into Mk.'s narratives, and confirms the otherwise probable conclusion that παρεκτός λόγου πορνείας in 5<sup>32</sup> is an insertion into the traditionally saying more accurately preserved in Lk 16. The motive of these insertions can only be conjectured. But, in view of other features of the First Gospel, it is probable that the editor was a Jewish Christian who has here Judaized Christ's teaching. Just as he has so arranged 5<sup>16-20</sup> as to represent Christ's attitude to the Law to be that of the Rabbinical Jews, who regarded every letter of the Law as permanently valid, so here he has so shaped Christ's teaching about divorce as to make it consonant with the permanent authority of the Pentateuch, and harmonious with the stricter school of Jewish theologians. To the same strain in the editor's character, the same Jewish-Christian jealousy for the honour of the Law, and for the privileges of the Jewish people, may perhaps be ascribed the emphasis placed on the prominence of St. Peter (10<sup>2</sup> πρωτος, 14<sup>20-21</sup> 15<sup>18</sup> 16<sup>17-19</sup> 17<sup>24-27</sup> 18<sup>21</sup>), and the preservation of such sayings as 10<sup>4</sup> 6 25. And to the same source may perhaps be attributed the Judaizing of the Lord's language in such expressions as 'the kingdom of the heavens,' and the 'Father who is in the heavens.' See, also, art. ADULTERY and MARRIAGE.

DOCTOR.—The English versions have been very inconsistent in the translation of διδάσκαλος, νομοδιδάσκαλος, μαθητ., νομικ.. They have generally followed Wyclif, who used maister for διδάσκαλος, and doctour only once (Lk 24<sup>46</sup>). In the American RV 'master' and 'doctor' disappear as tr. of διδάσκαλος, and 'teacher' is uniformly used. The AV has 'teacher' only once in the Gospels (Jn 2<sup>10</sup>) out of a very large number of instances of διδάσκαλος. The English RV advances to only four uses of 'teacher' (Mt 23<sup>8</sup>, Lk 24<sup>46</sup>, Jn 3<sup>2, 10</sup>), νομοδιδάσκαλος occurs only three times in the NT (Lk 6<sup>17</sup>, Ac 5<sup>24</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>7</sup>). In the last example AV has 'teacher' and in the other two 'doctor of the law.' Of course, 'doctor' is simply Latin for 'teacher,' but the American RV would have done better to adopt 'teacher of the law' for νομοδιδάσκαλος also (Lk 6<sup>17</sup>, Ac 5<sup>24</sup>).

The chief English Versions translate the word διδάσκαλος in Lk 24<sup>46</sup> as follows: Wyclif, doctours; Tindale, doctours; Cranmer, doctours; Geneva, doctours; Rheims, doctours; AV, doctors; RV, doctors; Noyes, teachers; Bible Union Revision, teachers; American RV, teachers; Twentieth Century NT, Teachers. νομοδιδάσκαλος in Lk 6<sup>17</sup> and Ac 5<sup>24</sup> is translated doctour of the law by Wyclif, who is followed with variations in spelling by Tindale, Geneva, Rheims, AV and RV, American RV. The American Bible Union Revision has teacher of the law in Lk 6<sup>17</sup> and Ac 5<sup>24</sup> also. Twentieth Century NT has Teacher of the Law.

It would seem that νομοδιδάσκαλος should be translated 'teacher of the law,' and διδάσκαλος 'teacher' always. The Old English word 'doctor' now often signifies a title. Pope's phrase, 'when doctors disagree,' referred to teachers. νομικ. is used once in Mt. (22<sup>3</sup>) and eight times in Lk., and is practically equivalent to νομοδιδάσκαλος. See RABBI, MASTER, TEACHER, LAWYER.

A. T. ROBERTSON.
DOCTRINES.—On the subject of doctrines in connexion with the Gospels but little light is shed by etymology.

Two words occur which have been translated 'doctrine'—διδασκαλία and διδασκ.. The former, which is by its form properly an adjective and denotes 'of or belonging to a teacher' (διδάσκων), is used of the subject-matter of his teaching, as the analogous word, which is found in the NT only in the neuter form διδασκάλιον, 'that which pertains to an επαιγγελία, is used in the sense of 'the good news,' 'the gospel.' The adjectival form διδασκαλιον, which in plural, in classical Greek means a teacher's pay, as επαιγγελιον means the reward given to a messenger of good news, does not occur in the NT. The word διδασκαλία, its meaning that which pertains to a διδάσκαλος, has in the NT special reference to the authority of the teacher. It is never used of our Lord's teaching, and only seldom of that of the Apostles. Further, it occurs in the Gospels only in those passages (Mt 13<sup>8</sup>, Mk 7<sup>1</sup>) in which Jesus accuses the scribes of 'teaching for doctrines the commandments of men,' and quotes against them the Septuagint rendering of Is 29<sup>13</sup>.

Διδασκ., the common word for the act of teaching or that which is taught, occurs more frequently. It is used with reference to the teaching of Jesus in a general sense, as where the people contrast His methods with those of the scribes (Mt 7<sup>28</sup>, Mk 12<sup>12</sup>), and again of His preaching, as in connexion with the parable of the Sower, where St. Mark says (4<sup>9</sup>), 'And he taught them many things in parables, and said unto them in his doctrine.' Here διδασκ., 'doctrine,' exactly corresponds to διδασκων, 'he taught,' and the phrase evidently means 'in the course of his teaching,' or 'in the course of his remarks.'

In the same general sense the word occurs again in Jn 18<sup>19</sup>, according to which the high priest examined Jesus concerning His disciples and 'his doctrine.' With reference to the subject-matter of His teaching it occurs in the answer of Jesus to the question of the Pharisees (Jn 7<sup>15, 17</sup>), 'How knoweth this man letters (γραμματα), having never learned?' The question refers to learning as it was understood by the scribes, that is, as theological science, those methods of Biblical interpretation in virtue of which they themselves were called scribes (γραμματισται), i.e. professional theologians. The answer of Jesus is, 'My doctrine' (ἡ ἡμεῖς διδασκ.) is not mine, but his that sent me'; in connexion with which Alford observes, 'Here only does our Lord call His teaching διδασκ.,' 'Elsewhere it is applied to Christ's teaching by the Evangelists themselves, in whose case it is sufficiently explained by the general use of the word with reference to teaching of any kind, and by the fact that Jesus was regarded and addressed as Rabbi or Teacher, and accepted the title. It is, however, important to note that, except where it is used in its most general sense, the word 'teaching' (διδασκ.) occurs in connexion with the marked contrast which all observed between the authoritative teaching of Jesus and the instructions of the scribes, who slavishly adhered to such doctrines and methods as were sanctioned only by Rabbinical tradition, and laid emphasis upon trivial questions to the neglect of the weightier matters of the Law (Mt 15<sup>2</sup> | Mk 7<sup>7</sup>).

As regards the doctrines which Jesus taught in His own unique and authoritative way, it must be carefully borne in mind that He did not formulate them in the manner of a systematic theologian. They cannot therefore be rightly described as 'doctrine' in the technical sense of the word, and still less as 'dogma,' as that was understood by theologians of a later period; but rather as 'apophthegms,' to use the expression by which the LXX rendered the words of Dt 32<sup>2</sup>, where Moses says of his teaching, 'My doctrine shall drop as the rain.' There the Gr. word ἀποφθελμα, 'a sententious saying,' is made to represent the Heb. נֶזֶק 'that which is received.' This word 'apophthegm,' indeed, corresponds very nearly to the expression τὰ λόγια, 'the sayings' or 'utterances' of which Papias speaks as forming the kernel of the Gospels, and which, according to that writer, were taken down by St. Mark as the amanuensis of St. Peter. Such a term, moreover, would aptly apply to the style of Christ's doctrine, which, as Beyschlag remarks (NT Theol. i. 31), 'is conditioned not merely by a necessity of teaching, but rather springs chiefly from the nature of the things to be communicated. These are just the eternal truths, the heavenly things in earthly speech, which can be brought home to the popular understanding only by pictorial forms. It is therefore the mother speech of religion which Jesus uses.' As has been well observed, Christ's teaching has to do with His own unique personality, with a Person much more than with doctrine properly so called. Again to quote the words of Beyschlag (op. cit. i. 28), 'His teaching is that in His appearance and active life which is necessary to make that life intelligible to us, and without which the Apostolic teaching about Him would be only a sum of dogmatic utterances which we could not comprehend and whose truth we could not prove,—a result not a little awkward for that view which contrasts "the teaching of Jesus" as Christianity proper with the Apostolic "teaching about Christ." Taking due account of these considerations, we may yet gather from the sources at our disposal, the simple narratives of the Synoptic Gospels and the more elaborate narratives and discourses of the Gospel of John, sufficient materials to enable us to piece together a scheme of the doctrine of Jesus as He taught it and as it was understood by His immediate followers.

It appears most convenient to start, as has been suggested by Weiss, with the doctrine of the Kingdom of Heaven or the Kingdom of God.

The former of these expressions is peculiar to the Gospel of Matthew. The latter is more usual in the NT. Beyerlag suggests that the former was that which was most favoured by our Lord Himself (op. cit. i. 42). However that may be, it has for us the special interest that, as Alford points out, it is common among Rabbinical writers, a fact which seems to indicate that it was admirably adapted to illustrate the connexion between the current expectations of the Jews and the message addressed to them first by John the Baptist and then by Jesus, to the effect that the promise whose fulfilment they expected was already in course of being fulfilled. It is the natural link between the two dispensations. On the other hand, the peculiarly OT stamp which, though only by association, it bore, suggestive of Jewish theocratic ideas, would sufficiently account for the fact that in the other Gospels, specially designed to meet the wants of the Gentiles, to whom those ideas were strange and unfamiliar, it gave place to the alternative expression, 'Kingdom of God.' Practically, however, the two expressions mean the same thing. The earlier form may possibly, as has been suggested, have been by association so closely connected with the national hope of the Jews, and with that selfish exclusiveness which led them to regard themselves as in a peculiar sense the elect people of God, as to seem to countenance the old narrow views of Messiah's kingdom, to the prejudice of the more spiritual and catholic teaching of Jesus Himself, which impressed itself the more strongly upon His followers the more successfully they sought to win the Gentiles to the faith of Christ. At the same time, they express at most only two different aspects of the same truth—Kingdom of Heaven, as the phrase occurs in the Gospels, denoting a condition of things in which God's will is done on earth as it is done in heaven, while Kingdom of God refers more directly and specially to God as the Sovereign of that regenerated society which the expression is used to describe. See KINGDOM OF GOD.

This conception is the central point in Christ's teaching, by reference to which its most characteristic features may be most conveniently gathered into a connected system—as its relation to the OT, its revelation of the nature and will of God, its teaching as to the nature and person of Jesus Himself, its doctrine of man, and of God's scheme for man's salvation. This central theme attracts our notice in the beginning of the Gospels. It is the subject of the preaching of the Baptist and also of Jesus, whose message is briefly summed up in the words, 'The kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the gospel' (Mk 1<sup>9</sup>). The Sermon on the Mount itself starts with the idea of the Kingdom of Heaven, and the same thought is the subject of two successive petitions in the Lord's Prayer, 'Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven' (Mt 5<sup>3-10</sup> || Lk 9<sup>30</sup>, Mt 6<sup>9</sup> || Lk 11<sup>2</sup>). The fundamental teachings of Jesus naturally group themselves round this central theme.

1. The Kingdom being the true Israel of God, the first point of doctrine that suggests itself concerns the King, the Supreme Ruler of the regenerated people. We have thus, as the words 'Kingdom of God' indicate, to deal first with Jesus' doctrine of God the Father. This it is to be carefully noted, is not a new theology. The God whom Christ reveals is the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Mk 12<sup>26</sup>). That 'God is Spirit,' and can be worshipped only 'in spirit and in truth,' was not first taught to the woman of Samaria (Jn 4<sup>24</sup>). That principle lies at the root of the teaching of the Law and the Prophets. Jesus accepted this fundamental doctrine, while at the same time He cleared it from those later speculations which tended to make of it a mere abstraction, or to accentuate the idea of the remoteness and incommunicableness of the Supreme Being. This He did by describing God, just as the Prophets and the Law had done, as infinitely holy, righteous, and loving. As Sovereign of the kingdom of righteousness and love, God makes holiness and love the essential laws of His kingdom, and commands His subjects to be as Himself. In particular, Jesus laid His emphasis upon the Fatherhood of God, and taught His disciples to trust implicitly in the Father's care (Mt 6<sup>25-34</sup> || Lk 12<sup>22-31</sup>), and to believe that that care extended to the very details of their daily life; while He exhorted them not only to rely upon and claim His compassion and His forgiving love, but to imitate Him in respect of these attributes, that they might 'be the children of' their 'Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust' (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>; cf. v. 48; Lk 6<sup>35-38</sup>).

2. But the Kingdom of God, as Jesus proclaims it, resembles the Old Testament theocracy in this, that the Supreme Sovereign reveals His will and rules His Kingdom by One whom He has sent and to whom He has delegated His authority. This, the hope of Israel, is an ideal which is already realizing itself. The prophecy of the Messiah is fulfilled in the person and work of Him whom God has sent. This is therefore the keynote of the gospel, that the Christ is come 'to fulfil all righteousness' (Mt 3<sup>15</sup>), to give effect to every part of the constitution of the Kingdom. Thus Jesus appears as the Divine legislator. In this capacity He not only, as in His parables, explains and illustrates the principles of His government, but, as in the Sermon on the Mount, appears as the authoritative expositor of the Law of God. He announces that He is come not to destroy but to fulfil the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>), and in this connexion shows that the Law is not satisfied with the literal and formal obedience of the Pharisees, but extends to thought and motive; He warns His disciples that, except their righteousness shall exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees, they cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven (v. 18-20); and in other passages He says that in the Day of Judgment men shall be judged so strictly that they shall give account of every idle word, and even of any neglect on their part of the law of kindness and compassion towards their neighbours (Mt 12<sup>36</sup> 25<sup>26</sup>).

This aspect of Christ's teaching, which is specially prominent in the Synoptic Gospels, has been represented by some as constituting the essence of His doctrine. But apart from the thought that, according to this view, the ethical teaching of Jesus would mean the enactment of a new code of religion and morality infinitely more difficult than the old which He professed to explain, it is abundantly clear from the Synoptists themselves, no less than from the testimony of St. John, that Jesus lays far more stress upon the subject of His own Person than upon any ethical doctrine or set of doctrines. In the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke, as distinctly as in that of John, Jesus lays down as the first condition of membership of the Kingdom the duty of accepting His testimony concerning Himself, and of following Him. As we read in the Fourth Gospel that 'to as many as received him' Jesus 'gave the right to become children of God' (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>), so, according to the testimony of all four, the Kingdom of God is come in the person of the Messiah (Mt 12<sup>28</sup> || Lk 11<sup>20</sup>). The Person of Christ is the centre of the gospel.

A remarkable feature, indeed, of the Gospels is the fact that the essential Divinity of Christ, and even the express doctrine of His Messiahship, appear to have been made in His public teaching the subject of gradual development rather than of direct and explicit teaching. Jesus suffered not the confession of His Messiahship by the demons whom He cast out of those who were possessed. And although, when He received the first disciples, John and Andrew, Peter, Nathanael and Philip,

He accepted their confession that in Him they had found the Messiah (Jn 1<sup>41-42</sup>), it was in but few cases that He declared Himself in so many words to be the Christ of God; as, for example, in that of His conversation with the woman of Samaria (Jn 4<sup>26</sup>); again when He declared to His townsmen in Nazareth that Isaiah's prophecy of the Messiah as the great preacher and healer was fulfilled in Himself (Lk 4<sup>21</sup>); and again when He answered the doubting question of the Baptist, 'Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?', by pointing to the testimony of His teaching and of His works of mercy (Mt 11<sup>2-9</sup> || Lk 7<sup>18-22</sup>). For the rest, Jesus allowed the thought of His Divine claims to grow in the minds of His disciples, and it was not until within a few months of His death that Peter in their name confessed His Messiahship, when Jesus, in welcoming their faith, expressly declared that it had come to them by revelation from God. Nevertheless, throughout His ministry the personal element was the most prominent feature of His teaching. From first to last He asked of those to whom He spoke, not faith in doctrines so much as trust in Himself as the Sent of God who alone could reveal the Father's will.

And, notwithstanding the fact that He left the full recognition of His claims to develop gradually in the minds of His disciples, His testimony concerning Himself contained implicitly all the elements of a complete revelation of His Divine claims. Thus He familiarized His disciples with the use of names and titles, as 'Son of Man,' 'He who should come,' 'Son of God,' 'the Sent of God,' 'the Holy One of God,' 'the Christ,' which they gradually came to recognize as indicative of those claims. (See also NAMES AND TITLES OF CHRIST.)

3. With regard to the Kingdom itself, Jesus spoke of it now as a present thing, again as that which should be realized in the future. So He said at one time, 'Their is the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 5<sup>10</sup>), and again, 'Neither shall they say, Lo here! or, lo there! for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you' (Lk 17<sup>21</sup>). Again He spoke of the Kingdom as future, and that in connexion with the final coming, the Parousia, of the Son of Man; so in the parables of the Great Supper (Lk 14<sup>15-24</sup>), of the Marriage Feast (Mt 22<sup>1-14</sup>), of the Ten Virgins (Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>). In this there was no real contradiction, for the central conception of the Kingdom is that of a gradual development, the future growing out of the present. We recognize this in several conspicuous parables, and no less in the practical means which Jesus adopted of founding and developing His Church, notably in His choice and training of the Twelve as the nucleus of that society of which the Kingdom should consist. Of the former, the most important in this connexion are the parables of the Sower (Mt 13<sup>3-23</sup> || Mk 4<sup>1-20</sup> || Lk 8<sup>5-15</sup>), of the Seed growing secretly (Mk 4<sup>26-29</sup>), of the Mustard Seed and the Leaven (Mt 13<sup>31-32</sup> || Mk 4<sup>30-32</sup>). In these the obvious thought is that the Kingdom is already here, but only in germ, a secret, but a present and a growing thing, the complete realization of which only the day of the Lord shall declare. The Kingdom is thus not such as the common expectation of the Messianic hope had led Israel to expect, a thought of which even the disciples found it hard to dislodge their minds—an external condition of society into which they should one day be ushered as a matter of favouritism or of covenant right, and in which there were places of pre-eminence which could be the objects of earthly ambition, or a condition of temporal benefit which could be enjoyed in the future irrespective of spiritual fitness. Instead of this it is a spiritual blessing, the gift of God to receptive souls, for the individual and for the community of believers a condition of heart and life gradually developed in them by the power of Divine love. So closely is future blessedness, the inheriting of the Kingdom, dependent upon present faith and patient persevering effort, that our Lord is careful to warn His disciples that while 'it is' their 'Father's good pleasure to give' them 'the kingdom' (Lk 12<sup>32</sup>), it is possible for the most highly favoured to come short of it, and 'there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last' (Lk 13<sup>30</sup>; cf. Mt 19<sup>30</sup> 20<sup>16</sup> || Mk 10<sup>31</sup>, Mt 21<sup>31-32</sup>).

4. In this Kingdom the conditions of membership are manifestly of the first importance. These are (a) Repentance, and (b) Faith in God and in Jesus Christ whom He has sent.

Repentance (μετάνοια) means a complete and radical change of heart and life, a change so thoroughgoing that it can best be characterized by the word 'conversion,' a turning round. 'Except ye be converted (στροφῆτε, 'turn'), and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the Kingdom of heaven' (Mt 18<sup>3</sup>), is the teaching of Jesus according to the Synoptics, to which His words to Nicodemus in the Fourth Gospel almost exactly correspond: 'Except a man be born again (or 'from above,' ἄνωθεν), he cannot see the kingdom of God' (Jn 3<sup>3</sup>). Such a complete change as these words imply—'change of mind' (μετάνοια), 'convert,' 'turn round' (στροφῆσαι, Mt 13<sup>30</sup>), 'new birth' or 'birth from above' (γενεθῆναι ἄνωθεν, Jn 3<sup>3</sup>) is necessary for all, as Jesus shows by addressing His teaching on this theme not only to Pharisees like Nicodemus, but to His own disciples—notably in the parable of the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18<sup>23-35</sup>), in which, in answer to a question of Peter, He likens the condition of all recipients of the Divine forgiveness to that of a man who owes a debt of ten thousand talents, clearly meaning by that the infinitude of man's obligation to God. So universal and so heinous is sin according to the teaching of Jesus. Sin springs from the heart (Mt 15<sup>19-20</sup> || Mk 7<sup>20-23</sup>), from its natural alienation from God, from the infirmity of the flesh (Mt 26<sup>41</sup> || Mk 14<sup>38</sup>). Man is, moreover, tempted to sin by Satan as the author of evil; though Jesus does not teach any special doctrine of sin, or explain how evil first came into existence, but deals only with sin itself as an awful and universal fact. Then, as all are tainted with the universal disease, and as the righteousness which God demands must extend to the whole nature, not merely to word and action but to the heart and motives, it follows that man is lost, unable to save himself, and therefore Jesus describes His mission as that of seeking and saving the lost (Mt 18<sup>11</sup>, cf. Lk 19<sup>10</sup>). All are thus dependent upon the sovereign pardoning grace of God, and so Jesus says, 'No man can come unto me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him' (Jn 6<sup>44</sup>). But that this grace is not restricted in its operation by any hard and fast decree of election, Jesus teaches by the manner in which He describes His mission, which is that of seeking the lost 'till he find' them (Lk 15<sup>4</sup>), and by the universal call which He addresses to the weary and heavy-laden (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>).

While we may for convenience' sake distinguish between Repentance and Faith, Jesus so presents them as to represent Faith as the source of Repentance, the one involving the other and leading to it. Thus, to take one illustration, the repentance which in His conversation with Nicodemus He describes as a new birth, is spoken of in the same discourse as the result of an act of faith in Himself, which He likens to the simple look directed by the dying Israelites to the Brazen Serpent which Moses lifted up in the wilderness (Jn 3<sup>14</sup>). As Weiss has well put it (Bib. Theol. of the NT, i. 97)—

'The new revelation of God which is brought in the message concerning the Kingdom of God spontaneously works the repentance which Jesus demands. God does not demand that man should meet Him; He Himself meets man with graciousness, and thereby does the utmost that lies in His power to make man capable of the repentance in which He has His greatest joy (Lk 10:42). He does not make His revelation of salvation dependent upon the conversion of the people, as in the teaching of the prophets; He will work this conversion by the revelation of His grace.'

Thus, in the Gospel of John, Jesus makes faith in Himself the condition of salvation: 'He that believeth hath everlasting life' (Jn 6:40); and in line with such declarations is that doctrine, characteristic of the Johannine discourses, which seems to represent faith as knowledge, the acceptance of the testimony of the Son of God (Jn 3:18). All that this means is that to accept Christ's testimony, and to accept Christ Himself as the revelation of the Divine grace, is to become a child of God and a member of the Kingdom of God.

Again, Jesus demands not only faith and repentance, but insists as strongly as John the Baptist or the prophets of the OT upon the importance of living proofs of faith, and of fruits meet for repentance (Mt 3:8-10 || Lk 3:8, Mt 7:17-27 || Lk 6:43). Christ's disciples must prove their conversion and their right to the privileges of the Kingdom of God by their 'moral imitation of their Heavenly Father'; sonship must show itself by the family likeness. But as that ideal is far beyond the possibility of present attainment, the Christian life is described as a steep and narrow path, to press along which requires constant effort and unremitting watchfulness and prayer (Mt 7:12-21 || Lk 13:24-28; Mt 7:24-27 || Lk 6:47-49).

5. With regard to the significance of the Death and Resurrection of Jesus as the ultimate conditions of the establishment of the Kingdom of God, our Lord treated that doctrine as He did His Messianic claims in respect of His Divine nature. It is represented in the Gospels as the subject of gradual development, as a truth not at the beginning clearly made known even to the most favoured disciples, but taught first by suggestions and figures more or less veiled, then by warnings and predictions, which became clearer as the end drew near, to the effect that Jesus must die. Still it is present from the first, though only in germ, and though it is noted as that part of their Master's teaching which the disciples were most slow to apprehend. Thus it is represented as having been suggested so early as in the time of the Baptist, whose words, 'Behold the Lamb of God,' first led John and Andrew to follow Jesus (Jn 1:29-37). At a later period Jesus declared in express terms that 'the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Μάρτυρ ἑαυτοῦ δοῦναι), where the death of Jesus as a sacrifice of substitution appears to be distinctly spoken of (Mt 20:28 || Mk 10:45). The doctrine that salvation can come only through the voluntary sufferings and death of Jesus is so clearly taught by our Lord's later utterances as recorded in all the Gospels, and particularly in the Fourth, as, for example, in the discourse on the Bread of Life ('the bread which I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world,' Jn 6:51), in the discourse on the Good Shepherd ('the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep,' 10:11-15, cf. vv. 17-18), etc., that it is hardly necessary to enumerate them. One of the strongest proofs that the disciples understood Jesus to lay special emphasis upon the necessity of His death as an atoning sacrifice, lies in the fact that so large a portion of the Gospels is devoted to the narrative of the sufferings, death, and resurrection of Jesus; while the full account which all the Synoptists give of the institution of the Lord's Supper (Mt 26:26-29 || Mk 14:22-25 || Lk 22:17-20), and particularly the significant words of Jesus recorded by St. Matthew (26:28), 'This is my blood of the [new] covenant, which is shed for many for the remission of sins,' show that by appointing this ordinance by which to 'show forth his death,' as St. Paul expresses it (1 Co 11:26), Jesus singled out this part of His work as constituting the central truth of His manifestation to men, and summing up and applying the whole.

Again, like the Apostles in the Acts and the Epistles, all four Evangelists represent the Resurrection as the necessary seal of Christ's atoning work, confirming His victory over death and him that had the power of death, and as a testimony to the Father's acceptance of the sacrifice. So Jesus, in foretelling His death, conjoined with the prediction the assurance that He should rise again the third day. The Resurrection is the necessary complement of the Atoning Death.

6. Closely connected with these fundamental teachings of the Kingdom of God and the conditions of its realization are those which relate (a) to the growth and maintenance of the Kingdom after Christ's Ascension, and (b) to the final consummation and the judgment of the world.

(a) According to all the Gospels, the speciality of Christ's mission, as that was revealed to John the Baptist, was that He should baptize with the Holy Ghost (Mt 3:11 || Mk 1:8 || Lk 3:16; cf. Jn 1:33). All relate the descent of the Holy Spirit at the Baptism of Jesus (Mt 3:16-17 || Mk 1:10 || Lk 3:21-22). John the Baptist testifies (Jn 1:33-34) that He upon whom the Spirit descended and abode is He who baptizeth with the Holy Ghost. Jesus attributed His power to cast out demons to the Spirit of God (Mt 12:28). That the Spirit thus spoken of is a Person, and as such to be distinguished from Christ, is to be inferred from the solemn warning which Jesus addressed to those who attributed His miracles of exorcism to Satanic agency, when He said that blasphemy against the Son of Man should be forgiven, but that to blaspheme against the Holy Ghost was an unpardonable sin (Mt 12:31-32 || Mk 3:29 || Lk 12:10). Jesus taught, however, that the prediction of John was to be fulfilled only after the Son of Man was glorified. Thus we read, with reference to the promise that the Spirit should be in believers a perennial fountain of grace, 'This spake he of the Spirit which they that believe on him should receive: for the Holy Ghost was not yet given; because that Jesus was not yet glorified' (Jn 7:39). And Jesus Himself says (16:7) to the disciples, 'It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you.' The office of the Spirit is to abide with the disciples as the source of grace (7:17), to bring to their remembrance the teaching of Jesus (14:26, 15:26) and guide them into all truth (16:13), to give them power to discharge their spiritual functions (20:22-23) as leaders and teachers of the Church, and, as the Spirit of wisdom and utterance, to inspire them to testify faithfully and courageously for Christ in presence of their persecutors (Mt 10:20 || Mk 13:11 || Lk 12:11-12). Further, His function is to 'reprove the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment' (Jn 16:8-11). With Christ's teaching concerning the Spirit His revelation of God was complete, and accordingly, in one of His last discourses after the Resurrection, He commanded His Apostles to 'make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost' (Mt 28:19).
