(b) Our Lord's teaching concerning the final consummation of the Kingdom of God may be briefly summarized. The disciples were instructed to live in constant expectation of His Second Coming (Mt 24:42-51 || Mk 13:33-37 || Lk 12:35-38; cf. Mt 25:13).

That might occur at any time. His coming should, according to the prophecies of the OT, be heralded by certain signs in the world, by tumult and distress among the nations, and by portents in nature, earthquakes, storms, and the like (Mt 24<sup>29-31</sup> || Mk 13<sup>24-25</sup> || Lk 21<sup>25-26</sup>). Nevertheless He should come as a thief in the night, and surprise the worldly and the careless in the midst of their business or their pleasure (Mt 24<sup>42-44</sup> || Lk 17<sup>37</sup>). Then also Christ should by His angels 'gather together his elect from the four winds' (Mt 24<sup>31</sup>) for the purpose of taking them to Himself and saving them from destruction (Lk 17<sup>34-35</sup>). In connexion with this, Jesus spoke also of a time of sifting, at which all unworthy members should be cast out (Mt 13<sup>30</sup> || Mt 22<sup>31-32</sup> || Lk 13<sup>27</sup>). Finally, after the Kingdom had been thus purified should come the ultimate consummation. Jesus should appear as the Judge of all nations (Mt 25<sup>31-46</sup>), coming in the clouds (Mt 26<sup>64</sup> || Mk 14<sup>62</sup> || Lk 22<sup>69</sup>) to reward the righteous with eternal bliss in heaven and to sentence the wicked to eternal perdition (Mt 25<sup>34-46</sup>). DOMINION.—The word 'dominion' occurs only once in the Gospels, as a part of the phrase 'exercise dominion over' (κατακυριεύουσιν), in that passage in the Gospel of Matthew (20<sup>25</sup>) which records our Lord's reply to the ambitious request of Salome on behalf of her sons, and the words which He addressed to the disciples at the time. The RV of this passage, as of the parallel text in Mark (10<sup>45</sup>), is 'lord it over'. The same idea is expressed in a similar passage in Luke (22<sup>28</sup>), which gives Christ's words at the Last Supper with reference to the dispute among His disciples as to precedence, by the simple verb κυριεύουσιν, 'exercise lordship over' (RV 'have lordship over').

Again, in all three passages the verbs which are so translated are followed in the parallel clause of the verse by the words 'exercise authority over' or 'upon' (Mt 20<sup>25</sup> AV and RV || Mk 10<sup>45</sup> AV and RV, Lk 22<sup>28</sup> AV), 'have authority over' (Lk 22<sup>28</sup> RV), representing the words of the original κατακυριεύουσιν, ἐξουσιάζουσιν. The word 'authority' (ἐξουσία) and the verbs formed from it thus suggest themselves for consideration in connexion with the word rendered 'dominion' in the passage in Matthew.

1. The passages quoted from the Synoptics illustrate a characteristic feature of the Gospels, the manner in which they represent Jesus as postponing the assertion of His kingly rights, and, in connexion with this, the express teaching which they attribute to Him as to the nature of the dominion which He claimed. Thus, as He withstood the temptation of Satan (Lk 4<sup>6</sup>) to assume the royal sceptre which belonged to Him as Son of God, and to reign as the Divinely appointed king of a visible and temporal realm, so He resisted, as a repetition of that temptation, every suggestion or appeal that was made to Him, by the people or by His disciples, formally and publicly to appear as the Messiah. He would not suffer the people of Galilee to make Him a king (Jn 6<sup>15</sup>). He declared to Pilate that, although royal authority was His by right, His kingdom was not of this world, and was therefore not to be won or maintained and defended by temporal weapons (Jn 18<sup>36-37</sup>).

Now the texts which have been quoted from the Synoptics may be regarded as the loci classici of the teaching of Jesus with reference to the nature of the sovereignty claimed by Him, and to the principle of that spiritual dominion of which He spoke. They occur in connexion with what the Gospels tell us regarding the Messianic expectations of the Twelve, who, like most of their countrymen, anticipated in the near, and even, at times, in the immediate, future, the visible establishment of the personal reign of Christ as Prince of the House of David. They were addressed to the disciples at the close of Christ's ministry, in the one case in the course of His last journey to Jerusalem, in the other in connexion with the dispute at the Last Supper as to who should be accounted the greatest. The answer of Jesus in both cases—to the ambitious request of Salome, and to the dispute among the disciples—was the same, and the principle which He laid down was to this effect. For Master and for disciple the question of dominion is totally different from that which is agitated by the ambition of the world. Among the princes of the Gentiles the way to power and authority is the path of worldly ambition and self-assertion. It is not so in the Kingdom of God. There not self-assertion but self-denial is the way to supremacy. The way to dominion is the way of service. Places of supremacy there certainly are in the Kingdom of God, and they are reserved 'for those for whom they are prepared' of the Father. But they are allotted upon a definite, intelligible principle, and are not of favouritism. It is not so in the Kingdom of men. They who shall hold rank nearest to Christ in His Kingdom are they who shall most closely resemble Him in respect of lowliness, self-denial, and humble service. For disciple and for Master the law is the same in this respect, that 'he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.' So Christ is 'among you as he that serveth' (Lk 22<sup>27</sup>). In laying down the principle, Jesus illustrated it by reference to His own mission. 'The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Mt 20<sup>28</sup> || Mk 10<sup>45</sup>). And here as elsewhere the disciple must be as his Master, attaining his place in the Kingdom only by the way of self-humiliation, self-denial, self-sacrifice.

2. The use in these passages, in immediate connexion with the idea of dominion, of the words 'have authority over,' 'exercise authority over' (ἐξουσιάζουσιν, ἐξουσιάζουσιν), calls for some reference to the power or authority (ἐξουσία) attributed to Christ in connexion with His humiliation as well as with His exaltation. That during His ministry He possessed and exercised very complete and far-reaching authority, dominion in the sense of ἐξουσία, the natural synonym of κυριότης, 'lordship,' 'dominion,' is distinctly testified by all the Gospels.

Lordship (κυριότης) was expressly claimed by Him even in connexion with His state of humiliation. Thus, in controversy with the Pharisees, He claimed to be Lord of the Sabbath, and, as such, to be entitled to interpret the Sabbath law (Mt 12<sup>8</sup> || Mk 2<sup>28</sup> || Lk 6<sup>9</sup>). St. Luke tells us in his account of the healing of the paralytic, that 'the power of the Lord was present to heal' (5<sup>17</sup>). The message to the owners of the ass on which Jesus rode to Jerusalem was 'The Lord hath need of him' (Mt 21<sup>3</sup> || Mk 11<sup>3</sup> || Lk 19<sup>31-32</sup>). When Jesus had washed the disciples' feet, and was applying the lesson of that incident, He said, 'Ye call me Master and Lord: and ye say well; for so I am' (Jn 13<sup>13</sup>).

As Son of Man, He was invested with special power (ἐξουσία) to work miracles. As such He is represented as exercising a delegated authority, acting according to His Father's will (Jn 5<sup>30</sup>), but that with a spontaneity and directness unknown before. Such was His power over unclean spirits that they trembled and cried out at His approach, and were compelled to yield instant though fearful and reluctant obedience to His command (Mt 17 || Lk 4<sup>35</sup>). With a word He controlled the winds and waves (Mt 8<sup>26-31</sup> || Mk 4<sup>35-41</sup> || Lk 8<sup>24-25</sup>). So wide and great was His authority over the powers of life and death, that His word, even though spoken at a distance, was sufficient to effect an instantaneous cure, as when His word of assurance spoken at Cana to the nobleman was followed immediately by the cure of his child who lay sick at Capernaum (Jn 4<sup>46</sup>); and when He confirmed the faith of the centurion, who likened Christ's power over disease to his own authority over his soldiers, by speaking the word which healed his servant (Mt 8<sup>5-13</sup> || Lk 7<sup>2-10</sup>). Three times He raised the dead with a word: in the case of the widow's son (Lk 7<sup>11-16</sup>), in that of Jairus' daughter (Mt 9<sup>18-26</sup> || Mk 5<sup>21-43</sup> || Lk 8<sup>40-56</sup>), and in that of Lazarus (Jn 11<sup>1-44</sup>). He could even delegate to others His power over unclean spirits and to heal disease, as He did in His mission, first of the Twelve, and again of the Seventy disciples (Mt 10<sup>6-8</sup> || Mk 6<sup>7-13</sup> || Lk 9<sup>1-6</sup> 10<sup>1-16</sup>). Again, He claimed and exercised power on earth to forgive sins (Mt 9<sup>1</sup> || Mk 2<sup>1</sup> || Lk 5<sup>1</sup>, cf. Lk 7<sup>36</sup>).

3. According to the Johannean discourses, Jesus declared that the Father had committed to Him power to execute judgment 'because he is the Son of Man' (Jn 5<sup>27</sup>). This function refers specially to His state of exaltation. He came not to judge, but to save the world (Jn 12<sup>47</sup>); 'I judge no man,' He said to the Jews (8<sup>15</sup>). At the same time His work and teaching, even His very presence in the world, meant a judgment, inasmuch as they compelled men to declare themselves either for or against Christ, and so pass judgment upon themselves (cf. Jn 9<sup>22</sup>); and as Jesus said Himself, 'The word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day' (12<sup>48</sup>). To Jesus as Son of Man all judgment and authority and power have been committed. All things are given into His hands (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, Jn 3<sup>35</sup> || 13<sup>3</sup>), that He may guide and strengthen His Church (Mt 28<sup>18</sup>), and at His second coming appear as the Judge of all nations (Mt 25<sup>31-46</sup>). It is He who is to pass the final sentence upon the just and upon the unjust. On that day He will say to those who have falsely called Him 'Lord, Lord,' 'I know you not' (Mt 7<sup>21-23</sup>). He will open to His faithful ones the door to the eternal festival of joy, but will close the door of the heavenly marriage feast on 'the unfaithful' (Mt 7<sup>21-23</sup> || Lk 13<sup>27-29</sup>). 'He shall sit upon the throne of his glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations' (Mt 25<sup>31-32</sup>). In connexion with these predictions of the events of the Day of Judgment, Jesus says: 'The Son of Man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity' (Mt 13<sup>41</sup>). The angels are thus represented as being subject to the dominion of Christ in His exaltation, as His servants, obeying His behests; as even during His life on earth they appeared as ministering spirits obedient to His command, and waiting upon Him as courtiers upon their Sovereign (Mt 4<sup>11</sup> 28<sup>10</sup>, Lk 22<sup>43</sup>).

Lastly, as the fruit of His work of redemption, and as part of the glory which He has won by His perfect submission to the Father's will, there is given to Him, in that time of waiting which must pass before the final completion of His kingdom, 'all power in heaven and on earth' (Mt 28<sup>18</sup>), as the Father has 'given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as he has given him' (Jn 17<sup>2</sup>, cf. 10<sup>25</sup>). DOOR (θύρα, cf. θυρωρός, 'doorkeeper,' 'porter').—The word 'door' is frequently found in the Gospels, sometimes in the literal, often in the figurative sense.

1. We need, first, to get clearly in mind the meaning of the term in Oriental usage. By 'door' is usually meant the outside or entrance doorway, but often the 'door' in distinction from the 'doorway,' the frame of wood, stone, or metal that closes the doorway. The outside of the Oriental house has little ornament or architectural attractiveness of any kind. The 'door,' however, and the projecting 'window' above it, are exceptions to this rule. The doors, windows, and doorways are often highly ornamented (Is 54<sup>12</sup>, Rev 21<sup>3</sup>), enriched with arabesques, and, if to-day it be the house of a Moslem, the door will have sentences from the Koran inscribed upon it (cf. Dt 6<sup>9</sup>). The 'doors' are usually of hard wood, studded with nails, or sometimes covered with sheet-iron. They are often very heavy. They invariably open inwards, and are furnished on the inside with strong bars and bolts. They have usually wooden locks, which are worked by wooden keys of such size that they could make formidable clubs (Is 22<sup>22</sup>, cf. Land and Book, i. 493). There is an opening in the door for the insertion of the hand and the introduction of the key from the outside, the lock being reached only from the inside. On entering the 'door' there is usually a vestibule, where, in daytime, the 'doorkeeper' is found, and where the master often receives the casual visitor (cf. Gn 19<sup>12</sup> 23<sup>10</sup> 34<sup>10</sup> and Job 29<sup>7</sup>).

The 'doors' leading into the 'rooms' or 'chambers' that open upon the court are not usually supplied with locks or bolts; a curtain, as a rule, being all that separates one of these 'chambers' from the 'court,' the idea being that all is private and secure within the outer gate (cf. Dt 24<sup>10</sup>, Ac 10<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>13</sup>).

The 'doorway' consists of three parts: the threshold or sill (sometimes used for 'door'), the two side-posts, and the lintel (Ex 12<sup>3</sup>). The doors of ancient Egypt, and probably of contemporary nations, swung upon vertical pintles which projected from the top and bottom of the door into sockets in the lintel and threshold respectively. The commonest form of door had the pindle in the middle of the width, so that, as it opened, a way was afforded on each side of it for ingress or egress.

Occasionally we find that the 'chamber,' or private room, had its own door and fastenings. In Mt 6<sup>9</sup>, 'When thou hast shut thy door,' the word used means not only closed, but fastened it—giving the idea of complete privacy. See art. CLOSET. In Mt 23<sup>9</sup>, 'the door was shut,' it is clearly the outside or entrance-door that is meant. When this one outer door was shut, all communication with the outside world was cut off. Then nothing but persistent knocking at this door, and loud entreaty, would succeed in securing even a hearing. In this case the appeal was made to the bridegroom himself, who, to this day, is considered in the East sovereign of the occasion.

2. When Jesus said, 'I am the door' (Jn 10<sup>9</sup>), He clearly meant to exclude every other form or means of mediation. But through Him there is an unhindered entering into and going out of the fold (cf. Nu 27<sup>17</sup>).

3. When it is said that Joseph, 'a rich man of Arimathea,' begged the body of Jesus, laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock, and rolled a great stone to the door of the tomb (Mt 27<sup>60</sup>, Mk 16<sup>3</sup>), we have a reference to a unique kind of door. The great roll-stone is often mentioned in the Talmud, but only in describing interments of the dead (Keim). It was clearly designed to protect the dead bodies and the other contents of the tomb from robbers, petty thieves, and birds and beasts of prey. One large tomb is now shown half a mile north of Jerusalem, which has a huge circular stone, like a great milestone on edge, cut from the solid rock, together with the channel in which it revolves. There are signs that it was originally furnished with a secret fastening, doubtless to protect the contents—spices, costly linen, jewellery, etc., against plunder. The 'Tomb of Mariamme', recently uncovered south of the city, and the so-called 'Tomb of Lazarus' at Bethany, likewise have doors with similar 'roll-stones' (cf. art. TOMB). See also art. COURT HOUSE.

DOUBT.—

In Lat. dubitare, from duo 'two' and bita 'go'; Germ. Zweifeln, Zweifel; from zwei, 'two'; Mid. Eng. douten, 'to doubt', had the meaning of to fear ('I doubt some foul play' (Shakespeare), 'nor slack her fearful hand for danger's doubt' (Spenser), and this meaning, perhaps, survives in such expressions as 'I doubt he will not come'. But, as commonly used, to doubt means to be of two minds, to waver, to hesitate. It suggests the idea of perplexity; of being at a loss, in a state of suspense. The questioning attitude is implied. The word has, in short, a variety of meanings.

References in the Gospels.—The word 'doubt' occurs several times in AV and RV. It is used, however, to translate several Greek terms; not all these invariably rendered by the word in question. A study of the respective passages reveals differing circumstances and conditions, different types of character, a variety of subjects exercising the mind. Doubt in several phases is in illustration.

(a) The doubt of perplexity. Thus in Mk 6<sup>35</sup>, Lk 24<sup>13</sup>, Jn 13<sup>22</sup>—where the verb ἀπορίσθαι occurs (the strengthened compound ἀπορίσθαι is found in Lk 9<sup>7</sup>). There is no question in these passages of the apprehension of religious truth; the idea suggested is rather that of being taken aback, disturbed, distracted, by the unintelligible and the unexpected. Herod is 'much perplexed' (Mk 6<sup>35</sup> RV, cf. Lk 9<sup>7</sup>) as he listens to the Baptist, as reports reach him concerning Jesus; he is puzzled, at a loss for explanations. And thus in Jn 13<sup>22</sup> 'the disciples looked one upon the other, doubting of whom he spake'; the unexpected statement has bewildered them. Similar feelings may be recognized in the case of the women at the sepulchre (Lk 24<sup>4</sup>); they are 'much perplexed'; utterly unable, that is, to account for the empty tomb. A like meaning may, perhaps, be read into the 'how long dost thou hold us in suspense?' of Jn 10<sup>24</sup> (ἵνα ψυχῆν ἡμῶν ἀπέσῃ): the Jews being understood as professing an uncertainty which could be at once dispelled by some plain declaration on the part of Jesus.

(b) Wavering faith. A second group of passages, where the verbs περιπαύεσθαι and δισταίω occur, has now to be considered. Again the word 'doubt' is found in AV and RV, but with reference to a mental condition other than that which has been noted in the preceding paragraph. A religious significance is now observable; the existence of faith is implied, but it is an imperfect, a wavering faith. Because of distractions of one kind or another, confidence is impaired. The doubters referred to are sometimes the ἀληπίστοι: their faith not only wavering but small. Thus in Lk 12<sup>29</sup> 'neither be ye of doubtful mind' (καὶ μὴ περιπαύεσθε), the context supplies the explanation; anxiety about earthly things is incompatible with absolute trust in the Fatherhood of God. So also in Mt 14<sup>31</sup> 'wherefore didst thou doubt?' (εἰς τί ἐδιστακας); where St. Peter's confidence has given way before sudden panic. And thus, perhaps, in Mt 28<sup>7</sup> 'but some doubted' (ἐδιστασαν). What, precisely, the condition of these genuine disciples was is difficult to determine, but it was one which left them unreceptive while others were convinced of a manifestation of the living Lord. With this passage may be compared Lk 24<sup>38</sup>; the διανοήματα (RV 'reasonings') being significant of some hesitation on the part of those who could not at once realize that the mysterious visitor was none other than Jesus Himself.

(c) The critical attitude. This is implied by the verb ἀσπίθεω; a term which, as used in NT, denotes the absence of faith, the paralysis of faith. It occurs but twice in the Gospels (Mt 21<sup>21</sup>, Mk 11<sup>22</sup>); where the power of faith is, by implication, contrasted with the impotency which is involved in the want of faith. Thought seems to be directed to the inevitable consequence of regarding Divine things as a subject for curious investigation rather than as matter of personal concern. On the one hand, there is the emphatic declaration which may be expressed in the words of Bacon, 'Man, when he resteth and assureth himself upon divine Protection and Favour, gathereth a Force and Faith [in its sense of fidelity] which Human Nature, in its selfe, could not obtaine.' On the other hand, there is the implied warning that, as the vision of God darkens and vanishes, man's capacity for useful action becomes weaker, until at length it dies away.

H. L. JACKSON.
DOVE (πελαγός).—Its gentle nature makes the dove a frequent simile in ancient literature. Christ bids His disciples to be harmless as doves, and to unite with such gentleness a wisdom like the serpent's (Mt 10<sup>16</sup>). Meyer, in loc., takes this to mean, 'Be prudent in regard to dangers in which you are placed, quick to see and avoid dangers; and always be full of uprightness, never taking any questionable way of escape.' As the serpent is the most cunning of the beasts of the field, so should the Lord's disciples have wisdom to understand the subtleties of Satan; but no evil is to mix with such wisdom. Along with it there must be found a purity and simplicity of heart of which the harmless, gentle dove is the symbol. The truest wisdom for the Christian is to keep always the simplicity of the dove. A nature purified by the Spirit of Christ will have wise penetration enough to defeat all the wiles of Satan.

The dove, the emblem of perfect innocence, is used (Mt 3<sup>2</sup> and parallels) as a symbol of the Holy Spirit, who is the power and wisdom of God, acting on the spirits of men. When the dove appeared to sit on the Saviour's head, it denoted the Divine recognition of His holiness (v. 17), and His official consecration to the Messianic ministry. As the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews says, 'He was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners' (7<sup>26</sup>).

It has been thought that the dove had a sacred character among the Hebrews. Though it was a favourite food with some neighbouring peoples, it was not eaten in Palestine. Young pigeons and doves were offered in sacrifice, where no sacrificial meal was involved. So we find in the temple courts them that sold doves (Mt 21<sup>12</sup>, Mk 11<sup>15</sup>, Jn 2<sup>14-16</sup>),—no doubt for such sacrifices,—whom Christ drove out, along with the money-changers. In Palestine the dove was considered sacred by the Phoenicians and the Philistines, and the Samaritans were often accused of worshipping it. There were holy doves at Mecca; and, according to Lucian (Dea Syria, 54), doves were taboo to the Syrians; he who touched them being unclean a whole day.

In Christian Art in representations of the Lord's Baptism, the presence of the Holy Spirit is indicated by the dove. In churches in early times the figure of a dove appeared in the baptisteries, a golden or silver dove being suspended above the font. Lamps, too, were sometimes made in the form of doves. In later times pyxes were sometimes made of gold and silver in the shape of a dove, and used for the reservation of the host.

Exclusive of the turtle-dove, four species of doves are found in Palestine: Columba palumbus, the ring-dove, or wood-pigeon; Columba oenas, the stock-dove, found in Gilead and Basian and the Jordan Valley; Columba risia, the rock-dove, abundant along the coast and in the uplands; Columba schimperii, closely allied to the preceding, and found in the interior.

DOXOLOGY.—An ascription of praise to God in forms of words more or less fixed by usage. Though the term does not occur in the NT, it contains many doxologies, and they were an important element in the devotional life of the primitive Christians. This indeed was inevitable, because they carried with them what was best in the practice of Judaism, and were especially influenced in the expression of their worship by the language of the OT.

1. The OT and Jewish usage.—Doxologies are common in the OT, being found in germ even in its oldest portions. In the Song of Deborah praise is given to Jehovah for national deliverance (Jg 5<sup>2-5</sup>; Ex 18<sup>21</sup>). In 1 K 18<sup>39</sup> there is thankful recognition of Jehovah's power and control in national events. The Psalms are especially rich (28<sup>3</sup> 34<sup>2-2</sup> 135, 146), though one form, 'give thanks unto Jehovah, for His lovingkindness endureth for ever,' seems to be the most common both in the Psalms and all post-exilic literature (Ps 106<sup>1</sup> 107<sup>1</sup> 118<sup>1, 2, 3</sup>, 1 Ch 16<sup>24</sup>, 2 Ch 5<sup>13</sup> 7<sup>2, 4</sup>, Ezr 3<sup>11</sup>). The regular liturgical conclusion of the services of the Temple, and afterwards of the Synagogue, came to be a doxology beginning 'blessed be (or 'is') God.' By the time of our Lord the employment of doxological expressions had increased so largely, that they were in the mouth of the people for any event which stirred their gratitude or wonder, in fact as thanksgiving for almost everything in life. Though the fundamental religious idea of the doxology, that Jehovah is the Holy One whose sovereign power must be acknowledged at all times, was a noble one, its use had too often degenerated into the veriest formalism.

2. NT usage.—Traces of Jewish custom may be seen in the Gospels (Mt 18<sup>3</sup>, Mk 2<sup>2</sup>, Lk 14. 48 22<sup>20</sup> 52. 28 7<sup>13</sup>). The words and attendant conditions of the life of Jesus so impressed the people that a new hope was born in them, and they praised God for signs of His returning favour to Israel through this prophet. Jesus does not yet receive Divine homage. No doxology is offered to Him anywhere in the Gospels, for the Messianic acclaim (Mk 11<sup>9-10</sup>) is not to be so interpreted (see Dalman, Words of Jesus, 220ff., and Swete, in loc.). God alone has the right to such ascription, for He is 'holy'; He is ἁγιόγραφος, the One to whom blessing is due (Mk 14<sup>6</sup>), ἁγίος ἄγιος being a well-known Jewish formula. See art. BENEEDICTION and BLESSING.

Immediately after the Resurrection, Jesus is associated with the Father in glory, and receives worship as Messiah and Son of God. This is the universal Apostolic view (Ac 2<sup>33-36</sup> 3<sup>13, 15</sup> 5<sup>3</sup>, Ro 1<sup>4</sup>, Ph 2<sup>6-11</sup>, He 1<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>9</sup>, Ja 2<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>17</sup>). So the ascription of doxologies to the risen Christ naturally followed. But the doxology continued to be addressed most frequently to God the Father (Ro 11<sup>36</sup>, Gal 1<sup>5</sup>, Eph 3<sup>14-21</sup>, Ph 4<sup>10</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>17</sup> 6<sup>13</sup>, 1 P 6<sup>11</sup>, Rev 7<sup>10</sup>). In several Jesus Christ is associated more or less directly with God the Father (Ro 16<sup>7</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>11</sup>, Jude 2<sup>5</sup>, Rev 5<sup>13</sup>). Ro 9<sup>8</sup> and He 13<sup>21</sup> present baffling evidence as to the recipient; but in 2 Ti 4<sup>18</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>18</sup>, Rev 1<sup>6</sup> glory is ascribed to Jesus Christ. Thus in conformity with Christian belief the OT usage was expanded, so that at a very early date there arose a Christian formula, which in the public adoration of the worship of the Church would serve in a secondary sense as a creed, expressing the doctrine that the risen Christ shared in Divine honour with the Father.

3. Structure.—The doxologies of the NT consist of three main parts.

(a) The Person to whom praise is given. This is, as we have seen, most frequently God the Father, though Jesus Christ is associated with Him. Attributes are often added, usually to emphasize the Divine blessing which has occasioned the praise. In Eph 3<sup>20-21</sup>, εἰς, a clause descriptive of the power of the Almighty serves to justify the Apostle's prayer for strength on behalf of his readers. See Ro 16<sup>7</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>17</sup> 6<sup>13</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>18</sup>, Jude 2<sup>5, 23</sup>, Rev 1<sup>6</sup>, 8 5<sup>13</sup>.

(b) The second term is almost invariably δόξα ('glory'), either alone or with some significant addition (Ep 3<sup>21</sup>), the chief exceptions being 1 Ti 6<sup>13</sup> ('honour and power'), 1 P 5<sup>11</sup> ('the dominion'). The amplitude of the doxologies in the Apocalypse deserves attention, the praise being threefold (4<sup>11</sup> 19<sup>1</sup>), fourfold (5<sup>13</sup>), or sevenfold in its perfection (7<sup>12</sup>). This full-voiced glory offered to the Lamb (5<sup>13</sup>), in this book of Hebrew cast, shows how thoroughly it was the belief of the circle from which it issued that Jesus transcended every created being.

Except in 1 P 4<sup>11</sup> the copula is omitted, so that it must be determined from the context whether the doxology is affirmative or precatory (see Lightfoot on Gal 1<sup>5</sup>; Chase, Lord's Prayer, p. 169; Didache, viii. 2; Clement of Rome, 88).

(c) The third integral part of the doxology in its simplest form is εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας ('unto the ages'), which denotes the eternity of the sovereign rule of the Lord. Before the mind of the Apostolic writers, however, the future rolls out in a series of æons, so that the normal form is expanded very frequently into εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰῶνων, in order to cover all possible periods of time (Gal 1<sup>5</sup>, Ph 4<sup>20</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>17</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>18</sup>, He 13<sup>21</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>11</sup>, Rev 5<sup>13</sup> 7<sup>12</sup>). See also Eph 3<sup>11</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>18</sup>, Jude 25.

The conclusion of all doxologies except 2 P 3<sup>18</sup> is ἀμήν.

4. The Doxology in the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6<sup>13</sup>).—It can no longer be doubted that this was not a part of the prayer as it stood originally in Matthew. The uncial evidence is very weak (L<sup>42</sup>), and the variations in the early versions are numerous (Syrian omits 'and the power'; the Sinaitic is defective, and the old Latin (k) and the Sahidic differ from each other and from the Syriac). The form found in the Didache (viii. 2, x. 5) ultimately developed into the full expression ('the kingdom and the power and the glory'), which probably passed into the Syrian text from the liturgical usage of the Syrian Church. (See Hort's Notes on Select Readings, p. 9). Of this final doxology the original source may have been 1 Ch 29<sup>11</sup>, which shaped the Synagogue usage and thereby that of the Christian Church. No Jewish benediction was complete without reference to 'the kingdom' of Jehovah. It calls attention to this that He to whom the kingdom belongs, also has the power to hear the prayer which primarily has in view the establishing of that kingdom, and that He is therefore to be praised for ever' (Weiss). See, further, art. LORD'S PRAYER.

6. The Angelic Hymn (Lk 24), in its longer and less correct text, gave rise to the Gloria in Excelsis (Apost. Const. vii. 47). The Doxologia Minor ('Glory be to the Father,' etc.) may possibly be traced back to Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, but there is no other sign of it in the NT. However, to follow the fortunes of these doxologies would carry us beyond our limits. (See Smith's Dictionary of Christian Antiquities).

DRAUGHT OF FISHES.—A twice repeated miracle: (1) at the beginning of the Lord's ministry, (2) after the Resurrection. The main points are similar, but differences in the details have always been considered important and significant.

1. Lk 5<sup>1-11</sup>. At the Lake of Gennesaret, Jesus, after teaching from Peter's boat, bids him put out and let down the nets for a draught. He and his companions have toiled all the night without success, but obey, and enclose a great multitude of fishes, so that the nets are in danger of breaking. With the aid of their partners they fill the boats, which begin to sink. Peter, who some time before had been brought to Jesus by his brother Andrew (Jn 1<sup>4</sup>) and had followed Him as His disciple (Mt 4<sup>18</sup>, Mk 1<sup>19</sup>), now begs Jesus to leave him, for he is 'a sinful man' (the vision of the Divine is the revelation of man's sin), but on a repeated command leaves all and follows Jesus.

2. Jn 21<sup>1-14</sup>. Some days or weeks after the Resurrection, when the Apostles have returned to their work as Galilean fishermen, after a night of fruitless labour, when they are drawing near the shore, an unrecognized voice hails them, asking if they have anything to sell for food. On their answering in the negative, they are advised to cast the net on the right side of the ship. Having done so, they are not able to draw the net for the multitude of fishes. Instinctively John recognizes the Lord, and tells Peter, who at once swims to land. On drawing the net, the number of 'great fishes' is found to be 153, yet the net is not broken. None of the disciples has any doubt that 'it is the Lord.'

The natural explanation of the miracle, that from a distance Jesus saw what those in the boat failed to observe, is possible, but is not necessary. The power is rather that of guiding to the required place. 'The miracle lies in the circumstances and not in the mere fact. The events came to men from the sphere of their daily labour, and were at once felt to be the manifestations of a present power of God' (Westcott, Characteristics of the Gospel Miracles),—in the second case the manifestation of the power of the risen Lord.

The significant differences between the details of the two incidents have been drawn out by St. Augustine (On Joh. cxlii. 7). 'The one miracle was the symbol of the Church at present, the other of the Church perfected; in the one we have good and bad, in the other good only; there Christ also is on the water, here He is on the land; there the draught is left in the boats, here it is landed on the beach; there the nets are let down as it might be, here in a special part; there the nets are mending, here they are not broken; there the boats are on the point of sinking with their load, here they are not laden; there the fish are not numbered, here the number is exactly given' (Westcott, St. John, in loc.). For interpretations of the number of fish (Jn 211), see Westcott and other commentators.

DRAW-NET (σαγήνη, seine).—For fuller description see art. NETS. This kind of net is mentioned in the Gospels only in the parable of Mt 13<sup>47-50</sup>, where it is very much in point. Being usually of great size and sweeping through an immense area, it collects many varieties of fish—worthless, undersized, even dead fish, as well as the choice and the living. The process of fishing with a seine gives the impression of comprehensiveness and completeness. To one who has watched it—the very gradual progress of the operation, the extended area slowly encircled, the final drawing up of the net on the beach, and the sorting of its varied contents, with the reservation of some and the rejection of others—the aptness of the parable becomes very apparent.

The parable closes the series of seven in Mt 13, in which various aspects of the Kingdom of Heaven are presented. It is parallel in meaning to the second of the series,—the Tares and the Wheat,—yet it has its distinct individuality. It points, like that parable, to the intermixture of good and evil in the Church in its present stage, and it is implicit in the figure used that no absolute separation is possible or to be thought of now. But the emphasis of the parable and of the explanation added by our Lord, lies not upon the fact of the intermixture, but upon the certainty that there will be a decisive end to it. A time of deliberate (meditative) and final severance is announced as a warning to the evil, as an assurance to the good. The parable is concerned with the future rather than with the present, hence its suitability at the end of the series. As must be expected, the figure is not quite adequate. The whole operation of fishing is carried out by the same instrument. But the separation of the good and the evil at the end of the world will be effected not by the men through whom the Kingdom was extended, but by the angels, to whom this ministry is always assigned (Mt 13<sup>41</sup> 24<sup>31</sup> 25<sup>31</sup>, Rev 14<sup>18-19</sup>).

This parable, like that of the Tares, was much appealed to in the Donatist controversy. The Donatists, emphasizing purity as a note of the Church, maintained that all must be excluded from its outward communion to whom that note could not be ascribed. Augustine showed that such attempted separation was forbidden by our Lord, apart from the case of open evildoers, and that He had not contemplated a community in its present stage free from admixture of evil. The net must contain both good and bad fish till it is drawn to the beach. As against schism, he points out the folly of those who, like fish breaking through or leaping over the net to escape the company of worthless fish within, refuse to wait the final and thorough separation appointed by God, and in mistakenly pressing the purity of the Church lose its catholicity (Augustine, Enarr. in Ps. 64, 8; cf. also Enarr. in Ps. 126, 2; Coll. Cath. d. 3; ad Rom. Post. Coll. 4, 8, 10).

What conception of the Kingdom of Heaven is indicated by the parable? The parable may be said to be an expansion of the idea contained in 'fishers of men.' Taken by itself, it might seem to support the identification of the Kingdom of Heaven with the Church; but in other contexts the Kingdom of Heaven (or of God) requires a much more comprehensive explanation. Harnack's assertion that our Lord meant by this term, so constantly recurring in His teaching, only an inward experience of the believer (Das Wesen des Christentums, p. 35 ff.), seems quite unsuited to this passage. So, too, does the Abbé Loisy's explanation of the Kingdom as being still entirely in the future, and existing in the present only as an expectation (The Gospel and the Church, § ii.). The parable, naturally interpreted, certainly suggests a visible community. The Kingdom is conceived of both as inward and outward, consisting in its present stage both of those who are animated by its true spirit, and those who belong to it only so far that they are included in its external organization. Again, the Kingdom is represented as belonging to the present, and yet as awaiting its consummation in a future crisis of judgment. And it is in idea universal ('gathered of every kind'), tending to include all men within its bounds.

'The Kingdom in its highest and most Christian sense is the working of "invisible laws" which penetrate below the surface, and are gradually progressive and expansive in their operation. But in this, as in other cases, spiritual forces take to themselves an outward form: they are embodied in a vessel of clay, finer or coarser as the case may be, not only in men as individuals, but in men as a community or communities. The society then becomes at once a vehicle and an instrument of the force by which it is animated, not a perfect vehicle or a perfect instrument,—a field of wheat mingled with tares, a net containing bad fish as well as good,—but analogous to those other visible institutions by which God accomplishes His gracious purposes amongst men' (Sanday, Hastings' DB, art. 'Jesus Christ', II. B. b. (2), (v. l.). A. E. Ross.

DREAM.—The interest of the student of the Gospels in dreams turns upon the occurrence in the opening chapters of Matthew of the record of no fewer than five supernatural dreams (1st 21st, 12th, 13th, 14th, 22nd). Later in the same Gospel mention is made of a remarkable dream which came to the wife of Pilate (27th). There is no reference to dreams elsewhere in the NT except in a citation from the OT in Ac 2nd and in an obscure verse in Jude (v. 4).

No allusion is made in the Gospels, or indeed in the whole NT, to dreams as phenomena forming part of the common experience of man. Any such allusions that may occur in Scripture are, of course, purely incidental; they are therefore in the whole extent of Scripture very infrequent. Barely enough exist to assure us that dreams were thought of by the Hebrews very much as they are by men of average good sense in our own day. Men then, too, were visited with pleasant dreams which they knew were too good to be true (Ps 123rd), and afflicted with nightmares which drove rest from their beds (Job 7th). To them, too, dreams were the type of the evanescent and shadowy, whatever suddenly flies away and cannot be found (Job 20th, Ps 73rd). The vanity and deceptiveness of dreams were proverbial (Ec 5th, Is 29th). The hungry man may dream that he eats, but his soul continues empty; the thirsty man may dream that he drinks, but he remains faint (Is 29th). Their roots were set in the multitude of cares, and their issue was emptiness (Ec 5th, 7). When the Son of Sirach (34th, 4) represents them as but reflexions of our waking experiences, to regard which is to catch at a shadow and to follow after the wind, he has in no respect passed beyond the Biblical view. (Cf. Delitzsch, Biblical Psychology, p. 328; Orelli, art. 'Träume' in PRE<sup>3</sup>).

The interest of the Bible in dreams is absorbed by the rare instances in which they are made the vehicles of supernatural revelation. That they were occasionally so employed is everywhere recognized, and they therefore find a place in the several enumerations of the modes of revelation (Nu 12th, Dt 13th, 1 S 28th, 1 J 2nd, Ac 2nd, Jer 23rd, 23rd, 27th, 29th, Zec 10th; Job 4th, 33rd stand somewhat apart). In this matter, too, the Son of Sirach retains the Biblical view, explicitly recognizing that dreams may be sent by the Most High in the very passage in which he reproves the folly of looking upon dreams in general as sources of knowledge (34th). The superstitious attitude characteristic of the whole heathen world, which regards all dreams as omens, and seeks to utilize them for purposes of divination, receives no support whatever from the Biblical writers. Therefore in Israel there arose no 'houses of dreams,' there was no place for a guild of dream-examiners or 'dream-critics.' When on rare occasions God did vouchsafe symbolical dreams to men, the professed dream-interpretors of the most highly trained castes stood helpless before them (Gn 37. 40. 41, Dn 2. 4). The interpretation of really God-sent dreams belonged solely to God Himself, the sender, and only His messengers could read their purport. There could be no more striking indication of the gulf that divides the Biblical and the ethnic views of dreams. If there is a hint of an overestimate of dreams among some Israelites (Jer 23rd, 27th), this is mentioned only to be condemned, and is obviously a trait not native to Israel, but, like all the soothsaying in vogue among the ill-instructed of the land, borrowed from the surrounding heathenism (cf. Lehmann, Aberglaube und Zauberei, p. 56). If there are possible suggestions that there were methods by which prophetic dreams were sought (Jer 29th, 1 S 28th), these suggestions are obscure, and involve no commendation of such usages as prevailed among the heathen. All the supernatural dreams mentioned in the Bible were the unsought gift of Jehovah; and there is not the slightest recommendation in the Scriptural narrative of any of the superstitious practices of either seeking or interpreting dreams which constitute the very nerve of ethnic dream-lore (cf. F. B. Jevons in Hastings' DB i. 622).

Very exaggerated language is often met with regarding the place which supernatural dreams occupy in Scripture. The writer of the article 'Songes' in Lichtenberger's Encyc. des Sciences Relig. (xi. 641), for example, opens a treatment of the subject dominated by this idea with the statement that, 'as everywhere in antiquity, dreams play a preponderant rôle in the religion of the Hebrews.' Even M. Bonché-Leclercq, who usually studies precision, remarks that 'the Scriptures are filled with apparitions and prophetic dreams' (Histoire de la divination dans l'antiquité, i. 278). Nothing could be more contrary to the fact. The truth is the supernatural dream is a very uncommon phenomenon in Scripture. Although as we have seen, dreams are a recognized mode of Divine communication, and dream-revelations may be presumed therefore to have occurred throughout the whole history of revelation; yet very few are actually recorded, and they oddly clustered at two or three critical points in the development of Israel. Of each of the two well-marked types of supernatural dreams (cf. Baur, Symbolik und Mythologie, II. i. 142)—those in which direct Divine revelations are communicated (Gn 15th, 20th, 28th, 31st, 1 K 3rd, Mt 1st, 2nd, 12th, 23rd, 27th) and symbolical dreams which receive Divine interpretations (Gn 37th, 40th, 41st, Jg 7th, Dn 2nd, 4th, 7th)—only some half-score of clear instances are given. All the symbolical dreams, it will be observed further, with the exception of the one recorded in Jg 7th (and this may have been only a 'providential' dream), occur in the histories of Joseph and Daniel; and all the dreams of direct Divine communication, with the exception of the one to Solomon (1 K 3rd), in the histories of the nativity of Israel or of the nativity of Israel's Redeemer. In effect, the patriarchal stories of the Book of Genesis, the story of Daniel at the palace of the king, and the story of the birth of Jesus, are the sole depositions of supernatural dreams in Scripture; the apparent exceptions (Jg 7th, 1 K 3rd, Mt 27th) may be reduced to the single one of 1 K 3rd.

The significance of the marked clustering of recorded supernatural dreams at just these historical points it is not easy to be perfectly sure of. Perhaps it is only a part of the general tendency of the supernatural manifestations recorded in Scripture to gather to the great historical crises; throughout Scripture the creative epochs are the supernaturalistic epochs. Perhaps, on the other hand, it may be connected with the circumstance that at just these particular periods God's people were brought into particularly close relations with the outside world. We have but to think of Abraham and Abimelech, of Jacob and Laban, of Joseph and Pharaoh, of Daniel and Nebuchadnezzar, of Joseph and the Magi, to observe how near at hand the suggestion lies that the choice of dreams in these instances as the medium of revelation has some connexion with the relation in which the recipient stood at the moment to influences arising from the outer world, or at least to some special interaction between Israel and that world.

In entertaining such a conjecture we must beware, however, of imagining that there was something heathenish in the recognition of dreams as vehicles of revelation; or even of unduly depreciating dreams among the vehicles of revelation. It has become quite usual to speak of dreams as the lowest of the media of revelation, with the general implication either that the revelations given through them cannot rise very high in the scale of revelations, or at least that the choice of dreams as their vehicle implies something inferior in the qualification of the recipients for receiving revelations. There is very little Scriptural support for such representations. No doubt, there is a certain gradation in dignity indicated in the methods of revelation. Moses' pre-eminence was marked by Jehovah speaking with him 'mouth to mouth,' manifestly, while to others he made Himself known 'in a vision,' or 'in a dream' (Nu 12). And it is possible that the order in which the various methods of revelation are enumerated in such passages as Dt 13, 18 28-19, Jl 2<sup>a</sup>, Ac 27 may imply a gradation in which revelation through dreams may stand at the foot. But these very passages establish dreams among the media steadily used by God for the revelation of His will, and drop no word depreciatory of them; nor is there discoverable in Scripture any justification for conceiving the revelations made through them as less valuable than those made through other media (cf. König, Offenbarungsbegriff, I, 85, II, 91, 93 f.).

It is very misleading to say, for example (Barry in Smith's JB, I, 617; cf. Orrell, op. cit.), that 'the greater number of the recorded supernatural dreams were granted, for prediction or for warning, to those who were aliens to the Jewish covenant'; and when they were given to God's 'chosen servants, they were almost always referred to the periods of their earliest and most imperfect knowledge of Him'; and, 'moreover, they belong especially to the earliest age, and become less frequent as the revelations of prophecy increase.' As many of these dreams were granted to Israelites as to aliens; they do not mark any particular stage of religious development in their recipients; they do not gradually decrease with the progress of revelation; they no more characterize the patriarchal age than that of the exile or the opening of the new dispensation. If no example is recorded during the whole period from Solomon to Daniel, so none is recorded from the patriarchs to Solomon, or again from Daniel to our Lord. If the great writing-prophets assign none of their revelations to dreams, they yet refer to revelations by dreams in such a way as to manifest their recognition of them as an ordinary medium of revelation (Jer 23<sup>a</sup>, 28 27 29, Zec 10). These passages are often adduced, to be sure, as suggesting that appeal especially to dreams was a characteristic of the false prophets of the day; and it is even sometimes represented that Jeremiah means to brand dream-revelations as such as lying revelations. Jeremiah's polemic, however, is not directed against any one particular method of revelation, but against false claims to revelation by any method. His zeal burns no more hot against the prophet that 'hath a dream' than against him that 'hath the Lord's word' (32<sup>a</sup>); no more against those that cry, 'I have dreamed, I have dreamed,' than against those who 'take their tongue and say, He saith' (32<sup>a</sup>, 31). Nor does Zechariah's careful definition of his visions as received waking, though coming to him at night (1<sup>a</sup>, 4), involve a depreciation of revelations through dreams; it merely calls our attention to the fact, otherwise copiously illustrated, that all night-visions are not dreams (cf. Gn 15<sup>a</sup>, 28<sup>a</sup>, 48, Nu 22<sup>a</sup>, 1 Ch 17<sup>a</sup>, 2 Ch 7<sup>a</sup>, Job 4<sup>a</sup>, 20<sup>a</sup>, 33<sup>a</sup>, Dn 2<sup>a</sup>, Ac 16, 18 23 27<sup>a</sup>).

The citation in Ac 27 of the prediction of Jl 2<sup>a</sup> suffices to show that there rested no shadow upon the 'dreaming of dreams' in the estimation of the writers of the NT. Rather this was in their view one of the tokens of the Messianic glory. Nevertheless, as we have seen, none of them except Matthew records instances of the supernatural dream. In the Gospel of Matthew, however, no fewer than five or six instances occur. Some doubt may attach, to be sure, to the nature of the dream of Pilate's wife (27<sup>b</sup>). The mention of it was certainly not introduced by Matthew idly, or for its own sake; it forms rather one of the incidents which he accumulates to exhibit the atrocity of the judicial murder of Jesus. Is his meaning that thus God Himself intervened to render Pilate utterly without excuse in his terrible crime (so Keil, in loc.)? Even so the question would still remain open whether the Divine intervention was direct and immediate, in the mode of a special revelation, or indirect and mediate, in the mode of a providential determination. In the latter contingency, this dream would take its place in a large class, naturally mediated, but induced by God for the guidance of the affairs of men—another instance of which, we have already suggested, may be discovered in the dream of the Midianitish man mentioned in Jg 7<sup>a</sup>-13 (so Nösgen, in loc.). In this case, the five instances of the directly supernatural dream which Matthew records in his 'Gospel of the infancy' stand alone in the NT.

In any event, this remarkable series of direct Divine revelations through dreams (Mt 1<sup>a</sup> 2<sup>a</sup>, 13 19, 27) forms a notable feature of this section of Matthew's Gospel, and contributes its share to marking it off as a section apart. On this account, as on others, accordingly, this section is sometimes contrasted unfavourably with the corresponding section of the Gospel of Luke. In that, remarks, for example, Reuss (La Bible, NT, i, 138), the angel visitants address waking hearers, the inspiration of the Spirit of God renews veritable prophecy, 'it is a living world, conscious of itself, that appears before us'; in this, on the contrary, 'the form of communication from on high is the direct form the least perfect, the least elevated, the least reassuring.' Others, less preoccupied with literary problems, fancy that it is the recipients of these dream-revelations rather than the author of the narrative to whom they are derogatory. Thus, for example, we are told that, like the Magi of the East and the wife of Pilate, Joseph, 'was thought worthy of communion with the unseen world and of communications from God's messenger only when in an unconscious state,' seeing that he was not ripe for the manifestation of the angel to him, as to Zacharias and Mary, when awake (Nebe, Kindheitsgeschichte, 212, cf. 368). Of course, there is nothing of all this in the narrative, as there is nothing to justify in any Scripture reference to the significance of revelation through dreams. The narrative is notable chiefly for its simple dignity and directness. In three of the instances we are merely told that 'an angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph,' and in the other two that he or the Magi were 'warned of God' in a dream, i.e. either by way of, or during, a dream. The term employed for 'appearing' (phaino) marks the phenomenal objectivity of the object; Joseph did not see in his dream-image something which he merely interpreted to stand for an angel, but an angel in his proper phenomenal presentation (see Grimm-Thayer, s.v. dokéō, ad fin.; Trench, Syn. NT, § lxxx.; Schmidt, Greek Syn., c. 15). The term translated 'warned of God' (σημαρτίζω) imports simply an authoritative communication of a declaration of the Divine will (so, e.g., Weiss, Keil, Alexander, Broadus, Nebe), and does not presuppose a precedent inquiry (as is assumed, e.g., by Bengel, Meyer, Fritzsche). The narratives confine themselves, therefore, purely to declaring, in the simplest and most direct manner, that the dream-communications recorded were from the Lord. Any hesitancy we may experience in reading them is not suggested by them, but is imported from our own personal estimate of the fitness of dreams to serve as media of Divine communications.

It is probable that the mere appearance of dreams among the media of revelation recognized by Scripture constitutes more or less of a stumbling-block to most readers of the Bible. The disordered phantasmagoria of dreams seems to render them peculiarly unfit for such a use. The superstitious employment of them by all nations in the lower stages of culture, including not only the nations of classical antiquity, but also those ancient peoples with whom Israel stood in closest relations, suggests further hesitancy. We naturally question whether we are not to look upon their presence in the Scripture narrative just as we look upon them in the Gilgames epic or the annals of Assurbani-pal, on the stèle of Bentrest or the inscriptions of Karnak, in the verses of Homer or the histories of Herodotus. We are not without temptation to say shortly with Kant (Anthropologie, i. § 29), 'We must not accept dream-tales as revelations from the invisible world.' And we are pretty sure, if we begin, with Witsius, with a faithful recognition of the fact that 'God has seen fit to reveal Himself not only to the waking, but sometimes also to the sleeping,' to lapse, like him, at once into an apologetical vein, and to raise the question seriously, 'Why should God wish to manifest Himself in this singular way, by night, and to the sleeping, when the manifestation must appear obscure, uncertain, and little suited either to the dignity of the matters revealed or to the use of those to whom the revelation is made?' (de Prophetis et Prophetia, ch. v. in Miscell. Sacra, i. pp. 22-27; cf. also Spanheim, Dubia Evangelica, 2nd pt., Geneva, 1700, pp. 239-240, and Rivetus, in Gen. Exercit. cxxiv.).

We have already pointed out how little there is in common between the occasional employment of dreams for revelations, such as meets us in Scripture, and the superstitious view of dreams prevalent among the ancients. It is an under-statement when it is remarked that 'the Scriptures start from a spiritual height to which the religious consciousness of the heathen world attained only after a long course of evolution, and then only in the case of an isolated genius like Plato' (Devons, loc. cit. 622). The difference is not a matter of degree, but of kind. No special sacredness or significance is ascribed by the Scriptures to dreams in general. No class or variety of dreams is recommended by them to our scrutiny that we may through this or that method of interpretation seek guidance from them for our life. The Scriptures merely affirm that God has on certain specific occasions, in making known His will to men, chosen to approach them through the medium of their night-visions; and has through these warned them of danger, awakened them to a sense of wrong-doing, communicated to them His will, or made known His purposes. The question that is raised by the affirmation of such an occasional Divine employment of dreams is obviously not whether dreams as such possess a supernatural quality and bear a supernatural message if only we could get at it, but rather whether there is anything inherent in their very nature which renders it impossible that God should have made such occasional use of them, or derogatory to Him to suppose that He has done so.

Surely we should bear in mind, in any consideration of such a question, the infinite condescension involved in God's speaking to man through any medium of communication. There is a sense in which it is derogatory to God to suppose Him to hold any commerce with man at all, particularly with sinful man. If we realized, as we should, the distance which separates the infinite and infinitely holy God from sin-stricken humanity, we should be little inclined to raise questions with respect to the relative condescension involved in His approaching us in these or those particular circumstances. In any revelation which God makes to man He stoops infinitely—and there are no degrees in the infinite. God's thoughts are not as our thoughts, and the clothing of His messages in the forms of human conception and language involves an infinite derogation. Looked at sub specie aeternitatis, the difference between God's approaching man through the medium of a dream or through the medium of his waking apprehension, shrinks into practical nothingness. The cry of the heart which has really seen or heard God must in any case be, 'What is man, that thou art mindful of him? or the son of man, that thou visitest him?'

It should also be kept clearly in view that the subject of dreams, too, is, after all, the human spirit. It is the same soul that is active in the waking consciousness which is active also in the dream-consciousness,—the same soul acting according to the same laws (cf. Lehmann, op. cit. p. 397). No doubt there are some dreams which we should find difficulty in believing were direct inspirations of God. Are there not some waking thoughts also of which the same may be said? This does not in the least suggest that the Divine Spirit may not on suitable occasion enter into the dream-consciousness, as into the waking, and impress upon it, with that force of conviction which He alone knows how to produce, the assurance of His presence and the terms of His message.

'The psychology of dreams and visions,' writes Dr. G. T. Ladd, 'so far as we can speak of such a psychology, furnishes us with neither sufficient motive nor sufficient means for denying the truth of the Biblical narratives. On the contrary, there are certain grounds for confirming the truth of some of these narratives. . . . Even in ordinary dreams, the dreamer is still the human soul. The soul acts, then, even in dreaming, as a unity, which involves within itself the functions and activities of the higher, even of the ethical and religious powers. . . . The possibility of even the highest forms of ethical and religious activities in dreams cannot be denied. . . . There is nothing in the physiological or psychological conditions of dream-life to preclude psychological activity for the reception of revealed truth. . . . It remains in general true that the Bible does not transgress the safe limits of possible or even actual experience' (The Doctr. of Sacred Scriptures, ii. 426).

So little, indeed, do emptiness and disorder enter into the very essence of dreaming, that common experience supplies innumerable examples of dreams thoroughly coherent and consequent. The literature of the subject is filled with instances in which even a heightened activity of human faculty is exhibited in dreams, and that throughout every department of mental endowment. Jurists have in their dreams prepared briefs of which they have been only too glad to avail themselves in their waking hours; statesmen have in their dreams obtained their best insight into policy; lecturers have elaborated their discourses; mathematicians solved their most puzzling problems; authors composed their most admired productions; artists worked out their most inspired motives. Dr. Franklin told Cabanis that the bearings and issues of political events which had baffled his inquiry when awake were not infrequently unfolded to him in his dreams. It was in a dream that Reinhold worked out his table of categories. Condorcet informs us that he often completed his imperfect calculations in his dreams; and the same experience has been shared by many other mathematicians, as, for example, by Maignan, Gôns, Wähner, Condillac, when engaged upon his Cours d'Etudes, repeatedly developed and finished in his dreams a subject which he had broken off on retiring to rest. The story of the origin of Coleridge's Kubla Khan in a dream is well known. Possibly no more instructive instance is on record, however, than the account given by Robert Louis Stevenson, in his delightful Chapter on Dreams ('Thistle' ed. of Works, xv. 250 ff.), of how 'the little people' of his brain, who had been wont to amuse him with absurd farragos, harnessed themselves to their task and dreamed for him consecutively and artistically when he became a craftsman in the art of story-telling. Now, they trimmed and pared their dream-stories, and set them on all fours, and fitted them to the laws of life, and even filled them with dramatic situations of gulfeful art, making the conduct of the actors psychologically correct, and aptly graduating the emotion up to the climax. (See Abercrombie, Inquiries Concerning the Intellectual Powers, etc., part iii. § iv., esp. pp.

216-221; Carpenter, Principles of Mental Physiology, p. 524 f.; Lehmann as cited, p. 411; Volkelt, Die Traumphantasie, No. 15; Myers, Human Personality, etc., Nos. 417 f., 430, with corresponding Appendixes).

Instances of this heightened mental action in dreams are so numerous and so striking in fact, that they have given rise to an hypothesis which provokes Wundt's scoff at those 'who are inclined to think that when we dream the mind has burst the fetters of the body, and that dream fancies transcend the activity of the waking consciousness, with its narrow confinement to the limitations of space and time' (Vorlesungen über die Menschen- und Tierseele, Lect. xxii. pp. 366-370, Eng. tr. pp. 323-324). The well-known essay of Lange 'On the Double Consciousness, especially on the Night-Consciousness and its polar relation to the Day-Consciousness of Man,' printed in the Deutsche Zeitschrift für christliche Wissenschaft und christliches Leben for 1851 (Nos. 30, 31, and 32), still provides one of the most readable and instructive statements of this theory. But English readers will be apt to turn for it first to the voluminous discussions of the late Mr. Frederic W. H. Myers, Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death (London, 1903), where it is given a new statement on a fresh and more empirical basis. In Mr. Myers' view, the sleeping state is more plastic than the waking, exhibiting some traces 'of the soul's less exclusive absorption in the activity of the organism,' by which is possibly increased 'the soul's power of operating in that spiritual world to which sleep has drawn it nearer' (vol. i. pp. 151-152; cf. p. 135). Accordingly, 'these subliminal uprushes' which we call dreams, these 'bubbles breaking on the surface from the deep below,' may be counted upon to bring us messages, now and again, from a spiritual environment to which our waking consciousness is closed. On hypotheses like these it is often argued that the sleeping state is the most favourable for the reception of spiritual communications. It is not necessary to commit ourselves to such speculations. But their existence among investigators who have given close study to the phenomena of dreams, strongly suggests to us that those phenomena, in the mass, are not such as to exclude the possibility or the propriety of the occasional employment by the Divine Spirit of dreams as vehicles of revelation.

That powerful influences should occasionally arise out of dreams, affecting the conduct and the destiny of men, is only natural, and is illustrated by numerous examples. Literature is crowded with instances of the effect of dreams upon life, for good and evil; and the personal experience of each of us will add additional ones. There is no one of us who has not been conscious of the influence of night visions in deterring him from evil and leading him to good. The annals of religion are sown with instances in which the careers of men have been swayed and their outlook for time and eternity altered by a dream. We may recall the dream of Evagrius of Pontus, recorded by Socrates, for example, by which he was nerved to resist temptation, and his whole life determined. Or we may recall the dream of Patrick, given in his Confession, on which hung his whole work as apostle of the Irish. Or we may recall the dream of Elizabeth Fry, by which she was rescued from the indecision and doubt into which she fell after her conversion. The part played by dreams in the conversion of John Bunyan, John Newton, James Gardiner, Alexander Duff, are but well-known instances of a phenomenon illustrated copiously from every age of the Church's experience. 'Converting dreams' are indeed a recognized variety

VOL. I.—32

(cf. Myers as cited, No. 409, i. pp. 126, 127), and are in nowise stranger than many of their fellows. They are the natural result of the action of the stirred conscience obtruding itself into the visions of the night, and, as psychological phenomena, are of precisely the same order as the completion of mathematical problems in dreams, or the familiar experience of the invasion of our dreams by our waking anxieties. In the providence of God, however, they have been used as instruments of Divine grace, and levers by which not only individual destiny has been determined, but the very world has been moved. (Cf. Delitzsch, as cited, and 'Dreams and the Moral Life,' in the Homiletic Review, Sept. 1890).

With such dreams and the issues which have flowed from them in mind, we surely can find no difficulty in recognizing the possibility and propriety of occasional Divine employment of dreams for the highest of ends. Obviously dreams have not been deemed by Providence too empty and bizarre to be used as instruments of the most far-reaching effects. Indeed, we must extend the control of Divine Providence to the whole world of dreams. Of course, no dream visits us in our sleep more than any occurrence takes place during our waking hours, apart from the appointment and direction of Him who Himself never either slumbers or sleeps, and in whose hands all things work together for the execution of His ends. We may, now and again, be able to trace with especial clearness the hand of the great Potter, moulding the vessel to its destined uses, in, say, an unusual dream, producing a profoundly arresting effect upon the consciousness. But in all the dreams that visit us, we must believe the guidance of the universal Governor to be present, working out His will. It will hardly be possible, however, to recognize this providential guidance of dreams, and especially the Divine employment of particularly moving dreams in the mode of what we commonly call 'special providences,' without removing all legitimate ground for hesitation in thinking of His employment of special dreams also as media of revelation. The God of providence and the God of revelation are one God; and His providential and revelational actions flow together into one harmonious effect. It is not possible to believe that the instrumentalities employed by Him freely in the one sphere of His operation can be unworthy of use by Him in the other. Those whom He has brought by His providential dealings with them into such a state of mind that they are prepared to meet with Him in the night watches, and to receive on the prepared surface of their souls the impressions which He designs to convey to them, He surely may visit according to His will, not merely by the immediate operation of His grace, but also in revealing visions, whether these visions themselves are wrought through the media of their own experiences or by His own creative energy. It is difficult to perceive in what the one mode of action would be more unfitting than the other.

LITERATURE.—Some of the special literature has been suggested in the course of the article. A good general account of dreams in their relations to the supernatural may be found in Alt. Lehmann's Abergläub und Zauberei, Ger. tr., Stuttgart, 1898, p. 389 f. At the foot of p. 548 is given an excellently selected list of books on the general subject. On the history of the estimate of dreams in the nations into contact with which the Biblical writers came, see Lehmann ('Index'), and also the following: Ebers, Ägypten und die Bücher Moses, 321; Le-normant, La divination et la science de présages chez les Chaldéens, 128-149; Bouché-Leclercq, Histoire de la divination dans l'antiquité, i. 275-299; Vaschide and Piéron, 'Prophetic Dreams in Greek and Roman Antiquity' in The Month for Jan. 1901, ix., ii. 161-194; Audenried's ed. of Nügelbuch's Homörische Theologie, §§ 25-29, pp. 172-175; Auzi, Die Religion der Römer, 79, 108, 183, 180; Granger, The Worship of the Romans, 28-52. For dreams among the later Jews, see Hamburger's RE i. 928-929; Jewish Encyclopedia, iv. 655-657; and cf. Philo, de Somniis. For Patristic views: Tertullian's On the Soul, cc. 42-50; Synesius' On Dreams; and the interesting correspondence between Evagrius and Augustine (Aug. Epist. 185, 186) may be profitably read. For the anthropological view see Tyler's Primitive Culture (Index).

DRESS.—

The words used in the original for articles of dress have lost much of their force through great variation in translation in the AV. For clothes in general ἱδύματα occurs; it is tr. 'clothing,' Mt 7:7; 'raiment,' Mt 34:28-29; Lk 12:28; 'garment,' Mt 22:11-12. ἱδύματα signifies an outer garment, a mantle or cloak; it is tr. 'garment,' Mt 9:16-20, 21, 14:56, 21:23, 27:30; Mk 3:27, 9:6, 10:50, 11:7, 13:18, 16:4, Lk 9:84, 10:28, 22:9, Jn 13:4, 13:19; 'cloak,' Mt 6:6, Lk 6:8; 'clothes,' Lk 8:7 (sing. in Greek); (plural) 'clothes,' Mt 21:24, 28:28; Mk 5:26, 10:13; Lk 19:8; 'raiment,' Mt 13:17, 27:31, Mk 9:1, Lk 7:28, 22:9, Jn 19:24. The scarlet or purple robe of Jesus is called ἱδύματα in Jn 19:2, ὑπόδημα in Mt 27:28, 31, ἵματιον in Lk 23:1, and in Mk 15:17, 20 simply 'the purple,' πῦρ πορφύρεον (cf. Lk 16:19). ἱδύματα is tr. 'raiment,' Lk 22:9; 'vesture,' Mt 27:28, Jn 19:24—in both passages it stands in antithesis to ἱδύματα—and 'apparel' (ἱδύματα ἱδύματα), Lk 7:28. ἱδύματα—the Lat. stola—is used for the long garments of the scribes, tr. 'long clothing' Mt 12:38; 'long robes' Lk 5:26; for the 'best robe' of the Prodigal Son, Lk 15:22; for the 'long garment' of the Resurrection angel, Mk 16:7—in the parallel passage ἱδύματα, 'garment' is used, Lk 24. ὑπόδημα signified an under-garment, and is tr. in EV 'coat' in Mt 6:2, 10:10, Mk 6:9, Lk 9:3, 10:4, Jn 12:35. The plural is in Mk 14:28 tr. 'clothes,' though in the parallel passage Mt 20:28 ἱδύματα is used. Closely connected with clothes we have ἱστίον, the towel with which Christ girded Himself, Jn 13:4-5; ὑπόδημα, 'napkin,' of Lk 10:4, Jn 13:4-5; ἱστίον, 'linen cloth,' of Lk 24:12, Jn 13:4, 13:5, 13:7; ἱστίον, 'linen cloth,' of Mt 27:59, Mk 14:13-14; and ἱστίον, 'fine linen,' Lk 16:19; ὑπόδημα, 'shoe,' Mt 3:1, 10:10, Mk 1:7, Lk 9:14, 13:28, 22:3, Jn 12:1; ὑπόδημα, 'sandals,' Mk 6:9; ἱστίον, 'girdle,' Mt 24, Mk 16; 'purse,' Mt 10, Mk 6; ὑπόδημα, 'scrip,' Mt 10, Mk 6, Lk 9:10, 22:35.

All the references to clothes in the Gospels are to male costume. There are very few indications of the materials of which they were made or of their shape. John the Baptist had his raiment (ἱδύματα) of camel's hair, and a girdle of leather about his loins (Mt 3:4-5)—like many a roughly clad man in Palestine to-day. The rich man of the parable was clothed in 'purple and fine linen' (βίβατος), Lk 16:19. The three body-garments commonly mentioned are the cloak (ἱδύματα),—a word used also in the plural for 'garments' in general,—the 'coat' (ὑπόδημα), and the girdle (ἱστίον). The head-dress is never definitely mentioned, but we know that it was practically universal to cover the head.

These references indicate that the clothes worn by Christ, His disciples, and the great majority of His adherents, were of the simplest kind; but among the richer classes there are indications, as is seen in the references given above, of more sumptuous robes. Indeed, among the better class of townsfolk it is probable that Jewish costume was largely modified under Hellenic and Roman influence. In dealing with the former more important subject, the probable costume of the founders of Christianity, the most hopeful sources of information are (1) the costumes of Jews, and (2) the dresses worn to-day among people of simple life in modern Palestine.

1. The dress of orthodox Jews is as various as their language and lands of residence. Neither in the head-dress, nor in the long Sabbath robes of the Rabbis, nor in the ordinary under-garments, are there any uniform features. There are, however, two special garments which are worn by orthodox Jews the world over; these are the tallith and the arba kanphóth. The tallith, or praying shawl, is a rectangular woollen shawl about 3 feet by 5*, usually white, with dark stripes across two of the sides. From each corner hangs a tassel or fringe; these are known as the zizith. Each consists of eight threads twisted together in five knots (see BORDER). The tallith is always worn in the synagogue and at prayer time; it then covers the head and shoulders. Jews who affect special sanctity—especially those living in the Holy Land—often wear it all day, as was once the common custom. In the Middle Ages, in consequence of the persecution which the Jews then underwent on account of their religious customs, the habit of wearing the tallith in public had to be given up; but as the Jews view the wearing of the fringes as a religious duty (Dt 22:12, Nu 15:38), they made a special under-garment to carry them. This consists of a rectangular piece of woollen or even cotton material, about 3 feet long by a foot wide; it has a large hole in the centre through which the head is put, so that the garment comes to lie over the chest and back like a kind of double chest-protector. At the four corners are the zizith, and the garment is known as the 'four corners,' arba kanphóth, or sometimes as the tallith katon, or small tallith. It is worn by small children, but the tallith proper only by a boy after he has become bar mitzvah, a 'son of the Law,' at thirteen. As the earliest mention of the arba kanphóth is in 1350, it is manifest that it cannot have existed in NT times. With the tallith, however, the case is different. It is certain that this is the altered form of an outer garment which existed in early times, and was known in Heb. as the simlah and in Gr. as himation. In the 'hem' or 'border' (ἄκρον ἄκρον, Mt 6:2, Mk 6:9, Lk 8:4) we have reference to the fringed border of the cloak; and even more definite is the reference in Mt 23, when the scribes and Pharisees are reproved for unduly lengthening the fringes (τὰ ἄκρον ἄκρον) of their garments.

2. The clothes of the ordinary fellah, or peasant in modern Palestine, are five in number,—shirt, cloak, girdle, shoes, and head-dress.

The shirt or kamis is a simple straight garment, extending from the neck almost to the feet, with short, or sometimes long, loose sleeves. It is usually of calico; it may be of linen. Among the fellahin it is white, among the Bedawin (who often go about in nothing else) it is dyed blue. It is usually open in front more than half-way to the waist, but is brought together at the neck by a button or knotted thread. It is worn night and day.

Over the shirt is fixed the cumndr or girdle, a most necessary article of clothing. It may be of leather, with buckles, or woven of camel's hair, or of brightly-dyed silk or cotton. The woven belt is wound tightly two or three times round the waist, and is fixed by tucking the free end into the belt itself. In the girdle is carried, as in NT days (Mt 10, Mk 6), the money, often knotted into a corner of a handkerchief, and also the pen and ink of the learned or the dagger of the fighter. When the man is 'girded' for work the kamis is hitched up to the tightened belt, as high as the knees. The upper part of the shirt is commonly drawn up loose above the girdle, so that a considerable space is left between the chest and the shirt. This is known as the u'bb or 'bosom,' and in this are carried many things; for example, the bread and olives for the midday meal, the seed or corn for sowing (Lk 6:9), or, in the case of a shepherd, a newborn lamb or kid (cf. Is 40:1).

In order of importance next comes the head-dress, of which two distinct types are in daily use—the turban and the kufiyeh. Under both of these is worn the tekkiyeh or 'arabkiyeh, a small plain close-fitting cap of felt, wool, or even cotton; this is commonly not removed even at night. When one has worn thin, a new one is placed on the top, so that two or three layers are quite usual; and between the layers the fellah keeps small papers of value. When a turban is worn, the red fax or tarbush is placed over the skull-cap, and the teffeh or turban is wound round its sides. The teffeh among the fellahin is usually of parti-coloured cotton or silk, red and white or yellow being common. In the towns it is often ornate.

mented with yellow silk worked in patterns; while the kay who has made the Mecca pilgrimage, and the Druse, wear plain white; and the sharif or 'descendant of the prophet' wears green. The other form of head-dress is more ancient and the more primitive: probably it is more like the peasant dress of NT times. It consists of a kufiyeh or large napkin of white or coloured cotton or silk, as much perhaps as a yard square, folded diagonally to make a triangular piece, and laid on the head with the apex backward; and the 'abā, a rope-like circle of camel's hair, laid double over the top of the head to keep the kufiyeh in position. The free ends of the kufiyeh are wound round the neck according to taste, being used on journeys in the hot sun to cover, at times, all the face below the eyes. It is a most efficient and practical head-dress, especially when worn over felt tebbiyeh. The napkin referred to in Lk 19<sup>2</sup> may have been of the same nature, and the napkins of Jn 11<sup>44</sup> 20<sup>7</sup>, though used to cover the face of the dead, may have been made for the head of the living.

These three garments are the essentials; in such will a man work all day, and, if very poor, even go journeys; but in the latter event he would be an object of pity unless he had an 'abā or cloak. This is made of camel's or goat's hair or of wool, and among the fellahin is usually of white and brown in stripes or of plain brown. The superior qualities are often white or black. The ordinary 'abā is made of a long rectangular piece of material, with the sides folded in and sewn along the top; it is thus very square, when new, across the shoulders. It has no sleeves, and though there are slits just below the upper corners through which the arms may be put, it is almost always worn resting over the shoulders and upper arms. It extends half-way between the knees and the feet. During sleep, especially on journeys when the traveller has no bed, it is made to cover the whole person, the man either wrapping it round him, or, if there is a sack or mat on which to lie, curling himself under it as under a blanket.

Shoes are to-day almost universally worn; but a fellah with a new pair of shoes will often, when outside the town, prefer to save his shoes from wear and tear by carrying them. Sandals are still worn, but not commonly as formerly, when the sandal seemed to make the simplest foot-gear (Mk 6<sup>9</sup>).

The costume of the Palestine peasant, above described, was probably, with no doubt differences in materials and in cut, the costume of the country folk of NT and pre-NT times. The kamīs is the equivalent of the χιτών, and that was the κήθηνη of the OT. Now, as then, it is at times woven in one piece without seam (Jn 19<sup>2</sup>). The 'abā is the modern equivalent of the ἱμάτιον, the simlah of the OT. It was the outer cloak which might not be retained as a pledge after sunset (Ex 22<sup>26</sup>). It is quite possible that in Mt 6<sup>25</sup> there is a reference to this. The Rabbis stated that the reason the cloak might not be removed was because the gizeth of their blue and white threads were a reminder of the Law. Christ teaches here that when a man does an injury, within legal limits, as in taking the shirt, his follower must be prepared to go a step farther, and give up even what the Law protects him in keeping. The reversal of the order in Lk, though more intelligible to Gentiles, misses the special reference to the Jewish Law. Like the modern 'abā, the himation was cast aside for quick movement (Mk 10<sup>2</sup>, Jn 13<sup>4-12</sup>), left aside when working in the fields (Mk 13<sup>9</sup>); and being dispensed with in fighting, might profitably be exchanged for a sword when danger was near (Lk 22<sup>26</sup>). It might be spread on the ground to form a carpet for an honoured person (Mt 21<sup>5</sup>), and might be used in lieu of a saddle, folded across an ass's back (Mk 11<sup>7-9</sup>). In every one of these details the use of the modern 'abā in Palestine could furnish parallels.

With respect to the χιτών in two separate references (Mt 10<sup>8</sup> etc. and Lk 3<sup>11</sup>), two 'coats,' i.e. shirts, are spoken of rather as luxuries than necessities for the traveller—as is to-day the case with the kamīs. Two 'cloaks' would be such unlikely baggage as not to need mentioning.

The girdle or zunnār is the equivalent of the ζώνη, as is specially shown in its use as a purse. There is, however, another girdling referred to in some passages. John the Baptist's girdle may quite probably have been a broad 'loin cloth' extending from waist to knee,—a very ancient dress,—while over the shoulders hung a rough coarse-haired 'abā. It is not unreasonable to suppose that, like the modern derdash, he wore his long hair uncovered. It is evident that his costume was intentionally distinctive. When Peter was found by the risen Master engaged in his old business of fishing, he, like the modern Galilean fishermen when fishing near shore, was probably girdled only with a 'loin-cloth,' and therefore described as 'naked' (Jn 21<sup>7</sup>). Christ girded Himself with a towel before washing the disciples' feet, to make Himself in outward form more like a slave (Jn 13<sup>4-5</sup>). It is evident that in the crucifixion, at least of Jews, who would not have tolerated absolute nudity, the victim, after the removal of his clothes, was girdled round the waist; Peter must have understood the words 'another shall gird thee' as foretelling that event (Jn 21<sup>18</sup>).

The long garments of the scribes and Pharisees find their modern counterparts in the long cloak used by Moslem religious leaders, the jibbeh, and in the velvet, plush, and silk robes of gorgeous colours favoured by the leading Rabbis of the Ashkenazim Jews, on Sabbath and feast-days. In city life, garments additional to those described above are always worn. Over the kamīs, but included within the girdle, is a striped coloured robe reaching to near the feet, called the kumbas, and, among the better dressed, over this is worn the sudriyeh or ornamental waistcoat. Labās or drawers, though utterly despised by the true Arab, are in common use in towns. Many other varieties of garments might be mentioned. Those already named and doubtless others all had their counterparts in NT times, but there is no hint that any but the simplest forms of peasant dress were worn by Christ and His disciples. It has indeed been thought that the garments divided by the soldiers must necessarily have been five, of which four, the cloak (ἱμάτιον), the shoes or sandals, the girdle and the head-dress, were 'divided among them,' and the fifth, the χιτών or shirt of finer quality, woven perhaps by the hands of His mother herself, apportioned by lot.

The στέφανος was evidently considered among the circle of Jesus a robe of dignity; it is the 'best robe' brought forth for the returning prodigal; it is used to describe the clothing of the 'young man' at the tomb (Mk 16<sup>5</sup>), and the imposing garments of the scribes (Lk 20<sup>10</sup> etc.).

The unsatisfactoriness of patching with new cloth a much worn garment (Mt 9<sup>16</sup>, Mk 2<sup>21</sup>), and the ubiquitousness of that scourge, the clothes-moth (Mt 6<sup>19-20</sup>, Lk 12<sup>29</sup>), are daily to be seen illustrated in Palestine. The custom of providing guests with clean 'wedding garments' is still known, though unusual, in the modern East. But the entertainment of the very poor by the well-to-do at such feasts, evidently then far from uncommon, must have made such a precaution absolutely necessary. In the account of the 'rich man' (Lk 16<sup>19</sup>), we have reference to two of the expensive materials for dress—the purple dye obtained from the murex on the coasts of Tyre, and the byssos, or 'fine linen,' which was imported at great expense from Egypt.

References made at the beginning to the various terms used to describe the robe put on Christ by the mocking soldiers. Of these the χλαμύς, or military mantle, fastened by a buckle on the right shoulder so as to hang in a curve across the body, would appear to have been the most distinctive and suitable for the purpose.

DRINK, DRINKING.—See EATING AND DRINKING, FOOD, LORD'S SUPPER, MEALS, WINE.

DROPSY.—As the name (Gr. ὄδιμα)* would seem to imply, this disease is characterized by an accretion or accumulation of water in the cellular tissue or serous cavities. In the only place in the NT where a reference to it occurs, no mention is made as to whether the patient suffered from a general anasarca or a local dropsical swelling (Lk 14<sup>9</sup>). The writer simply uses the adjective ὄδιματις (sc. ἀσθενῶν) instead of the noun. This is, however, in strict accordance with the usage of Greek medical writers, as we have it in the works of Hippocrates, Dioscorides, and Galen. That the disease was not unknown to the authors of some of the OT writings appears from the description of the trial by ordeal of a wife suspected of infidelity to her husband (Nu 5<sup>11-21</sup>). In vv. 21-22 part of the punishment inflicted on the guilty woman was a dropsical swelling (cf. Jos. Ant. III. xi. 6), which looks as if dropsy upon to be considered as an affliction sent by God upon the wicked for continued wilful sin (cf. Ps 109<sup>9</sup>), and see also the Mishnic tractate Shabbath xxxiii. 1, and especially for the sin of self-indulgence (cf. Horace, Carm. II. ii. 13, 'crescit indulgens sibi dirus hydrops').

The healing of the dropsical man is introduced by St. Luke as part of a narrative which is peculiar to his Gospel, if, indeed, the parable in Lk 14<sup>9-14</sup> be not identical with that in Mt 22<sup>1-14</sup>—a conjecture which does not seem likely (see, however, Wright's Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek, p. 273 f.).

St. Luke alone of the Evangelists tells of Jesus being invited to partake of the hospitality of the Pharisees and of His accepting their invitations on three different occasions: 'to eat' (7<sup>9</sup>), 'to breakfast' (11<sup>9</sup>), 'to eat bread' (14<sup>1</sup>). It was on one of these occasions, as He was sitting probably at breakfast or the midday meal (ἀπαιρῶν, v. 15) on the Sabbath, that He healed the dropsical man.

Like the story of the healing of the woman with the crooked spine, told in the preceding section, it furnishes a vivid illustration of the way in which the protracted controversy about the Sabbath rest was conducted by Jesus against the Pharisaic sabbatarianism of His time (cf. Mk 2<sup>23-28</sup>, Mt 12<sup>1-13</sup>, Lk 6<sup>1-11</sup>, 13<sup>10-17</sup>, Jn 5<sup>9-16</sup>). It is not easy to determine whether the diseased man was specially introduced into the house for a malignant purpose, or whether he appeared there unbidden in order to claim the sympathy and the help of Jesus. The presence of ὄδιμα seems to imply that the latter was the case, and that the host was as much surprised as any one else at the turn of events. In any case he could not have been an invited guest, as Jesus could not in that event, with courtesy, have dismissed him when healed, as St. Luke says He did (ἀπέλυσε, v. 4). Whatever was the immediate cause of the man's presence, Jesus utilized the opportunity thus afforded to emphasize once again His teaching on the Sabbath question. Here was a man afflicted with a most inveterate and dangerous malady, indicative of deeply rooted organic disease, and, according to contemporary belief, springing from moral as well as from physical sources. It was, moreover, a disease well known to those present; and it seems to have been more or less prevalent in that region down to recent times (see Jewish Intelligence, 1842, p. 319).

The persistent character of the espionage to which Jesus was subjected is well expressed by the periphrastic import of κατακλιθεὶς (v. 1), a verb which is almost confined, in NT usage, to St. Luke (cf. Lk 6<sup>20</sup>, Ac 9<sup>24</sup>; see also Mk 3<sup>2</sup> and Gal 4<sup>10</sup>).

The question addressed by Jesus on this occasion to 'the lawyers and Pharisees' aptly illustrates His method of 'carrying the war into the enemy's camp' (cf. 13<sup>5</sup>, Mt 12<sup>14</sup>, and Lk 7<sup>41</sup>). The effect of the question, which placed them on the horns of an ugly dilemma, is vividly narrated. They were forced to be silent because they were completely nonplussed (cf. ἔσθλησαν, v. 3). This verb, which occurs in the NT only once outside of St. Luke's writings (see 1 Th 4<sup>1</sup>), is often used in the sense of a silence produced by superior or determined argument (cf. Ac 11<sup>18</sup>, 21<sup>14</sup>; see also Neh 5<sup>8</sup> LXX). The nature of the difficulty, in which Jesus placed His enemies, will be understood if we remember the almost incredible minuteness with which the law of the Sabbath was treated by the Jewish Rabbins, and the childish way in which they regulated whether a physician should perform a deed of mercy on that day (see Schürer, HJP II. ii. pp. 99-105; Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, App. XVII., and II. pp. 59-61; Farrar, Life of Christ, vol. i. pp. 431-441).

Whatever might be the differences between the schools of Shammai and Hillel as to the class of works forbidden on the Sabbath day, the general practice of the Jews themselves was based on the recognition that danger to life superseded the Sabbath law, and the question of Jesus points out this with force. If they allowed a man to save his son or his ox from a position of imminent danger, and yet considered the Sabbath rest unbroken, how much stronger claim had a man, suffering from an incurable malady, upon Him whose power to heal had again and again been manifested?

It is possible, perhaps, to trace an element of scorn in Jesus' attitude on this occasion. The conjunction of the words σῆς and σῆς is at least remarkable, and points to vehemence on His part in pressing the argument. The very feast at which He sat as guest was a proof of insincerity in their attitude. How prevalent the abuse of Sabbath feasting became amongst the Jews is noticed by St. Augustine (Enarr. in Ps 91: 'Hodie sabbati est. hunc in presenti tempore otio quodam corporatiter languido et suavo et luxurioso celebrant Judaei').

St. Luke does not tell us plainly whether Jesus used any visible means in performing the cure of the dropsical man. He, however, uses one word which may point to a treatment similar to what He employed on other occasions (cf. ἐπιθεῖναι τὰς χεῖρας, 4<sup>10</sup>, 13<sup>13</sup>, Mk 5<sup>23</sup> etc., and ἀντιθεῖναι, 5<sup>13</sup>, 22<sup>1</sup>, Mk 14<sup>18</sup>, Mt 20<sup>34</sup> etc.). It is, of course, possible that ἐπιθεῖναι (v. 4) may have been used by the writer of the narrative to correspond with the word ἀνασπάσει (v. 5), in order to emphasize the force of Jesus' argument, and that Jesus, in actually laying hold of the dropsical patient, intended to convey objectively the lesson which each one of them ought to have learned from the toil involved in pulling a drowning animal out of a well.

The reference to the 'well' (ἐκ φρένας, cf. ἐκ βύθων, Mt 12<sup>11</sup>) is particularly appropriate when the nature of the disease is remembered, and shows how wonderfully every incident was used by Jesus to illustrate the lesson He meant to teach. A very similar instance is observed when He compared the woman with the diseased spine to the animal which, tied to his stall, required to be loosed therefrom even on the Sabbath day for his daily watering (Lk 13<sup>16</sup>; 'congruenter hydropicum animal quod occidit in puteum comparavit; humore enim laborabat,' Augustine, Quaest. Evang. ii. 29).

DROWNING.—Drowning never was or could be a recognized form of capital punishment in so poorly watered a country as Palestine, as it was in Assyria and Babylonia. It is mentioned in Mt 18<sup>6</sup> (cf. Mk 9<sup>5</sup>, Lk 17) as a fitting reward for those who 'offend one of these little ones which believe in me.' The last expression may either be taken literally, or this utterance of Jesus may be directed against those who cause the simple believer to stumble in his faith. The Greek word καταρῶν (katarrōn) is used by the LXX to translate the Hebrew ḥay in Ex 15<sup>17</sup>, and the expression used by Jesus may be a reminiscence of the drowning of the Egyptians in the Red Sea, or of the adventure of Peter (Mt 14<sup>9</sup>), where the same word is employed.

In the Code of Hammurabi, drowning is the penalty for selling beer too cheaply (C. H. W. Johns Babylonia and Assyria: Laws, Contracts, and Letters, p. 62 ff.), as well as for more serious offences. The keepers of the beer-shops appear to have been women, and the drowning seems to have been considered the form of execution proper to female criminals. In Moslem law as defined by Abu Hanifah (d. 767 A. D.), killing by means of drowning was not accounted murder, and no retaliation could be claimed. T. H. WEIR.

DRUNKENNESS.—Only one explicit utterance of our Lord relating to drunkenness is recorded (Lk 21<sup>34</sup>). Elsewhere He warns against it indirectly, as in the parables where He holds up drunken servants to reprobation (Mt 24<sup>49</sup>=Lk 12<sup>45</sup>). But His references to the vice are surprisingly meagre. That must not be regarded as a measure of the contemporary extent of the evil, nor as indicating any lack of concern on His part. Our Lord's attitude to the matter must be estimated in view of the sentiments and practices of His times.

The habit of drinking to excess was widespread. Hebrew literature provides ample proof of familiarity with its unvarying moral and social consequences. The scandals associated with the early Christian love-feasts (1 Co 11<sup>34</sup>, Jude 12) were doubtless partly a recrudescence of pre-Christian practices. While excess was unsparingly condemned by moralists, moderation was uniformly commended. Occasional maxims hint at the expediency of abstinence in the interests of moral integrity and personal security. But where that is actually practised, it is invariably the outcome of purely religious impulse. It would seem that the Nazirites, the Rechabites, and other ascetics realized that indulgence in wine was inimical to spiritual life (cf. Lk 1<sup>15</sup>), or inexpedient in situations demanding the highest possible personal purity, or inappropriate to persons of singular and abnormal holiness (cf. John the Baptist, with whom some seem to have compared Jesus unfavourably, Lk 7<sup>33</sup>). To the ordinary Jew, however, habitual indulgence was a matter of course. Abstinence required strong reasons to justify it. The Babylonian Gemara would even seem to suggest that abstinence might be a positive sin. 'The Nazirite has sinned by denying himself wine.' It bases this opinion on an arbitrary and erroneous interpretation of Nu 29<sup>10</sup> (see Jewish Encyc. art. 'Drunkenness').

Jesus seems to have adopted the prevailing popular attitude. He instituted no campaign against the use of strong drink. He made it no part of His mission to denounce indulgence. He Himself followed the ordinary practices of His day, both using wine and giving His countenance to festivities in which wine played an important part (cf. Jn 2<sup>9</sup>). His various references to the beverage indicate that He regarded it as a source of innocent enjoyment (cf. Lk 5<sup>30</sup>, 36, 39, 75, 177). Nevertheless, that He did not overlook the fact that excess was common, and that He had an open eye for the obtrusive evils of over-indulgence, is abundantly evident from other references, as in the parables. That He did not feel called upon to command or commend abstinence in spite of this is partly to be explained, perhaps, by the fact that drunkenness was the vice chiefly of the wealthy. That seems to be implicitly recognized in Lk 21<sup>34</sup>, where it is bracketed with surfeiting and subjection to the cares of this life, faults peculiarly associated with the rich or well-to-do. In the parable of the Householder (Mt 24<sup>49-51</sup>=Lk 12<sup>45-46</sup>), the drunken characters whom He holds up to contempt are servants of one in high position, forming the entourage of a luxurious household in which creature comforts would be plentiful. In the circles in which Jesus Himself principally moved, and to which He chiefly appealed, excess does not seem to have been so common as to call for urgent protest or the starting of a crusade against the use of alcoholic liquors.

Christ's attitude to the whole matter was determined by the fundamental purpose of His mission. Drunkenness in general He regards as the accompaniment and symptom of a carnal unregenerate state of heart, the outcome of wickedness that defies restraint. He implicitly recognizes it also as strongly contributory to spiritual demoralization, as inducing such blunting of the spiritual sensibilities and disabling of spiritual faculty as incapacitate the soul for the proper exercises of the devout life, and endanger its future by reducing it to a state of unpreparedness for the last Divine catastrophe (Lk 21<sup>34</sup>). DUST (κοιμήσις, Mt 10<sup>4</sup>, Lk 9<sup>10</sup>, Ac 13<sup>31</sup> 22<sup>2</sup>; χόσος=χόσος, Mk 6<sup>11</sup>, Rev 18<sup>19</sup>). The former means properly dust stirred up or blown about, as 'a cloud of dust'; the latter simply earth or soil thrown down or raised in a heap. In NT the two words are plainly synonymous.—The long droughts and fierce heat of Palestine, together with the softness of the limestone rock—the prevailing formation—make for the production of dust in great quantities. In high winds it penetrates to almost every part of the houses. The pedestrian suffers much from fretting of the feet by the dust, which neither sandal nor shoe excludes. This renders necessary, as well as pleasant, the washing of the feet when the journey is done (Lk 7<sup>44</sup>).

An immemorial token of grief in the East is the casting of dust upon the person, especially upon the head, or the laying of the face in the dust; while of one utterly humbled, it is said that he 'licks the dust.'

The throwing of dust in the air is still a not uncommon way of expressing rage, or emphasizing an appeal for justice. This is probably meant to show that Earth herself joins in the petition for redress of intolerable wrongs.

Our Lord's direction that 'the Twelve' should shake off the dust of the cities that rejected their message, derived special significance from Jewish teaching. The very dust of a heathen road was held to produce defilement. To shake off the dust of their feet, as a testimony against house or city, meant that it had passed under the ban of their Lord, and the symbolic act proclaimed that "nought of the cursed thing" clave to them. "In this sense anything that clave to a person was metaphorically called "the dust," as, e.g., "the dust of an evil tongue," "the dust of usury"; as, on the other hand, to "dust to idolatry" meant to clave to it" (Eilersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, vol. 1, p. 644). The modern Oriental, if asked regarding any questionable business, will daintily grip the lapel of his robe or tunic and gently shake it, turning aside his head as if he should say, "Not even the dust of that transaction has touched me."

W. EWING.
DUTY.—In the widest sense of the word, 'duty' is the correlate of 'ought.'* What I ought to be, to do, to feel, that is my duty. So the word covers the whole content of the moral ideal. But both to the plain man and to the philosopher duty usually has a narrower significance; and this we must make clear before we can trace the relation of the teaching of Jesus to the conception of duty.

Our type of duty is the soldier who kept guard at his post when Herulanum was overwhelmed by lava and ashes. His station in life prescribed an action; and he fulfilled it. What his motives were we do not ask; we do not inquire how he felt in the execution of his task, or what manner of man he was. He did what he was commanded; he did his duty. A man's duty, then, at any time is the action determined by his station in life. He stands under a rule, which he must obey and apply. Such obedience does not, however, cover the highest moral excellence. Two men both do their duty, say, to the poor; but the one is hard, unsympathetic, the other benevolent; the one is just, the other full of charity. Although in point of duty they do not differ, we feel that the latter is a better man than the former; for he stands nearer to the ideal of goodness. This is the popular view.

But among the ancients the Stoics, and in modern times Kant, have judged differently. They exclude the emotions, and measure moral worth by the degree to which duty, and duty alone, is the motive of action. No man is good unless he obeys the law, simply because it is the law. Duty for duty's sake is their watchword. 'The sage,' says Seneca,† 'will succour, will do good, for he is born to assist his fellow, to labour for the welfare of mankind; but he will feel no pity. . . . It is only diseased eyes that grow moist in beholding tears in other eyes, as it is no true sympathy, but only weakness of nerves, that leads some to laugh when others laugh, or to yawn when others yawn.' Kant‡ argues in a similar way, but with greater depth and sincerity, that philanthropic action has true moral worth only if done by a man whose temperament is cold and indifferent to the sufferings of others, not from inclination, but from duty, simply because he respects the law under which he stands. Further, the moral judgment is directed not to what is done, but to what the agent intended to do, to what he has willed and taken every means in his power to bring about. But even this needs qualification. Kant holds that we must leave out of account the content of what is willed, and simply inquire whether the law is obeyed just because it is the law. And so we reach the bare conception of duty for duty's sake, and find the moral law reduced to the mere form of universality. The flesh and blood of goodness have vanished, and we are left with the spectre of a law characterized only by the admission of no exceptions.

But no one can rest satisfied with an abstraction. Kant, therefore, restores content to the idea of duty by throwing into the form of Law Universal the various kinds of action which Society enjoins or forbids. Thus we receive a code of moral laws, each demanding unconditional obedience. But this is not always possible. Conflicts of 'duties' will from time to time appear, not in the sense that Duty issues conflicting commands (for under any given circumstances only one action can be right), but in the sense that one of two normal lines of conduct must overcome and contradict the other. Thus arise the problems that have exercised casuists and made real tragedies. Am I to refuse either to kill my fellow-men or to defend my country? Am I to tell a lie, or to become the accomplice, however unwilling, in the murder of my friend? Such problems are inevitable and insoluble, if we conceive duty as a group of coordinate and absolute laws of action. Conflicts must ensue in the application of such laws, once the ideal system of moral relations on which they are based fails to correspond point for point with the actual system in which they claim realization. But the world is full of imperfection and sin, and every man has sinned and is weak. Consequently the only possible choice may often lie between two lines of conduct, both of which are ideally wrong.

Moreover, if the moral ideal is expressed as a code of rules of action, morality tends to become no more than the rigid observance of ceremonies that characterized the Pharisee. Life hardens into conventionalism, if the emphasis is laid on doing rather than on being. We do not deny that character must express itself in action; that charity without works is a contradiction; that the good will cannot be formed save by doing good. But deeds are particular, and relative to time and place; and an ethical code which prescribes or forbids particular acts not only loses touch with real life, but diverts the attention from the spirit to the letter. In the same way the institutions by which a man's station and duties are determined tend also to become rigid and conventional.

Now Jesus Christ did not promulgate a new code of morals; nor did He do more than lay the foundations of a new society. Had He instituted a definite social, political, or ecclesiastical order, or prescribed a scheme of duties for His followers, the gospel would have possessed for Ethics only an historical interest, instead of affording, as it does, principles by which we may criticize every action and reform every institution. The words and works of Jesus are a well of living water, from which all men of whatever time or nation may drink. We do not disparage organizations and codes of duty. They are essential to the realization of any human ideal; and it is the part of practical Christianity to work out the gospel in a moral, social, and religious order, appropriate to the needs of each generation. In order to use ideas we must crystallize them; but in the process they become half-truths. The life of Jesus alone abides as the truth, reflected and refracted on the broken surface of the river of time.

We must, however, qualify what has been said in two respects. Jesus guarded the sanctuary of the family by the most stringent regulation of divorce. This was natural; for the family is the foundation-stone of the fabric of society. Where it does not remain pure and undivided, to nourish love and duty, the nation becomes corrupt at its source. Again, Jesus instituted the Holy Sacraments, by which we may participate in His living Body and Blood, i.e. in His Life and Spirit, to cleanse our hearts, to renew our wills, and to illuminate our minds with the vision of Truth.

Nothing can be gained by attempting to summarize the Sermon on the Mount. It is enough to emphasize three points.

1. Jesus turns the judgment and attention from the outward act to the inward motive, to the thought and feeling from which the act springs. 'Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery; but I say unto you, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart' (Mt 5<sup>27</sup>). A standard such as this must shatter the Pharisaic complacency that accompanies the outward observance of a code of duties.

2. In the same way Jesus lays stress on being, not doing, on character, not action. Blessed are the meek, the merciful, the pure in heart, the forgiving, they which hunger and thirst after righteousness. Not that deeds are unimportant or unnecessary. Far from it. But the vital thing is the will. So Jesus transcends the point of view of the casuist. In the Christian ideal there are no contradictions. In the Gospels there is no delicate balancing of considerations and consequences.

3. Jesus subordinates the love of our neighbour to the love of God. It is often said that the Second Commandment, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself,' is an adequate expression of the ultimate principle of morality. But the self that we love may be an unworthy self, perhaps even a sensual self. If so, we shall carry this conception into the treatment of our neighbour. There is much god-natured vice in the world. And apart from this, fashionable philanthropy is too often dominated by an ideal of mere comfort. That is why well-meant efforts at social improvement not seldom end in vanity and vexation of spirit. To avoid this, altruism must draw its inspiration from true religion. It must seek illumination from God, and in His light interpret the duty towards other men. In other words, the love of God, as He is seen and known in Christ Jesus, creates a new ideal of duty both in relation to ourselves and our neighbour. Finally, the Christian motive is not the abstract conception of duty for duty's sake, but charity, the pure love of the full, concrete, and perfect ideal of humanity, realized for all time in the Person of Jesus Christ.

EARTHLY AND HEAVENLY 503

EAR.—Of the Greek words translated 'ear' in EV, two (ἀράων, ἀρία) refer exclusively to the bodily organ, and occur only in connexion with the case of Malchus (Mk 14<sup>46</sup>, Jn 18<sup>10-26</sup>, Mt 26<sup>51</sup>, Lk 22<sup>51</sup>). In Mt 28<sup>14</sup> the rendering is simply a paraphrase. In Mk 7<sup>30</sup> (ἀκούα) 'his hearing' would be more exact. In all other instances the word οὖς occurs, and is used: (1) literally, to denote 'the ear' (Mt 10<sup>27</sup>, Mk 7<sup>33</sup> 8<sup>14</sup>, Lk 14<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>26</sup>), or (by transference) 'the range of hearing' (Lk 4<sup>32</sup>), but more frequently (2) figuratively, to denote a spiritual faculty symbolized by the natural ear (Mt 11<sup>15</sup> 13<sup>12</sup> 15<sup>10, 16, 23</sup>, Mk 4<sup>9</sup> 23, Lk 8<sup>9</sup> 9<sup>44</sup> 14<sup>35</sup>). The definitive passages for this use are Mt 13<sup>13-23</sup>, Mk 4<sup>2-22</sup>, Lk 8<sup>5-15</sup>, where it forms the underlying subject of Christ's first parable, 'the Sower,' a parable concluded in each account by the phrase, 'He that hath ears (to hear) let him hear.' Indeed, the general principle of speaking in parables is in these passages connected with 'ears dull of hearing' (Mt 13<sup>13-15</sup>). Christ is speaking in reference to 'mysteries' (Mt 13<sup>35</sup>, Mk 4<sup>11</sup>, Lk 8<sup>10</sup>), that is, Divine truths not necessarily puzzling in themselves, but undiscoverable by man apart from a revelation of them (see Monle on Eph 1<sup>8</sup> 3<sup>3-6</sup>, cf. also 1 Co 2<sup>7-10</sup>). When these have been revealed to him, man has the power to recognize their truth, fitness, and necessity (see Westcott on He 2<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>26</sup>), in proportion as he is determined to do the Divine will (Jn 7<sup>17</sup> 8<sup>48-49</sup>). This faculty of recognizing the voice of truth and (as it were) vibrating to its utterance is fitly referred to by Christ as a spiritual 'ear.'

EARTHLY AND HEAVENLY (ἐπιγῆτος, ἐπουράνιος).—The Gr. words are found in the Gospels only in Jn 3<sup>12</sup> (ἐπουράνιος), however, occurs as a variant reading (TR) in Mt 18<sup>22</sup>, where some critical editors prefer οὐράνιος, in Christ's conversation with Nicodemus, and are best interpreted in the light of the context. The attempt made by some commentators to explain them by collating passages where the same or similar words occur, yields no satisfactory result, the meaning of the words in these passages being so different from their meaning in Jn 3<sup>12</sup>.

It is evident from the conversation with Nicodemus that the contrast drawn by Christ between things earthly and things heavenly was not a contrast between truths which were within the range of religious experience, and which should therefore have been within the knowledge and understanding of Nicodemus—'a master of Israel,' and truths pertaining to the gospel which were, for the time being, beyond the reach of the religious consciousness. The earthly things were those of which Christ had been speaking,—the necessity and mystery and reality of the new birth,—and also, as Godet rightly infers from v. 12 (note use of plural instead of singular in addressing Nicodemus), the truths previously preached by Christ. These were all of a moral-religious character, and could be known and verified by the spiritually-minded. The heavenly things were those which were to be revealed to men through the completed redemptive work of Christ. Their nature may be gathered from v. 12<sup>12</sup>. The Divinity and the atoning death of Christ, God's eternal love, and salvation by faith, are indicated there as being among the heavenly things.

EARTHQUAKE.—Palestine abounds in traces of seismic and volcanic action. From the region of the Dead Sea northward along the Jordan valley and as far as Damascus the whole country must have been visited by tremendous earthquakes in prehistoric ages. Mention of several is made in the OT, sometimes coupled with significant reference to serious disaster and widespread alarm caused by them (1 S 14<sup>15</sup>, Am 1<sup>1</sup>, Zec 14<sup>2</sup> etc.). Regarded as supernatural visitations, signs of the times, they produced a deep impression.

Five times in the Gospels the noun σεισμός (fr. σειν, 'to shake') is used of an earthquake (Mt 24<sup>29</sup>, Mk 13<sup>19</sup>, Lk 21<sup>11</sup>), and once (Mt 27<sup>51</sup>) the idea is expressed by the phrase ἡ γῆ ἐκτάρατο ('EV the earth did quake'). In LXX σεισμός (or σεισμός) is employed to render EQ of the original. Though specifically applied to an earthquake, σεισμός properly has a wider connotation; thus in Mt 27<sup>51</sup> it is used of a tempest (σεισμός ὑπὸν ἕρποντα is of darkness). Hence Alford thinks that in Mt 23<sup>19</sup> it denotes not an earthquake, but the 'shock' produced by the rolling away of the stone from the sepulchre.

4. Recorded earthquakes.—Of these there are two, namely, the earthquakes at the Crucifixion and the Resurrection (Mt 27<sup>51-54</sup>, 28<sup>2</sup>). The historicity of these earthquakes is disputed. St. Matthew alone mentions them; St. Mark (15<sup>28-29</sup>) and St. Luke (23<sup>44</sup>), in agreement with St. Matthew in regard to the darkness and the rending of the veil, apparently know nothing of an earthquake at the Crucifixion [the Fourth Gospel has no allusion to any of the portents], and they are equally silent in the case of the Resurrection. Plummer ('St. Luke' in Internat. Crit. Com.) quotes a statement in the Gemara that some forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem the heavy gates of the temple were mysteriously flung open about midnight at the Passover; but it would seem that sufficient evidence of earthquake shocks being felt in or near Jerusalem at the date in question is wanting. Probably a legendary element must be recognized in the passages under consideration. At the same time it should be borne in mind that the circumstance narrated is 'not in itself incredible' (Cary, Synop. Gospels). Earthquakes are frequently accompanied by a 'strange, bewildering darkness' (Plummer, Bibl. Studies), and if shocks did then take place they would naturally be interpreted of the 'sympathy of nature.' (Cf. Corn. a Lap.: 'The earth, which trembled with horror at the death of Christ, as it were leaped with joy at the Resurrection'.)

2. Predicted earthquakes.—Mt 24<sup>7</sup>, Mk 13<sup>19</sup>, Lk 21<sup>11</sup>. The question arises, Do the Synoptists here preserve ipsisima verba of our Lord? It must be remembered that 'a generation and a half . . . had passed between the events and the telling of the tale' (F. C. Burkitt); hence a possibility that the eschatological discourses as reported are coloured by events which had already taken place when the narratives were compiled. On the assumption that the predictions were uttered by Jesus, account should be taken of the fact that they are clothed in the language of current Messianic expectation. The setting up of the Kingdom was at hand; it would be consequent on that national disaster which, looming in the near future, would be presaged by phenomena in which men saw the dread precursors of catastrophe. And this actually came about: between the Crucifixion and the destruction of Jerusalem the earthquake was frequent; the earth was a prey to the most violent convulsions (Godet, St. Mat. p. 149; Renan, L'Antichrist, ch. xiv.).

EATING AND DRINKING.—Eating and drinking are occasionally referred to in the Gospels as acts expressive of men's ordinary life. The simple natural life of Jesus was thus contrasted with the austere ways of the Baptist (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>, Lk 7<sup>34</sup>). The servant waits till the master has eaten and drunken, and afterwards he eats and drinks (Lk 17<sup>7</sup>); in the days of Noah men went on eating and drinking, heedless of the coming flood (Lk 17<sup>27-28</sup>), and the rich fool still says to his soul, 'Take thine ease, eat, drink, be merry' (Lk 12<sup>19</sup>). The careless self-indulgence of the servant who, in his lord's absence, began to eat and drink with the drunken (Mt 24<sup>46</sup>, Lk 12<sup>45</sup>) is condemned on the one hand; and so, on the other hand, is that over anxiety which keeps saying, 'What shall we eat? or What shall we drink? or Wherewithal shall we be clothed?' (Mt 6<sup>25-34</sup>, Lk 12<sup>22-34</sup>). The scribes and Pharisees complained that Jesus ate and drank with publicans and sinners (Lk 5<sup>29</sup>), which was His glory; and it will be the glory of those who continue with Him in His temptations that they will eat and drink at His table in His Kingdom (Lk 22<sup>29</sup>). EBIONISM.—It would be going beyond the scope of this Dictionary to enter with any fulness into a discussion of the obscure and elusive subject of Ebionism as it meets us in its varying forms in the history of the early Church. What immediately concerns us is its bearing upon certain questions connected with the origin of the Gospels and the history and person of Jesus Christ Himself. But as these questions cannot properly be handled till we have determined what we are to understand by Ebionism, a brief treatment of the general subject appears to be necessary.

1. WHO AND WHAT WERE THE EBIONITES?—The name Ebionites (Ἐβωναῖοι), it is generally agreed, is derived from the Hebrew עֲבִיּוֹנִים, evyonim 'the poor.'* It seems most probable that originally this name, like Nazarenes (Ac 24<sup>14</sup>), was applied to all Christians; but whether it was first adopted by the followers of Christ themselves or given them by others it is impossible to say. The comparative poverty of the great mass of Christians in the early days of the Church, especially in Jerusalem, where the name doubtless arose, might lead to its being used by outsiders as a term of contempt. On the other hand, the Christians of Jerusalem may themselves have adopted it because of the spiritual associations with which 'the poor' (עֲבִיּוֹנִים, evyonim) are referred to in the OT (e.g. Ps 34<sup>6</sup> 69<sup>72</sup>, Is 11<sup>4</sup> 14<sup>22</sup> 29<sup>19</sup>; cf. S. R. Driver, art. 'Poor' in Hastings' DB; G. A. Smith, Isaiah, vol. i. ch. xxix. 'God's Poor'), and the blessings pronounced upon them by Jesus Himself (Lk 6<sup>20</sup>, Mt 5<sup>3</sup>). If it was first given as a name of reproach, it could very easily and naturally be accepted as a name of honour.†

* Certain of the Fathers attempt to derive the name from a supposed founder called Ebon, who is said to have spread his doctrines among the Christians who fled to Pella after the fall of Jerusalem (Eutellian, de preser. Heret. 23; Epiphanius, Har. xxx. 1, 2). But though Hilgenfeld has laboured to give historical reality to the figure of Ebon (Ketzergesch. pp. 422-424), modern scholars have practically agreed that he has only a mythical existence (Harnack, Hist. of Dogma, i. 299; Uhlhorn in PREB. v. 120).
† It is a later idea, evidently suggested by antipathy to the low Christological ideas with which Ebionism had come to be identified, that leads Origen (c. Cell. ii. 1, de Princip. iv. 1, 22)

After the name 'Christian' (cf. Ac 11<sup>26</sup>) had become the general designation for the disciples of Christ, 'Ebionites' appears to have been reserved as a distinctive title for Jewish as distinguished from Gentile Christians (Εβουαία χριστιανισμῶν of ἀπὸ Ἰουδαίων τῶν Ἰησοῦν ὡς Χριστὸν παραδέξαντες, Origen, c. Cels. ii. 1), but specifically for those Jewish Christians who, in some degree more or less pronounced, sought to maintain as essential to Christianity the now obsolete forms of the OT religion (the Fathers from the 2nd to the 4th cent. passim). Thus Ebionism becomes a synonym for Jewish Christianity in its antithesis to the universalism of the Catholic Church; and it is in this broad and yet pretty definite sense that the word is properly to be employed (Harnack, l.c. i. 289; Uhlhorn, l.c. ibid.). It is true that in the 4th cent. we find Jerome using the two names Nazarenes and Ebionites in speaking of the Jewish Christians, with whom he had become well acquainted in Palestine (Ep. ad August. cxxii. 13), and this has led some to suppose that he is making a distinction between two entirely different sects (so especially Zahn, Kanonsgesch. ii. 648 ff.); but it is now generally held that, in this case he was referring using two names for the same thing, and that 'Nazarenes' and 'Ebionites' are both general designations for Jewish Christians as such (Harnack, l.c. p. 301; cf. Uhlhorn's art. 'Ebionites' in Schaff-Herzog, Enycl. of Rel. Knowledge, with his later art. 'Ebioniten' in PRE<sup>3</sup>).

While, however, it seems impossible to distinguish between Nazarenes and Ebionites, and improper in this connexion to think of a separation into clear-cut sects, there were undoubtedly differences of tendency within the general sphere of Ebionism. From the first a stricter and a more liberal party is to be discerned (the oi ἄστροι Εβουαία of Origen, c. Cels. v. 61), corresponding in some measure to the cleavage that existed in the Council of Jerusalem (Ac 15<sup>1-29</sup>)—a Pharisaic party which held the Law to be essential even for Gentile Christians, and a party of broader mind, which, while clinging to the Law for themselves, did not seek to impose it upon their Gentile brethren (Justin, Dial. c. Tryph. 47). Finally, with the rise of the Gnostic heresy, a Gnostic or syncretistic type of Jewish Christianity makes its appearance, to which the name of Ebionism is still applied (Epiphanius, Hær. xxx. 1). This Gnostic Ebionism itself assumes various forms. It already meets us within the NT in the false doctrine which St. Paul opposes in Colossians, and in the teaching of Cerinthus to which St. John replies in his First Epistle. At a later period it is represented in the doctrines of the Elkesaites, who combined their Ebionism with influences drawn from the Oriental heathen world (Epiphanius, Hær. xix. 2, xxx. 1; Hippolytus, Philos. ix. 13).

II. THE EBIONITE GOSPELS.—As against the Tübingen school, which held that primitive Christianity was itself Ebionism, and which took, in consequence, a highly exaggerated view of the influence of Ebionitic thought upon the history and the literature of the early Church, it is now admitted by nearly all modern scholars that there are no writings within the Canon of the NT which come to us directly from this circle. On the other hand, two of the Apocryphal Gospels, the Gospel according to the Hebrews and the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles (otherwise known as the Gospel of the Ebionites), are immediate products of the Judeo-Christian spirit—the former representing Ebionism in its earlier and simpler type, and the latter that syncretistic form of Jewish Christianity which afterwards sprang up through contact with Gnosticism (see GOSPELS [APOCRYPHAL]; and art. 'Gospel according to the Hebrews' and 'Apocryphal Gospels' in Hastings' DB, Extra Vol.). The extant fragments of the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles show that its value is quite secondary, and that the author has simply compiled it from the Canonical, and especially from the Synoptic Gospels, adapting it at the same time to the views and practices of Gnostic Ebionism. Much more interest and importance attach to the Gospel according to the Hebrews. We have references to it, for the most part respectful and sympathetic, in the writings of Clement, Origen, Eusebius, and, above all, Jerome; while several valuable fragments of it have been preserved for us in the pages of Epiphanius. Eusebius (HE iii. 25, 27) and Jerome (Com. on Mt 12<sup>23</sup>) both testify that this was the Gospel used by the Ebionites, and it is the latter who gives it its name of the 'Gospel according to the Hebrews' (secundum Hebræos). The numerous references in the Fathers to this work, and the extant fragments themselves, if they do not justify Harnack's statement that Jewish-Christian (i.e. Ebionite) sources lie at the basis of our Synoptic Gospels (Hist. of Dogma, i. 295), lend some weight to the idea that the distinctive features of the document, so far from being altogether secondary, ought to be regarded as indications of an early Aramaic tradition, which still held its own among the Jews after the growing universalism of the Church had left it behind (see Prof. Allan Menzies in Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. 343*).

and Eusebius (HE iii. 27) to treat the name as derived from the 'poverty' of the Ebionites in intelligence and knowledge of Scripture, and especially from the 'beggarly' quality of their Christology.

III. EBIONISM AND THE CANONICAL GOSPELS.—Apart from the existence of special Ebionite Gospels, the idea has been common, both in ancient and modern times, that certain of the Canonical Gospels owe something of their substance or their form to the positive or negative influence of Ebionite sources or Ebionite surroundings. (1) The Gospel of St. Matthew.—Jerome, who testifies, as we have seen, to the fact that the Jewish Christians of Palestine had a Gospel of their own (secundum Hebræos), also tells us that this Gospel was regarded by many as Matthæi authenticum, i.e. the original of Matthew (Com. on Mt 12<sup>23</sup>); and on one occasion refers to a copy of it which he himself had seen and translated as though he believed it to be the original Hebrew (ipsum Hebraicum) of St. Matthew's Gospel (de Viris Illust. ii. 3). Irenæus, two centuries earlier, says that the Ebionites use only the Gospel of Matthew (i. xxvi. 2); a statement which points, at all events, to this, that even in his time the Jewish Christians of Syria attached themselves to a particular Gospel, and that between that Gospel and St. Matthew the Apostle a close connexion was believed to exist. Irenæus does not seem to have been aware of the existence of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, and apparently confounded that work with the Canonical Matthew. But when his statement is taken together with those of Jerome, very interesting questions are raised as to the origin and connexions of the Synoptical Gospels, and of the First Gospel in particular, with the result that in modern theories upon this subject the Gospel according to the Hebrews has played an important rôle. It would be out of place to enter here upon any discussion of the questions thus raised (see GOSPELS). But it may be said that while the whole trend of recent scholarship is unfavourable to the views of those who would make the Gospel according to the Hebrews either the 'Ur-Matthews' itself or an expanded edition of it, some grounds can be alleged for thinking that it represents an early Aramaic tradition of the Gospel story which was in existence when the author of Canonical Matthew wrote his book, and upon which to some extent he may have drawn.—a tradition which would naturally be more Jewish and national in its outlook than that represented by the Greek written sources on which he placed his main dependence (see Hastings' DE, Extra Vol. 342 f.).

(2) The Gospel of St. Luke.—On the ground that much of the teaching which is peculiar to St. Luke bears specially upon wealth and poverty, it has frequently been alleged that the Evangelist made use of a distinctly Ebionitic source, or was himself in sympathy with Ebionism. It is true that the Ebionites, as we meet them later in Church history, resemble the Essenes in taking an ascetic view of life, and regarding voluntary poverty as a thing of merit and a means of preparing for the Messianic kingdom. But it is altogether a misrepresentation of the facts to say that this is the type of the ideal Christian life as it meets us in Luke, or that his references to riches and poverty rest on the idea that wealth is pernicious in itself and poverty salutary in itself (Weiss, Introd. ii. 309). The form in which the first Beatitude of Matthew (5<sup>1</sup>) is given in Luke, 'Blessed are ye poor for yours is the kingdom of God' (6<sup>20</sup>), together with the closely following Woe pronounced upon the rich (v. 24), has especially been fastened on as a clear proof that these sayings proceed from an Ebionitic circle 'ascetic in spirit and believing poverty to be in itself a passport to the kingdom, and riches the way to perdition.' Similarly in the parable of Dives and Lazarus (16<sup>19-31</sup>), it is supposed that Dives goes to the place of torment because he is rich, while the beggar is carried into Abraham's bosom simply because he is a beggar. Such interpretations, however, spring from a very superficial cognition (cf. Bruce, Expos. Gr. Test. on Lk. 6<sup>20</sup>, Parabolic Teaching of Christ, p. 378 ff.). And, while it is true that St. Luke dwells, more than the other Evangelists, on the consolations of the poor and the perils of rich men (see, besides the passages already quoted, 4<sup>18-22</sup>, 12<sup>16-19</sup>, 16<sup>19-21</sup>), the fact is sufficiently accounted for, on the one hand, by that humane and philanthropic spirit which is so characteristic of the Third Evangelist and so natural in one who is called 'the beloved physician'; and, on the other, as Zahn has suggested (Zinssetzung, ii. 379), by his sense of the appropriateness for one in the position of Theophilus, to whom his Gospel is immediately addressed, of our Lord's frequent warnings of the spiritual dangers of wealth and the worldliness to which wealth is so prone to lead. It is to be noted, however, that our Lord's strongest utterance against wealth is found in Matthew (19<sup>24</sup>) and Mark (10<sup>25</sup>), as well as Luke (18<sup>25</sup>); and that a comparison of the Third Synoptic with the other two reveals occasional touches, on the one side or the other (note, e.g., the presence of ἀπόσις in Mt 19<sup>24</sup>, Mk 10<sup>25</sup>, and its absence from Lk 18<sup>25</sup>), which an ingenious theorist might very well use to support the thesis that Luke is not so Ebionitic as Matthew and Mark (see Plummer, 'St. Luke' in Internat. Crit. Com. p. xxv f.).

(3) It is curious to notice how, from the 2nd cent. to the 19th, the Fourth Gospel has been associated in two quite different ways with Ebionism, and specifically with Cerinthus, an Ebionite of the Gnosticizing type who taught in Ephesus towards the close of the Apostolic age. On the one hand, we have the statements of Ireneus and others that the Apostle John wrote his Gospel to combat the errors of Cerinthus (Iren. III. xi. 1) and the Ebionites (Epiphanius, Hær. ii. 12, lxix. 23); statements which should be taken in connexion with the well-known story, attributed to Polycarp, of the dramatic encounter between St.

John and Cerinthus in the baths of Ephesus (Iren. III. iii. 4; Epiphanius, l.c. xxx. 24). * Even down to recent times these statements have been widely accepted as furnishing an adequate account of the origin of the Fourth Gospel. Thus Ebrard says: 'We are thus led to the conclusion that the Cerinthian gnosis was the principal cause which induced John to believe that the time had come for him to make known his peculiar gift, which he had hitherto kept concealed. . . . He emphasizes faith in Jesus the Son of God (xx. 31) over against a bare gnosis' (Schaff-Herzog, Encyc. of Rel. Knowledge, ii. 1189).

At the opposite extreme from the belief of Ireneus was the view of a sect referred to by Epiphanius (l.c. li. 3), and named by him the Alogi (because of their refusal to accept St. John's teaching regarding the Logos), who ascribed the Johannine writings to Cerinthus himself, and on that ground discarded them altogether. A parallel of a sort to this view was furnished by the Tubingen writers when they assigned the Gospel to some Gnosticizing dreamer of the 2nd century.

The residuum of truth that lies between these two contrary views may perhaps be found in the fact that the author was a contemporary of Cerinthus, and that he wrote his Gospel in full view of prevailing Cerinthian error. It is a mistake, however, to suppose that the work was intended as a direct polemic against Cerinthus and his followers.

'It is decisive,' says Meyer, 'against the assumption of any such polemical purpose that, in general, John nowhere in his Gospel allows any direct reference to the perverted tendencies of his day to appear; while to search for indirect and hidden allusions of the kind, as if they were intentional, would be as arbitrary as it would be repugnant to the decided character of the Apostolic standpoint which he took up when in conscious opposition to heresies. . . . We see from his [first] Epistle how John would have carried on a controversy, had he wished to do so in his Gospel' (John, i. 44 f.; cf. Westcott, John, p. xli).

The author doubtless has in view the heresies of Gnostic Ebionism, but in the Gospel he refutes them only by the full and positive exhibition of what he conceives to be the truth about Jesus Christ. He tells us himself that his purpose in writing is that those who read 'may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God' (20<sup>31</sup>). What he means by 'the Christ, the Son of God,' he lets us see in the prologue; and his method in the rest of the work is to show by selected examples how his conception of the truth about Jesus Christ has been historically realized.

iv. EBIONISM AND THE PERSON OF CHRIST.—The distinctive feature of Judaic Christianity, when we first meet it, lies in its continued adherence to the Law; but with the growth of more definite conceptions regarding the Person of Christ, the question of the keeping of the Law recedes into the background, and Christology becomes the matter of supreme importance to the Church. From the beginning it was the tendency of Jewish Christianity to shrink from the idea of the Incarnation, and to be content to regard Jesus as the last and greatest of the prophets. And when the Church defined its Christological position, the Jewish section was found to be lacking at this particular and crucial point, and so the term 'Ebionism' came to be almost synonymous with the denial of Christ's Divinity and Virgin-birth. Ireneus, after referring to the way in which the Ebionites clung to the Law of Moses and rejected Paul as an apostate, adds that, besides this, they teach consummator ut Cerinthus et Carpocrates (cf. Hippolytus, Philos. vii. 34, τὰ ἕξ περί Χριστοῦ ἰστοίαι τῶ Κερυνθίου καὶ Καρποκράτη μισθολογῶν), denying the birth from the Virgin and holding Christ as a mere man. Origen, more than half a century later, distinguishes between two classes of Ebionites (σὶ ἔθνοι Ἐβωναῖοι), one of which confesses, like the Church generally, that Jesus was born of a virgin, while the other affirms that He was born like the rest of men (c. Cels. v. 61). According to Jerome, it appears that by the 4th cent. the Ebionites of Palestine had made progress in their recognition of the Divinity of Christ and the Virgin-birth, for he says of them, qui credunt in Christum filium dei natum de Virgine Maria . . . in quem et nos credimus (Ep. ad August. cxxii. 13).

But while it may be true of the vulgar or non-Gnostic Ebionites, over whom, as Harnack says, 'the Church stalked with iron feet' (Hist. of Dogma, i. 301), that their distinction from the Church tended more and more to disappear, the case was different with the Gnostic or syncretistic variety, of whom Cerinthus may be taken as an early type. To Cerinthus, according to Irenæus (i. xxvi. 1; cf. Hippolytus, Philos. vii. 33), Jesus was nothing more than a naturally-begotten man—the son of Joseph and Mary—upon whom at His baptism the Christ came down from the absolute power (αὐθεντία) of God, thus making him the revealer of the Father and the miracle-working Messiah; but from whom this Christ-Spirit departed before the Passion, so that it was only the man Jesus who endured the cross, while the spiritual Christ remained untouched by suffering.

In the case of the Elkesaites of a later period, we find Jewish monotheism combined itself not only with Greek speculation, but with strange heathen elements taken over from the Asiatic religions. This syncretism was characteristic of the age, and in that fact the strength of Gnostic Ebionism lay. It was much more aggressive than Ebionism of the simpler type, and had a far more widely extended influence. Of its fantastic and fugitive forms this is not the place to speak. But its Christology appears in general to have been akin to that of Cerinthus; in other words it was essentially Docetic, and involved a denial of any real and abiding union of the Divine and human in the Person of our Lord.

ECCE HOMO.—'Behold, the man!' (Ἴδοὺ ὁ ἀνθρώπος or ἴδε ὁ ἀνθρώπος) (Jn 19<sup>6</sup>) was the utterance of Pilate when our Lord came forth wearing the crown of thorns and the purple robe. We may believe that the words were spoken to excite the pity of the Jews. Pilate had given over our Lord to be scourged, and had allowed his soldiers to robe and crown Him in mockery, but all the time he was anxious to save Him from death; and there was undoubtedly an appeal to the compassion of the bystanders in the words, 'Behold the man.' Probably it was to mock the Jews that the soldiers had robed and crowned Him who was said to have claimed to be their king; and Pilate himself, we can see, was not unwilling to deal somewhat scornfully with them. But he does not seem to have looked scornfully, he rather looked pitifully, on our Lord Himself. And when he said, 'Behold, the man!' he was, as it were, pointing out that Jesus had suffered enough. But although Pilate's words were those of a weak but not wholly unfeeling man who wanted to move to pity those whom he was afraid to send angry and revengeful from his judgment-seat, he was really, although all unconsciously, paying an act of homage to our Lord. 'Ecce Homo.' He was bidding men look to the perfect man, the incarnate Son of God, men's perfect example, their Divine yet most truly human Redeemer.

The scene of our Lord's appearing in the crown of thorns and the purple robe is naturally one to appeal to artists; and many great pictures, notably one of the greatest and most striking of modern times (by Munkacsy), have borne the title 'Ecce Homo!'

Ecce Homo is also the title of a very notable book by the late Sir John Seeley. The book cannot be discussed here. It deals with the manhood of our Lord in an original and striking way, and does not deny, although it does not discuss, His Divinity.

EDUCATION.—Among the Apocryphal Gospels, fables of what befell during the Silent Years, there are some that are concerned with the school-days of Jesus—mostly silly and sometimes blasphemous stories of the sort which St. Paul brands as 'profane and old-wishful myths' (1 Ti 4<sup>7</sup>). For instance, it is told in Arab. Evang. Inf. xlix. that the wondrous Child one day had a dispute with His teacher about the Hebrew alphabet; and when the latter would have chastised Him, his impious arm was withered, and he died. Such stories are, of course, absolutely unhistorical; but it is indubitable that during His early years at Nazareth Jesus had to do with school and teacher. It is mentioned incidentally by St. Luke that He could read (4<sup>16</sup>), and by St. John that He could write (8<sup>9</sup>); and it is impossible that He should have grown up without an education. It is not the least merit of the Jewish people that they recognized the value of education, and brought it within the reach of the poorest. 'Our ground,' says Josephus,* 'is good, and we work it to the utmost; but our chief ambition is for the education of our children.' A father, according to R. Salomo,† had as well bury his son as neglect his instruction; and it was a saying of R. Judah the Holy that 'the world exists by the breath of school-children.'

A child's first school was his home and his first teachers his parents, in accordance with Dt 6<sup>6-7</sup>; and his instruction began very early, since youth was recognized as the season of opportunity. 'He who learns as a lad,' said R. Abujah, 'to what is he like? To ink written on fresh paper. And he who learns when old, to what is he like? To ink written on used paper.'‡ St. Paul testifies that Timothy had known sacred literature 'from his infancy' (ἀπὸ βρέφους), his teachers being—since his father was a Greek and apparently deceased—his grandmother Lois and his mother Eunice (2 Ti 3<sup>15</sup> 1<sup>6</sup>); and Josephus says that 'from the very dawn of understanding' a Jewish child 'learned the Law by heart, and had it, as it were, engraved on his soul.'§ It may be assumed that Joseph and Mary would be no less zealous than others in the discharge of this sacred and imperative duty.

When he reached the age of six or seven years,¶ the boy was sent to the elementary school, which, since the subject of study was the Book of the Law, was styled the House of the Book (beit ha-Sopher). This admirable institution, comparable to John Knox's parish school, was attached to the synagogue; and since there was a synagogue in every village in the land, there was also an elementary school in every village.* The establishment of this system of education was ascribed to the celebrated Simon ben Shetach, brother of Salome Alexandra, the queen of Alexander Janneus (B.C. 104-78), and his successor on the throne (B.C. 78-69). Schürer† summarily dismisses the tradition with the remark that 'this Simon ben Shetach is a meeting place for all kinds of myths.' Whatever be the worth of the tradition, Josephus' reiterated ascription to Moses of the exceedingly thorough system of education which prevailed in his day,‡ proves it no recent institution.

From the House of the Book such as desired to prosecute their studies and become teachers themselves passed into the Scribal College, styled the House of the Midrash (beit ha-Midrash),§ where the great Rabbis taught. There were several of these colleges in Palestine. Sometimes, like the Christian ἐκκλησία (cf. 1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>, Col 4<sup>10</sup>), they met in an upper room in a private house,|| but generally in some special place. The college at Jabne, where R. Eleazar and R. Ishmael taught, met in a place called the Vineyard. The principal college was that of Jerusalem, and it met within the Temple-precincts (cf. Lk 2<sup>46</sup>), probably in the Temple-synagogue. The Rabbi occupied a low platform, and his disciples sat round him on the floor, 'powdering themselves in the dust of the feet of the wise,'¶—an arrangement which explains St. Paul's expression, 'educated at the feet of Gamaliel' (Ac 22<sup>3</sup>).

The disciples were employed in the study of the Oral Law—the Tradition of the Elders (Mt 15<sup>7</sup>), which in those days was regarded with even greater veneration than the Written Law,** and which until, at the earliest, the 5th cent. of our era†† was preserved in the memories of the Rabbis and orally transmitted from generation to generation. The method of study was Mishna, i.e. 'repetition,'‡‡ the lesson being repeated over and over again until it was fixed in the memory; and proficiency lay in faithful reproduction of the ipsisima verba of the Tradition. It was a high eulogy of Eliezer ben Hyrcanus, a disciple of R. Johanan ben Zakai, when he was likened to 'a plastered cistern which loses not a drop.'§§

This mnemonic drill was not the sole employment in the House of the Midrash. Whatever difficulties they felt, the disciples propounded to the Rabbi for elucidation. Often their questions were ridiculous quibbles, like that put to R. Levi ben Susi in connexion with Dt 23<sup>9</sup> 'If his brother's wife have lost her hands, how is she to loose his shoes?'|| But they were not always quite so trivial. One much discussed questio theologica was, 'Are they few that are being saved?' Some Rabbis held that 'all Israel would have a portion in the world to come'; others, that as only two of all that came out of Egypt entered into the land of Canaan, so would it be in the days of the Messiah.¶¶ Another question was, 'May a man divorce his wife for any cause?' (cf. Mt 19<sup>9</sup>). The strict school of Shammai permitted divorce only on the ground of unfaithfulness; but that of Hillel granted greater facility, allowing a man to put away his wife if he hated her; if he was dissatisfied with her cooking; if she went deaf or insane; if he saw another woman whom he fancied more.***

*** Jb. on Mt 5<sup>27</sup>.

He sat at the feet of the Rabbis in the House of the Midrash at Jerusalem—on that memorable occasion when, on attaining the age of twelve years and becoming 'a son of the Law,' He for the first time (?) accompanied Joseph and Mary on their annual pilgrimage to the sacred capital to celebrate the Feast of the Passover. He lingered in the city when His parents set forth on their return journey, and they found Him on the third day after in the school of the Rabbis. 'Raise up many disciples' was the Rabbinical maxim,* and the new recruit would be welcome when He took His place among the disciples. He was sitting in the midst of the Teachers, both listening to them and questioning them' (Lk 2<sup>46</sup>), and evincing an intelligence which amazed them.

There prevailed in early times a singularly unhappy misconception, that the Holy Child was confounding the wise men by an exhibition of Divine wisdom. The Arab. Evang. Inf. (i. 311.) declares that He was puzzling them with questions about theology, astronomy, physics, metaphysics, and anatomy, 'things which the mind of no creature could reach'; and Origen says: 'He was questioning the Teachers; and because they could not answer, He Himself was answering the questions which He asked.' He was questioning the Teachers, not that He might learn aught, but that by questioning He might instruct them.† This is rank Docetism, and is refuted by the Evangelist's testimony that 'Jesus made progress in wisdom and age' (grew) (Lk 2<sup>52</sup>), as it were, pari passu. He had a human education. His mind grew even as His body.

It made Jesus an object of disdain in the eyes of the rulers that He had never attended a Rabbinical College. They called Him 'a Samaritan,' which was a nickname that they had for one who had never sat at the feet of the Rabbis.‡ At the same time they could not deny that He had a knowledge of the things of God far transcending their theological lore. Again and again He encountered the wise men of Israel in debate, and worsted them on their own proper field (cf. Mk 12<sup>34-37</sup>—Mt 22<sup>34-36</sup>; Mt 22<sup>46</sup>—Mk 12<sup>37-39</sup>—Lk 20<sup>41-43</sup>). And once, when they heard Him discoursing in the Temple-court, they marvelled whence He had derived His wisdom. 'How,' they asked, 'hath this man learning, though he hath not studied?' (Jn 7<sup>15</sup>). His wisdom flowed from a higher source. The lofty truths which they were blindly groping after and ignorantly reasoning about, the Father had revealed to Him (cf. Jn 6<sup>39</sup>).

All the vaunted wisdom of the Rabbis Jesus held in very slight esteem. It was not indeed His manner to despise the searchings of earnest souls after the knowledge of God, but the theology of His day was the very arrogance of ignorance, and blinded its votaries to the truth. It is a pathetic fact that nothing so effectually prevented the recognition of Jesus by the men of Jerusalem as their fancied knowledge of the things of God. Bred in an atmosphere of disputation, they were all controversialists, and at every turn they would raise some theological objection to His claims. Once, when some wondered if He were the Messiah, others answered that His origin was known, and, according to the Rabbinical teaching, the Messiah would appear suddenly, none would know whence, like a serpent by the way or a treasure-trove (Jn 7<sup>37-38</sup>; cf. v. 41). Again it was objected that He testified concerning Himself; and it was a Rabbinical maxim that a man's testimony concerning himself was invalid (Jn 8<sup>15</sup>).§ Thus it fared with the Messiah when He made His appeal to the men of Jerusalem. Their minds were fenced by an impenetrable barrier of theological prejudice. It was otherwise in Galilee. Among the unsophisticated folk of that despised province the gospel gained a fair hearing and a ready welcome. All the Apostles save Judas were Galileans. 'I thank these, Father, Lord of heaven and earth,' said Jesus, perhaps when He was leaving Jerusalem, rejected by her wise men (Jn 10<sup>40-42</sup>); 'that thou didst hide these things from wise and understanding, and didst reveal them to babes' (Mt 11<sup>25</sup>).

It is important to take account of this. Does it not explain a difficulty which has been felt in connexion with the Fourth Gospel? St. John represents Jesus as a controversialist absolutely unlike the gracious Teacher of the Synoptists; and it has been alleged that these representations are incompatible. If Jesus spoke as the Synoptists report, He cannot have spoken after the Johannine fashion. But the difference is really a mark of verisimilitude. Jesus had different audiences in Galilee and in Jerusalem. To the simple people of the north He spoke the language of the heart, and couched His teaching in parable and poetry; but in Jerusalem He had to do with men whose minds were steeped in theology, and He met them on their own ground, talked to them in their own language, and encountered them with their own weapons. He adapted His teaching to His audiences. See, further, art. BOYHOOD.

EGYPT.—The Gospel narrative comes into contact with the land of Egypt at one point alone, and then only incidentally, in a manner which seems to have exercised no influence and left no trace upon the course of sacred history. The record, moreover, is confined to the first of the Evangelists, and is by him associated with the fulfilment of prophecy, as one of the links which drew together the ancient Hebrew Scriptures and the life of our Lord. The narrative is simple and brief. St. Matthew relates that Joseph, in obedience to the command of God, conveyed by an angel in a dream, took refuge in Egypt with the child and His mother from the murderous intentions of Herod the king (Mt 2<sup>13-15</sup>). The return to Palestine, again at the bidding of an angel of the Lord in a dream, is described (v. 19<sup>c</sup>). Joseph, however, feared to enter Judaea because of Archelaus, Herod's son and successor; and in obedience to a second vision directed his course to Galilee, and settled at Nazareth (v. 23<sup>a</sup>).

To St. Matthew it would appear that the chief interest of the history lies in its relation to OT prophecy. Both movements, the Flight and the Return to Nazareth, are described as fulfilments of the word spoken 'through the prophet' (v. 15), or 'through the prophets' (v. 23). In the first instance the passage quoted is Hos 11<sup>1</sup>: 'When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt' (עַיִן יִשְׂרָאֵל בְּרַחֲמָיִם לְבָנִי לָקָחְתִּי מִמִּצְרָיִם, i.e. Israel's children). Hosea recalls the deliverance and mercies of the past (cf. G. A. Smith, Twelve Prophets, in loc.); the Evangelist sees history repeating itself in a new exodus, which, like the earlier departure from Egypt, signalizes the beginning of a new national life, and is the promise and pledge of Divine favour. Egypt, therefore, to the narrator is no mere 'geographical expression.' The name recalls the memories of a glorious past, when Israel's youth was guided and sustained by the miracles of Divine interposition. And to him it is significant of much that this land should thus be brought into connexion with the birth of a new era for the people, in the Person of a greater Son, in whom he saw the fulfilment of the best hopes and brightest anticipations of Israel's ancient prophets.

The narrative of the Evangelist is absolutely simple and unadorned, and amounts to little more than a mention of the journey into Egypt made under Divine direction. No indication is given either of the locality or duration of the stay in the country. The impression conveyed, however, is that the visit was not prolonged.* Had the case been otherwise, it would hardly have failed to find mention in the other Synoptic Gospels, if not in St. John. The absence, therefore, of further record is hardly sufficient ground for throwing doubt upon the reality of the incident itself.

This brief statement is supplemented and expanded in the Apocryphal Gospels with a wealth of descriptive detail. The fullest accounts are found, as might be expected, in the Gospel of the Infancy, and the Gospel of pseudo-Matthew (see Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. p. 430 ff.).

In the Gospel of the Infancy (ch. ix. l.), Joseph and Mary with the Child set out for Egypt at cock-crow, and reach a great city and temple with an idol to whose shrine the other idols of Egypt send gifts. There they find accommodation in a hospital dedicated to the idol, and a great commotion is caused by their entrance. The people of the land send the idol to inquire the reason of the commotion, and are told that an 'occult god' has come, who alone is worthy of worship, because he is truly Son of God. Thereupon the idol falls prostrate, and all the people run together at the sound. The following chapter narrates the healing of the three-year-old son of the priest of the idol, who is possessed by many demons, and whose sickness is described in terms similar to those used of the Gadarene demoniac (Lk 8<sup>27</sup>, Mt 9<sup>2-3</sup>). Thereafter Joseph and Mary depart, and are afraid lest the Egyptians should burn them to death because of the destruction of the idol. Passing on their way they twice meet with robbers in the desert. In the first instance the robbers flee on their approach, and a number of captives are liberated. At a considerably later stage of their journey (ch. xxiii.) two bandits are encountered, whose names are given as Tibus and Dumachus, the former of whom bribes his companion not to molest Joseph and Mary; and the child Jesus foretells His crucifixion at Jerusalem thirty years later with these two robbers, and that Tibus shall precede Him into Paradise. On the road the travellers have passed through many cities, at which a demoniac woman, a dumb bride, a leprous girl who accompanies them on their journey, and many others have been healed. Finally, they come to Memphis (ch. xxx.), where they see the Pharaoh, and remain three years, during which period Jesus works many miracles, returning at the end of the three years to Palestine, and by direction of an angel making their home at Nazareth.

In a similar strain the Gospel of pseudo-Matthew (ch. xvii. ff.) records the number of attendants, with riding animals, a waggon, pack-oxen and asses, sheep and rams, that set out with Joseph and Mary from Judaea. In a cave where they had stopped to rest they are terrified by dragons, which, however, worship the child Jesus; and lions and other wild beasts escort them on their way through the desert. A palm-tree bends down its boughs that Mary may pluck the fruit; and as a reward a branch of it is carried by an angel to Paradise. A spring also breaks forth from its roots for the refreshment of man and beast. And the long thirty days' journey into Egypt is miraculously shortened into one. The name of the Egyptian city to which they come is said to be Sothis within the borders of Hermopolis, and there, in default of any acquaintance from whom to seek hospitality, they take refuge in the temple, called the 'ospital.' The 335 idols of the temple, to which divine honours were daily paid, fall prostrate, and are broken in pieces; and Afrodisius, the governor of the town, coming with an army, at sight of the ruined idols worships the child Jesus, and all the people of the city believe in God through Jesus Christ. Afterwards Joseph is commanded to return into the land of Judah. Nothing, however, is said of the actual journey, but a narrative of events 'in Galilee' follows, beginning with the fourth year of Christ's age.

According to the Gospel of Thomas, ch. i. ff. (Latin, Tisch. Ev. Apoc. p. 156 ff.), Jesus was two years old on entering Egypt. He and His parents found hospitality in the house of a widow, where they remained for a year, at the close of which they were expelled because of a miracle wrought by Jesus in bringing a dry and salted fish to life. A similar fate overtakes them subsequently in being driven from the city. The angel directs Mary to return, and she goes with the child to Nazareth. The History of Joseph, ch. viii. l., states the duration of the stay in Egypt as a whole year, and names Nazareth as the city in which Jesus and His parents lived after their return into the land of Israel.

The Flight of the Holy Family into Egypt has been at all times a favourite subject for the exercise * Herod's death (Mt 2<sup>9</sup>) would appear to have occurred not long after the 'Massacre of the Innocents' in Bethlehem.

of Christian art. William Blake, Charles Holroyd, Eugène Girardet, Anthony van Dyke, William Dobson, and many others have painted the scenes by the way with a circumstance and detail which are indebted, where not wholly imaginary, to the accounts of the Apocryphal Gospels. The reality would doubtless differ widely from the tranquil and easy conditions under which it has usually been depicted, and from which most readers have formed their mental conceptions of the event. The simple reticence of the Gospel narrative is in striking contrast to the luxuriance and prodigality of miracle of the Apocryphal story. All that can be affirmed with certainty is that the flight would be conducted in haste and with the utmost secrecy, and probably for the most part under cover of night. See also FLIGHT.

EIGHTH DAY.—On the eighth day after birth, as is well known, Jewish male infants received the rite of circumcision, and, at all events by the time of our Lord, their proper name also, in memory of the change in Abraham's name (see Hastings' DB, art. 'Circumcision'). Accordingly St. Luke records the fact that both Jesus Christ (22<sup>d</sup>) and His forerunner John the Baptist (12th) were circumcised and named on the eighth day (cf. Ph 3<sup>d</sup>, Ac 7th etc.); for thus it became them 'to fulfil all righteousness' (i. e. to observe all the requirements of the ancient Law in the spirit as well as in the letter). See, further, art. CIRCUMCISION. C. L. FELTOE.

ELDER.—In the Gospels the term 'elder' (πρεσβύτερος) does not occur in the later Christian sense, denoting an officer of the Church (as in Ac 14th 20th, Tit 1st, Ja 5th, 1 P 5th). In the Gospel of St. John the word occurs only once, and that in the doubtful passage concerning the adulteress (Jn 8th), where it has not any official sense, but simply means older in years. In the Synoptics there is more frequent use, mostly in the official sense. The few cases of unofficial meaning of the term are: Lk 15th, where it describes the 'elder brother' in the parable of the Prodigal; and Mt 15th, Mk 7th, where it means 'the elders' of a former age, the men of old from whom customs and maxims are handed down. In all the other passages (Mt 16th 21st 23rd, Mr 7th 27th, Lk 12. 29. 41, Mk 8th 11th 14th 23rd, Lk 9th 20th 22nd) the term 'elders'—invariably plural—bears the official meaning current among the Jews of our Lord's time. What is that meaning?

In the OT and Apoc. there is frequent mention of 'elders' in the official sense (see, e. g., Gn 50th, Ex 3rd 16, Lv 4th, Nu 11th, Dt 31st, Jos 24th, Jg 8th, 1 S 16th, 2 S 5th, 1 K 20th, Ezr 5th, Ezk 8th, Jth 6th, 1 Mac 7th 11th, Sus 6. 19 etc.). From a study of these and similar passages it appears that in all the history of Israel, from the Egyptian bondage down to the time of Christ, 'elders' appear as an official class; but the descriptions and statements are not explicit enough to give a definite idea of how they were appointed to office, or of their exact functions. It is not improbable that they were chosen as representatives of the people; and the duties of the office appear to have been threefold—advisory, executive, judicial. Further, there is a distinction between local 'elders' (those of a city) and 'the elders of Israel,' 'elders of the congregation,' 'elders of the people,' as they are variously called. We are now to inquire how far this OT use of the word is illustrated in that of the Gospels.

One passage only (Lk 7th) seems to indicate the local 'elders'—those of Capernaum, the scene of the event described; and even here the turn of the expression, 'elders of the Jews,' might possibly point to national 'elders' present or resident at Capernaum. But on the whole it seems more natural to take the term here in its local sense. In all the remaining passages cited above, the reference is to the national 'elders.' From Vitrings (de Synag., Vet. III. l. 1) downwards, NT scholars have held with apparent unanimity that the term designates the members of the Sanhedrin (wh. see). This view is sustained by the connexion and association of the term,—usually with 'scribes' and 'chief priests,'—and by Lk 22nd, where the Sanhedrin is called 'the presbytery,' or assembly of 'elders' (πρεσβυτεριον, cf. Ac 22nd). There are various forms of expression: sometimes 'elders' simply, and sometimes 'elders of the people,' commonly associated with 'chief priests and scribes.' This is held by some to indicate that there were three orders or grades in the Sanhedrin, the 'elders' being the lay element, or representatives of the people. This may be the case, but is at best only an inference, neither contradicted nor supported.

ELEAZAR.—An ancestor of Jesus, Mt 1st.

ELECT, ELECTION (ἐκλεκτός, ἐλεκτός, ἐκλογή).—Though we have no reference in the Gospels to any conscious effort on the part of the writers to grasp the significance of the Divine action in choosing and rejecting the human objects of His favour and the instruments of His will, we have sufficiently explicit statements, incidentally valuable, to show clearly that they inherited the OT conceptions on this question. The self-identification of Jesus with the ideal Servant of Jehovah (Lk 4th—Is 61st) at the outset of His public ministry at once widens the scope of the revelation of His Father's elective activity, and emphasizes the profound depths in human-Divine relationships to which this activity in the freedom of its manifestation has penetrated. Once again, in what may without exaggeration be called the most critical moment of Jesus' public life, when suffering and death (Lk 9th) assumed large proportions in His sight, the revelation of His position as the elect of God (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἐκλεκτοῦ, v. 35) not only assured His fearful disciples, but strengthened Himself in His often-expressed conviction that the consciousness of His eternal Sonship was well founded.

The variant reading ἐκλεκτός instead of ἐκλεκτός (Mk 9th—Mt 17th) is generally recognized as the genuine one, not only on account of the high authority of M and B, but also because, according to an obvious canon of textual criticism, it is the more likely reading of the two (see Scrivener's Introd. to the Criticism of the NT, II. 2471; cf., however, Nestle's Criticism of the Greek NT, p. 12, and art. 'Ascension of Isaiah' in Hastings' DB, vol. II. p. 501<sup>a</sup>). The Matthean and Markan versions bear evident traces of assimilation to the voice at Jesus' baptism. In this connexion it is important to remember how fully Jesus recognized that His position as the elect Son involved the fulfilment (καταρτισμός, Lk 9th) by Him of conditions fore-ordained as inseparable from His earthly life (cf. Lk 12th 128 24th, in each of which places is found St. Luke's favourite and emphatic βί; see also Mt 9th, Mt 17th). The determining factor in the free choice of ἐκλεκτός ἐξ ὕψους αἰώνων, Jn 10th by Jesus of the cross as the crowning act of His self-atonement was its absolute necessity (ἀπολύτως ἐκεί, Lk 24th). The ultimate synthesis of these apparently irreconcilable hypotheses may elude the keenest observation, but the reflexion that, in acting as He did, Jesus was fulfilling conditions which lie at the root of all well-ordered moral and spiritual activity (cf. ἐκλεκτός, He 2nd; ἐκλεκτός, 2nd) will serve to remind us of a sphere where these seeming contradictions are discovered to be profoundly at one, both in their origin and in the end at which they aim. It is noteworthy that St. Luke not only gives the burden of the conversation between Jesus and His heavenly visitants;

he also implies that Jesus was there informed in detail of the character of the death which He was about to suffer (συνιδέων αὐτόν . . . ἄγνωστος ἵδων αὐτόν, 8307).

How universally the title of 'the Elect' or 'the Elect One' had become identified with that of 'the Christ' is best seen in the contemptuous irony of the scoffing rulers who mocked on the day of the Crucifixion. The demonstrative αὐτός and the titular ὁ ἐκλεκτός combine to mark the emphasis with which they rejected the Messianic claims of Jesus; and not only the claims, but the foundation upon which those claims rested (cf. Lk 23<sup>35</sup>). It is remarkable that St. Luke seems to be the only NT writer who has adopted the use of the word as a designation, strictly speaking, of the Messiah (cf., however, the variant reading ὁ ἐκλεκτός in the Baptist's testimony to Jesus, Jn 1<sup>4</sup> WH). This statement is not affected by St. Matthew's quotation from Isaiah (42<sup>1</sup>), who may be regarded as the originator of the title. Here we have the idea in prominence, but by way of interpretation rather than by direct statement (cf. his use of the verb ἠρώσασθε, Mt 12<sup>24</sup> instead of the merely descriptive ὁ ἐκλεκτός μου of Is 42<sup>1</sup>).

The only other writing of a late date in which 'the Elect One' appears as a Messianic title is the Book of Enoch, which seems to have been the chief means of popularizing its use. Indeed, it would be interesting to trace the influence of that work in this, as well as in other respects, upon the Gospels of the NT. Of the many names by which the coming Messiah is designated there, the favourite one seems to be 'the Elect One' (see 49<sup>1</sup>, 45<sup>1</sup>, 49<sup>4</sup>, 51<sup>8</sup>, 52<sup>8</sup>, 54<sup>1</sup>, 55<sup>1</sup>, 8<sup>10</sup>, 62<sup>1</sup>), and on a couple of occasions this is joined with another word or words which are equivalent to a characterization of the condition upon which His election to the Messiahship rests ('the righteous and elect one', 53<sup>1</sup>; 'the elect one of righteousness and faith', 38<sup>1</sup>; see The Book of Enoch, E. H. Charles ed. pp. 106-180). A somewhat fantastic representation of the method by which the Divine election of Jesus was consummated occurs in Herman, where the servant elected by his Lord (ἐκλεκτὸν ἑκάλεσε κύριος πατρις, κ.τ.λ.), after having approved himself as a zealous guardian of his master's interests, is chosen by the latter (ἀφ' ὧν τὸν ἐπίστατον ἀγαπᾷ ἕλεσε κυριεύσας) to occupy the position of 'great power and lordship.' Whatever we may think of the orthodoxy of this teaching, it is at least interesting as showing how completely the habits of thought in the early Church were dominated by this aspect of the Incarnation, and how men strove by the aid of reason to harmonize the ideas underlying the titles of 'Servant' and 'Son' (see Sim. 5, 1-71).

As the Christological ideas of the early Church begin to emerge and to crystallize, we find this one holding a firm place, while at the same time another equally emphatic conception begins to assert itself. The election, by God, of Jesus was held to be a means to a wider end—the establishment of a chosen body which should exhibit on earth the graces and virtues of Him in and through whom their election was accomplished (cf. 1 P 2<sup>4</sup> 6), where the writer's insistence on the profound oneness of Jesus and His people is fundamentally and essentially Pauline, though he elaborates no argument to prove what he states; cf. ἐξελέξατο ἡμᾶς ἐν αὐτῷ, Eph 1<sup>4</sup>).

'The fundamental conception of Jesus dominating everything was, according to the OT, that God had chosen Him and through Him the Church. God had chosen Him and made Him to be both Lord and Christ. He had made over to Him the work of setting up the Kingdom,' etc. (Harnack, Dogmengeschichte, Eng. tr. vol. 1, p. 83). 'The Christian community must be conceived as a communion resting on a divine election' (ib. p. 148).

We must not forget, however, that this Divine election has its roots struck deep in the election which issued in the Incarnation, and that, apart from the latter, which is the rationalis and guarantee of the former, we cannot believe in the existence of 'an elect race' (ἡμεῖς δὲ γένος ἐκλεκτῶν, 1 P 2<sup>2</sup>). This was apprehended very soon by the Fathers of the Church, who never separate the idea of the election of Jesus from that of the community (ὁ ἐκλεκτός μου ὁ Κύριος Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς καὶ ἡμεῖς δὲ αὐτοῦ, κ.τ.λ., Clem. Rom. Ep. ad Cor. lxxiv; cf. also the Paulinism ὁ λαὸς ἐν ἡτοιμασεν ἐν τῷ ἡγαπημένῳ αὐτοῦ, Ep. of Barnabas iii. 6). While it is recognized that the ultimate Author of all elective purpose is God the Father, it is agreed that the active Agent in giving expression to the Divine decree is the Son, apart from whom (εἰ μὴ δι' ἐμοῦ, Jn 14<sup>6</sup>) it is not only impossible for men to approach God, but even to hear the voice of that calling (ἐκλέξασθε ἐταίρους, He 3<sup>1</sup>, cf. 12<sup>2</sup>) which He addresses to them in Christ (ὁ καλέσας ὑμᾶς . . . ἐν Χριστῷ, 1 P 5<sup>10</sup>), and which, when heard, is the antecedent condition of their election (cf. 2 P 1<sup>10</sup>; see οἱ κλητοὶ καὶ ἐκλεκτοὶ καὶ πιστοί, Rev. 17<sup>14</sup>).

It will scarcely be contended that there is any practical difference in the Christology of those who speak of an election διὰ Χριστοῦ, and of those who in the same connexion use the phrase ἐν Χριστῷ. We are able, perhaps, to see in the former expression an emphatic assertion of the delegated activity of Christ who prepares 'for Himself' a people (αὐτοῖς αὐτοῦ τὸν λαόν τῶν κλητῶν ἐταίρων ἑαυτοῦ, Barn. v. 7, cf. xiv. 6) whose prerogatives and position shall be in correspondence with His royal priesthood, and with the Sonship to which He was chosen (1 P 2<sup>4</sup>, Rev 20<sup>6</sup> 1<sup>5</sup>; cf. He 7<sup>24</sup> ἀπαράβατος τῶν ἡμετέων, Ro 8<sup>34-37</sup> ὄντως υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ . . . συνδοκῆσαν δι' Χριστοῦ, κ.τ.λ.).

Nor is the teaching of Jesus Himself devoid of references to those chosen by God out of mankind 'as vessels made to honour' (cf. 2 Tj 2<sup>1</sup>, Ro 9<sup>21</sup>). He indirectly tells us that 'the elect' have an influence in the Divine government of the world which makes for mercy and pity and salvation. The awful scenes accompanying the destruction of Jerusalem would result in the annihilation of its doomed inhabitants, were it not that, 'for the sake of his chosen,' the Lord (some of the old Latin versions read Deus) had determined to cut short the duration of that period (cf. Mk 13<sup>20</sup> = Mt 24<sup>20</sup>), in both of which passages occurs the verb κολοῦσθαι, found nowhere else in the NT, showing the interdependence of the two authors, although the forms of the verb in both places are not the same). St. Luke does not make any mention in this part of his record of the elect, but curiously enough he makes a reference to the vengeance of God being wreaked (ἡμέρας ἐκδικήσεως, Lk 21<sup>22</sup>) on the unfortunate city, which reminds us of the words of Jesus contained in another passage in the same Gospel. Jesus there is said to speak of God 'avenging his elect' (ὁ θεὸς οὐ μὴ παύσῃ τὴν ἐκδίκησιν τῶν ἐκλεκτῶν αὐτοῦ, Lk 18<sup>7</sup>). It may be permissible to conjecture that St. Luke omitted to mention Jesus' reference to the elect in the former context because of the promise implied in the interrogatory sentence just quoted. On the other hand, it is possible that a displacement has occurred in the text, with the result that we have a double reference to God's activity on behalf of His chosen, each being suitable to the textual position it occupies. The subject of the prayers of those who appeal (τῶν βλασφημῶν αὐτῶν) 'day and night' is that, in the first place, they may be delivered from injustice; and, secondly, that they may soon see the vengeance of God active on their behalf against those who oppress them (cf. ἐκδικήσων με ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀντιδικου μου, Lk 18<sup>7</sup>, where the first idea is prominent; and ἐδικαίει . . . ἐκ τῶν, κ.τ.λ., Rev 6<sup>10</sup>, in which the second thought is emphasized; cf. also the reference to the cry of Abel's blood for vengeance, cf. He 12<sup>24</sup> = Gn 4<sup>10</sup>). It is possible that, by interpreting the cry of the elect in this twofold sense, we are able to obtain a clearer idea of the meaning of the 'longsuffering' of God with regard to them (μακροθυμεί ἐπ' αὐτοῖς). The ambiguity of the expression is mitigated if we remember that the patience of God is needed even by His elect, whose insistent (cf. φωνῇ μεγάλῃ, Rev 6<sup>10</sup>, and ἡμέρας καὶ νυκτῶν, Lk 18<sup>7</sup>) appeal for vengeance on their enemies and oppressors is not in harmony with the voice of that blood by which they were redeemed (αἷμα βαπτισμοῦ, He 12<sup>24</sup>). Much more, of course, does the patient waiting of God, sometimes amounting even to seeming tardiness, reveal His tenderness when exemplified in the case of those who torment His elect (ὡς τινες βραδυτέρα ἠγοῦνται, 2 P 3<sup>9</sup>). Arising out of this thought we are not surprised to find on more than one occasion that not only is it insufficient for their final acceptance that men should be 'called' (cf. the contrast πολλοὶ κλητοὶ and ὀλίγοι ἐλεκτοί, Mt 22<sup>14</sup>), for this is in harmony with much of Jesus' teaching elsewhere (cf. Mt 7<sup>24-28</sup> etc.), but that there is even a danger that the elect may lose that and for which they were chosen (see . . . ἀποπλανῆναι . . . τοὺς ἐλεκτούς, Mk 13<sup>12</sup>, cf. Mt 24<sup>10</sup>; cf. διναρῶν can hardly be an implicit assertion of the impossibility of success attending the efforts of the false teachers to lead astray the elect; it rather refers to that object which they had in view). Another and a further condition must be fulfilled before the chosen of God may claim the salvation to which they were elected (. . . τῆν ἠτοιμασμένην ἡμῶν βασιλείαν ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου, Mt 25<sup>34</sup>, cf. 25<sup>35</sup>; Ho 11<sup>16</sup>). On more than one occasion Jesus insists on the necessity of endurance or perseverance up to the very end of their experiences (ὁ ὀψομένης . . . σωθήσεται, Mk 13<sup>13</sup>=Mt 24<sup>13</sup>; cf. Mt 10<sup>22</sup>, Eph 6<sup>13</sup>), and, on the other hand, we are justified in applying to this place His warning, which He gave to those whose joy in receiving the gospel message was but a transitory (πρόκαιρος, Mt 13<sup>21</sup>=Mk 4<sup>17</sup>) emotion. Of a like nature is the incidental remark of the seer of the Apocalypse, that Jesus' companions in His warfare with 'the beast' are those who not only were called and elected, but whose calling and election had been crowned by their enduring faithfulness (πιστοί, Rev 17<sup>14</sup>). We are thus able to appreciate the anxiety of later Christian writers, who emphasized this part of Jesus' teaching, and who reminded their readers that their entrance into the eternal kingdom of Jesus was conditioned by their enduring zeal; for in this way alone their 'calling' and 'election' were made stable and lasting and certain (βεβαίαν ἡμῶν τὴν κληθῆναι καὶ ἐλεγθῆναι ποιῆσαι, 2 P 1<sup>10</sup>, cf. He 3<sup>14</sup>).

That Jesus held firmly by the Jewish belief in the election of that race to spiritual privilege, is evidenced by many signs both in His teaching and His methods of work. It is true that His words are in perfect harmony with the Baptist's scornful warning against that foolish pride of birth which leaves out of sight the responsibility involved by privilege (cf. Mt 3<sup>9</sup> and Jn 8<sup>56</sup>). At the same time, He is no less ready to assert the claims of His fellow-countrymen to the rights which were theirs as the Divinely chosen people (ἡ σωτηρία ἐκ τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἐστίν, Jn 4<sup>22</sup>; cf. τῶν ἄρτων τῶν τέκνων, Mt 15<sup>26</sup>). The sting of His bitter denunciation of contemporary religionists lay in His recognition of their spiritual position, and of the fact that they of right were the teachers of the people (ἐπὶ τῆς Μωσέως καθέδρας, Mt 23<sup>2</sup>, cf. v. 10<sup>2</sup>). In spite of many disappointing experiences, He was again and again amazed at the lack of faith and spiritual insight amongst 'Israelites' (Mt 8<sup>10</sup>=Lk 7<sup>9</sup>; Jn 3<sup>9</sup>, cf. Mk 6<sup>6</sup>), and His pathetic lament over the decaying Jerusalem shows how eagerly He had hoped to make the Jewish nation realize its ancient place as the 'first-born' in the family of His Father (Ex 4<sup>22</sup>, Jer 31<sup>1</sup>, cf. Ho 12<sup>9</sup>). His activity in this direction betrays itself both in His words which incidentally express His feelings (ἀφες πρώτων χορηγεῖσθαι τὰ τέκνα, Mk 7<sup>27</sup>, Mt 15<sup>24</sup>), and in His deliberate instructions to His disciples to confine their missionary labours 'to the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 10<sup>6</sup>). We are, however, bound to remember that St. Matthew alone records this restriction, and that there are some evidences of the abandonment of its strict enforcement even by Jesus Himself (Jn 4<sup>22-24</sup>, cf. Ac 1<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>14</sup>).

Though Jesus felt Himself forced to recognize, in the attitude of the Pharisees and lawyers of His day, the failure of God's people to realize the Divine purpose in them, He also recognizes no less distinctly that, according to that purpose, theirs was a high destiny (. . . τῆν βουλήν τοῦ Θεοῦ ἠθέτησαν εἰς αὐτούς, Lk 7<sup>35</sup> [cf. for the use of βουλή in this sense Ac 2<sup>28</sup> 4<sup>28</sup> 20<sup>27</sup>, Eph 1<sup>11</sup>, He 6<sup>17</sup>]), and it seems as if at times His realization of what this people might have become, and His keen disappointment at their actual achievement, led Him into speaking disparagingly of those who were outside the Jewish covenant (cf. the contrast ἡμεῖς . . . ἡμεῖς, Jn 4<sup>9</sup>, which is the verbal expression of a contrast running through the whole narrative [see Westcott, Gospel of St. John, ad loc.]; cf. also the privilege involved in the word πρώτος as well as the harsh contrast τέκνα [τὰ τέκνα] . . . κυνάρια, Mk 7<sup>27</sup>).

We may here note that St. Matthew has preserved several fragments which deal with the claim of Israel as God's people to be the sole recipients of the gospel message (Mt 10<sup>6</sup>; 23<sup>15</sup>; 23<sup>35</sup>), though he also records sayings of Jesus which conflict with this (24<sup>14</sup> 23<sup>35</sup>, cf. Mt 13<sup>10</sup> 11<sup>17</sup> 14<sup>13</sup> 15<sup>14</sup>, Lk 24<sup>47</sup>). Perhaps the most striking instance of these just referred to is that in which Jesus avers, as His reason for the evangelization of Israel alone, that His 'coming' is imminent, and that no time is to be lost, because, in any event, the work will not be completed before that occurrence (. . . ἵνα ἴδῃτε ἵνα τίς ἀφῆκεν, Mt 10<sup>6</sup>). It is evident that whatever may have been the case with regard to Jesus' actual knowledge of the date of His parousia, those who heard His words understood Him to mean that it would take place soon (cf. ἀπὸ νῦν, Mk 13<sup>35</sup>, Lk 21<sup>34</sup>; Mt 24<sup>29</sup>; cf. ἡ γὰρ ἡμέρα καὶ ἡ νύκτις οὐκ οἶσθε, Lk 21<sup>34</sup>; see 1 Th 5<sup>14</sup>). Moreover, the Evangelists seem to have established an intimate connection in the consciousness of early Christianity between His second coming and the preaching of His gospel to 'the cities of Israel' (Ac 28<sup>21</sup>; Ro 15<sup>31</sup>; see Edersheim, Life and Times, i. 644 ff.; cf. also O. Holtzmann, Leben Jesu, Eng. tr. pp. 160, 301, etc.). 'It might, of course, be objected, that the idea of the universality of the judgment leaves no sufficient reason for restricting the disciples' work to the Jewish people, and that the heathen were perhaps even in more urgent need of the disciples' preaching than the Jews, since to the latter had been given the Law and the Prophets. The justness of the objection may be granted. But against it we have set the belief in the election of Israel,' etc. (O. Holtzmann, op. cit., p. 379 n. 3). His own assertion with the limiting words ἡ μὲν (Mt 15<sup>24</sup>) is strongly emphatic as to His conviction with regard to the Divine favour towards Israel. 'The saying of Jesus to His disciples at the last supper, that they, to whom He committed His Kingdom which He had received from His Father, would be beside Him . . . sitting on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel' (Lk 22<sup>29</sup>), indicates that He viewed the activity of His disciples, and therefore also their future judicial function, as primarily extending to the people of Israel. Also when Jesus spoke of a coming of the heathen from the east and west . . . He was thereby thinking of an ingathering . . . which, as a whole, consisted of native Israelites' (Wendt, Lehrn Jesu, Eng. tr. ii. 849 f.).

Not only do we find Jesus recognizing and acting upon the OT conception of the national election of Israel—that preferential treatment which His fellow-countrymen claimed as of right—though He reminded them from time to time that in order to a genuine Abrahamic descent it was necessary to cultivate an ethical and spiritual likeness to their great forefather, which would alone complete their title to the promises made to them through him (cf. the implied contrast between physical and spiritual descent in the words σπέρμα and τέκνα, Jn 8<sup>37-39</sup>, cf. Lk 8<sup>9</sup>=Mt 3<sup>9</sup>). Jesus also Himself, in establishing His Kingdom amongst men, proceeds along lines exactly parallel to these. He assumes to Himself the right to select certain instruments whereby His designs may be furthered and ultimately accomplished. As He was the Chosen and Sent of His Father, so He is delegated to choose and send others, who were to be the few through whom God's work upon the many was to be accomplished (cf. Jn 17<sup>18</sup> 20<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>18</sup> etc.). It is true that at times Jesus speaks of His disciples as His Father's choice and possession (τοὶ ἠσταν, Jn 17<sup>9</sup>), and that they are His by His Father's gift (καὶ ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ, 17<sup>8-9</sup>; cf. καὶ τὰ ἐμὰ πάντα σὲ ἔδωκεν καὶ τὰ ἐμὰ, v. 10). At the same time He is no less emphatic in His declarations that they are His own elect, the result of His own discriminating choice (ἐγὼ ἐξελέξαμην ὑμᾶς ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου, Jn 15<sup>16</sup>; cf. ἐγὼ οἶδα τίνας ἐξελέξαμην, 13<sup>13</sup>). Our knowledge of Jesus' acquaintances with the characters of His disciples prior to their selection by Him, is too scanty to permit us to judge accurately of His methods; but from the fact that they were for the most part natives of that part of Galilee where His earliest activity displayed itself, and that some of them were antecedently disciples of the Baptist, we are led to conclude that He possessed sufficient individual acquaintanceship to warrant His choice (cf. Mk 1<sup>16c</sup>, Mt 4<sup>16c</sup>, Lk 5<sup>16c</sup>; see Jn 1<sup>40c</sup>). He seems, moreover, to have felt a heavy weight of responsibility on their account, and in the review of His work towards the end of His life, He seems to congratulate Himself on being able to render a good account of His stewardship in this respect. As the result of His guardianship (ἐν ᾧ ἐτήρουν αὐτοῦ . . . καὶ ἐφύλαξα, Jn 17<sup>12</sup>), they all justified His choice with but one exception, and that exception had its mournful justification (ὅσα ἢ γράφῃ κληρώθη), and, in spite of the necessity of such failure (κατὰ τὸ ἀπομάρτυρον; Lk 22<sup>32</sup>; cf. Ac 2<sup>24</sup>; see also Lk 17<sup>1</sup>=Mt 18<sup>7</sup>), its awful warning (ὅσα δὲ τὸ ἀνόμωτον ἐκείνη δι' οὗ, κ.τ.λ., Mk 14<sup>21</sup>, Mt 26<sup>24</sup>). The work which this chosen nucleus was destined to achieve finds also a definite place in the consciousness of Jesus as He looks out on the world and down the future ages. He does not, in fact, hesitate to name those who are to be brought to share in the glory and in the power of His judgment-coming, though they are scattered in all directions over the world (ἐκ τῶν ἑσπέρων ἀνέμων ἀπ' ἄκρου γῆς εἰς ἄκρου οὐρανοῦ, Mk 13<sup>37</sup>=Mt 24<sup>31</sup>), His elect (τοὺς ἐλεκτοὺς αὐτοῦ).

The work wrought by the little band chosen by Christ, and continued by their successors from one generation to another during the period intervening between the initiation of His Kingdom and its consummation, can hardly be better delineated than in the words of the present Bishop of Birmingham: "The Apostles were the first 'elect' in Christ with a little Jewish company. "We,"—so St. Paul speaks of the Jewish Christians,—"we who had before hoped in Christ." But it was to show the way to all the Gentiles ("ye also, who have heard the word of the truth, the gospel of your salvation") who were also to constitute "God's own possession," His heritage. It was His purpose to be realized a universal one: it is the reunion of man with man, as such, by being all together reunited to God in one body. . . . And the Church of the reconciliation is God's elect body to represent a Divine purpose of restoration far wider than itself—extending, in fact, to all creation. It is the Divine purpose, with a view to "a dispensation of the fullness of the times, to sum up" or "bring together again in unity" all things in Christ. . . . This great and rich idea of the election of the Church as a special body to fulfil a universal purpose of recovery, etc. (Gore, The Epistle to the Ephesians, p. 71 f.).

Here, then, we have in its incipient stages a revelation of this Divine process of working in its new and wider aspect. There is fundamentally no change of method, but rather a consecration of what has always in the OT been recognized as God's plan of work (cf. e.g. Am 3<sup>2</sup>, Dt 7<sup>6</sup> etc.). In the fresh start, so to speak, which He has made we find His choice not merely involved in the Incarnation as the mode of procedure, but in the election of the Man Jesus (Lk 9<sup>34</sup>), whom He deliberately ordained or appointed (ἐν ἀνθρῷ ᾧ ὤρισεν, Ac 17<sup>31</sup>, cf. 10<sup>42</sup>) for His work. Jesus, acting on authority delegated to Him, chooses certain men and sends them to carry out what He has commenced. In the end He breaks down all national barriers and limitations (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, cf. Mk 16<sup>15</sup>), and people in every nation (ἐν παντί ἔθνεσιν, Ac 10<sup>45</sup>) are accepted by Him so long as they 'fear God and work righteousness.'

Keeping these facts and considerations in mind, we are at liberty to ask ourselves the very difficult questions. On what basis does the Divine election stand? Is there any antecedent condition in complying with which men are placed amongst the number of God's elect? From whatever point of view we look at this mystery, one thought, at least, clearly emerges: in His choice of Israel as the guardian of the sacred deposit of religious truth, God exhibited His wisdom in a way we, as students of the Divine government of the world, can discern and appreciate. Their genius for the work entrusted to them is universally recognized (cf., on the other hand, such passages as Dt 6<sup>10</sup>, Jer 31<sup>4</sup>, Mal 1<sup>2</sup>, which, however, do not conflict with the general truth of our statement, though they emphasize the absolute freedom of God's choice). From them and from them solely have come into the world those truths which spring from a pure and spiritual monotheism; and we are not forbidden to recognize, in the analogous lessons taught to the world by other nations, that 'the principle of selection' (ἡ ἐκτ' ἀπορῆς πρόθεσις, Ro 9<sup>11</sup>) finds its place in their history too (see Sanday-Headlam, 'Romans' in Internat. Crit. Com. pp. 248 ff., 342 ff. etc.). When we remember that to the consciousness of Jesus the full and final revelation of His unique Divine Sonship was only made at His Baptism (Mt 3<sup>17</sup>=Mk 1<sup>11</sup>=Lk 3<sup>22</sup>), and confirmed beyond doubt during the period of His Temptation, we are at liberty to believe that His previous life was a gradual preparation for His final election, as well as a proof that in selecting Him for His work His Father had chosen the fittest instrument to reveal Himself to mankind. Remembering, too, the gradual gathering together by Jesus of His little band of chosen disciples and followers, and the care taken by Him in training and disciplining them for their position and work, we are able to apprehend in some dim way the necessity of a moral and spiritual correspondence between Him who chooses and His chosen. The fact that Jesus Himself included Judas Iscariot amongst the number of His 'elect' (Jn 6<sup>70</sup>) does not invalidate this contention, as we may well be able to believe that the unhappy traitor exhibited a character sufficiently endowed with spiritual possibilities to justify his election to the Apostleship. Perhaps he may be adequately described as one of those labourers who, having been hired (μισθώσασθαι ἐργάται, Mt 20<sup>1</sup>) to work in the vineyard, were ultimately rejected because they failed to correspond with their new environment.

We may here note two different uses to which the word 'elect' or its equivalent idea is put in the Gospels. (a) It describes those who are chosen for a certain definite work, and are for this purpose endowed with suitable characteristics, and elected to certain special privileges and spiritual graces (see Mt 24<sup>22-24</sup>, Mk 13<sup>30-32</sup>). For their endurance and active perseverance to the end alone ensure their final salvation (ἐν τῷ ἁμαρῆ ἡμῶν ἀντιμεθεὶς τὰς ἄρχαίς ἡμῶν, Lk 21<sup>19</sup>), though they are always to remember that God's active sympathy is ever on their side (197). (β) It is also used of those whose salvation is assured by their sharing in the power and glory of the returning Messiah (κατὰ τὸν ἀπομάρτυρον καὶ δέξιναι αὐτοῦ, Mt 24<sup>31</sup>=Mk 13<sup>32</sup>; cf. λόγιον Ἰσακαιοῦ, Mt 22<sup>14</sup>).

In conclusion, we may be permitted to point out that in acting on the principle according to election, God has for ever vindicated His justice and righteousness by choosing us 'in Christ' (see ἐν Χριστῷ, ἐν ἀδελφῷ, Eph 1<sup>6</sup>). By and in the Incarnation the human race and the separate individuals of the race have received those capacities and endowments which fit them for their work and for their Divinely appointed destiny (ὁ πᾶσι τὰς ἀνθρώπων θέλει σωθῆναι, 1 Ti 2<sup>4</sup>). No one in the fore-ordaining counsels of God is contemplated as doomed to eternal exclusion from His presence (μη βουδόμενός τις ἀπολέσθαι, 2 P 3<sup>9</sup>), and if they are thus shut out finally (ὅπου ὁ σκόδιος αὐτῶν οὐ τελευτῆ, κ.τ.λ., Mk 9<sup>46</sup>), it is because of their own deliberate action in causing their bodies to be servants of unrighteousness, and thus in being stumbling-blocks in the way of the salvation of their fellow-men (cf. Mt 5<sup>29c</sup> 18<sup>6a</sup>, Mk 9<sup>42c</sup> etc.). No excuse as to lack of opportunity or privilege will avail; for although inequality will always here as elsewhere exist, none shall be judged apart from their capacities and opportunities (ἐκαστῷ κατὰ τὴν ἰδίαν δόξαν, Mt 25<sup>12</sup>); and all shall be recompensed according to the knowledge they were able to acquire (Lk 12<sup>47</sup>). It is true that apart from Christ (χωρίς εμού, Jn 15<sup>7</sup>) we are powerless for good; but as none, not even those who have never heard His name, are outside Him (ὅτι πάντα ἐπ' αὐτοῦ συνέστηκεν, Col 1<sup>17</sup>; cf. Eph 1<sup>10</sup>), so none need be apart from Him in that profounder sense whereby human life becomes Divinely active and abundantly fruitful. To all is given the opportunity of attaining the end to which they are called and chosen.

ELI [ELOI], ELI [ELOI], etc.—See SEVEN WORDS.

ELIAKIM.—Two ancestors of Jesus bore this name, according to Mt 1<sup>3</sup> and Lk 3<sup>3</sup>.

ELIEZER.—An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3<sup>3</sup>.

ELIJAH (AV Elias) is mentioned in the Gospels on 9 occasions, reported in 15 passages (rejecting Lk 9<sup>8</sup>). Of these passages only one, Lk 4<sup>25</sup>, alludes to the story of Elijah as it is contained in the OT. Here Jesus justifies His performance of miracles in Capernaum, while refraining from working them in Nazareth, by citing the well-known story of Elijah's going away from Israel in time of famine to relieve the distress of a Sidonian widow (1 K 17<sup>9-13</sup>). All the other passages refer to the present or future work of an Elijah who, according to common Jewish belief, still lived and would appear again upon earth.

The dominant note in the belief is that the prophet was to appear as the forerunner of the Messiah. This notion appears in its simplest form in the accounts of the avowal of the Messiahship of Jesus at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16<sup>13</sup>, Mk 8<sup>29</sup>, Lk 9<sup>20</sup>). The answers then given by the disciples to Jesus' question as to the popular estimate of Himself were varied, and doubtless representative: He was John the Baptist, Elijah, Jeremiah, or one of the prophets (cf. Mk 8<sup>28</sup>, Lk 9<sup>2</sup>). Only one, Simon, saw in the work of Jesus the consummation, rather than the postponement, of their Messianic hope. The period of Elijah the forerunner is past, and the Messiah is here.

The relation between the prophet Elijah, the lawgiver Moses, and the Messiah Jesus, is dramatically presented in the narrative of the Transfiguration (Mt 17, Mk 9<sup>2</sup>, Lk 9<sup>28</sup>). Here, too, the logical proof is presented that Elijah has come already, and is John the Baptist. When once Jesus has been accepted as the Messiah, the work of John cannot fail to be known as the great preparatory work of Elijah. This work finds expression in St. Matthew's report of Jesus' characterization of John (11<sup>14</sup>; omitted from the parallel in Lk.).

The Baptist's denial that he was Elijah (Jn 1<sup>20</sup>) is the natural expression of his lofty idea of the work of preparation for the Messiah contrasted with the insufficiency of the work he had actually been able to perform. The passage incidentally describes one of the functions of Elijah who was to come, viz., that he should baptize. Baptism was then one of the preliminaries of the salvation which the Messiah was to bring.

Elijah is mentioned again in connexion with the Crucifixion (Mt 27<sup>46-50</sup>, Mk 15<sup>34-36</sup>). The bystanders professedly misunderstood Jesus' cry, 'Eli, Eli,' as a call to Elijah. They proposed to wait and see if he would come down to help Him. Bearing in mind that Elijah is the forerunner of the Messiah, their curiosity seems not simply whether Jesus would have supernatural relief, as a man might, but whether Elijah would, by coming to His aid, prove that Jesus was after all the Messiah.

There remains the striking picture of the Baptist in the character of Elijah, drawn in Lk 1<sup>16</sup>. The passage clearly assumes the developed doctrine of the Messiahship of Jesus, and the career of John the Baptist is analyzed from this point of view. The high spiritual plane of the identification is obvious. John, comes in the spirit and power of the great prophet, reconciling families, reducing the disobedient to obedience, preparing Israel for the coming of the Messiah. Only on this high plane could the identification be successful. The work of the forerunner here finds fullest expression. He not simply proclaims, he prepares. This is, however, the implication of the other passages; otherwise the suggested identification of Jesus with Elijah would not have been possible, for it was the very works of Jesus that called out the suggestion. The same is true in the case of John.

The belief in the reappearance of Elijah, held by the Jews of NT times, is a later stage of the belief which is expressed in Mal 4<sup>5</sup> (Eng.); he would come before the great day of Jehovah to reconcile the hearts of parents and children. Sir 48<sup>10</sup> describes the same work more elaborately, and forms an early interpretation of the passage in Malachi.

The Rabbinical writings abound in expressions of the same belief, with characteristic extravagances and specifications. These Jewish traditions know Elijah as zealous in the service of God, and as a helper in distress, as well as the forerunner of the Messiah. Naturally his work is in behalf of their own people, and is performed in connexion with their own institutions.

As the Jews elaborated the earlier doctrine of the Messiah, and as in their thought He became more and more exalted in holiness and majesty, the impossibility of His appearance in the midst of all the sin and shame of Israel was increasingly felt; and the character of Elijah, the holy prophet, zealous in his earthly life for the political and religious integrity of the nation, and already enshrined in tradition as having been spared death, was a fitting one to be chosen to carry on the great work of preparing Israel for the blessings of the Messianic era. Indeed, in some passages the doctrine of Elijah has developed to such an extent as well nigh to usurp the functions of the Messiah.

ELISABETH.—The NT notice of Elisabeth is confined to the Third Gospel, and its brief record concerning her may well be due to St. Luke's acquaintance with Mary the mother of our Lord. It is interesting to know that she was a kinswoman (συνγνεῖς, Lk 1<sup>36</sup>) of Mary, though it is unfortunately impossible to verify the exact relationship that existed between them. Elisabeth is described, with her husband Zacharias (wh. see), as a faithful adherent of the OT type of religion—strict and regular in observance of the Law (v. 3). She enjoyed the double distinction, according to Jewish thought, of being both a priest's daughter and a priest's wife (v. 5). The joy of such a twofold honour was, however, diminished by the fact that she was barren (v. 7), to an Oriental woman little less than a calamity. But a single event in the Gospel narrative at once dispelled her sorrow and entitled her to a place of honour not among Jewish women alone, but in the eyes of the whole world. In her old age (v. 36) she became the mother of John the Baptist.

Between the promise and the birth of this child she was visited by Mary (v. 38), who remained with her for a period of three months (v. 39), and to whom she was made a proof of the Almighty's power (vv. 39-45). On Mary's appearance she received a special inspiration of the Holy Spirit, which even enabled her to recognize in her kinswoman the mother of her 'Lord' (v. 41<sup>f</sup>), and in Mary's Child a fulfilment of the promise of Jehovah Himself (v. 42). Herein she unconsciously illustrated the meaning of her own name, which in its Hebrew form signifies 'God is an oath.'

On the theory (upheld by Burkitt, Harnack, et al.) that the Magnificat ought to be attributed to Elizabeth and not to Mary, see art. BIRTH OF CHRIST, p. 203<sup>b</sup> note, and MAGNIFICAT.

ELISHA (AV Elisens).—The famous disciple, companion, and successor of Elijah. In NT he is only once referred to, viz. in Lk 4<sup>47</sup>. Jesus, preaching in the synagogue at Nazareth, reminds His fellow-townsmen, who were unwilling to receive His teaching because He was one of themselves, that Elisha, who was an Israelite, healed but one leper, and he was a Syrian. He leaves them to draw the obvious inference as to the probable consequence of their rejection of Him. It is clear, however, that in this warning our Lord was looking far beyond Nazareth, and that He had in view the casting away of the Jews through unbelief, and the call of the Gentiles. J. CROMARTY SMITH.

ELIUD.—An ancestor of Jesus, Mt 1<sup>14</sup>.

ELMADAM (AV Elmodam).—An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3<sup>28</sup>; perh. = Heb. Almodad (cf. Gn 10<sup>28</sup>).

EMMANUEL.—See IMMANUEL.

EMMAUS (Ἐμμαούς).—The question of Emmaus would seem at first sight to be simple, and the identification of this place easy. Indeed, Emmaus not being mentioned more than once in the Gospels, there are no different texts to be harmonized. We read in Lk 24<sup>13</sup> that Emmaus was a village 60 furlongs from Jerusalem, and that after having arrived there at the close of the day, and having seen Jesus at a meal, the two disciples were able to return the same evening to Jerusalem and there find the Apostles still assembled together. The only parallel passage in Mk. (16<sup>12</sup>), part of the unauthentic close of the Second Gospel, does not mention the name of the locality, and speaks only of an appearance to two disciples 'as they walked on their way into the country' (ὡς δὲ περιπατοῦντες . . . ἐκπορεύοντες εἰς ἄγρον). On the other hand, Josephus says (BJ VII. vi. 6) that Vespasian established a colony of 800 Roman veterans on the lands which he gave them at a distance of 60 (v.l. 30) furlongs from Jerusalem, at a place called Emmaus. Now, there still actually exists to the west of Jerusalem, on the road which leads to Jaffa, a place named Kolonieh. It is true that the distance is less than 60 furlongs: authors estimate it sometimes at 45, but more frequently at only 35, furlongs. It might be held, however, that the territory of the colony extended over an area of several miles, and that it might, according to circumstances, be thus considered as being distant either 30 or 60 furlongs from the capital. Under these conditions nothing would seem to oppose our placing, on the grounds indicated above, the Emmaus of St. Luke, identified with that of Josephus, at Kolonieh.

It must, however, be remarked that the different reading noted in the passage from Josephus (60 or 30) creates some uncertainty. It must also be noted that, according to some authors, the name Kolonieh is not to be explained by the Latin colonia at all, but by the name Kulon (Κούλον), mentioned in Jos 15<sup>59</sup> (LXX) as that of a town of Judah situated in the hill country. These difficulties, however, would not be altogether insurmountable if they were the only ones; a further and graver complication arises from the following facts.

In 1 Mac. an Emmaus is spoken of more than once as the scene of various occurrences: Judas Maccabeus vanquished Gorgias there in B.C. 166-167 (1 Mac 3<sup>40-57</sup> 42<sup>25</sup>; cf. Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 4); and in B.C. 160 Bacchides fortified it and placed a garrison in it (1 Mac 9<sup>20</sup>; cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. i. 3). The position of this place is easy to determine; it must have been situated between Jerusalem and Jaffa, nearer the latter, at the spot where the slopes of the mountainous region descend towards the great maritime plain. In this quarter, indeed, is found a site which has left important ruins, and which is mentioned several times in the course of the first centuries of the Christian era under the name Emmaus. From the 3rd cent. onwards it was called Nicopolis, without the remembrance of the ancient Semitic name being lost; and, as is the case with most of those places with two names, under the Arab domination it resumed its earlier name and was called Amwas, the appellation it still bears. Now, from the earliest times of ecclesiastical history, the opinion gained ground that this Emmaus-Nicopolis was the Emmaus of St. Luke. Eusebius, no doubt reflecting the views of Origen, and after him Jerome, maintained this identity (OS 257, 21, 121, 6); and after them this view of the case held sway for a long time in the Church. If it is asked how this conclusion could be formed, seeing that Emmaus-Nicopolis is situated at a distance from Jerusalem which is estimated (according to the particular route adopted) at 190, 175, 170, or 166 furlongs, almost thrice the 60 furlongs mentioned above, the reply is promptly given: '8 and some other MSS read '160' instead of '60.' The tendency to identify Emmaus-Nicopolis and the Emmaus of St. Luke became so strong, so irresistible, that it led to a curious result: in the Middle Ages, at the time of the Crusaders and afterwards, the memory of Emmaus-Nicopolis having been lost, the Emmaus of St. Luke was looked for nearer Jerusalem, and when it was believed that it had been found, not only the name of Emmaus, but also that of Nicopolis, was given to it.

From the 13th cent. (1280) or perhaps from the last years of the 11th (1099, see ZDPV xvi. p. 300), a tradition arose which for more clearness may be called the Franciscan tradition, and which places the Emmaus of St. Luke at el-Kubeibeh, to the N.W. of Kolonieh, at some distance to the north of the road from Jerusalem to Jaffa, and about 60 (more exactly 62-64) furlongs from the capital. Still, indeed, all the efforts of the champions of the Franciscan theory are directed towards establishing that the Emmaus of the Evangelist is el-Kubeibeh. Interesting ruins have been discovered there: those of a church dating from the time of the Crusades, and in the interior of its encinte the remains of a more ancient structure, which might be those of a Byzantine church, but which the defenders of the Franciscan tradition consider to be the very house of Cleopas, around which the sanctuary had been built.

The first question to clear up is that of the text. Now several authors, and in particular P. Lagrange (Rev. Bibl. 1896, pp. 87-92), have, in the opinion of the present writer, shown irrefutably that the original reading must have been '60 furlongs,' and that '160' is a correction meant to enable the Emmaus of St. Luke to be identified with that of 1 Maccabees. 'The 160 furlongs,' Lagrange concludes admirably (p. 89), 'represent neither the ancient tradition, nor the universal tradition, nor the unconscious tradition. This reading is a critical one, imposed by the authority of a master, very probably Origen, and collides almost everywhere with the firmly assured tradition of the Churches. To judge from the manuscripts, the question is settled: we must read "60 furlongs."

We must remark, further, that Emmaus-Nicopolis was a town before the Christian era and long beyond (cf. Jos. BJ. II. xx. 4), whereas the Evangelist speaks of a village (κώμη). Even after Emmaus-Nicopolis had been destroyed by the Roman soldiers of Varus (A.D. 4), it was not on that account a village; a ruined town is not a village. It was even the chief town of a toparchy (Jos. BJ. III. iii. 5; Plin. HN. v. 14). The remains of a church have been found there, which date not merely from the Crusades, but very probably from the Byzantine epoch; it is in vain that a recent author (Barnabé), who favours el-Kubeibeh, has tried to prove that this church was really nothing but a hot-baths establishment. But it is also vain to seek to infer from the presence of a church, even an ancient one, that we have to do with the Emmaus of St. Luke.

Another very strong argument against Emmaus-Nicopolis is its excessive distance. It is worth noting what efforts its partisans make to show that the two disciples could have returned the same evening to Jerusalem, walking for this purpose five or six hours. One of the most convinced defenders of this theory, Schifers, does not hesitate to affirm that they could have set out again from Emmaus as early as 3 o'clock in the afternoon and arrived at Jerusalem at 9 o'clock (Ev. Bibl. 1894, pp. 26-40; see also his book Amwas, das Emmaus des heil. Lukas, 1890). In that case it must be held that the words 'it is toward evening, and the day is now far spent' (Lk. 24th), may have been spoken immediately after noon.

The failure of the identification of Emmaus-Nicopolis with the Emmaus of St. Luke proves nothing in favour of el-Kubeibeh, which can produce only a late tradition in its favour. The argument which it has been sought to draw from the name el-Kubeibeh as an alleged corruption of Nicopolis (1) refutes itself. But the probabilities indicated at the opening of this article in favour of Kolonieh are greatly weakened by the undisputed fact that the ecclesiastical tradition of the first centuries pronounces in favour of 'Amwas-Nicopolis'; this fact proves that all recollection of an Emmaus situated nearer to Jerusalem had become effaced in the 3rd century. Under these circumstances the most elementary duty is to declare the problem unsolved, and incapable of solution under the present conditions and with the data which we possess.

Nor does the etymology of the name furnish any precise indication. We do not know to what Hebrew or Aramaic term Emmaus [we find also the forms Ammathus, Ammathum, Emmathum; 'Αμμαθός, 'Αμμαθού, 'Εμμαθού] corresponds. A vain attempt has been made to connect it with the root haman, and to prove thereby that baths existed at this spot. An argument in favour of this has been based on the fact that the baths situated near Tiberias were called by the same name (cf. Jos. 18th Hammath), but it is now known that the correct reading is Ammathus ('Αμμαθός; cf. ZDPV. xiii. pp. 194-199). It is on the frail basis of this hypothetical derivation that Mrs. Finn grounds her theory that Emmaus = Urtas, to the south of Bethlehem, near Solomon's Pools, 60 furlongs from Jerusalem (see PEFS, 1883, pp. 53-64). It is by an equally dubious etymological process that Colonel Conder has been led to seek for Emmaus in Khamasa, to the S.W. of Jerusalem, at a distance, moreover, not of 60, but of 80-90 furlongs. We may also note the attempt to place the Emmaus of St. Luke at Abu-Ghosh (Kiret-el-'Enab). From the point of view of distance this would be sufficiently exact, but there is nothing to lead us to conclude in favour of this particular spot rather than any other within the same circuit.

Lastly, we recall the fact that the Talmud speaks of Kolonieh as being also called Mosa or ham-Mosa, a name which we may connect with the מִשָּׁה of Jos. 18th (LXX: 'Amwas, but also 'Amwas). Near Kolonieh there exists to-day a place called Beit-Mizzeb, which recalls Mosa.

LUCIEN GAUTIER.

ENDURANCE.—The active qualities of perseverance and persistence, never absent from the biblical notion of endurance, form, in effect, the substance of the art. ACTIVITY, and need not be considered here. The passive aspect suggests an inquiry as to—

1. The causes of those trials which Christ had to endure.—Of (a) supernatural causes (1) the first, an all-inclusive cause, was the Divine will (Jn 10th), recorded beforehand in OT Scriptures (Mt 26th, Mk 14th, Lk 22nd 24th), and referred to constantly by Christ in words of resignation (Mt 20th, Lk 10th), often under the figure of a 'cup' (Mt 26th 28th, Jn 18th). (2) A second supernatural cause (under Divine permission) appears in the agency of Satan, acting both directly, in temptation and opposition (Mt 4th 13th, Lk 10th), and also oftener indirectly, through the weakness (Mt 16th, Lk 22nd) and wickedness (Lk 22nd, Jn 6th 8th 13th) of men. These two causes, whether expressly referred to or not, are undoubtedly to be regarded as factors never absent (see Jn 19th and also 12th 14th 16th), where the title 'prince of this world' is significant in this connection).

(b) Internal causes (supernatural also, in a different sense) were not wanting. (1) The prophetic mission of Christ (Jn 12th 18th) made suffering and death morally inevitable at the hand of man (Lk 4th 11th 13th, Jn 7th), light and darkness being essentially opposed (Jn 3rd; cf., for illustration, a remarkable passage in Plato, Rep. vii. 517 B, where a similar inevitability is declared even in the case of Socrates). (2) The revelation of His Divine nature, implied in His relationship to the Father's Being (Jn 5th 8th 10th), and prerogatives (Mt 9th, Lk 7th) was bound to provoke deadly hostility in unbelieving Jews (Mt 26th, Jn 19th). It is at the same time clear, from Christ's anxiety to avoid publicity (Mt 12th, Mk 7th 8th etc.) and needless offence (Mt 17th), that persecution and death were not courted by Him.

(c) The external causes were more complex. (1) Many trials arose from the imperfections of His disciples; their dulness (Mk 8th 9th, Lk 24th), spiritual powerlessness (Mt 17th), false zeal (Mt 15th 16th, Mk 9th, Lk 9th), mistaken aims (Mk 9th 10th, Lk 22nd), and discreditable falls (Mt 26th, Mk 14th), but (2) most arose from Christ's rejection by 'His own' (Jn 1<sup>11</sup>, Mt 23<sup>37</sup>, Mk 12<sup>62</sup>, Jn 5<sup>3</sup> 19<sup>13</sup>) from motives (which He well perceived, Mt 9<sup>4</sup> 12<sup>22</sup>, Mk 9<sup>31</sup>, Lk 6<sup>8</sup>, Jn 2<sup>25</sup>) of fear (Mt 8<sup>24</sup>, Jn 12<sup>22</sup> 19<sup>13</sup>), policy (Jn 11<sup>8</sup>, Mk 15<sup>15</sup>), gain (Mt 26<sup>42</sup>, Mk 10<sup>22</sup>, Lk 16<sup>13</sup>), envy (Mt 21<sup>28</sup> 27<sup>12</sup>, Jn 12<sup>17</sup>), and hate (Lk 19<sup>14</sup>, Jn 7<sup>7</sup> 15<sup>18-20</sup>); a rejection characterized in its display by indifference (Lk 14<sup>18</sup>), ingratitude (Lk 17<sup>17</sup>, Jn 5<sup>13</sup>), contradiction (Jn 8<sup>13</sup>), insult (Mt 10<sup>25</sup> 12<sup>24</sup>, Mk 15<sup>22</sup>, Lk 7<sup>34</sup> 22<sup>63</sup> 23<sup>31</sup>, Jn 8<sup>48</sup> 9<sup>24</sup>), treachery (Lk 11<sup>25</sup> 20<sup>20</sup> 22<sup>48</sup>), injustice (Mk 14<sup>64</sup>, Jn 19<sup>10-16</sup>), violence (Lk 4<sup>28</sup>, Jn 8<sup>20</sup> 10<sup>23</sup>), brutality (Lk 22<sup>64</sup>, Jn 19<sup>10</sup> etc.), and death (Jn 19<sup>16</sup>).

2. Some features of Christ's endurance are vitally connected with fundamental doctrines of His person and work. (1) It was voluntary. Of this the emphatic statement in Jn 10<sup>17</sup> leaves no doubt. Such an utterance may be hard to parallel, but prudence would almost make it so; and the expressions used in Lk 9<sup>31</sup>, Jn 7<sup>30</sup> 8<sup>20</sup> 13<sup>31</sup> seem to speak of a course equally spontaneous; indeed, in one case (8<sup>20</sup>) a voluntary (i.e. a suicide's) death is actually suggested as their meaning! (2) It was perfect. (a) Under suffering: for His spirit, words, and demeanour were admittedly supreme examples of His own teaching, e.g. upon submission (Jn 18<sup>27</sup>, Mt 26<sup>64</sup>), retaliation (Lk 22<sup>64</sup>), and love to enemies (Mt 5<sup>44</sup>, Lk 23<sup>34</sup>). (b) Under temptation: otherwise it would be inexplicable that Christ should have urged repentance as a first essential for others (Mt 4<sup>7</sup> 11<sup>20</sup>, 21<sup>28</sup>, Lk 5<sup>32</sup> 13<sup>15</sup>, etc.), whereas He afforded no example of it in His own case. On the contrary, He laid claim to sinlessness both negatively (Jn 14<sup>20</sup>) and positively (8<sup>29</sup>), as unchallengeable (8<sup>29</sup>). An intense perception of His sinlessness appears in the self-abasing awe of a few good men (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>, Lk 5<sup>8</sup>) more convincingly than in the ambiguous testimony of many other observers (Mt 27<sup>14</sup>, Lk 23<sup>6</sup>, Jn 19<sup>4</sup> etc.). (3) It was human. Christ's capability of human suffering is beyond question. No mention, indeed, is made of sickness in the ordinary sense; perhaps it is excluded; but all other bodily needs and infirmities were shared by Him (Mt 4<sup>2</sup> 8<sup>20-24</sup> 21<sup>18</sup>, Jn 4<sup>6</sup>, 19<sup>28</sup>). The emotions of His mind (Mk 3<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>34</sup> 10<sup>14</sup>, Lk 19<sup>4</sup>, Jn 11<sup>35</sup>) and spirit (Lk 10<sup>21</sup>, Jn 11<sup>33</sup> 13<sup>31</sup>) were evident from their outward traces, as well as from His own statements (Mt 16<sup>68</sup>, Lk 22<sup>15</sup>, Jn 11<sup>33</sup>). On two occasions He referred to those of His soul (Jn 12<sup>27</sup>, Mk 14<sup>34</sup>). That this capability of suffering was not counteracted by the exercise of miraculous power is proved by His reference to His 'temptations' (Lk 22<sup>28</sup>), by His prediction of sufferings on the part of His disciples similar generally to His own (Mk 10<sup>28</sup>), by the shrinking of His human will (Mt 26<sup>42</sup>, Lk 22<sup>42</sup>, Jn 12<sup>27</sup>), by His refusal to ally His own hunger miraculously (Mt 4<sup>2</sup>), or to lessen His torments even by ordinary means (Mk 15<sup>25</sup>), by His craving for the support of human sympathy (Mk 14<sup>36</sup>), and by His reliance above all else upon the Father's presence (Jn 8<sup>29</sup> 16<sup>29</sup>) and the spiritual support of prayer (Lk 6<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>18</sup>, 28 11<sup>1</sup> 22<sup>44</sup> etc.). As man He met temptation (Mt 4<sup>1</sup>), and overcame by faith (see Jn 11<sup>46</sup>, Mt 27<sup>32</sup>), and also the important expression 'my God,' Mt 27<sup>46</sup>, Jn 20<sup>17</sup>).

In some respects, however, His endurance differed essentially from that of believers. (1) It was free from the inherent tendencies of a sinful nature (Jn 14<sup>20</sup>) and from the enslaving influence of sins committed (8<sup>29-30</sup>). (2) It contained the additional elements of presence and perfect consciousness. Predictions of suffering are numerous and detailed (Mt 17<sup>22</sup>, 20<sup>21</sup>, 26<sup>7</sup>, Mk 14<sup>30-33</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22-44</sup> 12<sup>50</sup> 13<sup>31</sup>, 17<sup>22</sup> 22<sup>27</sup> etc.). The knowledge (Jn 18<sup>4</sup>) whereby He 'saw' and 'tasted' death (Jn 8<sup>51</sup>, 10<sup>12</sup>) was complete. (3) Above all, the relation between the Passion of Christ and the sin of the world (Jn 1<sup>29</sup>), symbolized by the supernatural darkness, laid on Him that infinite woe, almost amounting to despair (Mk 15<sup>34</sup>), the prospect of which was undoubtedly the main factor in the Agony and other forebodings.

3. There remain to be considered the purposes for the attainment of which Christ's endurance was a necessity (Lk 24<sup>26</sup>). In the trials and temptations of (a) His life, two such purposes are prominently visible: (1) the fulfilment of all righteousness (Mt 3<sup>12</sup> 5<sup>17</sup>), described as a progressive course through service and suffering (Lk 22<sup>27</sup>, Jn 13<sup>14</sup> 18<sup>11</sup>), in which Christ met continually the Father's approval (Lk 25<sup>42</sup>, Mt 3<sup>17</sup>, Jn 12<sup>28</sup>), being declared to be the 'Son of God' ideally as well as actually. (2) The acquirement of sympathy; through experimental acquaintance with the weakness of the flesh (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>, Mt 26<sup>41</sup>). Numerous instances might be given of the sympathy of Christ with human nature in its aspirations (Mk 10<sup>21</sup>, Jn 21<sup>17</sup>), weakness (Mt 12<sup>22</sup>), weariness (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>, Mk 6<sup>34</sup>), misery (Mt 3<sup>3</sup>), and shame (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>, Lk 15<sup>11</sup>). To Him, therefore, as 'Son of Man,' ideally as well as actually, is given authority to exercise pardon (Mk 2<sup>10</sup>), legislation (2<sup>28</sup>), and judgment (Jn 5<sup>27</sup>). Lastly, the great purpose which involved the endurance of (b) His death is in the main so clear as to leave no room for doubt. It may be summed up in the words 'forgiveness' (Mt 9<sup>28</sup>), 'redemption' (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>), and 'removal of sin' (Jn 1<sup>29</sup>); to which, in Jn 11<sup>50</sup>, is added the gathering of all the children of God into one in Christ (cf. 17<sup>21</sup>), benefits potentially world-wide (Jn 1<sup>29</sup> 9<sup>37</sup>), but limited, in their highest realization, to believers (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>). It need be no cause of surprise that these purposes are not more frequently enlarged upon in the Gospels, as they were incomprehensible to the disciples (and are remarked as such, Mt 16<sup>23</sup>, Lk 9<sup>45</sup>, Jn 13<sup>7</sup>) until after the Crucifixion had taken place.

4. It may be added that Christ warned His disciples in all ages to expect trials comparable in some measure to His own (Mt 5<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>24</sup>, Jn 15<sup>18</sup>), accompanied in many cases by decline and apostasy (Mt 24<sup>12-14</sup>). Hence His marked endurance as a continual test of genuineness (Lk 8<sup>12</sup>) and an indispensable requisite for final salvation (Mt 24<sup>13</sup>). At the same time He declared a complementary truth, namely, the Divine preservation of His 'own sheep' (Jn 10<sup>28</sup>, 17<sup>12</sup> 18<sup>9</sup>, Mk 13<sup>28</sup>), a privilege commonly described as the 'perseverance of the elect.' However stated, the antithesis of these two truths is plain. The assurance in Jn 10<sup>28</sup> is largely parallel to that in Mt 16<sup>18</sup>, except that the latter, the indestructibility of the Church, is more clearly collective in form. There are 'branches' (so it appears, Jn 15<sup>2</sup>) even 'in Christ' that the Father takes away; moreover, the remarkable use of the imperative in 15<sup>2</sup> suggests an element of conditionality in the abiding or perseverance referred to. The practical inference is intended to lie in a direction quite the opposite of false security and presumption (Mt 7<sup>22</sup>, Lk 13<sup>28-29</sup>, 21<sup>28</sup>, 22<sup>28</sup>). Perseverance is undoubtedly the privilege of the elect, but there is no infallible sign of the elect except their perseverance' (Vaughan on Ph 1<sup>6</sup>).

ENEMIES (ἐχθροί).—1. Of public enemies: twice in the Benedictus, Lk 17<sup>74</sup>, where the word implies Gentile persecutors. In Lk 19<sup>48</sup> it is spoken of the Romans and their threatened siege of Jerusalem. In the quotation from Ps 110 which occurs in Mt 22<sup>44</sup>, Mk 12<sup>36</sup>, Lk 20<sup>42</sup>, He 1<sup>13</sup> 10<sup>13</sup>, the same word denotes all the world forces opposing Christ. 2. Of private enemies, in the correction of the old maxim enjoining hatred, 'Love your enemies,' Mt 5<sup>44</sup>, Lk 6<sup>27-28</sup>. 3. Of the devil and the powers of evil, in the parable of the Wheat and the Tares, Mt 13<sup>25-30</sup>. 4. Of the spiritual forces acting in opposition to Christ, of which the strongest is death;

1 Co 15<sup>28-29</sup>. 5. Of wicked persons hindering the spread of Christ's influence, the enemies of the cross, Ph 3<sup>2</sup>. The word used in NT for enemies is usually applied elsewhere to private or personal enemies, not to public foes. See, further, artt. FORGIVENESS, HATRED, LOVE.

ENERGY.—The Gr. ἐργασία (tr. 'working') is used only of supernatural spiritual working, and only in the Epistles; in Eph. and Col. of God, in Ph 3<sup>2</sup> of the exalted Christ, in 2 Th 2<sup>9</sup> of Satan. In Eph 1<sup>19</sup> we find in one sentence four terms expressive of power—ἐργασία, κράτος, ἰσχύς, and δύναμις. These Divine qualities were exercised in the resurrection and exaltation of Christ, and the Christian soldier is exhorted (Eph 6<sup>10</sup>) to obtain a portion of them in equipment for his spiritual warfare. Of these terms the chief is δύναμις, 'power,' of which the application is manifold. On three occasions (Lk 5<sup>17</sup> 6<sup>19</sup> 8<sup>46</sup> or Mk 5<sup>20</sup>) it is specially used of a healing power (AV 'virtue') that issued or was drawn from Jesus as from a storehouse of spiritual energy. See artt. FORCE, POWER, and VIRTUE.

1. 'Energy' in the physical sense means power or capacity of work. It includes the active and the potential side, force of motion and energy of position: two interchanging factors of which the sum total is constant. In its moral application there is a similar duality. The man of energy is not only an active agent, but also one in whom we recognize a reserve of power. This energy of character is partly physical, partly mental. It is altogether different from the purely physical quality of strength or might (κράτος, ἰσχύς), the virtue of the warrior or athlete. A physical basis is necessary, yet dauntless energy may be found in a feeble frame. The quality is essentially moral, because it involves the constant exercise of a powerful will. The fundamental requirement is unhindered mental force. Two modern statesmen may be instanced. One wrote in his diary the cardinal principles of his life—benevolence, self-sacrifice, purity, energy. Another expounds and exhibits the 'strenuous life.' The duty of work and the heroism of energy constitute a large part of the teaching of Carlyle. Such lessons and lives are illustrations of the spirit of Christianity. On the other hand, indolence and idleness are natural to many men and even to many nations. The habit of inactivity is fostered by mental indifference or the lack of any propelling emotion such as religion or patriotism. The duty and honour of work are Christian conceptions. In 2 Th 3<sup>11</sup> we have an early indication of a long struggle, in the course of which sloth was enthroned as one of the seven mortal sins. (Cf. Paget, Spirit of Discipline, pp. 1-50).

2. The life of our Lord Himself furnishes the supreme type of Christian energy. Energy is measured by the amount of work it can accomplish within a given time. The ministry of Jesus was limited to a very brief period, but into that little space there was crowded a work that has no parallel in the history of the world. Energy is also measured by the vastness and continuance of its effects, and after nineteen centuries the quickening influence of Jesus is operating on the world with undiminished power. Jesus was never idle. For Him every hour had its appointed task (Jn 2<sup>9</sup>), and every day was governed by a steady and strenuous purpose (Jn 3<sup>8</sup>). He was sometimes weary in His toils (Mt 3<sup>9</sup>, Jn 4<sup>6</sup>), yet was ever ready to meet fresh calls upon His time and strength, His pity or His help. The reason was that the springs of His energy never ran dry. It is right to say that the secret of Christ's energy lay in His Divinely unconquerable will, but it is none the less true that the strength of His spirit was fed by His love to man and His faith in God. His boundless love and compassion for human beings inspired Him to go about doing good. His perfect faith in God enabled Him to feel, as no other on earth has ever felt, that nothing was impossible (Mt 17<sup>20</sup>). But beneath all conscious faith and love there sprang up in the soul of Jesus a fountain of life and power through His abiding union with His Father. 'My Father worketh hitherto,' He once said, 'and I work' (Jn 5<sup>17</sup>). 'He went about doing good,' St. Peter declared, 'for God was with him' (Ac 10<sup>38</sup>).

3. The teaching of Jesus on this subject may be divided into two parts. (1) He enjoins many qualities that contribute to the life of strenuousness. Such are diligence (parables of Talents and Pounds, Mt 25, Lk 19), readiness (Lk 12<sup>35</sup>), use of opportunities (Jn 9<sup>4</sup>), watchfulness (Mk 13<sup>35</sup>), perseverance and importunity of prayer (Lk 11<sup>5</sup> 18<sup>1</sup>), constancy and continuance of service (Lk 12<sup>42</sup> 17<sup>10</sup>). Such precepts receive double force from the example of His life of unrelenting labour (Jn 5<sup>17</sup> 9<sup>4</sup>). In St. Paul the same lessons are illustrated and inculcated (1 Co 15<sup>10-20</sup>).—(2) Faith is set forth as the supreme source of active energy. Faith receives healing; it can also bestow healing. Before its presence both bodily and mental diseases disappear. Sayings of Jesus to this effect are remembered as maxims and metaphors. 'All things are possible to him that believeth' (Mk 9<sup>23</sup> 11<sup>23</sup>). By faith mountains disappear and trees may be uprooted (Mk 11<sup>23</sup>, Lk 17<sup>6</sup>). Such sayings passed into ordinary speech (1 Co 13<sup>2</sup>), and the life of achievement was regarded as illustrative of the power of faith (He 11). The fact that men of faith are the possessors of boundless energy is indeed writ large in the history of the world. But the living faith enjoined by Jesus and practised in the planting of Christianity procured an immediate possession of surprising power. Exorcists and magicians were abashed; and demonic possession, still a plague of the East, disappeared before the advancing standards of the new faith. This spiritual energy depended on immediate communication with God. The last words attributed to Christ are these: 'Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you' (Ac 1<sup>8</sup>).

ENOS.—An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3<sup>38</sup>.

ENROLMENT.—See CENSUS and QUIRINIUS.

ENTHUSIASM.—Enthusiasm means etymologically a Divinely inspired interest or zeal (Gr. ἐνθουσιάζω, to be inspired by a god, from ἐν 'in,' and θεός 'god'); and therefore affords an appropriate modern rendering for the phrase ἁγία ἄνεμος, 'Holy Spirit,' in the NT (Lk 1<sup>8</sup> 3<sup>2</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>, Ac 2<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>31</sup> 6<sup>3</sup> 7<sup>55</sup> 9<sup>17</sup> 11<sup>24</sup> 13<sup>9</sup>; see Bartlett's Acts, p. 386). The author of Eccle Homo has called attention to the enthusiasm Jesus required of, and inspired in, His disciples (pp. 141, 152, 154, fifth edition). His own life was marked by enthusiasm, intense and exalted emotions in regard to His vocation. As a youth He was enthusiastic for His Father's house (Lk 2<sup>20</sup>); at the Baptism He devoted Himself to His calling (Mt 3<sup>9</sup>), and was conscious of receiving the Spirit (3<sup>8</sup>), the spirit of zeal and power. His first enthusiasm to use the new energy afforded the occasion for the temptation in the wilderness (Mk 1<sup>13</sup> 'straightway the Spirit driveth him forth'). In His call to His disciples, His teaching and healing, His journeyings from place to place in the early Galilean ministry (Mk 1<sup>9</sup> 2<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>), this mood of enthusiasm is dominant (Lk 4<sup>1</sup>). The same impression is conveyed in St. John's record: His answer to His mother in Cana, the casting out of the traders from the temple, the challenge to the priests, the confession of His Messiahship to the woman of Samaria, the forgetfulness of the needs of the body in His absorption in His work (24. 17. 19. 42<sup>a</sup>. 22. 24<sup>a</sup>), have all the same characteristic of an intense, exalted emotion. His mood was mistaken for madness by His relatives (Mk 3<sup>21</sup>), and His answer regarding His spiritual relationships would not remove their doubt (3<sup>24</sup>. 32<sup>a</sup>). His demands on His disciples to abandon all, and to cleave to Him (Lk 9<sup>60</sup>. 62. 14<sup>26</sup>), and the Beatitudes He pronounced on the spiritually aspiring, and on the persecuted (Mt 5<sup>2</sup>. 12<sup>a</sup>), spring from the same inward source. He was deeply moved by any evidence of faith which He met with (Mt 8<sup>10</sup>. 13<sup>24</sup>. Lk 10<sup>41</sup>. Mt 16<sup>7</sup>. Jn 12<sup>29</sup>. Lk 23<sup>45</sup>). He even intensely desired to fulfil His vocation in His death (Lk 12<sup>50</sup>). The Baptist contrasted his own baptism with water and the Messiah's baptism with the Holy Spirit and fire (Mt 3<sup>11</sup>). His words have been thus interpreted: 'He baptizes with water, in the running stream of Jordan, to emblem the only way of escape, amendment. Messiah will baptize with wind and fire, sweeping away and consuming the impenitent, leaving behind only the righteous' (Bruce, 'St. Matthew' in Expositor's Gr. Test. p. 84). When Jesus presented the same contrast in His demand to Nicodemus (Jn 3<sup>3</sup>), it is not probable that He referred to judgement, but to the inspiration which He brought to men in His ministry, the enthusiasm for God and His kingdom which He imparted. We have abundant evidence that He so inspired men in Galilee by His healing, teaching, forgiveness of sins, companionship (Mk 1<sup>27</sup>. 27. 212. 14<sup>a</sup>), and attracted many (Mk 3<sup>7</sup>. 6<sup>30-32</sup>). The people believed Him to be John the Baptist, Elijah, or one of the prophets (Mk 8<sup>28</sup>. Mt 16<sup>14</sup>). That this mood was temporary Jesus recognized in the parable of the Sower (Mk 4<sup>5</sup>. 6<sup>a</sup>). The flame blazed up again for a moment among the Galilean pilgrims at the triumphal entry (Mk 11<sup>8</sup>. 10<sup>a</sup>). The early ministry in Judaea and in Samaria, as recorded by John, made the same impression (Jn 2<sup>25</sup>. 3<sup>25</sup>. 4<sup>20-24</sup>). After His Resurrection and Ascension the Christian Church received at Pentecost the permanent and communicable gift of holy enthusiasm (ἁγία ἀγία, as explained above).*

It is a difficult problem whether in His early ministry Jesus was not led by His enthusiasm to show less reserve in the expression of His claims and less restraint in the exercise of His powers than was His practice afterwards, when He had learned from experience the peril this course involved of a premature close of His ministry. The solution of the problem depends on the answer given to the wider question, whether such a change of method, due to the teaching of experience, would be compatible with His unerring moral insight and

* In this view of the meaning of Christian enthusiasm, as a power which finds its true source in the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, we get an interesting glimpse into both the history of language and the philosophy of this history, from the disrepute which attached to the word 'enthusiasm' during the age of Rationalism and Deism. Those were days when leaders in the Church set themselves to 'put down enthusiasm, and Christian apologists were anxious to prove that neither Jesus Christ nor His Apostles were 'enthusiasts'. Hartley defines enthusiasm as 'a mistaken persuasion in any person that he is a peculiar favourite with God; and that he receives supernatural marks thereof' (Observations on Man, i. 490), a definition which entirely corresponds to the contemporary ideas on the subject (see J. E. Carpenter, James Martineau, p. 92). In the 18th cent. enthusiasm was a synonym for fanaticism; an enthusiast was simply a fanatic. And the constant application of the terms to the Evangelical Revival and its leaders shows that this debasing of their value was due to the spiritual deadness of the critics rather than to the extravagances of the enthusiasts. Similarly, the Jewish leaders said of Jesus, 'He hath a devil, and is mad' (Jn 10<sup>20</sup>); Festus said to Paul, 'Thou art beside thyself' (Ac 26<sup>24</sup>); and some of the people of Jerusalem, when they witnessed the charismatic gifts bestowed upon Christ's followers on the Day of Pentecost, exclaimed, 'These men are full of new wine' (Ac 2<sup>13</sup>).

sinless moral character, and the Divine guidance He constantly sought and found in the fulfilment of His vocation. If not, we cannot assume any such change. The question is discussed in The Expositor, 6th series, vol. vi. 'The Early Self-Denouement'.

ALFRED E. GARVIE.

ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM.—This was one of the acted parables of Jesus, in which some immortal lesson is concealed. The washing of the feet, the entry, and the cleansing of the Temple, stand together as dramatic representations of the principles and ideas of the Kingdom of God; of the humility and self-denial required in the life of the Christian; of the mixture of condescension and majesty in the manner of the King's coming; and of the peace He gives and of the judgment that follows in His steps.

Of the Synoptic accounts Mk. seems the original. Mt. describes the entry in keeping with his representation of Jesus as the Malkā Meshīhā of the Jews, and in consonance with the prophecy of Zec 9<sup>9</sup>. The RV rendering of 21<sup>a</sup> τοῦτο δὲ λέγει, 'Now this is come to pass, seems to put the reference to the fulfilment of that prophecy into the mouth of Jesus. But the inference from Jn 19<sup>28-30</sup> is that the prophecy is an afterthought of the disciples, in the light of the Ascension; and the ten texts of 'fulfilment' in Mt. are always comments of the writer. Mt. seems to represent Jesus as riding on the she-ass and the colt (ἑνάς ἀσίνων). In Zec 9<sup>9</sup> the Heb. as Rosenmüller points out, is exegetical not copulative, and as 'ass' ('שׁוֹר') is male, the proper rendering is 'sitting on an ass, even a colt, the foal of she-asses.' There is thus only one ass in Zechariah. The apparent duplication is due to Hebrew parallelismus. Mt. is accused of embroidering the historical statement by adding a second ass in order to show the exact literal fulfilment of prophecy (Kinsopp Lake, at Liverpool Church Congress). Robertson's attempt (Christianity and Mythology, p. 368) to explain the two asses mythologically as signifying that the 'Sun-god is at his highest pitch of glory and is coming to his doom,' is not to be taken seriously. Mt.'s penchant for 'doubles' being well known (cf. 8<sup>28</sup>. 9<sup>20</sup>. 20<sup>30-34</sup>), the passage must not be pressed. Bengel's comment is 'pullo vectus est, asina item usus, pulli comite.' Farrar suggested rendering ἑνάς ἀσίνων = 'one of them'; cf. Ac 23<sup>24</sup>. Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 32) speaks only of a colt, but, connecting the incident with Gn 49<sup>11</sup>, describes it as 'tied to a vine.'

The prophecy Mt 21<sup>a</sup>, a compound of Is 62<sup>11</sup> and Zec 9<sup>9</sup>, is taken partly from Heb., partly from LXX. LXX suppresses שׁוֹר, which is recovered from Hebrew. Mt. suppresses ἑνάς καὶ ἄσινον [שׁוֹר] Niph. ptc. salvatus not salvator, trans. active, through influence of שׁוֹר ('thy salvation') Is 62<sup>11</sup>, emphasizing שׁוֹר, 'meek' (שׁוֹר).

In Mt. there is a description of the commotion (ἐρέσθη) in the whole city; the question, 'Who is this?'; the answer, 'This is the prophet Jesus, he who is from Nazareth of Galilee'; and the greeting, 'Hosanna to the Son of David.' Mk 11<sup>8-10</sup> adds some vivid details. The colt, never before used (so Lk.), was tied 'at the door without in the open street' (πρὸ τοῦ ἀφώδου [not 'where two ways met,' bivium, Vulg.], Just. Mart. ἐν τῶν εἰσόδων κώμης [l.c.]; ἀφώδου, cf. βόμα [Hesych.]). The woven branches (στρογγύλες) cut from the gardens (ἀγροί, g.l. for δένδρον) are different from the ελάδοι (olive branches in classical Greek) cut from the trees, in Mt 21<sup>8</sup>. The cry of the people is 'Hosanna; Blessed in the name of the Lord (acc. to Hebrew accents and idiom, e.g. Dt 21<sup>9</sup>), Blessed be the Kingdom that cometh, even that of our father David.' Mt. treats the visit as one of inspection. Jesus retires, 'having looked round on all things, for the hour was late,' whereas Mt. and Lk. give it as prelude to the cleansing of the Temple. Lk 19<sup>23-25</sup> gives additional touches. They placed Jesus on the colt ἐπιβίβασαν (ἐπεβάσαν of Mt 21<sup>7</sup> being doubtful); the exact place of the exhibition of popular enthusiasm is given, 'even now at the descent of the Mt. of Olives' (ἵδῃ πρὸς τῇ καρρὰβάρει), from which, Dean Stanley states, the first view is caught of the south-eastern corner of the city as the road from Bethany begins to descend. The lament over the city, the resort to the Pharisees' objection, 'If these should hold their peace, etc., are peculiar to Luke. The song is, 'Peace in heaven and glory in the highest, a seeming adaptation of the 'Hosanna,' etc., to suit Greek taste, perhaps through the influence of the angels' song (Lk 2<sup>14</sup>).

In 12<sup>12-13</sup> describes the scene from the standpoint of the people in the city who went out to meet Him (εἰς ὑπάντησιν); the blending of the two streams of people, the οἱ προάγουσες, 'those going before' of the Synoptics being those who had gone out to meet Him and had turned back when they met Him at the head of the procession, and thus preceded Him to the city; the testimony of the people who were with Him to the new-comers that (reading εἰ for εἶρε) He had summoned Lazarus from the tomb; and the fact that the people from the city took branches of palm trees (τὰ βλάτα τῶν φοινίκων [from class, βλά, 'palm-branch,' not from βλάς, 'small'; note the three different words for 'branch,' ἀλάτος, σριβάς, and βλάω]. The prophecy is given in a shorter form. Jesus is hailed 'King of Israel,' and the Pharisees comment on their own powerlessness and His popularity (v. 19).

This entry was connected with Jesus' consciousness of His Messianic mission, gradually developing as His work assumed definite direction and His doctrine definite form; was conceived after the prophecies of the OT, and planned in order to satisfy the expectations of many who were waiting for the coming of the Kingdom of God, 'the consolation of Israel,' 'the redemption of Jerusalem' (Lk 2<sup>38, 39</sup>). After the feeding of the 5000 (Jn 6<sup>14</sup>) the multitude recognized Jesus as the prophet that should come into the world, and would have seized Him and made Him a king, but He defeated their purpose; for He could not allow an emotional pennisantry, ever ready to flock to the standard of a deliverer, to identify His Kingdom with this world, or His cause with that of a Judas of Galilee. Here He devises the entry on the lines of Jewish prophecy, which, though free from any hostile intention, was equivalent to a declaration that He was the Messiah, and implied that He was more. It was not directly urged against Him at His trial; but it supplied Pilate with his question, 'Art thou the King of the Jews?' and, accordingly, with the legal basis for his sentence. This and the cleansing were His two first and last actions as Messiah. They were followed by the Cross.

We may infer in some measure from the song, the prophecy quoted, and His mode of entry, how far Jesus fulfilled and how far He transcended the Messianic expectations of His day.

1. The Kingdom of our father David.—The Kingdom of God or of heaven in the sense of the rule or Herrechaft of God, 'the power of God in its present or future manifestation,' the spiritual sway and 'sovereignty of God' (Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 94), not in the sense of Home Rule for the Jews, had always been the text of Jesus' public addresses (Mt 4<sup>7</sup>). Shortly before this the Pharisees had asked when the Kingdom of God should come (Lk 17<sup>20</sup>). And His answer was in keeping with His object of purifying the Messianic ideas and exalting the Messianic ideal of His age. It was the Kingdom of His Father (Mt 23<sup>31</sup>) and of the Father of the righteous (Mt 13<sup>32</sup>) that He proclaimed; it was the kingdom of their father David of which the people thought. And His question, 'What think ye of Christ?' (Mt 22<sup>42</sup>), shows that He did not consider Davidic origin sufficient status in itself for the Messiah. 'The kingdom of our father David' recalls the grand ideal of the theocratic ruler, the representative of J', the ideal son to whose descendants that throne was ensured (2 S 7<sup>12</sup>), upon which the prophets of the OT continued to build their hopes—hopes which had become greatly modified and materialized during the struggle with Antiochus and Rome, and by contact with Grecian thought, and which made the ordinary Jew dream of a deliverer with all the heroic qualities of a Judas Maccabeus, and the more philosophic think of an earthly empire, cosmopolitan and world-ruling like the Roman. It was the idea in the prophets, chiefly in Dn 7<sup>13, 14, 17</sup>, of a kingdom, holy, supernatural, universal and eternal, that Jesus sought to recover from the lumber-room of tradition; and in this He was assisted by the gradual revival of more spiritual Messianic hopes among thoughtful and devout Jews like Simeon and Anna (cf. also the angelic prediction of Lk 1<sup>32</sup> 'And the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David'). The Gospels give an account of the general Messianic expectations. The Messiah was not to come from Galilee but from Bethlehem (Mt 2<sup>6</sup>), was king of the Jews (v. 2), was to perform miracles (Jn 7<sup>31</sup>), to be a prophet (4<sup>21</sup>), to appear mysteriously (7<sup>27</sup>), to be a descendant of David (Mt 9<sup>12</sup>), and to restore again the kingdom to Israel (Ac 1<sup>6</sup>).

2. The address 'Son of David.'—The Messiah is first designated υἱὸς Δαβὶδ in Pa-Sol 17<sup>22</sup>—a title founded on Scripture expressions such as 'son' (Is 9<sup>1</sup>), 'seed' (Targ. 2 S 7<sup>12</sup>), 'branch' (Jer 23<sup>5</sup> and Zec 6<sup>12</sup>, where the Aram. paraphrase for 'branch' is 'Messiah'). The Davidic descent of Jesus, never refuted by His opponents, was accepted by St. Paul (Ro 1<sup>3</sup>). But Jesus based His authority on something higher than this (Mt 22<sup>42</sup>).

3. The song 'Hosanna . . . highest' (cf. Ps 118<sup>25, 26</sup>, the festal cry amidst which the altar of burnt-offering was solemnly compassed on the first six days of the Feast of Tabernacles, and on the last day seven times).—'Hosanna,' which may be a contraction for ἱδοὺ ἡμῶν (ἰδοὺ ἡμῶν, LXX), or shorter Hiph. imper. with enclitic, ἡρῆψῃ, is evidently a salutation = 'greeting to (cf. Lat. Io triumpho) the Son of David,' not supplication as in Ps.; cf. Didache, x. 6, ὡσαννά τῷ θεῷ Δαβὶδ ('hail'). ὡσαννά ἐπὶ κλάδοις φοινίκων (Mt.) = ἰδοὺ ἐπὶ φοινίκων (Lk.). In Pa 7<sup>24</sup> 11<sup>10</sup> the Heb. ἡ (=dat.) is found after Hiph. of ἡρῆψῃ; but the fact that the branches at the Feast of Tabernacles were called 'hosannas' and Mt.'s remarkable omission from Zec 9<sup>9</sup> of ἡρῆψῃ (σάτωρ, LXX), which would have thrown a new light on this cry, seem to denude the expression of any special significance. See HOSANNA.

Dalman suggests that the original cry of the people was 'Hosanna, Blessed in the name of J' be he that cometh' (op. cit. p. 222). It is also to be remembered that in the OT, J' Himself is generally represented as Saviour, while the Messiah was the prince of the redeemed people; the idea that the Messiah was the Redeemer being more recent. An interesting connexion between Pa 11<sup>10</sup> 'Bind the sacrifices with cords or woven branches' (συνδύμει-συνδύμει, Mk 11<sup>5</sup>) and the entry of Jesus is brought out in Symm. εὐδὲς ἐπὶ κλάδοις φοινίκων.

It is possible to make too much of the ceremonies of the Feast of Tabernacles in connexion with this entry, which took place just before the Feast of Passover in spring. But it is equally possible that the song, etc., may have been due to reminiscences of the preceding Feast of Tabernacles, when Jesus was pronounced the prophet and the Messiah (Jn 7<sup>41</sup>), and that the whole passage was sung, that which used to be application now passing into greeting. Our conclusion is, then, that though the song 'Hosanna,' etc., was used in salutation, it contains an allusion to the preceding Feast of Tabernacles, expresses the convictions of many of the people, and offers a remarkable parallel to Ps 118<sup>25-27</sup>.

4. The mode of entry.—Some of the same Galilean folk who wished to make Jesus a king before the time of Jn 6<sup>15</sup> have now, in their progress to the city, gathered around Him and escort Him, their national Prophet, with song. Others come from the city to meet Him, and receive Him with acts of homage which show that they regarded Him at the time as the prospective deliverer of the nation. In 2 Mac 10<sup>6</sup> Judas Maccabæus is welcomed with similar acclamations and 'branches and fair boughs and palms,' and in 1 Mac 13<sup>3</sup> Simon. In 2 K 9<sup>3</sup> the followers of Jehu, the newly proclaimed king, threw down their cloaks (μάτια, as here) before him. Stanley also (SP 191) mentions that in recent times the people of Bethlehem cast their cloaks before the horse of the consul of Damascus. Delisle agrees with Wellhausen that the procession did not acquire its Messianic colour until a later period, and that few at the time thought of the prophecy in Zec. (op. cit. p. 222). In the light of after events, Jesus entered the city as Messianic king, priest, and prophet. (1) The 'prince' had to provide the sacrifices 'to make reconciliation for us to God' for [the] house of Israel' (Ezk 45<sup>3</sup>, cf. 46<sup>4-6</sup> and 2 Ch 30<sup>24</sup>). So does 'the Lord's Anointed' here. (2) The priest presents the offering. So does 'the priest after the order of Melchizedek' (Ps 110<sup>4</sup>) proceed, metaphorically speaking, to 'bind the sacrifice with cords unto the horns of the altar' (118<sup>7</sup>). The harmony between the two offices of the Messiah as king and priest is well described in Zec 6<sup>13</sup> and the counsel of peace shall be between the two' (so Rosenm.). The growing predominance of the priestly office of the Messiah is also expressed in the choice of the colt 'whereon never man sat' (Mk. and Lk.), cf. Nu 19<sup>3</sup> 'a red heifer . . . upon which never came yoke.' (3) The prophetic character of the Messiah as the 'messenger of the covenant' (Mal 3), coming to His temple, J<sup>'s</sup> prophet to the world and a light to the Gentiles (Is 49<sup>6</sup>), was suitably expressed by the proclamation of the people, 'This is Jesus the prophet,' etc., and by their testimony to His miracles, generally connected with a prophet. (4) There was another ideal of the OT realized in Jesus on this occasion. The meek and afflicted [y]saint of Ps 22<sup>2</sup>, the Psalm appropriated by Jesus on the cross, was represented by Him who wept over the city and entered it 'meek [y] Zec 9<sup>9</sup> = παῖς, Mt 21<sup>5</sup>; also in Mt 5<sup>4</sup> = Ps 37<sup>11</sup>, and sitting upon an ass. Other significations of this Heb. ad], such as 'poor,' 'oppressed,' and 'persecuted' (in Isaiah), were also realized in Jesus. But it is His meekness that Mt. emphasizes, doubtless because of His riding on an ass. At one time the ass was not a despised animal. Judges rode on white asses (Jg 5<sup>10</sup>). But through contact with Gentiles the ass had fallen into contempt. For δὸς Josephus substitutes αἴβης and ἄρος. LXX in Zec 9<sup>9</sup> preferred τροχίον and ἄρος to the despised word. It was however, the tradition that the Messiah should come riding on an ass (Sepp, § vi. c. 6). (5) The conception of Messiah as the suffering Servant of Deut.-Isaiah was, however, most of all exemplified by Him who on this occasion humbled Himself [y] (Niph. of נָּו in reflexive sense) Is 53<sup>7</sup> = ἐταπεινωσάτω ἑαυτὸν, Ph 2<sup>8</sup> in a voluntary manner in His progress to a death for His people.

Matthew describes Jesus as armed with authority (ἐξουσία, cf. 8<sup>9</sup>), and on this occasion depicts Him as the ἡγῶν Μεσσίας of the Jews, His authority is over all flesh, to make them feel their want of God and Him. The sense of power was derived from the sense of His mission and the consciousness that He was the Son of God, which made Him soar beyond the Messianic rôle and see Himself the Lord of the whole earth, holding sway by peace, spiritual peace, and by power, spiritual power. He claimed for Himself, as Dalman remarks (op. cit. p. 313), 'an exalted position such as had not been assigned even to the Messiah,' and, as Harnack (What is Christianity? p. 141) observes, 'He leaves the idea of the Messiah far behind Him, because He filled it with a content that burst it.' It was in the same spirit that He affirmed His Kingship before Pilate (Mt 27<sup>11</sup>).

The object of this entry was the inauguration of Jesus' last mission to His people. The attraction of the provincial crowds, the Jerusalem populace, the Greeks and proselytes, if not the impressing of the Jewish hierarchy, this was the end desired, and in a great measure attained. He never seems to move in solitary state in the Temple; crowds are always around Him; He is the topic of the people's conversation and the subject of the priests' conspiracy. This was a suitable prelude to a great missionary enterprise all too brief, but crowded perhaps with more real work and witness for the King and His Kingdom than the preceding portion of His ministry. It led to the cleansing of the Temple on the same or the following day, and these together culminated in the Cross.

ENVY.—The word φθόνος occurs in the Gospels only in the two parallel passages Mt 27<sup>18</sup> and Mk 15<sup>10</sup> in connexion with the trial of Jesus. When the members of the Jewish hierarchy sought the death of Jesus at the hands of Pilate, they attempted to veil their motives under the pretence of loyalty to Caesar. Pilate was too astute a man to credit these professions for a single instant. He perceived (εἶδεν, Mk 15<sup>10</sup>) the underlying feeling to be envy. If the word ᾔδει ('he knew,' Mt 27<sup>18</sup>) is significant, it supports the opinion that Pilate had previously become acquainted with the attitude of the chief priests toward Jesus. The message that Pilate later received from his wife (Mt 27<sup>19</sup>) somewhat favours this opinion. In fact it was the business of Pilate to know of the person of Jesus and His relations to the leaders of the Jews, and nothing but the contemptuous indifference of a Gallio would have hindered him from the inquiries necessary for gaining this knowledge.

Perhaps it might seem at first as though the feeling prompted the priests might more properly be termed jealousy. A comparison of the two feelings, jealousy and envy, readily shows the distinctive character of each: Jealousy is the malign feeling which is often had toward a rival, or possible rival, for the possession of that which we greatly desire, as in love or ambition. Envy is a similar feeling toward one, whether rival or not, who already possesses that which we greatly desire. Jealousy is enmity prompted by fear; envy is enmity prompted by covetousness' (Century Dictionary, s.v. 'Envy'). 'Envy is only a malignant, selfish hunger, casting its evil eye on the elevation or supposed happiness of others' (Bunuel, ib.). In Trench, Synonyms of the New Testament, xxvi, the comparison is less happily stated. Apparently jealousy (ζῆλος) may assume two shapes; either that of a desire to make war upon the good which it beholds in another, and thus to trouble that good, and make it less; or, where it has not vigour and energy enough to attempt the making of it less, there may be at least the wishing of it less. And here is the point of contact which ζῆλος has with φθόνος: thus Plato, Menex. 242 A, ἠγῶν μὲν ζῆλος, ἀπὸ ζῆλου δὲ φθόνος; the latter being essentially passive, the former is active and energetic.' This citation from Plato shows that there may be a genetic relation between jealousy and envy, but it does not show that envy is passive. Trench quotes from Aristotle, Rhetoric, ii. 11, omitting δὲ δὲ τὸν φθόνον [παρρησιαστικὸν] μὴ ἔχει διὰ τὸν φθόνον [τὸν ἐφθαλά: 'One that is moved by envy contrives that his neighbour shall not have the good that he has or seems to have.' A careful examination of the use of phos in classic Greek authors justifies this statement of Aristotle, and reveals that it means the same active malignant feeling as is expressed in modern English by the word 'envy'. It was phos which moved the gods to prevent men from attaining a great or uninterrupted experience of prosperity. Pindar, the tragic writers, and orators also are found using the word to designate the active impulse to destroy another's prosperity so far as one has the power to do it. The Septuagint, according to Hatch's Concordance, uses phos only in the Apocryphal books. The most noteworthy instance is in Wis 24<sup>1</sup> on account of the envy of the devil, death entered into the world.

Since envy is an ill-will or malice aroused by the success or good gifts of another, it is the fitting word to designate the motive of the priests who protested their loyalty to Caesar. Envy is not a primary emotion. Other feelings prepare the way for, and may enter into, it. It is the result of a development in the life of selfishness (Jul. Müller, Lehre von der Sünde, i. 233 f. [Eng. tr. Christian Doctrine of Sin, i. 171]). In the Gospels this development is not difficult to trace. The deeds and words of Jesus were from the outset attended by suspicion on the part of scribes and Pharisees. His growing popularity aroused their jealousy. When they could charge Him with a compact with Beelzebub (Mt 12<sup>24</sup>, Mk 3<sup>22</sup>, Lk 11<sup>15</sup>), they had begun to hate Him because of the popular confidence in Him, and especially because this confidence was of a degree and a quality which they never had received, and which they could not hope to receive. This occurrence was an attempt to discredit Him with the people, and it showed that envy had obtained full lodgment in their hearts. From that time onwards it had so large a share in their lives, that when they appeared before Pilate they were so mastered by this feeling to which they had given free rein for months, that they were unable to conceal it. EPHATHA.—An Aramaic word, found in the Greek text of Mk 7<sup>4</sup>. We there read that Jesus said to a man who was 'deaf and had an impediment in his speech, Ephphatha' (ἐφθαθά). The Evangelist appends a Greek translation of the word: ὁ ἑστὶν διαβολῆθρα, 'that is, Be opened.'

There are two Aram. words of which ephathá may be a transmutation: (1) ܐܦܬܐ; (2) ܐܦܬܐ. The former is a contraction of ܐܦܬܐܐ Imperative Ithpaal; and the latter is a contraction of ܐܦܬܐܐ Imperative Ithpaal of the verb ܐܦܬܐ 'to open'. In Greek MSS, 8th present ephathá, which is certainly Ithpaal, whereas ephathá may be Ithpaal. Jerome gives Ephphatha, and some Latin MSS give ephtha, ephtha, and even ephtha. Wellhausen in his Com. on Mk 7<sup>4</sup> prints ephtha, but apparently without MS authority.

The form ephathá, when compared with its Aram. equivalent ܐܦܬܐ, presents several interesting peculiarities bearing on the dialect spoken by our Lord. (1) We note the disappearance of the guttural ܐ. We know that in Galilee and Samaria the gutturals were much neglected, or even interchanged; and they are often ignored in transliterating Semitic words into Greek. Thus we find Marcus from ܡܪܩܘܨ; Beelzebub from ܒܝܠܘܨܝܒ; zabian from ܘܒܝܢ; Samar from ܫܡܪܘܢ (side by side with Samaritan, where the s does duty for ܫ). (2) We note the assimilation of ܦ to ܦ giving ephathá for ephathá or in Aram. ܐܦܬܐ for ܐܦܬܐ. This is quite in accordance with a rule in Palestinian Aramaic, that frequently, and especially with the labials ܦ, ܘ, and ܦ, the ܦ in the passive prefix ܦܐ is assimilated to the first radical (Dalman's Aramäische Grammatik, p. 203). (3) It is noteworthy that we have the repetition of the aspirate letter ܦ. According to Hebrew analogy, ܦܦ ought to give ephathá, inasmuch as the dagheesh always indicates the harder and not the aspirated form of the letter ܦ. We infer, therefore, that in the Semitic language, which lies behind our Greek text, there was a deviation from Hebrew rule as to the dagheesh. If Heb. had been the usual language of the Gospels, we could not have had such forms as Beelzebubian from ܒܝܠܘܨܝܒ and Beelzebub from ܒܝܠܘܨܝܒ. The aspirated forms ܦ and ܦ after a closed syllable would be intolerable. The dagheesh forte is also singularly treated in Marcus from ܡܪܩܘܨ and Zacchaeus from ܘܨܚܝܐ. (4) The appearance of ܦ in ephathá may possibly indicate that the dialect spoken by our Lord used the Syriac prefix ܦܐ with passive forms, and not ܦܐ ܐܬܐ, as is found in Palestinian Aramaic; in other words, used Ithpaal for Ithpaal.

As to what is the subject of the verb ἐφθαλάθρα, Be thou opened, there is room for difference of opinion. It may be the mouth, as in Lk 14<sup>16</sup> (so Weise, Morison), or the ear, as in Targ. on Is 50<sup>5</sup> (so Bruce, Swete); or it may be the deaf man himself who is addressed. One door of knowledge being shut, the man is conceived of as a bolted chamber: 'Jesus said to him, Be thou opened.'

EPHRAIM.—Jn 11<sup>4</sup> only. After the raising of Lazarus, Jesus departed, in consequence of the plots of the chief priests against Him, 'unto a country (RV 'into the country') near to the wilderness, into a city called Ephraim, and there continued with his disciples.'

There are scarcely any textual variations. TR spells Ephraim; Lachmann, Tischendorf, Westcott-Hort spell Ephraim; Stephanus, 1550, had on the margin the reading Ephraim, which is supported by VL and Latin witnesses, and the name Σαφραϊμ as to be supplied after ζώμας. This is the reading of D, Sapfrim in its Latin part, for which Chase (Synop. Lat. Text of Gospels, 108) and R. Harris (A Study of Codex Bezae, p. 184) suggested that zoma might be the Heb. ܘܘܢ 'the name'; but more probable is the identification with Sepphoris, which in Jos. Ant. xv. 41. 91 is spell Σαφραϊμ (v.l. Σαφραϊμ and other forms); so Jerome (v.l. 'Araha' in OS 17. 131): 'Dioscesarum, quo olim Sepphoris dicebatur.'

Eusebius in his Onomasticon says (ad Ephron, Jos. xv. 9): καὶ ἐστὶν νῦν κώμη Ἐφραϊμ μεγίστη περὶ τὰ ἄρτια Ἀβιάς ὡς ἀπὸ στυγίων κ; in the Latin rendering of Jerome: 'est et villa pergrandis Ephraim nomine contra septentrionem in vicinissimo ab Elia miliario' (ed. Klostermann, p. 86. 1, 90. 18). With this has been identified Afra [= ἄφρα Jos. xviii. 23]; 'in tribu Benjamin; et est hodie vicus Ephraim in quinto miliario Bethelis ad orientem respiciens' (p. 29. 4); the Greek text [28. 4: καὶ νῦν ἐστὶ κώμη Ἀφραϊμ ἀπὸ] is here defective; further, 1 Mac 11<sup>14</sup> = Jos. Ant. xiii. 127 [ed. Niese]: τοὺς ἄρτις νομῶν Ἀφραϊμα (v.l. Ἀφραϊμα) καὶ Ἀδὲα καὶ Παυαβὲν; finally, the notice of Josephus (BJ iv. 551), that Vespasian took Βῆθθρα τε (earlier reading Βαθθλ or Εφθθλ) καὶ Ἐφραϊμ πολύχρηνα. Since Robinson, the site has been sought at the modern et Tayyibeh, 4 miles N.E. from Bethel. Schürer (GJF 3. i. 233) quotes Robinson, ii. 332-338; Guérin, Judee, iii. 45-51; Buhl, GAP p. 177; Heidt, art. 'Ephrem' in Vigouroux's Dict. ii. 1885 ff.; cf., further, art. 'Ephraim' by J. H. Kennedy in Hastings' DB, and by T. K. Cheyne in Encyc. Biblica.*

Origen compares, for the retirement of Jesus, Mt 4<sup>12</sup> and then allegorizes: Ephraim, according to Gn 49<sup>11</sup>: 'εὐφραίνου; ἀνὰ τὸν ἑαυτοῦ αἵμα τὸν δόμο ἀπέμειν; ἕως τῆς ἁβύσσου ἰακωβου; ἢ Ἐφραϊμ τὸν ἀσπυροποιεῖν ἀσπυροποιεῖται, etc. (New Berlin edition, pp. 450, 451). About the site he says nothing. E. B. NESTLE.

EPILEPSY.—There is but one specific instance of this awful malady recorded for us in the Gospels.† This case is, however, common to all three Synoptists (cf. Mt 17<sup>15</sup>, Mk 9<sup>17</sup>, Lk 9<sup>39</sup>); and the three accounts, while not in verbal agreement, are sufficiently harmonious to leave no doubt in the mind of the reader as to the nature and malignancy of the disease.

* Schürer (GJF 3. ii. 163, n. 435) is certainly right in rejecting the identification of Sapfrim with Sepphoris (2 K 17<sup>34</sup>) put forward by Resch (TU x. 4, pp. 141, 204) and approved by Blass (Ev. sec. Joh. 1905, p. xi), and in finding in Sapfrim the name of the town Sepphoris, which covered a very large area. But it is not yet certain whether Codex D has preserved here a correct tradition. Lk 9<sup>39</sup> offers similar variations in the text (εἶπεν αὐτῷ λέγοντες, εἶπεν ἑμῶν, etc.). Ephraim might itself be derived from Sepphoris, the first letter being dropped after the ε of εἶπεν.

† Epileptic is substituted by RV for 'lunatick' of AV in Mt 4<sup>24</sup> 17<sup>15</sup> as tr. of εὐνοκέφαλος.

nant character of the disease. It is noteworthy that the writers all attribute it to the active agency of demons; and this is the more remarkable as St. Matthew, in another place, appears to differentiate between demon possession and epilepsy (Mt 4<sup>24</sup> δαιμονιζομένων καὶ σελήνιαζομένων). Not only do the Evangelists record their own and the popular belief in the connexion of evil spirits with epilepsy; they also lead us to believe that Jesus exercised His power on the presupposition of the truth of this contemporary idea (cf. Mt 17<sup>18</sup>, Mk 9<sup>25</sup>, Lk 9<sup>4</sup>).

It is well to remember in this connexion that medical thought at this time and, indeed, for a long period subsequent to this, was distinctly on the side of the Synoptists. Aretaeus (c. 70 A.D.) in writing of it (Opus. Med. Diagnost., 37) attempts to explain the reason why epilepsy was called 'the sacred illness' (ἡ ἀγία καὶ ἁγίαστος νόσος). The remedy, according to this writer, belonged not to human but to Divine agency. Hippocrates, on the other hand, writing some five centuries earlier, refuses to accept the belief that there was anything supernatural about this disease. In his opinion it is to be explained in the same way as any other disease to which people are liable (ἔσθι μὲν ἡ ἀσθένεια τῆς ἐπιληψίας ὅμοια τῆς λοιπῆς νοσημάτων, κ.τ.λ., Morb. Sac. 383 [see Hobart's The Medical Opinions of St. Luke, p. 20]). The important place held by the belief in the malevolent influence of demons and in the powers of the exorcist will be recognized if we turn, e.g., to Celsus, Apol., 22; Origen, c. Cels., vii. 334; Apost. Constit., viii. 26, amongst the written products of early Christian thought.

The word employed by St. Matthew in his description of the epileptic boy (σολημιάζων), as well as in his catalogue of ailments (4<sup>24</sup>), suggests that in the opinion of the ancients the moon had a preponderating influence in bringing on this disease (cf. Ps 121<sup>6</sup> for a reference to the baleful effect which the brilliant rays of the moon were supposed to exert, and which from the context seems to have been thought as deadly as sunstroke). This belief, too, descended far down into the Middle Ages; and, indeed, it can hardly be said to have altogether vanished from the popular mind, though it is probably now confined to the remoter quarters of human habitation.

A comparative study of the particular case described by each of the Synoptists reveals the fact that St. Mark gives a much more graphic and detailed account of the symptoms than either of the other two. According to this writer, the boy was deaf and dumb, he was liable to be seized with convulsions at any time or place (ὅπου ἔδει, v. 18), to fall violently to the ground, foaming at his mouth, gnashing with and grinding his teeth. Finally, he is said to be gradually wasting away as a result of the frequency of the seizures. He was, moreover, afflicted from his childhood with this awful malady, a by no means uncommon feature of such cases (see art. 'Medicine,' by A. Macalister, in Hastings' DB iii. 327<sup>b</sup>). St. Mark also gives a vivid account of a fit which seems to have been brought on by the presence of Jesus, or by the excitement consequent on his introduction to that presence (9<sup>20</sup>). No sooner did he come before Jesus than a seizure with terrible convulsions took place, and falling on the ground he rolled about (ἐκλυτρο does not seem to be adequately treated in EV) foaming.

Perhaps the most peculiar part of the Markan narrative is the account of the healing process. According to the Matthean and Lukan versions, the cure was not only perfect, it was instantaneous (Mt 17<sup>18</sup>—Lk 9<sup>42</sup>). St. Mark, on the other hand, says it was gradual and difficult of accomplishment. Jesus, adopting a tone of presumptuous authority (ὡς ἐπελάλησεν αὐτῷ, v. 20), addressed the spirit as a person, and was answered by the latter, who caused his victim to utter loud cries and to writhe with violent convulsions before he obeyed the command. Nor was the completion of the cure yet reached, for an unconsciousness supervened so profound (ὡς ἵνα οὐκ ἴσασθαι, κ.τ.λ., v. 22) as to deceive many of the bystanders into the belief that death had claimed the victim. It was not until Jesus took the boy by the hand to raise him from the ground that the miracle took its final shape, and the people were enabled to witness and to marvel at 'the majesty of God' (Lk 9<sup>42</sup>).

It is to be noted that this feature in the healing acts of Jesus does not stand alone in this place. It is revealed in another case also recorded by St. Mark. In a preceding section he tells of the healing by Jesus of a blind man at Bethsaida. The cure in this case, too, was effected gradually, and was completed only by the contact of His hands with the afflicted patient (see 8<sup>22-25</sup>).

That 'the scribes' seized the opportunity afforded by this case to carry on their controversy with Jesus and His disciples is implied in St. Mark, where the element of hostility is referred to (see v. 14 'and scribes disputing against them' [ἠρώδης αἰρούσθαι]). The method of healing adopted by Jesus was in striking contrast to that to which they were accustomed to lend themselves (cf. Shabbath 61 and Tosefta Shabbath, in loc., where we learn of the employment of charms, such as amulets and winged insects of a certain kind, in the cure of epileptics). With Jesus it is the assertion of personal superiority. His words carry with them the weight of indisputable authority. The command is that of One who claims the lordship over disease and death. At the same time directness and simplicity are the essential characteristics of His attitude and bearing. Nor did Jesus permit this contrast to pass unnoticed (see Mt 12<sup>24</sup>), where He refers to a practice recognized as legitimate by the religionists of His day.

Exorcism was practised in public by men who professed to wield authority over the demon world (cf. Ac 19<sup>13</sup>, which is the only place where the word 'exorcist' occurs in the NT). These exorcists seem to have relied upon the repetition of certain names to effect their purpose, among which the recitation of special incantations, of which Solomon particularly was considered to be the author (see Jos. Ant. viii. ii. 5; Schürer, HJP II. iii. 151-155, and also To 6-8 for the lengths to which belief in the efficacy of charms and incantations had made its way among the Jews). We must not forget, moreover, that the followers of Jesus framed their methods of healing the sick upon this contemporary model. The utterance of the name of Jesus found its place in their cures (Ac 3<sup>6</sup> 16<sup>18</sup>, Mk 9<sup>28</sup>, 29 16<sup>17</sup> etc., where ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ seems to be an essential part of the formula employed). EPIPHANY.—See CALENDAR, p. 261 f.

EQUALITY.—Equality in capability, responsibility, and future destiny is by no means taught by Christ in the Gospels. Christians are not reduced to one uniform level of worth and dignity, either here or hereafter. In the parables of the Talents and the Pounds the servants are not in a condition of equality during their period of probation or afterwards (Mt 25<sup>14-30</sup>, Lk 19<sup>11-27</sup>). The inequality of Dives and Lazarus here is an admitted fact, and their inequality beyond the grave is a sure consequence (Lk 16<sup>26</sup>). Christ repeatedly admits without deprecation the inequality observable among men. 'There are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last' (Lk 13<sup>30</sup>, cf. Mt 19<sup>30</sup>). There is, indeed, no suggestion whatever that a certain level of equality, tried even by internal criteria, is to be aimed at. Growth in grace follows the law of life, an increasing increment following upon each further increment (Lk 19<sup>26</sup>). 'He that is but little in the kingdom of heaven' is greater than John the Baptist (Mt 11<sup>11</sup>, Lk 7<sup>28</sup>). Pre-eminence is not at all directly discouraged or deprecated, only it must be the deepest and truest excellence, apart from the odiousness of comparison with others. The sons of Zebedee are too anxious for the position of pre-eminence hereafter, and too heedless of the call to self-sacrifice now (Mk 10<sup>37</sup>, Mt 20<sup>21</sup>). All disciples are in danger of desiring to be honoured by titles here, instead of awaiting God's bestowal of dignity in the new life beyond (Mt 23<sup>8-12</sup>). But, to be greatest in the Kingdom of heaven it is necessary to be as a little child here (Mt 18<sup>4</sup>, Lk 9<sup>48</sup>). Such lowly and meek Christians are called 'His children,' and the Lord identifies Himself with them (Mk 9<sup>27</sup>). The disciple must not lord it over his fellow-disciples wantonly and arrogantly (Mt 24<sup>48</sup> ff.). Not only superiority, but even equality, is forbidden as the goal of effort. Mutual service is to be the aim of the Christian community—the first is to be bond-servant of all (Mk 10<sup>44</sup>). This precept of service, instead of insistence upon equality (Lk 22<sup>26, 27</sup>), was beautifully and touchingly practised by the Master-Servant on the night of His betrayal (Jn 13<sup>14</sup>). Every man is to descend below the level of equality and leave it to God to call him higher if it be good in His sight (Lk 14<sup>10</sup>). Especially in respect of penitence for sin is it good to sink all considerations of comparative merit (Lk 18<sup>14</sup>). Except in the ideal sense, equality is neither an established fact nor a correct principle in the Christian Society. We are sons of one Father, and so brothers; but brothers are not equal, for some are older or wiser or richer or better. We are servants of one Master, and so fellows; but in this service there are various offices and diverse stations. Unity rather than equality is the leading characteristic of the internal economy of the Kingdom of heaven (Jn 10<sup>14</sup> 11<sup>24</sup> etc.).

ER.—An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3<sup>28</sup>.

ERROR.—As one who lived in the undimmed vision of holiness and truth, 'who saw life steadily and saw it whole,' Jesus must have felt with an intensity we cannot fathom how sin had distorted the reason of man as well as perverted his affections. All around Him He saw men walking 'in the vanity of their mind, being darkened in their understanding, alienated from the life of God because of the ignorance that is in them, because of the hardening of their heart' (Eph 4<sup>18</sup>). He saw, also, as no one else had ever seen, that the recovery of those who had become 'vain in their reasonings' (Ro 1<sup>21</sup>) was to be achieved less by attacking their godless errors than by aiming at the renewal of the moral and spiritual nature. This is the fundamental and vital point to emphasize. Underlying all Christ's dealings with error there was the recognition of the dependence of men's opinions and beliefs upon their character. We seldom realize how much we contribute to the judgments we form. We set out with the intention of being wholly governed by the object. We want to know what it really is, and not merely what it appears to be. So we approach it, examine it, and form our opinion of it. But the eye brings with it the power of seeing; what we see depends not merely upon the object, but upon the organ of vision. This is true especially with respect to all judgments of value, all questions of right and wrong, of duty and religion. The possibilities of error increase not merely with the complexity of the subject-matter, but with the way in which our interests and convictions, our desires and predilections, are bound up with it. In the region of the moral and spiritual life not only must the intellect be clear,—free from false theory,—but still more necessary is it that the heart be pure and the practice sound. To appreciate goodness a man must love goodness; must be, if not good, at any rate good in many ways. 'Every one,' said Jesus, 'that is of the truth heareth my voice' (Jn 18<sup>27</sup>). This does not, of course, mean that all moral and religious errors are due simply to a depraved heart. Violent upholders of orthodoxy have been only too ready to assume that such is the case, and to silence the heretic by declaring him a bad man. But it does mean that there is a moral aptitude for Christian discipleship. It was inevitable that men who had no enthusiasm for goodness should misunderstand Christ and reject Him. It was equally certain that His 'sheep' would hear His voice and follow Him.

There are a few striking illustrations of these principles in the Gospels which demand our attention.

1. The necessity for inward, moral clarity and simplicity is strongly insisted on by Jesus (Mt 6<sup>22, 23</sup>, Lk 11<sup>34-35</sup>). 'We so often talk as if we were only obliged to "follow our conscience"; as if no one could lay anything to our charge unless we were acting against the present voice of conscience. But this is very perilous error. We are also obliged to enlighten our conscience and keep it enlightened. It is as much liable to error as our un instructed intelligence, as much liable to failure as our sight' (Gore, The Sermons on the Mount, p. 146 f.). The thought is expressed in other forms equally suggestive. Thus the 'pure heart' is the condition of the vision of God (Mt 6<sup>8</sup>). It is the 'honest and good heart' which, having heard the word, keeps it (Lk 8<sup>23</sup>). Heavenly truth is hid from the wise and prudent, but revealed unto babes (Mt 11<sup>25</sup>). The disciples must be converted and become as little children (Mt 18<sup>2-5</sup>, Mk 10<sup>13</sup>).

2. Our Lord's method of dealing with the ignorant and erring is full of instruction. Take the case of the woman suffering from an issue of blood (Mt 9<sup>20-22</sup>, Mk 5<sup>25-26</sup>, Lk 8<sup>43-48</sup>). It would be hard to exaggerate the poor woman's ignorance. Her mind was full of erroneous thoughts of Jesus. At best she looks upon Him as a worker of magic. She thinks that she may be able to steal a blessing from Him in the crowd. But there was working, even in that darkness, the precious element of faith. She trusted Jesus as far as she understood Him, and that was enough for the Master. He knew that faith in Himself, even though it were only as a grain of mustard seed, would break through the incumbent weight of error and ignorance, and offer a free way for His grace: 'Daughter, be of good comfort; thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace.' Jesus adopted essentially the same method in dealing with persons like Zaccheus, Mary Magdalene, the woman of Samaria, and the 'publicans and sinners' generally. These victims and slaves of passion and ignorance were certainly not good. Their lives were stained by error and sin. The religious classes looked upon them as moral outcasts. And yet there were those among them open to conviction. Their wilful and passionate lives had not destroyed in them a strange yearning for better things. And when purity drew near to them, adorned with such Divine graciousness as it was in the Person of Jesus, they became responsive to it and yearned after it. That was faith, and Jesus saw in it a power which would work for the redemption of the whole nature. His one endeavour was to call it forth into fullest exercise. Erroneous thoughts of God and life, of duty and religion, would all slowly disappear under the influence of this new devotion to Himself. But, after all, those who responded to His invitations (Mt 11<sup>28-30</sup>) were never numerous. The great mass of the people was untouched and unenlightened. Sunk in stupid ignorance, vice, and worldliness, the masses, at the best, followed Him for a time in gaping wonder, thinking far more of 'the loaves and fishes' than of the new life and truth He placed before them. Hence the sad words with which Jesus upbraided 'the cities wherein most of his mighty works were done' (Mt 11<sup>20-24</sup>).

3. The Pharisees and the other religious leaders.—At first it seems a strange thing that these men, on the whole, fell into the appalling error of rejecting Jesus. 'The gospel did not place itself, directly and at the outset, in opposition to the errors of the Pharisees. . . . But the dividing gulf was none the less real, and would baffle every attempt to fathom or bridge it over' (Reuss, Christian Theology in the Apostolic Age, p. 227). A few reflexions on the lines of the previous remarks will make this clear. The whole life and thought of the typical Pharisee was a closed system. His religion was already fully organized. 'In the hands of the Pharisees, Judaism finally became petrified.' It was a body of rules and doctrines which laid the main stress on conduct and outward ceremonies,—a rigid mould without plasticity or capability of expansion. It could only react in antagonism towards one who offered a religion of the spirit, a worship of the Father in spirit and in truth. The Pharisee did not know what to make of a renovating and inspiring call which bade him begin afresh, and completely revise his life and religion in the light of a higher ideal. He was self-satisfied, and resented criticism as an intolerable impertinence. He was like one who says that he must follow his conscience, but who does not continually seek to enlighten his conscience by confronting it with higher aspects of truth. He had ears, but he heard not; eyes, yet he was blind. This was the most fatal kind of error, the most hopeless of all moral states; and it was inevitable that it should come into deadly collision with Jesus. 'While the Pharisaic spirit had changed religion into a narrow and barren formalism, the gospel carefully distinguished the form from the essence in things religious. Its estimate of man's true worth and the certainty of his hopes rested not upon the outward conduct of the life, but upon the inward direction of the heart and feelings' (Reuss, The Gospel and Judaism, vol. I, p. 227). The errors of the Pharisees and the bitter hostility to Jesus which they provoked may be studied in the following passages—they are a mere selection: Mt 6<sup>1-5</sup> 12<sup>1-5</sup> 23<sup>1-39</sup>, Mk 3<sup>1-6</sup>, Lk 6<sup>1-11</sup> 11<sup>27-34</sup> 18<sup>9-14</sup>, Jn 5<sup>30-47</sup> 7<sup>14-52</sup> 8<sup>12-58</sup> 9<sup>1-41</sup>.

4. The errors of the disciples.—It is not necessary to go into details here. In responding to His call the disciples of Jesus had placed themselves in training for the higher life. They had passed into a school where the scholar's ignorance and error would be dealt with patiently and wisely. They had much to learn, but the essential thing was that they were in communion with the Light of Life.

The design of this article is indicated particularly under the letter B in the above Table of Contents.

It is to set forth the main features of the teaching of our Lord regarding the Last Things. His doctrine is presumably discoverable from the Four Gospels, and is capable of being exhibited in a self-consistent form. Yet in view of the facts of the case and the present state of critical opinion, it will be necessary to keep certain distinctions steadily in mind.

We must distinguish between (I.) the Synoptic Gospels and (II.) the Gospel of John; and we must distinguish between (A.) current Jewish conceptions and (B.) the conceptions of Jesus. In proportion to our feeling of the real unity of our subject, it will be impossible to maintain these distinctions with rigidity; yet a total disregard of them is impossible to any one who would keep on terms with the criticism of the Gospels in our own day, or, what is more important, would appreciate in any just degree the holy originality of Jesus. The bearing, however, of what is called the Synoptic Problem upon any matter important to our purpose is so slight that we may safely ignore it, mentioning only that we assume as a good working hypothesis the prevailing critical theory, which gives precedence in point of time, and even, in certain aspects, of importance, to the Gospel of Mark.

I. ESCHATOLOGY IN THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS.—

A. CURRENT JEWISH ESCHATOLOGICAL CONCEPTIONS AS WITNESSED TO BY THE GOSPELS.—So far as these are concerned, it does not seem necessary to make any distinction between the Synoptics among themselves or between them and John. It may be generally postulated, moreover, that the fundamental conceptions are those of the OT, although it will be found that some of these have undergone modification since the time of the latest canonical books. Our principal witnesses are naturally the Synoptics. In them we have the most accurate reports accessible to us of the words actually used by Jesus; and where His sayings, as there recorded, employ the language of eschatology, apart from explanations which give it a turn peculiar to Himself, we may assume that the language in its natural implications represents current Jewish belief.

1. The coming Kingdom.—It is clear that Jesus addressed people who had a perfectly distinct, though not accurately defined, idea of an age or kingdom to come, which should follow on the consummation (συντέλεια, Mt 13<sup>39c</sup>) of the present age. He speaks, e.g., of rewards to the faithful

'in this time (καὶ νῦν)', and of eternal life in the 'world (αἰὼς) to come' (Mk 10<sup>28</sup>); and the phrase 'Kingdom of God,' which was constantly on His lips, while doubtless subjected to expositions which charged it with new meanings for His followers, yet rested on a view of things common to Him and to even irresponsible hearers. It meant the perfect form of the Theocracy of which all the prophets had spoken.

2. The Jewish supremacy.—It was generally believed that the Kingdom would come through an act of power, in which God would visit His people,—the Jews,—delivering them from all their enemies, so that they might serve Him without fear in holiness and righteousness for ever (Lk 1<sup>74</sup>). Men of the type of Simon, Zacharias, and Joseph of Arimathea waited for the consolation of Israel. Such persons doubtless believed with the prophets (e.g. Is 11<sup>15</sup> 9<sup>8</sup>, Zec 9<sup>9</sup>) that the supremacy of God's people would be maintained, if not actually accomplished, by methods of peace, and even in the spirit of brotherly alliance among the nations (see esp. Is 19<sup>24</sup>), who would receive the 'law' from Mount Zion (Is 2<sup>2-4</sup>). Yet obviously both they and the general populace, and even the disciples after the Resurrection (Ac 1<sup>6</sup>), thought of a state of things in which the position of God's ancient people would be central and supreme.

3. The Messiah.—Beyond the general belief that the Kingdom would come through an act or series of acts of Divine power, there is abundant evidence that in the time represented by the Gospels there was among the Jewish people, though not confined to them,* the definite expectation that the Kingdom would come through the advent of a personal Ruler—called by the Jews, the Messiah or, in Greek, the Christos;—the Anointed—on whom God would pour forth His Spirit in extraordinary measure. This belief, so far as the Jews were concerned, goes back to the testimony of the earlier prophets (esp. Isaiah and Micah), but its history within the OT period shows that it sometimes either disappeared altogether or retired into the background, its place being taken by such a view as that expressed in Jer 31<sup>31</sup>—of a reign of Jahweh Himself through His law written on the hearts of His people.† We need not here inquire into the causes of this fluctuation. It is enough to remark that for about a century before the time of Christ the belief that the Kingdom would be established through an individual world-wide Ruler, who would exercise practically Divine powers, had been current in larger or smaller circles among the Jews. Sufficient proof of this lies in the circumstance that in the time of our Lord passages in the Prophets (e.g. Deutero-Isaiah) or in the Apocalypse of Daniel, which had originally no reference to an individual Messiah,‡ had come to be so interpreted. The interpretation is current. No other is even thought of. In some cases, no doubt—as notably in the fulfillments of prophecy marked by the First Evangelist—it may be difficult to decide whether the exegesis of a passage cited from a prophet is not of purely Christian origin; but there are unquestionably some cases (notably Dn 7<sup>13</sup>) in which the importation of a reference to an individual Messiah into passages which really contain no such reference, is of pre-Christian date.

4. Various forms of the conception of the Messiah.—It is difficult to determine with any minuteness how the Messiah was conceived, as regarded either His Person or His work. In regard to the former, e.g., it would be unwarrantable to infer from Mt 1<sup>23</sup> (cf. Ia 7<sup>14</sup>) that it was generally believed that He would be born of a virgin, and perhaps equally so to infer from the fact that the disciples (16<sup>17</sup>), and perhaps others also (14<sup>7</sup>), expressed their belief in the Messiahship of Jesus by calling Him the Son of God, the prevalence of a belief among Jewish theologians of the 1st cent. that the Messiah was of one metaphysical being with Jahweh. The utmost perhaps which we can affirm is that it was largely believed that the origin of the Messiah would be mysterious (Dn 7<sup>7</sup>), and that this belief rested in all probability directly on the Messianic interpretation of Dn 7<sup>13</sup>.§ It seems possible, however, to distinguish two general types of belief regarding the Messiah and His work. The one may be called the Prophetic, the other the Apocalyptic type. The former type, which was the more popular and held its ground even with the scholars of the time (Mk 12<sup>35</sup>||), rested on the early Prophetic testimony that the Messiah would spring from the house of David,—a belief of whose persistence and of whose correspondence with the actual fact the circumstance that Jesus is confidently affirmed or assumed by five of the NT writers (Matthew, Luke, Paul, author of Hebrews, author of Apocalypse*) to have been of the seed of David may be considered the most striking proof. According to this type, so far as purely Jewish belief is concerned, the work of the Messiah, while superhuman, was conceived on comparatively secular lines. He would destroy his persistent enemies and establish a reign of lasting righteousness and peace over obedient and contented subjects. This type, taken by itself, hardly possesses for us eschatological interest. It belongs to a mode of conception in which the problems of death and immortality, if realized at all, cannot be solved. The sphere offered for solving them is too mundane. It is otherwise with the apocalyptic type of view, which rested mainly on the Book of Daniel, esp. Dn 7<sup>13</sup> and 12<sup>2</sup>. Whether or not the author of Daniel in the latter of these passages conceived of a resurrection from the dead available for all past generations of faithful Israelites, it seems certain that in the time of our Lord this sense was assigned to his words by those who, like the Pharisees, held the doctrine. According to Josephus,† the Pharisees held a fatalistic doctrine of the present life—but not of human conduct—which seems to have resembled that of the Stoics, and which made them for the most part averse to schemes of political revolution. Their participation, therefore, in the popular view of the 'Son of David' was more theoretical than real. Their tendency was to conceive the final Kingdom on strictly supernatural lines. It was a wonder that would not spring from earth, but would descend from heaven.‡ The Messiah was the Man of Daniel's vision, the Man of the Clouds.‡

Two points have recently been much in dispute: (a) Whether in view of the grammatical possibilities of Aramaic, as used in the time of Jesus, He could have applied to Himself the phrase 'Son of Man' or 'Man' as a title, basing on Dn 7<sup>13</sup>; and (b) Whether He could have done this so habitually as our Gospels represent. Even those who, like Lietzmann§ and Wellhausen,|| have reached on these points the most negative conclusions, do not doubt that in the latter part of His career, and perhaps habitually, Jesus held the apocalyptic view of the final Kingdom and of the glorious advent of the Messiah; and, even if we exclude the title 'Son of Man' from those passages in the Gospels which have no eschatological reference, there remains a sufficient number (about a third of the entire number, exclusive of John) where the eschatological reference is distinct. Thus, e.g., out of 22 instances of 'Son of Man' in Matthew's Gospel, 14 are apocalyptic.¶

It is indubitable that in the time of our Lord the Book of Daniel and other Apocalypses modelled on it were much read by a considerable portion of the Jewish people. Many of those whose views were influenced by this literature saw no inconsistency in combining with these views others derived from literature of the 'prophetic' type, e.g. The Psalter of Solomon,** embodying the ancient and still popular conception of the 'Son of David'. Yet, as this veneration for ancient prophecy was combined for the most part with political quiescence, it may perhaps be said that in the more reflective minds 'Son of David' and 'Son of Man' represented one heavenly ideal. Jesus Himself expressly repudiated the implications of 'Son of David' (Mk 12<sup>35</sup>||); but it is remarkable that this did not hinder the prevalence in Christian circles of the Apostolic age of the belief that He was of the seed of David according to the flesh, and the Evangelists Matthew and Luke risked publishing pedigrees, whose apparent mutual inconsistencies constitute the chief difficulty of the modern mind in accepting the fact they were designed to establish.

Instructive in this connexion is the phrase 'Kingdom of the heavens' in Matthew's Gospel. The phrase is, of course, equivalent in meaning to 'Kingdom of God' which the other Evangelists employ. It need not, however, be questioned that Jesus, occasionally at least, used 'Kingdom of the heavens,' and it seems certain that He did not invent the phrase. It was current, and it pointed to the apocalyptic construction of the Messianic hope. The Kingdom belonged to the heavens, and would come thence to earth. It was the unlikeness of Jesus to the altogether wonderful Personage of the apocalyptic Messiah that offended the Pharisees. If He were the Messiah, why should He refuse a sign from heaven? (Mt 16<sup>28</sup>).

8. The preliminaries of the coming Kingdom.—Assuming this leading idea of a Kingdom to come, heavenly in its origin and nature, we must now ask how the various matters preliminary to or accompanying its advent were conceived.

(a) Who were the heirs of the Kingdom? There were people 'just and devout' (Lk 2<sup>25</sup>) who 'waited for the consolation of Israel,' the still surviving type of Jahweh's 'poor ones' who 'cried unto him and he heard them' (Ps 34<sup>9</sup>). Such persons, however, did not advertise themselves, nor did they as a rule sit in the seat of the learned. The prevailing teachers were the scribes and Pharisees, whose yoke, practically intolerable, was yet theoretically imperative. It has been questioned how far readers of the Gospels get from them a fair impression of the moral and religious influence exercised by the teachers of the Law, and it has been contended, with perhaps some justice, that the impression so derived is as one-sided as the impression of the Roman Church one naturally gathers from histories of the Protestant Reformation. Still, the good type of scribe or Catholic is not due to the tendency against which the Evangelic text or the Reformation is a protest. It cannot be doubted that in the time of our Lord it was authoritatively taught by the Pharisees that the title to inheritance of the heavenly kingdom was a punctilious observance of the Law after the manner of their own practice. Their doctrine, indeed, on this point is not explicitly stated in the Gospels or in any contemporary documents. But the impression we gather from the situation depicted in the Gospels and from the record regarding the Apostle Paul favours the supposition that the view of the Pharisees in the time of Jesus is that represented by the Rabbinism of the 2nd cent., viz. that the Messiah would come when Jahweh's people, the Jews, were found generally and carefully observing the Law.* And the 'Law' meant not simply the legal precepts of the Pentateuch (in particular the Priestly Code), it meant the 'tradition' of the elders. While the average man inevitably shook off the punctilious of obedience, and the Pharisees themselves took refuge from their own rigour in an elaborate casuistry, we cannot doubt that the generally accepted view was that the passport to the Kingdom was 'the righteousness of the law.'

(b) The Resurrection. But generations of faithful Israelites passed, and the Messiah did not come. Would they miss the glory when it came? At least since the time of the Syrian persecution (B.C. 168-165)—the time of the Apocalypse of Daniel—it was taught that death formed no insuperable barrier to the inheritance of the Kingdom. Probably the author of Daniel (12<sup>2-3</sup>) had in view mainly (we cannot say exclusively) those Israelites who had sealed their fidelity to the law of Jahweh with their blood, but it may be taken for certain that, long before the time represented by the Gospels, all idea of the blessings of the Kingdom being restricted to members of the holy nation who had suffered death for their fidelity (if such an idea was ever entertained), had completely disappeared. It was taught that there would be a resurrection of the righteous (Lk 14<sup>14</sup>), i.e. of those who kept the 'Law' and the 'Tradition.'

(c) Hades, Gehenna, Paradise. There is nowhere in the Gospels an explicit statement of what was held regarding the state of the dead; but four times (Mt 11<sup>23</sup> 16<sup>18</sup>, Lk 10<sup>18</sup> 16<sup>26</sup>) the word Hades (Abyss) occurs. In the LXX this word is the almost invariable equivalent of hwt; and when Jesus used it without comment, it must be held to have conveyed to His hearers the associations proper to that word. The NT as well as the OT* is dominated by a view of things in which the modern idea that annihilation may be the fate of some men has no place. The dead are in a land of darkness and forgetfulness, cut from knowledge of affairs human and Divine. Still, in this condition—at most the pale reflexion of full-blooded life—they exist. Two things, however, must be observed: (i.) There is in the OT itself a marked, if not systematized, protest against the idea that permanent detention in Sheol or Hades can be the fate of the righteous, who had found their portion in the living God (see esp. Ps 16 and 73 and Job 14 and 19). Historically, doubtless, the experience of suffering under the various oppressors of the nation (Assyrian, Chaldean, Græco-Syrian) had much to do with the development of this protest; but it is probably a mistake to suppose that it was when they were actually suffering under the yoke of the world-powers that the people of Jahweh adopted from foreign sources much or anything that bore on the problem of what lay beyond death. This caution applies specially to the relation of Hebrew thought to the mythological ideas of Babylon or Egypt. The impregnation of the Hebrew spirit with ideas coming from these sources dates in all probability from a much earlier period than the 6th cent. B.C. All we can say for certain, perhaps, is that the experience of national humiliation quickened in a special degree the peculiar Hebrew genius, leading it at this time (say from the 6th cent. onwards) to place the peculiar stamp of the Jahweh faith on mythical ideas or pictures, which in some cases it had carried with it since the days of its infancy in Mesopotamia. (ii.) Although there is no hint in the OT itself of effect being given to moral distinctions between the wicked and the godly in Hades itself, yet the suggestion of a possible escape for the godly from the gloom of the underworld could not but arise, and ultimately decide, another question, viz. whether the distinction between the godly and the wicked was not observed from the moment of death. For perhaps about 100 years before Christ the idea of separate compartments in Hades, for the godly and the wicked respectively, had more or less prevailed (see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, esp. the part dealing with the Book of Enoch). Obviously our Lord could not have uttered the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>), or said to the penitent malefactor (23<sup>43</sup>), 'To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise,' had He not been addressing people accustomed to the idea that in the intermediate state, previous to the resurrection and the final judgment, moral distinctions were accorded a real, if incomplete, recognition. It is obvious

* The Jerusalem Talmud (Taan. 64a) remarks on Ex 16<sup>26</sup> that 'if Israel only kept one Sabbath according to the commandment, the Messiah would immediately come.' See Ebersheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, vol. II, p. 718.

* On this whole subject of the conception of Sheol, etc., cf. esp. A. B. Davidson, Theol. of the OT, p. 425 ff., T. & T. Clark, 1904 from the entire tenor of our Lord's references (see esp. the instructive passage Mt 5<sup>22</sup>) to Gehenna that He spoke to those to whom this term represented the utmost condemnation and punishment. It represented the fate of those who should still be enemies of Jahweh in that day when Jerusalem should be renewed by righteousness, and all flesh (i.e. all living) should go out and behold the carcases of those who had transgressed, for 'their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched' (Is 66<sup>24</sup>). See artt. GEHENNA and PARADISE.

(a) The Final Judgment. In our Christian minds, as with the NT writers, the idea of the Resurrection is inseparably associated with that of the Judgment which follows it. In the main track of OT thought, indeed, this association did not exist. The habit of conceiving the subject of the Divine favour or punishment rather as a nation than as a number of individuals, made it possible, or even natural, practically to ignore the individual side of the problem of life and death, and the distinction, natural to us, between this world and that which is to come is represented in the OT mainly by the distinction between this life with God and this life without Him. Under this view of things the prevailing conception of judgment in OT times is that of a manifestation of Jahweh's righteousness (whether it be through His 'messenger' [Mal 3] or through the Messianic 'Son of David' [Is 11<sup>1-9</sup>]), in which He effectually visits His people with His mercy, and breaks the arm of the unrighteous peoples, who forget God and oppress them. These heathen return to Sheol (Ps 9<sup>6</sup>); but the covenant of Jahweh with His faithful people is established for ever. The history seems to show that it was possible for pious Israelites to rest in this view, merging individual hopes in hopes for the nation, until the actual disaster of the Exile shook their faith in the permanence of the collective unit of the Jewish State. From this time, however, as we see clearly from the writings of Jeremiah and Ezekiel (cf. esp. Eek 18), the claims of the individual come into prominence. It was felt that in the righteousness of God one generation ought not to suffer for the sins of its predecessors. Each generation, even each unit of a generation, had its own rights. Yet, in fact, it seemed as though these rights were ignored. It is with the problem raised by this conflict between the prophetic conscience and the facts, that the apocalyptic literature from Daniel onwards is concerned. The solution obtained springs from the despair that lies on the border of hope. The mundane element in the old idea of a Prince of the house of David tends to disappear. The blessing, which could not spring from earth, was expected from heaven, and at the touch of the new power, coming thence, even the 'dust' of the earth (i.e. esp. dead Israelites who had kept the covenant) should awake (Is 26<sup>19</sup>). While, doubtless, the adumbrations of the conception of immortality which we find scattered throughout the OT had their origin in the sentiment that it must be well with the righteous for ever, this positive aspect of the matter was inseparable from a negative. The righteous could hardly be vindicated unless punishment fell on the rebels and transgressors. Hence even in Dn 12<sup>2</sup>, which cannot be said to teach a universal resurrection, among the 'many' who awake from the dust of the earth there are 'some' who arise to 'shame and everlasting contempt.' It was inevitable that these conceptions should be universalized. If, as even the former Prophets and Psalmists in their own fashion had taught, there was to be a universal judgment (i.e. a vengeance of Jahweh exercised upon all rebel Gentiles and upon the transgressors of the covenant in Israel), and if the collective unit of the nation was practically displaced by the individual, it is clear that the idea of universal judgment must have come to have for its counterpart the idea of universal resurrection. No doubt the conception was held vaguely, and was as little effective for practical consolation as it is to this day (cf. Martha's attitude, Jn 11<sup>24</sup>)—still it was there. When Jesus spoke of the 'resurrection of the dead,' or even of the Messianic 'Son of Man' as executing judgment, He was using language whose general implications were either entirely or (as in the case of 'Son of Man') at least partially understood by His hearers.

B. THE MAIN FEATURES OF OUR LORD'S ESCHATOLOGICAL TEACHING.—Turning now to the subject of our Lord's eschatological teaching, and looking to the present condition of critical opinion, we may make a distinction, which has in most respects only a theoretical value, between the eschatological views of the early Church as reflected in the Gospels and those held and taught by Jesus Himself. The Gospels are as a whole too entirely dominated by the spirit of truth as it was in Jesus to make it possible, without arbitrariness, to vindicate this distinction in detail. Yet the investigation in which we are engaged seems to reveal problems arising out of portions of even the Synoptic Gospels, in connexion with which it may be well to remember that the Master must not be measured even by His best reporters. The distinction may seem de priori to have even more warrant in reference to the Fourth Gospel, whose representation both of the Person and the words of Jesus stands in such obvious contrast to that of the Synoptics as to justify our dealing with it in a separate section. We may do this even though in the end we may find ourselves to agree with Haupt* that the Johannine presentation of the eschatology of Jesus supplies just the kind of supplement to that of the Synoptics which a critical study of the latter led us to think necessary. We therefore consider at present only the eschatology of Jesus as presented in the Synoptic Gospels.

1. His conception of the Kingdom of God.—Both John the Baptist and Jesus preached, saying, 'Repent: for the Kingdom of God (in Mt. most frequently 'the Kingdom of the heavens') is at hand.' There seems no reason to doubt that in general Jesus thought of the Kingdom just as John did. Modern writers on the Gospels, like Johannes Weiss† and Titius‡, warn us with considerable justice against reading our own philosophical thoughts into the simple realism of the Bible. The Kingdom of God meant the perfect rule of God over all things in earth and heaven for the benefit of His people. It was eternal, it was universal in the sense of embracing people of all nations, though, of course, only those in each nation who did righteousness; and it embraced not earth only, but also heaven, whence it should come, and to whose type, as regarded at least the character of its subjects, it should be conformed. It may be postulated perhaps, further, that the Kingdom was conceived by Jesus, in at least its external features, on the closest possible analogy to an earthly kingdom. In two important respects, however, it differed from the latter. (a) It was not promoted by the weapons of flesh and blood. It was a Kingdom where rank—even that of the King Himself—was determined by the measure of service. The spirit of service was the spirit of lowly love. (b) It was a Kingdom which, while coming ultimately from God and heaven, came through a Mediator, by whom it would be administered. Since His baptism Jesus had the witness within Himself that He was the Mediator. He was the Messianic King who was truly the 'Son of God' (Ps 2). To Him the whole trust of the Kingdom was given, even all power in heaven and earth. Barring the mystery revealed at His baptism, which concerned primarily Himself only, we must admit that such a view of things was inevitable to One who found the form and substance of His faith in the OT, and at the same time believed, in harmony with the earlier Prophets and the prevailing tendency of His own time, in a personal Messiah. We seem therefore warranted in assuming that such was the view of Jesus at the commencement of His ministry. The Kingdom was coming from heaven. He Himself was the Person appointed to establish it on earth. Beyond this, however, the witness of the OT and His own special experience previous to and at the time of His baptism would not necessarily carry Him. It is perhaps permissible to find in the story of the Temptation (Mt 4th, Lk 4th) the record of a period when, not without a struggle with the prince of this evil world, He renounced the idea that the Kingdom was to come immediately through some dramatic catastrophic exercise of the heavenly power with which He felt Himself to be charged. It is more to our purpose at present to note that while He renounced this catastrophic ideal (if we may call it so) to the extent of refusing to allow it to defect Him from obedience to the Divine word, He did not, according to the Synoptics, renounce it so far as His general view of the mode of the Kingdom's advent was concerned. To the last He spoke in apocalyptic fashion of the Son of Man coming on the clouds. The glorious Parousia would illuminate simultaneously all quarters of heaven like the lightning (Lk 17th). It would happen within that generation although He could not tell the day nor the hour, and it would be preceded by disasters on a great scale, affecting not simply the human world, but the cosmo-system. How far it is true to the mind of Jesus, as He spoke on earth, to take the language of the so-called 'great eschatological discourse' (Mk 13, cf. Mt 24) with strict literalness, has been of late keenly debated, and some have been disposed to see in this discourse and matter harmonizing with it in the Gospels, an example of the way in which our Lord found it necessary to accommodate His language to conceptions which were inevitable for the hearers if not for Himself. Others may perhaps incline to a view which has been advocated by the present writer,* that the phenomena of this peculiarly apocalyptic discourse offer an occasion on which it is profitable to remember that He thought of Jesus far transcended those of even the most forward of His disciples. But, while we may well acknowledge a certain elusiveness in the language of Jesus in which He deals with the future, we cannot without violence to the Synoptic record refuse to admit that in His habitual view the Kingdom of God was not something that had already come with Himself, but was rather something that still lay in the future. Everyone sees that when Jesus said, 'The kingdom of God is at hand' (cf. ἤγγικεν = has come near), or bade the disciples pray, 'Thy kingdom come,' He must have thought of the Kingdom as being still in the future.

But what of the passages in which it seems to be implied that the Kingdom is already present? For instance Mt 11th (cf. Lk 7th), in which John the Baptist is declared less than the least in the Kingdom of God, or Mt 12th (cf. Lk 11th), in which the expelling of demons in the name of God is offered as proof that the Kingdom of God has come, or the parables (Mt 13th, Mk 4th) in which the Kingdom of God is represented as actually in process of coming to its proper magnitude in the world, and therefore already rooted there. It is the crux of the student of eschatology in the Gospels to show how these two modes of conception, presential and futuristic (sometimes distinguished as ethical and eschatological), can be reconciled. Perhaps the most satisfactory recent treatment of the subject is to be found in a brief but brilliant essay of Professor Wernle.* Wernle lays probably excessive stress on what he considers the 'ecclesiastical' element in the construction of even the Synoptic Gospels (esp. Matthew). But his book, read in the light of the contributions of predecessors to the same discussion (esp. Haupt, Titius, and Joh. Weiss), shows very convincingly that we must, in fairness to our authorities the Synoptics, and in view of the entire historical situation reflected in these writings, start from the fact that our Lord habitually thought and spoke of the Kingdom—however much He might identify it with Himself—as, so to speak, an objective wonder of the future. It does not, indeed, follow that this was the sole or even the most important aspect of it present to His mind; but it seems right that we should accommodate to it, if possible, those passages in which the Kingdom seems to be spoken of as if it were already present, and that this accommodation should be made apart from the intrusion of distinctively modern thoughts. This Wernle has done with great plausibility in the case of the passages above referred to, pointing out that when regard is had to the context, literal or circumstantial, the difficulty disappears. Thus in the passage Mt 11th (Lk 7th) a main element in the situation is a certain rivalry between the circle of John the Baptist and the circle of Jesus. The former approach the latter in an attitude of aggressive doubt. If Jesus is the Messiah, where is the Kingdom that should come with Him? In what respect are those who have attached themselves to Jesus better than those who hold to their old master, John? To such aggressive questioning the answer is: 'The Kingdom has come already.' Its powers are seen working among us (v. 16). Those who keep apart from the sphere of these wonders, however truly they may fulfil otherwise the conditions of membership in the Kingdom, are yet actually standing on the outside.' On this reading, the passage, so far from being antagonistic to the eschatological view of the Kingdom, in reality strongly supports that view. For a main point of the argument is the assumption that, while a high ethical standard in practice may be expected of the children of the Kingdom or may be a condition of entrance into it, the Kingdom itself is something more than this. It is the product of a power altogether supernatural and apart from the will of men. Not righteousness, but the working of this power, is the criterion of the Kingdom. Else surely the Kingdom would be with the greatest of men born of women, and not (as it actually is) with men of even much less stature than his.

The same line of solution seems available in the case of the other passages. Thus in the passage Mt 12th, esp. v. 28 (cf. Lk 11th, esp. v. 20), a main element in the situation is again the element of attack. The Pharisees insinuate that the demons may be subdued by the power of Beelzebub, their prince. Jesus answers that such a state of the case is inconceivable. Satan cannot wish to overthrow his own work. If, on the other hand, the power be the power of God, then the Kingdom of God has come in effect. The strong man armed (the prince of this world, and author of all evil in it) has been conquered and bound. Again, obviously, the criterion of the Kingdom is not simply the presence of the good, but the presence of the good in power. Finally, there are the parables in which the Kingdom is spoken of as something growing in the earth and therefore already planted. Note especially the parable of the Mustard-seed and the Leaven. Here, indeed, we are left to imagine the context in which the parables were uttered, as even Mark (4:26-29) in this instance follows the topical method of Matthew, and relates the parables only as specimens of the didactic method of Jesus (cf. v. 33). But may we not reasonably suppose, as in the other cases, the context of a certain antagonism? Timid followers come to Him with a difficulty born of vision and reflexion: 'If Thou art He with whom the Kingdom comes, why is the word of the Kingdom really received by so few who hear it, or how shall even the wonders of God done in one little land affect the whole world?' To which Jesus replies in effect: 'Have patience, and you shall see.' The greatest things of the world are not always those that give promise of greatness. They are often those whose beginnings are remarkably small, and yet connecting beginning and end is the one power, if this was the occasion of the utterance of the parables under discussion (and it seems difficult even to imagine another), it is obvious that both the question of the doubters and the answer of Jesus assume that the constituent of the Kingdom is the supernatural Divine power before which no opposition can stand. The question is, Can the power really be present when there is so little to show for it? And the answer is, Yes, it can. The same power that begins with little ends with much. We read our own thoughts into the simple intention of these parables, when we speak as if Jesus intended to teach that the manifestation of the Kingdom would not be catastrophic, but would be a matter of growth and development. Doubtless the parables, taken by themselves, are capable of bearing this meaning; but just this isolation alienates them from the general context of the situation reflected in the Gospel history is that of which we must beware. But there remains still what is, apparently, the most important passage, Lk. 17:20. 'Whether is it possible in you' or 'among you' (ἐν ὑμῖν, v. 21), Jesus seems to say very emphatically that the Kingdom is present. On a nearer view of the passage, however, and a more careful articulation of its sentences, this appearance vanishes. V. 21 must be understood in harmony with v. 20 (cf. the 'lo, here' and the 'lo, there' of v. 34, 35). The leading thought of the passage is the suddenness (in the special aspect of simultaneity) of the manifestation of the Kingdom. The advent of the great day shall be like the lightning flash, of which you cannot say, 'here' or 'there,' for it is everywhere and all at once.

It thus appears that there is nothing in the Synoptics really antagonistic to the 'eschatological' view of the Kingdom. The Kingdom is not present in any sense not reconcilable with the fact that it is also and mainly future. No one may understand the Gospels who cannot accept the fact that in a perfectly distinct sense the teaching of Jesus was not modern. It was in the highest degree sane and authoritative, yet it remained true to the traditional view that the Kingdom would come by miracle and catastrophe. The unmistakable indications of this are the facts that the references to the Kingdom in the Synoptics are prevalently of futuristic implication (on this see Wernle, op. cit.), and that even in the Fourth Gospel there are numerous passages to show that Jesus never thought of the Consummation apart from the transcendent wonders of the Resurrection and the Judgment.

There was, however, one important modification of the traditional view. The Consummation and all that accompanied it were to be mediated and, indeed, effected by Himself. Prophecy, it is true, contained the promise of a Messiah. But the correspondences of fulfilment to prophecy are largely contrasts, and the impressiveness of history is perhaps mainly due to these contrasts. The efforts of the Evangelist Matthew to show—sometimes in strangely far-fetched ways—that Jesus fulfilled the prophecies, are an instructive index of the difficulties felt by even the most spiritually minded Jews in reconciling the Messiahship of Jesus with the testimony of prophecy. It becomes important to inquire how in an eschatological aspect Jesus conceived His own Messiahship.

2. His Messianic consciousness.—Of great significance in this connexion is the Temptation. The record of this cannot rest on other testimony than His own, and the key to the juxtaposition of the narratives of the Herodism and the Temptation must be sought in His Messianic consciousness. The latter, therefore, we must try reverently to conceive. It seems true to say that the Temptation represents a contrast or conflict of faith that pervades our Lord's entire ministry on earth. In general it is the contrast between God and man, between what is omnipotent and what is humanly possible; in particular, it is the contrast between a measureless gift and the definite responsibility of using it aright. Jesus had received a practically limitless endowment. He was in the world as God, for He was the 'Son' of God accredited to His own consciousness by His Father. Yet He was flesh and blood, a genuine Brother of men. Each term of this contrast had its own place in the will of God. It was the task of the Messiah to reconcile them. Thus He would do the will of God. An unrestrained use of this gift would remove Him from the brotherhood of men; a refusal to use it meant the failure of His mission. How was a superhuman task to be done by One who should yet remain a man? The key to this problem was grasped in the victorious experience of the Temptation. What the solution meant in detail we learn from the subsequent history. Reading that history in the light of the Temptation-narrative, we seem to discern in it two principles: (a) the one is the principle of faith; (b) the other is the principle of self-sacrifice. These two principles have, of course, a common root in the one Messianic life; but it is useful to view them apart. The principle of faith covers the strictly supernatural side of the work of consummating the Kingdom. It is the hope of what GOD will do through His Messianic Son in bringing the promised Kingdom from heaven to earth. We cannot do justice to the consciousness of our Lord reflected in the Gospels if we fail to note the supremacy of this principle. If we may make for the moment the distinction between faith and duty, we must find what is at once deepest and loftiest in the consciousness of Jesus—not in the thought of what He Himself is to do in the fulfilment of the Messianic career but—in what God is to do in Him and through Him. He never loses sight of the 'one like unto a son of man' who is to come with the clouds and receive a dominion universal and everlasting. The Messiahship is not simply His present task. It is His hope for Himself and for the world. The eschatology of Jesus is mainly His hope of the accomplishment of an act of omnipotence, in which God will finally constitute the Messianic Person and functions. This hope was necessarily shadowy in circumstantial outline, but it rested on an absolutely substantial foundation. Its foundation was the presence of the Spirit that fell to Him as the Son of God. The gift of the Spirit, moreover, was not simply the ground of a hope that related primarily only to Himself. It was a leading of duty and a power of benefit in relation to others. He could give to others helps that were not permissible to Himself. Hence there is a miraculous element in the Messianic ministry even on earth. The miracles are the premonitory signs of the final Messianic glory. They are the pledge that the Power which will be manifested in that glory is not far away. While these opicia and signa abound in the earthly ministry, they are always under the control of the principle of faith. No one is suffered to experience the extraordinary helps who does not believe.

The other principle, resting equally in the depths of our Lord's filial consciousness, is the principle of self-sacrifice. It is in the practical dominance of this principle that we may discern at once the originality of Jesus and the difference between His eschatology and that of contemporary Jewish faith. While He retains the traditional view that the Consummation will be effected in transcendent catastrophic fashion,—collapse of the present world, appearances of the 'Son of Man,' resurrection, judgment.—He reaches the conviction, possibly as early as the time of His baptism, that this Consummation will not be attained previous to His own death and resurrection. How entirely this conviction, once attained, dominated His conception of the Divine purpose and His teaching of His disciples, may be seen in the facts not only that in the Fourth Gospel the sacrificial death of the Messiah is prophesied by the Baptist, and is a matter of our Lord's consciousness from the very beginning of His ministry (Jn 2<sup>19c</sup>), but also that (as regards the latter point) there is little if anything in the Synoptic Gospels opposed to the Johannine view. This may not decide the comparatively unimportant question as to when our Lord attained the conviction that He must as the Messiah submit to a violent death, but taken along with the testimony of the rest of the NT (say, especially, the Pauline and Petrine Epp.) it shows conclusively the practically predominant importance of this event—or rather signal service—in the mind and faith of the Christian Church. For every one text in the Epistles that calls attention to the glory of the Kingdom that is to come in the incomprehensible power of God, there are probably at least two in which the emphasis rests not on the power of God the Father, but on the love of the Son of God. Indeed, it may be questioned whether there is a single reference to the Consummation in the Epistles or the Apocalypse of the NT which does not in its immediate context suggest that the centre of the coming glory is the Person of Him who was delivered for the offences of His people, but raised for their justification. Even in the Epp. to the Thessalonians, which are commonly supposed to represent the most primitive type of Pauline doctrine, it is not the 'Kingdom of God,' but 'His Son from heaven,' that is to believers the object of waiting (1 Th 1<sup>10</sup>).

This indissoluble connexion between the 'sufferings of the Christ' and the 'glory that should follow' (1 P 1<sup>11</sup>) could not have been fixed so securely in the mind of the first believers had it not been first in the mind of Jesus Himself. The Synoptics bear witness to the importance of the connexion for Jesus not only by reporting the profoundly significant but isolated sayings, Mt 20<sup>28</sup> 26<sup>28c</sup> ||, but by the very distinct way in which they connect the critical incident of the disciples confessing their Master's Messiahship with the institution of a new order of lessons, the theme of which is the necessity and the near prospect of the Messiah's sufferings (16<sup>21c</sup> ||). This representation rests on a sure basis of reminiscence, and it seems to have a special guarantee in the fact that the teaching does not contain an articulated doctrine of atonement like that which is expressed in the Epp. (esp. Romans), but aims rather at expressing the necessity of the Master's sufferings in terms that apply equally to the disciple. Admitting the distinctiveness of the two sayings, Mt 20<sup>28</sup> 26<sup>28c</sup> ||, we seem warranted in saying that, according to the Synoptics, the view of things that practically determined the career of Jesus was that the good of which He possessed the pledge in His unique filial consciousness would not come during the period of His own life on earth. The spirit that brought help and healing to others was, as regarded Himself, a spirit of self-sacrifice. The sacrifice would culminate in His death. But the death would be momentary. In two or three days (cf. Hos 6<sup>2</sup>) He would rise again. Yet the momentary death would not be in vain. The death and resurrection of the Messiah meant a conquest of death for a new believing Israel. The death would be the ransom price (λύτρον, Mt 20<sup>28</sup>) which neither man nor angel could pay for the soul of a brother man. It would be the institution and support of the true and abiding temple of the Divine presence (Ex 30<sup>17c</sup>, Job 33<sup>18-24</sup>, Ps 49<sup>8-9</sup>. See on this A. B. Bruce's Kingdom of God: T. & T. Clark, 1889). The thought of the redemptive value of the sufferings of Jesus as the Christ dominates the Fourth Gospel, most of the Epistles, and the Apocalypse of the NT. If it is not prominent, it is certainly present, in the Synoptic Gospels. The lack of prominence finds its explanation in the reserve that naturally characterized the utterance of Jesus regarding His own death. The presence of frequent or elaborate references to the matter in these Gospels would have taken from our estimate of their 'objective' character. Jesus may well have felt that the work of the Messiah was to die, not to explain the consequences or power of that death. Of this there would be another Witness. He who sacrifices himself commits his case to God and to posterity. This brings us to another matter.

3. His view of the time of the Consummation.—We have seen that Jesus did not dissociate Himself from the traditional view that the end would come in the form of a catastrophic transformation, culminating in the advent of the Messiah Himself, who would come from heaven. He seems rather everywhere, both by the assumptions and by the direct references of His language, to set His seal to this view. When we consider how widely His consciousness of personal concern in the accomplishing of the Kingdom must have caused His view of things to differ from all views that were by comparison tentative and theoretical, and reflect how much there is in the ethical quality of His teaching, particularly in the parables which conceive the Kingdom under the analogy of natural growth, to suggest an openness of His mind to all that may be of abiding worth in the modern idea of evolution, the tenacity with which He adhered to the catastrophic view of the final event cannot but profoundly impress us. Reverent investigators will pause before accepting the conclusion that He was in this matter under some kind of delusion. They will strive rather to see in the attitude of One who was conscious of being not simply the herald but also the bearer of the Kingdom of God, a model for the attitude of all who would turn serious thoughts to the last things. Whatever else we bring to a study where there is room for all knowledge and all thought, we must give a final as well as a supreme and pervasive place to the wonder-working power of the living God. We have sure ground in the Synoptics for saying that, while Jesus regarded the work of His Father in heaven, even in what we call nature and ordinary providence, as wonderful (Mt 6<sup>22c</sup>, etc.), this did not prevent Him from steadfastly contemplating a final wonder of destruction and reconstruction which should be the consummation of the Kingdom or its perfect establishment on earth. While so much is clear, there is very great difficulty involved in the question whether He predicted, so definitely and unmistakably as the Synoptics lead us to suppose, that the final wonder would be accomplished within the term of the generation then living. The problem is not to be solved either by the quantitative method of counting heads (whether Gospel texts or modern authorities), or by the alternative method of saying, Either He was mistaken, or such texts as Mk 9<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>30</sup> || are false reports. It can hardly be doubted that Jesus uttered words which were naturally understood, by those who heard them and by others to whom they were reported, to mean that the final wonder—the Parousia of the 'Man' of Daniel's vision and of age-long expectation—would happen within their own generation. It is inconceivable that an expectation so confident and definite could have rested on anything but a definite reminiscence of words used by Jesus which seemed capable of only one interpretation.

Is it, then, possible to justify such sayings as Mk 9<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>20</sup> ¶ apart from the blunt avowal that Jesus laboured under an illusion, and that He transmitted the illusion to His immediate followers not only before but after His death and resurrection? This has been felt to be among the most difficult questions of historical Christology, and various types of solution of the problem are still represented by leading authorities. These may be roughly classified under the heads: (a) prophetic, (b) pictorial, (c) realistic. Under (a) would be included all theories, such as that of Beyschlag, which emphasize the fact that in this instance at least Jesus spoke in the manner of an OT prophet, and that His utterance kept within the limitation common to all the prophets. This limitation required Him to see and announce the final salvation of Jehovah as about to happen within a measurable interval after the judgment (in this case the fall of Jerusalem) impending over the nation. Under (b) would be included theories of the type of Haupt's, which emphasize the necessarily pictorial character of language, which must express extra-mundane realities in mundane forms. Might not the assertion that the Son of Man would come on the clouds within their own generation be the most effective way of leading persons familiar with the apocalyptic style of language to the perfectly confident but also essentially spiritual type of faith represented in the NT literature? (c) The term realistic, finally, might describe all theories whose tendency is to insist on what has been called the "biblical realism," and to require us to put upon the language of Jesus the most literal or natural construction possible. The most distinguished representative of this type in its bearing on the present problem is perhaps Titius. Titius thinks that Jesus must be considered to have held in a bona fide sense the view which His words naturally express, viz. that His own generation would see the end of the present wicked world and the establishment on earth of the perfect heavenly Kingdom. But His confession of ignorance as to the day and the hour of the Consummation (Mk 13<sup>32</sup>) shows that He held His own conviction in an attitude of reverent submission to His Father's will, which must have made the transition to acceptance of the differing reality easy and natural.

It is possible to incline to any one of the above types consistently with a reverential appreciation of the unique mental and spiritual equipment of Jesus; and valuable elements of truth may be found in them all. The opinion of English-speaking students of the Gospels has perhaps till recently inclined most to the pictorial type (b). For some time, however, this has been undergoing modifications from the increasing attention paid to the apocalyptic writings. This has fostered the belief that more regard than has been given is due to the realistic character of our Lord's mode of thought and utterance. On the whole, the variety and vacillation of opinion suggest the likelihood that we are not yet in a position to offer a solution of the problem that shall possess demonstrable certainty. Our information about Jesus, while adequate for spiritual and practical purposes, is insufficient for the purposes, or at least for the appetite, of biographical science. To a great extent we do not know, or are only slowly learning, either the exact occasions of His utterances or the amount of meaning they may have conveyed or failed to convey to those to whom they were delivered. Greater than the limitation arising from defective information, because more intimate to ourselves, is that connected with the inability of even the modern mind to find within itself a measure for the words of eternal life. To those to whom Jesus was and is the unique bearer of the Kingdom of God both to themselves and to the world, it must seem pertinent to ask whether those who can never stand in the centre of such responsibilities can properly estimate the things falling within the vision of the one Person, bearing our nature, who did and does so stand?

Without presuming to offer a key that fits the lock of all the critical difficulties, the present writer ventures to call attention to the view of the whole matter expressed in his Eschatology of Jesus (Melrose, 1904). While it does not meet the difficulties of those whose view of the Person of Jesus is frankly naturalistic, it has some claim upon the attention of those to whom the historical Jesus was the unique manifestation in the flesh of the Power that is directing human history to its goal. To those for whom this conviction is fixed, the two following considerations may perhaps appear of paramount importance. The one is that many of the sayings of Jesus must have had a certain elusiveness. The mere fact that they were so habitually aphoristic and pictorial is itself almost a proof of this. Besides the meaning which immediately strikes us, there is a reserve of possible meaning which lies along the line of our vision, yet goes beyond what we actually see. There is a measure of this elusiveness in the language of all genuine seers. Must there not have been an extraordinary measure of it in the language of Jesus?

The other is that the elusive language of the seer is not delusive. Jesus does not set Himself to utter dark sayings; but His practical instinct keeps Him from dazzling His hearers with an excess of light. He gives them all the light they can take; but it does not follow either that this is all that fills the recesses of His own spirit, or, on the other hand, that in His utterance He is consciously keeping anything back. We must conceive the seer to deliver the truth in the form in which it holds his mind. But the form in this case is not the particular word or image. It is not even so impressive an image as that of the Son of Man coming with the clouds (Dn 7<sup>13</sup>, cf. Mk 13<sup>26</sup> 14<sup>62</sup> ¶). The form concerns rather what may be called spiritual emphasis. It is the exact poise of the spiritual mind at the point of self-surrendering trust in the goodwill and immediate action of the good God. For such a mind the employment of definite words and images in relation to the secrets of the future may mean no more than a definite certainty of new and immediate manifestations of the Divine power and love. They do not necessarily mean a definite realization of the precise form in which the manifestation will be made. It is the definite certainty, not the indefinite form, which the words are calculated to convey. If they convey even to His most susceptible hearers something that is in one aspect more and in another less than this, this is due to the fact that their spiritual poise is inferior to His. The poise in their case is rectified by the subsequent teaching of the Spirit in the light of events.

Those who are able to accept this view will probably do so mainly for two reasons: (a) Because it explains the desire of Jesus to assure His faithful followers that they would live to see the manifestation of the Kingdom in power (Mk 9<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>20</sup> ¶, Mt 10<sup>23</sup>). (b) Because it explains the ability of the Apostles and Apostolic writers to accept apparently without any great travail of mind the disappointment of first hopes, or even to regard the disappointment as part-fulfillment (see, e.g., Jn 16<sup>22</sup> and 2 P 3<sup>6</sup>). To these may perhaps be added: (c) That this view has no necessary connexion with the idea that Jesus in this matter accommodated His expressions to the limitations of the disciples. The idea of accommodation is no doubt suggested by Jn 16<sup>22</sup>; but even if we suppose that the words of this passage are a literal reminiscence of what the Master said, we must observe that one who professes to be accommodating his words to the limitations of his hearers takes thereby all sting from the charge that he has compromised the truth. Many reverent students of the Gospels will probably, however, prefer to regard the words of Jn 12<sup>25</sup> not as a literal utterance of the Master, but rather as a devout recognition proceeding from the inner circle of disciples of an element or quality in their Master which, in spite of all the simplicity of His utterance and His impressive veracity, had eluded and mystified them. They thought they had understood, yet how much they had misunderstood! On this view Jesus did not 'accommodate.' He spoke as the word was given Him, in the style that is most faithfully reflected in the Synoptics. Whatever may be the truth about Jn 12<sup>25</sup>, we seem warranted in saying that Jesus had but one way of speaking of the Consummation. During all His ministry, and up to the end of it, He spoke of it as imminent. It was something for the generation then living. As 19 and the other books of the NT outside the Gospels may be taken as proof that He spoke of it in the same way after His resurrection. If in this regard He was 'limited' in the days of His flesh, He was limited also when He wore the body that was from heaven; if He 'accommodated' in the one sphere, He 'accommodated' in the other also.

The NT as a whole is filled with an expectation, which in the form in which it was entertained was not fulfilled; and yet faith in Jesus and belief in the still coming Consummation lived on and live still. Our conclusion is, then, briefly as follows:—As a protest to His own people, Jesus predicted the downfall of the Jewish nation within a measurable period (see esp. Mt 23 and 24). While in all probability He depicted this catastrophe in colours that closely matched those of the event itself, the very intensity of His concentration upon a vision that might seem to concern only the Jewish nation serves to show that through the telescope of Jewish particularity He was looking out upon the whole human world. His vision was that of One uniquely alive to the purpose of God, of which He, the Messianic Son of Man, was the supreme executor. It was the vision of a prophet, seeing all things in relation to the Divine purpose, not the vision of a mere politician or patriot. The Jewish nation was chosen to bless the world with the knowledge of God. Failure to fulfil this vocation brought on it the destructive wrath of God; and the condemnation of the chosen people involved in an obvious sense the doom of the world. That ignorance of God and hostility, of which the Jewish obduracy was the signal example, would reach a climax in the murderous death of the Son of God. From that moment the forces of final reconstruction would set in. When the Consummation would be attained, when the Son of Man should come in His glory, and all evil and evil-doers be put away, no man or angel knew. Not even the Son, only the Father. But this much was certain. The power of the Prince of this world—the Prince whose power was manifest in sin, disease, and death—was broken. The proofs of that victory could not be long delayed. Some would live to see signs of which they had not dreamt, that the Kingdom had come in power.

This covers in brief probably as much as we are able to report of the unique eschatological consciousness of Jesus. The account, however, would not be complete without a fresh reference to the blank space of our ignorance. This space we shall enlarge or diminish according to our estimate of the difference between the area of our knowledge, and that not merely of the general purpose of God, but of the consciousness of Jesus, the Son of God. All men are agnostics in the sense of admitting that they have not been made privy to the counsels of Creation and Providence; but besides this common agnosticism there is a kind peculiar to Christians, which breathes the spirit of faith and reverence. Christians believe that 'all things,' including especially human destiny, have been committed to the hands of Jesus Christ. In that faith they can anticipate with calmness the worst tragedies of personal or social history. They believe that there is no terror of the kingdom of darkness which the Son of God has not overcome with the armour of His holy light; but, because they believe this, they do not presume to possess, even in the measure of His Spirit to which they have attained, a key that will open every secret that was stored in the depths of His personality, even while He was on earth. The last mystery to Christians is no longer the mystery of death, judgment, and the hereafter. It is rather the mystery—which is also the fact—of Jesus Christ, the mystery of the relation of these things to Him, or rather, perhaps, of His relation to them.

II. ESCHATOLOGY IN THE GOSPEL OF JOHN.—We pass by questions as to the date or authorship of this Gospel. The writing may be placed with confidence near the border dividing the 1st and 2nd centuries. It does not matter for our purpose on which side of the border it is placed. To the eyes of most Anglo-Saxon critics the Gospel reveals still the marks of an intimate of Jesus, and with them we assume that, even in the form in which we read the Gospel, it proceeded from the circle of a 'disciple whom Jesus loved.' We assume also—that probably no one denies—that there is but one mind between the author of the Gospel and the author of the Epistles that bear the name of John. Whoever was its author, the Gospel could not have reached so soon the position of authority it has held in the Christian Church since the 2nd cent., had it not been considered to express the living and profound belief of Christendom regarding what was most essential in the Person and History of Jesus. This is the matter of importance to our present inquiry. If we find that the view of our Lord's eschatological consciousness, which has seemed to us to be most reasonably deducible from the Synoptic Gospels, agrees on the whole with what is presented here, that view may be considered to have behind it a weight of authority that could not well be greater. For the authority is not simply the consciousness of an inspired Apostle or Apostolic man; it is that of the consciousness of the Church as a whole at the critical period of the close of the Apostolic age. We may fix attention on three matters: (1) the idealizing style of the Gospel; (2) its conception of Eternal Life; (3) its attitude to Eschatology proper.

1. The idealizing style of the Fourth Gospel.—From the first it has been admitted that, as compared with the Synoptics, this Gospel is one rather of the mind than of the external actions of Jesus. Even the most remarkable external actions, the miracles, are but 'signs' of the mystery that is really important to us—that, viz., of the Person of the 'Son of God.' The 'signs' are recorded that we may believe that Jesus is the Son of God, and may have life through His name (20<sup>31</sup>). The Logos that was 'towards God (πρός τὸν θεόν) and was God' (1<sup>1</sup>), was made flesh, and the writer and his companions beheld His glory, and reported the vision, not so much from literal reminiscence of the acts and words done and spoken by Jesus on earth, as under the inspiration of the Spirit that came according to promise from the presence of the Father and the Risen Ascended Son. The author is concerned rather with the discourses of Jesus than with His actions, and the discourses are, we believe, not so much reported as interpreted. They are the words of an eternal life in which the writer and his fellow-believers share (1 Jn 1<sup>2</sup>). Jesus is Himself the Word, the Truth, the Life. What is told of Him represents but a few out of many instances of His self-manifestation. They are like the sparks that witness to a hidden, mighty, and continuous electric stream. One consequence of this mode of treatment is that there is little in this Gospel to indicate that Jesus experienced anything of the sinless infirmity of flesh and blood. There is, e.g., no suggestion that He grew in knowledge of the path He had to tread as the Saviour of the world. There is no temptation, no agony in Gethsemane, no ignorance or doubt as to the times and seasons of the Consummation. The author does not, perhaps, consciously ignore these things, but to mention them is no part of his purpose to manifest the eternal life that was in the Son of God.

If such a view of the Person of Jesus were carried out with rigorous abstract logic, we should reach a result that would not only be glaringly at variance with the picture presented by the Synoptists, but would be indistinguishable from the heresy against which, at least in its germinal form, the author himself protests (1 Jn 2<sup>20</sup> 6<sup>9</sup>), viz. that the incarnation of the Logos was mere appearance. The point to be observed is that the view is not carried out rigorously. The reason is that the author combines a sense of history with a sense of spiritual fact. But what mainly concerns him is the spiritual fact: what Jesus, who rose and ascended, is now to His Church, that in deep reality He has always been. No doubt He was truly human, and, because He was so, there was during His earthly sojourn real limitation, but the limitation was free because self-imposed (see, e.g., 10<sup>18</sup>), and behind it there was always the Divine reality. He was never other than the Logos, the eternal and only-begotten Son of God.

Even though it be conceded, as we think it must be, that neither as regards incidents nor discourses is the Johannine picture of Jesus so strictly historical as that of the Synoptists, it does not follow that it is not, in another than the literally historical sense, a deeply true picture. The guarantee of its truth is the fact that the Christian Church has accepted it, and in doing so has conquered both its own feeling of disappointment in the delayed Parousia and the unbelief of the world. The Church discovered, that is to say, the presence in the mind and utterances of Jesus of a quality of which it had not at first grasped the significance. His words were 'spirit and life' (6<sup>68</sup>). They could be interpreted only by His own perpetual teaching through the Spirit of truth (16<sup>13</sup>).

We may call this, if we choose, the idealism of the Johannine Gospel and of the early Church; but the question is worth pondering whether anything less than an idealism which rested on a sure, if profound, basis of truth, could have held the Church to its loyalty to the unseen Jesus in face of the disappointment of hopes which the Synoptic testimony, taken in its natural sense, had encouraged. In any case, the Johannine picture of Jesus may be considered to supply a striking confirmation of the opinion, already partly expressed in this article, that no amount of fragmentary sentences of Jesus, however accurately reported, and however definite their meaning may be when they are taken by themselves, can be a perfect index of a mind like His.

2. Its conception of Eternal Life.—Every reader of John notices the prominence of the words 'life,' or 'eternal life,' or 'spirit.' The phrase 'Kingdom of God' has practically disappeared, and 'life' or 'eternal life' takes its place. The fact is of importance to us in our present study, because it is the index of John's way of conceiving what in the Synoptic mode of speech might be called the present aspect of the Kingdom. Jesus appears as the possessor and even the direct dispenser of the Divine life. It is given to the Son to have life in Himself even as the Father (5<sup>26</sup>), and no one can come to Him except it be given him from the Father (6<sup>67</sup>). Yet neither the Father nor the Son dispenses life in its fulness till the Son is glorified through death, or returns to the glory which He had from the first with the Father (7<sup>39</sup>). But once the life is imparted it is a new birth which carries its own promise. It is, in a proper sense, sufficient for itself. If a man is born of God, the Divine seed remains in him. Its product is righteousness, and its perfect fruition is likeness to the only-begotten Son Himself (3<sup>9</sup> 9<sup>42</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup> 9 etc.). It is clear that this mode of view brings the Divine boon nearer to the individual heart, and necessarily alters, at least for the individual, the perspective of the eschatology.

Not simply the great event itself,—the glorious Parousia of the Christ,—but the events of resurrection and judgment that accompany it, are regarded from within rather than from without. Those whose hope is set on Jesus do not lift to the heavens faces sick with deferred hope. They look within and behold Him with the vision of the pure in heart. For them Jesus has come already and keeps coming. The supreme matter is to abide in Him or in His love by keeping His words. Let a man thus live and believe in Him, and he shall never die. Nothing, that is, not even what we call death, will break the continuity of his life (11<sup>26</sup>). The water of life that Jesus gives shall be in him a well of water springing up unto everlasting life (4<sup>14</sup>). The Judgment similarly is, or tends to be, withdrawn from futurity. He who believes does not come to judgment; he has passed already from death to life (5<sup>24</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup>). On the other hand, he who disbelieves is condemned already. Life has come to him, but he chooses death; light, but he chooses darkness. In turning from the only-begotten Son of God he puts from him his chance of being saved from a Divine wrath already present (3<sup>36</sup>, 36). Until he seeks the Father through Him who is the Way, the wrath of God abideth on him. Every thoughtful reader of Jn. perceives that such are the main ideas both of the Gospel and of the Epistles. He will hardly fail to reflect also that these are, and have remained ever since the time of these writings or earlier, the vital ideas of the Christian Church in its cultivation of individual and social life, both on its practical and its meditative side.—Comparing the Johannine testimony with the utterances in the Synoptic Gospels—few, it may be, but important—which reveal a consciousness in Jesus of a Kingdom of God that is present and not simply future, and considering especially the fact that in spite of their testimony to Jesus' sense of the imminence of a Kingdom yet to come, there is not in the Synoptic Gospels the slightest indication that this tremendous prospect at all diminished His appreciation of the worth of those ethical precepts (e.g. those relating to marriage and the parental relation (Mk 10<sup>28</sup>, 7<sup>10</sup>)) that have to do with the secular order, we shall hesitate before accepting the idea suggested by Joh. Weiss (op. cit.), that the precise meaning of the ethical utterances of Jesus is to be determined by our knowledge (?) of His eschatology, and that Jesus would not have spoken as He does, e.g., in Lk 14<sup>20</sup>, had He not believed that within a generation the institutions of marriage and the family would cease, and that those who should survive this end of the world, being 'sons of the resurrection' (Lk 20<sup>35</sup>), should be thenceforward as the angels (ib.). In this reference also the Johannine Gospel confirms our sense of an element in the equipment and outlook of Jesus to which justice can hardly be done by those who lay unqualified stress on the distinctively eschatological portions of the Synoptic Gospels.

3. Its attitude to Eschatology proper.—Yet it has to be observed, finally, that, while the futuristic element is not prominent in the Johannine Gospel, it is by no means eliminated. It may be felt, indeed, that the terms in which it is expressed involve a departure from (or, at any rate, a transformation of) the objective standpoint of the Syn-optics. The last three words of the phrase, 'the hour cometh and now is' (5<sup>22c</sup>), suggest a state of mind in which the thought of a future radically or incalculably different from that which is already present to the vision of faith, is no longer keenly operative. The same is still more obvious in the Supper discourse (chs. 14-16), in reading which one feels that the line of distinction between the Lord's final coming to receive the disciples to Himself, and His continuous abiding with them or visitation of them through the comforting Spirit, tends to be a vanishing one.

Yet it does not follow that the distinctively eschatological utterances or references contained in the Johannine Gospel (e.g. 5<sup>28c</sup>, 21<sup>22c</sup>) are of the nature of a formally dutiful acknowledgment of an earlier mode of speech and a still lingering form of popular Christian expectation corresponding to it. Such a view, at least, is not an exhaustive description of the state of the case. It seems true rather to say that the futuristic outlook, while it lost, even within the time covered by the NT writings, its first aspect of keen expectation, was yet to the last of that period felt to be—what it is still—an indispensable element of Christian faith. That the matter is looked at from within, and attention fastened not on what is to come to us, but rather on what we are to become (1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>), does not alter the fact that the total on which we are looking belongs to the future as well as to the present, and that that future is in the wonder-working power of the Conqueror of death. It is never possible to neglect the aspect of futurism, and it is sometimes imperative to emphasize it. Such a passage as 1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup> compared with Mk 13<sup>22</sup> shows significantly how much the Fourth Evangelist, in spite of the depth of his insight into the Master's mind (or, shall we say, because of that insight), was to the last influenced by the eschatological utterances of the Synoptic testimony. He recognizes the antichrists of his own day, and is confident that it is the 'last time.' The 21st chapter of the Gospel speaks similarly for the attitude of the Evangelist's circle. The chapter is an appendix, and v. 22<sup>c</sup> show what is probably its main motive. The aged Apostle has passed away, and the question is raised, Did not the Master say that this disciple should not see death till He should come in glory? The expectation implied in the question connected itself in all likelihood with the utterance in Mk 9<sup>1</sup>. There was a general impression throughout the Churches of Asia that John was the person mainly intended, and a story was current to the effect that in predicting Peter's mode of death the Master had told that disciple of the survival of John. The author of the appendix claims to be in a position to tell the readers of the Gospel what the Master had really said. It was far from being a definite promise. It was only the hint of a possibility. The apology would hardly have been deemed necessary if the tendency to insist on a literalistic interpretation of the Synoptic testimony, placing the glorious final advent within 'this generation,' had not still been prevalent at the close of the 1st cent., i.e. at the time when John died.

Neither the author of the Gospel and the Epistles nor the author of the appendix to the Gospel has anything to object to the probability of an immediate Parousia of Jesus in glory; but the impression which their utterances leave upon our minds, and which from the first they were fitted to convey to the Church, is that the contrast important to the authors is no longer that between present and future, but rather that between God and the world, between the love of the Father and the love of this present evil world. The matter of absorbing interest is not that the Son of God will come again, but that He has come. Life is not movement towards a point on a straight line: it is expansion from a centre, and because the centre is living he who is at the centre is also implicitly at the goal of the moving circumference.

The Evangelist has expressed this in very characteristic fashion in the closing words of his principal Epistle: 'We know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness. And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true, and we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life' (1 Jn 5<sup>18c</sup>).

Those who find their own consciousness expressed in such words, and feel impelled to trace that consciousness to its historical source, will not readily suppose that they have found the source anywhere nearer than the consciousness of Jesus Himself. Who but He could have been the first either to possess eternal life or to know that He possessed it?

LITERATURE.—For the literature on Eschatology in general or on Scriptural Eschatology see the art. 'Eschatology' in Hastings' DB and in Encyc. Biblica. It is indispensable for the student of the Gospels to understand the general scope of Jewish apocalyptic literature, and for this purpose the introductions in Driver's Daniel (in the 'Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges') and Scott's Revelation (in the 'Century Bible') will be found sufficient by most English readers. Of German works there may be mentioned, in this connexion, Hilgenfeld, Jüdische Apokalyptik, 1857 (still a standard work); Gunkel, Schöpfung u. Chaos, and his Zum religionsgeschichtlichen Verständnis des NT, 1895 and 1903; Bousset, Der Antichrist, etc., 1886, and his Die jüd. Apokalyptik, 1896; to which may be added Gressmann, Der Ursprung der jüd. Eschatologie, 1905. On OT Eschatology see very specially A. B. Davidson's Theology of the Old Testament (T. & T. Clark, 1906), 34-41, and also in regard to the Eschatology of the Gospels a good list of books will be found in Moffatt's Historical New Testament (T. & T. Clark), p. 639-41, bearing especially on the theory of the 'Little Apocalypse,' which many scholars, following Colani and Weissenbach, suppose to be incorporated in Mk 13, Mt 24. Beyond the works of Haupt, Thüls, Joh. Weiss, etc., mentioned in this article, the most comprehensive work, strictly ad rem, is probably Baldensperger's Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu, of which only the first part of the 3rd 'völlig ungarbeitete' edition, entitled 'Die Messianisch-Apok. Hoffnungen des Judentums' (Strassburg, 1903), has as yet (1906) been published. A discussion of the matters specially emphasized by Joh. Weiss and Baldensperger will be found in a volume of the 'Decennial Publications of the University of Chicago,' entitled The Messianic Hope in the NT, by Professor Shailer Mathews, Chicago, 1905. See also Forster's Messias of the Apocalypses, and his art. 'Revelation' in Hastings' DB. For illustrations of Rabbinical views and interpretations, current more or less in the time of our Lord, see very specially the latest edition of Ederheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (London, 1900), vol. II, Appendices 5, 8, 9, 13, 14, 17, 18; also Weber's Jüd. Theologie, Leipzig, 1887. In E. W. Schmidt's Die Geschichte Jesu (Tüb. and Leipzig, 1900), there is a section entitled 'Zukunftsprüche,' the views of which are defended in vol. II, of the same work (1904), pp. 364-398. Of other works the following may be mentioned: I. A. Dörner, de Oratione Christi Eschatologica, Mith. 24<sup>1-26</sup>, Stuttgart, 1844; Herm. Cremer, *Die eschat. H. Charles, Oxford, Clarendon Press, since 1893, when his Book of Enoch, translated from Professor Dillmann's Ethiopic Text, appeared. See in this discussion on 'Son of Man' as at Enoch 49, pp. 127-128, and 'The Son of Man: Its Origin and Meaning' (Appendix B), pp. 212-217. Since the publication of Charles' Enoch the philological question regarding 'Son of Man' has been keenly discussed by Lietzmann, Wellhausen, Schmiedel, Dalman, Flebig, and others.

ESLI.—An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3<sup>38</sup>.

ESSENES.—The Essenes were an ascetic community among the Jews, the existence of which can be traced for over two centuries, from about B.C. 150 to the Fall of Jerusalem. For original information regarding them we are dependent on Josephus (BJ II. viii.; Ant. XVIII. i. 5, XV. x. 4, 5, XIII. v. 9) and Philo (Quod omnis probus liber, chs. 12, 13, ed. Mangey, pp. 457-459). Josephus has also scattered references to individual Essenes, and the elder Pliny (HN v. 17) an appreciative notice of them, for which he was probably indebted to Alexander Polyhistor and his work 'On the Jews.' Other ancient authorities are either secondary or untrustworthy.

Josephus introduces the Essenes as one of the three 'sects of philosophy' which were influential amongst the Jews, the others being the Sadducees and the Pharisees; but from the descriptions given of their practices and organization, they seem to have corresponded more closely to a monastic order than to a sect or a religious party. Their name is probably, though not certainly, derived from the Aramaic form of the Hebrew word hasidim ('pious ones'), and this already suggests a close relation, especially in their origin, between the Essenes and the Pharisees. Their numbers are estimated by Jos. (Ant. XVIII. i. 5) and Philo at 4000; and while there is no evidence of their existence as an order outside Palestine, within its area they were widely distributed, being found in a great many of the villages and small towns, as well as in Jerusalem, where there was a 'Gate of the Essenes.' The members of the order were celibates, living in community houses and owning nothing as individuals, but having everything in common. They are extolled for their piety, their industry, which was confined to agricultural pursuits, the simplicity of their food, and their scrupulous cleanliness. Further characteristics of their life were that they had no slaves, used no oil for the purpose of anointing, dressed in white, and rigidly prohibited the use of oaths except on the admission of a new member to the order.

The order was held together by the strictest discipline. Full membership was granted only after a novitiate of two years, and then upon an oath to reveal everything to the members and nothing to the outside world. Offenders against the rules of the order were punished by exclusion; and as they were still held bound by their vows, they were unable to return to ordinary life.

What makes the Essenes 'the great enigma of Hebrew history' (Lightfoot, Col. 7 p. 82) is that, while they are distinguished by exaggerated adherence to the Jewish Law and by special reverence for Moses as lawgiver, they betray at the same time certain ideas and practices which are foreign to Judaism, and seem incompatible with its spirit. The indications of incipient dualism which may be found in their abstinence from marriage and in other ascetic practices, find a parallel in their doctrine of immortality, wherein they agreed with the Pharisees against the Sadducees as to the immortality of the soul, but differed from the Pharisees in denying the resurrection of the body. And they deviated still further from orthodox Judaism in the practice of making a daily prayer to the sun 'as if entreating him to rise,' and in refraining altogether from animal sacrifice. It followed that they were excluded from the services of the Temple. On the other hand, they were rigid beyond all others in their observance of the Sabbath; and they went beyond the Pharisees in their absolute determinism, affirming 'that fate governs all things, and that nothing befalls men but what is according to its determination' (Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 9).

It is in this apparent eclecticism that the problem of the origin of Essenism consists. While it is impossible to deny the Jewish foundation on which it rests, it is equally impossible to overlook the presence of foreign elements. The source of these has formed the subject of endless discussion, and has been found by various writers in Parsism and Buddhism (Hilgenfeld), Parsism (Lightfoot), Syro-Palestinian heathenism (Lipsius), and Pythagoreanism (Zeller, Keim). But all attempts to demonstrate any necessary connexion or indubitable channel between any one of these and Essenism have failed. And it remains either to assume that foreign influences had percolated unobserved, or to suppose that the characteristic phenomena emerged independently in Persia, Greece, and Palestine.

The Essenes are not directly referred to in the NT; but some have without sufficient reason claimed John the Baptist, and even Jesus, as Essenes. It has also been alleged that their influence may be traced within the circle of Christian ideas and practices. The possible relation of Essenism to the heresy controverted by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Colossians has been discussed at length by Bishop Lightfoot in his edition of the Epistle (cf. his Galatians<sup>2</sup>, p. 322 ff.), and also by Klöpper, Brief an die Kolosser, pp. 76-95.

C. ANDERSON SCOTT.

ETERNAL FIRE.—An expression twice used by Christ in reference to the future punishment of the wicked. In Mt 18<sup>8</sup> ἀποθνήσκει εἰς τὸ πῦρ τὸ αἰώνιον stands in contrast to εἰς ἀβύσσον εἰς τὸ πῦρ; and from Mt 25<sup>41</sup> we learn that this eternal fire, into which the wicked are to be cast, was prepared not for them but for the devil and his angels. These are the only passages in which the expression is found in the Gospels; but equivalent terms occur. In Mt 19<sup>17</sup> the eternal fire is identified with the fire of Gehenna; and in 25<sup>46</sup> we have ἐκείσε αἰώνιον. In Mt 3<sup>12</sup> and Mk 9<sup>43</sup> it is the unquenchable fire (ἀσβεστον), and in Mk 9<sup>48</sup> Gehenna is the place of punishment where their worm dieth not, καὶ τὸ πῦρ οὐ σβέννυται. The wicked after their separation from the righteous (Mt 13<sup>42-43</sup>) are to be cast into a furnace (ἀβύσσος) of fire.

A brief account of the origin of this phraseology will throw light on its meaning. The idea of punishment by fire comes from the OT. The destruction by fire of Sodom and Gomorrah supplied the typical example, and it is frequently referred to as such (De 29<sup>22</sup>, Is 19 13<sup>18</sup>, Jer 49<sup>12</sup>, Am 4<sup>11</sup>, Wis 10<sup>7</sup>, 3 Mac 2<sup>3</sup>; cf. such well-known NT passages as Jude 7). A similar judgment is spoken against Edom (Is 34<sup>9-10</sup>), where it is said that the fire is eternal and will not be quenched. In Am 1. 2, Damascus, Gaza, etc., are threatened with the fire penalty. See for other examples of the unquenchable fire, 2 R 22<sup>17</sup>, Is 33, Jer 44 21<sup>12</sup>, Eek 20<sup>47-48</sup>, Am 5<sup>6</sup>. The 'everlasting burnings' of Is 33<sup>14</sup> refer, like the preceding, to temporal judgments. But there are passages which at least suggest the extension of the idea and its imagery to the future world. According to De 32<sup>22</sup> the fire of Jehovah's anger reaches down to Sheol. Chrysostom finds in Is 50<sup>11</sup> and 66<sup>24</sup> a reference to the punishment of souls in the underworld; but Salmund and A. B. Davidson see in the latter passage only the description of a present-world penalty; and this seems the more natural interpretation. This passage seems to have suggested the later Jewish belief regarding eternal punishment, for certain expressions in it are used in this sense in the Apocryphal writings (e.g. 3th 16<sup>17</sup>, Sir 7<sup>17</sup>) and by Christ (Mk 9<sup>47</sup>). The scene of this judgment is, in all probability, the Valley of Hinnom, regarded by the Jews as a place accursed on account of its Molech sacrifices; and the fires which were kept burning, through which the victims passed, would readily suggest the idea of Gehenna and its eternal fire.

* Kimchi's statement, that a fire was kept constantly burning in Hinnom to consume the offal and the dead bodies which were thrown into it, comes too late (A.D. 1200) to be accepted without evidence.

ETERNAL FIRE

In the Apocryphal writings the fire penalty is extended without reserve to the future world, and in a greatly intensified form. Most of the writers have ceased to expect an equitable distribution of rewards and penalties in this life: their hopes are fixed on the future; and they, therefore, transfer the OT imagery of retribution to the life after death. The Book of Enoch is the great storehouse of teaching on this subject. For the impure angels and the faithless angelic rulers an abyss of fire is prepared, in which, after the judgment, they will be tortured for ever (108-13, 19<sup>1</sup>-21<sup>7</sup>, 54<sup>8</sup> 60<sup>8</sup>-62). For human offenders, a fiery abyss is opened on the right hand of the Temple (90<sup>8</sup>, 77); this is Gehenna. They descend into 'the flame of the pain of Sheol' (62<sup>9</sup>), or into the 'burning fire of Sheol' (103<sup>7</sup>-8). Thus it appears that the NT 'eternal fire' of Gehenna is anticipated in this book: the only difference being that, while in the NT the fire prepared for the devil and his angels is identified with that into which wicked men are cast, in the Book of Enoch they are always distinguished.

Two questions arise regarding the nature of the eternal fire. Is it material? And in what sense is it eternal?

(1) In many OT passages, even where it is said that the fire is unquenchable, and will burn for ever, material fire is undoubtedly meant, for fire is one of the physical agents which God commonly employs in His temporal judgments, and its burning for ever must refer to the lasting destruction which it effects. Sodom, Gomorrah, and Edom are given as examples of places on which the doom of eternal fire fell, and they still bear its proof-marks. But in other passages the literal sense cannot be maintained, as, e.g., where God's anger or jealousy and man's wickedness are said to burn like fire. Nor can it be allowed in passages like 18<sup>14</sup> if Cheyne's interpretation is accepted; since undying worms, preying on souls or bodies that are being consumed by unquenchable fire, is an impossible idea. In the NT, as we have seen, Christ drew largely on OT imagery in speaking of the 'last things.' But the whole drift of His interpretation of prophetic language is at variance with the literal sense of the fire penalty. What He gives in His eschatological teaching is not a dogmatic but an imaginative presentation of the truth; and the imagery He employs belongs, not to the substance, but to the form of His thought. The prophet, like the poet and the artist, must present the future in terms and forms borrowed from present experience, and the underlying truth must be spiritually discerned. If, as Christ tells us, the eternal fire was prepared for the devil and his angels, it cannot be material fire; for spirits cannot undergo physical torture.*

Death by fire was the severest penalty under the Jewish law, and as it was inflicted only for the most shameful sins (Lv 24<sup>14</sup> 21<sup>10</sup>; Jos 7<sup>25</sup>), a peculiar infamy was associated with it. Christ, therefore, when He employed this imagery in speaking of the doom of the wicked, intended to warn men that God has attached a terrible retribution to sin. At the very least it signifies an ordeal of suffering analogous to that which fire causes in the living tissues. To the question, How will the suffering be caused? Scripture gives only the figurative answer, 'as by fire.' Bp. Butler (Anal. pt. ii. ch. v.) thought that it might come in the way of natural consequence, without any direct infliction on the part of God. Sin, which yields pleasure here, becomes misery there without changing its nature, through the natural working of moral law. The agony of remorse, which sometimes overwhelms the sinner in this life, has been * Yet the contrary has been maintained on high authority. Augustine held that the fire was material, and that spirits may be tortured by it, since it is always the mind and not the body that suffers, even when the pain originates in the body. He also suggests that devils may have bodies made of air, 'like what strikes us when the wind blows, and thus be liable to suffering from fire' (de Civit. xxi. 8, 9, 10). Th. Aquinas held that the fire is material (Summa Theol. pt. iii. suppl. lxx. 3). And in our own day Ed. White inclines to the view that the wicked before extinction will be punished by material fire (Life in Christ, p. 352).

ETERNAL FIRE

regarded as a foretaste of the eternal fire. The pæna damni, or the consciousness of being for ever cut off from the sight of God, the only satisfying good, will be, it has been said, intense suffering as by fire, when the distractions of the world have ceased to dazzle. And these will, doubtless, be elements in the retribution. But if this were all, a possible consequence would be that the penalty would fall most lightly on the most degraded. A soul that can be made miserable through remorse, or the conscious loss of God's presence, has not reached the lowest stage of hardening; while experience tells us that those who have reached this stage are least liable to suffering from such a source. In them remorse can be awakened, not by the pæna damni, but by suffering externally ceased. And the language of the NT suggests that in the future world an environment is prepared, with its appropriate agencies and influences, for the punishment of those who are morally and spiritually dead. Such expressions as 'Depart into the eternal fire,' 'shall be cast into the lake of fire,' etc., clearly presuppose such an environment, in which the least worthy shall suffer the most, 'be beaten with many stripes.'

(2) Why is the fire called eternal?—In Mt 25<sup>41-46</sup> the adjective aiônios is used with reference to 'the fire,' 'punishment,' and 'the life,' and no satisfying reason has been given for saying that, as regards the first two, it means 'time limited,' and, as regards the last, 'time unlimited.' If Christ's purpose had been to call attention to the duration of each, then 'endlessness' is the idea emphasized. But, except where this word or its Hebrew equivalent is applied to objects that, for the nonce, are invested with a quasi-eternity (Lv 3<sup>17</sup>, Gn 17<sup>8</sup> 49<sup>10</sup>), it takes us into a sphere of being to which time measurements are inapplicable, and in which objects are presented in their relation to some eternal aspect of the Divine nature. Thus eternal life does not mean natural life prolonged to infinity; such a life might be lived without any experience of the eternal life, which signifies life in fellowship with, or that partakes in, the eternal life of God. God's relation to believers is such that between them and Him there is a community of life. Eternal fire, on the other hand, figuratively expresses the truth that, God's nature being what it is, there must be, under any economy over which He presides, a provision for the adequate punishment of sin. The eternal fire is such a provision, and, being eternal, it can be no mere temporary contrivance for fiding over an emergency, but must be the retributive aspect of the Divine holiness. God is, was, and ever shall be a consuming fire in relation to sin unrepented of; this is His unchanging and unchangeable attitude. Some of the OT saints were all their lifetime subject to bondage through fear of death, for to them Sheol (Is 38) was a place where all life in fellowship with God was lost. But suppose that their worst fears had been realized, it would still have been true that they had had a passing experience of the life eternal. And similarly if, after ages of suffering, the wicked were to cease to be, it would, none the less, be true of them that they had been cast into the eternal fire. In Sodom, Gomorrah, Edom, etc., we have examples of what is meant by 'suffering the doom of eternal fire'; but this does not mean that ever since the fire destroyed the cities their inhabitants have been enduring its pains. Eternal fire may or may not mean everlasting suffering in it (see art. ETERNAL PUNISHMENT AND RETRIBUTION).

A. BISSET.

ETERNAL LIFE.—This phrase occurs more than forty times in the New Testament. In many passages it denotes primarily a present possession or actual experience of the Christian believer, while in others it clearly contemplates a blessed life to come, conceived as a promised inheritance. The Greek expressions are ζωὴ αἰώνιος, ἡ αἰώνιος ζωὴ (Jn 17<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>12</sup>), ἡ ζωὴ ἡ αἰώνιος (1 Jn 1<sup>5</sup>). The word 'life,' or 'the life' (ζωή, ἡ ζωή), without the qualifying adjective 'eternal,' is often employed in the same general meaning.

There are passages in the Synoptic Gospels in which the phrase 'eternal life' is used synonymously and interchangeably with 'the kingdom of God' (Mk 9<sup>45</sup>, Mt 7<sup>14</sup>). The Kingdom of heaven and the life eternal are very closely related in the teaching of Jesus. Compare also the suggestive language of Ro 9<sup>7</sup> 'shall reign in life through Jesus Christ.' But it is especially in the writings of St. John that we find 'eternal life' presented as a heavenly boon which may become the actual possession of believers in the present life. God Himself is the source of all life, and 'as the Father hath life in himself, even so gave he to the Son also to have life in himself' (Jn 5<sup>26</sup>). In the Word 'which became flesh and dwelt among us' there was a visible manifestation of the life eternal: 'In him was life; and the life was the light of men' (1<sup>9</sup>), so that He Himself declares, 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life' (14<sup>6</sup>). In accord with these statements the very life of God is conceived as begotten in the believer by the Holy Spirit, so that he is 'born anew,' 'born from above' (3<sup>3-7</sup>). Thus begotten of God, the children of God become distinctly manifest, and God's 'seed abideth in them' (1 Jn 3<sup>9</sup>). That is, in these Divinely begotten children of God there abides the imperishable germ (σπέρμα) of life from above, the eternal kind of life which the twice born possess in common with the Father and the Son.

Hence it is that the believer 'hath eternal life' as an actual possession (Jn 3<sup>36</sup>). He 'hath passed out of death into life' (Jn 5<sup>24</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup>). In Jn 17<sup>3</sup> we read what has to some extent the manner of a definition: 'This is life eternal, that (ὅτι) they should know thee the only true God, and him whom thou didst send, even Jesus Christ.' So far as this text furnishes a definition, it seems clearly to imply that 'eternal life' consists in such a knowledge of God and of Christ as involves a personal experience of vital fellowship. It carries with it the love and obedience which, according to Jn 14<sup>21</sup>, bring the Father and the Son into the believer's inmost life, so that they 'make their abode with him.' In view of the use of ἔα in 4<sup>14</sup> 15<sup>12</sup> 18<sup>36</sup> we need not refine so far as (with Westcott on this passage) to maintain that the connective here retains its telic force and indicates an aim and an end, a struggle after increasing knowledge rather than the attainment of a knowledge already in possession. But it should not be supposed that any present knowledge of God and of Christ is inconsistent with incalculable future increase. While the essence of this Divine life consists in the knowledge of the only true God and His anointed Son, such knowledge is not the whole of eternal life, for other ideals with their additional content are also set before us in the teaching of Christ and of His Apostles. Whatever else is true touching this saving knowledge of the true

God, its present possession is one of the great realities in the personal experience of the believer. In 1 Jn 5<sup>11-12</sup> the gift and actual possession of this eternal kind of heavenly life are made emphatic: 'God gave unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath the life; he that hath not the Son of God hath not the life.' This language is incompatible with the thought that the 'eternal life' spoken of is merely a promise, a hope or an expectation of such life in a future state, as some of the older expositors maintained.

This heavenly kind of life in Christ, conceived as a present experience of salvation, is further confirmed and illustrated by what Jesus said of Himself as 'the bread of life' and the giver of the water that springs up into eternal life. We have, no doubt, the enigmatical words of profound mysticism in Jn 6<sup>25-28</sup>. Jesus declares that He is 'the bread of life,' which 'giveth life unto the world.' 'I am the living bread which came down out of heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever; yea, and the bread which I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world.' 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, ye have not life in yourselves. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life: and I will raise him up at the last day.' 'He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood abideth in me, and I in him.' 'He that eateth me shall live because of me.' 'He that eateth this bread shall live for ever.' These emphatic repetitions of statement would seem to put it beyond all question that their author meant to teach that the Son of God, sent by the living Father, 'lives because of the Father, and imparts the eternal life of the Father to every one who believes in Him. Of this living bread the believer now partakes, and 'hath eternal life' (vv. 47, 54). This life also is conceived as attaining a certain goal, or receiving a definite consummation 'at the last day.' For it is a permanent possession, and of a nature to advance from strength to strength and from glory to glory. The eating the flesh and drinking the blood of the Son of Man have been thought by some expositors to refer to the partaking of the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper; but such a reference to an institution not yet established, and utterly unknown to His Jewish opponents, would have been strangely irrelevant. The life eternal into which the believer enters involves, as matter of course, all due allowance for Divinely appointed conditions, aids, provisions and means of nourishing the life itself; but to exalt these unduly is to divert the thought from the more central and profound mystic conception of Christ Himself as the life of the world. So the remarkable sayings of Jesus in the synagogue at Capernaum, recorded in Jn 6<sup>28-29</sup>, are but another form and a mystic expression of His emphatic declaration in 5<sup>24</sup>. 'He that heareth my word, and believeth him that sent me, hath eternal life, and cometh not into judgment, but hath passed out of death into life.'

The exact meaning of the word 'eternal,' when used to qualify 'the life,' is best understood when the life is conceived as issuing from the eternal Father, and so partaking of His Divine nature (cf. 2 P 1<sup>4</sup>). Having life in Himself, and giving to His Son to have life in Himself (Jn 5<sup>26</sup>), He imparts the same life to all who believe in the Son; and that life is in its nature eternal as God Himself. It is an eternal kind of life which belongs to the unseen and imperishable things (cf. 2 Co 4<sup>9</sup>). In the Johannine writings the word 'life' or 'the life,' and the phrase 'eternal life,' are used interchangeably. The latter is the more frequent form of expression, but it is evident that the writer often employs 'the life' in the same sense. This life is spoken of in contrast with 'death' and 'perishing.' The believer 'shall not perish, but have eternal life' (3<sup>15</sup>), 'hath passed out of the death into the life' (5<sup>24</sup>), 'shall never see death,' nor 'taste of death' (8<sup>51, 52</sup>), 'shall never perish' (10<sup>28</sup>). He who has not the life is in a condition of spiritual death, and must perish unless he receive the life of God, the eternal kind of life, which has been manifested in Christ. In these and other similar passages life and death are not to be understood as identical in meaning with existence and non-existence. The person who has passed out of death into life had existence before the new life came, and such existence, in estrangement from God and in disobedience of the gospel, may be perpetuated in 'eternal destruction from the face of the Lord' (2 Th 1<sup>9</sup>). So the 'death,' which those who 'perish' taste, need not be understood as annihilation, or utter extinction of being. As 'the death' is a condition of moral and spiritual destitution in which one has no fellowship with God, so 'the life' is the blessed experience of fellowship and union with Christ as vital as that of the branch and the vine. And this participation in the very nature of the Eternal God is the essence of the 'life eternal.'

In the writings of St. Paul we also find a mystic element in which we note the concept of eternal life as a present possession. The exhortation to 'lay hold on the life eternal,' and the designation of it as 'the life which is life indeed' (3 Corin 3<sup>14</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>12, 13</sup>), may refer either to the present or the future; but when the Apostle speaks of believers as made alive and risen with Christ, and sitting with Him in the heavens (Eph 2<sup>5, 6</sup>), he implies a fruition that was already realized. It involved a positive experience like that in which 'the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus made him free from the law of sin and of death' (Ro 8<sup>2</sup>). He also has a wonderful appreciation of the heavenly illumination which 'shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ' (2 Co 4<sup>6</sup>). This surpassing light is conceived by the Apostle as a product of the Spirit of the Lord, and a reflexion of the glory of Christ as seen in the mirror of His gospel. In that mirror the believer beholds the glory of his Lord reflected, and by the power of the heavenly vision he is 'transformed into the same image' (2 Co 3<sup>17, 18</sup>). The Johannine doctrine of 'passing out of death into life' is conceived by St. Paul as a dying unto sin and being made alive unto God in Christ Jesus. The believer is 'alive from the dead' and 'walks in newness of life' (Ro 6<sup>1-13</sup>). He has been 'crucified with Christ: and it is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me; and that life which I now live in the flesh I live in faith, which is in the Son of God' (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>). And so in Pauline thought the spiritual life of faith, enjoyed in fellowship with God and Christ, is a 'life hid with Christ in God' (Col 3<sup>3</sup>), and 'the free gift of God' (Ro 6<sup>23</sup>). This conception is in essential harmony with the doctrine of St. John. Eternal life is in its inmost nature the free, pure, permanent spiritual life of Christlikeness. It is a present possession, a glorious reality, a steadfastness of conscious living fellowship with the Eternal Father, and with His Son, Jesus Christ.

But in all the Gospels and in the Epistles we also find eternal life contemplated as a future glorious inheritance of the saints. In St. John's Gospel the 'eternal life' which the believer now 'hath' is destined to attain a glorious consummation in the resurrection 'at the last day' (5<sup>40, 54</sup>). For Jesus is Himself the resurrection as well as the life, and declares: 'He that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die' (11<sup>25, 26</sup>). Such a life must needs abide in eternal permanence.

ETERNAL LIFE

Jesus spoke of 'the water of life' which becomes in him who drinks it 'a fountain of water springing up into eternal life' (4<sup>14</sup>). He spoke of food 'which abideth unto life eternal,' and of 'gathering fruit unto life eternal' (4<sup>36, 67</sup>). In all the Gospels He is represented as teaching that 'he that loveth [or findeth, so Synopt.] his soul loseth it; and he that hateth [or loseth] his soul in this world shall keep it unto life eternal.' We read in Mk 10<sup>29, 30</sup> 'There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, . . . or lands, for my sake and for the gospel's sake, but he shall receive a hundredfold now in this time, . . . and in the age to come life eternal' (cf. Mt 19<sup>29</sup> and Lk 18<sup>29, 30</sup>). These Gospels also speak of eternal life as an inheritance to be received at a future day (Mt 19<sup>13</sup>, Mk 10<sup>17</sup>, Lk 10<sup>28, 18</sup>). Such contrast of 'this time,' 'this world,' 'on the earth' with 'the age to come,' and 'in heaven,' implies possessions in some other age or world beyond the present. In the picture of the Judgment (Mt 25<sup>31-46</sup>), the righteous who go 'into eternal life' are said to 'inherit the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world,' and to enter into the joy and glory of the King Himself.

This idea of eternal life as a glorious future inheritance finds also frequent expression in the Epistles. Those who 'by patience in well-doing' seek for glory and honour and immortality shall receive eternal life as a reward of the righteous judgment of God (Ro 2<sup>7</sup>). All who are made free from sin and become servants of God 'have their fruit unto sanctification, and the end life eternal' (Ro 5<sup>21, 62</sup>). In the Epistle to the Hebrews (11<sup>14, 15</sup>) we read of 'them that shall inherit salvation,' and of them that 'receive the promise of the eternal inheritance.' In 1 P 1<sup>4</sup> the writer tells his readers that God has begotten them unto a living hope, 'unto an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved for them in heaven.' According to all these scriptures, eternal life is begotten in the Christian believer by the Holy Spirit of God, and is to be perpetuated through the ages of ages. It is eternal in quality as being a participation in the Divine nature of the Eternal One, and eternal in duration as continuing for ever and ever. It is a possession of manifold fullness, and is conditioned in a character of godlikeness, which 'has the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come' (1 Ti 4<sup>8</sup>). There can be no living this life apart from God, for it is begotten in the soul by a heavenly birth, and must be continually nourished by the Spirit of God. Such vital union with the eternal Spirit brings unspeakable blessedness in this life and in this world; but it is as permanent and abiding as the nature of God, and is therefore appropriately called an incorruptible inheritance. Each individual life, whose fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ' (1 Jn 1<sup>3</sup>), is conceived as continuing eternally in that heavenly fellowship. In this age and that which is to come, in this world and in any other, on the earth or in the heavens, the child of God abides in eternal life.

ETERNAL PUNISHMENT.—RV of Mt 25<sup>46</sup> (εις κολουσιον αιωνιον). The AV here and in 26 other passages has 'everlasting.' The adjective αιωνιος occurs 70 times in the NT (1 Ti 6<sup>13</sup> omitted in RV), and in the RV, with one exception (Philem<sup>12</sup>), is uniformly rendered 'eternal.' This is a distinct gain, as it leaves the exact significance to be determined by use. Three passages should be examined: 'Through times eternal' (Ro 16<sup>26</sup>); 'before times eternal' (2 Ti 1<sup>18</sup>, Tit 1<sup>13</sup>); in these uses it is clear that 'eternal' and 'everlasting' are not interchangeable. This agrees with the LXX, in which αιωνιος is used of the rites and ceremonies of Judaism which are done away in Christianity (Ex 12<sup>24</sup> 29<sup>28</sup> 40<sup>23</sup>, Nu 18<sup>10</sup> and others). The suggested use of 'aeonian' has failed to find approval notwithstanding its advantages, and 'age-long' is inept.

For NT thought the use of the term in the Fourth Gospel should be studied. Excluding parallel passages, 'eternal life' is found 21 times in the Gospels, and of these 17 are in John. In this Gospel, as also in 1 Jn., the notions of succession and duration are eliminated, and 'eternal' becomes almost synonymous with 'Divine.' 'It is not an endless duration of being in time, but being of which time is not a measure' (Westcott, see Additional note on 1 Jn 5<sup>20</sup>). See ETERNAL LIFE.

In the Synoptic Gospels, to 'enter into life' and to 'enter into the kingdom' are used interchangeably (cf. Mt 19<sup>16-17</sup> with 23, Mk 9<sup>45</sup> with 47, Mt 25<sup>34</sup> 'inherit the kingdom,' and v. 46 'unto eternal life'). In the Fourth Gospel 'eternal life' is the equivalent of 'the kingdom of heaven' of the Synoptic Gospels (cf. Jn 3<sup>3-5</sup>, where 'the kingdom of God' occurs, with v. 16). This suggests a very comprehensive and definite idea. 'Eternal life' is the life of the Kingdom of God, forgiveness, righteousness, salvation, blessing, whatever that life is declared to be in the teaching of Jesus. 'Eternal punishment' is the antithesis of 'eternal life,' the penalties upon all unrighteousness inseparably bound up with the Kingdom, and which, in His new teaching of the Kingdom, Jesus plainly sets forth. As a working principle, then, 'eternal' may be accepted as descriptive of things belonging to, essentially bound up with, the Kingdom, and is almost the equivalent of 'Messianic,' in the Christian, as opposed to the merely Jewish significance of the term, 'that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye may have life in his name' (Jn 20<sup>31</sup>). These deeper meanings of αιωνιος in the NT should serve to remove the question of the time element in future punishment from the unsatisfactory basis of mere verbal interpretations.

In collating the teaching of the Gospels, full emphasis must be given to the following postulates: 1. The certainty of retribution is inseparably bound up with the revelation of Jesus as to the will and character of God. The Father who 'seeth in secret' and rewards unobtrusive righteousness (Mt 6<sup>16</sup>) will render to the unrighteous the due reward of their deeds (Mt 7<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>28</sup> 12<sup>36</sup> 13<sup>18</sup> 18<sup>30</sup>, Lk 13<sup>17</sup> [parallel passages omitted throughout]). Hence the urgency of the call to repentance (Mt 4<sup>17</sup>), and to the obedience of righteousness as in the Sermon on the Mount, and, at any cost, to 'crucify the flesh' which prompts to sin (Mt 5<sup>26-29</sup> 18<sup>6-9</sup>). In this Jesus takes His stand with the prophets of old and with the last of their order, John the Baptist (cf. Lk 3<sup>7-14</sup>). The revelation of the all-perfect Father never weakens, but ever adds new emphasis to the call to a life of righteousness, and to the certainty of penalty for all unrighteousness.

2. The characteristic teaching of Jesus as to the penalties of sin is bound up with His gospel of the Kingdom.—The incomparable worth of the Kingdom, as the richest 'treasure,' and 'pearl of great price' (Mt 13<sup>44-46</sup>), and the supreme quest of it as the first duty and sovereign wisdom of life (Mt 6<sup>33</sup>), have, as their converse, the incomparable loss which the rejection of the gospel must inevitably entail. This is the supreme penalty—exclusion from the Kingdom, to be cast into the 'outer darkness' (Mt 8<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>13</sup> 25<sup>30</sup>), denied by the Lord (Mt 7<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>33</sup> 25<sup>12</sup>, Lk 13<sup>28-29</sup>), shut out from the glad presence of the King (Mt 25<sup>1</sup>). The use of the figures 'weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth' in the sentence of exclusion clearly indicates that remorse is one element in future retribution (cf. Lk 16<sup>27</sup> 'Son, remember').

3. The hearing of the gospel adds to human responsibility, and increases the severity of the inevitable penalty of disobedience.—This is the burden of much of the teaching of Jesus. Light is come into the world, and with the light a more solemn duty (Jn 3<sup>19</sup> 9<sup>41</sup> 15<sup>22-24</sup> 16<sup>9</sup>, Lk 12<sup>47-49</sup>). It is the apostate disciple who, as salt which has lost its savour, is cast out (Mt 5<sup>13</sup>). To His disciples Jesus gives the warnings of God's searching judgment (Mt 5<sup>22</sup>). To those who call Him 'Lord, Lord,' and in His name have done 'many mighty works,' He utters the dread 'Depart' (Mt 7<sup>21-23</sup>, cf. Lk 13<sup>27-28</sup>). It is the disobedient hearers of His word who are compared to a foolish builder whose house, built upon sand, is ruined by the storm (Mt 7<sup>26-27</sup>). Those who deny Him, He also will deny (Mt 10<sup>33</sup>); those who are ashamed of Him, of them will He be ashamed (Mk 8<sup>38</sup>). It is the unfaithful servant (Mt 24<sup>48-51</sup>), the unwatchful (Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>), the unprofitable (Mt 25<sup>14</sup>), who are cast out of the Kingdom. It is the unfruitful branch of the vine that is cut forth, withered, gathered, cast into the fire, burned (Jn 15<sup>6</sup>). The final condition of hopeless doom, the state of 'eternal sin,' is the direct result of self-willed, deliberate resistance to the Divine grace (Mk 3<sup>29</sup>; see ETERNAL SIN). And in the larger issues the severity of judgment falls upon cities and generations 'exalted to heaven in privilege and opportunity, but doomed because of neglect' (Mt 11<sup>20-24</sup> 12<sup>41-42</sup>).

In all this there is no reference to those to whom the gospel has not been made known. The mention of the Cities of the Plain (Mt 10<sup>15</sup>) and that of the men of Nineveh (Mt 12<sup>41</sup>) are too incidental and indirect to yield any determining principle. Even the great Judgment passage (Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>), if indeed it is to be interpreted universally as including all the nations of the earth, may be interpreted also as assuming a corresponding universality of knowledge, the gospel preached throughout the whole world. The judgments Jesus announces are vitally bound up with the message He brings. The problem of those to whom the offers of grace have not been made is not considered, and we are not justified in applying to them the severities of penalty and dread doom which, in the teaching of Jesus, fall only upon those who deny Him and reject His gospel.

4. The final triumph of the Kingdom, and consequent final separation of the righteous and the wicked.—This is again and again solemnly asserted and described. In the parables of the Tares (Mt 13<sup>24-30</sup>) and the Drag-net (Mt 13<sup>47-50</sup>), the ultimate overthrow, and, as the terms used would seem to imply, the final destruction of evil are decisively declared. From the explanation of the parable it is clear that the wheat and the tares represent persons—'the sons of the kingdom' and 'the sons of the evil one.' This sharp division of men into two classes entirely distinct is to human vision impossible. The facts of life show the presence of 'wheat and tares,' good and evil in every man. The difficulty is unresolved. The end is declared, but not the stages by which it is reached. The Kingdom is to be all righteousness, out of it is to be gathered 'all things that cause stumbling, and them that do iniquity' (Mt 18<sup>6</sup>). Every plant not planted by the Father is to be uprooted (Mt 15<sup>23</sup>), and every tree which beareth not good fruit is to be cut down and destroyed (Mt 7<sup>19</sup>).

So far there can be little hesitation in setting forth the teaching of Jesus. The difficulties arise when we seek to determine exactly the nature and duration of the penalties and of the doom. The difficulty is accentuated by the fact that Jesus uses freely the religious symbolism current at the time. Gehenna, the worm that dies not and the fire that is not quenched, the outer darkness, the weeping and the wailing and the gnashing of teeth, were familiar figures, and are clearly used because familiar (see ETERNAL FIRE). If, then, we ask how far Jesus gave His sanction to the popular notions behind the symbols, we are confronted with the difficulty of determining what those notions were. The use of these figures to describe the place of punishment in the world of spirits is admitted, but it is not so clear which of the three doctrines which have divided Christian thought—endless punishment, annihilation, restoration—was held. Support has been found for each opinion, and from the words of Jesus Himself quite opposite conclusions have been reached. In what has been said above, finality would seem to be taught, but other opinions are held.

(1) Especially the great sayings in which the note of the universality of grace rings so clear (Jn 3<sup>16, 17</sup>), and the persistent search of the lost (Lk 15<sup>4-8</sup>) and the all-embracing work of Jesus are so absolutely declared (Jn 1<sup>9</sup>, 12<sup>31-32</sup>), have been dwelt upon as justifying 'the larger hope.' The exact award of penalty, the few and many stripes according to the measure of disobedience (Lk 12<sup>47-48</sup>), the completed sentence implied in 'till thou have paid the last farthing' (Mt 5<sup>26</sup>, cf. 18<sup>24, 32</sup>), the startling symbolism of the phrase 'salted with fire' (Mk 9<sup>49</sup>), which is said to teach 'that the destructive element performs a purifying part' (see Internat. Crit. Com., 'Mark' in loco), the use of κόλασις, pruning, 'punishment' (see Expos. Gr. Test. on Mt 25<sup>46</sup>), and the use of αἰώνιος as suggesting 'age-long,' have all been singled out as leaving room for the hope of final salvation through the fires of judgment.

The exact balance of the awards 'eternal life' and 'eternal punishment' (Mt 25<sup>46</sup>) has often been insisted upon as teaching finality. As the life is certainly endless, so, it is urged, must the punishment be. But even this is not conclusive. The terms 'life' and 'punishment' point to an essential difference. Life is of God, essentially Divine; punishment is from God, a Divine act. It is well also to bear in mind that 'if good ever should come to an end, that would come to an end which Christ died to bring in; but if evil comes to an end, that comes to an end which He died to destroy' (Clemence, Future Punishment, p. 65).

But more than upon single texts, reliance is placed upon the revealed character and purpose of God in Jesus Christ.

(2) On the other hand, the strong terms, destruction, perdition, unquenchable fire, and the analogies of consumption of tares and chaff and withered branches by fire, are instanced as indicating annihilation. Two sayings of Jesus are indeed terrible in their severity, and ought not to be minimized: 'Be not afraid of them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell' (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>). Whether the reference be to God as the object of fear (so Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, i. 201, and most commentators) or 'the tempter' and 'the devil whose agent he is' (so Bruce, Expos. Gr. Test. in loco), the statement as to the destruction of the soul itself remains. The same thought is suggested by the figure used in the saying, 'He that falleth on this stone shall be broken to pieces; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will scatter him as dust' (Mt 21<sup>4</sup>). Were utter extinction of being to be taught, it could hardly be in plainer terms.

(3) In close association, and lending support to the theory of annihilation, is the doctrine of 'conditional immortality' or 'life in Christ.' According to this theory the object of revelation is 'to change man's nature, not only from sin to holiness, but from mortality to immortality.' Many sayings in the Fourth Gospel are pressed to support this theory, especially those where the gift of life is declared to be only through the Son, and to those only who abide in Him by faith (Jn 3<sup>15, 16</sup>, 36<sup>28-29</sup>).

It is this evident and apparently 'insoluble antinomy' which has led many to conclude 'that we have not the elements of a complete solution, and we ought not to attempt it. What visions beyond there may be, what larger hopes, what ultimate harmonies, if such there are in store, will come in God's good time; it is not ours to anticipate them, or lift the veil where God has left it drawn' (Orr, The Christian View of God and the World, 397). This conclusion, so far at least as the Gospels are concerned, may be accepted. In the teaching of Jesus the emphasis is always upon present opportunity, duty, responsibility. 'One said unto him, Lord, are they few that be saved? And he said unto them, Strive to enter in by the narrow door' (Lk 13<sup>24</sup>). 'Walk while ye have the light, that darkness overtake you not. While ye have the light, believe on the light, that ye may become sons of light' (Jn 12<sup>35, 36</sup>). God's eternal grace and man's 'boundless power of resistance' stand over against each other. Jesus honours both, but nowhere in His reported sayings does He disclose the final issue.

The teaching of the Epistles does not come within the scope of this article, but this brief reference is necessary. To the present writer, at least, it does appear that St. Paul's faith reaches a final issue. By him an endless dualism is decisively rejected. 'That God may be all in all' (1 Co 15<sup>28</sup>) is the final goal; but what that includes, or how accomplished, is not declared; only of Christ it is said, and we may hold this faith confidently, 'He must reign till he hath put all his enemies under his feet.'

ETERNAL SIN.—The RV of Mk 3<sup>29</sup> (αἰώνιος ἀναστροφή, so NBI; C<sup>1</sup> vs D read ἀναστρίαι); AV 'eternal damnation' (αἰώνιος, so AC<sup>2</sup>), 'a strong translation of an incorrect text' (Morison). It is not surprising that the latter explanation of a difficult word (ἀνάστροφαι) should have found its way into the text of some later MSS. As an explanation of the correct text, 'eternal judgment'—or, as the judgment is clearly adverse, 'eternal condemnation'—is not without force. It has the merit of emphasizing the essential matter, which any interpretation, to be adequate, must take into account; that an 'eternal sin' is a sin which 'hath never forgiveness.' But this early gloss is inadequate. There is more than the emphasis of repetition. It is not the penalty of the sin, but its nature, which is declared; not the mere duration of the sin or of the sinning, but the guilt; not eternally sinning, but an eternal sin.

That sin tends to propagate itself is witnessed to by experience, and that continuance in sinning must exclude forgiveness is an essential principle of all moral judgment. Sin and penalty are of necessity coterminous. But unforgiven because unrepented of is true of all sin, and is no adequate explanation of an 'eternal sin' which carries the judgment 'unforgivable.' The absoluteness of the sentence is already declared in the words 'hath never forgiveness'; it is the ultimate ground of this judgment which is further declared.

'Eternal sin' finds its contrast and opposite in 'eternal life,' which is not simply or characteristically endless life, but essential, perfect life, 'the life which is life indeed' (1 Ti 6:12 RV), the life of the Kingdom of God (cf. Mk 9:24-25 and Jn 3:1-5), the life of God (1 Jn 1:2 RV). So 'eternal sin' is more than 'sin eternally repeating itself,' it is a fixed state of sin, sin which has become character, nature, moral death, which is death indeed. But see art. BLASPHEMY, p. 209<sup>b</sup>. This is the final revolt of man, free will carried to its ultimate in the defiance of God, a final condition, hopeless and beyond recovery, beyond the reach even of Divine illumination and influence. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews certainly contemplates in 6:4-6 the possibility of such fatal apostasy, cf. also 1 Jn 5:16 'sin unto death' (see Westcott, ad loc.); but neither of these passages appears to the present writer to afford help here.

Two questions must be distinguished — the actuality and the possibility of this state of moral depravity. That the grace of God should prove unavailing is indeed hard to believe, and by many the thought is rejected utterly. Yet there is much in the teaching of Jesus and in human life to justify the fear that this possibility may become an actual fact. The hardening of the heart which follows all unfaithfulness is the witness in human life to what must inevitably result if unfaithfulness is persisted in, a fixed state of spiritual blindness and insensibility. There is a law of degeneration in the moral world as in the natural. But it is in the Scripture doctrine of sin that the full ground of this fear is seen. According to the teaching of Jesus, the measure of responsibility is 'the light that is in thee' (Mt 6:23), and sin is wilful disregard of the light of truth. To be blind is to be without sin; but to those who say 'we see,' and yet walk in darkness, 'sin remaineth' (Jn 9:4). So every increase of light brings increased responsibility (Jn 3:15<sup>b</sup>), and for self-willed deliberate refusal of the Divine grace, refusal not in ignorance or misunderstanding but with full consciousness and choice of will so that the will itself becomes identified with evil, there can only be judgment, not because the Divine compassions fail, but because the redemption, as the Redeemer, is despised and rejected of men. In the final issue the free will of man is valid even against the beseechings of God (Jn 5:40, Mt 23:37).

The doom of the finally impenitent is here negatively told: 'hath never forgiveness'; but that includes the uttermost penalty, exclusion from the Kingdom of the Father, loss of the 'eternal life.' This is sin's last stage and uttermost working; it cuts the soul off from God, its source and life. 'Sin, when it is full grown, bringeth forth death' (Ja 1:12). See, further, art. SIN.

ETERNITY.—There is no word either in OT Hebrew or in NT Greek corresponding to the abstract idea of eternity.

In Is 67:16 both AV and RV have the phrase 'the high and lofty One that dwelleth eternally.' MT has 'עליון' lit. 'dwelling for ever'—the thought of the writer being evidently the unchangeableness of God. 'עליון' probably comes nearest of all Hebrew words to express permanence. Originally it was a substantivized participle of the verb 'על', meaning 'to pass', 'to pass time,' 'the present.' But in OT it is used adverbially to express indefinite duration of time generally in the future. Its use is mainly poetical: of God (Is 67:16), His law (Ps 119), His attributes (113:10). But it is found also in connexion with things whose existence in Hebrew thought would be limited, e.g. a king's life (Ps 21:5, Pr 23:4), the lip of truth (Pr 12:19).

A word of wider meaning and more general application is 'עולם', connected with Assyrian ullanu, meaning 'remote time.' 'עולם' is frequently used of the past-days (Is 65:11, Mic 6:7 etc.), people (Is 44:7, Jer 23:14), hills (Gn 49:10, Hab 9:9). It is also used, like 'עליון', of God or His attributes as existing from the remote past (Ps 93:2, 119:92, Is 63:16-19), to the remote future (Ps 138:8, Jer 31:4, 1 K 10:9), especially in the phrase 'עולם ועד' 'from everlasting to everlasting' (Ps 90:2, 103:17, Nah 9:6 etc.). But in the case of 'עולם' also there are many places in OT where its meaning is obviously limited to the affairs and lives of human beings, e.g. of a slave (Dt 15:17, 1 S 27:12), of careless dwellers (Ps 73:12), and in the familiar phrase, 'May the king live for ever' (1 K 1:17, Neh 2:1). Often, however, the word is used to indicate the writer's hope or belief that a certain state of good (e.g. God's covenant (Gn 49:9), or His promises (Is 49:6), or His relations to His people (Ps 45:18, etc.)), may continue indefinitely. Particular is this true of the Messianic hope (Is 9:5, Ps 110:4-5). Sometimes this thought of permanence is emphasized by the use of the plural (Is 26:4, 45:17, Dn 9:2). In Ec 3:1, a very difficult passage, RVm gives as an alternative rendering of 'עולם' 'eternity.'

The other Hebrew phrases worthy of note are 'עלמית' 'perpetuity' in the frequent phrase 'עלמית' 'for ever' (Is 13:20, 25:8, Am 8:7, Hab 1:4 etc.), and 'עלמית' 'length of days,' Dt 32:3, Job 12:12, Ps 21:4, and in the well-known passage Ps 23:6 'I shall dwell in the house of the Lord for ever.' Here the meaning is disputed, but the probability is that the highest anticipation of the Psalmist was to have the joy of spending an indefinite period in the Temple in prayer and meditation. Similar to 'עולם' is the phrase 'עליון' lit. 'to age and age,' i.e. to future ages (Ec 3:15, Ps 106:23<sup>11</sup> 49:1). It is mainly poetical.

The idea of eternity, like the idea of immortality, was probably beyond the range of early Jewish thought. It arose after the Exile, partly through a natural development of the Hebrew conception of God, and partly through the force of circumstances.

(1) The pious Jew, turning away more and more from the anthropomorphism of cruder religions, strove to differentiate the infinite God from finite man. God is transcendent—above the limitations of earthly existence. Hence He is eternal, from everlasting to everlasting. A thousand years in His sight are but as yesterday. (2) With the Exile came a decay of national ideals, and the Jew began to consider more his own personality and its relation to this eternal God. This thought developed slowly, and was mixed with various elements. The Jew found himself in an evil world. His own nation was oppressed, almost blotted out. Good men suffered; wicked men seemed to prosper. If the eternal, omnipotent God ruled the world, then all this must surely end. The Day of the Lord would come for oppressed Israel, for the oppressors, for the whole world, and (in Apocalyptic literature, Ps-Sol 3:10, 13<sup>b</sup> etc.) for the Jew himself. Then the present evil world (העולם הזה) would give place to a new and glorious era (העולם הבא), see GENERATION. Whether this עולם הבא would be endless the Jew did not at first stop to inquire. Sufficient for him that it would come with countless blessings in 'the end of the days' (עֵת הַיְּמֵי קֵץ, cf. Mt 13:39, 24). In the Book of Enoch, however, 'Time' is followed by 'Eternity' in the עולם הבא. Later Judaism developed the idea, probably borrowed from the Zoroastrian religion, of a series of world epochs (cf. the world empires of Daniel's vision), followed by the Messianic age.

In the time of Christ, Jewish thought on the future had developed very much, and had assumed many forms (see ESCHATOLOGY). Jesus must have sifted the various elements. He retained and perhaps developed the view of a new age (αἰὼν ἐπὶ αἰὼν) about to dawn on the world as opposed to the present (ἡρᾶ ἐπὶ ἡρᾶ; Mt. 13<sup>32</sup> cf. 13<sup>35</sup> 28<sup>20</sup>). Then 'the kingdom of heaven' (ἐν οὐρανῷ βασιλεία) would be established. Jesus endeavoured to concentrate the thoughts of His hearers on their personal relation to this kingdom, and the desirability of sharing it (see LIFE, ETERNAL LIFE). Doubtless this kingdom would be for ever and its members live for ever (cf. Dn. 12<sup>2</sup> ἐπιβίωσιν 'eternal life'). The vexed question of the absolute endlessness of this kingdom, with its rewards and punishments, would probably never be raised in the minds of Jesus' hearers. At the same time, there is no evidence in the teaching of Jesus of any limit to the αἰὼν ἐπὶ αἰὼν, and while the frequent adjective αἰώνιος, 'eternal,' must be taken in the Gospels as referring in the first place to this coming kingdom, it may, so far as we know, be taken as implying also that quality of absolute permanence with which that kingdom has always been associated in the minds of men.

LITERATURE.—The subject is practically part of the larger topic Eschatology, and all books dealing with this latter subject refer more or less to Eternity. ETHICS.—A very little reflexion will reveal the unusual difficulties that lurk in a subject like the present—the Ethics of Jesus, or, of the Gospels. Even the uninitiated is aware that we cannot in strictness speak of the 'Ethics' of Jesus at all—in the sense, that is, of a doctrine systematically developed according to principles, and exhaustively applied to the facts of life. For His was no scientific or methodical spirit; His significance lies rather in the realm of personality, in the unique quality of His moral feeling and judgment, in the peculiar way in which men and things moved Him, and in which He reacted upon them. Hence we need not look for either an orderly arrangement of, or even an approximate completeness in, His ethical ideas. From the drama of His life we are unable to compile a system of morals, but we may see how a great Personality creates a moral standard by what He does and suffers, and how He elucidates it in His words.

But are we justified in connecting with Him the term 'ethical' at all? We speak accurately of Ethics or Moral Science only when we regard the conduct of men in their mutual relations as something by itself, abstracted from religious feeling and action, and when ethical ends and maxims are disengaged from religion, in virtue of their inherent worth; and such an independent position of Ethics, whether it appear worth attaining or not, is simply beside the mark in the case of Jesus. His moral and His religious principles are so closely interwoven, His moral feeling, e.g. His love for man, is so inseparable from the religious basis of His belief in the Fatherhood of God, that it would seem to be impossible to delineate His 'Ethics' without at the same time treating of, say, the Kingdom of God, the Divine grace, or the final judgment. And if, nevertheless, we venture upon the task, we must never lose sight of the connecting lines that run between His ethical teaching and His religious principles.

Then there is the question whether our sources are at all sufficient for the full and accurate representation of the moral personality of Jesus. In restricting ourselves to the Synoptic Gospels, we are doing nothing more than recognizing the claims of historical science. But now, to what extent can we regard the three older Gospels as adequate sources for our theme? If we investigate the oldest of all, viz. Mark, we find that it nowhere makes any attempt to portray the Ethics of Jesus as such. In reporting His conflict and controversy with the Judaism of His time, it casts but an indirect light upon this side of His character, and that, moreover, in a series of isolated scenes. Of these the most outstanding are the Rabbinical disputations regarding the Sabbath (2<sup>27-31</sup>), purity (7<sup>1-23</sup>), divorce (10<sup>1-12</sup>); then come the important passages narrating the conversation with the rich man (10<sup>17-27</sup>) and regarding the 'first commandment' (12<sup>28-34</sup>). Various other aspects of His conception of life are vividly illustrated by such utterances as that to the paralytic (2<sup>24</sup>), about the physician and the sick (2<sup>17</sup>), the true kinship (3<sup>35</sup>), children (10<sup>26</sup>), and tribute-money (12<sup>13-17</sup>). In the section dominated by the three predictions of His death (8<sup>27-10<sup>40</sup></sup>) we have a mass of admonitions to the disciples—concerning readiness to suffer, loyalty, courage, humility, reverence for childhood, etc. We have here something of the nature of a primitive Christian catechism; not instructions (as in the Didache, let us say) for tranquil seasons and everyday life, but rather articles of war for the ecclesia militans of the persecutions, a manuale crucis.*

An entirely different kind of appeal is made by the Sermon on the Mount in Mt. 5-7. In its extant form the Sermon is the promulgation of a great programme, in which the Evangelist seeks to give a definitive and approximately complete statement of Jesus' relation to the Law, with a reference, moreover, to the representatives of the anti-legalistic standpoint, who think that He is come 'to destroy the law.' It is the purpose of the writer to convince these that Jesus, being in a general way the Fulfiller of Prophecy, is, as a lawgiver, the fulfiller of the prophecy regarding the second Moses, whom God was to raise up in the last days (Dt. 18<sup>15</sup>), and who, so far from abrogating the Law, will rather consummate and even transcend it.† In our reading of the Sermon we cannot afford to ignore this design of the writer; we must draw a distinction between what its words purported to him, and what they meant in the tradition he utilized. Similarly, in reading St. Luke's version of the Sermon on the Mount, we must bear in mind that he has materially abridged his material, not alone by discarding the Jewish and preserving only the typically human elements, but by considerably transforming it under the influence of his pronounced ascetic view.‡ Both Mt. and Lk. thus throw us back upon the source of our Lord's words, in which the primitive Jewish-Christian community had grouped the Logia of Jesus for its own instruction. Hence we are forced to distinguish between the Ethics of the Evangelists and the Ethics of their source. Further, we must make a searching examination of the characteristically Lukan tradition as it appears in the parables of the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Good Samaritan, etc.; § only so shall we be justified in attempting to answer the question, What was the ethical position of Jesus? An extremely complicated critical process must thus be gone through before we use our present authorities as documents for the solution of our problem. But as it is impossible to reproduce here the details of such investigation, only the results can be stated, with references to other works of the present writer.

In an account of the Ethics of Jesus, the reader also looks for a comparison and contrast between Him and His Jewish, perhaps also His Greco-Roman, contemporaries. The fresh and original elements in His moral thought and feeling must be set over against traditional views. The favourite procedure in this connexion, that, namely, of placing His luminous figure on a background as sombre as possible, is one we cannot follow. Above all, the task of describing the ethical conditions of contemporary Judaism would take us beyond our allotted space, and is, moreover, beyond our capacity. Often as it has been tried, in more or less ingenious sketches, to reproduce some cross-section through the moral conditions of later Judaism, it has never been accomplished without subjective caprice and violent tendency-interpretations. Nor is this result to be wondered at; for it is quite impossible to describe faithfully, or estimate justly, the characteristic ethical complexion of a period so extensive as the two and a half centuries from B.C. 180 to A.D. 70, of the inner history of which we still know so little, which is represented by a literature so multiform, and of which the dominant currents veered so much—a period, moreover, meagrely equipped with first-rate or distinctly recognizable personalities. True, we can observe the behaviour of the circles from which sprang the Psalms of Solomon, we can lay our hand upon the devout breast of the pseudo-Ezra, we can enter into the spirit of the author of I Maccabees or Sirach; but how diverse are even these few casual types, and how impossible is it to make them fit into one harmonious picture! What, again, do we know of the Ethics of the Greek or Sadducean party? What vogue had the Essenes among the people? Are the Pharisees of the Psalms of Solomon identical with those of the time of Jesus? And, above all, what significance for our problem has the Talmud, so often named, so little known? Here, in sober truth, so many unsolved enigmas await the historian, that one cannot but marvel at the assurance of those who, in face of them all, are ready to sketch the Ethics of later Judaism as a foil for the Ethics of Jesus. We for our part renounce any such design. We have not the daring to institute a comparison between the Ethics of Jesus and the complicated historical phenomena of the period, and then, as impartial judges, to proceed to measure out the light and shade. We content ourselves with the question, How did Jesus regard and estimate the Judaism of His time? It is beyond doubt that His moral sense was chafed by many things, and in particular by Pharisaism, and that a material part of His teaching was formulated in antagonism to the Rabbis. We too must feel this antagonism, if we are ever to understand Him.

If, again, we are required to answer the question as to wherein consists the new and original element in the Ethics of Jesus, we are brought to a complete standstill. In His conflict with Rabbinism He is in close alliance with the Prophets, and is certainly not outside their influence. But to assume that a great gulf is fixed between the religion of the Prophets and Psalmists and that of later Judaism, is to forget that a goodly part of both the Prophets and the Psalms was a contribution of the post-exilic period, and, above all, to overlook the fact that these writings form the background, or, we might even say, the native soil of Judaism. However profoundly they were misunderstood, still it was not possible to prevent the intermittent welling up, from the soil, of many a copious spring; and many a document of the later period bears clear testimony to their influence. Thus we can do full justice to the moral creed of Jesus only by giving adequate consideration to the circumstance that He lived in intimate sympathy and steadfast accord with the noblest and devoutest thoughts of His people's Bible. Hence, if in view of these facts we inquire concerning the originality of Jesus, the result will be a surprise. For we shall find that of almost all His ethical ideas there are anticipations, precedents, and even parallels in the OT, as also in contemporary Judaism. A mere glance at any collection of parallels, such as that of Wetstein, will be sufficient to purge us of the notion that the uniqueness or greatness of Jesus consists in the novelty of His ethical teaching. Theology is still tainted with the propensity, inherited from Rationalism, to see in the production of ideas the all but exclusive factor in the making of history or the progress of man. It often fails to realize how plentiful ideas are in times that are spiritually alive, or how in all ages humanity has been enabled to take a step in advance only by the emergence of a personality who, with unwonted energy, sincerity, and enthusiasm, absorbed, elaborated, and formed anew from his individual experience the choicest products of his age. So with Jesus; His ideas as such are neither so novel nor so revolutionary as to create a new world; they derive their procreative virtue solely from the fact that He made them His own, lived them, and died for them.

From these preliminaries we turn to the exposition proper, premising that we shall on principle forego any systematic or exhaustive development of the material from a fundamental idea. Our purpose is to survey the figure of Jesus in its specific operation, and what better situation for this can we find than the actual scene of His conflict with His environment? It was the friction with that environment which kindled the fire within Him; it was His unconformity with it that gave Him the conviction of His peculiar heritage. Just as His anger at the profanation of the Temple moved Him to an involuntary display of a religious feeling superior to, and more delicate than, that of His fellows, so His collision with the leading representatives of Judaism evokes from Him not merely an indignant criticism, but also a manifestation of His own inherent character. In this connexion the great discourse against the Scribes and Pharisees in Mt 23 (cf. Lk 11<sup>29-32</sup>) furnishes invaluable testimony. Even if its artificial form (cf. the seven Woes) be derivative, still the majority of the sayings grouped in it, so expressive of individual feeling, so original in form, unmistakably show the characteristic touch of Jesus. In any case the discourse clearly reveals the distinction He drew between Himself and the Rabbis, and the traits in the latter by which the disciples, filled with His spirit, felt themselves repelled. It is, above all things, the insincerity of their practice, the contrast between the reality and the appearance, which is so vividly brought out in the metaphor of 'whited sepulchres' (23<sup>27</sup>). The supreme business of the scribes,—to which they apparently devoted themselves with surpassing zeal,—viz. the instruction of the people in the law of God (23<sup>1</sup>), they discharged in such a way as to superinduce the very reverse of what was intended: instead of bringing men into the Kingdom (23<sup>13</sup>) they keep them out by imposing intolerable burdens, in the bearing of which they render not the slightest help. It is, in fact, evident that the work of leading men to God was for them a matter of no consequence whatever. A glaring light is thrown likewise upon the propaganda of the Pharisees (23<sup>15</sup>): under their tutelage a proselyte becomes a child of hell, twice as wicked as themselves (or, as it was probably spoken at first, twice as wicked as he was before). These severe verdicts show at a glance how highly Jesus estimated the sacred and responsible office of the leaders of the people, which they so direly abused. With keen moral indignation He passes sentence upon the complacent and self-seeking father-confessors, who, on the pretext of pastoral zeal, with 'long prayers' devour widows' houses (Mk 12<sup>40</sup>). He shows inimitably the unscrupulousness of their over-scrupulosity: straining out gnats and swallowing camels, they are squeamish and strait-laced in regard to trifles, in the great moral matters lax for themselves and lenient to others, even to the point of apathy—and such has ever since been the practice of a hierarchy clothed with authority (23<sup>34</sup>). In these utterances Jesus reproves chiefly the scribes' insensibility to the primary moral sanctions; they keep cup and platter clean, but are indifferent to the nature of the contents: non olet, even though it has been accumulated by selfishness and greed, and is gorged with unbridled self-indulgence (23<sup>35</sup>). While with painful precision they attend to the tithing of the meaneast garden produce, they neglect the weightiest matters of the Law—justice, mercy, and faithfulness (23<sup>36</sup>). In harmony with Mic<sup>6</sup> He enunciates the principle that the primary imperatives of morality surpass all ceremonial prescriptions in importance and urgency—a truth which, though ancient, needs ever to be emphasized anew. There can be no dubiety as to the purport of 'justice' or 'mercy' in this passage; they are meant to cover the great social obligations of the ruling to the dependent classes—the non-perversion of the Law, the succour of widows and orphans, the relief of the poor. As to the third injunction, the Evangelists do not seem to have been sure of its meaning; for 'faithfulness' St. Luke (11<sup>42</sup>) substitutes the 'love of God,' probably interpreting pietas as 'faith' (as EV). Without doubt, however, Jesus intends this word also to connote a social and moral duty, viz. trustworthiness and candour in human relationships.

Mk. has in this verse inserted a clause (23<sup>37</sup>) which should almost certainly be deleted from Lk. (11<sup>42</sup>), as a gloss involving a certain modification of the command. The preceding verses might lead us to infer that Jesus did not only set less store by the ceremonial law, but was willing to do away with it altogether. This, however, says St. Matthew, is not His meaning: 'These (moral duties) ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone.' The Evangelist is, in fact, keenly solicitous lest Jesus be regarded as hostile to the Mosaic law, as he shows also in 5<sup>17</sup> and the prefatory words 23<sup>37</sup> (neither passage in Lk.), implying that the teaching of the scribes is good, but that their works are evil, since they do not practise what they preach. Taking into consideration the writer's date and point of view, we can quite well understand the words; but we naturally ask whether this conciliatory and conservative attitude towards the ceremonial law truly represents the mind of Jesus? The words about the cleansing of cups and platters, and about the tithing of mint, anise, and cummin, certainly sound so contemptuous as to compel us to ask whether Jesus set any value whatever upon the ceremonial side of the Law, and, in particular, upon the special casuistical precepts of the scribes. The question may be answered provisionally and generally: Jesus was not a Pharisee, and this means that His attitude towards many of the scribal maxims was a dissenting one; He was not a Judean, but a son of the Galilean peasantry, who knew how to evade the authority of Pharisaic doctors and lawyers, and who were, in consequence, liable to the curse merited by those who 'know not the law' (Jn 7<sup>49</sup>); and, accordingly, He regards Himself and His followers likewise as above the Pharisees' rules about purifying. But we also find explicit remonstrances against the 'traditions of the elders' so dear to the scribes (Mk 7<sup>8, 12</sup>); He characterizes them summarily as the 'prescriptions' (EV 'tradition') of men (7<sup>9</sup>), thus contrasting them with the commandments of God. In this He evinces His independent attitude, for a genuine Pharisee could live only by the belief that the additions to and amplifications of the Law, even if devised by human teachers, were yet expressive of God's will. But Jesus goes still further, affirming positively that in their concern for these traditions the scribes reject, pervert, and even make void the commandment of God (7<sup>13</sup>). He gives as an example the gross case of one who evades the plain human duty of supporting his parents by the manoeuvre of dedicating to the Temple the money he might have spared for them: once the fateful word 'Corban' is spoken, then every penny so consecrated belongs to God, and is, as sacred property, interdicted from all secular uses, and so from that of the parents. It is bad enough that a son should so act; but that jurists and theologians should permit him henceforward to turn his back upon father and mother, should declare his pledge to be inviolable, and refuse to 'release' him from it, is neither more nor less than the dismantling of the Fifth Commandment.*

Now the assertion that the great moral demands of God's law are of more importance than any ceremonial obligations, is primarily directed only against the traditions and prescriptions of the Rabbis; in reality, however, it is a principle which threatens the very foundation of the Mosaic system. Already in the OT we see the strained relations between prophetic piety and priestly legality—brothers again and again at variance. In the personality and preaching of Jesus the prophetic religion reappears with unparalleled force and clearness, and braces itself to the work of overthrowing the fabric of Levitical ceremonialism. To treat the ethical and the ritual law as of equal validity belongs to the very nature of the priestly theocracy: the moment the former is placed on a higher level the whole edifice becomes insecure. In this reference St. Mark preserves a short but pregnant saying of Jesus (7<sup>13</sup>), viz. 'There is nothing from without the man that going into him can defile him, but the things which proceed out of the man are those which defile him.' As He is here speaking of clean and unclean meats, He says, 'Nothing going into the man,' but He might equally well say, and certainly means, 'Nothing from without the man coming to him,' i.e. coming into contact with him. But this is the reverse of what stands in the Law. For the whole complex of the Mosaic-Levitical legislation rests upon the postulate that a man is defiled by outer contact and contamination, or by partaking of certain foods, i.e. that he thereby becomes separated from God, is excluded from the sanctuary and segregated from the sacred community. Now the principle enunciated by Jesus cuts the ground from under all the particular commandments of the ceremonial law. It carries, indeed, a dissolving and explosive force. But His standpoint differs from mere rationalistic 'illumism' by having a profoundly religious basis. Jesus had so intense a conception of man's relation to God as an ethical one, that He could not tolerate the thought that God would exclude any one from His presence merely because he had touched a corpse or eaten swine's flesh. It is the evil will, the impure heart, the false nature, that separate men from God.

All this, of course, is self-evident to us: but when Jesus uttered it, and acted upon it, He found Himself at cross purposes with the most exemplary personages of His generation, and compelled to resist the drift of an age-long tradition. He raised His voice not only against the scribes, but against the very spirit of the Law they expounded. Moreover, in actual practice, His bearing towards the Law is quite unconstrained. He adds to the exceptions already conceded by the Rabbis (e.g. works of necessity on the Sabbath), and allows both Himself and His disciples a certain freedom, without taking counsel of the specialists. When challenged, He appeals to the example of David (Mk 2<sup>23-24</sup>). It is manifestly gratifying to the narrator that Jesus was able to justify His action so adroitly by the methods of Rabbinical exposition. But this is only an ex post facto justification, of which the disciples certainly were not thinking as they plucked the corn; they had acted without deliberation, simply availing themselves of the freedom which their fellowship with Jesus had made a matter of course. We learn the true meaning of Jesus from the twofold declaration subjoined by St. Mark (2<sup>21</sup>). Doubtless what the writer means is that the 'Son of man,' i.e. the Messiah, is Lord of the Sabbath, and can absolve His disciples from its observance; but originally the saying must have run thus: 'Man has full power also over the Sabbath,' which, again, is of essentially the same tenor as the other, viz. 'the Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath.'* This saying, too, is more than an article in a confession; it is really a declaration of war against Mosaism. Scribe and doctor regard the Law as an end in itself, and obedience to it as the final purpose of human life, even if such obedience involve sacrifice, and indeed the surrender of life itself. But the assertion of Jesus that the Law is given for man's sake, as something designed for his benefit, and the inference that he is free from it whenever its observance conflicts with his welfare, proceed from an entirely different point of view, and have far-reaching implications. The rigid and dogmatic aspect of the Law is thus cancelled; its behests are viewed as means for the realization of God's purposes of love towards men. All this, however, shows but the birth-struggle of an entirely new religious conception, destined in its further growth to do away altogether with the Law as law. A similar instance is the declaration (Mk 10<sup>11</sup>) that the Mosaic regulation regarding divorce was a concession to the Israelites' hardness of heart, and that it stands in antithesis to the statute originally promulgated in Paradise, which alone is the will of God and the precedent for man. Here the Mosaic ordinance is represented as something adventitious, as merely marking a stage meant to be left behind.

* Cf. J. Weiss, op. cit. i. 1, p. 124

The boldness of Jesus in thus essaying to make a distinction within Scripture itself, and to discriminate between the law of God and human accretions, is of great moment for us. He has recourse to a mode of criticism which might be called subjective, but which really merits the attribute prophetic. This 'Prophet,' filled with Deity, this great religious Personality, ever directly conscious of His nearness to God, does not shrink from giving judgment as to what is the actual purpose of the Most High. Just as He fervidly announces the royal benignity of God towards both the evil and the good, just as He confidently speaks to the contrite of the Divine forgiveness, and without misgiving assures the wretched of the Divine succour, so He also undertakes, in face of the law of Moses, 'that which was spoken to the fathers,' to set forth a new law, in the glad conviction that He is thus expressing the will of God. Hence it is a misapprehension of the tenor and scope of the 'antitheses' in the Sermon on the Mount to imagine that in these Jesus is merely impugning the prevailing exegesis of the Law, or merely endeavouring to bring to light the real design of its promulgator. No; the rhetorical repetition of the phrase, 'But I say unto you,' makes it abundantly clear that Jesus is here reaching beyond Moses. And this undoubtedly corresponds to the historical situation. Take, for instance, the first two enactments, viz. regarding murder and adultery; it is clear that what Jesus means is that God asks more than mere abstention from these crimes: He demands perfect self-control and integrity of heart. The unheeded moments when the animal nature starts up in a fit of anger or of impure desire are grievously sinful in the eyes of God, as well as the actual misdeeds.

The religious-historical situation is as follows. The Jewish people were under a theocracy, and for them the Law of Moses was by no means restricted to religious or moral matters; it was at once a civil and a penal code, an order of legal procedure and a manual for the priesthood. Now it is the bane of a theocratic constitution that the Divine law, ingrafted as it is upon common life, tends to lose its majesty and inviolability. It has to adapt itself to the varied facts of existence by means of saving clauses and casuistical methods; and such a religione fosters above all the notion that the will and judgment of God reach no further than the arm of the civil magistrate, and that it is only the completed act, and not the intention, that God brings to judgment. Thus the moral relation of man to God sinks to the level of a legal one. Such a deterioration and externalizing of the religious life must all but inevitably ensue when its regulation and guardianship are committed to priests and jurists. It is the 'Prophet,' however, who now takes up the word. With incisive force He makes it clear that God looks upon the heart, the thought, the secret motions of the soul, and brings these things before His judgment-seat, and that the sin of intention passes with Him for no less than the overt act. To assert such equivalence of thought and deed may seem to us almost to overshoot the mark; for we rightly place a high value upon the self-command which keeps desire from passing into action. But the apparently partial view is to be regarded as the natural reaction of the heart and the conscience against the legalistic ossification and externalization of religion.

The verdict of Jesus upon divorce points in the same direction. The argument upon which He bases His prohibition of the separation permitted by Moses merits our attention. The statute laid down in Paradise is to be preferred, as the law of God, not merely in virtue of its great antiquity, but also on intrinsic grounds. When a husband puts away his wife, he places her in a position of moral jeopardy; for, should she associate herself with another man, whether in a second marriage or in a passing act of immorality, she thereby completes the dissolution of the first marriage, which hitherto was legally binding. The noteworthy element in this utterance is not that the ruptured matrimonial union is still binding, but in particular that the man is morally responsible for his wife, even after his dismissal of her; he must bear the guilt of her sin. Such is the only judgment possible, if marriage is to be regarded not merely as a legal bond, under the control of the civil magistrate, but as a moral covenant, for whose inviolability men are responsible, not to one another, but to God. See DIVORCE.

The profoundly irreligious subtlety of the lawyers is also exposed in Jesus' prohibition of oaths. First of all He shows that the evasions and periphrases by which those who swear hope to escape the danger of profaning God's holy name, are of no avail; every oath is and remains an adjuration of God.

But more: to the finer religious feelings, every oath is a gratuitous and irreverent bringing down of the Most High into the sordid and trivial concerns of the hour—the grossest case being that of the impulsive Oriental who puts his head in pledge, as if he had power over life and death, forgetting his complete dependence upon God, and that life and death proceed from Him alone. Thus Jesus supersedes the scrupulous anxiety and the petty evasions of the Rabbis by a much deeper religious motive: the oath, in truth, is but an element in a world under the domination of sin and Satan (Mt 5<sup>27</sup>), and he who feels God's majesty and purity in his inmost soul will have a sacred fear of bringing God upon such a scene, and will honour Him best by the plain and simple word of truth.

Of an entirely different character are the two final antitheses, viz. those relating to non-resistance and love of enemies, as given in Mt 5<sup>38-42</sup>. In the foregoing precepts we have simply the utterances of a more earnest moral sensibility; here we have the language of exultant and heroic enthusiasm, not meant to be judged by commonplace standards. In lieu of the typically Jewish principle of retaliation, which was applied both in legal and in personal affairs, viz. 'eye for eye, tooth for tooth,' Jesus demands the entire renunciation of self-defence or self-vindication. Nay more; it is not mere tranquil endurance that He enjoins, but a readiness to present to the assailant the other cheek, to give more than what is asked, to surrender the cloak as well as the tunic. These injunctions differ from those of St. Paul in Ro 12<sup>19-21</sup> in that they involve no thought of shaming or overcoming the adversary by pliancy and patience. St. Paul would seem, in fact, to have interpreted the words of Jesus in the practical didactic sense of certain Stoic admonitions.

But the distinctive feature of the passages in the Sermon on the Mount is that the demands are made without any reason being assigned or any subordinate aim proposed, precisely, indeed, as if their authority must have been perfectly self-evident to the disciples. A theological exegesis has barred the way towards a right understanding of them by always starting from the question what these words mean for us, and how we shall obey them. And as a literal obedience to them seems to us impossible, recourse is had to new interpretations and modifications, by which the strength of their tremendous claims is sapped. Instead of putting such questions, we would rather ask how the words are to be understood in their original setting, and how Jesus came to utter them in that form. Now it is evident that their essential feature is a thorough aversion to the principle of retaliation by which the ignobler instincts of the Jewish national spirit were sustained and intensified. This aversion on the part of Jesus is so strong that the most emphatic utterance of the opposite quality is for Him precisely the right thing; a consummate zeal for forbearance and renunciation whets His demands to their sharpest point. But what is the source of this enthusiasm?

It is no mere reformer of Jewish morals that speaks here, no legislator for centuries yet unborn, but the herald and apostle of the imminent dissolution of the world and of the Kingdom of God already at the door! Hence a man can prepare himself for that day in no more worthy or more earnest way than by the surrender of all the present life is based upon—earthly repute, business capacity, personal property; all these are but obstacles and fetters. Whoso renounces willingly, whoso suffers gladly—he is truly free, and ready for the great day that is at hand. We can appreciate and vindicate the words only if we interpret them by the mood appropriate to the twelfth hour.

'If so, they take our life,
Goods, honour, children, wife—
Let these things vanish all!
Their profit is but small;
The Kingdom still remaineth.'

The same enthusiasm pulsates through the words about love to enemies. It is unnecessary to paint the background of Judaism too black, to cavil at the Jewish 'love to one's neighbour' as narrow and partial, or even to lay too great a stress upon its 'hatred of one's enemies,' in order to feel that the demand of Jesus is not only something 'new,' but also a puissant, transcendent, superhuman ideal. He says, indeed, that the man who so acts will be perfect even as God is perfect, a worthy child of the all-loving Father. Now it cannot be sufficiently urged that this obligation to love one's enemies neither issues from nor can be fulfilled amidst the normal emotions of everyday life. If it is to be real to us, i.e. truly realized and not merely assumed, then it demands an enthusiasm which, if not 'contrary to the nature,' is certainly 'beyond the power' of the natural man. None but the possessor of a spirit profoundly religious and animated by the love of God, could possibly love his enemies at all events according to the special sense which Jesus gave to the universal command, viz. 'Love them which hate you, pray for them which despitefully use you.'

Our view of this supreme command of Jesus thus brings us to the twofold law of love (Mk 12<sup>29</sup>, Lk 10<sup>27</sup>). It is beyond question that neither this combining of love to God with love to one's neighbour, nor the focusing of the whole Divine law in that 'summa' is a specifically original thought of Jesus. According to the oldest form of the narrative (Lk 10<sup>27</sup>),* He elicits it from a scribe. Possibly enough there were earnest and pious Rabbis who, amid the jungle of thousands upon thousands of precepts, sought for some leading idea, and found in the requirement of love to God and man the nucleus of God's primal revelation; but none of them was ever able to carry such unification and simplification into full effect. Here again it is not the mere thought which matters, nor the fact that Jesus gave it utterance. The great thing is that, over and above, He furnished in His own life such an embodiment of the Law as carries conviction to all. In His personification of the ideal He welded the love of God and the love of man in an indissoluble union, in which they might foster and strengthen each other. He expressed the ideal in a perfect form, and stamped it upon the soul of the race. Since His day it has become obvious that the highest form of religion is that from which there radiates the soothing, genial, meek, and helpful love of mankind; obvious also, that that love of man is the deepest, the truest, the most enduring, the most exacting, which has its roots in the depths of a soul pledged to the Most High, a soul which is permeated by His truth, and has been apprehended by His holy and gracious will.

EUNUCH (εὐνοῦχος; συνδύον) occurs sometimes in LXX [see Gn 37<sup>36</sup> and Is 56<sup>10</sup>], with which, however, cf. the corresponding passage 2 K 20<sup>12</sup>].—From the single reference in the Gospels (Mt 19<sup>12</sup>) to the barbarous Oriental practice of mutilating individuals for certain purposes, we gather that the existence and purpose of eunuchs as a class were not unknown to the Jews of the time of Jesus. The religious disabilities under which men, deformed in this way, laboured, had the effect of making the practice (. . . εὐνοχίσθησαν ὑπὸ τῶν ἀσέβων) abominable to the Jews (Dt 23<sup>1</sup>; cf. Lv 22<sup>24-25</sup>). On the other hand, Josephus informs us that eunuchs were a normal feature of the courts of the Herods; and from him we also learn what share they were at that time supposed to have taken in the family intrigues (Ant. xv. vii. 4), and what base purposes they often subserved (Ant. xvii. viii. 1).

The passage containing the reference to eunuchs is peculiar to St. Matthew, and seems to be added to the Markan section, which deals with the question of divorce (Mk 10<sup>10-12</sup>=Mt 19<sup>9-11</sup>), from a source unknown to the author of the latter (see Tischendorf's Synopsis Evangelica, § 113, 'Interrogantibus de Repudio respondet'; and Wright's Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek, 'Anonymous Fragments', p. 267). The remark made by the disciples touching the difficulties arising out of Jesus' interpretation of the law of marriage, shows the widespread influence of the lax teaching on this subject characteristic of the school of Hillel (see art. ADULTERY, p. 30<sup>n</sup>).

It matters not for our purpose whether in the reply of Jesus τῶν λόγων (v. 11) be connected with οὐ συνδέσει γὰμθεταί (v. 10), or, which is more intelligible to the present writer in the light of what follows, with the primal law quoted in v. 4 (ἕνεκα τοῦτον . . . οὐ δύο εἰς σάρκα μίαν). All men are not in a position to accept a hard and fast rule. Men are constituted differently by nature, or adventitious circumstances produce artificial dissimilarities. There is no question as to the law of nature. The married life is the norm of man's condition; and the union effected thereby transcends every other natural bond, even that of filial affection. At the same time, Jesus would have His hearers understand that there are cases, and these numerous enough to be taken seriously into account, where the rule does not hold. It is not granted* to every man to be in a position to fulfil the functions of the married state. Here it is of interest to note that Jesus, in speaking of three classes of 'eunuchs,' was making a distinction well known to those He was addressing. Moreover, the metaphorical use of the word in speaking of the third class finds also its place in the language of the Jewish Rabbins קרים, קרים, קרים, קרים, קרים, cf. Lightfoot's Horæ Heb. et Talmud., and Schöttgen's Horæ Heb., in loc.

The well-known case of Origen, who literally emasculated himself 'for the kingdom of heaven's sake,' to which he afterwards seems to make pathetic, though incidental, reference in his commentary (in Matt. tom. xv. 1 ff.), was not the only example of a perverted interpretation of these words of Jesus. The Talmudic tractate Shabbath (132a) contains a reference to a eunuch of this class (cf. Midrash on Ec 10<sup>10</sup>), and the Council of Nicea (c. 1) felt called on to deal with the danger, as did also the Apostolical Canons (c. 21), and the Second Council of Arles (c. 7). The common sense which thus prevailed amongst the guiding spirits of the Church is enhanced when we remember that the disabilities attaching to self-mutilation had no reference to those who were eunuchs from their mother's womb, or who 'were made eunuchs by men' (see for examples of both, Eusebius, HE vii. 32; Socrates, HE vi. 15; Sozomen, HE viii. 24; cf. Bingham's Ant. iv. 9).

It is not without significance that in the conversation of Jesus with His disciples no mention is made of any word of condemnation by Him of the horrible practice of emasculation. The complete lack of the sense of the dignity of human life, so characteristic of the ancient world, and the absence of the feeling of human brotherhood, found expression in no more terrible way than in this consequence of the laws of slavery. Yet Jesus refers directly neither to the institution of slavery nor to this, its result. He prefers the plan of instilling principles which lead by the processes of thought and application to the recognition that God hath 'made of one (ἐξ ἑνός) every nation of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth' (Ac 17<sup>26</sup>; cf. Lk 10<sup>25</sup>, 43<sup>26</sup>; Mt 8<sup>12</sup>=Lk 13<sup>29</sup>). It is as if He had an unconquerable belief in the power of the human mind ultimately to accept the truth, and to reject, finally and for ever, what has been false, in its provisional solutions of life's problems.

And as it was with His treatment of this form of cruelty practised by the strong upon the helpless, so it was with the mutilation of the body inflicted for so-called religious purposes. To the present writer it seems probable that Jesus made a conscious and deliberate reference to this practice (see Driver's 'Deuteronomy' in Internat. Crit. Com. on Dt 23<sup>1</sup>). Here, too, there is no condemnation expressed of an inadequate and artificial method which was the outcome of a legalistic conception of moral purity. It is rather by His positive teaching on the subject of purity that we are led to understand (ὁ δυνάμενος χωρεῖν χωρεῖται) what are the lines along which we must move in order to reach the goal of perfect self-renunciation. There is another and a more excellent way of obtaining the mastery of the sexual passion than by literally 'cutting off' the offending fleshly member (cf. Mt 5<sup>29</sup>, where the words βλέπω and ὀφθαλμὸς point to the radical character of the treatment insisted on by Jesus). The peculiarity about His method of treating this particular question is its loving cautiousness. It is not possible for all, but it is possible for some, to obtain as complete an ascendancy over this strong instinct as if they were physically sexless; while, of course, the resultant moral victory is of infinitely more value than the merely negative, unmoral condition produced by self-emasculation. Those who adopt His method 'make themselves eunuchs' with a definite purpose in view (ὁὐ τῆν βασιλείαν τῶν οὐρανῶν), and the interests which are created by that purpose are so absorbing that neither time nor opportunity is given to the 'fleshly lusts which war against the soul' (1 P 2<sup>11</sup>).

The clear and definite teaching of Jesus on the subject of marriage will help to elucidate the words under review. The Divine idea (ὡστε οὐδεὶς εἰσὶν δύο ἀλλὰ μία σὰρξ, Mk 10<sup>9</sup>), on which He laid special stress, involves mutual effort and restraint. It is not possible but that even under the most favourable circumstances duties will arise which will prove irksome, and not less so because they are peculiar to the married state. Indeed, the Hebraistic עושרא עיש (Heb. 7 77) emphasizes the truth that perfect union does not follow at once on the consummation of marriage. It is a gradual process, and, because it is so, it involves some amount of mutual self-abnegation. The cares and responsibilities which follow in the wake of those who are married necessarily mean absorption both of time and attention which may clash with the work given to some to do (cf. 1 Co 7<sup>32</sup>). It is for this reason that these find themselves debarred from ever undertaking the duties attaching to marriage. They voluntarily undertake eunuchism because they are completely immersed in, and engrossed by, the work of 'the kingdom of heaven.' There is no need to suppose, as Keim does, that Jesus is here deliberately referring to Himself and to the Baptist. At the same time, we are able to see in His life the highest expression of that blessed eunuchism* (Bengel, Gnomon of the NT, in loc.) which renounced all earthly ties for the sake of the work He was given to do* (cf. Jn 17<sup>4</sup>); and if St. Paul, in view of a stern emergency, felt justified in enjoining upon even the married the necessity of adopting this condition (see 1 Co 7<sup>29</sup>), we know that he was speaking from the plane on which he himself stood (cf. 1 Co 9<sup>7-17</sup>). At the same time, the apparent harshness of his asceticism is softened by his repeated expressions of regard for the gift peculiar to each (ἕκαστος χάρισμα). See, further, art. MARRIAGE.

EVANGELIST.—Although the word 'evangelist' (εὐαγγελιστής) does not occur in the Gospels, it justly finds a place in this work because it is the name commonly given to the authors of the four Gospels. The verb εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, from which the substantive 'evangelist' is derived, signifies to proclaim good tidings. The corresponding verbs in Hebrew and Aramaic (Dalman, NHWB, s. v. עָבַד, Words of Jesus, 103) sometimes bear only the meaning 'announce,' but their prevailing import is to announce good tidings. There is no reason to doubt that the Aramaic word or words used by our Lord concerning His message to mankind described it as the proclamation of good news. Hence in Christian circles the term acquired the specific sense of announcing the gospel. The word 'evangelist' is not found in classical Greek or in the LXX, nor has it as yet been found in any papyri. So far as our present knowledge goes, it belongs only to the NT and to ecclesiastical Greek. It is used thrice in the NT, and in none of the instances is its meaning doubtful. It is applied to Philip (Ac 21<sup>8</sup>), either because of the labours described in Ac 8, or because he belonged to a class or order of Christian labourers whose function was to go abroad proclaiming the gospel to those who had not heard it. In the Epistle to the Ephesians, 'evangelists' are mentioned (4<sup>11</sup>) as an order or class, after the Apostles and prophets, and before pastors and teachers. Here, too, the most probable view is that those spoken of were missionary preachers. Again, Timothy is charged by St. Paul (2 Ti 4<sup>5</sup>) to 'do the work of an evangelist.' Whether Timothy is here called an evangelist is open to discussion, but the nature of the work he is bidden to perform is clear: he is to visit new communities in order to preach the gospel to them. The force of the word suggested by its etymology is, therefore, the meaning attaching to it in the three passages of the NT where it is found. This is the view of all modern scholars of any note. Some of the Greek expositors, misled by the usage of their own time, assigned, at least to the passage in Ephesians, the sense which it came to bear subsequent to NT times, that of author or writer of a Gospel; but this interpretation has no supporters to-day.

How did this second sense arise? Can any links of connexion be traced between the earlier and the later signification? Is it possible to ascertain the time at which the later usage began? These questions are best answered by studying the references to the term in the Church History of Eusebius. It is obvious at once that Eusebius had two senses of the word before him; that he knew that its original import was a preacher of the gospel, but that this meaning had been largely displaced by another, that of a writer of a Gospel. Speaking generally, the Church in the age of Eusebius understood by the word 'evangelist' the writer of a Gospel, though scholars like Eusebius himself were aware that in earlier times it had borne another meaning. Accordingly the references of Eusebius to the original force of the term are all associated with the earlier history of the Church. Thus he relates that the Apostle Thomas sent Thaddeus to Edessa as a preacher and evangelist of the teaching of Christ (HE I. xiii. 4). Again he speaks of those who in the age of Trajan started out on long journeys and performed the office of an evangelist, filled with the desire to preach Christ to those who had not heard the word of faith, and to deliver to them the Divine Gospels (III. xxxvii. 2). Once more, he tells that Pantænus was a herald of the gospel of Christ to the nations of the East, and that he was sent as far as India. For, he adds, there were still many evangelists of the word who sought earnestly to use their inspired zeal, after the example of the Apostles, for the building up of the Divine word (IV. x. 2). In all these passages 'evangelist' evidently denotes an itinerant preacher of the gospel. On the other hand, when Eusebius names John the evangelist (III. xxxix. 5), he is speaking of him as the author of the Gospel, and the reference to the voice of the inspired evangelists and Apostles (II. iii. 1) is probably to be explained in the same sense. How then was the transition effected from the one of these significations to the other? How was the title transferred from a preacher to a writer? There are those who think that even from the first the term denoted not so much a travelling preacher in general as a preacher who set himself to relate the life and words of Jesus. Teaching and specific teaching regarding the addresses delivered by Jesus and the miracles He performed was a characteristic of the evangelist from the first, hence there is little difficulty in realizing how the title passed from those who related to those who wrote our Lord's life, the latter meaning being only the natural development of the former. Even a scholar like Meyer (in Ac 21<sup>8</sup>) affirms that the chief duty of the evangelist was to communicate to his hearers historical incidents from the ministry of Jesus, and some later writers of all schools have embraced the same view. It is believed to be corroborated by the language just quoted from Eusebius regarding the distribution of the written Gospels by evangelists. But there is nothing to show that the first evangelists of the Church made special use of the facts of our Lord's life, and that their teaching or preaching differed in this respect from that of the Apostles. The wide acceptance in which the words 'evangel' and 'evangelize' are used in the NT is adverse to this conclusion. The earliest gospel was not the life of Jesus, but the message of salvation. To preach the gospel was necessarily to preach Jesus, but not to give any sketch of the life of Jesus such as is found in our four Gospels. Nor is the view probable in itself. A modern missionary relates the life of Jesus as he sees it expedient, but he does not make the communication of the details of that life to his hearers one of his chief duties. The same freedom was doubtless exercised in the earliest ages of the Church. One evangelist would tell less and another more of the life of Jesus as he preached. Even the same evangelist would vary the amount of detail he gave regarding the life and words of Jesus according to the varying needs of his hearers. Beyond all doubt most of the addresses delivered by the evangelists were largely occupied by an account of the career of Jesus, and especially of His sayings and His miracles; but this was true of every person who sought to propagate Christianity, and not distinctive of the evangelist as such. Further, it is difficult on this hypothesis to explain the fact that the original signification of 'evangelist' as a preacher was current long after the Gospels had obtained the fullest recognition within the Church. The evangelists carried the Gospels with them if they were fortunate enough to possess copies; they referred to the Gospels as the authorities for the life of Jesus, yet they retained their title. There is no evidence that the later meaning drove out the earlier so long as the Church possessed evangelists or called them by this name. Undoubtedly the two meanings flourished side by side for a time.

If this argument is sound, the origin of the later import of the term must be sought in another quarter. That quarter is not remote. The Church possessed from early days four narratives of our Lord's life, and to these first the term 'Gospel' and subsequently its plural 'Gospels' was applied. It was necessary to refer to these writings individually, hence there arose the practice of speaking of the Gospel according to Matthew and the like: Matthew being regarded as the author of the Gospel bearing his name. Very soon it became necessary to find a term to serve as a common designation of the writers of the Gospels. No more suitable word for this purpose could be found than 'evangelist.' It was already in use in the Church; it stood in the closest affinity to the word 'evangel' or 'gospel,' which had acquired by this time its new sense of a written work, and the term once applied proved so useful that it immediately became popular. Just as the term 'gospel,' which denoted a spoken message, an announcement of good news, the Christian good news, was current long before the written books called Gospels existed, and nevertheless gave its name to them, so also was it with the term 'evangelist.' By a similar transition it became the designation of the writers of the Gospels. After the word 'Gospel' was used to denote a written narrative of the life of Jesus, the extension of the meaning of the word 'evangelist' to designate the author of such a work was only a question of time.

Is it possible to ascertain the date at which the term was first used in this specific sense? The evidence at present available shows that it was thus employed by Hippolytus and by Tertullian. The first occurrence of the word is in the de Antichr. of Hippolytus (68), where St. Luke is spoken of as 'the Evangelist.' The generally accepted date of this treatise is about the year 201 (Harnack, Chronol. ii. 214; Bardenheuer, Altkirch. Lit. ii. 521). Tertullian in his adv. Praes., which has been assigned to the years 213-218 (Bardenheuer, ii. 388; Harnack, ii. 286), speaks of 'the preface of John the Evangelist' (21, cf. 23). This evidence shows that towards the beginning of the 3rd cent. the term was used to denote the authors of the Gospels. The incidental manner in which both writers employ the word suggests that its use was not new. But this inference is precarious, and it is possible that Hippolytus was the first to employ it, and that Tertullian imitated his example and gave it a Latin form. The absence of the word from the opening chapters of the third Book of Irenaeus will appear to some to confirm the opinion that the use of the term is later than his time, but the proper conclusion is that a decisive verdict is impossible. All that can be affirmed with confidence is that, as the term 'Gospels' was admittedly used in the plural in the time of Justin Martyr (Ap. i. 66), the employment of the term 'evangelist' to describe the author of a Gospel could have begun in his age, but that the first occurrence of the word is half a century later.

In dealing with the topic 'Evangelist,' it is desirable to add a brief notice of the animal symbols by which the Gospels are designated. This symbolism makes no appeal to us to-day, but it enters so largely into early Christian art and poetry that some acquaintance with it is necessary. The symbolism is founded on the description of the four living creatures in the Apocalypse (4th). The first creature is stated to have been like a lion, the second like a calf, the third had the face of a man, the fourth was like a flying eagle. It occurred to Irenaeus to compare, if not identify, these with the four Gospels, and it was therefore necessary for him to ascribe a particular symbol to each of the Evangelists. To him John is the lion, Luke the calf, Matthew the man, and Mark the eagle (Hær. iii. xi. 11). The mode of illustration pursued by Irenaeus strikes us to-day as forced and profitless, but the example he set was followed by Hippolytus (Hipp. i. ii. 183, Berlin ed.; cf. Bardenheuer, Altkirch. Lit. ii. 532). In a Syriac fragment he repeats the comparison, but advances an interpretation of his own. Now the lion is Matthew, the calf Luke, the man Mark, and the eagle John. The symbolism spread throughout the Church, but there was no agreement as to the connexion between the different living creatures and the separate Evangelists. However, the authority of Jerome (Preface to Matthew), despite the divergent opinion of Augustine (Cons. Ev. i. 6), prevailed throughout the West, and furnished the interpretation which is best known, as most largely represented in Christian art, and as embodied in the noble hymn of Adam of St. Victor, 'Psallat chorus corde mundo' (Trench, Sacred Latin Poetry, 67). According to this view, St. Matthew is the man, St. Mark the lion, St. Luke the calf, and St. John the eagle.

EVENING (ἡ ἑσπέρα [sc. ἡμέρα], ἑσπέρα).—The Babylonians divided the day into equal parts by sun-watches. The 'sixty system' of minutes and seconds was in vogue among them. Among Syrian peoples also, it is likely, the same system prevailed. No trace of this is found among the Israelites, however, in the pre-exilic period. Another marked difference between the Babylonians and the Israelites is noteworthy. With the Israelites the day began at sunset, with the Babylonians at sunrise. It is at least certain that the reckoning from eve to eve became the exclusive method in Israel with the triumph of the Law. A kindred system prevailed among Arabs, Athenians, and Gauls (Pliny, HN ii. 78). It was customary, too, in ancient Israel to distinguish between the 'first evening' and the 'second evening.' It is not certain just where they drew the line (Edersheim). The phrase 'between the two evenings' (בין הערביים), Ex 16th 29th, as a designation of the time of the daily evening offerings, clearly meant some period in the late afternoon. The 'first evening,' it is generally thought, began about 3 p.m. and extended to sunset; the second began at sunset and continued into the night.

In Mt 14th 23 we have the word 'evening' used in both senses. 'When it was evening' (v. 12) clearly refers to the first evening (cf. Lk 9th 12 and the day began to decline, Bible Union Ver.). For when the disciples suggested that Jesus send the multitude away, that they might go into the villages and buy themselves food, Jesus said they need not depart; and the feeding of the five thousand and the sending away of the multitude followed before 'he went up into the mountain apart to pray.' Then a second evening is spoken of in the words: 'And when the evening was come, he was there alone' (v. 23). In the latter case, Jesus, after seeing His disciples off (Jn 6th), evidently sought the mountain solitude, as He did on other occasions, to spend much of the night in prayer (v. 20). This second evening, then, was evidently verging on the night.

EVIL.—It is customary to distinguish three kinds of evil: (1) what Leibnitz called metaphysical evil, i.e. the incompleteness and imperfection which belong more or less to all created things; (2) physical evil, i.e. pain, suffering, and death; and (3) moral evil, which is a vicious choice of a morally responsible being.

1. METAPHYSICAL EVIL.—The writers of the OT were, for the most part, deeply impressed with the doctrine of God's transcendence; i.e. His unique and unapproachable majesty, power, and holiness. Hence the nothingness and transitoriness of all earthly and visible things are a constant theme with them: 'Behold, heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain thee,' etc. (1 K 8<sup>27</sup>); 'What is man that thou art mindful of him?' etc. (Ps 8<sup>4</sup>); 'All flesh is grass,' etc. (Is 40<sup>6</sup>); 'The inhabitants of the earth are as grasshoppers' (v. 2). Compared with God's ineffable holiness, the holiest of created beings are, as it were, unclean. In heaven the holy angels veil their faces in God's presence (Is 6<sup>3</sup>). The holy sanctuary of Israel required to be purged every year from its pollutions by the blood of sacrifices (Lv 16<sup>19</sup>). All human righteousnesses are as a polluted garment (Is 64<sup>6</sup>).

In the NT there is naturally less stress laid upon the Divine transcendence. The theme of the NT writers is the love of God shown in the Incarnation. The eternal Son of God has taken upon Him human nature, to raise it into fellowship with God, to clothe it with the garment of the Divine righteousness, and to cause it to partake of the Divine immortality. Yet the awful and unapproachable character of God, and the infinite abyss which separates the Creator from the highest creature, are never lost sight of. He alone is the Absolute Good (Mk 10<sup>18</sup>); He alone may lawfully be worshipped (Mk 12<sup>29, 32</sup>, Rev 19<sup>10</sup>).

2. PHYSICAL EVIL.—(1) Optimism and pessimism.—Christianity may be classed philosophically as a moderate optimism. It is not an extravagant optimism, like that of Leibnitz, who maintained that this is the best of all possible worlds, or of Malebranche, who regarded it as the best conceivable. Christ would certainly not have endorsed the hyperboles of Pope, that all discord is harmony not understood, and all partial evil universal good; yet He must certainly be classed among the most pronounced teachers of optimism. As against all forms of Gnosticism and Dualism, He maintained that the Universe, in all its parts, is the work of a perfectly good Creator, and that, in spite of all appearances to the contrary, it is under the guidance of His fatherly Providence: 'Behold the fowls of the air,' etc. (Mt 6<sup>26</sup>); 'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing?' etc. (Mt 10<sup>29</sup>); 'He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good,' etc. (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>). The optimism of Jesus is particularly evident in His eschatology. He taught that in the end good will triumph over evil, and evil be absolutely excluded from the Universe: 'In the end of the world the Son of man shall send forth his angels,' etc. (Mt 13<sup>41</sup>, cf. 24<sup>31</sup> 25<sup>32, 41</sup>). He believed that there is a glorious goal to which the whole creation is moving. In one passage He calls it Creation's new birth (ἀναγενεσία, Mt 19<sup>28</sup>); but His usual term for it is the 'Kingdom of God' (or of Heaven): 'Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father' (Mt 13<sup>43</sup>). For the coming of this Kingdom every Christian is directed to pray (Mt 6<sup>10</sup>) and to watch (24<sup>42</sup> 25<sup>13</sup>). That the material Universe will be glorified along with the spiritual is not distinctly stated by Jesus, but is a necessary inference from the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, which was undoubtedly held by Him (Mt 5<sup>29</sup> 10<sup>28</sup> etc.), though in a more spiritual form than was generally current (22<sup>30</sup>).

(2) Pain, sorrow, disease, and death.—The Gospels lend no countenance to the view that moral evil is the only genuine evil, and that physical evil is not evil in the strict and proper sense. Pain, sorrow, disease, and death were regarded by Jesus as things which ought not to be, and He spent much of the time of His public ministry in combating them: 'He went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed with the devil: for God was with him' (Ac 10<sup>38</sup>). He committed the ministry of healing to the Apostles and other believers: 'Preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out devils; freely ye have received, freely give' (Mt 10<sup>7</sup>). Death was regarded by Jesus as in an especial sense 'the enemy.' Its ravages affected Him with acute distress (ἐπέβουλησάτο τῷ πνεύματι καὶ ἔρπαξεν ταυτὸν . . . ἕδρασεως, Jn 11<sup>32</sup>, where consult the commentators). Three of His most striking recorded miracles were victories over death (Mk 5<sup>4</sup>, Lk 7<sup>11</sup>, Jn 11<sup>4</sup>); and His own resurrection, according to the energetic expression of the Apostle, 'abolished death, and brought life and incorruption to light' (2 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>).

As to the causation of physical evil, there is a great difference of point of view between the OT and the NT. The OT upon the whole (Job 1. 2. is an exception) regards physical evil as inflicted directly by God. According to the NT, however, physical evil is mainly the work of the devil. God tolerates, permits, and overrules, rather than directly inflicts it. Pain and disease and death belong to the devil's kingdom, not to God's; and their universal prevalence is a sign of the usurped authority over the human race of the prince of this world. The preaching of the Kingdom of God and the emancipation of mankind from the devil's thralldom were consequently accompanied by an extensive ministry of healing, and Christ appealed to His miracles as evidence that 'the kingdom of God is come upon you' (Lk 11<sup>20</sup>). The NT does not, however, deny that physical evil is often inflicted by God for disciplinary or retributive purposes. He 12<sup>1</sup> lays especial stress upon the wholesome chastening of affliction which all the sons of God receive. Examples of penal or retributive affliction are Mt 9<sup>2</sup> (palsy), Mt 23<sup>32</sup> (war and massacre), Jn 5<sup>4</sup> (constitutional infirmity), Ac 5<sup>6</sup> (death), Ac 13<sup>11</sup> (blindness). Jesus, however, strongly protested against the idea that every calamity is to be regarded as a punishment for individual sin. This specially Jewish idea, which Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar develop at length in the Book of Job, is definitely condemned (Lk 13<sup>4</sup>, Jn 9<sup>2</sup>).

3. MORAL EVIL.—(1) Its nature and origin.—The only possible way of accounting for moral evil without making God the author of it, is to attribute it to the abuse of free will on the part of created beings, angelic, or human, or both. The doctrine of free will has been severely criticised in all ages by the advocates of philosophical and theological necessity; but it has, notwithstanding, held its ground, and is at the present time the faith of all the most progressive races of mankind. That it was held by Jesus does not admit of reasonable doubt. Thus He habitually spoke of the power which men possess to resist God and to frustrate His benevolent intentions: 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, . . . how often would I (ἤθελον) . . . and ye would not' (καὶ οὐκ ἠθέλησατε, Lk 13<sup>34</sup>; cf. Jn 5<sup>40</sup>, Mt 11<sup>19</sup>). His general invitations to all men to be saved imply the same doctrine: 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest' (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>); 'And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto myself' (Jn 12<sup>32</sup>).

The reality of Christ's Libertarianism is not disproved by certain passages in the Gospels which seem at first sight to speak the language of Predestination, or even of Determinism.

(Jn 8:37, 39, Mt 26:24 etc.). Predestination was not so held in Christ's time as to exclude free will. Iosephus says of the Pharisees: "When they say that all things happen by fate, they do not take away from men the freedom of acting as they think fit; since their notion is that it hath pleased God to mix up the degrees of fate and man's will, so that man can act virtuously and viciously" (Ant. xviii. i. 3).

Jesus accordingly attributed the origin of evil not to the will of God, but to the perversity of God's creatures. Mankind, according to Him, is in rebellion against God; but the whole guilt of rebellion is not his. Before man existed, there were myriads of finite spirits, higher in the order of creation than he, and of these some fell from their original innocence and became devils. The chief of these, Satan, is ever seeking to seduce the human race from its allegiance to its Creator, and is therefore emphatically called 'the tempter' (ὁ πειράζων, Mt 4, 1 Th 3<sup>2</sup>), and the slayer of men (ἀποκτείνων, Jn 8<sup>4</sup>). This last is the one certain allusion to the fall of Satan to be found in the Gospels (Lk 10<sup>18</sup> is doubtful). From it we learn that he once existed in a state of innocence (ἔφ' ἣν ἀψήθη), but did not persist in it (reading ὡς ἔργον with WH).

The position of Satan in the Universe is so exalted, and the power ascribed to him in the NT so great (cf. esp. Mt 4, Jn 14<sup>30</sup>), that some have regarded Jesus as a Dualist. But the authority attributed to Satan in the NT, though great, is subordinate. The devils recognize the power of Jesus, and come out at His word (Mk 16:17, 18 etc.). If Satan is 'the strong man,' there is a stronger, who can bind him and spoil his goods (Mt 12<sup>29</sup>). At the Temptation the devil acknowledged that his power is delegated one (ὡς ἔρρηκται, Lk 4<sup>6</sup>). His kingdom will surely come to an end. In fact its fall has already been virtually secured by the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus (Jn 12<sup>31</sup>). His fate is hence determined, and it will be fully adequate to his delinquency (Mt 25<sup>41</sup>).

(2) Original sin.—There is no recorded teaching of Jesus about original sin. He recognized the fall of man (Jn 8<sup>44</sup>), and the general sinfulness of the human race (Mt 7<sup>21</sup>); but how He connected these two facts does not appear. It may, perhaps, be argued from Jn 9:5 that He would not have approved of any theory of original sin which regarded men as obnoxious to punishment from God merely because of an ancestral taint that they could not help inheriting. See, further, art. SIN and ETERNAL PUNISHMENT.

EVIL SPIRIT.—See DEMON.

EVOLUTION (CHRIST AND).—The widespread acceptance of the Evolutionary philosophy, and the endeavours of its leading exponents to include the phenomena of religion within the sweep of its categories, have greatly accentuated the problem of the place of the Incarnation in the cosmic order, and of Jesus Christ, His Person, His work, and His redemptive function, in human history.

1. The basis of discussion.—At the outset we must distinguish sharply between the Materialistic type of the Evolutionary philosophy on the one hand, and the Theistic type on the other. The former may be described as including all efforts to explain the highest phenomena of the cosmos—including those of life, consciousness, and all forms of spiritual activity—in terms of mechanical motion and force. Such a philosophy rules out all recognition of the Divine Personality, of the possible independence of mind over matter, of the ethical responsibility and free spiritual activity of man, and of his capacity for immortal life. This disposes of the problem of the Incarnation as irrelevant, and throws us back on a purely 'naturalistic' explanation of the Person and life of Jesus Christ. The Theistic type of the Evolutionary philosophy, however—the central idea of which is that the goal of Evolution and not its beginnings provides us with the principle of cosmic interpretation, and that spirit and not matter furnishes the key to the riddle of the Universe—leaves us free to deal with the Supreme Person and Fact of history with open minds. Theism presents us with a conception of God as immanent in the Universe, but not as imprisoned within its material or psychical manifestations; as transcendent, living a free, self-determined life in virtue of His own eternal Being, yet not separated from the forces and phenomena of the cosmos, which are manifestations of His creative activity and expanding purpose. It also presents us with a conception of man as a created but free spiritual person, physically a part of nature, but ethically above it, and capable of coming into conscious personal relations with his Creator.

2. Theistic theory of Evolution compatible with a process of Incarnation.—It is manifest that the idea of Incarnation is not a priori incompatible with such a philosophy of God and man. It represents the Universe as God realizing His creative purpose; impersonally in Nature, personally in Man. Creation awakes in man to the sense of its own origin and the possibility of its own consummation in a life of free spiritual communion with God. Incarnation means that this fellowship is actually sought after and objectively consummated by an act of self-realization on the part of God. It implies the special compatibility of the Divine nature and the human personality. 'God [is, as it were, the eternal possibility of being incarnated, man the permanent capability of incarnation.' 'The nature that is in all men akin to Deity becomes in Christ a nature in personal union with the Deity, and the unio personalis, which is peculiar to Him, is the basis of the unio mystica, which is possible to all' (Fairbairn, Christ in Modern Theology, pp. 473, 475; see also Clarke's Outline of Christian Theology, p. 275).

3. The Person and work of Christ in such a theory.—The historical realization of this possibility of Incarnation in Jesus of Nazareth raises the further question of His place in a philosophy of history, and in Christian theology. The Christian contention is that in Him the Evolutionary process finds its consummation on the one side—He was the Ideal Man made actual; and that a fresh Evolutionary start was made by the fusion of the Divine and human natures in Him on the other—He was the Son of God Incarnate, 'manifested to take away sin' (1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>), and to project the race on the lines of its true development and life, which had been interrupted and swerved aside by the intrusion of sin into the world. This conception of the Person and work of Christ, while it falls into line with the Evolutionary idea in one direction, appears to fall foul of it in another, because of the claim it makes that there was in the nature of Christ an incommensurable factor, incapable of being explained by the laws of organic life, or by human psychology,—manifesting itself in a life of unique goodness and power, begun by a free special act of God in the Virgin-birth, and consummated by the objective Resurrection of our Lord from the dead.

This difficulty, however, on deeper consideration is not incompatible with a wider view of the Evolutionary process. There were several stages in the known pathway of the upward movement from the star mist, in which the process began, to man, in whom terrestrial evolution finds its consummation, when fresh phenomena appeared which cannot be explained in terms of those that preceded; e.g. at the emergence of organic life, of sentience, and of ethical self-consciousness. So far, no rational bridge of theory has been found to span the gap between these diverse facts. It is, therefore, not unthinkable that there was in the Person of our Lord a superhuman element, which in Him mingled with the stream of human life, and started a fresh and higher line of evolution for the race. The question whether this was so in point of actual fact is thus purely one of evidence, and, if historically substantiated, must be accepted, whether we are able ultimately to 'account' for it theoretically or not. Our canons of Evolution must make room for all the facts of life and history, or be finally discredited as inadequate and obscurantist.

4. Jesus Christ not explicable on naturalistic grounds.—It is certain also that, so far, the innumerable efforts which have been put forth during the past century, from almost every conceivable point of view, to give a naturalistic explanation of the life and Person of Jesus Christ, have not, in whole or in part, disposed of this problem. There is no single theory or combination of theories which meets with general acceptance, even among those who take up a purely scientific attitude. When we confront them with the Christian consciousness which is the historical outcome of faith in the Divine nature and mission and work of Christ, they fail utterly to carry conviction. (This last fact has so far not had its true place in the settlement of the problem). The Personality of Jesus Christ is thus still the unsolved problem of history, and it is more than doubtful if any fresh treatment of the question will succeed in bringing Him within the categories of an Agnostic Evolutionary Philosophy.

5. Cur Deus Homo?—The Theistic Evolutionist has next to face the old question of the purpose and aim of the Incarnation in the cosmic order. 'Cur Deus Homo?' becomes a more burning question than ever in a scheme of Evolutionary thought. Two hypotheses present themselves, according as we take an a priori or a posteriori standpoint, which may be called the Evolutionary and the Redemptive. The first makes the Christ the consummation and crown of the process of cosmic Evolution, and postulates the Incarnation as its necessary climax; the second occupies the old standpoint of Christian theology from the beginning, that, whether the Incarnation lay implicit or not in the process, it was historically conditioned by the fact of the sinful and 'fallen' state of humanity. The two views are not incompatible with one another, and both in combination are quite consistent with the teaching of Scripture. The upward striving of humanity for union with its Creator as personal finds its historical witness in (1) the universal function of worship, prayer, and sacrifice, and (2) the Hebrew prophetic vision of the Ideal Servant of Jehovah, and the Messianic hope; and it suggests, as God is personal, a corresponding act of self-revelation in a historical Person who would unite in himself the human aspiration and the Divine manifestation; while the gradual revelation consummated in the coming of Christ, and recorded in the Old and New Testaments, is in line with all the known laws of God's evolutionary methods. On the other hand, it is unquestionable that the Scripture doctrine of the Incarnation is indissolubly associated with the redemptive purpose of God. This is its historical aim and character: 'He was manifested to take away sin' (1 Jn 3<sup>6</sup>, cf. 1 Co 5<sup>18, 19</sup> etc.). While, therefore, we are justified on a priori grounds in believing that the Incarnation was no afterthought (Dale, Fellowship with Christ, and Other Sermons, pp. 10, 252f.), but that it would have taken place even if sin had not entered the world, the form which it took was historically conditioned by the actual condition of humanity; i.e. it was soteriological in its manifestation.

6. Three pregnant aspects of the historical Incarnation.—More particularly, the significance of the historical Incarnation as a redemptive and perfective process may be described under three pregnant headings. It was (1) the realization of the perfect type of humanity—Christ as the Ideal Man; (2) the achievement of a great restorative or saving work—Christ as the sufficient Saviour; (3) the beginning of a fresh departure in the upward Life of the Race—Christ as the Founder and Head of His Church, and the source of the higher spiritual movements of history. These three aspects of His work are specially related to His human life as our great Exemplar; to His Cross and Passion as our Sacrifice and Reconiler; to His Resurrection and Ascension into the unseen world, and His influence through His Spirit on the individual and wider life of mankind.

(1) As the Ideal Man, Jesus revealed the possibilities and determined the type of perfect manhood for the race. This was done under special conditions, and at a given moment of time and place, race and environment. He was born in Palestine, during the reign of Herod, 'of the seed of David' (Ro 1<sup>3</sup>); i.e. He was a Jew, conforming to the special conditions and demands of His own times, and limited by the intellectual and social horizon of His day. There was much, therefore, in the outward life of Jesus which was temporary and local in its manifestations. Yet beneath all this we see a true revelation of the Perfect Man, universal in its scope, yet appealing to each individual man as his exemplar; Ideal in its purity and holiness, yet throbbing with contagious life; beyond the reach of literal imitation, yet quickening each of His followers to the realization of his own individual life and personality. Looked at from within, His life is depicted in the NT as one of perfect and joyous obedience to the Father's revealed will (Jn 5<sup>19</sup>), unbroken communion with Him (10<sup>38</sup>), and supreme self-forgetfulness in the service of His brethren (2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>). Whatever transcendent elements may have been hidden (and sometimes patent) in the spiritual consciousness of Jesus, He is represented as truly temptable (Mt 4<sup>1</sup> etc.), as depending entirely on Divine help and grace for conquest over temptation (Jn 5<sup>19</sup> etc.), and as having triumphed absolutely over evil, so that He was 'without sin' (He 4<sup>15</sup>). The impression left on those who knew Him best by this life of filial obedience and service was that it was of unique beauty and attractiveness (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>), and yet capable of emulation by all, under their own individual conditions of life and service (1 P 2<sup>21</sup>). And this NT picture of Jesus as the Ideal Man is one that the noblest minds of Christendom throughout the centuries have accepted. There is no historical character that has ever threatened to divide the sovereignty of Jesus in the spiritual homage of men; and such 'detached' thinkers as Goethe and Carlyle, Strauss and Renan, Richter and Lecky have borne unqualified testimony to the solitary and unapproachable grandeur of the moral ideal incarnated in Him.

'In the fulness of the time.'—From the Evolutionary standpoint the question is often asked, whether such an Ideal life must not necessarily have appeared as the consummation of the spiritual development of the race,—as the last link in the series. This a priori objection is of doubtful application, however, even in the lower ranges of organic life; and as regards the self-conscious aspiring life of men, it is demonstrably lacking in cogency. Jesus, according to Scripture, appeared in the "fulness" of the time, and at that precise moment in the order of history which enabled Him best to fulfil His mission (Gal 4, He 1-3). The best minds of previous ages had been eagerly looking forward to a manifestation of the saving power of God (Mt 12<sup>17</sup>; Lk 24<sup>29</sup>; Ac 21<sup>18</sup>; 1 P 1<sup>10</sup> etc.), and, if the actual historical manifestation of the Messiah for whom they waited was not in accordance with their literal expectations, it was the true fulfilment of the spiritual movement of which their ideals and prophecies were a part. In Evolutionary language, the "embryonic" Christ of prophecy became in due course the actual Christ of history, or, less figuratively, the dimly outlined ideal life of aspiration took objective form in the manifested life of the Son of God. Or, we may say that the right time for an ideal to be actualized in the life of humanity would be, at that precise moment when the capacity for conceiving and recognizing an ideal had been sufficiently developed to appreciate it. Before this, it would be wasted; later, it would have been belated; and Jesus came and embodied the Ideal Life just when humanity was capable of profiting by it, and of being stirred by it into higher aspiration and endeavour.

(2) The Redemptive work of Christ finds its place in an Evolutionary scheme of thought on cognate lines. It presupposes that a lapse, or at least a fatal halt, has occurred in the upward spiritual development of the race, and that all further progress was barred by the poisoning of the wells of progress by sin (see FALL). Before humanity could be released from this disability, which had interfered with the free interflow of the Divine and human fellowship, in the unrestricted action of which alone the spiritual life of man can develop, a process of reconciliation and at-one-ment with the source of the spiritual Life must be initiated. Apart from this, the presentation of an Ideal Life would be a mockery, for its realization would be impossible. Thus, as already stated, the historical Incarnation took a redemptive form, and it was consummated by an act of supreme sacrifice.

The process of 'progress by sacrifice' (see Bruce's Providential Order, ch. xii, p. 345 ff.) is deeply embedded in the organic world. The so-called cruel Law of Natural Selection is but another name for a rudimentary fact which finds its finest and most perfect realization in the Cross of Christ. In nature we find three grades or stages of this process. (1) The sacrifice of the weak for the strong, as when those creatures in every species which are ill-adapted for the propagation of their kind are bowed out of existence by the vitally strong and efficient, and made 'subservient to another's good' in the way of food. (2) The sacrifice of the strong for the weak, exemplified in the action of the imperious parental instinct which is manifested by every living species above the very lowest, and which gradually increases in its range and its delicacy till it arrives through the higher mammals at man. Here there is more or less conscious self-denial on the part of the vigorous and capable organisms on behalf of the helpless and the weak. (3) The sacrifice of the good for the bad, a fact manifested (in the necessity of things) only among ethical persons, and exemplified throughout history as one of the most potent forces for the uplifting and perfecting of humanity. These various stages of the sacrificial element in nature do not exhaust the meaning of the Redemption wrought through the Cross of Christ, which has a unique character of its own as an 'atonement'; but they serve to link it with the world-process, and to make it more or less evolutionarily intelligible. (See further on this subject Griffith-Jones, The Ascent through Christ, bk. ii, ch. iii, pp. 283-306).

(3) The Risen Life of our Lord initiates the final stage in the spiritual evolution of the race, and completes the range of forces that work for the perfecting of the human soul in its upward march. The Resurrection and the Ascension indicate a fresh epoch in the history of mankind, both in the development of the individual soul and in the progress of society. A new type of character emerges, and a new community is born; each marking a higher achievement and indicating a further advance in spiritual life. Historical Christianity rests on the faith that Jesus rose again and passed into the unseen world, whence He continues to send forth His personal influence and saving grace by His Spirit among believers, and through them into the world at large. This He does first by quickening individual men in the New Life, enabling them to conquer sin, and to put forth the distinctive Christian virtues; and, secondly, by the perpetual renewal and invigoration of the Christian society or Church, which is composed of those believers who join in brotherly love in the active service of mankind in the name of their spiritual Head. This new force has leavened and in a measure created modern Western civilization, and though it has so far not succeeded in permeating it through and through with the Christian spirit, it is demonstrable that its finest and most potent elements are those derived from the Christian Ideal and ennobled by the Christian graces. The slowness of the world's spiritual development along Christian lines is undeniable, it is marked by ages of stagnation and by periods of unmistakable reaction; this, however, is entirely consistent with the laws of evolution through all its upward stages, and is inevitable when we remember the potent forces of spiritual degeneracy and inertia which oppose its march. It is clear that there is no rival directive or inspiring ideal among mankind that could take the place of Christianity without crying halt to all that is noblest in the life of the race. The future of the world lies with Christ, unless it is to fall back on a lower stage of ethical and spiritual development on its way to utter disintegration and decadence. Since the lines of cosmic development have so far been on the whole in an upward direction, and since there is no indication that the Christian ideal has lost its hold on the best minds of the race, or is less potent than formerly in regenerating individual souls and in inspiring the Church to ever fresh activity and influence, there is reason for confident belief that at last the race as a whole will be raised to the Christian level, and that the future is with Him of whom it is prophesied that He shall reign in undisputed sway over the affections and command the obedience of all mankind (Ph 2<sup>10-11</sup>, Rev 11<sup>15</sup> etc.). EXALTATION.—1. The general sentiment that the lowly in heart alone receive the true exaltation, is exceedingly prominent in both the Old and New Testaments. The life of Christ was throughout one of self-humbling, but He knew prophetically that it would end in the highest exaltation. In the Song of Mary at the Annunciation this principle of Divine procedure is stated: 'He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree' (Lk 1<sup>28</sup>). In Christ's parable of the Wedding Feast He insists on this principle, as against the self-seeking and pride of the scribes and Pharisees, who love the chief seats in the synagogue, and the foremost places at feasts. It is better to take the lowest room, and wait till the host shall give their proper place to one's virtue and dignity, by saying, 'Friend, come up higher' (Lk 14<sup>10</sup>). The behaviour of a Christian among his fellows should have regard to this principle. He is not to be forward to lay claim to that which may even be his right (cf. Mt 23<sup>12</sup>; Lk 14<sup>11</sup> 18<sup>14</sup>).

2. One of the clearest words of Jesus in regard to His own exaltation is Jn 12<sup>28</sup>. Some Greeks came desiring to see Him. Our Lord seeing in this desire of theirs something prophetic of the future ingathering of the Gentiles into His kingdom, opened up His heart to His disciples as to the way in which He hoped to conquer the hearts of men. He made somewhat enigmatic reference to His death. He knew that the hour had almost come for the suffering of the lowly Son of Man. But it is necessary that the seed which is to produce a great harvest must first die. So it is a law of the Kingdom of God that life in this world must be sacrificed, if need be, that life eternal may be gained as a permanent possession. After the Saviour's life of service, the due reward will be honour from God. When the heavenly voice spoke, the Saviour was consoled and uplifted by the thought that He would cast out the prince of this world, and be lifted up (hupodidoti) as a victorious conqueror. It was a prediction of His final triumph over evil, and His eternal reign over all men. The outwardly shameful death of the cross would be His true exaltation as the world's Saviour. By the identification of outward events with their inward meaning, He advances men's thoughts to the idea of His exaltation to heaven as the victorious One. This anticipation of Jesus is the starting-point for the Church's fully developed doctrine of the Exaltation. 'He rose again from the dead on the third day, He ascended up into heaven, He sitteth on the right hand of God the Father, He shall come to judge the world at the last day.' See art. ASCENSION, JUDGMENT, SESSION.

After the predictions of His suffering, He always spoke of His future glory. He would rise again from the dead (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>). 'In the regeneration the Son of man shall sit on the throne of His glory' (19<sup>28</sup>). 'The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels, and then shall he render unto every man according to his deeds' (10<sup>42</sup>). In the sayings in the Gospel of John there are many lofty statements as to His heavenly glory (cf. 14<sup>2</sup> 17<sup>24</sup> etc.). DAVID M. W. LAIRD.

EXAMPLE.—

A. LINGUISTIC USAGE.—The word 'example' (or 'ensample') occurs 15 times in the AV and 17 times in the RV of the NT. In the two versions it stands 7 times (1 Co 10<sup>8</sup>, Ph 3<sup>17</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>7</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>14</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>12</sup>, Ti 2<sup>7</sup> RV, 1 P 5<sup>9</sup> for typos; once (1 Ti 1<sup>16</sup> RV) for typos, once (1 Co 10<sup>11</sup>) in adverbial phrase for typos, 5 times (Jn 13<sup>15</sup>, He 4<sup>11</sup> 8<sup>9</sup>, Ja 5<sup>10</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>20</sup>) for typos, once (Ac 20<sup>32</sup>) as partial rendering of typos, once (Jude 7) for typos, once (Mt 1<sup>19</sup>) as partial rendering of typos, and once (1 P 2<sup>24</sup>) for typos. For our present purpose Mt 1<sup>19</sup> falls quite out of account. typos (Jude 7) is a 'specimen', 'an (illustrative) exhibit'—in this instance set forth as a warning, though of itself this simple form hardly suggests either imitation or shunning, as typos does. The other passages all more or less illustrate the topic in hand. Besides these, there are, of course, many other passages which, though not employing the term 'example', are no less relevant and significant than these.

Thus, whether tr. 'example' or 'pattern', 'type', has generally an important bearing upon our topic. Primarily the 'mark', 'impression' of a stroke or blow (Jn 8<sup>28</sup> 'print'), hence 'figure', 'image' (Ac 7<sup>43</sup>), typos is generally 'pattern', 'type', 'example'. Sometimes the example is by way of warning, as 1 Co 10<sup>11</sup>. Generally, however, it is an example to be imitated. A corresponding sense is to be ascribed to typos (1 Ti 1<sup>16</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>13</sup>). (In the latter passage Holmann's and Cremer's interpretation 'Abbild' seems hardly warranted. Timothy is to hold fast the 'type' of doctrine which he had received from Paul, and this 'type' is not regarded as Timothy's copy of Paul's, but as something which had now become common to both.)—typos is a concrete illustration or exhibition, designed for imitation or for warning—generally the former. In one instance in the NT typos is used for after-representation (Ger. Abbild).—typos is a 'writing-copy' (model), to be imitated by the pupil. Hence an example set before one for close imitation. This is perhaps the most vivid of the NT terms indicative of Christ's exemplariness. The term itself implies the strictest imitation; though both the context and the general teaching of the NT will save us from the error of conceiving Christ's example as something formal and external.

Among the other terms which give expression to the idea of Christian example, the most prominent are akolouthos and imitator (AV 'follower' and 'follower', RV 'imitate' and 'imitator'). The verb occurs 4 times in the NT (2 Th 2<sup>14</sup>, He 13<sup>7</sup>, 2 Jn 1<sup>8</sup>), in one of these instances in connexion with typos. The noun occurs 6 times (1 Co 4<sup>16</sup> 11<sup>1</sup>, Eph 5<sup>1</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>16</sup> 2<sup>14</sup>, He 6<sup>12</sup>—at 1 P 3<sup>18</sup> the reading imitator is to be rejected), in every instance signifying 'imitator' in the ethico-religious sense. In Eph 5<sup>1</sup> we find imitator in Christ, in He 6<sup>12</sup> it is the exemplary saint who are to be imitated in 1 Co 4<sup>16</sup> 8<sup>1</sup>. Paul exhorts to the imitation of himself, rather than to turn away from him, inasmuch as he was their father in the faith. In 1 Co 11<sup>1</sup> he bids his readers imitate him as he imitates Christ. In 1 Th 1<sup>6</sup> it is 'imitators of us and of the Lord', while in 1 Th 2<sup>14</sup> it is 'the churches of God in Judaea,' of whom the Thessalonians had become imitators.

Jesus in gathering His disciples about Him generally bade men 'follow' Him (akolouthete; in one instance, Mt 4<sup>19</sup>, akolouthete). Primarily the expression means no more than 'to accompany' as a disciple, and yet manifestly it became, in our Lord's use of it, one of the most characteristic and intensely significant expressions of the idea of discipleship in all its deepest import. So where Christ bids the rich young ruler sell all that he has and 'come, follow me,' or in the words on 'taking up the cross and following,' and elsewhere (see esp. Mt 10<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>38</sup> 16<sup>24</sup>, Jn 12<sup>26</sup> 21<sup>22</sup>). The verb is not found in the Epistles, except at 1 Co 11<sup>1</sup>.

Christ is represented as the 'image'—image—which Christians are to resemble (Ro 8<sup>29</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>49</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>18</sup>, Col 3<sup>10</sup>). But those passages also which represent Christ as the image of God must be taken no less into account: for Christ's claim to an unconditional personal authority is expressly based upon the fact that He is the image—the apprehensible representation—of the invisible God (Jn 1<sup>18</sup> 16<sup>7</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>4</sup>, Col 1<sup>15</sup>, He 1<sup>3</sup>—in the last passage the word is ymaginis). In this connexion mention must be made also of the expressions 'children of God,' 'of your Father,' 'of the Highest' (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>, Lk 11<sup>2</sup> 20<sup>9</sup>). Also in the Epistles the filial relation is made to imply the following of the example of God in Christ (e.g. Eph 5<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>4</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>4</sup>). Besides the terms already considered, which give more or less formal expression to the Christian idea of exemplariness, there are many more, which—some of them in the most elementary and untechnical terms—no less definitely express the same thought. The very idea of discipleship in our Lord's teaching involved the idea of the personal exemplariness of the Master (see esp. Mt 10<sup>24</sup>, Lk 14<sup>27</sup>, 28, Jn 13<sup>15</sup>). The same thought is expressed in Eph 4<sup>20</sup> 'Ye have not so learned Christ.' In He 6<sup>20</sup> Jesus is called our 'Forerunner.' His temptations are typical (He 2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>), and in His our example in the enduring of temptation (He 3<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>22</sup>). True believers have the 'mind of Christ' (1 Co 2<sup>16</sup>, Ph 2<sup>5</sup>, cf. Ro 8<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>12</sup>). Christ is the 'life,' and as such is the 'light' of men (Jn 1<sup>9</sup> 8<sup>12</sup>, cf. 2 Jn 8<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>36</sup>, 28, 46, 1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>). He is Himself 'the way,' etc. (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>). Believers are to 'put on' Christ (Ro 13<sup>14</sup>, Gal 3<sup>27</sup>, Eph 4<sup>24</sup>, Col 3<sup>12</sup>). The Christian's 'walk' is to be according to Christ (see esp. 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>6</sup>, Eph 5<sup>2</sup>, Col 2<sup>6</sup>). Finally,—for an exhaustive study of the linguistic usage is not intended,—many of the most characteristic expressions of the thought of exemplariness in Christianity are effected without the use of any peculiar terms. The word 'as,' or something else equally simple and direct, often best serves the purpose (e.g. Mt 5<sup>8</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>14</sup>, Eph 4<sup>20</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>6</sup> 4<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>2</sup>).

B. THE DOCTRINE.—i. THE EXAMPLE OF CHRIST.—4.

—4. In the teaching of Jesus no truth is more essential than that God the Father Himself is the original and absolute example for all personal life. The Law is holy, for it is the expression of the will of God. But the letter apart from God's immediate personal will is dead. As Jesus expounds the Law, the disciples learn to look through the particular commandment to the personal will of the living God. It is not enough to keep the commandment in the most scrupulous fashion, as if it were something standing apart and complete in itself (Mt 5<sup>21</sup>). We have to do directly with God Himself. His will and personal nature are our sole and absolute standard (Mt 5<sup>48</sup>). In answer to the young ruler who asked what good thing he should do in order to have eternal life, Jesus refuses to be regarded as one who might propose some novel good—some good other than that which is already known from God. Apart from God there is no good (Mt 19<sup>17</sup>). To love God is the first commandment; and the coming of His Kingdom and the doing of His will should be man's first concern (Mt 22<sup>37</sup> 38).

But Jesus does more than point to God as the absolute standard for personal life. He comes to make God known. It is not enough to know that God is the standard, so long as God's nature is unknown. So Jesus was sent as the perfect revelation of the Father (Jn 14<sup>9</sup>). Not that God was hitherto unknown: what the Jews worshipped they knew (Jn 4<sup>22</sup>). Jesus came to complete the revelation of God. He gives a perfect interpretation of the mind and will of God, and in His own Person perfectly exemplifies that mind and will. He is conscious of perfect accord with the will of the Father (Mt 12<sup>50</sup> 51, 1 Jn 5<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>29</sup> 14<sup>21</sup>). His words and acts He has learned from the Father, even from the Father's example (Jn 8<sup>28</sup> 5<sup>17</sup>, 19). This principle determines His whole treatment of the Mosaic Law. The inevitable limitations of mere statutes He overcomes by an appeal to the Divine example and order (as in the case of the law of the Sabbath and the law of marriage, Jn 5<sup>1</sup>, Mt 19<sup>4-6</sup>, in the latter case appealing also to Scripture as well as to fact). And because He knows God as the Son knows the Father—immediately and perfectly (Jn 7<sup>29</sup> 8<sup>55</sup> 10<sup>14</sup>, Mt 11<sup>27</sup>), and because He perfectly fulfils the will of God, Jesus demands an unconditional following, which shall consist, not in copying the outward form, but in the most inward appropriation of the ruling principle of His life (Mt 7<sup>21-27</sup> 23<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>23-25</sup> 11<sup>28</sup>, 22 20<sup>21-23</sup> 16<sup>24</sup>, 22 20<sup>22</sup> 23<sup>23</sup> 8<sup>12-22</sup> 19<sup>21</sup>, Jn 15<sup>2-10</sup> 8<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>28</sup>, 28, 44-50 13<sup>12-17</sup> 15<sup>4-7</sup> 17<sup>21-23</sup> 21<sup>22</sup>). He does not set Himself forth as a substitute for the Father, but as the One who knows God and teaches us to know Him. He is the Light of Life, the Way, the Truth, the Life, the visible manifestation of God (Jn 8<sup>12</sup> 14<sup>6-9</sup>). Christ's claim to absolute authority (which expressly included the judgment of the world, e.g. Jn 5<sup>22</sup>) is based not upon His prophetic office alone, but upon that unity of word and deed which constituted the perfect revelation of the will of God. Jesus' own Person was not left out of His gospel (cf. Harnack's statement, Wesen des Christentums, p. 91: 'Nicht der Sohn, sondern allein der Vater gehört in das Evangelium, wie es Jesus verkündigt hat, hinein'). Not, indeed, as one doctrine among many, nor as an addition to the doctrine of the Father, did Jesus present the truth concerning Himself. But He claimed to be the perfect and unique embodiment and exemplification of the Father's will. Yet He is more than mere example. He does not merely show the way; He is the Way. At the same time He is the Truth and the Life. He gives not only the perfect example but also life-power. In this sense, therefore, Jesus, even according to His own teaching, is more than an element in the gospel: He is the very essence of the gospel.

2. Christ's demand of an unconditional personal following is reproduced in the Apostolic preaching. But after Christ's passion, resurrection, and exaltation, the thought of His exemplarship is expanded and heightened. The Christ who died for the sin of the world is the perfect revelation of God's holy love (e.g. 1 Jn 4<sup>19</sup>), while His exaltation, coupled with the gift of His Spirit, affords assurance that the coveted likeness to Christ and the promised sharing of His glory shall be realized (e.g. Ro 8<sup>2</sup>, 29-30). The thought of Christ as our example is so variously and abundantly applied by the NT writers, that it will suffice here to notice particularly only the more characteristic passages. The concreteness of the revelation in a personal life is most frequently and most strikingly set forth by St. John (Jn 1<sup>4</sup>, 14, 18, 1 Jn 1<sup>3</sup> 4<sup>2-3</sup>). Jesus is the perfect example of the life of faith, even its Author and Perfecter (He 12<sup>2</sup>). He was tempted like as we are (2<sup>18</sup>, 18 4<sup>7</sup>), and is the perfect pattern of patient endurance of all temptation, even unto death (3<sup>15</sup>, 12<sup>24</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>11</sup> 2<sup>21-23</sup> 3<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>; cf. Gethsemane and Calvary in the Gospels). He is our example of mercy and forgiveness (Eph 4<sup>32</sup>, Col 3<sup>13</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>21</sup>); in self-denial and humble service (Ph 2<sup>24</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>, Ro 15<sup>3-7</sup>); in meekness, gentleness, and forbearance (2 Co 10<sup>1</sup>, Col 3<sup>12</sup>, Eph 4<sup>2</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>20</sup>); in the love that suffers, labours, and dies for others (1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>14-15</sup>, Eph 5<sup>2-3</sup>, Gal 6<sup>3</sup>, Ph 2<sup>25</sup>); in holiness and purity (Eph 4<sup>22</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>15</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>15</sup>, 4<sup>17</sup>). And then, more broadly, believers are exhorted to 'put on Christ,' or 'the new man,' renewed after Christ's image (Ro 13<sup>14</sup>, Eph 4<sup>24</sup>, Col 3<sup>10</sup>, 11, Gal 3<sup>27</sup>); and to 'walk' in, or according to, Christ (Eph 5<sup>2</sup>, Col 2<sup>6</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>6</sup>). The highest destiny of believers is to be made like Christ (Ro 8<sup>29</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>). In this connexion the significance of those passages in which Christ is called the image of God (Col 1<sup>15</sup>, He 1<sup>3</sup>, cf. Jn 1<sup>14</sup>) should not be overlooked; for God has given us this perfect revelation in a Person just in order that we might find in Him our true example and archetype.

In addition to these and all other specific expressions of the thought of Christ's exemplarship, there stands the great fact that the whole picture which the Evangelists drew of Jesus was made under the powerful influence of the twofold conviction that He was the image of the Father, so that by Him we know the 'Christ-like God,' and that He was the Ideal Man—not an ideal creation of human fancy, but the Ideal-Real come from God Himself.

3. It has already been briefly noted that Christ Himself as well as His disciples bore witness that He was to His own much more than mere example. The relation of His followers to Jesus is something more than that of those who are striving to copy a model. Christ is example in a deeper sense. He is not only 'type,' but also 'archetype' (e.g. 1 Co 15<sup>20</sup>, 46-49, Ro 8<sup>29</sup>, He 2<sup>11-12</sup> 17). An example for personal life must in any case be something better than a mould for the multiplication of its own form. Personality is interested in inward traits and principles, which are to be independently developed in the greatest variety of forms. But Jesus' relation to us lies even deeper than this. He is the 'archetype,' the 'original,' of our personal life. Now an original is not passively there to be copied; it sustains some sort of active causal relation to the copy. So Christ is our example in this more vital sense: He is at once example and original (admirably expressed in Ger. Vorbild and Urbild). As our 'original,' Christ not only (as in the case of mere examples in personal life) mysteriously impresses us, but also imparts life and power through His Spirit (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>, 17 5<sup>24-25</sup>, Ro 8<sup>2</sup>, Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, Col 3<sup>2</sup>, 4, 1 Jn 5<sup>12</sup>, and many more passages). He who, having fulfilled the Law, is henceforth Himself the Law (Ro 10<sup>4</sup>, Gal 3<sup>12</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>21</sup>), has engaged to work likeness unto Himself in all who believe. So we may say with Augustine: 'Give what Thou commandest, and command what Thou wilt.' If Christ is to us mere example, without renewing power, we are, after all, 'under law,' and not 'under grace.' 'But the Word became not only flesh, but also spirit' (Kähler, Wissensch. d. chr. Lehre, p. 510. See Jn 20<sup>22</sup>, 22 6<sup>7</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>17-18</sup>). Yet the inward operation of the Spirit in producing likeness to Christ has constant and express reference to the historic Christ (Jn 16<sup>14</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>2</sup>, 3).

4. The actual validity of the picture of Christ as example, implies the genuine humanness of the life and the adequate fullness and clearness of the picture. Furthermore, the example must be capable of universal application. As to the humanness of the life of Jesus, it is sufficient in this connexion to point out that the Biblical witness is without a trace of questioning as to its reality. Even the highest confessions of Jesus as the Son of God are never at the expense of the patent fact that He is truly man. As to the pictures of Christ in the Gospels, while these are not biographies, as that term is commonly understood, they do give a wonderfully luminous and vivid portrait of the personal life of our Lord. Using the historical material for the sake of its content of truth, they show us Jesus the Witness, in word and deed, of the holy love of God, and as the Bearer of love and truth and life to the world. Affirming love to God and man as the supreme law, He Himself fulfilled that law, gladly laying down His life that He might glorify the Father and bring salvation to the world. And this life of unimagined self-sacrifice He led to the end, in spite of manifold and tremendous temptations, without once deviating from the path appointed by the Father. And with it all there was no ascetical denial of the values that are primarily temporal; nor did He lose either joy or repose of soul through His sufferings and conflicts. A marvellous openness in word and deed was ever characteristic of Him who came a Light into the world. Besides all this, here is a life that manifestly reached its goal. The course of that life had been one continual renunciation of proffered worldly advantage and success; nevertheless its end was a unique triumph. For the real end was not Calvary, but the exaltation to the right hand of God. However hidden this end may be from the unbelieving world, Christian faith sees in the resurrection and exaltation of Christ the one supreme proof that righteousness cannot fail. This is the 'conviction of righteousness,' because Jesus has gone to the Father (Jn 16<sup>10</sup>). Without such a revelation of the appointed end of faith and righteousness the example would be incomplete, and Christian ethics could not maintain its ideal.

This picture of Jesus is capable of universal application. It is true the vocation of Jesus was unique. And yet the principles which controlled that life—perfect trust in the Father, and perfect love to God and man—are manifestly applicable under all possible circumstances. Such love as Christ's is the fulfilling of the Law. In one respect only is there a seeming limitation—for it is only He is without the struggle with inward sin—He can be no model for the transformation of a sinful life. Inasmuch, however, as the processes of renewal are not our affair—we need only to be joined to our Lord in faith and to follow Him—this is no lack. Although 'a Jew of the first century,' Jesus is the Son of Man, in everything essential to personality free from the limitations of His own time and people. He is not less the kinsman of all peoples; He is 'the contemporary of every age.'

5. We have further to consider the practical relation of the disciple to the example of Christ. We are commanded to 'follow,' to 'imitate,' to 'put on Christ,' to 'follow in his steps.' But how are we to conceive the problem of discipleship? For, while the Church has never failed to hear the call of Jesus, 'Follow me!' the conception of discipleship has sometimes been much distorted. In the Middle Ages the dominant thought was asceticism. The ascetic imitation of Christ, of which St. Francis is the most noteworthy example, selects certain traits in His life, and by undue emphasis upon these, together with a neglect of others, produces a distorted image. Then there have been enthusiasts who thought to be able to follow Christ in sharing His redemptorial work—exaggerating and perverting such passages as Ph 3<sup>10</sup>, Gal 6<sup>1</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>9</sup>. Again, rationalism has made of Christ simply a model of virtues to be copied. These three are perhaps the most important types of perversion of the NT idea of Christ's exemplarship; but the three appear in various modifications and combinations. The only safeguard against such errors seems to lie in a consistent emphasis upon the integrity of the Biblical picture of Christ.

Among evangelical theologians the term 'imitation' of Christ is very commonly objected to as implying merely a formal copying of the Lord's example. The word, of course, can be so understood; but so also may the word 'following.' In any event it must be insisted upon that the words 'imitate' and 'imitator' in the NT (RV) have no such unevangelical meaning.

The believer's practical attitude to the example of Christ may be profitably studied in the light of a few characteristic passages: (a) Answering to the frequent declaration of the absoluteness of Christ's authority (e.g. Mt 23<sup>8-10</sup>, Eph 1<sup>22</sup>, Ph 2<sup>9-11</sup>), there are many passages which emphasize the obligation of exclusive loyalty to Him (e.g., 2 Co 10<sup>5</sup> 11<sup>2</sup>, Col 3<sup>17</sup>, Eph 4<sup>9</sup>). (b) We are to have the mind of Christ, and to set the mind on the things above, where Christ is (Col 3<sup>17</sup>, Ro 12<sup>3</sup>, Eph 4<sup>23</sup>). (c) We shall be transformed into the image of Christ by beholding Him, though the energy that produces the result comes from 'the Lord the Spirit' (2 Co 3<sup>18</sup>—see also Drummond, The Changed Life). (d) Complementing the thought of meditation as a means to Christ-likeness, there are various passages which set forth the more strenuous elements in the following of Christ (e.g. Ph 3<sup>10-16</sup>). (e) Several passages bid us 'put on Christ' or the 'new man' (Ro 13<sup>14</sup>, Eph 4<sup>24</sup>, Col 3<sup>10-12</sup>). This relates to the formation of a Christian character. (f) Jesus left us an example, that we should 'follow in his steps' (1 P 2<sup>21</sup>). Just as 'the mind of Christ' means inward renewal, and 'putting on Christ' means character-building, so 'to walk in his steps' may fairly serve as a motto for the exercise of Christian love in all social relations. (g) The example of Christ in His personal consummation is the believer's most glorious hope (Ro 8<sup>24</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>2-3</sup>, cf. Eph 3<sup>19</sup>). And the hope set within us is guaranteed by the earnest of the Spirit. We already have a measure of Christ-likeness—we are now sons of God, and His power is working in us to finish the work begun (Ro 8<sup>29</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>2-4</sup>, Eph 3<sup>14-20</sup>, Col 3<sup>10</sup>, Ph 1<sup>6</sup>).

EXAMPLE

But all these various aspects of our relation to our Example presuppose the vital fellowship of a personal faith. No 'imitation' of Christ is according to the gospel if it is anything else than an essential aspect of the life of faith. With all its rare beauty and power, the Imitation of Christ by Thomas à Kempis (?) is hardly conceived in the plane of the perfect law of liberty. And yet, over against the widespread questioning of the universal applicability of Christ's example, as well as the ethical shallowness and indefiniteness of a religion of mere feeling, too much stress cannot be laid upon the vocation of the Christian to take up the cross daily and follow the Lord. 'This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments' (1 Jn 5<sup>2</sup>). The full gospel principle of the freedom of the Spirit being presupposed, the question, 'What would Jesus do?' (see Sheldon, In His Steps), is not unwarranted. But to walk in the Spirit implies that we are not seeking merit or virtue for our own satisfaction, but are seeking to glorify God. To do all 'in the name of the Lord Jesus'—no more comprehensive or profound expression of the fundamental law of Christian living could be conceived; and just this, after all, is what is meant by following Christ. Our task is not in the narrower sense to copy Him, but to receive His Spirit, to understand His mind, to let Him be formed within us. So we shall also 'walk' in Him.

ii. THE EXAMPLE OF THE FOLLOWERS OF CHRIST.—'One is your Teacher—one is your Master, even the Christ' (Mt 23<sup>8-9</sup>). 'Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ' (1 Co 3<sup>11</sup>). This relation of our Lord to us is unique and exclusive. He is our life. We have been renewed after His image. But just because this is so—just because He does beget in His followers a likeness to Himself—those who bear His image are fitted to be examples; only, of course, their exemplarship is relative and mediate. He who said concerning Himself, 'I am the light of the world' (Jn 8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>), said also to His disciples, 'Ye are the salt of the earth, ye are the light of the world' (Mt 5<sup>13-16</sup>). But they are this just because they are His followers, and in virtus of what they have from Him. In various ways our Lord recognizes the value of good example; for instance, where He warns against the bad example of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 23<sup>1-7</sup>). He prays for His disciples: 'As thou didst send me into the world, even so send I them into the world' (Jn 17<sup>18</sup>). They were to be His witnesses; they were to do nothing in their own name. And yet, in order that they might be true witnesses, they must be sanctified in the truth. Their ministry for Christ must be, like Christ's own ministry, an intensely personal one. And when the Lord gives to His disciples that 'example' of humble service in washing their feet (Jn 13<sup>4-6</sup>), and elsewhere (17<sup>17</sup> 13<sup>3</sup>) shows that they shall preach Him through a life of love as well as by word, it cannot be doubted that He places a very high value on the example of His followers.

The NT writers generally, especially St. Paul and St. Peter, lay great stress upon the salutary effect of Christian example (1 P 2<sup>12</sup>; 3: 1, 16, 17; Ph 2<sup>15</sup>; 1 Th 1: 6, 1 Co 7: 17, 1 Th 5: 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100). On the other hand, the danger of an example not positively evil but only doubtful is clearly set forth (e.g. 1 Co 8: 7, Ro 14: 1-13). St. Paul shows the peculiarity of repeated reference to his own example. Reckoning the passage Ac 20: 3 as an authentic report, and including all the Epistles that bear his name, there are not fewer than eight passages (Ac 20: 3, 1 Co 4: 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100) in which the element of specific commendation is lacking. This fact is all the more striking because St. Paul is pre-eminent in the energy with which he repudiates all human merit. 'Christ is all in all.' It is St. Paul, moreover, who declares 'I am not as you yourselves, but Christ Jesus as Lord, and ourselves as your servants for Jesus' sake' (2 Co 4: 5). There is, however, no real incongruity here. An examination of the passages in question will show that St. Paul nowhere assumes authority in his own person. 'Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ' (1 Co 11: 1). This is thoroughly characteristic. It is but another way of affirming that his sole purpose is to lead them to purest, simplest devotion to Christ. 'What then is Apollo? and what is Paul? Ministers through whom ye believed; and such as the Lord gave to him' (1 Co 9: 6). St. Paul does not refuse to be judged as a minister of Christ and steward of the mysteries of God (1 Co 4: 1). He is but a servant and a witness. And if there is anything exemplary in him, it is only the faithfulness and sincerity of his own discipleship and service. 'By the grace of God I am what I am' (1 Co 15: 10). Glorifying is excluded, and neither St. Paul nor any other NT writer ever makes the virtuous life of believers a principal proof of the doctrine; it is, however, powerfully confirmatory. The Apostolic doctrine thus outlined is of such simplicity, that its universal acceptance in the Church is hindered only by the same carnal mind that caused many even in St. Paul's day to 'walk according to man' (1 Co 3: 3).

EXCLUSIVENESS.—The term is here employed to denote that Christ's earthly ministry was confined to the people of Israel. The passages bearing on the subject leave no doubt that Christ regarded the Messianic mission entrusted to Him by the Father as limited to the Jewish nation, and in practice He kept within the limits imposed by the Divine decree. Only on one occasion do we find Him crossing the borders of the Holy Land into heathen territory (Mk 7: 24), and on that occasion His object was not to extend the sphere of His work, but to secure an interval of rest and leisure for the private instruction of His disciples. When the Syrophenician woman, seizing the opportunity presented by His presence in the neighbourhood, appealed to Him to heal her demoniac daughter, He justified Himself at first for refusing by the statement, 'I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 15: 24). At an earlier date, in His instructions to the Twelve in view of their missionary journey, the area of their work was sharply defined in the words, 'Go not into any way of the Gentiles, and enter not into any city of the Samaritans; but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 10: 6). It has been alleged that this restriction of His work was occasioned by want of sympathy with those outside the Jewish pale, in proof of which appeal is made to some of His sayings, such as those in which He characterizes Gentiles as 'dogs' (Mt 15: 26 ff.), directs His disciples to treat an impenitent offender as 'an heathen man and a publican' (Mt 18: 17), and enjoins them to 'use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do' (Mt 6: 7).

The fact of Christ's attitude of aloofness toward the Gentile world throughout His earthly ministry is quite evident. In explanation of it various considerations have to be taken into account. (1) His vocation as 'a minister of the circumcision' (Ro 15: 8) led Him to avoid as far as possible work among Samaritans and Gentiles. As the Messianic King, who came in fulfilment of OT prophecies, His appeal would naturally be, in the first instance, to 'His own' (Jn 1: 11). (2) The whole history of the Jewish people having been a preparation for the Kingdom of God, He recognized in its members 'the children of the kingdom' (Mt 8: 12). By virtue of possessing the oracles of God, Israel alone was fitted to appreciate the message of the Kingdom, which could not be presented to the world at large without a preparatory training, involving more or less delay. (3) To secure a favourable reception for His message it was necessary to avoid, as far as possible, arousing the prejudice and alienating the sympathy of His Jewish hearers, who would have resented any teaching or practice tending to place Gentile communities on a level of privilege with themselves (Lk 4: 22-28). (4) The shortness of His earthly ministry made it imperative that He should restrict the field to be evangelized, and not be diverted from His immediate purpose of establishing the Kingdom among the chosen people by the claims of those outside, however urgent and undeniable. (5) Assuming that the Kingdom was destined ultimately to be universal, its triumph among the Jews would evidently be the most successful method of securing its extension to other nations. As a matter of fact, it was Jewish adherents who afterwards became the agents of spreading it among the Gentiles.

Among the reasons why Gentiles were excluded from the scope of Christ's personal ministry, want of sympathy cannot be included. The evidence, instead of proving want of sympathy, is all the other way. He granted the request of the Roman centurion who sought the healing of his servant, enjoining at the same time his faith as something without a parallel even in Israel (Mt 8: 10). The apparent coldness of His demeanour toward the Syrophenician woman was due to the embarrassing nature of her petition, which required Him to violate the principle by which His conduct had been governed hitherto. He was anxious to help, if He could do so without sacrificing the interests of those who had the first claim upon His services. The term 'dogs' has been objected to on the ground that it is insulting. The woman herself did not view it in this light, and her quick wit turned it into an argument in her own favour.

The term (κυνάμα), moreover, does not denote the ownerless dogs which act as scavengers in the East, but the household pets which serve as the children's playmates. The scruples which led Christ to withhold for a moment the help sought, were in the end overcome by the woman's faith, which won His cordial approval.

There is no trace of racial or religious bias in Christ's reference to the heathen. Any repugnance implied in His language is toward what is evil in their system or in their conduct. It is their method of prayer with which He has no sympathy, and which He stigmatizes as unworthy of imitation. Their lives were often such as to make close association with them unadvisable, and the impenitent offender is regarded as on a par with them in this respect. Christ's attitude toward publicans, who are bracketed with heathen, was anything but unsympathetic; and if He felt toward heathen in the same way, they were objects not of dislike, but of the deepest compassion. See also art. GENTILES, MISSIONS. W. S. MONTGOMERY.

EXCOMMUNICATION denotes the exclusion, either temporary or permanent, and specifically on moral or religious grounds, of a member of a religious body from the privileges which membership in that body ordinarily carries with it. The word does not occur in EV, but we have in the Gospels several references to the practice as it existed among the Jews in the time of Christ, while certain words of Christ Himself supply the germs of the usage of the Christian Church as it meets us in the Apostolic age and was subsequently developed in the ecclesiastical discipline of later times.

i. JEWISH EXCOMMUNICATION.—Passing over the segregation of lepers, though this generally implied exclusion from the synagogue (Mt 8<sup>1</sup> Lk 17<sup>18</sup>),* and coming to excommunication of a more specific kind, we find that it is certainly referred to four times in the Gospels, viz. Lk 6<sup>22</sup> ('blessed are ye . . . when they shall separate you from their company'—ἀφορίσασιν ὑμᾶς), Jn 9<sup>22</sup> ('for the Jews had agreed already that if any man should confess him to be Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue'—ἀποσυνάγωγος γένηται), Jn 12<sup>22</sup> ('they did not confess him, lest they should be put out of the synagogue'—ἵνα μὴ ἀποσυνάγωγοι γένησθε), Jn 16<sup>2</sup> ('they shall put you out of the synagogues'—ἀποσυναγωγούς ποιήσουσιν ὑμᾶς). It is not unlikely, however, that a fifth reference should be found in the ἐξέβαλον αὐτὸν ἐξω of Jn 9<sup>34</sup>,<sup>35</sup> (so AVm and many commentators). Meyer and Westcott (Gospel of St. John) object to this that no sitting of the Sanhedrin had taken place, and that the persons who cross-questioned the formerly blind man were not competent to pronounce the sentence of excommunication. It is true, no doubt, that excommunication properly denotes a formal sentence passed by the officials of the congregation (Schürer, HJP II. ii. 60),—though in Talmudic times a minor form of excommunication by an individual, and especially by a rabbi, was also recognized (Jewish Encyc. vol. v. p. 286 f.),—but as it was 'the Jews,' i. e. in the language of the Fourth Gospel the Jewish authorities, who expelled the man, it seems quite possible that the examination described in Jn 9 was of a formal nature. This is confirmed by the expressions, 'they bring to the Pharisees him that aforesaid was blind' (v. 13), 'they called the parents' (v. 18), 'they called a second time the man that was blind'

* Being forbidden to enter a walled town, they could not worship in the synagogue in such places; but in unwalled towns a corner was frequently reserved for them in the synagogue, on condition that they were the first to enter and the last to depart (see Hastings' DB iii. 97).

(v. 24), which suggests an authoritative summons before an official body. And when we read in v. 25 'Jesus heard that they had cast him out,' this seems to imply that some grave act of formal censure had been passed upon the man.

Of the fact that excommunication was practised in the Jewish synagogue in the time of Christ, these passages leave us in no doubt. But now comes the question whether at that time there were different kinds of excommunication. In the Talmud two degrees are recognized, a minor, niddāi (נִדְבֵי), and a major, ḥērem (חֵרֶם); the former being a temporary exclusion from the synagogue together with a restriction upon social intercourse with others, while the latter amounted to a ban of indefinite or permanent duration.* It must be remembered, however, that as an authority upon Jewish usages the Talmud does not carry us back to the earliest Christian age, and that for the practice of Jewish courts in the time of our Lord the NT itself is our only real source of information. And while it has sometimes been fancied that in the Gospels we have an indication of two kinds or degrees of excommunication—the ἀποσυνάγωγος of Jn 9<sup>22</sup> being distinguished either, as something more severe, from the ἀφορίστω of Lk 6<sup>22</sup>, or, as something more mild, from the ἐξβάλλειν of Jn 9<sup>34</sup>,<sup>35</sup>—the truth is that there are no adequate grounds for such discriminations. It is, of course, quite possible, and even likely, that in the time of Christ there were distinct grades of exclusion from the privileges of the Jewish community, corresponding to the later niddāi and ḥērem,† but the NT cannot be said to testify to anything more than the fact of excommunication itself.

For the immediate origin of the practice of excommunication as it meets us in the Gospels, we have only to go back to Ezra and the days after the Exile, when the strictest discipline was absolutely essential to the solidarity, indeed to the very existence, of the Jewish Church and nation. Ezra insisted that those Jews who had married foreign wives should either put away both their wives and the children born of them, or forfeit their whole substance and be separated from the congregation of Israel (Ezr 10<sup>2</sup>). But the ultimate roots of the practice are to be sought in the Pentateuchal legislation, with its exclusion of the ceremonially unclean from the camp of the congregation (Lv 13<sup>46</sup>, 48, Nu 5<sup>2</sup>, 3), and its devotion to destruction (Dt 20, whence Dt 20<sup>17</sup>) of whole cities or tribes as enemies of Israel (Dt 2<sup>34</sup> 3<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>2</sup>; cf. Jg. 213, where the men of Jabesh-gilead themselves fall under the ban of extermination for not coming up to Mizpeh along with their brethren).

With regard to the grounds on which, in our Lord's time, sentence of excommunication was passed, the Talmud speaks of twenty-four offences as being thus punishable—a round number which is not to be taken too literally (Jewish Encyc., art. 'Excommunication')—though later Rabbinical authorities have carried out the list into its particulars. When we read that the rulers decreed that any one who confessed Jesus to be Christ should be put out of the synagogue (Jn 9<sup>22</sup> 12<sup>20</sup>), this may show that they possessed a large discretionary power of fixing the grounds of ecclesiastical censure. But if the later lists of Talmudical writers rest on traditions that go back to the time of Christ, there were certain recognized categories of offence, such as 'dealing lightly with any of the Rabbinic or Messianic precepts,' under which it would be easy for the Jewish casuists to arraign any one who called Jesus Master or acknowledged Him to be the Messiah.

* The attempt has sometimes been made to discover in the language of the Talmud a third and more awful kind of excommunication named shammattā (שָׁמַטָּא); and in accordance with this it has been supposed that there may be a reference to the three presumed degrees of Jewish excommunication in Lk 6<sup>22</sup>—they shall separate you from their company (niddāi), and reproach you (ḥērem), and cast out your name as evil (shammattā). But it is now generally acknowledged that the idea of this threefold distinction is due to a mistake, and that, as used in the Talmud, shammattā is simply a general designation for both the niddāi and the ḥērem (see Buxtorf, Lexicon, s.v. שָׁמַטָּא; Schürer, HJP II. ii. 60).

† It is perhaps suggestive that ἀνάθεμα is the constant LXX rendering of the OT חֵרֶם (Jos 617. 19 7 passim 22<sup>20</sup>, 1 Ch 27), and that ἀνάθεμα and ἀναθεματισμός meet us frequently in the NT as expressive of a curse or strong form of banning (Mk 14<sup>27</sup>, Ac 2312. 14. 21, Ro 9<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>3</sup> 16<sup>22</sup>, Gal 1<sup>8</sup> 5<sup>7</sup>).

ii. CHRISTIAN EXCOMMUNICATION.—It lies beyond the scope of this Dictionary to deal with excommunication as practised in the Apostolic Church, and as it meets us especially in the Pauline writings. But in the teaching of our Lord Himself we find the principles at least of the rules which St. Paul lays down in 1 Co 5, 2 Co 2<sup>6-11</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>20</sup>, Tit 3<sup>10</sup>.

In Mt 16<sup>19</sup> Jesus promises to St. Peter the keys of the Kingdom of heaven, so that whatsoever he shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever he shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. In Mt 18<sup>17-19</sup> He makes a similar promise to the Church generally, or to the Twelve as representing the ecclesia—not 'qua apostles with ecclesiastical authority, but qua disciples with ethical power of morally disciplined men' (Bruce, Expositor's Gr. Test., ib. loc.; cf. further Jn 20<sup>23</sup>). And in the immediately preceding context (vv. 15-17) He gives directions as to the way in which an offending brother is to be dealt with in the Church. The injured person is first to go to him privately and endeavour to show him his fault. If he will not listen, one or two other Christian brethren are to accompany the first as witnesses—not in any legal sense, we must suppose, but because 'consensus in moral judgment carries weight with the conscience' (Bruce, op. cit., ib. loc.). If he is still obdurate, the Church is now to be appealed to: 'and if he refuse to hear the Church (ἐκκλησία) also, let him be unto thee as the Gentile and the publican.' That ἐκκλησία in this passage means the community of Christian believers, and not, as Hort, for example, thinks (Christian Ecclesia, p. 10), the Jewish local community, seems in every way probable. Jesus had already spoken at Caesarea of the ἐκκλησία that is built on Christian faith and confession (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>), and it was altogether natural that on this later occasion He should refer to it again in speaking of the relations between Christian brethren. But it would be a mistake to find in this passage any reference to a formal process of excommunication on the part of the Church. The offender of whom Christ speaks excommunicates himself from the Christian community by refusing to listen to its united voice, and the members of the community have no option but to regard him as an outsider so long as he maintains that attitude. That Jesus meant nothing harsh by the expression 'as the Gentile and the publican,' and certainly did not mean a permanent exclusion from the Christian society, may be judged from the way in which He treated a Roman centurion and a Syrophenician woman, and from the name given Him by His enemies—'the friend of publicans and sinners.' No doubt in an organized society a solemn and formal act such as St. Paul prescribes in 1 Co 5<sup>4-5</sup> is a natural deduction from the words of Christ in this passage; but it cannot be said that such an act is definitely enjoined by the Lord Himself. It is the attempt to find here the authoritative institution of excommunication as a formal act of ecclesiastical discipline that gives a colour of justification to the contention of some critics (e.g. Holtzmann, Hand-Commentar zum NT, ib. loc.) that what we have in this passage is not an actual saying of Jesus, but a reflexion of the ecclesiastical practice in the Jewish-Christian circles for which the Gospel of Matthew was written.

From our Lord's teaching in this passage it seems legitimate to infer that, though excommunication may become necessary in the interests of the Christian society, it should never be resorted to until every other means has been tried, and in particular should be preceded by private dealing in a brotherly and loving spirit. From the two parables of the Tares and the Wheat (Mt 13<sup>24-36</sup> 36-43) and the Draw-net (Mt 13<sup>47-50</sup>) we may further gather that Christ would have His people to exercise a wise patience and caution in the use even of a necessary instrument. Mt 18<sup>15-17</sup> shows that there are offences which are patent and serious, and are not to be passed over. But from the two parables referred to we learn the impossibility of the Donatist dream of an absolutely pure Church. Not even those who have the enlightenment of the Spirit are infallible judges of character. The absolute discrimination between 'the good' and 'the bad' (Mt 13<sup>49</sup>) must be postponed till 'the end of the age' (v. 40). Only under the personal rule of the Son of Man Himself shall all things that offend (πάρα τὰ σκάνδαλα) be gathered out of His Kingdom (v. 41).

EXCUSE.—'To make excuse' (παραισέσθαι), Lk 14<sup>13</sup> means to avert displeasure by entreaty, to crave indulgence, to seek to be freed from an obligation or duty. (Cf. the use of 'excuse' in Dampier, Voyages, ii. l. 99: 'In the evening he sent me out of the palace, desiring to be excused that he could not entertain me all night'). παραισέσθαι is used by Josephus exactly as here of declining an invitation (Ant. VII. vii. 2). ἔχε με παρηγοῦν (vv. 13, 15) may be a Latinism for habere me excusatum, but see Meyer and Weiss contra.

These guests had evidently received a previous invitation, as is customary in the East, which they had accepted (vv. 12, 17). Their unanimity, the absence of an adversative ἀλλά or οὐδέ, and the order of the words, combine to make παραισέσθαι a surprise when it comes (contrast v. 15). They did not give a direct refusal, they were detained by certain hindrances which were not wrong in themselves, but they all showed the same spirit in rejecting the invitation because they preferred to follow their own inclinations. The first had bought a field, he was elated by his already acquired possessions (Trench, Parables), and alleged a necessity (ἔχω ἀνάγκην); 'sepe concurrunt tempora gratie acceptissima et mundana negotia urgentissima' (Bengel). The second may illustrate the anxiety of getting; he alleges rather his plan and purpose (πορεύομαι). The third was detained by pleasure; his marriage seemed a sufficient reason, and he simply said οὐ δύναμαι. Gerhard sums up the hindrances as 'dignitates, opes, voluptates,' cf. Lk 8<sup>14</sup>. 'His omnibus modert poterat sanctum illud odium v. 26' (Bengel).

'Excuse' is also used in RV for ἀπολογία (Jn 15<sup>25</sup>), so Wyc., Vulg. (excusatio); AV follows Tindale 'dloke.' Cf. Ps 140 (141)<sup>4</sup> τοῖς προφαίσεσθαι προφάσεις ἐν ἀμαρτίαις; Vulg. 'ad excusandas excusationes in peccatis.' The Jews had no longer anything to plead in their own defence, as was possible in times of ignorance.

EXPIATION.—See ATONEMENT, DEATH OF CHRIST, RANSOM, RECONCILIATION, REDEMPTION.

EXTORTION (ἀπαγωγή).—The word is used by Christ in His terrible arraignment of the scribes and Pharisees, on account of the way in which, by their methods of plunder, they openly violated the Scriptures they knew so well (Mt. 23<sup>23</sup>, Lk. 11<sup>54</sup>). Isaiah (16<sup>4</sup>) had predicted the cessation of the extortioner as one of the signs of the Messianic reign. Ezekiel (22<sup>12</sup>) had inveighed against this sin as one of the transgressions of Israel which called forth the Divine wrath. Yet they, who claimed to keep the Law to the letter, and who professed to be the teachers of the Law, fattened themselves on extortion and filled their cups by it. For the methods of extortion practised by the publicans see art. PUBLICAN.

EYE.—The OT usage of 'eye' (עַיַן), with its material and figurative senses, is found to be faithfully continued in the Gospels.

The almost invariable word used in the Gospels is ὀφθαλμός; in two passages (Mt. 20<sup>34</sup>, Mk. 8<sup>20</sup>) ἄσπετος is found, but used only in the plural. The difference in meaning between the two would appear to be that ἄσπετος refers to the material organ as distinct from its function, while ὀφθαλμός is not only the vehicle of vision but that which sees.* The most usual verb used in connexion with the eyes is βλέω (e.g. Mt. 7<sup>7</sup>, Lk. 6<sup>41</sup>), with its compounds ἀναβλέπω (Mk. 8<sup>20</sup>) and ἀποβλέπω (Mt. 20<sup>34</sup>, Jn. 9<sup>19</sup>); more rarely we find ἴδω (Mt. 13<sup>14</sup>, Lk. 2<sup>30</sup> 16<sup>28</sup>, Jn. 12<sup>40</sup>) and θεωρέω (Jn. 4<sup>26</sup> 6<sup>9</sup>). A fairly frequent phrase is that of 'lifting up (ἔγειρα) the eyes,' (e.g. Mt. 17<sup>22</sup>, Lk. 13<sup>28</sup> 13<sup>31</sup>, Jn. 4<sup>21</sup>); in every case in which the eyes of Christ are mentioned this word is used (Lk. 6<sup>30</sup>, Jn. 6<sup>11</sup> 17<sup>1</sup>).

The word 'eye' is used—1. In the ordinary, literal sense: as illustrating the lex talionis, Mt. 5<sup>21</sup>; † of the eyes being heavy with sleep, Mk. 14<sup>37</sup>; ‡ of the multitude fixing their eyes on Christ, Lk. 4<sup>23</sup>; especially of Christ giving sight to the eyes of the blind, e.g. Mt. 9<sup>28</sup> 20<sup>32</sup> 22<sup>22</sup>, Mk. 8<sup>23</sup>, Jn. 9<sup>6</sup>. 2. In a literal sense, but with a figurative sense implied: e.g. the words of Simeon, 'Mine eyes have seen thy salvation' (Lk. 2<sup>30</sup>), where there is primarily the literal looking down upon the babe before him, but also, by implication, the mental vision of God's salvation of which the visible child was the pledge; again, in the words, 'Blessed are your eyes, for they see . . .' (Mt. 13<sup>16</sup>, see also Lk. 10<sup>22</sup>), where we have both the literal seeing of Christ and the seeing, in the sense of understanding, His teaching; further, a striking instance is contained in Lk. 24<sup>41</sup>.

* Perhaps somewhat in the same way that one can differentiate between a musical instrument and the music it gives forth.
† It occurs very rarely outside of Lk., Jn., and Acts.
‡ Cf. in this connexion the Code of Hammurabi, § 196, 'If a man has caused the loss of a gentleman's eye, his eye one shall cause to be lost' (see Johns' The Oldest Code of Laws, p. 48).

where it is said of the two disciples to whom Christ, after His resurrection, became known by the breaking of bread, that 'their eyes were opened, and they knew him.' There appears here (however it may be accounted for) an extraordinarily close connexion or correspondence between weakness in the bodily and the mental vision, for it is certain that their eyes were open, in the ordinary sense, before they recognized Christ. Another example is that in Jn. 4<sup>26</sup> 'Lift up your eyes and look on the fields, that they are white already unto harvest.' What the bodily eye saw here was evidently intended by Christ to be a symbol of the great work of evangelization which He desired the mental vision of the disciples to discern. Under this head would come also Mt. 5<sup>29</sup> 'If thy right eye causeth thee to stumble, cut it out and cast it from thee.' From the context the 'eye' is clearly used here in a material sense, while the 'cut it out' is equally clearly used in a figurative sense (cf. Mt. 19<sup>12</sup>).

3. In a purely figurative sense it is found in Mt. 7<sup>3-6</sup> and Lk. 6<sup>41-42</sup> (the mote in the brother's eye); also in Mt. 6<sup>22-23</sup>, Lk. 11<sup>34</sup> ('The lamp of the body is the eye'), where the eye is spoken of as reflecting the spiritual condition of the heart, though even here it is possible that the thought of the expression of the material eyes may also have been in Christ's mind. Again, in Mt. 20<sup>15</sup> 'Is thine eye evil because I am good?' the eye is used figuratively to express an attitude of envy (see below). Lastly, it must obviously have been used in a purely figurative sense in Lk. 16<sup>22</sup> 'In Hades he lifted up his eyes . . .'

4. There remains the strange expression 'evil eye' (ὀφθαλμὸς πονηρός, Mk. 7<sup>21</sup>). The meaning of this no doubt approximates to that of the similar expression in Mt. 6<sup>28</sup> 20<sup>15</sup>, and, generally speaking, denotes envy; † but it also implied demoniacal possession [see DEMON, III. (b)] ‡ and the 'evil' referred not only to the possessed himself, but also to the harm which might be done to others who came under the influence of the 'evil eye.' †

EYE-WITNESSES (αὐτόματοι, Lk. 1<sup>2</sup>; cf. ἐπίμαται in 2 P. 1<sup>13</sup>).—We have the assurance of the Third Evangelist that the Gospels are founded not upon second-hand reports, but upon the direct testimony of those who were present. Similarly in Jn. 19<sup>35</sup> 21<sup>24</sup> (where the words μαρτυρεῖν and μαρτυρία are used), the record of the Fourth Gospel is certified to be reliable. FABLE.—See PARABLE.

FACE.—Of the words tr. 'face,' 'countenance,' the Heb. פָּנִים indicates the front, that which is presented to view, while mar'eh and the NT terms πρόσωπον, ὄψις, and εἶδω correspond to view, visage, that which can be seen.

1. Physical appearance.—Beauty of face is frequently alluded to in the Bible in connexion with both men and women as a distinguishing personal charm, and a powerful influence for good or evil. The underlying thought is that a noble and beautiful face should be the index of a noble and beautiful spirit. There is a resemblance among the children of a king (Jg. 8<sup>19</sup>). Along with this recognition there are intimations that the Lord seeth not as man seeth (1 S. 16<sup>7</sup>), and that beauty is vain (Pr. 31<sup>30</sup>). In the mysterious personality outlined in Is. 53 one of the arresting features is the absence of such beauty in a face singularly marred, and according to common standards confessedly unattractive. While there is a dark type of comeliness (Ca 19), yet, as might be expected among a people accustomed to olive and sunburnt tones of complexion, it is the exceptional characteristic of a fair and lustrous face that marks the highest form of beauty. In the poetry of the Arabs, when beauty of face is referred to, the usual and ever-sufficient simile is that of the full moon (6th), and in the descriptions of Paradise in the Koran the female attendants of the 'faithful' are called houris, 'the white-faced ones.' The illumination on the face of Moses is still recalled in the Jewish synagogue when the officiating Levite, in pronouncing the benediction (Nu 6th) at the close of the service, veils his face with the tallith, or prayer-cloth. Similarly in the sacred art of the Church, the Transfiguration light on the face of Christ was perpetuated in the halo around the faces of the saints who suffered as His witnesses. In 2 Co 4th the consummation of the gospel is described as the hope of beholding and sharing the manifestation of God's glory as it had been seen in the face of Jesus Christ.

2. In the expression of character and feeling.—Although the face was understood to be only a medium or channel for the manifestation of inward thought and emotion, a more vivid impression was often gained by alluding to it as having the essentials of personality. Thus it has its own health (Ps 42nd), it produces gladness in others (21st, Ac 2nd), and pronounces rebuke (Ps 80th), it falls (Gn 4th), is lifted up (Ps 4th), emits light (44th). All emotions are marked upon it; it is impudent (Pr 7th), harder than a rock (Jer 5th), and may be a face of fury (Ezk 38th). In Lk 12th the face of the sky is referred to as conveying to those who could read it a sign of its intentions. The face being thus closely identified with the person, any violence offered to the face was in the highest degree affronting (1 S 11th, 2 S 10th, Mt 28th). As the expression of the face was regarded as a trustworthy indication of the life within, the Pharisees cultivated an aspect of religious absorption; and Christ showed that the thought behind this device was essentially blind and irreligious, inasmuch as the true service of the Kingdom required the spirit of the Beatitudes (6th). As the emblem of perfected sainthood and ordered harmony, the Church in its final form is represented as having the beauty of a face without spot or wrinkle or any such thing (Eph 5th).

The figure of the averted or hidden face (Dt 31st, Is 53rd) that declines to meet the look of supplication, owes its origin to the fact that Orientals are largely swayed by the strongest feeling of the moment, and can be moved from their previous purpose by well directed emotional appeals. When one man is seeking to appease or persuade another, it is customary, when the right moment has been reached, to put the hand quietly and tentatively under the chin, and thus turn the face so that eye may meet eye, and more kindly feelings prevail. Not to see the face at all is to intercept such emotional persuasion of prostration, pleading, and tears, and means that all hope must be abandoned.

G. M. MACKIE.
FACT AND THEORY.—Christianity is a religion which comes to man from God. It has to do with man's relation to God, and with God's will for man. Any knowledge, therefore, of the nature of Christianity depends upon revelation. This would still be true apart from the fact of sin and the fact that Christianity is a religion of redemption. For God is a personal Spirit; and the only way by which we can know even the finite persons about us is through their revealing themselves to us. When, further, we bear in mind the truth that God is an infinite Spirit, and that we men are finite, it at once becomes obvious that all knowledge of God as well as of His plan or purpose must rest upon a revelation by God. This revelation may be general. Thus the creation of the Universe and of man, with God's image in his heart and able to see God in the work of His hands, is to be regarded as an act of self-revelation on the part of God. But sin is a reality in this universe, and the noetic effects of sin have rendered necessary a special revelation of the holy God to sinful man. Sin has not only made man blind to spiritual realities, it has distorted the purity of the Divine image in man's heart and in nature. Accordingly special revelation must be external, consisting in supernatural acts of God to restore the image of God, and must also consist in a supernatural word-revelation or communication of knowledge to explain the meaning of these acts. Special revelation, then, being soteriological, accompanies the redemptive activity of God. This Divine redemptive activity is historical, and has entered this world of time and space. This was necessary, because sin, the effects of which the redemptive activity was to counteract, is a historical force at work in the world. Since, therefore, special revelation accompanies God's redemptive acts, it too is historical, taking place under the category of time. Hence we have, first of all, God's redeeming acts, culminating in the Incarnation, Death, and Resurrection of Jesus Christ. These redemptive acts are also revealing acts. Thus God's Son came into this world in the flesh in order to save sinners, as St. Paul tells us (1 Ti 1st). But His incarnation is also a revelation of God, as we learn from the prologue to St. John's Gospel. But we have also a word-revelation accompanying the Divine redemptive facts or acts, and giving us their meaning. Indeed, that which rendered necessary the fact-revelation, viz. the noetic effects of sin, also makes necessary an authoritative word-revelation to explain to us the meaning of those acts. Christianity, therefore, consists in facts which have a meaning, or in the meaning of the facts, whichever way we choose to put it. Take away either the facts or their authoritative interpretation, and we have no Christianity left. The mere external facts apart from their meaning are, of course, meaningless, and therefore do not constitute Christianity; while the abandonment of the facts no less destroys the Christian religion, reducing it to a mere natural religion, or religious philosophy. Neither can the abandonment of the facts be justified because of the co-ordination of revelation and redemption, and of the historical character of the latter, to which we have already alluded.

This is the conception of revelation which the Scripture writers themselves give us. They claim that they were spoken to by God, and not merely that they had their religious intuition aroused by the facts of God's revelation. Hence their interpretation of the meaning of the great facts of Christianity, according to their own account of the matter, is not mere human reflexion upon the facts. If, therefore, we reject their interpretation of the facts as itself immediately from God, and therefore authoritative, we shall not be able to trust them for the occurrence of the supernatural facts, and shall be driven logically to deny the immediacy and supernatural character of the Divine activity in the facts themselves. The meaning of the term 'revelation' will have been changed. It will no longer signify the communication of truth by God's acts and words,* it will designate a product of the religious life of man. This does away with the absoluteness of Christianity, and is in direct contradiction to the account given by the Scripture writers themselves of the way in which Divine truth came to them. The question, therefore, really resolves itself into that of the trustworthiness of Christ and His Apostles as teachers of doctrine. The evidence for their trustworthiness is just the evidence for Christianity as a supernatural religion, which, of course, takes us far beyond the limits of this article (cf. Warfield, art. 'The Real Problem of Inspiration' in Pres. and Ref. Rev. iv, p. 177 f.). But if we accept their authority (as we do, resting it on the above mentioned evidence), then Christianity consists in certain great facts, and in the true meaning of those facts. The meaning of a fact is its meaning for a mind. By their true meaning, of course, is meant their meaning for God. This meaning, therefore, He must authoritatively make known to us if we are to have any Christianity.

In the first place, then, to attempt to hold to the great supernatural facts of Christianity and to give up their meaning, is not only impossible, but, were it possible, would result in taking from the facts just that which makes them Christian facts, and which makes them constitutive of the essence of Christianity. There has been an attempt to distinguish between the facts of Christ's life as the permanent Divine Christianity and the 'theories' as relative, human, and changing. This general tendency to separate between fact and theory in Christianity has assumed two forms: on the one hand, it is said that the Bible contains no explanation of the great facts of Christianity; on the other hand, it is admitted that the Bible does contain an explanation of the facts; but, while a special revelation in a series of supernatural acts of God is recognized, a special word-revelation is denied, and the whole doctrinal content of Christianity as contained in the Bible is reduced practically to human reflexion upon the acts of God.

In the former position, it is said that Christianity consists in facts, not in doctrines. We have in the Bible the fact of Christ, but no theory as to His person. We have the fact of the Atonement, but no theory or doctrine of its meaning.

This position has been held by R. J. Campbell and F. W. Farrar in their essays on the Atonement in a volume entitled The Atonement and Modern Religious Thought, 1900. For example, Farrar maintains that any attempt to explain the nature of the Atonement is a 'futile endeavour to be wise above what is written, and to translate the language of emotion into that of right scholasticism.' So also R. F. Horton, in his essay on the Atonement in a volume entitled Faith and Criticism, 1903, says that the NT contains no theory of the Atonement. (Horton has given up this position in his essay on the same subject in the same volume with Farrar's essay). A similar position seems to have been maintained by Astle, who is quoted by H. Bois in De la Connaissance Religieuse, p. 342; cf. Warfield, The Right of Systematic Theology, p. 30.

In regard to this position we should note, first of all, that 'bare facts,' i.e. meaningless facts, are impossible, for every fact has a meaning whether we know it or not. And still further, a 'bare fact' being a meaningless thing, there is no atonement in the 'bare fact' of Christ's death, and no Christianity in the events of His life regarded as 'bare facts.' If we clearly understand that a 'bare fact' is simply an event in the external world apprehended by the senses, or a subjective fact of some self-consciousness, then it may be the statement of a 'bare fact' to say that a man called Jesus was born some 1900 years ago, but we are not to say that He was God's Son made flesh for our salvation; we can say that He died on the cross without going beyond 'bare fact,' or even that He expressed manifestation of truth to the Scripture writer in a supernatural manner. Of course, it should not be forgotten that inspiration is also necessary in order to render the truth infallible to us.

certain feelings, but we cannot say so much as that He died for our sin. It is not necessary to salvation that we should know the full and true meaning of Christ's death; we are not speaking, however, of the conditions of salvation, but of the essence of Christianity. And this lies in the meaning of the great redemptive facts of the Christian religion, or in the facts because of their meaning. We may conceive some false meaning of these facts, but like all facts they must have some meaning, and their true meaning is their meaning for God. Hence, as was said, if we are to know their true meaning, God must tell it to us. If, therefore, we were simply to hold to the facts of Christ's life considered as 'bare facts,' we should have taken away from them that which makes them Christian facts and redemptive facts. In short, this method of treating the facts of Christianity takes from them all that makes them constitutive of the essence of Christianity.*

We should observe, next, that the modes of statement of all those who hold this position suggest the impossibility of holding to 'bare facts.' They speak constantly of the 'fact of the Atonement.' But this is quite ambiguous. If it means that the atonement is real, then it is a true statement, but a statement which involves a theory or interpretation of the fact of Christ's death as atoning for sin. But, taken as they appear to mean it, the statement is false. We may speak of the fact of Christ's death, but in this as a 'bare fact' there is no atonement. As soon as we call it an atonement we have interpreted it by a theory. So, when Farrar says it is a 'landmark of the death of Christ,' that it is 'not only the declaration, but the ground of pardon,' he has gone a long way toward understanding its meaning, and, according to his position, has made the mistake of 'translating the language of emotion into the rigidity of syllogisms.' And this same ambiguity often attaches to the language of those who do not hold this position. Thus the late Dr. Dale, in his book on the Atonement, first seeks to establish its fact and secondly its theory. In reality, however, the first part of his book contains more general, and the latter part more specific, statements of the doctrine or theory. Precisely the same ambiguity is seen in the article 'The Fact of the Atonement,' by R. Mackintosh (Expos. Times, May 1903), who speaks of the 'fact of Christ's death' and the 'fact of the Atonement' as equivalent terms, and again of the 'fact that Christ died for our sins,' which statement, of course, contains a doctrine.

But we must observe, finally, that it is not sufficient to show the necessity of an interpretation of the facts of Christianity. The question of an external authority in religious knowledge cannot be evaded by saying that the Bible contains no explanation of these great facts. Whatever may be said as to the authority of Scripture, it is evident that the Bible does contain an interpretation of the great facts of Christ's life. And whatever interpretation be put upon the language of Christ and His Apostles, it is plain that they had definite ideas as to who Christ was, why and how He came into this world, why He died, and what His death means. To take only a few instances, and those only in regard to one fact, viz. Christ's death, it is scarcely a matter for dispute that, when He speaks of giving His life 'a ransom in the place of many' (Mk 10<sup>45</sup>; Mt 20<sup>28</sup>), or of His blood as Covenant-blood 'shed for many unto the remission of sins' (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>), He intended to convey a definite view as to the meaning of His death.* The same thing could be shown in regard to all our Lord's statements as to His Person and Work. The whole of the Pauline letters are occupied to a large extent with the interpretation of the facts of our Lord's Incarnation, Death, and Resurrection. It is not possible, then, to assert that the NT contains no interpretation of the facts which lie at the basis of Christianity.

* The necessity for an interpretation of the facts of Christianity has been shown by Denney, Studies in Theol., p. 106, and The Death of Christ, introd.; cf. also J. Orr, The Christian View of God and the World, p. 25; H. Bois, Le Dogme Grec, pp. 110-117; Warfield, The Right of Syst. Theol., pp. 28-46.

We must therefore face the question of the authority of this interpretation. If we are unwilling to yield to its authority, and still insist upon the distinction between the facts as Divine and the theory as merely human, we shall be in the second position mentioned, that of those who recognize a supernatural revelation in a series of facts, but who reduce the whole doctrinal content of Christianity, as contained in the Bible, to human reflexion upon these facts (see Rothe, Zur Dogmatik, pp. 64-120; Weiss, Bibl. Theol. des NT, § 1 c, also note 3 on p. 4. For other instances of this see Warfield, art. 'Revelation' in Johnson's Encycl. vol. vii, p. 79). But this position is not a logical one.

For it is not the account which the Scripture writers give of their interpretation of the facts of Christianity. They claim a direct supernaturalism in the communication to them of truth. Hence, if by reason of an anti-supernaturalistic philosophy we reject this claim, and regard their interpretation of the facts as relative and conditioned by the conceptions of the time, we shall also be led logically to reject their statements as to the occurrence of supernatural facts. The consequence of this will be to regard the facts of Christianity, i.e. its whole historical basis, no less than the Scripture doctrine, as the mere 'husk' which contains the 'kernel' either of rational truth or of Christian life; and thus Christianity will have been reduced to a mere religious philosophy or a mystical life. For, we are asked, can a history long past be the object of religious faith any more than a doctrine of a bygone age? Is not the whole of the historical and dogmatic element of the Scripture relative and temporally conditioned? Accordingly the logic of this position of recognizing a revelation only in fact, is to drive us to Rationalism or Mysticism. This is the result of abandoning the principle of external authority in religion. But rational truth and religious sentiment are not Christianity. If we are to have any Christian religion, we must have the great supernatural facts of Christianity and an authoritative interpretation of them. Whereas on this view revelation is only a product of the religious life of man.

Accordingly we are brought to a position opposite to that which we have been discussing, i.e. to the position which does not do justice to the facts of Christianity, subordinating them to a purely human theory. This tendency reduces Christianity to a philosophy of religion; the historical element being regarded as the 'husk' which contains the 'kernel' of eternal truths of reason.

This question of the importance of the historical element in Christianity was prominent in the 18th cent. (cf. Lipsius, 'Die Bedeutung des Historischen im Christentum' in his Glauben u. Wissen). The difficulty which was felt with historic facts was not, as more recently, that of attaining historic certitude. The clearest, most undisputed fact, it was held, could not support or be the content of religious belief. The objection was therefore a metaphysical, not a historical one. Hence all positive religions were regarded as but outward expressions of the pure religion of reason. This was the position of the Leibnitz-Wolffian philosophy (cf. Windelband, Gesch. der Phil.

* It is often asserted that the words first quoted show Pauline influence on the Evangelist. But the unwillingness to admit that Jesus uttered them rests on dogmatic grounds. There is no external evidence against them, and, as Denney has shown, they are perfectly in keeping with the context. So also Spitta's idea that the words Mt 26<sup>6</sup> have no reference to Christ's death, is admitted by him to be quite different from the view of the Evangelist (see Denney, The Death of Christ, pp. 83 and 40).

p. 30 ff.). Lessing also gave utterance to his famous saying that 'accidental historical truths' can never be the ground of 'eternal rational truths.' And he seemed to regard all of the historical element in Christianity as 'accidental,' for the ideal kernel of Christianity was just rational religious truth. In the same way Kant (Die Religion innerhalb d. Grenzen d. blossen Vernunft) considered pure moral truth as the abiding kernel of all religions. Historical Christianity, he held, had clothed this with accretions which are symbolical representations of eternal truth. Fichte held practically the same position (see Ansatzung zum seligen Leben). Thus by distinguishing between the 'kernel' and the 'husk,' and by finding the former in the truths of reason, the whole of Christianity was relegated to the category of husk. Christianity, accordingly, was reduced to a religious philosophy and destroyed, for it is not the product of human reflexion. An attempt at a more adequate view of history is seen in Schelling and Hegel, but with much the same result so far as historical Christianity is concerned, because of their adherence to the distinction between kernel and husk. History is regarded by them not as an 'outer' empirical history, but as the history of God's life in the finite spirit. Thus the history of Christ is not important as the history of an individual, but in these symbols faith sees the eternal course of the Divine life. Christ's death is simply a symbol of something which must be repeated in every man's inner life, and His bodily Resurrection a symbol of the return of the finite spirit to the Infinite. Thus historic Christianity is but one of the forms, albeit the highest, of bare natural religion, in this case construed upon a pantheistic basis.

In England, F. H. Green has given a Neo-Hegelian construction of Christianity which subordinates its facts and the Scripture interpretation of them to a philosophical theory (Miscell. Wks. vol. iii, pp. 160-186, 230-276). God and man are identified. God is the ideal self of each man. Sin is self-assertion, and salvation consists in 'dying to live,' i.e. giving up this individualistic self-assertion. This is held to be the revelation of Christianity, but no value is attached to the historic Christ apart from the idea which He exemplified. This, it goes without saying, is Neo-Hegelianism and not Christianity. The claim, also, that faith which has a historic element in its content is therefore psychologically a 'historic faith' in the sense of a dead faith, is specious. Faith may have a historic element in its content without being changed as to its psychological character as trust in God. (For a critique of Green's religious philosophy see Kilpatrick in The Thinker for 1885; Rainy in The Theol. Review for 1890; Forrest, The Christ of Hist. and of Experience, Lect. 5).

From the standpoint of NT criticism, the art. by Schmiedel on 'The Resurrection and Ascension Narratives' in Engel. Bibl. vol. iv, p. 460f., illustrates the same distinction between kernel and husk, and the giving up of the fact of the bodily Resurrection of Christ. Here an anti-supernaturalistic bias governs the whole discussion, though Schmiedel asserts that he does not presuppose the impossibility of a miracle.

The extreme result of this tendency to give up the authority of Scripture, and the consequent subordination of the facts of Christianity to a theory, is seen in an art. in the Hilbert Journal, Jan. 1906, entitled 'The Christ of Dogma and of Experience,' by W. A. Pickard-Cambridge. According to the author, the fundamental error in Scripture is its identification of Jesus Christ with the Spirit of God, communion with whom is the essence of religion. The Apostles were confronted with a personality of 'overwhelming attractiveness,' and so made this mistake. This, indeed, is Christianity without Christ. The author's Christ is a mere man idealized by emotion.

In doing away with the historical element in Christianity, these thinkers have done away with Christianity itself. This is only to say that the great facts of Christ's life are a part of the essence of Christianity. The Christian religion is not a product of human ideas, but of a direct revelation of God to men, accompanying God's direct interference in the downward course of the world caused by sin, which is a historic force. Thus, having abandoned all external authority, we lose the fact-basis as well as its Scripture interpretation, and are left with a philosophy of religion. But these so-called eternal truths are either purely human, in which case they cannot be eternally valid truth; or else man's thoughts about God must be held to be God's thoughts about Himself, in which case even natural religion vanishes in Pantheism. This type of religious philosophy may not admit the authority of the Scripture, but it should frankly admit that what it leaves us is not Christianity. It is, however, simply the logical result of the entire abandonment of the principle of external authority in religious knowledge.

When we turn from the philosophers to the 'liberal theology' represented by Biedermann, Lipsius, and Pfeiderer, we find that, notwithstanding the greater emphasis which they lay upon the historic Christ, their difference from the philosophers is not so much one of principle as of degree, i.e. of how much of Christianity they will retain as kernel and how much they will throw away as husk. This is determined largely by their philosophical standpoint. Hence in their case also there is a subjection of Christian fact and doctrine to an unauthoritative theory. That they do not differ so much in principle from the preceding philosophical solvent of Christianity can be seen from the following considerations. Wherever the principle of external authority is given up, we are sure to meet with the same distinction between kernel and husk in reference to Scripture fact and doctrine. And whenever this takes place, the Scripture idea of revelation has been changed, revelation being simply the product of religious thoughts and feelings in the mind of man. This makes it the product of natural development, and subjects it to the laws of psychic life. Accordingly we find that, while these theologians differ from the preceding construction of Christianity in laying greater emphasis upon Christ and in insisting that the essence of Christianity lies not in eternal truth so much as in Christ Himself (see esp. Lipsius, op. cit.), they nevertheless regard the Scripture facts as Scripturally interpreted, i.e. both fact and dogma, as but the 'sensual representation' of rational religious truth.

Christ is probably of least significance in the theology of Biedermann, who held that Jesus is simply the first realization of the idea of Divine Sonship (Dogmatis, II, 103). Whereas Lipsius, though an opponent of the Ritschlian school, resembles it in the emphasis laid upon Christ. Thus in the essay already cited he says that the Christian religion is historical, and that the eternal good which it offers is bound up with the person of Christ. Christianity, he says, consists not in ideas which Christ illustrated, but in Christ Himself. But Lipsius distinguishes between kernel and husk, and between some facts and others. Thus he says that 'faith has to do not with single historical facts as such, but with their religious value and that "others are facts about whose historicity there is little doubt, and which are of no importance for our religious life, and there are others about which there may be much doubt, and yet, as sensual representations of religious truths, they are of the greatest value." Obviously, if facts about whose occurrence there is doubt are of such importance as "sensual representations" of religious truth, the really essential thing is the rational truth which they are supposed to represent. And this is actually the case with Lipsius' treatment of the great Christian facts. Thus the Cross is 'the symbol of the eternal truth that the old man in us must die, in order that man be born of God' (p. 138), though Lipsius does recognize in Christ's death more than a mere symbol (p. 137). At the same time the all-important thing is the idea symbolized. So also the Resurrection of Christ need not be true in its literal Scriptural form, but at the same time it symbolizes the truth of the entrance of Christ into the heavenly world. The 'form' in which we conceive it is expressly said to be of no importance. This is sufficient to show the complete subordination of Christian fact to philosophic theory in this movement. But not only are the great facts of Christianity put into the category of 'husk.' The dogmatic interpretation of them in the Scripture is also regarded as the external hull or symbol of rational truth. For, unlike the Ritschlian school, who hold that the Greek influence is largely later than the NT writings, the liberal theology carries this influence, and consequently the critical process of separating the kernel of truth from its husk, back into the NT. Thus Pfleiderer (Glaubens- u. Sittenlehre, p. 4) says that it is the business of Dogmatics to 'work over critically' the Scripture as well as the Church dogma in order to reach its abiding truth. The Scripture doctrine is said to contain a 'sensual' element which is not rational and which must be rationalized.

It is evident that the principle of external authority in religious knowledge having been abandoned by this school also, the historic facts of Christianity as well as the Scripture interpretation are given up. Again, facts are subordinated to a human theory, and we have left a religious philosophy.

The subjection of the Scripture facts and doctrines to a subjective norm has taken also a more mystical form. This, indeed, is a natural consequence of the attempt to find a permanent basis for religious knowledge after the principle of external authority has been given up. For this kernel of rational truth seems to differ with each theologian, and does not afford that permanency which should characterize the essence of Christianity. These so-called eternal truths are temporally conditioned just as are the Scripture dogmas. To hold to them, therefore, is a species of dogmatism. Accordingly it is natural that a demand for a truly undogmatic Christianity should arise, seeking to be rid not only of Scripture doctrine, but also of the rational element into which it had been distilled.

This demand was made by Dreyer in his Undogmatisches Christentum, the first edition of which appeared in 1888. Coming from the camp of the liberals, Dreyer directed his polemic against 'liberalism' and 'orthodoxy' alike. The liberal theology fails to satisfy the demands of the 'pious heart,' while orthodox dogma is in conflict with modern culture. We are therefore bidden to turn from dogma to the life of faith. Christianity is a life, not a series of facts or doctrines. Dogma is religious experience put into the form of concepts (p. 77). It is therefore put into a form of relative validity, and one that is continually changing. When these concepts are no longer valid, they no longer serve to express religious life, and must be rejected. The facts of Christianity fare no better at Dreyer's hands. He will not allow our idea of history to be governed by any dogmatic supernaturalism, and consequently, at the demand of an equally dogmatic anti-supernaturalism, he tells us that the 'myth-forming process' is seen in the Gospel record of the life of Christ. Although something of external fact may remain, we can find no religious certitude in any historic fact, and are told to fall back on Christ's holy character, which is exalted above all the changes of theological science and historical criticism. This arouses life in us, and this life is the essence of Christianity, which is a life, not fact or doctrine. A somewhat similar position has been taken in France by A. Sabatier. His idea is that religion is life, not doctrine. External authority, whether of Scripture or the Church, kills religion. The essential thing in religion is life. But this life must express itself outwardly in institutions and symbols. Christian doctrines are but symbols of Christian life. They are higher than those of other religions because the life is higher. The essence of Christianity, therefore, is neither a series of facts nor a sum of dogmas, but a spiritual life.

We have not space to show the inconsistency of Dreyer's supposed escape from historical criticism, when he falls back on the inner life of Jesus as the ground of the life which constitutes the essence of Christianity; or to discuss the philosophy which underlies Sabatier's books. We can only stop to indicate briefly that when we have separated Christianity from all external facts and have made its doctrinal content entirely the product of the religious life, we have done away with Christianity, because we have done away with all that distinguishes it from natural religion. Of course it is true that Christianity is a life hid with Christ in God. It is also true that Christian doctrine can never produce Christian life. St. Paul has taught us this. Man is dead in sin, and the revelation of Divine truth in the Bible will fail to produce spiritual apprehension or life; for 'the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit' (1 Co 2<sup>14</sup>). These great truths are emphasized in the Reformed Theology. But the type of thought we are discussing means that the essence of Christianity consists in a life which precedes and is independent of facts and doctrines, and that doctrine

* In some respects Dreyer's position resembles that of the Ritschlians. Thus, e.g., Kaftan in his Glaube u. Dogma replied to Dreyer that instead of an undogmatic Christianity we need a 'new dogma' which grows out of Christian faith. Dreyer rejoined, in a later edition of his book, that he admitted a 'science of faith' (Glaubenswissenschaft), and so did not differ from Kaftan. Kaftan again replied, saying that Dreyer held that this science of faith contained a symbolic element, and was only of relative validity. This seems to be the most essential point of difference between Dreyer and Kaftan, viz., the latter claims absolute validity for dogmatics as 'the science of faith,' while the former admits a relative element in this 'science of faith' which he refuses to call a dogma. Dreyer's view of the inner life of Christ, as independent of historical criticism, and as the source of Christian life, resembles that of Herrmann in his Verkehr des Christen mit Gott. But Dreyer is a mystic, while Herrmann is not. See also, Dreyer, Zur undogm. Glaubenslehre, (posthum.), 1901, § Enigues d'une Phil. de la Religion, d'après la Psych. et l'Éthique, 1897 (also Eng. tr. 1897). This book includes a lecture, 'The Vitality of Christian Dogmas,' published separately (also Eng. tr.); also Les Religions d'Autorité et la Religion de l'Esprit, 1900 (also Eng. tr.).

is the product of life. Thus to eliminate fact and doctrine from Christianity is to leave nothing but bare natural religious sentiment. And it is a mistake to suppose that Christianity is the product of the religious sentiment (see Warfield, The Right of Syst. Theol.). It is no more the product of this than it is of rational reflexion.

Furthermore, there is now left no basis for the affirmation that Christianity is the final religion, and its doctrine absolute truth. For we can never be sure that Christian life may not reach higher levels and embody itself in more elevated doctrinal symbols. Writers of this type might and do reply to this, that, even apart from fact and doctrine, the Christian life is not the bare religious sentiment, but the product of God's Spirit, and that it is therefore the true life, and its doctrinal product final truth. But when they affirm this, they abandon their position. For it cannot be proved that this life is the true life if the norm of truth be drawn from the life itself. We believe that Christian life is the true life because of a fact and a doctrine independent of this life, viz. that it proceeds from the regenerating activity of the Holy Spirit. But in affirming this we have asserted a great fact as well as a doctrine, each independent of, as well as at the basis of, Christian life. In short, if Christianity is separated from the great supernatural facts of Christ's life and from the great supernatural facts of the action of God's Spirit on men's hearts, as well as from its authoritative doctrinal content, then that which differentiates it from mere religious sentiment is gone. What, then, to sum up, is the attitude of this type of religious thinking to the question of 'fact and theory' in relation, especially, to Christ? This question may be answered by saying that the facts and doctrines of Christianity have been subordinated to a psychological theory that feeling and sensation precede and condition thought. And as a consequence, we are left with a human Christ whose portrait is the product of the religious sentiment.

At this point we are met with a reaction from the neglect of the historical element in Christianity, and also from the demand for an undogmatic Christianity. This has come from members of the Ritschlian school. Thus, e.g., Harnack (cf. his address, Das Christentum u. die Geschichte, 1890), and Herrmann (besides his Verkehr and Begriff der Offenbarung, see esp. his Warum bedarf unser Glaube geschichtlicher Thatachen? 1884) have attempted to defend the importance of the historical basis of Christianity against Lessing and Kant and Kaftan (Glaube u. Dogma?, 1889) has written a reply to Dreyer, showing that the dogmatic element is essential to Christianity, and that what we need is a 'new dogma.' But this demand must be judged in the light of the motive, principles, and results of this theological movement. The fundamental motive of Ritschlianism is an apologetic one, viz., to find a ground of certitude in Christianity which shall be independent of the results of historical criticism and of metaphysics, and so to state the content of the Christian faith that it too shall be independent in both these respects. In order to accomplish this, it is common with theologians of this school to lay stress on the revelation of God in the 'historic Christ,' and to seek to find in Him the ground, as well as an essential element in the content, of the Christian faith. This ground of certitude and this dogmatic content are held to be independent of historical criticism and metaphysics, by means of their sharp distinction between religious and theoretic knowledge, the latter dealing with facts and their explanation, the former with religious values. In regard, then, to the historical element in Christianity or the Christian facts, this school emphasizes its importance as part of the essence of Christianity; but in order to maintain its independence of the results of historical criticism, falls back upon one fact, viz.—the so-called 'historic Christ.' It is not meant that Christianity is independent of the results of historical criticism in such a sense that, if there were no basis for their historic Christ in the Gospels, Christianity could still survive. Their idea is that the 'historic Christ' stands fast after historical criticism has done its work. But since this criticism is largely determined by an anti-supernaturalistic bias, it is evident that the historic Christ of the Ritschlians is not a Christ who is independent of historical criticism, but the Christ which a naturalistic criticism has left us. This shows that independence of the results of criticism is impossible, since Christianity is a historical religion. The supposed independence of its results turns out to be a surrender of all that is difficult to defend against a criticism which is determined by naturalism. Accordingly Harnack says (Das Christentum u. die Geschichte) that 'the tradition as to the incidents attending the birth and early life of Jesus Christ has been shattered.' This makes necessary the old rationalistic distinction between 'kernel' and 'husk,' and so in his lectures on the Essence of Christianity we are told that we must distinguish between the Easter message of the empty tomb, which is not essential to Christianity, and the Easter faith that Jesus gained a victory over death and still lives. Of course, if we follow this method, not only will all the external supernatural events of Christ's life have to be surrendered, but also those elements in His inner life which involve the supernatural must go. And so we find Herrmann in the Verkehr falling back upon the inner life of Jesus reduced to a merely ethical content.*

Thus the Ritschlian attempt at independence of historical criticism results really in a surrender to a criticism determined by naturalism. The virgin-birth and the bodily resurrection of Christ are given up, and we have no longer the Christ of the Gospels, but the Christ of a Gospel reconstructed by the critics. It is the subordination of Christian facts to a human theory.

When we turn to the demand for a 'new dogma,' which we saw was emphasized by Kaftan (Glaube u. Dogma), we find the other principle of the school at work, viz.—the separation of theology from metaphysics, and the distinction between religious and theoretic knowledge. The watchword 'theology without metaphysics,' however, does not mean simply theology which shall be free from a speculative reconstruction as in the Hegelian school. It means a theology without any metaphysical elements, i.e. with nothing that transcends experience. Hence we must not only distinguish the 'historical Christ' from the Christ of an uncritical tradition; we must also distinguish Him from the Christ of a metaphysical dogma of Greek origin. Accordingly the doctrines of the Trinity and of the two natures in one person in our Lord are to be abandoned as metaphysical. The new dogma expresses itself in religious knowledge which springs from faith, and not in metaphysical propositions. Christ, therefore, is not Divine in a metaphysical sense as in the doctrine of the two natures, but simply in the religious sense that in the man Jesus we have the perfect revelation of God, or else that the term 'Divinity' expresses His value for the believer. This latter is Ritschl's position, and members of the school who have taken a more positive attitude than Ritschl have fallen short of asserting Christ's Divinity in any metaphysical sense (cf. Kaftan, Dogmatik; Lobstein, Lehre v. d. übernat. Geburt Christi; Harnack, op. cit., and H. Schultz, Lehre u. d. Gottheit Christi, occupy much the same position as Ritschl).

* It is true that both Herrmann and Reischle (Der Sinn über die Begründung des Glaubens auf dem gesch. Christus, Zeitsch. f. Theol. u. Kirche, 1897) make a sharp distinction between the 'ground' and the 'content' of faith; and what they seek is an independent ground of faith. But it is also true that the ground of faith once determined becomes in their hands a norm for distinguishing between kernel and husk in its 'content.' Accordingly their idea of the 'content' of faith is one that fits in with their idea of its ground. Kahler (Der sogenannte historische Jesus u. d. gesch. historische Christus?, 1890) has criticised this distinction between the ground and the content of faith. But it is more important to note that the idea which these writers have of Christ as the ground of faith determines absolutely its content by acting as a principle by which to distinguish the abiding content of faith from its historical form, and thus makes room for endless subjectivity.

We must conclude that in the Ritschlian theology we have again the subordination of the great Christian facts and dogmas to a phenomenalist philosophy and a historical criticism subject to a naturalistic bias. This amounts to their subjection to a human theory. For the fundamental question is—Upon what does this theology rest? Has it a more objective basis than rationalism and mysticism? It seeks to base revelation on Christ. The source of its dogma is not the individual Christian consciousness but the Christian life, or the revelation of God portrayed in the Bible. But its Christ is a human Christ who can give no absolute revelation of God; and the Scripture is not regarded as authoritative in any objective sense as containing a supernatural revelation, but simply as the record of the revelation by the human Christ. The Scripture is subjected to the Christian consciousness to such an extent that the Christian doctrines are not to be taken directly from Scripture as 'external revelations' but objects as 'appropriated' and 'authenticated' by Christian faith (cf. Kaftan, Dogmatik, § on the Scripture, p. 48). Thus the idea of revelation has changed its biblical sense of a supernatural communication of truth, and becomes the product of the religious life of those who stood nearest Christ. But the Christian life does not remove the noetic effects of sin all at once, and consequently this idea of special revelation does not meet the demand which made a special revelation necessary. In short, if we abandon the principle of external authority, we cannot escape the subjection of the facts and doctrines of Christianity to a philosophical theory.

The logical results of the abandonment of an external authority in religious knowledge have been recently exhibited in the new theological school which follows the method of Comparative Religion. For if Christ is only human, and the Christian revelation not supernatural, it will be impossible to maintain the absoluteness of Christianity as the Ritschlians sought to do. It will be impossible to maintain that Christianity consists in Christ and not merely in a principle of which He is the illustration. We thus have the distinction between the 'Christian principle' and the person of Christ. It is the distinction of the old rationalism, only now in quite a different form, since this school insists that principles can never be separated from their historical embodiment. Therefore the distinction between the 'kernel' and the 'husk' must be given up, since the kernel is always inseparable from its historical manifestation. All history is relative, yet not at all unimportant, for we cannot have religious truth except in a historically conditioned form. Thus, while a greater significance attaches to Christ than in the old rationalism, the great facts and the dogmatic content of Christianity have only a relative value, and are frankly given up at the demands of an avowedly naturalistic philosophy. This can be seen in Troeltsch, the dogmatist of the school (cf. his art. 'Geschichte u. Metaphysik' in Zeitschr. f.

Theol. u. Kirche, 1898, pp. 55-67. Cf. also Die Absolutheit des Christentums u. die Religionsgeschichte, 1902). Troeltsch admits the significance of personality in the religious sphere, and that Christ is the source of our communion with God; but in view of the power of development in Christianity, he holds that it is not possible to limit God's revelation to one person at the beginning of Christian history. Therefore the first form of Christianity, as connected with Jesus, is to be regarded along with later forms simply as illustrations of the Christian principle. Thus we have again the entire subordination of the facts and doctrines of Christianity to the theory of the naturalistic evolution of religious ideas.

We conclude, then, that Christianity consists in a series of supernatural facts together with their meaning; that their true meaning is their meaning for God, and that therefore He must tell it to us; that the noetic effects of sin make it necessary that this be in a special and supernatural manner. The abandonment of the authority of Scripture for the interpretation of the facts leads logically to the abandonment of the facts themselves, i.e. to their subordination to a theory which distinguishes their accidental Scriptural form from their abiding philosophical content. The Ritschlian endeavor to stem the tide of this logic is unsuccessful, and the newest development in theology has cast aside the Ritschlian claim as to the absoluteness of Christianity and the Divinity of Christ, and has subjected Scripture fact and doctrine to an avowedly naturalistic philosophy. If, therefore, we are not to lose the supernatural facts and their authoritative interpretation, i.e. if we are not to lose Christianity, we must abide by the Scripture as an external authority.

Literature.

1. Introductory.—In the NT the term 'faith' has two main meanings, which may be distinguished as active and passive senses, viz.: (1) belief, 'the frame of mind which relies on another,' and (2) fidelity, 'the frame of mind which can be relied on.' Of these the former is the predominant use, and is marked by a rich, copious, and distinctively Christian development.

The two senses—the active and passive—both logically and grammatically pass by an easy transition from one to the other, and are not always clearly distinguishable, or are actually combined (as, e.g., in et servus, 'the faithful' applied to the Christian fellowship). In the OT the quasi-active sense of 'trust,' with the meaning 'exhibit faithfulness or confidence,' is expressed by the Hiphil  $\text{יָרָא}$  (constr. with  $\text{ב}$  = to believe in reliance on or in, followed by the object or ground of the belief; with  $\text{ב}$  in a weaker sense, 'to believe,' the object here denoted by  $\text{ב}$  being not so much that in which the confidence is reposed, as that on the (attesting) strength of which it is reposed in the absolute object). No noun-derivative from the Hiphil occurs in the OT (denoting 'faith' as an active principle). The substantive  $\text{אֱמוּנָה}$  'firmness,' 'steadfastness,' 'fidelity' (not in the passive form) is the nearest equivalent for 'faith'; but it always occurs with the passive sense, with the possible exception of Hab 2<sup>4</sup> ('the just shall live by his faith').\* In this passage the active principle of trust in God seems to be contrasted sharply with arrogant self-sufficiency.

The Gr.  $\text{πίστις}$  (epistis), seems to have followed the reverse order of development (from active to passive). Here the predominant meaning is active 'faith,' 'trust,' 'belief' (in Classical usage, however, with the slightest possible association with religious ideas). The LXX use of the word ( $\text{πίστις}$  =  $\text{πίστευ}$  usually; sometimes  $\text{πιστ}$  and  $\text{πιστε}$ ) probably receded upon the Hebrew, and on this supposition it is possible to explain the active sense which is certainly present in Rabbinical Hebrew, and which may be seen in the late Hebrew of Sirach (e.g. 40<sup>9</sup>),† in the Aramaic of the Targums the active sense is fixed in a substantive derived from the Aphel,  $\text{אֱמוּנָתָא}$  (used in Gn 15<sup>6</sup> of Abraham's faith). Cf. the Syriac equivalent of epistis in the NT  $\text{ܐܡܘܢܐ}$ .

2. The idea of faith in the OT.—Faith as an active religious principle is relatively far less prominent in the OT than in the NT. The solitary instance in which the active meaning certainly emerges in the Heb. substantive  $\text{אֱמוּנָה}$  has already been referred to. But even the verb ( $\text{יָרָא}$ ) is by no means common with a religious connotation. Trust or confidence in God and the unseen are, of course, essential to spiritual religion, and receive manifold expression, especially in the Psalms (note the use in this connexion of  $\text{ב}$ ,  $\text{יָרָא}$  with God as object). But, as Lightfoot<sup>1</sup> has remarked, 'it is indeed a characteristic token of the difference between the two covenants, that under the Law the "fear of the Lord" holds very much the same place as "faith in God," "faith in Christ," under the Gospel. Awe is the prominent idea in the earlier dispensation, trust in the later.'

The object of 'faith,' as expressed (with a religious connotation) by the verb ( $\text{יָרָא}$ ) in the OT, is sometimes the words or commandments of God, or a particular word or work of God, or the Divine revelation, or the Divine messengers the prophets, or God Himself in His own Person. Of this last usage the examples are the most important (Gn 15<sup>6</sup>, Ex 14<sup>13</sup>, Nu 14<sup>11</sup> 20<sup>13</sup>, Dt 1<sup>2</sup>, 2 K 17<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ch 20<sup>30</sup>, Ps 78<sup>22</sup>, Jon 3<sup>8</sup>). Here the verb is construed with  $\text{ב}$ . The classical instance is, of course, Abraham's faith (Gn 15<sup>6</sup>), which, with a true instinct, has been recognized, both by Jewish and Christian religious exegesis, as the supreme example of faith in its active exercise as a religious principle.

3. Later Jewish idea of 'faith.'—In early Rabbinical and other Jewish literature the term for 'faith,' besides its Biblical meaning of 'faithfulness,' also denotes active trust in God. This as a religious principle is emphatically praised by the Rabbis, and regarded by them as highly meritorious. The classical example is, as has already been stated, the faith of Abraham (Gn 15<sup>6</sup>), which became one of the commonplaces of theological discussion not only in Rabbinical circles but also in the Hellenistic school of Alexandria,* while its occurrence in the NT is, of course, a familiar fact. The most instructive example in Rabbinical literature is to be found in the early Midrashic work the Mekhilta (on Ex 14<sup>20</sup>).† The passage runs as follows:

'The people feared the Lord. So long as they were in Egypt they did not fear God, but now: the people feared the Lord, and they believed in the Lord and His servant Moses. If they believed in Moses, much more did they believe in the Lord. From this thou mayest learn that whoever believes in the faithful Shepherd is (regarded) as if he believed in the word of Him who speaks and the world was. . . . Great is faith whereby Israel believed in Him who spoke and the world was; for because Israel believed in the Lord, the Holy Spirit abode upon them, and they sang the song: for immediately after the words: they believed in the Lord and in Moses His servant, follow the words (Ex 15): Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song to the Lord. In like manner thou findest that Abraham our Father inherited this world and the world to come only by the merit of faith ( $\text{אֱמוּנָה}$ ) whereby he believed in the Lord, as it is said (Gn 15<sup>6</sup>): And he believed in the Lord, and He counted it to him for righteousness. . . . B. Nehemiah says: Whoever receives unto himself one precept (of the Law) in true faith ( $\text{אֱמוּנָה$ ) is worthy for the Holy Spirit to abide upon him; for so we find in the case of our fathers that because they believed in the Lord they were deemed worthy that the Holy Spirit should abide upon them, and they uttered the song: For it is said: they believed in God and in Moses His servant; and (immediately afterwards) it is said: then sang Moses and the children of Israel, etc. And so thou findest in the case of Abraham that he inherited this world and the world to come solely by merit of faith ( $\text{אֱמוּנָה}$   $\text{אֱמוּנָה}$ ), whereby he believed in the Lord, as it is said (15<sup>6</sup>): Abraham believed, etc. And in the same way we find in the case of Moses, David, and Deborah that they (by reason of faith) sang a song, and the Holy Spirit abode upon them. And in like manner thou findest that solely by merit of faith was Israel redeemed from Egypt, as it is said: And the people believed, etc. And so it is said (Ps 81<sup>2</sup>): The Lord presseth the faithful, making mention of the faith of the fathers. . . . Of the righteous it is said (Is 55<sup>2</sup>): Open ye the gates that the righteous nation, which keepeth the faith, may enter in. Into this gate all the faithful ( $\text{אֱמוּנָה}$   $\text{אֱמוּנָה}$ ) enter. David sings (Ps 92<sup>1</sup>): It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord, and to sing praises unto Thy name, O Most High: to show forth Thy loving-kindness in the morning and Thy faithfulness in the night, with an instrument of ten strings and with the psalter, with a solemn sound upon the harp. For Thou, O Lord, hast made me glad through Thy works, and in the operation of Thy hand will I exult. What is the cause of his joy here? It is the reward of faith which our fathers showed in this world, wherewith they trusted by day and night. For thus it is said: to show forth thy loving-kindness in the morning and thy faithfulness in the night. And in like manner it is said of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup>): And they rose early in the morning and went forth into the wilderness of Tekoa; and when they went forth Jehoshaphat stood up and said: Hear ye me, O Judah, and ye inhabitants of Jerusalem: Have faith in the Lord your God, and so shall ye be established; and have faith in His prophets, and so shall ye prosper. And (so) it is written (Is 5<sup>7</sup>): O Lord, do not Thine eyes look upon faith? And (Hab 2<sup>4</sup>): The righteous liveth of his faith. Also (La 3<sup>28</sup>): They are new every morning, Thy faithfulness is great. Also thou findest that the (Divine) intercourse is only accorded as the reward of faith, as it is said (Ca 4<sup>9</sup>): Come with me from Lebanon, my bride ('Bride'* = Holy Spirit), come with me; of faith shalt Thou be the familiar companion altogether (lit. 'from the head'); in like manner it is said (Hos 2<sup>18-20</sup>): I will*

* In Philo the career of Abraham is made the subject of elaborate and frequent comment and allegory. Lightfoot (op. cit.) remarks: 'If we look only to the individual man, faith with Philo is substantially the same as faith with St. Paul. The lessons drawn from the history of Abraham by the Alexandrian Jew and the Christian Apostle differ very slightly.'

† The original can be seen in Welles' ed. of the Mekhilta, 255, 26. The Mekhilta is a halakhic midrash on part of Exodus, dating in its present form from the first part of the second Christian century, but containing much earlier material. It is invaluable for illustrating early Jewish ideas and religious thoughts of the Apostolic age.

betroth thee unto me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto me with faith (אֱמִינָה). Great is faith before God, for on account of faith it is that the Holy Spirit abides (upon Israel), etc.

In the early Rabbinical literature 'faith' wavers in meaning between 'belief' and 'fidelity (to the Law)'. The former is prominent in the Apocalypse of Baruch (1st cent. A.D.). But the latter is characteristic of the later period, 'faith' and 'works' being co-ordinated or combined. * 'Faith' (אֱמִינָה) in the sense of fixed dogmatic belief is quite late in Hebrew literature (medieval times).

In Rabbinical Hebrew, besides the nouns אֱמִינָה, אֱמִינָה, a Hiphil-substantial form אֱמִינָה (= Aram. אֱמִינָה) occurs (Tosefta Baba bathra v. 8). For the Gospel-expression ἀγαπίους a Heb. parallel occurs in Middot (on Ex. 15) אֲמִינָה אֲמִינָה 'those lacking faith.' So in the Pal. Targ. (on Nu 11:29) אֲמִינָה אֲמִינָה (Then rose up those who had lacked faith and gathered the quails, etc.); and Gen. Rab. § 32, אֲמִינָה אֲמִינָה 'men of little faith' (an exact parallel). In the Mishna, Sota ix. 12, the decline of the world is ascribed to the disappearance of 'men of faith' (אֲמִינָה אֲמִינָה).

4. 'Faith' in the Gospels.—The terms for 'faith' and 'believe' in contrast with those of the OT are characteristic of the whole NT language, and occur almost entirely with a directly religious connotation. In Philo the religious content of the terms had decidedly been heightened, but suffered from a certain vagueness in the conception of the object of faith, due to his transcendental philosophy. Faith, in Philo's conception, rests rather upon the abstract Divinity than upon the personal God of grace and salvation, and is rather the fruit and crown of righteousness than its antecedent. In the NT it is all-important to distinguish the different connotations of the terms according as the object is (a) God; (b) the promises of God; (c) Christ; (d) some particular utterance, claim, or promise of God or Christ. The last of these senses is the one most common in the Synoptic Gospels. †

(1) In the Synoptics.—In its active sense of 'faith,' πίστις usually means here belief or trust in God or God's power as manifested in Christ (the so-called 'miracle-faith'). ‡ The response of faith conditions the granting of relief to those in bodily distress (Mk 5:34 || 10:51 ||), the effect being proportionate to the degree of faith exercised (Mt 9:22 'According to your faith [κατὰ τὴν πίστιν ὑμῶν] be it done unto you'; cf. 15:28, Lk 7:9, 50; and for degrees of faith see Mt 8:10 || Lk 17:8 etc.). In this connection Mt 13:38 is instructive. We are told that 'He did not many mighty works there [in his own country, Nazareth] because of their unbelief' ('lack of faith,' ἀπιστία); cf. Mk 6:2. The term 'faith' is also applied to the confidence of the disciple that the power conferred upon him will be effective (in the performance of miraculous works), Mk 11:22-24, defined by Christ as 'faith in God' (v. 22). Possibly, however, this passage (as has been suggested by Menzies §) is intended simply to bring home to the disciples the power of faith in accomplishing the seemingly impossible. 'Jesus summons those who look to Him to have faith in God when they are in great danger, or when they are seeking with all their heart some boon which outward appearances declare to be all but hopeless'; the special and (apparently insurmountable) difficulty here being the insensibility of the Jewish people as a whole to the message of the gospel

* Cf. Charles' note on Apoe. Bar. iv. 21: 'Faith in the Talmud is in one of its aspects regarded as a work which, as the fulfilment of the Law, produces merit.'

† Sanday-Headlam, Romans, p. 31 f. The passive sense of πίστις ('faithfulness,' 'fidelity') is very rare in the NT. The only instance in the Gospels seems to be Mt 23:23 ('the weightier matters of the Law, judgment and mercy and faithfulness [καὶ πίστις]').

‡ Nowhere in the NT is it used of man's faith in man.

(symbolized by the withered fig-tree). Cf. the words of Christ to Jairus (Mk 5:36 'Fear not, only believe'), to the father of the epileptic (9:22 'If it be possible! All things are possible to him that believeth'), to the disciples in the storm (4:40 'Why are ye fearful? Have ye not faith?').

The words about the power to remove mountains (Mk 11:22 || Mt 21:21) occur also in a different connexion in Mt 17:20 (and in the rebuke administered to the disciples for their 'lack of faith' in dealing with the epileptic—a case of special difficulty). 'They have a proverbial ring,' and may easily have been used by our Lord more than once (cf. Lk 17:6 'If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye would say to this sycamine tree, Be thou rooted up,' etc.).

In one instance 'faith' is used in the Synoptic Gospels in a way that suggests the technical sense so frequent in the Epistles, viz. Lk 18:8 ('When the Son of man comes, shall he find faith on the earth?'). Here 'faith' = faith in Himself as Messiah and Redeemer.

In the Acts and Epp. πίστις, used absolutely, constantly occurs in a soteriological sense = 'saving faith.' It rapidly became a Christian technical term, and practically stood as a synonym for Christianity, marking out the new religion as essentially characterized by faith or belief in Jesus as Redeemer. 'Believers' becomes the designation of Christians; 'to believe' to become a Christian as contrasted with this usage, the term in the Synoptics is, to some extent, undeveloped in meaning. Yet how near the soteriological lies to the 'miracle-faith' comes out clearly in such passages as Ac 3:16 (the healing of the lame man at the Gate Beautiful) 'By faith in his name hath his name made this man strong, whom ye behold and know; yea, the faith that is through him hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all'; here 'faith in the Name' (of Jesus) is described as 'faith brought into being by Him' (cf. πίστις ἡ ἐκ' αὐτοῦ), and the same conclusion results from a comparison of the language of Mt 9:2, Mk 28, Lk 8:50 ('Thy sins are forgiven thee'), as well as from the language of Lk 7:50, Mt 9:2, Mk 5:4.

(2) In the Fourth Gospel the absence of the substantive (πίστις)—which does not occur at all—is made up for by the frequent use of the verb (πιστεύω).

πιστεύω rarely occurs in the NT in the weakened sense 'to credit,' 'give credence to'; only once apparently of a non-religious sort (Mt 24:29, Mk 13:21—in the warning about false Christs, 'believe it not'); elsewhere of assent given to some definite act, event, or fact in the religious sphere: of believing prayer (Mt 21:22 'Whatever ye shall ask in prayer, believing ye shall receive'); of belief in the fact of the resurrection of Christ (Jn 20:8, 20:9); in God's word of promise (Lk 1:47; cf. Ac 2:22), in the declarations of Jesus whether regarding earthly or heavenly things (Jn 8:12, Lk 22:67); of faith generally in the word of salvation (Lk 8:12 'that they may not believe and be saved'; cf. Jn 17).

The usual sense of the verb in the Fourth Gospel is a soteriological one. It expresses saving faith directed to the Person of Christ. In some instances, it is true, the immediate object of the faith is the wonder-working power of Jesus (the 'miracle-faith'); Jn 4:48 ('Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will in no wise believe'), 11:48. § But here also the same remark applies as to the similar cases in the Synoptics, that the soteriological meaning lies very close to, and is sometimes almost indistinguishable from, the other (cf. Jn 4:48 with v. 38 and 9:38, and 11:40 with v. 19 and 12:30). In the following instances, however, the direct soteriological significance is clear and unmistakable: 3:15, 16, 44, 45, 54, 98, 99, 102, 29, 11:15, 12:30, 14:29, 16:31, 19:38, 20:31. Of these passages the two last are particularly instructive: 'That ye may believe' (19:38), and 'These are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye may have life in his name' (20:31). Here faith occupies a fundamental place. Its essential object is defined to be the belief that Jesus is 'the Christ, the Son of God.'

Once again the conclusion is reinforced that the undefined 'to believe' is practically a synonym for 'to be a Christian.' Indeed, it may be inferred from the NT usage generally of πιστεύω that before the disciples were called 'Christians' (Ac 11:26), they were designated 'believers' (cf. πιστεύω is used as a participle in Mk 9:24, but as a subst. perhaps in Ac 11:40). And believers were the more added to the Lord. Sometimes πιστεύω is used in an equivalent sense (e.g. Ac 10:4; 1 P 1:13; Rev 17:14; cf. the use of πιστεύω in Jn 1:7), and ἀπιστία occurs in the opposite sense of 'unbelief' (e.g. 2 Co 4:13; cf. Jn 3:18; Mt 17:20; Mk 9:24; Lk 9:41). Cf. the cognate use of ἀπιστία, 'unbelief' (Mk 9:24; Lk 13:10; also in the Epp.); ἀπιστία, 'disbelief' (Mk 16:11; Lk 24:11; Ac 28:24; 1 P 2:7); and ἀπιστία, 'little faith' (Mt 6:30; 8:26; 14:31; Lk 12:28); ἀπιστία, 'little faith,' occurs Mt 17:20.

5. Some characteristics of the Johannine conception of 'faith'.—The fundamental conception of 'faith' in the Fourth Gospel coincides with that of the other NT writers; it consists essentially in trustful self-committal to Christ and His salvation. Only it is concerned less than in the Synoptics with the appropriation of directly physical relief; it moves rather in the sphere of spiritual and eternal facts, and directs itself more exclusively to the Person of Christ. Trust in God and in Christ are equated (1:1); faith characterizes those who recognize His Divine mission (cf. also 16:26), and they are described as those 'who believe in his name.' The result of faith is an acknowledgment of Christ's unity with the Father (10:30; 14:9).

Faith (πιστεύω) and knowledge (γινώσκω) are interchangeable ideas in the Fourth Gospel (cf. 6:29; 10:38; 17:3); or rather they express the same truth looked at from different sides. 'To know' (γινώσκω) in the Johannine language expresses the perception of eternal truth; 'to believe,' its temporal discovery and appropriation. The former is therefore the fruit of the latter (cf. esp. 10:38 'believe . . . that ye may know'). The intellectual element is thus the product of a moral act, and is conditioned by it. Faith is not the result of logical operations, but is due to the Divine working (6:44; 'No man can come to me, except the Father which sent me draw him'). Where faith is not attained, this is due to the distraction exercised by lower and earthly ambitions or ideals ('glory one of another,' 5:44), or the deliberate choice of darkness rather than light (3:19; cf. v. 21). Trust is also shown to be characteristic of a real faith, which does not need 'signs,' and has risen above the necessities of 'sight' (20:29). The boon which faith appropriates is eternal life (5:24).

There is evident in the treatment of faith characteristic of the Fourth Gospel a spirit of protest against the false and exaggerated views of knowledge that were beginning to affect the Church. The subtle and pervasive danger of Gnosticism, with its dangerous glorification of a merely intellectual knowledge, and its contempt for simple faith, had to be met. This was effected in the Fourth Gospel, 'on the one hand by deepening the idea of knowledge to the knowledge of experience' (which is the fruit of simple faith), 'and on the other by insisting upon the immediate entrance of every believer into the possession of salvation.'† The writer of the Fourth Gospel 'would indeed have believers know what they believe, and who He is in whom they put their trust, and what He has done for them, and is doing, and will do in and through them; but this is not that they may know these things simply as intellectual propositions, but that they may rest on them in faith, and know them in personal experience.‡ Nothing is more characteristic of the Johannine conception than the insistence on the present experience and participation in eternal life of believers. He that believeth hath eternal life' (3:36; 5:24; 6:47; cf. 1 Jn 3:14; 5:11-12). The inheritance of the true Christian was not merely a future boon,—though the future had in store for him a greater glory than that of the present,—but the simple believer, by the mere act of faith, was already placed on a plane of life to which no knowledge could attain.'

* cf. πιστεύω (= those who had turned to Christ in trustful reliance) is perhaps used as a subst. in such passages as Ac 2:44; 4:23; 2 Th 1:14; He 4:2.
† E. B. Warfield in Hastings' DB I. 836 (art. 'Faith').

It is worth noting in this connection that ἀλήθεια (which like πίστις is employed in the LXX to translate ἰσχύς) seems to be used in the Fourth Gospel in the sense of faithfulness, righteousness, rectitude, rather than with the meaning of intellectual truth. In 14:10 χάρις καὶ ἀλήθεια = ἔλεος ἰσχύς καὶ ἀλήθεια, and by ἀλήθεια is to be understood 'faithfulness corresponding to certain obligatory relations or to certain premises' (Wendt*). Cf. also the phrase πιστὸν τὸ ἀληθινόν = 'to do the right, i.e. to act conscientiously'; also 3:21; 4:43-46; 17:17-19, and possibly also in 14:17; 15:26; 16:13; 18:37—in all which passages the connotation seems to be a moral one ('faithfulness,' 'rectitude') rather than a purely intellectual one ('truth').

6. The Johannine and Pauline conceptions of 'faith' contrasted.—This is not the place for an extended review of the Pauline view of faith, but one or two salient points of contrast with the Johannine may be briefly indicated. The different method of presentation in each case is explained by the different circumstances under which each was formulated. In the interests of spiritual religion the Apostle of the Gentiles was forced to wage uncompromising war with Jewish legalistic conceptions of religion, and prejudices in favour of their own privileged religious position, which (naturally enough) were ingrained in the Jewish consciousness, and threatened to pass over into the Christian Church.† As against Jewish privilege and advantage, St. Paul vindicated and maintained the great principle that in the domain of salvation there is no distinction between Jew and Gentile, and that the Jew has no other righteousness than that which comes through faith in Jesus Christ (Gal 3:7), being in this respect in exactly the same position as the Gentile (cf. Ro 3:28). From this certain important results follow: (1) That 'no man is justified by the law' (Gal 2:16; Ro 3:20), and (2) that 'a man is justified by faith alone, apart from works of law.' This thesis was splendidly developed by St. Paul in his great dialectic. The absolute sufficiency of this saving faith is above all shown in the contemplation of its object. 'It is because faith lays hold of Jesus Christ, who was delivered up for our trespasses and was raised for our justification (Ro 4:25), and makes us the possessors of the righteousness of God through Him, that there is no room for any righteousness of our own in the ground of our salvation (Ro 10:4; Eph 2:8)' (Warfield). See, further, JUSTIFICATION.

On the other hand, the Johannine presentation is determined by an environment of different circumstances. The false emphasis laid on a merely intellectual knowledge had to be met. Hence the insistence in the Fourth Gospel on the true knowledge of Christian experience which is the fruit of a simple faith. It is regarded as a precious and permanent present possession. Briefly, it may be said that 'faith with St. John is rather contemplative and philosophic, where with St. Paul it is active and enthusiastic.'

7. The place of 'faith' in the teaching of Jesus.—Christ no less than St. Paul combated the prevailing tendency among the Jews to rest in a * Teaching of Jesus, I. p. 259 (Eng. tr.). God's faithfulness to His promises, as shown esp. in blessing His people, is an attribute constantly insisted on in the OT.

† As has already been pointed out above, 'faith' was regarded in Jewish circles as of the highest religious significance and value; only in the background of the Jewish mind there always lurked the consciousness of privilege and superiority.

‡ Sunday-Headlam, Romans, p. 32.

FAITH

position of privilege (cf. Mt 3<sup>o</sup>, Ro 2<sup>o</sup>). But the dominant characteristic of His teaching, as reported both in the Synoptics and in the Fourth Gospel, is the consistent way in which He strives to draw all faith to Himself. Even when His language is general in character (Mk 11<sup>o</sup>, Mt 21<sup>o</sup>, Mk 9<sup>o</sup>, Lk 18<sup>o</sup>), He speaks in a way that necessarily fixes attention upon His own Person as God's unique representative on earth. The soteriological significance of the so-called 'miracle-faith' has already been pointed out above. This comes out especially in such a passage as Mt 9<sup>o</sup>, where healing of the body is conjoined with the claim to forgive sins. That Christ is the proper object of this soteriological faith is sufficiently attested even in the Synoptic account (Lk 8<sup>12</sup> 13 22<sup>o</sup>, Mt 18<sup>o</sup> [Mk 9<sup>o</sup>], Lk 7<sup>6</sup>; cf. Lk 24<sup>32-40</sup>). It is in the Fourth Gospel, however, in the intimate discourses of Jesus which are there preserved, that the fullest account is given of the teaching of our Lord on this subject. Here, as is natural, faith in its higher aspects is consistently and abundantly set forth, as reflected and mirrored in the recollection of the 'disciple whom Jesus loved.' In the Fourth Gospel we are confronted with the personal testimony of the disciple who was uniquely fitted both by temperament and by character to receive and assimilate the deepest thoughts of his Master.

The testimony of the Fourth Gospel on this subject cannot be more adequately summed up than in the words of Warfield:<sup>2</sup>—

'In these discourses, too, Jesus' primary task is to blind men to Him by faith. The chief difference is that here, consonantly with the nature of the discourses recorded, much more prevailing stress is laid upon the higher aspects of faith, and we see Jesus striving specially to attract to Himself a faith consciously set upon eternal good. In a number of instances we find ourselves in much the same atmosphere as in the Synoptics (4th. 48<sup>o</sup>, 49<sup>o</sup>); and the method of Jesus is the same throughout. Everywhere He offers Himself as the object of faith, and claims faith in Himself for the highest concerns of the soul. But everywhere He begins at the level at which He finds His hearers, and leads them upward to these higher things. It is so that He deals constantly with the Jews, everywhere requiring faith in Himself for eternal life (5th. 38 39 40-47 78 84 92 93 124 49), declaring that faith in Him is the certain outcome of faith in their own Scriptures (6th. 47), is demanded by the witness borne Him by God in His mighty works (10th. 38 39), is involved in and is indeed identical with faith in God (5th. 38 6th. 43 87 124), and is the one thing which God requires of them (6th. 29), and the failure of which will bring them eternal ruin (9th. 24 35). When dealing with His followers, His primary care was to build up their faith in Him. Witness especially His solicitude for their faith in the last hours of His intercourse with them. For the faith they had reposed in Him He returns thanks to God (17<sup>o</sup>), but He is still nursing their faith (16<sup>o</sup>), preparing for its increase through the events to come (13<sup>o</sup> 14<sup>o</sup>), and with almost passionate eagerness claiming it at their hands (14<sup>o</sup>. 10-11-12). Even after His resurrection we find Him restoring the faith of the waverer (20<sup>o</sup>) with words which pronounce a special blessing on those who should hereafter believe on less compelling evidence—words whose point is not fully caught until we realize that they contain an intimation of the work of the Apostles as, like His own, bringing men to faith in Him (17<sup>o</sup>. 21).

The fundamental position of faith in the Christian religion, which is so strikingly expressed and implied throughout the whole NT literature, justifies the distinction of the old and new covenants as the ages before and after the 'coming of faith' (Gal 3<sup>o</sup>. 25). At the same time the way had been prepared for this historically by the circumstances of the time. The more the fulfilment of Israel's national hopes by special Divine interposition seemed to recede, the more stress was laid upon the necessity of trust and faith in the Divine ordering as a religious duty.

FALL

FAITHFULNESS.—The quality of being faithful. 'Fidelity,' in the sense of trustworthiness, is a synonym; so also 'loyalty,' 'constancy.' The thought is not primarily of belief entertained (although that is latent); rather of right conduct which, emanating from right motive, demands and receives confidence and approval. Thus George Eliot (Span. Gipsy, v.).

'The deepest hunger of a faithful heart
Is faithfulness.'

The noun does not occur in the Gospels. There is, however, allusion to those in whom the quality (πίστεως) is conspicuous; they are the 'faithful' (πίστοι) of Mt 24<sup>o</sup> 25<sup>o</sup>. 2; Lk 12<sup>o</sup> 16<sup>o</sup>—where the word πίστοι has the meaning of being trustworthy in the discharge of duty. It is their conduct, not their creed, to which attention is specially directed. At the same time it should be remarked that the πίστεως implied (certainly in Mt 24<sup>o</sup> 25<sup>o</sup>. 2, Lk 12<sup>o</sup>) is closely bound up with an allegiance owned and recognized. It is suggestive of faith which, because genuine, compels to loyal obedience, and cannot but issue in works ('La foi qui n'a point, est-ce une foi sincère?' Racine). The trusty are the trustful (cf. Lightfoot, Gal. p. 155); and it is precisely those who feel themselves able to cling to something external to themselves who are most solicitous that their lives should be spent in useful service. See FAITH. H. L. JACKSON.

FALL.—The various questions suggested in regard to the relation of the Fall to Jesus Christ may be treated under the following heads:

- i. The Messianic element in the story of the Fall.
- ii. The Fall in its bearing on the work of Christ in (1) the Incarnation, (2) its redemptive aspects.
- iii. The Fall in its bearing on the Person of Christ.
- iv. Our Lord's own teaching (or that of the Gospels) on the Fall.

i. THE MESSIANIC ELEMENT IN THE STORY OF THE FALL.—It is not within the scope of this Dictionary to discuss the general character of the OT narrative of the Fall. We may here simply assume as accepted the view that in Gn 3 we have an account, cast in the pictorial form characteristic of the period to which it belongs, of the beginning of human sin, with its attendant evils of suffering and death. Whatever opinion may be held as to the literary materials and composition of the narrative, it commends itself as in all essential features a unique and authoritative record of great fundamental facts of human life and history; and its Divine inspiration is sufficiently attested by the profound truthfulness and significance of its moral and religious teaching.

In the midst of this story of sin and judgment we find the first promise of restoration, and thus the Divine purpose of redemption is brought into association with the very beginnings of human evil. 'I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel' (Gn 3<sup>o</sup>). That this utterance contains the germ of Messianic prophecy cannot be doubted; but care must be taken so make neither too much nor too little of this element in it, and to interpret the passage in accordance with sound principles of historical exegesis, with due reference to the context, and to the general characteristics of OT prophecy. The embodiment of this Protévangelium in the primitive religious tradition, and in the inspired record of it, is a testimony to the fact that the Divine purpose of redemption is coeval with the existence of human sin. From the time when the consciousness of guilt and corruption first dawned in the human heart, there was also present the hope of restoration, and of man's ultimate triumph over those powers of evil by which he had been temporarily vanquished. This is the germ of which all the redemptive promise and prophecy of the OT are the development. Three progressive ideas may be traced in the teaching of the passage, which the serpent species is regarded, there is conveyed the truth that there would be continual and deadly conflict between the human race and the powers of evil, each seeking to destroy the other. (2) The hopeful element in the struggle is indicated, and man's final victory suggested, by the specific way in which the conflict is described—'It shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel.' (3) There underlies the statement with regard to mankind in general the remoter and deeper significance applicable to the representative Man, in and through whom the warfare was to be brought to a crisis and a victorious issue.

The order of these points may also be taken as indicating the line along which the full meaning of the saying would unfold itself. It is one of those pregnant utterances of revelation whose content is gradually realized and defined by the progress of events. The Messianic ideas contained in it are as yet vague and general, yet real; rudimentary, but fundamental; implicit rather than explicit; yet enough to keep a spark of hope alive, and to inspire faith and effort till clearer light came in the providential unfolding of God's redemptive plan.

ii. THE FALL IN RELATION TO THE WORK OF CHRIST.—The fact of man's fallen condition, of which the narrative of Gn 3 is the historical explanation, is the raison d'être of redemption, and thus the Fall is very closely related to the whole work of Christ at every point. But it is with the effects rather than with the manner or history of the Fall that the gospel supremely concerned, and after the story has once for all been given at the beginning of revelation, it is thereafter but little referred to in Scripture, and is scarcely ever brought into direct relation with redemption, except in two classical passages in the writings of St. Paul, viz. in Ro 5 and I Co 15. Our attention will here be confined to those points in which the Fall comes into more direct relation with the work of Christ, or in which the fall of man in Adam and his restoration in Christ serve to illuminate each other.

1. The relation of the Fall to the Incarnation.—The question here raised is between the two views expressed respectively by the words of Augustine, 'Si homo non peccasset, filius Dei non esset incarnatus,' and of Andreas Osiander, 'Etiamsi homo non peccasset, Deus tamen incarnatus esset licet non crucifexus.' The common belief has hitherto been that the whole mission and work of Christ were solely conditioned by the Fall. But the other view with regard to the Incarnation, maintained by the Scotists in the Middle Ages and by other distinguished thinkers, has of late gained fresh currency, especially in connexion with modern evolutionary philosophy. The relation of the Fall to the Incarnation determines the place of the latter in the plan of redemption, and opens up the question whether the Incarnation was subsidiary to the Atonement, or the Atonement a development and modification of the Incarnation.

(i.) The view that an Incarnation was, independently of sin, the consummation of God's purpose in relation to mankind, has been supported by arguments which can here only be briefly mentioned.

(a) The metaphysical argument that a possibility of becoming man must have existed eternally in the being of God, otherwise no Incarnation could have taken place. In other words, there was in God a 'self-disposition' for incarnation, a necessity (ethical, not metaphysical) for God, who is love, to make a perfect self-communication to His moral and spiritual creature.

(b) The very conception of the Mediator in redemption implies a necessary and eternal relation both to God and to man, which, even apart from sin, would have found its issue in incarnation. The Mediator is necessary for the perfecting of the world no less than for its redemption, and has a cosmical significance wider and deeper than His work as Redeemer.

(c) As Christ is necessary for the world's perfection, the Incarnation may be held to be involved in the 'eternal idea of the world.' This is the counterpart of the preceding arguments, and is as old as Irenæus. It means that man has in his very nature a need and a capacity for Christ, corresponding to God's self-communicating love, and this quite apart from sin.

(d) To base the Incarnation solely on the need of redemption, is to make Christ a means and not an end in Himself, or, in more modern language, to reduce the most glorious manifestation of God for the perfecting of humanity to an expedient contingent upon the untoward incident of sin. In Christ alone, as the centre and end, is the highest possible for man realized; if this were dependent on the Fall, then sin would be a 'felix culpa' in the most emphatic sense.

(e) These somewhat speculative lines of reasoning are not without Scripture warrant. In such passages as Col 1:16, and Eph 1:10, we have at least a suggestion of a grand Christocentric plan for the universe, antecedent to, and occupying a plane quite above, the contingency of human sin. Christ is here presented in relation to the Universe as 'the firstborn of all creation,' to whom and unto whom all things were created, in whom all things hold together, and who becomes also 'the head of the body, the Church,' and 'the firstborn from the dead.' It was God's eternal purpose 'to sum up all things in Christ,' 'in whom also we were made a heritage' (cf. also Jn 1, He 1, I Co 8, Rev 3:14 etc.). Redemption is here presented as something which forms a harmonious part of a larger plan. Christ is at once the Alpha and the Omega, the medium and the end of creation, the beginning and the consummation of God's eternal purpose.

(ii.) The commonly received view that the Incarnation is simply a necessary part of the work of redemption, is supported by the prima facie teaching of Scripture. 'The Son of man came to seek and to save' (Lk 19:10); 'God sent forth His Son . . . that he might redeem' (Gal 4:4). These are examples of innumerable passages which represent the mission of Christ in this light. But to this it may be answered that, though historically and actually the Incarnation has taken this redemptive aspect, and is naturally and properly so presented in the Gospel, another view of it, under different conditions, is not excluded, of which, as we have seen, we are in fact permitted brief glimpses in a wider field of vision.

(iii.) Both the foregoing views may be united and harmonized in what is really the truest and deepest conception, viz. that God's purpose is an eternal and unchangeable unity, and every part of it, as wrought out in history, must be regarded as having its proper place in relation to the whole. It is by a misunderstanding of the absolute being and counsels of God that we discuss at all questions as to what might have been done under other conditions. The view of the question before us which is most worthy of a true conception of God, and which at the same time agrees with the broad teaching of Scripture, is that in the infinite counsels of Him who sees the end from the beginning, Redemption is wrought into the very fabric of God's eternal purpose, all parts of which—Creation, Redemption, Incarnation, Atonement, the Final Consummation,—hang together harmoniously as integral and correlated elements in one homogeneous, perfect, and unchangeable unity. The question as to the relation of the Fall to the Incarnation thus resolves itself into that of the place of the Fall in God's plan of the world; and we need not hold with hyper-Calvinists that sin was foreordained, in order to believe that the Fall, foreseen and permitted, enters into an intimate and essential relation to the whole of the Divine plan. In this plan Incarnation holds a central place, and its redemptive significance is one aspect of a wider relation to the world, as the means for perfecting as well as for redeeming the human race. This view preserves the place of Redemption in the foreground of God's revealed plan, avoids the necessity of conceiving any change in the Divine purpose contingent upon sin, and at the same time gives the Incarnation that cosmical significance worthy of its transcendent character. Thus Christ is central and supreme, and the whole scheme of Redemption is presented in a true perspective, more in harmony with the requirements of modern thought.

2. The relation of the Fall to the redemptive work of Christ.—In the distinctively soteriological aspects of Christ's work, we are brought at once into close relation to the Fall. We have here to consider (i.) the reality and general nature of the Fall, as seen in the light of Redemption; and (ii.) the main points of detail in which the Fall and the redeeming work of Christ explain and illustrate each other.

(i.) The doctrine of the Fall is vital to the Christian system; the reality and general nature of the Fall, as a great downward and retrograde step in the history of mankind, are confirmed and illustrated by the redemptive work of Christ. This aspect of Christ's work, which occupies in Scripture the foremost place, is everywhere represented as rendered necessary by something grievously abnormal in the condition of the human race. The Scripture doctrine of sin as absolute evil; man's universal sinfulness, helplessness, and state of spiritual death, which form the very basis of Redemption; the representation of mankind as 'lost,' 'alienated,' from God, and yet capable and worthy of being redeemed and restored;—all this, as so abundantly presented and emphasized in connexion with the atoning work of Christ, affords the strongest confirmation of the doctrine that man has fallen from a higher condition. Whatever may be said as to the Incarnation (see A, above), it is clear that the great outstanding fact of the Atonement, with all the suffering and sacrifice which it involved, can only be accounted for at once by the dignity and the degradation of man,—in other words, by the Fall.

(ii.) This is borne out by the more specific teaching in regard to the Fall in its relation to the work of Christ in Ro 5:12 and 1 Co 15:22. The general and clear line of argument in the former passage brings out the following points:

Adam's act of disobedience involved all men in (a) Sin, and (b) Death. By sin is here meant both actual sinfulness ('for that all sinned,' v. 12), and a condition of liability to penalty even apart from personal transgression (v. 14). This latter, however, is not to be held in any sense as personal participation in or responsibility for Adam's offence, though it is the transmitted effect of it (see below). Death here apparently means physical death in the first place (as in v. 14), but most probably includes also spiritual death. On the other hand, though the analogy is not fully expressed, it is clearly implied that in the same way Christ's act of obedience brings (a) justification and (b) Life; and in view of the emphatic reiteration, in various forms, of the surpassing fulness of Redemption in vv. 15-17, we may include under these terms: negatively, deliverance from guilt, from sin itself; and from death; and positively, the bestowment of judicial and actual righteousness, and of spiritual and eternal life.

Another question raised in this connexion is concerned with the precise moral relationship between Adam and his posterity on the one hand, and between Christ and His people on the other. Adam and Christ ('the second Adam') are represented as standing in an analogous relation to mankind, forming the basis in the one case of universal sin and death, and in the other of restoration for believers. In regard to Adam it has been variously held (1) that the relation between him and his posterity was virtually one of identity; mankind sinned in him and therefore share his guilt; (2) that the relation is representative or federal, Adam acting on behalf of his descendants; and (3) that the relation is natural, the evil effects of Adam's fall being communicated to the race through the ordinary channels of heredity. The third view preserves any elements of truth in the other two, while it best explains the facts in harmony with true ethical principles. The transmitted effect of Adam's sin consists mainly of the loss of moral balance, an inborn tendency of heart and will towards evil, a disability, though not a total inability, for goodness. Though men are not personally implicated in the guilt of Adam's transgression, their condition involves demerit and necessitates redemption.* Turning to the other side, though we are not warranted in carrying the analogy too far, we find on the part of Christ (1) a relation of identity with the race through the Incarnation; (2) a representative or covenant relation with His people (see 2 Co 5:21 etc.), based on the one side on God's free grace, and on the other on believers' voluntary acceptance of it (Ro 5:17); and (3) a vital union between Christ and believers by which new life is imparted and the evil effects of the Fall counteracted (Jn 15:1-8 etc.).

Christ is thus a new beginning for the fallen race, a fountain of life and righteousness, as Adam was of death and sin. Adam was a true 'figure of him that was to come,' a type based not on mere analogy, but on deep and real correspondences between his relation as 'psychical' parent to his natural descendants, and Christ's relation to His people as the 'second Adam,' the 'spiritual' originator of a regenerated race.†

III. THE FALL IN RELATION TO THE PERSON OF CHRIST.—The Fall of Adam, as we have seen, introduced into the nature of all descended from him a fatal taint of sin, an insuperable moral disability. The question now before us is, How did Jesus Christ, the new Adam, as a true member of the fallen race, escape this evil influence? That Christ in His nature and Person was absolutely free from sin, is one of the clearest and most generally admitted as well as most vital facts of the gospel. Born into the world in the line of human descent, sharing human nature otherwise in its fulness, how was Jesus alone unaffected by the common heritage of sin?

The full answer to this question lies hidden in the mystery of the Incarnation; but an indication of the line in which the solution lies is given in the great fact of the Virgin Birth of our Lord. The historical reality of this part of the Gospel narrative has been assailed by modern criticism, but the doctrine still retains its place in the best philosophy of the Incarnation, and the truth has been rather confirmed than otherwise by impartial study of the records. As a fact, the birth of Jesus in a supernatural manner commends itself as peculiarly in keeping with the whole scheme of redemption. (1) It indicates a new departure, a fresh beginning, the introduction into the human race of a new element, and marks a break in the normal and fatal continuity of spiritual helplessness and decay. (2) It suggests, though it does not fully explain, means by which Christ could become true man and yet be preserved from the hereditary effects of the Fall. 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Most High shall overshadow thee: wherefore also that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God' (Lk 1:35). Those who deny the Virgin Birth have still to explain the equally miraculous fact of the appearance of this single exception to the universal sinfulness of mankind. The manner of Christ's birth, as recorded in the Gospels of Mt. and Lk., is so fully in harmony with His unique personality and character, that, though we cannot fully understand, we may at least be satisfied that all form parts of one Divine plan, and thus the moral miracle and the physical mutually support one another. See art. VIRGIN BIRTH.

iv. THE TEACHING OF CHRIST AND OF THE GOSPELS ON THE FALL.—Our Lord makes no reference to the story of the Fall in all His recorded teaching. His only allusion to our first parents at all being the general statement in connexion with marriage (Mt 19<sup>a</sup>, Mk 10<sup>b</sup>). But the doctrine of the Fall underlies the whole teaching of Christ on sin and redemption, and is particularly confirmed and illustrated in the following points:

(1) The universal sinfulness of man. This is taken for granted. 'If ye then, being evil, know, etc. (Mt 7<sup>a</sup>, Lk 11<sup>b</sup>). This truth is involved in the whole character of our Lord's mission and teaching. See also Jn 1<sup>a</sup> 8<sup>b</sup>. (2) The inwardness of sin. 'Out of the heart come forth evil thoughts, etc. These are the things which defile the man' (Mt 15<sup>a</sup>, 9 and 1). Cf. also Mt 19<sup>a</sup>, Mk 10<sup>b</sup>, Lk 6<sup>a</sup>. (3) The deep radical character of human evil. 'Ye must be born anew' (Jn 3<sup>a</sup> and v.<sup>a</sup>). (4) The hereditary disability of human nature. 'That which is born of the flesh is flesh,' etc. (Jn 3<sup>a</sup>; cf. 1<sup>b</sup>). (5) Jesus everywhere indicates clearly His view as to the original dignity and status of man. 'What shall a man be profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and forfeit his life?' (Mt 16<sup>a</sup>). Cf. Lk 15<sup>a</sup>, Mt 12<sup>a</sup>, etc.; and the general teaching of Jesus as to the Fatherhood of God. (6) The Fall may be said to be pictured for us more specifically in the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15<sup>a</sup>), and the corresponding parables of the Lost Sheep and the Lost Piece of Money in the same chapter. (7) Generally the whole mission of Christ to ransom men (Mk 10<sup>a</sup>), to save (Mt 1<sup>a</sup>, Lk 19<sup>a</sup> etc.), and to restore to Divine Sonship (Jn 1<sup>a</sup>), is founded upon the doctrine of the Fall and the state of ruin resulting from it, combined with splendid possibilities of restoration through grace.

FALSE CHRISTS.—The term pseudochristos or pseudo-Christ occurs only in Mk 13<sup>a</sup> (cf. 13<sup>b</sup>)=Mt 24<sup>a</sup> (cf. 24<sup>b</sup>). Despite its omission in Mk. by D, etc., it probably belongs to the original text of the eschatological discourse. But this discourse forms one of the sections in the Synoptic narrative which are specially permeated by reflexions of the Apostolic Church; and even after a small Jewish or Jewish-Christian apocalypse has been disentangled from the discourse, the remaining logia, of which this forms one, require to be carefully scrutinized. They do not belong to the primitive tradition of Christ's sayings. Over them lie traces of the experiences of the early Christians during the latter half of the seventh decade in Palestine, when the political convulsion of the country was accompanied by religious agitation and moral crises of a strange nature. The 1st cent. of our era was full of unrest for the Jews of Palestine. As the pages of Josephus testify, one rival Messiah followed another, each and all succeeding more or less in kindling the passions of the people against the Roman authorities. These popular leaders of revolt worked on the religious feeling of the nation. Messianic fanaticism became uncontrollable, and enthusiasts seduced the ardent by semi-political hopes (cf. Schürer, HJP I. ii. § 20, and Volz, Jüd. Eschatologie, 209-210).

If the words 'in my name' (Mk 13<sup>a</sup>=Mt 24<sup>a</sup>) mean 'in the name of Jesus,' it is difficult to understand them. For it is hard to think of any Christians claiming to be Jesus. Christian false prophets there might be, and were, but we have no evidence during the 1st cent. of pretenders to the name of Jesus. False Christs in this sense of the term are scarcely credible, though later ages have furnished specimens of the type, as, e.g., among some of the followers of George Fox the Quaker, who was himself accused of claiming to be Christ. Either, then, we must suppose that the phrase 'in my name' has been inserted by the Evangelists in order to stamp as Christian what was originally a Jewish prediction, or the phrase must be taken as equivalent to 'in the name of Messiah,' as is implied in 'I am he.' False Christs would thus be equivalent to false Messiahs (so Mk 13<sup>a</sup>, Mt 24<sup>a</sup>), and the logion would be a warning against the claims and pretensions of the numerous impostors who swarmed in Palestine down to the days of Bar Cochba (131-135 A.D.), their last representative. It is in the light of this retrospect that Justin Martyr (about 155 A.D.) quotes this saying in his Dialogue (82, 308 C) thus: 'Our Lord said many false prophets and false Christs would come in His name and deceive many; which is the case.' The false prophets, of course, are the heralds of the false Messiahs; they guarantee the movement in question by means of miracles. But occasionally a false Messiah may have been, as Theudas was, a false prophet as well. The Diatheke, curiously enough, omits all mention of false Messiahs, though it notices the danger of false prophets (xvi. 3; cf., however, what is said in xvi. 4 about the appearing of the world-deceiver as Son of God).

The locale of the false Messiahs (Mt 24<sup>a</sup>) is either the wilderness (cf. Ac 21<sup>a</sup>), as in the case of Simon son of Gioras, or the inner chambers, as in the case of John of Giscala (cf. 1 K 20<sup>a</sup>)—alluding possibly to the current idea that the Messiah was to remain hidden for some time previous to His appearance in public. But whether the one or the other happened to be chosen, the salient point is that in either case the elect are to be kept right by a wholesome scepticism. Christians, at Israel's great crisis, were to be saved by unbelief in pseudo-Messiahs and pseudo-prophets' (Expos. Gr. Test. i. 294). The situation would also manifest the difference between credulity and faith. Desperate situations foster an avid appetite for deliverance, which is too often indifferent to the particular quality of the aid offered. But faith keeps its head. Belief in Christ imparts a sanity of judgment which makes men cool even in emergencies. Finally, there is the thought that miracles of themselves are no guarantee of Divine authority.

The allusion in Jn 5<sup>a</sup> may be, but is not necessarily, to a single anti-Christ or pseudo-Christ, who, however, comes in his own name (cf. Loisy, Le Quatrième Évangile, p. 416). Neither here nor in Rev 13<sup>a</sup> 20<sup>b</sup> have we to do with an epitome or individual incarnation of the deceivers foretold in the Synoptic narrative. The plane of thought is at once later and different.

FALSE PROPHETS.—1. For the understanding of this expression in the NT, we must correctly apprehend the character of the false prophets of the OT. To earlier writers these men were essentially and consciously false, either prophets of false gods, holders of opinions which did not agree with the revealed character of Jehovah the God of Israel, or men who knowingly spoke falsehoods in the name of Jehovah. Modern biblical science takes a more lenient view. It does not deny the existence of such as either possible or actual (Jer 28, Ezk 13<sup>8</sup>), though in the matter of creed many of them were probably 'syncretistic' rather than simply 'anti-Jehovistic' (A. B. Davidson). The majority may be regarded rather as men accustomed to the outward signs of the prophetic office, the hairy mantle (Zec 13, cf. 1 K 19<sup>10</sup>), the methods of prophetic instruction (Jer 28<sup>10</sup>), and the use of the prophetic formula, 'Thus saith Jehovah' (Jer 28<sup>6-8</sup>, Ezk 13<sup>7</sup>), but who had never come under the influence or had failed to remain in personal contact with, the revealing Spirit 'who spake by the prophets.' Hence the message they gave was merely one that was agreeable to the common thought of the people, whether it concerned the internal condition and life of the nation or its relation to surrounding States. It was principally in the later prophetic period of Micah, Jeremiah, and Zechariah that these prophets of smooth things, subject to no true and Divine revelation, came to be regarded as professional tricksters, making a living out of their false predictions (Mic 3, Zec 13<sup>4-5</sup>). But whether from the desire of gain or of public favour, these false prophets expressed the optimistic, what would be regarded as the patriotic, view of the state and future of their country, and have been described as 'nationalistic rather than false.' It is this optimistic, nationalist outlook that particularly explains the reference in Lk 6<sup>26</sup>, 'in the same manner did their fathers (speak well) to the false prophets.' The false prophets, as declaring the things the nation wished to hear, naturally succeeded in gaining general approval and credence. This is particularly shown in Jer 6<sup>12-15</sup> and Mic 2<sup>1</sup>, and is confirmed by instances, not a few, in which the apparently unpatriotic attitude of the true prophet, compared with that assumed by the false, resulted in disfavour and even in persecution (1 K 22<sup>27</sup>, 2 Ch 16<sup>9</sup>, Jer 20<sup>7</sup>). It was the false prophet, representing the national 'wish that is father to the thought,' of whom 'all men spoke well.' Our Lord therefore takes such as types of that ill-deserved general approval which may be won by flattery, by concealment of the truth, by the denying or minimizing of danger and of retribution: methods denied to those who 'are of the truth.' This view of false prophecy as the saying of things men wish to hear 'for the hire of wrongdoing,' is to be discerned in 2 P 2<sup>21</sup>, where the false prophet is the analogue of the false teacher, himself guilty of 'lascivious doings' (cf. vv. 12-19 for the character of this teaching).

2. The false prophets in the Christian Church.—In the NT as in the OT, the prophetic ministry must be regarded in its two branches as interpretative of God's mind and as predictive. False prophets of both these classes were to be expected in the Christian community. To grasp the significance of the warnings against these men, the importance of prophecy in NT times must be borne in mind. Prophecy was a more important gift than tongues (1 Co 14), and the prophet is in the list of officers associated with the Apostles, taking, with this one exception, precedence of all other ranks. The prominence of the prophet may be seen in the Didache (c. 11), and in the part played by him in the Montanist movement. Hence their truth or falseness, their faithful use, or their abuse of the spiritual gift, was an important factor for the infant Church. Hence our Lord warns against them as 'wolves in sheep's clothing' (Mt 7<sup>15</sup>), and St. John at the end of the Apostolic age repeats the warning (1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>). In the former case the reference is apparently to their unethical teaching; in the latter to their denial or misinterpretation of the fact of the Incarnation. Without using the name, our Lord warns also against such men, as falsely predicting or announcing the Parousia (Mt 24<sup>5-7</sup>). In 2 P 2<sup>1</sup> stress is laid upon false teaching of an antinomian character, the authors of which are called 'false teachers,' but find their analogy in the 'false prophets' of the OT.

FALSE WITNESS.—The prohibition in the Decalogue of bearing false witness was endorsed by Christ (ὁ ψευδομαρτυροῦσθαι, Mt 19<sup>18</sup>). Originally it dealt, not with lying in general, but with lying against one's neighbour, perhaps because this is the most frequent form of falsehood (see Dale, Ten Commandments, p. 208): Was it merely for brevity that the limiting clause was dropped by Christ? or did it not rather imply a broadening and deepening of the commandment? Like other sins, ψευδομαρτυρία come from the heart (Mt 15<sup>19</sup>).

At the preliminary investigation before Caiaphas, the chief priests and the whole council sought (ἐζητοῦν) false witness on which such a capital charge might be based as would demand Pilate's attention (Mt 26<sup>59</sup>, Mk 14<sup>59</sup>), ὅτι μὴ ἐκείνοις εἴδωκε μαρτυρίαν, ὡς δὲ τῇ ἀληθείᾳ ψευδομαρτυρίαν (Euthym. Zig.); but the Evangelists seem to mean more than this. 'Hic (ἐζητοῦν) illa falsorum testium exorta copia' (Bengel). While nominally judges, they were really prosecutors, as they showed by disregarding the rule that witnesses for the defence should first be called (see Westcott on Jn 18<sup>21</sup>). Though many false witnesses came (Mt 26<sup>60</sup>) and bore false witness (Mk 14<sup>60</sup>), yet their witness agreed not together (τοὺ αὶ μαρτυρία οὐκ ἦσαν, ib.), i. e. they were not consistent with each other, since it was necessary that two at least should agree (Dt 17<sup>9</sup>), and witnesses were examined separately, not in the presence of each other (see Ederheim, Jesus the Messiah, ii. 560). Some (Erasmus, Grot. etc.) take τοὺ in the sense of 'sufficient for the purpose, equal to the demand for weighty evidence, and justifying condemnation.' The parallel words in Mt 26<sup>60</sup> lend some support ('sought false witness against Jesus that they might put him to death; and they found it not, though many false witnesses came'); but it is a strong objection that οὐδὲ ἄλλως τῶν is used of the witness of those who perverted His words concerning the temple (Mk 14<sup>60</sup>), which constituted a very grave charge; cf. Ac 6<sup>12, 14</sup> (cf. Expositor's Greek Testament on Mk 14<sup>60</sup>).

Even the spies who constantly laid wait for Him had caught up nothing to serve their purpose; but at last two false witnesses (Mt 26<sup>60</sup>; τῶν, Mk 14<sup>67</sup>) came, who perverted certain words spoken at the beginning of His ministry (Jn 2<sup>19</sup>); but their testimony also was not τῶν. Taking the meaning as 'did not agree together,' the difference may perhaps be traced in Mt. (ἕσθωμαι, παραλέω) and Mk. (ἐπὶ κραδίω); certainly the perversion is evident, since they ascribed to Him that destruction which He ascribed to the Jews. It has been inferred from Mt 27<sup>68</sup> that the rulers knew the true meaning; but perhaps this is better referred to a knowledge of Christ's words in Mk 8<sup>31</sup> etc. This false witness might have sufficed; no other charge could be so effective before the Roman Procurator as that of being a fanatical seducer of the ignorant populace, who might lead them on to wild tumultuous acts; while the claim that He would, or was able to, rebuild the temple within three days might be made to imply Divine or magical pretensions (see Edersheim, op. cit. ii. 559); but it also broke down (ὁδοὶ ὄχρου λαῶν ἦν ἡ μακροπία ἀβρῶν), cf. Ps 27<sup>12</sup> 35<sup>11</sup>.

On the law concerning false witness see Hastings' DB iv. 351<sup>a</sup>; Edersheim, op. cit. ii. 558. Witnesses who contradicted each other were not considered in Rabbinic law as false witnesses in the sense of being punishable. The Sadducees were less severe than the Pharisees in the interpretation of Dt 19<sup>16</sup>; they held that the punishment should be inflicted only if the falsely accused had been punished, whereas the Pharisees demanded punishment if the sentence had been pronounced, whether it was executed or not.

FAME.—This term has had three meanings,—rumour, reputation, and posthumous renown. The last is modern; the Elizabethan usage lies between, or may include, the other two. Bacon, who left a Fragment on the subject, and who loved to quote the mythological idea of Fame as the daughter of the angry Earth and the sister of the warring Giants, understood by the term disturbing Rumour—a thing dangerous to governments. Milton, who in an early poem (Lycidas, 70 ff.) described 'the last infirmity of noble minds,' in a late poem analyzed the temptation to seek fame or glory, and poured scorn on human judgments (Par. Reg. iii. 21-151). In the Gospels the meaning is simpler. The term describes the spreading talk of the admiring multitudes. It is a thing unsought, but unrestrainable, and in no small degree disquieting to the authorities.

We are told that early in the ministry of Jesus a fame of Him went through Galilee and the surrounding country, including Syria (Mt 4<sup>24</sup>, Lk 4<sup>14</sup>). Special occasions were the restoration of a demoniac (Mk 1<sup>34</sup>, Lk 4<sup>41</sup>) and the cleansing of a leper (Lk 5<sup>13</sup>, cf. Mk 1<sup>40</sup>). The First Gospel uses the term also in connexion with the restoring of Jairus' daughter and the giving of sight to two blind men (Mt 9<sup>20, 21</sup>). And, finally, this Gospel tells us that the fame of Jesus affected Herod (Mt 14<sup>1</sup> RV 'report,' cf. Mk 6<sup>16</sup>, Lk 9<sup>7</sup>).

An examination of the Greek text shows that in no two parallel passages is the same term used. The term of the first two Gospels (except in Mt 9<sup>20</sup>) is ἀκοή (lit. 'hearing'; RV 'report'), used also for 'rumours' in the eschatological discourse (Mt 24<sup>4</sup>, Mk 13<sup>7</sup>). St. Luke, however, eschews this word, and in his three passages uses three others: φῆμι (lit. 'speech'; RV 'fame,' Lk 4<sup>14</sup>, so Mt 9<sup>11</sup>); ἤχος (lit. 'sound'; RV 'report,' Lk 4<sup>27</sup>); and λόγος (lit. 'discourse'; RV 'report,' Lk 5<sup>13</sup>). And elsewhere each Evangelist uses periphrasis. Thus we may conclude that the idea, expressed by these terms was of an indefinite character. It included, in varying degrees, such elements as curiosity, attraction, wonder, faith, worship.

These passages, taken along with others that more directly express admiration or astonishment (Mt 7<sup>28</sup> 12<sup>28</sup> 15<sup>31</sup>), or that relate the concourse and following of multitudes (Mk 3<sup>7</sup> 6<sup>12, 13</sup> 10<sup>1</sup>), show that during His whole public ministry the acts of Jesus arrested the gaze of men. Not only in Galilee, but in all the provinces of Palestine, and in cities of Syria, men talked and speculated regarding a new Figure that was in their midst. A few who cherished sacred tradition believed that the Messiah had come (Jn 1<sup>41, 49</sup> 7<sup>40</sup>, Mt 16<sup>21</sup>). Others less instructed talked wildly as if Elijah had descended, or the Baptist had risen (Mk 6<sup>14, 15</sup>, Mt 16<sup>13, 14</sup>), or some prophet of local tradition or expectation had appeared (Jn 7<sup>40</sup>, Mt 21<sup>11</sup>). Doubtless the multitudes that hung around Him were very mixed crowds. Vanity and selfishness mingled with their motives. They loved display. They desired a succession of palpable benefits. Some had political aims or ambitions. The majority failed to appreciate the renunciation and pure spirituality of the Teacher. And few were able to sustain the devotion of their higher moments. To Jesus it was often a relief to find a place of solitude for meditation and prayer. Yet He acknowledged the true instinct of the untutored worshipper (Mt 21<sup>10</sup>). And it is to the honour of human nature to remember that the common people heard Him gladly (Mk 12<sup>37</sup>), and that not the nation at large, but the constituted authorities and their tools—a suspicious officialism, a proud and jealous priesthood—rejected the true Leader and Lord of men, the Shepherd and Bishop of souls. See, further, art. AMBITION and GLORY.

FAMILY.—1. Membership.—Jewish family life, while having many points in common with that of the Gentiles, was marked by a higher standard of purity, the avoidance of infanticide, and the condemnation of the selfish cruelty that in human sacrifice gave the fruit of the body for the sin of the soul (Mic 6<sup>7</sup>). The father was the head of the house, exercising restrictive authority over the wife, having complete disposal of the children, and giving his name to the family inheritance. Although living for years in another locality, he was regarded and registered as belonging to the place of his ancestral origin (Lk 3<sup>2</sup>).

The wife, as being legally the purchased possession of her husband, was under his law,—the bē'ulah to her bā'ah, or rightful possessor. Hence the land of Israel could be called the bē'ulah of Jehovah (Is 62<sup>7</sup>). Betrothal (Mt 1<sup>17</sup>), as a covenant, was equivalent to marriage; it prevented the woman from being married to any other man until she had received a writing of divorce. Among the duties of the wife, apart from the maternal charge of the family, was the daily preparation of the bread (Mt 23<sup>41</sup>), and the carrying of water from the village fountain (Jn 4<sup>7</sup>). The desire for male children was universal (Jn 16<sup>21</sup>), as these preserved the name and upheld the interests and rights of the family, and in due time enlarged its circle by bringing in daughters from other households. The pre-eminence of the father carried with it a corresponding responsibility of watching over the life and honour, the rights and welfare of his family. See art. DIVORCE, MARRIAGE.

2. References to the family.—It was out of such relationships that Christ drew examples that were familiar to all, when He spoke of fathers who knew how to give good gifts to their children (Lk 11<sup>13</sup>), of sons who obeyed or disobeyed the father's command (Mt 21<sup>28</sup>); and when, beyond the attachments of unselfish devotion fostered by the sacred institutions of the family, He set the higher claim of what was due to Himself from His disciples (Mt 10<sup>37</sup>). The Lord's Prayer was a transfiguration of the family relationships.

3. Religion in the family.—It was especially in the superiority of its religious training that the Jewish home differed from the family life of the Gentiles. See art. BOYHOOD, CHILDHOOD.

FAMILY.—

1. Jesus as the member of a family.
2. Teaching of Jesus on the family.
  - (a) Marriage.
  - (b) Position of women.
  - (c) Filial obedience.
  - (d) The family and the Kingdom of God.

1. Whatever be the force of the phrase 'the brethren of the Lord' (see article s.v.), it is evident that Jesus took His place as a member of a human family in the fullest sense of the word. Such was the impression of His fellow-townsmen who saw Him in His daily life. The recidence of the Gospels about the childhood of Christ is in itself an indication that there was nothing which so differed from the ordinary family life of a Jewish household as to create a special tradition about His early years. It was not till a later age had forgotten the completeness with which the Lord identified Himself with human conditions that there appeared the painful attempts of the Apocryphal Gospels to break the silence of their Canonical prototypes. In the one authentic account of any event in the boyhood of Jesus (Lk 24-31), received perhaps from the Virgin herself (see Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? ch. iv.), He is seen to be as others 'among their kinsfolk and acquaintance.' For the rest we only know that 'the moral perfections of God were being translated into those unostentatious virtues which constitute the dignity and the happiness of a human home' (Dale, Laws of Christ for Common Life, xi.).

When we come to the history of the Ministry, two stages can be discerned in the change which came over the relations between Jesus and His earthly kinsfolk. (1) The calling of the first disciples, narrated in Jn 1, did not lead at once to the withdrawal of the Lord from His family. His mother was present with Him at the marriage at Cana, and after that event He went down with her and His brethren to Capernaum and made a short stay there (Jn 2<sup>1</sup>, cf. Mt 4<sup>12-16</sup>). (2) But when the Apostolic band was complete and the work of training them began in earnest, then He subordinated the claims of His family to the higher claims of His mission, and no longer lived continually in the home of His youth. Immediately after the final choice of the Twelve occurred the incident near Capernaum, when those from His house (of παρ' αβραμ) went out to stop Him from preaching, under the impression that He was mad; shortly afterwards His mother and His brethren try to call Him away, apparently for a similar reason (Mk 3<sup>2</sup>). From this it may be gathered that they were now living at Capernaum. From Mk 6<sup>3</sup> it has been mistakenly concluded that they were still living at Nazareth, but the verse plainly draws a distinction between them and His sisters (named, acc. to Epiphanius, Her. lxxviii. 9, Salome and Mary), who, either because they were married, or for some other reason, had settled down in their native town. Some have supposed that when the Lord left His family He dwelt in a house of His own in Capernaum. The Gospel of St. Matthew, it is true, speaks in a vague way of 'the house' (10<sup>23</sup>, 13<sup>28</sup>, 17<sup>28</sup>), but a comparison of, e.g., 9<sup>10</sup> with the corresponding passage in Lk 5<sup>28</sup> shows that it is not a house of Jesus which is meant. After leaving the family home, when He entered into a city, He depended on the hospitality of His friends. It was this literal homelessness which drew from Him the saying recorded in Mt 8<sup>20</sup> | Lk 9<sup>28</sup>, for it is unnecessary to give these words, with Augustine and others, a figurative sense. It is not possible to discover the precise moment at which they were uttered, as the two Evangelists give them in different connexions, but they must belong to the period when the total failure of His kindred to understand His mission had made it impossible for Him to dwell with them any longer. The position given to them by St. Luke is the more probable. According to him, they were pronounced as the Ministry was entering upon its last stage (cf. Lk 9<sup>2</sup>). Now in Jn 7<sup>12</sup> the Lord's 'brethren' are found arguing with Him as if He still lived with them. The incident there alluded to took place just before the Feast of Tabernacles in the second year of the Ministry. From this we may accept the conclusion suggested by St. Luke's order, that the Lord's home was closed against Him towards the end of the Ministry, rather than near its beginning, as the position given to the saying in St. Matthew might imply. Perhaps it is not without significance that in the next chapter of St. Luke is introduced another home, that of Lazarus and his sisters at Bethany, in which the Lord was an honoured guest.

The reconciliation which the Lord's Passion won for all mankind was first reflected among His own kinsmen after the last in a series during which His mother had ever been parted from Him in any absolute sense, and after His resurrection His brethren also cast in their lot with those who believed in Him. According to the tradition which St. Paul received, the Lord Himself appeared to James (1 Co 15<sup>7</sup>). This moment was probably the last in a series during which the surrender to the claims of Jesus had been steadily replacing previous unbelief. Such at least was the interpretation of later days, when the story was told that beneath the Cross (or even at the Last Supper, acc. to the version of Jerome, de Vir. Illus., quoting the Gospel of the Hebrews) James swore that he would neither eat bread nor drink wine till the Lord rose from the dead. With his conversion came that of the other brethren, and they with the Virgin are found at the opening of the Acts (1<sup>4</sup>) among those who were waiting for the fulfilment of the promise of the Spirit. Thus the earthly family of Christ fittingly finds its place in the foundations of His spiritual family.

2. In the teaching of Christ, although the word 'family' does not occur, yet the institution is everywhere presupposed and its laws emphasized, as it is also connected with the first miracle recorded in the Fourth Gospel. (a) The pivot on which family life turns is marriage, and this subject holds a unique place in the teaching of Christ. On all other social topics He left no particular detailed instructions, but only general rules. On marriage His words are distinct and afford specific guidance about details. He lays it down that monogamy is not the result of any code of law, but a primal fact instituted 'in the beginning' (Mt 19<sup>6</sup>). True marriage rests ultimately upon a spiritual basis, the physical aspect is but an accident. This is implied in the answer to the Sadducees (Mk 12<sup>26-27</sup>). No human law, not even though it have the sanction of the name of Moses, can alter this. The possibility of ground for divorce is confined to the case of one offence (or even abolished altogether, if we regard the exceptive clauses in Mt 19<sup>9</sup> and 3<sup>2</sup> as later glosses on the Lord's words; see Wright, Synopsis of Gospels, on Mk 10<sup>2</sup>, and cf. art. ADULTERY, DIVORCE, and MARRIAGE).

(b) The attitude of Jesus towards marriage was necessarily reflected in His treatment of women. In spite of all that can be urged to the contrary, it is clear that contemporary Judaism assigned to women a position far inferior to that of men. The tendency was rather to fall away from than to advance upon the standpoint of the OT. There woman is often found in a prominent and honourable place (e.g. Miriam, Nu 12<sup>1</sup>; Deborah, Jg 4<sup>4</sup>; Bathsheba, 1 K 1), but the days were now approaching when it could be said that he who talked with a woman was qualifying for Gehenna (Πῖρξος Ἀβὸθ, ed. Taylor, p. 59), an expression in which Judaism contrasted unfavourably even with the low estimate of women current among the Greeks (cf. Aristotle, Poetics, 15; Nic. Eth. vii. 7). In the treatment which Christ accorded to women is found the very antithesis of this harshness. This is sometimes (e.g. Jn 2<sup>d</sup>) obscured in the EV by the employment of 'woman' as a rendering of γυναίκα, a translation which is far from reproducing the respectful tone of the Greek. Jesus readily accepted the help of women, an aspect of the Ministry on which St. Luke seems to desire to lay special stress (cf. Plummer, Interpret. Crit. Com. on 'St. Luke,' Introd. p. xliii). He gave them equal rights with their husbands, implying that as far as divorce was lawful at all, a wife might put away a husband as much as a husband a wife, a doctrine tolerated rather than accepted by His countrymen. A like care to secure justice for women appears in the narrative preserved in Jn 8th. This story, whether Apostolic or not, certainly reflects the teaching of Jesus by inferring that in such moral downfalls the crime is not always to be imputed to the woman alone.

(c) In another region of family ethics—the sphere of filial duty—our Lord again attacked contemporary Jewish conventions. Nominally, filial obedience was exalted to a high place by the teachers of the day, but in practice it might be reduced to a mere shadow by such vows as those alluded to in Mk 7th. By sweeping away the sophistries with which these vows were defended, Jesus made parental claims absolute and inviolable.

(d) The family and the Kingdom of God.—Not only is life in a family the normal life of a disciple, as pictured in the Gospels, but the family supplies the analogy by which men are led to the better understanding of the Kingdom of God. In the First Gospel especially we constantly see on the throne of the Kingdom the 'Father who is in the heavens,' while the ideal of the citizens is to be His true 'sons.' This aspect of the Kingdom is made familiar to all Christians by the Lord's Prayer. In its clauses are represented successively all the integral elements in the relations of a father to his children, the reverence and obedience which he expects from them, the support, forbearance, and protection which he extends to them (cf. Robinson, Church Catechism Explained, ch. II.). The exclusion from the Kingdom, which results when they are lost, is exhibited in the parable of the Prodigal Son.

This fundamental conception erects an insuperable barrier between the teaching of Jesus and those varieties of Socialism which aim at the abolition of the traditional form of the family, which rests on the assumption that marriage is a life-long obligation. 'An association terminable at the will of either party' (Morris and Bax, Socialism) is diametrically opposed to the Gospel doctrine. Christian Socialism, if it is to be true to the will of Christ, must work for the removal, not of the family, but of those forces which are injurious to its perfect development. But this does not make it impossible for circumstances to arise in the lives of particular individuals which demand the postponement of family claims to those of the Kingdom of God. It is implied in Mk 10th that the Twelve had put the following of Christ before the claims of home, and the reply which the reminder of this drew from Jesus makes it clear that the Christian must not draw back even from this if his own special call requires it. It is noteworthy that the First and Second Gospels seem to shrink from including the wife among the objects which are to be renounced, but both in the parallel passage here and elsewhere St. Luke inserts this also (cf. Mt 10th with Lk 14th). The disciple is to 'hate' domestic claims if there is any danger that they may lessen the reality of his service, as comes to pass when 'not only have we family and friendship, but also these have us' (Martensen). But such a conflict of claims can arise in the eyes of Christ only when devotion to home ties is vera vera. If a man cannot combine surrender to the bidding of the Gospel with the love of a wife, then he is right to remain unmarried (Mt 19th). This is far from the exaggeration which sets up an irreconcilable difference between the love of God and the love of home. In the life of Christ Himself the two appear in their right proportions. For the correct view is not that of Tertullian, who saw in such passages as Lk 9th a censure of the mother and brethren of Jesus for their anxiety about Him (adv. Marc. iv. 19; de Carne Christi, vii.), but rather that of Bengel: 'Non spernit matrem, sed anteponit Patrem.'

FAMINE.—Though the general fertility of Palestine is frequently alluded to in the Bible, yet the country was, as we know, by no means free from the danger of famine, whether brought about by drought or by the devastations of locusts and other pests, or by the destructive hand of man. Our Lord refers to the familiar instance of famine in the days of Elijah (Lk 4th). In order to illustrate the truth that no prophet is best received in his own country, He reminds His hearers that Elijah was at that time sent not to one of the many widows in Israel, but to the widow of Sarepta in the territory of Sidon.

In the parable of the Prodigal Son, it was 'a mighty famine' (λαμπή ἰσχυρά) in the land of his distant exile that helped to bring the wanderer to his senses (Lk 15th). He had squandered all his patrimony by the time it arose, and in his distress he had to seek a living by feeding swine. Even thus, food was so scarce with him that 'he would fain have been filled with the husks that the swine did eat.'

Lastly, in the eschatological discourses of our Lord recorded by the Synoptists (Mt 24th, Mk 13th, Lk 21st), 'famines in divers places' are included among the signs of the end. In St. Luke's account they are joined with pestilences, and in all three accounts with earthquakes. This portion of the prophecy at all events seems clearly to refer in the first instance to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem by Titus (A.D. 70), and only in a secondary sense, if at all, to the final end of all things. Josephus (BJ v. and vi.) again and again tells us that famine and pestilence were the terrible accompaniments of the city being taken by the Roman army; and these were no doubt in great measure due to its crowded state on account of the many pilgrims who had come up to keep the Passover. C. L. FELTOE.

FAN.—The fan (מִצְרֵחַ mizrah, the πρόσ of Mt 3<sup>d</sup> and Lk 3<sup>d</sup>) was an implement used in the winnowing of grain (Is 30th (where it is mentioned along with the רַבָּחַת, EV 'shovel')). It was either a wooden shovel (Hastings' DB i. 51<sup>a</sup>; Smith, DB i. 31; van Lennep, Bible Lands, p. 83) or a pitchfork (Hastings' DB iv. 500<sup>a</sup>; Encyc. Bibl. i. 84; Mackie, Bible Manners and Customs, p. 42). The balance of probability is in favour of the latter.

We get no help from LXX and Vulgate. LXX omits the word; the Vulg. renders by ventilabrum, which was, according to some, a shovel (Ramsay, Roman Antiquities, p. 482), and, according to others, a fork (Smith, Lat. Eng. Dict. s.v.). Fehl. has raphah, which means 'shovel.' There is, however, the significant fact that down to the present day two winnowing implements are used in Palestine which bear practically the same names as those which occur in Is 30th. These are the midra and the raht, and there is no substantial reason for doubting that they correspond respectively to the mizrah and the rabath. The midra, which we accordingly identify with the 'fan' of Scripture, is a simple wooden fork about six feet long. It has from five to seven prongs, which are set in separately and bound together with a wrapping of fresh hide. The natural shrinkage of the hide renders it a very effective ligature. The raht is a wooden shovel about five feet in length.

FARM

The winnowing of the mixed mass of grain, chaff, and short straw produced by threshing is begun by tossing it into the air with the midra. This process frees most of the chaff and straw, which are carried away by the wind (see AGRICULTURE, p. 40), but a good deal still remains mingled with the pile of grain. A second winnowing is therefore needed, and for this the raft is used. See also CHAFF.

FASTING.—In the time of Christ, fasting appears to have been a prominent characteristic of Jewish piety. The fasts were both public and private. Of public fasts only one in the year was ordained by the law of Moses, the Day of Atonement; in Ac 27<sup>9</sup> it is called simply 'the fast' (cf. Jos. Ant. xiv. iv. 3; Philo, Vit. Mos. ii. 4; Schürer, HJP I. i. 322). The four annual fasts, established in memory of national calamities and referred to by Zechariah (8<sup>19</sup>), had fallen into desuetude, and were not revived until after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. The late 'fast of Esther,' on the 13th of Adar (Est 9<sup>17</sup>, cf. 4<sup>16</sup>), was not at this time observed. But occasional public fasts were ordered from time to time during seasons of drought and public calamity. They were held on the second and fifth days of the week, — Monday and Thursday, — because Moses was believed to have gone up Mt. Sinai on a Thursday and to have returned on a Monday. They always began on the second day, so that a three days' fast would fall on the second, fifth, and second — Monday, Thursday, Monday (see Didache, viii.; Const. Apost. vii. 23; Epiphanius, Har. xvi. 1). Apart from these public occasions, however, many individuals were in the habit of imposing extra fasts upon themselves (Lk 2<sup>17</sup>, cf. Jth 8<sup>1</sup>); and some, particularly among the Pharisees, fasted on Mondays and Thursdays all the year round (Lk 13<sup>1</sup>; Lightfoot and Wetstein, ad loc.). Religious teachers, moreover, were apparently accustomed to lay down rules about fasting for the guidance of their disciples (Mk 2<sup>18</sup>, Mt 9<sup>14</sup>, Lk 5<sup>18</sup>). The 'frequent fasts' of the Jews are alluded to by Tacitus (Hist. v. 4); and Josephus, speaking of the spread of Jewish customs among the Gentile cities, mentions fasting (c. Apion. ii. 40; cf. Tert. ad Nat. i. 13). Among the Romans a mistaken idea seems to have been current that the Jews fasted on the Sabbath (Sueton. Aug. 76).

The manner of fasting differed according to the degree of strictness of the fast. Thus, on less strict fasts, while abstinence from food and drink from sunrise to sunset was enjoined, washing and anointing were still permitted. The strictest fast, however, lasted from one sunset till after the next, when the stars appeared; and during these hours not only food and drink, but washing, anointing, and every kind of agreeable transaction, even salutations, were prohibited (Schürer, II. ii. 119; Eilersheim, Life and Times, i. p. 663, Temple, pp. 297-300). Fasting was generally practised in an ostentatious manner; on this point the testimony of Mt 6<sup>16</sup> is confirmed by the Mishna.

Passing on to consider the attitude of Jesus towards fasting, we remark that, while on the one hand there is no reason to doubt that He observed the prescribed public fasts, and while He may even have undertaken a voluntary fast of forty days at the commencement of His ministry (Mt 4<sup>2</sup>; but see art. ASCETICISM), yet, on the other hand, it is evident that neither by practice nor by precept did He lay any stress on this form of devotion. His ordinary mode of life was so unascetic as to bring on Him the reproach of being a 'gluttonous man and a wine-bibber' (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>, Lk 7<sup>34</sup>). In His teaching He directly alluded to fasting only twice. The passages are as follow: (a) Mt 6<sup>16-18</sup>. Here voluntary fasting is presupposed as a religious exercise, but the disciples are warned against making it an occasion for a parade of piety. 'Thou, when thou fastest, anoint thy head, and wash thy face; that thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father which is in secret.' Jesus thus sanctions fasting, but only as the genuine expression of a devout and contrite frame of mind. Its whole value depends on the purity and sincerity of the motive with which it is undertaken. As for the pretentious externalism of the Pharisees, that has its own reward.

FATHER, FATHERHOOD 579

(b) Mk 2<sup>18-22</sup>, Mt 9<sup>14-17</sup>, Lk 5<sup>27-30</sup>. In reply to the question of the disciples of John and of the Pharisees, Jesus deliberately refuses to enjoin fasting on His followers. Alluding to a Rabbinic ordinance that all mourning be suspended during the marriage-week, He says that fasting, which is a sign of mourning, would be inconsistent with the joy which 'the children of the bride-chamber' experience 'while the bridegroom is with them.' But He adds that the days of bereavement are coming, and then the outward expression of sorrow will be appropriate enough. Here, as in the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus certainly sanctions fasting as a form through which emotion spontaneously seeks expression. But to the form itself He attaches very slight importance. This is brought out clearly in the succeeding parables of the Old Garment and the Old Wineskins. It is futile to graft the new liberty of the gospel on to the body of old observances and practices, and yet more futile to attempt to force the whole new system within the ancient moulds. The new piety must manifest itself in new forms of its own. Nevertheless, while Jesus seems to suggest that the Jewish regulations are not in harmony with the Christian spirit, He can sympathize with the prejudice of conservatives who still cling tenaciously to the custom of their fathers. 'No man also having drunk old wine straightway desireth new: for he saith, The old is good.'

The allusions to fasting in Mk 9<sup>18</sup> and Mt 17<sup>21</sup> are corruptions of the text; for similar combinations of prayer and fasting see To 1<sup>26</sup>, Sir 34<sup>28</sup>, Lk 2<sup>37</sup>. The second Logion of the Oxyrhynchus fragment discovered in 1897 commences with the words, λέγει Ἰησοῦς, ἐάν μὴ νηστεύσῃτε τὸν κῆραρον, οὐ μὴ εὐρήσῃτε τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ. Here, however, the fasting spoken of is obviously metaphorical. Another reference to fasting occurs in the fifth of the New Sayings of Jesus, published by Grenfell and Hunt in 1904, but the Logion is 'broken beyond hope of recovery' (op. cit., p. 18 f.).

On the general bearings of this subject see art. ASCETICISM. F. HOMES DUDDEN.

FATHER, FATHERHOOD.—The one subject on which Jesus claimed to have unique and absolute knowledge was the Father (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>). Yet, in saying this, He evidently did not mean that He knew all that God knows. He confessed or implied that His knowledge was limited (e.g. Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, Mt 9<sup>21, 22</sup>); and the very fact that He looked up to God as His God is sufficient evidence that, by knowledge of the Father, He did not mean comprehension of the Infinite. The record of His life and teaching makes it plain that His unique knowledge of God was knowledge of the Divine character and purpose. This was the sphere in which He lived and moved and had His conscious being. This was the sphere of His revelation.

In setting forth Jesus' conception of the Fatherhood of God, we shall consider (1) the use of the name 'Father'; (2) the meaning of Fatherhood; (3) the Fatherhood of God in the Fourth Gospel; (4) the place of Fatherhood in the teaching of Jesus; and (5) Jesus' conception of God compared with that of the OT and of His contemporaries.

1. Use of the name 'Father' by Jesus.—The first recorded sentence of Jesus (Lk 2<sup>20</sup>), and that which was probably the last (Lk 23<sup>46</sup>), both contain the name 'Father.' The boy of twelve felt an inward constraint to be engaged in the things of His Father, and twenty years later, expiring on the cross, it was into the hands of His Father that He commended His spirit. Throughout His ministry His use of this name is what we might expect from the scene which St. Luke records from His boyhood. 'The child is father of the man.' Whenever the personal relation between Him and God is involved, Jesus employs no name but 'Father,' if we except a single passage where He quotes from the 22nd Psalm (Mk 15<sup>34</sup>). In each of the five prayers where the words of Jesus are given, He addresses God as 'Father' (Mt 11<sup>25-27</sup>, Lk 23<sup>34-35</sup>); and in the longest of these, which includes only three verses, the name is repeated five times (Mt 11<sup>25-27</sup>). When speaking of God in the third person, Jesus refers to Him once as 'the Great King' (Mt 5<sup>35</sup>), and once as 'Lord of the harvest' (Mt 9<sup>8</sup>); but in almost every case He uses the name 'God' or the name 'Father.' He never employs such circumlocutions as 'the Blessed One' and 'Holy One,' and never uses abstract designations such as 'Place,' all of which were common in the synagogue. It is significant to compare with this usage that of Philo, whose commonest titles of God are abstract (e.g. τὸ θεῖον, τὸ ἄρρητον θεῖον, τὸ ἀπρόσληπτον θεῖον, ὁ ἄφ'—Drummond, Philo Judaeus, ii. 20). The name by which Jesus Himself addressed God was also the name which He put on the lips of His disciples. It was their privilege to share His communion with God (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>, 23<sup>9</sup>).

2. The Meaning of Fatherhood.—What Jesus meant by the term 'Father' is to be learned both from His words and from His life. From His words we infer that He chose this term to describe the character of God. Thus He teaches that, as it is the very nature of a father to give good gifts to his children, so it is the very nature of God to give His good things to those who ask Him (Mt 7<sup>11</sup>, Lk 11<sup>9</sup>). Earthly fathers, though evil, give to their children; much more will God give, who is absolutely and unchangeably good (Mk 10<sup>18</sup>). He is ready to bestow the Kingdom of heaven upon the poor in spirit, and to give the vision of Himself to the pure in heart (Mt 5<sup>3-9</sup>); that is to say, He gives the best He has to any who will receive it. And even upon those who will not receive the best, He bestows much; for He maketh His sun to rise on the evil, and sendeth rain on the unjust (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>). Jesus exhorts His hearers to have this spirit in order that they may become sons of the heavenly Father and share His perfection (Mt 5<sup>48</sup>). Accordingly the term 'Fatherhood' describes what God is in Himself. It does not concern merely or chiefly His relation to men, but it declares His very spirit, that which lies behind all relationships.

The story of the Lost Son perfectly interprets Jesus' conception of Fatherhood (Lk 15<sup>11-32</sup>). The lost son does not stand for a lost Israelite merely, a fallen member of the theocratic people, but represents the sinner, whether Jew or Gentile. For, in the first place, the parable was spoken to justify Jesus' reception of publicans (Lk 15<sup>1-2</sup>), and publicans were rated as no better than Gentiles (Mt 18<sup>7</sup>); and, in the second place, the conclusion of Jesus in the parables of the Lost Sheep and the Lost Coin, which are manifestly parallel to that of the Lost Son, is perfectly general. He there declares that there is joy in heaven over one sinner who repents (Lk 15<sup>7-10</sup>). Therefore, when Jesus, in the story of the Lost Son, says that the father watched and longed for his son's return, and welcomed him at last with kisses and a joyful feast, He teaches that the Fatherhood of God is essential, and therefore a fact of universal significance. It is in keeping with this when Jesus, addressing the multitudes as well as His disciples, said to all who heard Him, 'Call no man your father on earth; for one is your Father, who is in heaven' (Mt 23<sup>9</sup>). If we had more of the addresses of Jesus to the multitudes, we should probably have more instances of this same usage.

Again, the very life of Jesus shows what He meant by the Fatherhood of God, for He surely felt that the spirit of this Fatherhood was manifested through Him. He portrayed His own attitude towards the lost when He drew the picture of the father and his lost son. His brotherhood interpreted the spirit of the Divine Fatherhood. But the brotherhood of Jesus describes what He was. He did not simulate brotherliness. It was by the very necessity of His holy and loving will that He was the friend of sinners. It is impossible, therefore, to suppose that, in His thought, the Fatherhood of God was something less than essential, a figure setting forth His gracious relationship to certain favoured people. As His own love flowed out to men irrespective of all merely outward circumstances, and as He believed that He knew the Father and was in harmony with His will, He must have believed that God loves men irrespective of all outward circumstances; and in other words, that His Fatherhood is essential, and hence of universal significance.

It is true that Jesus considered Himself sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and that He confined His labours chiefly to them; but it is equally true that this was solely a matter of order. He told the Censurist woman that the children should be fed first (Mk 7<sup>7</sup>), which plainly suggests that the gospel was for all, but that for some reason it was to be offered first to the Jews. Moreover, He granted the woman's request, though He thus spoke; and in no case did He turn a Gentile away empty who came to Him for help. He healed a Samaritan leper (Lk 17<sup>16</sup>), and the servant of a Gentile centurion (Mt 8<sup>13</sup>). There is no indication that they were less dear to Him than were the Jews.

We conclude, therefore, both from the words and the life of Jesus, that He called God our Father, not because God created us,—a view common in Philo,—or because He rules over us, or because of the covenant which He made with Abraham, but simply and only because He loves us. The abstract statement that 'God is love' (1 Jn 4<sup>8</sup>) is a true interpretation of the word 'Father' as used by Jesus.

3. The Fatherhood of God in the Fourth Gospel.—The Fatherhood of God is more conspicuous in John than in the Synoptics, the word 'Father' occurring about 90 times as against 5 in Mark, 17 in Luke, and 45 in Matthew. Here also, as in the Synoptics, the word is found only on the lips of Jesus, with the exception of three passages where the author speaks from his own Christian point of view (Jn 1<sup>38</sup>, 8<sup>27</sup>, 13<sup>3</sup>), and one passage in which he attributes his Christian usage to the Baptist (3<sup>30</sup>).

The new feature of the subject in the Fourth Gospel is the emphasis laid on the universality of Fatherhood. Thus it is the world (kosmos) which God is represented as loving up to the point of the highest sacrifice (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>). It is all men whom Jesus will draw unto Himself (12<sup>32</sup>). In offering life to a Samaritan, Jesus feels that He is accomplishing the Father's will (4<sup>34-36</sup>), and a visit of certain Greeks brought before His soul the vision of a great harvest for the Kingdom of God (12<sup>20-24</sup>).

Still more noticeable, and more divergent from the earlier usage, is the employment of 'Father' in an absolute sense. The extent of this usage in John is not altogether clear. In the conversation with the Samaritan woman, Fatherhood is plainly universal: 'The hour cometh and now is when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and truth: for such doth the Father seek to be his worshippers'; 'Believe me, the hour cometh when neither in this mountain nor in Jerusalem shall ye worship the Father' (Jn 4<sup>21-23</sup>). Another passage which admits of no doubt is Jn 20<sup>17</sup>: 'I am not yet ascended to the Father. But go to my brethren and say to them, I ascend to my Father and your Father, and my God and your God.' It is quite clear that the word 'Father' in the first clause is unlimited; for, in the later clauses, He who is here called 'the Father' is called by Jesus 'my Father and your Father.' Two other cases of what appears to be the same use of the word are Jn 6<sup>27, 46</sup>.

In about one quarter of the passages where God is called 'Father,' He is so called in reference to Jesus, and the language is 'my Father' (e.g. Jn 2<sup>16</sup> 5<sup>17</sup> 6<sup>29</sup>). Since, now, there are some passages in which the absolute sense of 'Father' is required, and since in the majority of the other passages, where the expression 'the Father' is used, there is nothing which requires us to adopt a limited idea of Fatherhood, it must be regarded as probable that the author always employed the word in an unlimited sense when he did not associate a personal pronoun with it. Thus the Fourth Gospel would place a very striking emphasis on the thought that the Fatherhood of God is essential and universal. Such emphasis on this point in the teaching of John was, of course, made natural by the missionary activity of the early Church, which had gone forward many years before the Fourth Gospel was composed.

The meaning of Fatherhood in the Fourth Gospel is the same as in the primitive tradition. It describes the character of God, and is expressed in love. It is perhaps probable that the author of the Fourth Gospel occasionally used the term 'Father' in a metaphysical sense (1<sup>14, 19</sup>), but he has put no words on the lips of Jesus which require to be taken metaphysically. He often represents Jesus as saying 'my Father,' but it is unquestionable that Jesus would have every man address God in just this way. He taught His disciples to say 'our Father,' which, of course, implies that each individual may say 'my Father.' When Jesus, to comfort His disciples, is represented as sending them the message, 'I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and my God and your God' (Jn 20<sup>17</sup>), He does not separate Himself from them by claiming a unique relationship to the Father, even God, but rather joins Himself closely with them by the thought that one and the same Father is theirs and His alike, one God the God of both. The Fatherhood of God according to Jesus, even in the Fourth Gospel, is one and ethical, but His appreciation and appropriation of that Fatherhood are unique.

3. The Place of Fatherhood in the teaching of Jesus.—In accordance with the fact that the sole subject on which Jesus claimed to possess unique knowledge was the character of God, or, as we may now say, the Fatherhood of God, we find that this truth is central and determinative in all His teaching. His conception of the Kingdom of heaven was dependent on His conception of the character of God. The Kingdom which He wished to see come on earth was the Kingdom of the Father (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>), a Kingdom in which the will of the Father should be done. Therefore the conception of the Kingdom of heaven is not the fundamental thought of Jesus. Nor was His teaching determined by His sense of the imperfections of the Law. These imperfections He saw clearly, but not because of a critical analysis of the Law such as a philosophical student of history might make. He considered the Law from above, as one who possessed in Himself a higher standard, a more perfect knowledge of the Divine will. His work was, indeed, to fulfil the Law, and to establish the Kingdom of God on earth; but the inspiring and ruling thought in all His work was the truth of God's Fatherhood. What He teaches of man's relation to God is determined by this truth. It is gathered up in the thought of sonship. The lost son is to return to the Father. His life is to be one of filial service in the Father's presence. And it is the goodness of the Father that draws him back.

The Fatherhood of God requires that the spirit of the religious life shall be love, out of which will be born perfect trust. It invites and draws man to communion with God, and determines the character of his devotion. What Jesus teaches of man's relation to man is also determined by His consciousness of the character of God. His morality is purely religious. The ethical life of His disciples is to be controlled by the fact of their sonship to God. The standard of that life is the very quality which constitutes the perfection of God (Mt 5<sup>48</sup>). It is one and the same quality that makes Him the Father and makes man His son. Thus the entire teaching of Jesus is but the interpretation of the fact of God's Fatherhood. This is the sun in His heaven which lights and warms the broad field of human life.

4. Jesus' conception of God compared with that of the OT, and with views of His contemporaries.—The new revelation which Jesus gave of the character of God was put into a term which had long been applied to Him in Israel. The first of the great prerogatives of the Jewish people which are enumerated by St. Paul is the adoption (Ro 9<sup>4</sup>), that is, the appointment of Israel to be in a peculiar sense God's son. This thought was derived from the OT. God's message to Pharaoh by Moses involved a paternal relation to Israel, for Moses was to say in God's name, 'Israel is my son, my first-born' (Ex 4<sup>22</sup>). Again, Deuteronomy represents Moses as saying to the people, 'As a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee' (Dt 8<sup>5</sup> 32<sup>7</sup>); and the Lord says in Hosea that when Israel was a child He loved him and called His sons out of Egypt (Hos 11<sup>1, 3</sup>). In these passages, and in a few more, God is thought of as a Father to the people of Israel as a whole; and He is the Father of Israel because He made them a nation and established them by His mighty power (Dt 32<sup>6</sup>). So far His Fatherhood is wholly national. There are, however, other passages in which we have an individualizing of the thought of Fatherhood. Thus the Lord says of the theocratic descendant of David, 'I will be his father, and he shall be my son' (2 S 7<sup>14</sup>); and the Messianic king puts the decree of Jehovah concerning himself in these words, 'Thou art my son; this day have I begotten thee' (Ps 2<sup>7</sup>). There is also an individualizing of God's Fatherhood with reference to other persons, for the Psalter calls Him the Father of the fatherless; and His pity for those who fear Him is like the pity of a father for his children (Ps 68<sup>1</sup> 103<sup>13</sup>). Yet in all these passages we see only the relation of God to His chosen people, or to a particular class among them, or to His chosen king. 'Father' is a word of relation, not yet a description of God's very character. It marks an advance upon that conception of Fatherhood which is derived from the fact of creation, but it is still far removed from the view of Jesus. The OT gave to Jesus the name 'Father' for God, but He filled it with a new content.

When we come down from the OT to the time of Jesus, we find among the Jews a conception of God that is far more widely unlike that of the gospel, and which by contrast serves to bring out the thought of Jesus into strong relief. This Jewish conception of God was based on the traditional interpretation of the Law, not on the spiritual teaching of the Prophets. God was put further and further away; and the conception of Him became increasingly abstract and transcendental.

Even as early as the translation of the OT into Greek (3rd cent. B.C.) this tendency towards a more abstract conception of God is manifest. The translators sought to remove the thought that God had come into actual contact with men. They do not, with Ex 15, call God a 'man of war,' but render the passage by 'the Lord who makes war.' Moses no longer goes up 'to God in the mount,' as the original reads (Ex 19), but he goes up 'to the mount of God.' Moses and those with him did not see the God of Israel (Ex 24<sup>10</sup>), but they saw the place where He stood.

As in the Greek translation of the OT, so in the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan (1st cent. A.C.) appears the tendency to safeguard the holiness of God by removing Him far from men. An illustration may be cited from Gn 18. It is said there that the heavenly visitants ate of the repast which Abraham had provided, but Onkelos changes it to 'it seemed to him as though they ate.' Such was the method of the Targumists. With the removal of God far from men there came to be associated in the course of time an elaborate doctrine of angels—a natural if not necessary correlate of the transcendental conception of God.

But though the scribes removed God far from contact with man and the world, their conception of Him was unspiritual.

He is pictured in the Talmud of Jerusalem as a great Rabbi. He studies the Law three hours each day, and observes all its ordinances. He keeps the Sabbath. He makes vows, and on their accomplishment He is released by the heavenly Sanhedrin. He also fulfills the injunction to rise up before the hoary head (see Shivrit, Das Schriftstudium, pp. 17, 18). Thus the external, ceremonial conception of religion at last took complete possession of the future world, and threw the mesh of its enslavement to the letter even around God Himself. The prophet's spiritual conception of Jehovah was lost; the glow of lovingkindness which they beheld in His face faded out utterly; and there remained a Being who was called 'the Holy One,' interesting perhaps to the scribe, but whom no one could really love.

To this conception of God the revelation of His Fatherhood by Jesus formed an absolute contrast. The scribes put God in the seventh heaven; Jesus taught that He is near. The scribes held that He is intensely concerned with outward ordinances; Jesus taught that He is full of love, and cares only for the heart of man. To the scribal mind God was the God of scribes; to Jesus He was the Father of all men. The religious teachers of Jesus' time fell very far below the prophetic conception of God; Jesus rose still further above it.

FATHERS.—The plural of 'father' is found in 14 passages in the Gospels, once (in the Greek) with no determining word (Lk 17), twice with the article only, 'the fathers' (Jn 6<sup>98</sup> RV 7<sup>29</sup>), and 11 times with a pronoun: 'our' (Mt 23<sup>9</sup>, Lk 11<sup>2</sup>, 7, Jn 4<sup>22</sup> 6<sup>91</sup>); 'your' (Mt 23<sup>9</sup>, Lk 11<sup>2</sup>, 4, Jn 6<sup>91</sup>); 'their' (Lk 6<sup>26</sup>, 27). With one exception (Lk 17) where it means 'parents,' as contrasted with 'children,' as is innumerable passages in the OT (Gn 47, 1 K 11<sup>14</sup> 14<sup>15</sup> 15<sup>15</sup> etc.), the Apocrypha and the Pseudepigrapha (2 Es 7<sup>9</sup>, Ps-Sol 3<sup>9</sup> 9<sup>15</sup> etc.), and the historical Assyrian texts (Karrani abi-ia = 'the kings my fathers,' KTB ii. 170, 172, etc.).

As early as about B.C. 200 the Heb. word abôth came to have the narrower meaning of 'distinguished ancestors.' The long historical review in Sir 44-49 opens (Heb.):

Let me now praise godly men,
Our fathers in their generations.

The fathers praised are Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Israel, Moses, Aaron, Phinehas, Joshua, Caleb, the Judges, Samuel, Nathan, David, Solomon, Elijah, Elisha, Hezekiah, Isaiah, Josiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Job, the Twelve, Zerubbabel, Joshua the priest, Nehemiah. In a sort of appendix (49<sup>14-16</sup>) are given Enoch (again), Joseph, Simeon, Seth, Enos, Adam. The Hebrew heading of these chapters, 'Praise of the fathers of the world,' or, as Cowley and Neubauer render, 'Praise of the patriarchs,' cannot be urged, as it may be of much later date. The Greek heading πατέρων θύμων is of more value, as it may be pre-Christian. Among these distinguished ancestors or 'fathers' a group of three was early singled out for special notice—Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. God is several times described in the OT as 'the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob' or 'Israel' (Ex 3<sup>15</sup>, 1 K 18<sup>26</sup>, 1 Ch 29<sup>16</sup>, 2 Ch 30<sup>6</sup>). In a tradition preserved in the Babylonian Talmud (Berak. 16b) it is said: 'Only three are called fathers.' It is assumed that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were 'the fathers' par excellence. The group is referred to 5 times in the Gospels (Mt 8<sup>11</sup> 22<sup>22</sup>, Mk 12<sup>26</sup>, Lk 13<sup>28</sup> 20<sup>37</sup>), and probably, without the names, in one of the passages cited above (Jn 7<sup>22</sup> 'not that I [circumcision] is of Moses but of the fathers'). The 'fathers,' then, in the language of our Lord and His contemporaries, could mean ancestors in general, or the ancestors of some particular period, as, for example, the wandering in the wilderness (Jn 6<sup>31</sup>, 49, 50), or ancestors of notable piety or renown, more especially the three patriarchs who were regarded as the founders of the people.

The thought that the great goodness of some of the fathers, especially of Abraham, was helpful to their sinful descendants, which found expression in the phrase sakbith 'abôth 'merit of the fathers' so often met with in the Talmud, can be traced as far back as the time of Christ and the Apostles. It probably underlies the words of St. Paul: 'they are beloved for the fathers' sakes' (Ro 11<sup>28</sup>); and evidently lurks in the proud boast of being the seed of Abraham or children of Abraham (Mt 3<sup>9</sup>, Lk 3<sup>8</sup>, Jn 8<sup>39</sup> etc.). The phrase, however, is never met with in the Gospels. The allied belief that the holy fathers could effectually intercede for their wicked descendants, which is distinctly attested in some of the Pseudepigrapha (Syr. Apoc. of Bar. 85<sup>12</sup>, Sib. Oracles ii. 330-333), is implied in the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus. The rich man in Hades appeals, not to God, but to one of the fathers (Lk 16<sup>28</sup>). Still there is no direct mention of their intercession in the Gospels.

The use of the term 'fathers' in the sense of 'distinguished teachers of the Law, who prolonged the line of tradition' which has become so widely known through the famous Talmudic tractate Pirke Abôth or Masseketh Abôth, is unrepresented in the Gospels, unless it is alluded to or echoed in the title 'father' applied to a living rabbi (Mt 23<sup>9</sup>).

FATHER'S HOUSE (oikta tou patros mou).—The name applied by Jesus in Jn 14<sup>2</sup> to the eternal home, whither He goes to prepare a place for His disciples. To their fear lest they might never rejoin Him after the impending separation, He answers that in His Father's house there are many abodes (moiai)—a place, therefore, for every one who believes in Him. See art. MANSION.

The expression occurs twice elsewhere in the Gospels, with reference to the Temple, and in both cases bears an emphatic meaning: (a) In Lk 2<sup>49</sup> the words ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ are, although capable of the translation 'about my Father's business' (as in AV), are more properly rendered 'in my Father's house' (RV). This rendering is supported by the context. See BUSINESS. The first recorded utterance of Jesus has an important bearing on the question of the development of His Messianic consciousness. His visit to the Temple, in the dawn of manhood, awakened in Him the sense of a peculiarly close relation to God, whom He recognized henceforth as His Father. (b) In Jn 2<sup>14</sup> the words which appear in the Synoptic narrative as a quotation from the OT ('It is written, My house shall be called, etc.') are given as a direct saying of Jesus, 'Make not my Father's house a house of merchandise.' The speaker thus declares by what authority He cleanses the Temple. As Son of God He has the right of ordering His Father's house and casting out the intruders who have dishonoured it.

The 'Father's house' of John 14<sup>2</sup> has been explained (on the analogy of the above passages) as the heavenly Temple, of which the Temple at Jerusalem was the earthly type (cf. Is 6<sup>7</sup>, He 9). Apart, however, from the particular difficulty that a temple could hardly be described as a place of νοεῖν, the whole tone of the passage demands a simpler explanation. Jesus thinks of the 'house' as a home, to which He is Himself returning, and in which He will be reunited at last with His disciples. The expression 'Father's house' has already been used implicitly with this larger meaning in Jn 8<sup>23</sup>. 'The servant abideth not in the house for ever, but the Son abideth for ever.'

Theologically, the passage Jn 14<sup>2</sup> marks a departure from the prevailing type of Johannine thought. It withdraws into the future that communion with Christ and participation in His eternal life which are elsewhere regarded as present realities. It further identifies the εσχατολογία with the coming of Christ to the believer in the hour of death (v. 5), not (as in the sequel of the discourse) with His abiding spiritual presence. The divergence, however, does not necessarily involve a contradiction. While maintaining that life is given in the present, St. John looks to a future in which it will become fully manifest (cf. 5<sup>28, 29</sup> 6<sup>38</sup> etc.). For the believer, as for Christ Himself, death is the transition to a larger 'glory.'

The allusion to the 'Father's house' is obviously figurative, and we cannot even infer from it that St. John conceives of the future world under forms of space. Such a conception seems, indeed, to be debarred by the great declaration (4<sup>8</sup>) of the spiritual nature of God. The essential thought in the saying is simply that the believer will enter after death into that perfect communion with God which is impossible under the conditions of this world. In more than one Synoptic passage this communion is described by Jesus under the imagery of a feast (Mt 26<sup>29</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>, Lk 14<sup>15</sup>). This image is replaced in the Fourth Gospel by the less vivid but more adequate one of a perpetual sojourn with the Father in His house. But in both cases the image is only the vehicle, necessarily imperfect, of the spiritual idea, that the crowning blessedness of the believer will consist in nearness to God and perfect fellowship with Him.

This main idea is combined, in the Johannine passage, with several others which serve to render it more complete and definite: (1) The communion with God is mediated by Christ, who is Himself the Son, and therefore has the right to bring His chosen friends into His Father's house (cf. 8<sup>38, 39</sup> 17<sup>24</sup>). (2) It will be a lasting communion, not fitful and interrupted like that which is granted to us in the present. Those who were formerly servants will 'abide in the house for ever,' like the Son Himself. They will not be strangers, tarrying for an hour, but will have νοεῖν appointed to them—fixed places which they can call their own. (3) The emphasis on the 'many mansions' would seem to suggest that the perfect communion with God does not involve a mere absorption in Him. Each life will maintain its own identity and receive its separate fulfilment. Jesus will be the same in the higher world as He was in this, and the disciples likewise will find themselves again, and resume their fellowship with each other and with Him. A certain resemblance can thus be traced between the thought of this passage and that of St. Paul in 2 Co 5<sup>1-4</sup>. The Apostle anticipates for each believer 'a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens,' which will take the place of the earthly house of this tabernacle.' The saying in the Gospel declares that there will be room for all these separate mansions within the one 'Father's house.'

FEAR (φόβος, φοβούμεναι; in Mt 8<sup>26</sup> and Mk 4<sup>40</sup> 'fearful—φόβου).—In many passages in the Gospels fear is a motive restraining or compelling action in the ordinary course of human relationships. Men fear others, and shape their conduct, at least in part, by their fears: e.g. Mt 2<sup>22</sup> (Joseph is afraid to return to Judaea); 14<sup>5</sup> (Herod would not put John to death because 'he feared the people') 21<sup>28, 29</sup>; Mk 11<sup>18</sup>, Lk 22<sup>2</sup> (where the Pharisees 'fear the multitude'); Mk 9<sup>32</sup>, Lk 9<sup>32</sup> (the disciples are 'afraid to ask' the meaning of a saying); Mk 11<sup>18</sup> (scribes and Pharisees wished to destroy Jesus, 'for they feared him'); Jn 7<sup>13</sup> 9<sup>22</sup> 19<sup>38</sup> 20<sup>19</sup> (men are silent or secret 'for fear of the Jews'). Similar passages are Mt 25<sup>10</sup>, Mk 6<sup>20</sup> 12<sup>14</sup>, Lk 19<sup>10</sup> 20<sup>19</sup> etc. This fear sometimes restrains bad men from carrying out their evil purposes; but quite as often turns others aside from the straight path of right.

2. The Gospels also mention frequently the fear which men feel in the presence of what they believe to be supernatural or superhuman. This is often an accompaniment of the miracles of Jesus. It is mentioned of the disciples, at the stilling of the tempest (Mk 4<sup>41</sup>, Lk 8<sup>23</sup>), when Jesus walked on the sea (Mt 14<sup>26</sup>, Mk 6<sup>50</sup>, Jn 6<sup>19, 20</sup>), at the Transfiguration (Mt 17<sup>6, 7</sup> and parallels). So the people of Judaea were afraid when they saw the demoniac healed (Mk 5<sup>15</sup>); so 'fear took hold on all' when the widow's son was raised (Lk 7<sup>10</sup>); and in the same way the centurion at the cross (Mt 27<sup>54</sup>) and the witnesses of the Resurrection (Mt 28<sup>4, 8</sup>) were afraid; cf. also Lk 11<sup>5, 6</sup> 2<sup>5</sup> etc.

3. Especially worthy of notice are those passages in which Jesus exhorts His hearers not to fear. He reassures Jairus when word comes that his daughter is dead (Mk 5<sup>36</sup>, Lk 8<sup>50</sup>); and Peter when the miraculous draught of fishes fills him with a sense of sin (Lk 5<sup>10</sup>); He meets the terror of the disciples on the sea with, 'It is I, be not afraid' (Mt 14<sup>27</sup>); and touches them at the Transfiguration, with similar words (Mt 17<sup>7</sup>). When He sends the disciples out to preach, it is with reiterated injunctions against fear. The servants will meet with hostility from the enemies of their Lord; but they must face such opposition without fear; 'for there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed' (Mt 10<sup>26-27</sup>). They are to be fearless preachers of the gospel, because no hostility of men can prevent the triumph of truth. They are not to fear even those who can kill the body, for their power is strictly limited to the body (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>, Lk 12<sup>4</sup>); they are to remember God's thought for the sparrows, and to be assured of the greater value of the servants of His Kingdom, and so to escape from fear (Mt 10<sup>31</sup>). If they are few in number facing a hostile world—a little flock surrounded by wolves —they are to remember the sure purpose of the Father and not to be afraid (Lk 12<sup>32</sup>).

Moral courage is a vital necessity of Christian discipleship. The Master is keenly conscious of moral paralysis which comes from the fear of man. Rev 21<sup>8</sup> reflects His judgment when it groups 'the fearful' with 'the unbelieving' and 'the abominable' who are cast into the lake of fire which is the second death. And in our Lord's teaching faith is the antidote of fear. A true knowledge of the Father is the unfailing source of moral courage. 'Acquaint thyself with the Father and be delivered from fear' is the burden of His teaching. See COURAGE, COWARDICE.

4. The almost complete absence of direct exhortation to fear God is a very noticeable feature of the Gospels. The fear of God is, indeed, mentioned in the Magnificat (Lk 1<sup>10</sup>), in the parable of the Unjust Judge (Lk 18<sup>9-10</sup>), and by the penitent thief on the cross (Lk 23<sup>40</sup>); but in a direct injunction of Jesus only—if at all—in Mt 10<sup>28</sup> and the parallel passage Lk 12<sup>3</sup>. Here, as already mentioned, Jesus is sending out the disciples with the exhortation not to fear—even those who kill the body. But He adds to the negative a positive injunction, 'Rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell'; or, as Lk puts it, 'But I will warn you whom ye shall fear: fear him which after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, fear him.' It is most natural to think with the majority of commentators that God is the object of fear in this exhortation; but there are some who urge, on the contrary, that the devil is intended.

A. B. Bruce ('St. Matthew,' in Expositor's Gr. Test.) says: 'Would Christ present God under this aspect in such close connection with the Father who cares even for the sparrows? What is to be greatly feared is not the final condemnation, but that which leads to it—temptation to forsake the cause of God out of regard to self-interest or self-preservation. Shortly, the counsel is: fear not the persecutor but the tempter, not the man who kills you for your fidelity but the man who wants to buy you off, and the devil whose agent he is.' Weymouth (The NT in Modern Speech) urges against the reference to God that phobos (Lk 12<sup>3</sup>) usually denotes 'delegated authority,' 'power enjoyed on sufferance'; and refers to Lk 22<sup>34</sup>, Jn 14<sup>1</sup>, Ac 26<sup>10</sup>, Col 1<sup>11</sup>, and Rev 13<sup>7</sup> for illustrations of the ascription of power to Satan. On the other side Plummer ('St. Luke' in Interpret. Crit. Com.) says: 'There is little doubt that this refers to God, and not to the devil. The change of construction points to this. It is no longer phobos dei et hominum but phobos phobos, "fear without trying to shun," which is the usual construction of fearing God. Moreover, we are not in Scripture told to fear Satan, but to resist him courageously.'

It may also be urged that the extreme punishment of the wicked is nowhere described as an exercise of Satan's authority. Gehenna is 'the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels' into which in Mt 25<sup>41</sup> those on the left hand are sent by the King. The ultimate 'destruction' of wicked men, whatever that may actually mean, must be conceived as an act of God and as the exercise of His authority; cf. Mt 21<sup>44</sup>. 'The Lord of the vineyard . . . will miserably destroy those wicked men.'

5. Looking at the teaching of Jesus as a whole, we notice that, while He constantly urges men to faith rather than to fear, and to a trust in God's fatherly goodness, such as makes filial love the ruling motive of religious life, He does not altogether discard the appeal to fear as a motive for right conduct. There is a severity of God which cannot be ignored. Such parables as the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Unmerciful Servant, the Wheat and the Tares, and others, whatever interpretation we may put upon their details, at least suggest a Divine and holy sternness in regard to which men should keep a wholesome fear. Nor is it only in parables that we find this element of our Lord's teaching. We have in the Sermon on the Mount such passages as Mt 5<sup>27-30</sup> 7<sup>12-14</sup> and 21-27; and with these we may compare Mt 11<sup>20-24</sup> 12<sup>28</sup> 16<sup>28</sup>. 21<sup>44</sup> 23<sup>34</sup> and many others. The normal relation of the children of God to the Heavenly Father should be one of glad confidence and loving obedience. It should be ever approaching that perfect love which casts out fear; but men who are trifling with great moral issues have no right, according to the teaching of Jesus, to this happy emancipation. For them fear is wholesome and necessary; for God is the Holy Father, and persistent defiance of His will must be visited with stern and righteous doom.

FEASTS.—The religious Feasts of the Jews in our Lord's time were not so many as the religious Feasts of the Christian Church of to-day as enumerated in the English Book of Common Prayer, but they meant very much more in the way of outward observance. In the first rank—like Christmas, Easter, Ascensiontide, and Whitsuntide—there stood out the three great Feasts of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles. Not unlike the Holy Days of the Church's Calendar, commemorating as they do various victories of the past, there were the annual Feasts of Dedication and of Purim, to which must be added the Feast of Trumpets together with its smaller counterpart in the monthly Feast of the New Moon. Corresponding to the Christian Sunday there was the weekly Feast of the Sabbath. Of these, Passover, Tabernacles, and Dedication are all specially mentioned in the Gospels, as well as the Sabbath, to which there are very many references, some merely incidental and some meant to show that it was our Lord's purpose to free the observance of that day from the artificial rules that had grown up about it in tradition. The Feasts are most prominent in the Fourth Gospel, where they are so mentioned as to form a framework into which the events of our Lord's Ministry fall. Three Passovers are there recorded: (1) Jn 2<sup>13</sup>, when our Lord cleansed the Temple almost at the beginning of His Ministry; (2) 6<sup>4</sup>, just after the feeding of the 5000; (3) 13<sup>1</sup> (cf. Mt 26<sup>1</sup>, Mk 14<sup>1</sup>, Lk 22<sup>1</sup>), at the time of the Crucifixion and Resurrection.

It has indeed been contended that the reference to Passover in Jn 6<sup>4</sup> is a mistake, and that really there were only two Passovers in our Lord's Ministry, the one at the beginning and the other at the end; it has also been contended that there may have been other Passovers, which are not mentioned, and that our Lord's Ministry may have included so many as ten or twelve, lasting over 10 or 12 years; but neither of these contentions can be made good, and it seems more likely that the record as it stands is both accurate and complete (see Turner in Hastings' DB, art. 'Chronology of NT').

Besides these three Passovers, mention is made of the Feast of Tabernacles in Jn 7<sup>2</sup>, of the Feast of Dedication in Jn 10<sup>22</sup>, and of some Feast not particularized by name in Jn 5<sup>1</sup>. To these St. Luke adds mention of an earlier Passover, when our Lord was 12 years old and was for the first time (†) allowed to accompany Joseph and Mary as they went up to Jerusalem year after year for the Feast (Lk 2<sup>41</sup>).

The Feasts of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles were all of them Pilgrimage Feasts, that is to say, Feasts at which all male Jews above the age of 12 years were required to appear before the Lord in Jerusalem. It is noticed in Lk 2<sup>41</sup> that Joseph and Mary were both in the habit of going up to Jerusalem for the Passover every year. There was no requirement that women should thus attend at the Feasts, but Hillel seems to have encouraged the practice, and it was adopted by other religious women besides Mary (Edersheim, Life and Times, vol. i. p. 236). St. Luke in the same passage speaks of our Lord as going up at the age of twelve; that, too, was in excess of what was required by law, but was apparently in accordance with custom (so Edersheim, op. cit., p. 235; but cf. Schürer, HTZ II. ii. p. 51, who represents that, strictly speaking, every boy who could walk ought to have attended, and that it was only by custom that boys who lived at a distance were allowed to wait till their twelfth year before going). Attendance at the Feasts was not confined to those who lived within easy reach, but Jews came as well from great distances, although naturally they could not attend so often as three times a year.

Schlirer writes (op. cit. p. 290 f.): 'There was nothing that contributed so much to cement the bond of union between the dispersion and the mother country as the regular pilgrimages which Jews from all quarters of the world were in the habit of making to Jerusalem on festival occasions.' He quotes Philo (de Monarchia, ii. 1) as saying: 'Many thousands of people from many thousands of towns made pilgrimages to the Temple at every festival, some by land, some by sea, and coming from the east and the west, from the north and the south,' and refers to Josephus' estimate of the number of Jews in Jerusalem at the time of the Feasts as being so many as 2,700,000 (Jd. vi. ix. 9).

In accordance with this it is definitely stated in the Gospels that four times during His Ministry our Lord went up to Jerusalem to keep the Feasts, twice for Passover, once for Tabernacles, and once for an unnamed Feast. Possibly He went up quite regularly three times a year, for the notice that He was in Galilee shortly before the second Passover (Jn 6<sup>4</sup>) does not preclude the possibility of His having gone up a little later. At the first Passover mention is made of His disciples being with Him in Jerusalem (Jn 2<sup>12-23</sup>), evidently having journeyed from Galilee with the same purpose as Himself, to keep the Feast. Similarly at Tabernacles it is stated that His brethren went up from Galilee to keep the Feast (Jn 7<sup>9</sup>). In all the Gospel references to Passover and Tabernacles the impression is given of large crowds of Jews in Jerusalem. At the Feast of Dedication also our Lord was in Jerusalem, but that was simply because His work at that time lay close by. He did not go up to Jerusalem on purpose for it, since no pilgrimages were made except at the three great Feasts; but being close at hand He liked to mark the occasion by a visit to the Temple, and there found a considerable number of Jews resident in the neighbourhood who had been attracted thither like Himself. See, further, the sep. art. on DEDICATION, PASSOVER, etc.

As regards the unnamed Feast of Jn 5<sup>1</sup>, it is impossible to reach any certainty as to what Feast is intended. If the correct reading were ἑστῆς, it would most naturally be the Feast of Tabernacles, which was above all the Feast of the Jews (Chayne on Is 50<sup>29</sup>); but if the article be omitted, as almost certainly it should be, the expression is quite indefinite, and might refer to either Tabernacles or Passover or Pentecost, or to any of the smaller Feasts.

In attempting to decide between these, guidance may first be sought from the general sequence of events, so far as it is indicated by the following notes of time:

- (1) Passover, i.e. March or April, Jn 2<sup>13</sup>.
  - (2) A reference to harvest, Jn 4<sup>35</sup>.
  - (3) This unnamed Feast, Jn 5<sup>1</sup>.
  - (4) A second Passover, Jn 6<sup>4</sup>.
- Thus it appears that the unnamed Feast fell between the incident connected with the harvest in Jn 4<sup>35</sup> and Passover. This does not, however, give very much help, because Jn 4<sup>35</sup> may mean either that that was the actual time of harvest or that it was four months before harvest, so that it is impossible to tell whether the incident there described happened in the month of April or in midwinter. If that happened in midwinter, then Dedication (Dec.) and Purim (Feb.) are the only Feasts possible chronologically; but if, as is equally likely, that incident happened at harvest, then the chronology would admit almost any of the Feasts, either Pentecost (May) or Trumpets (Sept.), or Tabernacles (Sept.), or Dedication (Dec.), or Purim (Feb.). Thus the setting of the incident is quite indeterminate. In the description of the incident itself there are two points that need to be noticed. The one is that the introductory words are such as to suggest that the only reason for mentioning the Feast at all is to explain our Lord's presence in Jerusalem.—'After these things there was a Feast of the Jews, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem.' Since there were only three Feasts at which even the strictest Jews went up to Jerusalem, it appears that this must be one of these three, i.e. must be either Passover, Pentecost, or Tabernacles. At the smaller Feasts many of those Jews who were in or near Jerusalem would naturally congregate in the Temple courts (cf. Jn 10<sup>22</sup>), but none were in the habit of going up on these occasions from other parts of the country. Accordingly, though Purim may seem suitable in other ways, it quite fails to explain the one fundamental fact, our Lord's visit to Jerusalem, and the same objection lies against all the smaller Feasts. The second point to be noticed is that St. John's use of so vague a phrase in reference to one of the three great Feasts can mean only that he was himself unable to recall the exact occasion. The events recalled were quite clear in his mind, and he remembered that they had happened on one of the occasions when our Lord went to Jerusalem to keep the Feasts, but at which particular one he could not recall. This being so, it is useless to try now to discover the secret from his writings, but there is no need to feel disappointment at the absence of information on this point, as if some part of the significance of the incident were lost through ignorance of its occasion, for the circumstances would not have dropped out of St. John's memory as they did, if they had been essential to the understanding of our Lord's words or actions. FEEDING THE MULTITUDES.—The Gospels give us two accounts of multitudes miraculously fed by our Lord. In the first instance (reported in Mt 14<sup>13-21</sup>, Mk 6<sup>30-44</sup>, Lk 9<sup>10-17</sup>, Jn 6<sup>1-13</sup>) the number is given as 5000, exclusive (so Mt.) of women and children. In the second instance (reported in Mt 15<sup>28-39</sup>, Mk 8<sup>1-9</sup>) the number is given as 4000, Mt. again adding women and children.

It will be better to consider these instances separately, and to treat the feeding of the 5000 in the light of the first three Gospels. The Synoptics agree that the place was a desert one on the east side of the Sea of Galilee; and Lk. fixes it at Bethsaida Julias (see CAPERNAUM). Mk. and Lk. connect the withdrawal to this place with the return of the Twelve and their report, Mt. with the execution of John the Baptist. Mk. seems to be correct, since he gives the specific reason that they needed rest, which they could not otherwise secure. All agree that a vast multitude followed them to their place of resort, thus defeating their purpose, and that it was the disciples who called the attention of Jesus to the needs of the people. Jesus then commanded His disciples to provide food for the multitude. One feels that He was preparing their minds for what He was about to do. Their astonishment at His command led them to point out the impossibility, if not absurdity, of the requirement, since they had but five loaves and two fishes. Then follows the astounding order to seat the people in groups easily accessible to the disciples, the blessing of the loaves and fishes, the distribution of the meagre supply, the satisfaction of the hunger of all, and the gathering up of the fragments.

Attempts have been made to rob this account of its miraculous character, the favourite method being to assume that the evident determination of Jesus to assuage their hunger induced those in the vast company who had supplies of food, to share, in the spirit of Jesus, with those who had none. The difficulty with this explanation is that the disciples, who had every opportunity of seeing what was done, thought that the multitude was fed with the five loaves and two fishes only. Against this, neither Mk 6<sup>30</sup> nor Jn 6<sup>9</sup> is evidence, as Beyschlag will have it (Leben Jesus, i. 330). The immediate context in both passages shows that both Jesus and the Twelve thought of the transaction as miraculous. Admitting the miracle, some have thought to explain it as a miraculous satisfaction of hunger with a little, rather than as a multiplication of the loaves and fishes. This is contrary to the text in all four of the Gospels, which unite in saying that twelve baskets of fragments were taken up. This would be more than there was at the beginning (see art. BASKET), thus virtually affirming the multiplication. We are shut up, then, to the alternative of regarding the account as legendary, or else as a miraculous multiplication of their food supply. There are some difficulties in the way of believing it miraculous. (1) The question of Jesus, 'How many loaves have ye?' reminds one of the question of Elisha (2 K 4<sup>2</sup>), 'What hast thou in the house?'

and so suggests an imitation of Elisha's miracle, as in fact the whole process of multiplication suggests the miracle of the meal in the jar and the cruse of oil of 1 K 17<sup>12-14</sup>. (2) The record is a trifle obscure. The whole stress is on the loaves, both in the gathered fragments, especially in Jn., and in the subsequent references of Jesus (see Mk 8<sup>19</sup>), while the fish are ignored. (3) Usually, also, when such a miracle was performed, the observers are said to have been profoundly impressed (see Mk 4<sup>41</sup> 5<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>27</sup>), but here no comment follows. (4) Besides, it seems to be in contradiction of His avowed purpose not to give the Jews what would be to them a convincing sign. As to all but the last of these difficulties, it may be said that they are, in themselves, not serious. The fourth assumes that the miracles of healing would not, but that a miracle such as the feeding would convince the Jews, and so be just the kind of sign the Jews demanded. But, in fact, the sign the Jews required and Jesus refused to grant was some miracle performed to order, and regardless of human need. Such a miracle as the feeding lacked these two characteristics. It was spontaneous, and it met a human want. In favour of the historicity of the miracle is the further fact that it is recorded in all the Gospels. The tradition was not open to question in the mind of any one of the Evangelists.

2. With regard to the second recorded instance, the feeding of the 4000, the case is quite different. It is found in but two of the Gospels. Lk. and Jn. evidently thought of but a single feeding. It is easy to see how the second account might have grown out of the first, and the similarities are so great as to suggest that it did have its origin there. The question of Jesus concerning the number of loaves, the remarkable circumstance that a second time the disciples had so little food with them, the seating of the people on the ground, the distribution to the Twelve for redistribution among the multitude, the eating until they were filled, the gathering of the broken pieces into baskets, are suspiciously like the feeding of the 5000. It is difficult to see how the disciples, with the memory of the feeding of the 5000 fresh in their minds, could have questioned Jesus as to the source of supply for this second company. And here it is that the narrative as given by Jn. sheds light on the question under consideration. Jn. betrays the fact that the same narrative was differently told, since he combines elements of both narratives as related by Mt. and Mark. Mt. places the second feeding on a mountain; Jn. locates the feeding on a mountain. Jn. and Mt. and Mk. (second instance) agree that Jesus proposed the feeding. Mk., according to his usual custom of emphasizing the teaching as primary, and of making the miracles secondary, makes Jesus teach the shepherdless sheep out of sympathy, while Mt. makes this sympathy prompt Him to heal them, and Lk. combines the two; this in the first feeding. In the second this sympathy was elicited by their hunger. In the second the point of difficulty with the disciples (according to Mt. and Mk.), or with Jesus (according to Jn.), was not the expense, as in the first, but that of securing so much food in a desert place. This certainly looks as though Jn. had heard both accounts and deliberately undertook to combine them into one, or else as though the differences in the account of the same story led Mt. and Mk. to believe that there were two feedings. In any case Lk., by implication, and Jn., almost directly, favour the single feeding—that of the 5000. The only serious difficulty in this elimination of the second feeding is the record in Mk 8<sup>19-20</sup> (cf. Mt 16<sup>9-10</sup>), according to which Jesus is made to refer to the two feedings as separate events. The denial of the second would make it necessary to affirm that the words of Jesus are incorrectly reported. But here Mt. is evidently dependent upon the collection of narratives by Mk., not Mk. upon the collection of sayings made by Matthew. Mt. and Mk. are not two independent witnesses. We may not be able to account satisfactorily for the misunderstanding of Mk. in this case, but his testimony could hardly offset that of Jn., unless we were obliged, which we are not, to suppose that Mk. got his information on this point directly from Peter. Even if this were so, we should have to make our choice between Peter and Jn., which, in view of all the facts, would turn out in favour of the latter.

The significance of the feeding of the multitude for the humanness of Jesus is not less great than that of the healings. The power was His, and He used it for the good of His fellow-men in whatever way was needful for their immediate welfare, and for setting an example of helpfulness in the everyday affairs of life to His disciples in all the centuries to follow.

FEET.—The word occurs frequently in the Gospels. Figuratively it has a wide range of meaning. It is employed in phrases which express worthlessness ('to be trodden under foot,' Mt 5<sup>13</sup>), supplication ('fell at his feet,' Mk 5<sup>22</sup> 7<sup>26</sup>), great honour or reverence (Lk 7<sup>38-39</sup> the woman who kissed Jesus' feet; Jn 11<sup>31</sup> Mary; Mt 28<sup>9</sup> 'held him by the feet'), ignorant or blasphemous contempt (Mt 7<sup>9</sup> 'trample under foot'), righteous condemnation or rejection (Mt 10<sup>14</sup> 'shake dust off feet'), salvation through sacrifice (Mt 18<sup>8</sup> Mk 9<sup>3</sup> cutting off hand or foot), discipleship (Lk 8<sup>38</sup> cured demoniac sitting at Jesus' feet; 10<sup>38</sup> Mary), helplessness (Mt 22<sup>28</sup> 'bind hand and foot'), complete triumph (Mt 22<sup>44</sup> Mk 12<sup>28</sup> Lk 20<sup>48</sup> enemies of Messianic King put under His feet), absolute safety (Mt 4<sup>8</sup> Lk 4<sup>11</sup> 'lest thou dash thy foot against a stone'), subjection (Mt 5<sup>28</sup> earth the footstool of God's feet). In washing the feet of the disciples Jesus inculcates lessons of humility, mutual service, and the need of daily cleansing from sin (Jn 13<sup>1-14</sup>). See artt. BASON, FOOT.

Of the feet of Jesus Himself mention is made in the NT very frequently. Before His feet suppliants fell down (Mk 5<sup>22</sup> 7<sup>26</sup>, Lk 8<sup>31</sup>), and also a Samaritan who returned to give thanks (Lk 17<sup>16</sup>). At His feet sufferers were laid to be healed (Mt 15<sup>26</sup>). Neglectful of the courtesies of a host, Simon the Pharisee gave Him no water to refresh His feet (Lk 7<sup>44</sup>); but a sinful woman on the same occasion wet His feet with her tears, wiped them with the hair of her head, kissed them, and anointed them with ointment (7<sup>38-44</sup>); and Mary of Bethany showed her great love and gratitude in a similar fashion, when she lavished the contents of her alabaster cruse of precious spikenard (Jn 11<sup>2</sup> 12<sup>3</sup>; cf. Mt 26<sup>7</sup>, Mk 14<sup>3</sup>) upon the feet which had brought the Lord from beyond Jordan (Jn 10<sup>40</sup> 11<sup>7</sup>) to speak the life-giving word at her brother's grave (11<sup>44</sup>). At Jesus' feet the restored demoniac sat (Lk 8<sup>33</sup>), like Mary afterwards when she 'heard his word' (10<sup>39</sup>). The two angels who guarded the sepulchre were seen sitting 'the one at the head, and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain' (Jn 20<sup>13</sup>). It was His feet that the two Marys clung to when they first met Jesus on the Resurrection morning. [Though love prompted them to lay hold of Him, did reverence forbid them to touch more than His feet? When Jesus in the upper room showed His hands and His feet to His disciples (Lk 24<sup>30</sup>), it was doubtless to prove to them that He who now stood before them was the same Jesus who by hands and feet had been nailed to the cross (cf. Jn 20<sup>25-27</sup>). St. Paul says of the ascended Christ that all things are put under His feet (Eph 1<sup>22</sup>), and that beneath His feet death itself shall be destroyed (1 Co 15<sup>25</sup>). And in the Book of Revelation, when the heavenly Jesus appears to the seer of Patmos, the place of His feet has been made glorious (cf. Is 60<sup>13</sup>). Those feet which were dust-stained in the house of Simon the Pharisee, and weary by the well of Sychar (Jn 4<sup>6</sup>), and pierced with nails on the cross of Calvary, are now 'like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace' (Rev 1<sup>15</sup>, cf. 2<sup>18</sup>).

It has been questioned whether the feet of Jesus were nailed to the cross. The doubt is based on the facts that in the Fourth Gospel Jesus mentions only His hands and side (Jn 20<sup>26</sup>), and that sometimes in crucifixion the feet were simply tied to the cross. The nailing of the feet of Jesus would not have been disputed were it not part of an argument to prove that He did not really die on the cross. That the feet were usually nailed (in crucifixion), and that the case of Jesus was no exception to the general rule, may be regarded as beyond doubt (Meyer on Mt 27<sup>30</sup>). There is a difference of opinion as to whether the feet of Jesus were nailed to the cross separately, with two nails, or the one over the other with the same nail. In early art the feet are more frequently represented as separately nailed, but in later art as nailed together, the one over the other. Tradition favours the opinion that the feet were nailed separately. See art. CRUCIFIXION.

FELLOWSHIP.—

Neither the word 'fellowship' (κοινωνία) nor any equivalent term occurs in the Synoptic Gospels, but the reality in faith, love, and joy is diffused like the fragrance of the flowers of Galilee through that bright spring of the world's life. As we pass to the Acts and Epistles, especially the Pauline, the word is found in a variety of meanings. Most frequently it is translated 'fellowship' (Ac 2<sup>42</sup>, 1 Co 12, 2 Co 6<sup>18</sup>, Gal 2<sup>9</sup>, Ph 1<sup>9</sup>, 2<sup>19</sup>). It is rendered 'communion' in 1 Co 10<sup>16</sup> (RVm 'participation in') and 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>; 'contribution' (AV 'distribution') in 2 Co 9<sup>12</sup>, cf. Ro 15<sup>27</sup>; 'communication' (RV 'fellowship') in Philm 6, cf. He 13<sup>16</sup>. Though κοινωνία occurs only three times in the Johannine writings (1 Jn 1<sup>6, 7</sup>), they are peculiarly rich in the religious ideas which give the term its content. The conception of fellowship in the NT is not exhausted by the varied significations of any one word; it becomes plain only as we comprehend the meaning of the life of the Early Church.

i. INHERITED FORECASTS.—Like most of the great religious conceptions of the NT, this idea has its roots deep in the OT. Isaiah proclaims that the religion of Israel can find its truest expression only in a spiritual fellowship of faith, independent of a national framework. In Israel there is an imperishable remnant, a stock from which new life will spring forth after desolation has swept over Jerusalem (Is 8<sup>12-18</sup>, 37<sup>31-32</sup>). By the time of Jeremiah the disaster of the nation had become so irretrievable that the prophet hardly dares to hope for more than the salvage of individuals from the wreck; but these rescued ones will form the true Israel under a new covenant (Jer 23<sup>6-8</sup>, 31<sup>31-32</sup>). The Messianic blessedness which those prophets foresaw consisted of an intimate fellowship which, in the coming days, the redeemed company of Israel would enjoy with Jehovah (Is 49<sup>6-13</sup>, Jer 31<sup>31-32</sup>). It was to be a fellowship of Israelites because it was primarily a fellowship with Israel's God (Is 52<sup>8-10</sup>, 60). This thought of fellowship finds nowhere more vivid expression than in the Psalter. That storehouse of religious devotion is filled with prayers of communion with Jehovah, the supremely moral Person, righteous, faithful, holy, yet full of loving-kindness, who satisfies the needs of man by bringing him into fellowship with Himself (Pss 16, 34, 40, 63). Though many of the psalms seem to be the utterance of individual yearning for God's presence, others express the religious desires of corporate Israel, a fellowship of saints with a common thirst for the springs of its life.

A special term had been coined for Israel in her religious rather than her national function—kahal, which was rendered in the LXX by ἐκκλησία ('church'). It signified the religious assembly of God's chosen people; but as this could never be completely realized, even in the great temple gatherings, the conception remained largely ideal. A rich spiritual legacy was transmitted from the OT in the words Israel, ecclesia, Kingdom of God; and though the Jewish heirs were unable to appreciate their inheritance, these two truths of the prophets and psalmists could never have quite perished—that there is an eternal commonwealth of saints, and that this fellowship of Israel is based upon fellowship with Jehovah.

ii. THE SYNOPTIC GOSPELS.—Jesus not only claimed to fulfil prophecy; by His words of grace He did much more than the most spiritually minded Israelite could have hoped. The spirit of the Lord which was upon Him awoke prophetic thoughts that had long lain in the hearts of those who were waiting for the consolation of Israel.

He brought spring and quickened the seed sown in the past. He calls men to Himself and forms them into a new society, within which are to be enjoyed the blessings foretold by the prophets. In this company is found religious fellowship, based upon forgiveness of sins and eternal life through the knowledge of God revealed by Jesus as Father, of which the OT saints had but partial enjoyment or glad anticipation. He places Himself at the head of this society, claiming that He alone can impart the knowledge of God which will give rest to the souls of men (Mt 11<sup>27-30</sup>). Thus His followers, constituted into the society of the Messiah, become a Divinely ordered fellowship not dependent on outward organization, but united by a common faith in Jesus as the Revealer of God to them. They are the New Israel, the imperishable ecclesia (Mt 16<sup>18-19</sup>).

This society is no closed circle. Associating Himself more or less intimately with groups of disciples, Jesus sends them forth with the knowledge they have gained concerning Him, to proclaim to the people that the new epoch of Divine rule is about to be inaugurated, and that they should prepare for its advent. The condition of membership in this brotherhood is to follow Jesus, even though this may seem to the man of the world to be nothing less than to lose one's life. Fellowship with Jesus costs much. Family ties may be severed, the hatred of the world may be vented upon His disciples, billows of persecution may sweep over them, but in this society is life indeed (Mk 8<sup>34-38</sup>, Lk 14<sup>26-33</sup>). Jesus offers His followers a fellowship in this new brotherhood, which more than compensates for any worldly friendship that they may have to renounce (Mk 10<sup>29-31</sup>). Their true kindred, even like that of Jesus Himself, will be found among those united by spiritual affinities in this new circle. New virtues abound in this brotherhood. Love working in helpful ministries for others is of the essence of fellowship in Messiah's company. Rank is assigned, not as in worldly kingdoms, but by the degree of service rendered by each to all (Mk 10<sup>42-45</sup>).

In time Jesus announces to His followers that His society, as the true Israel, is to take the place of the Jewish nation, which as such is becoming a massa perditā. Out of this perishing world His disciples are saved into the eternal Kingdom, and as heirs of salvation they are in reality, as they were afterwards called, 'the saints of the New Covenant' (Mk 12<sup>1-13</sup>). Before His death the Messiah gave concreteness to this fellowship by a solemn communion with His disciples in the Last Supper, which became the means of making real to them the blessings of the New Covenant. The connexion of the Supper with the Paschal meal, which may here be assumed as having existed, either by anticipation or directly, would suggest to the minds of the participants that in this New Covenant they were entering into fellowship with Jehovah, and that they were also binding themselves together as brothers in a new covenant with God (Mk 14<sup>22-25</sup>). A promise of enlarging fellowship fitly closes the Gospel of Matthew in the words, 'Lo, I am with you to the end of the ages' (28<sup>20</sup>), and gives us a glimpse of the transition from the earthly to the heavenly life of Jesus.

To sum up, the Synoptic Gospels show us the conception of an eternal Divine Commonwealth, made actual by Jesus in a society welded together by fervent loyalty to Himself as the Christ of God, and pervaded by a life of mutual service to the members. He brings His followers into true fellowship with Jehovah by revealing Him and pardoning their sins. They enjoy the life of a brotherhood, which is true life, in His company.

iii. THE PRIMITIVE JEWISH-CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—Fellowship is the most real definition of the unity which was a constituent quality of the Early Church. Intercourse, intimate and universal, among brethren, whose life was consecrated by a gracious Divine presence, and thus free from everything secular, constituted the Church as distinctively one. This unity was not expressed by any rigid cohesive organization, not even primarily by the leadership of the Apostles. Indeed, the disciples had been warned by their Lord not to allow themselves to be called 'Master' (Mt 23<sup>9</sup>). A company of baptized brethren, they had received the Holy Spirit from their risen Lord, who had welded them into one. His personal gifts were manifest in each brother passionately devoted to his unseen Lord, and so on terms of friendship with all who loved Him.

The Church appears on the stage of the public world as a new sect, holding to the belief that Jesus is Messiah. Outwardly the brethren were probably indistinguishable from good Jews, and such organization as they had would follow the lines of their former life. But it would seem that they did not think of themselves as a new organization. They were slow to cast loose their havers and swing out into the stream as an independent Church. Led by powerful personalities, Peter, John, and James, who had been either intimate or of close kinship with Jesus, they regarded themselves as the true Israel, and for a while hoped that the nation would repent. Before St. Paul's time, however, there was a change, for we find that the brethren throughout Judea were organized into distinctive communities, not as 'synagogues,' but as 'churches' (Gal. 1<sup>23</sup>). But in these churches the utmost freedom of the individual, which is essential for true fellowship, prevailed; for the Church grew not by official initiative, but by the prophetic power of the Holy Spirit impelling the brethren to spread far and wide the good news of their gospel.

Little as the primitive Christians differed outwardly from the Jewish world, their inner world was a new creation. It was a brotherhood of Divine origin; for not only were they baptized into the name of Jesus the Lord of life, but they had received the Holy Spirit. How sacred this fellowship was is manifest from the terrible punishment meted out to Ananias and Sapphira for violating the mutual trust that made the brotherhood possible (Ac 5).

There were various manifestations of this fellowship. (a) It was a house-church. Brethren met as sons round the common board in the homes of those who could best provide accommodation, and partook of a daily meal consecrated to the memory of their unseen but present Lord. They held communion with one another because they held communion with the risen Jesus. Common prayers, songs, and thanksgivings rose to Jehovah from these family groups (Ac 2<sup>42</sup> 42<sup>22</sup>).

(b) This fellowship (κοινωνία) found further expression in a life of mutual service,—the rich for the poor, the strong for the weak. They rejoiced with those who rejoiced; they wept with those who wept. In fact, true κοινωνία could not be better defined than in the words of the Golden Rule—'Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them' (Mt 7<sup>12</sup>). No formal ordinance, such as the community of goods, was enjoined on the brethren; their love welled forth in such a pure and powerful stream that it made its own channels. All blessings, earthly and spiritual, were spontaneously shared with those who were in need (Ac 2<sup>44-47</sup> 43<sup>2-3</sup>).

So we have in the earliest days a true fellowship, a brotherhood united by love to a risen Lord, whom many of them had known on earth, and led without rivalry by favourite disciples of Jesus, enjoying gifts and graces from the ever present Spirit of their Lord. But that brotherhood gathered in the earthly Zion was nationalistic in sentiment. It was provincial in spirit, especially, it would seem, throughout Judea, where the churches were in villages remote from the world of men.

iv. THE GENTILE CHURCHES OF THE PAULINE WORLD.—With the rise of Antioch a peril threatened the prestige of Jerusalem. Could the fruit of the Spirit thrive equally well in the valleys and on the plains of Syria and Asia as on the isolated plateau of Judea? If so, it was bound to be very much more abundant. Fortunately, Paul the Apostle to the Gentiles was a man of varied culture. While his world was in cities and he thought imperially, he never treated the Jewish mind lightly, and he knew what that mind was. He understood its worth and its rights. He could discern every wave of feeling, every gust that shivered duskily across it. So St. Paul was himself the greatest power of his day making for the unity of the Church. It was a passion with him to avert a breach which would be fatal; and he was successful, for the other Apostles responded nobly as brethren, and gave him the right hand of fellowship (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>). But the sections thus united had to be cemented; so he devotes much energy to effecting a durable κοινωνία by organizing the collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem. In 2 Co 8<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>12</sup> and Ro 15<sup>27</sup> the word κοινωνία is translated (RV) 'contribution'; but 'there is always at the root of κοινωνία, in the NT, the idea of Christian communion in one form or another. Those who bestow make common cause with one another and with the recipients' (Waite). The collection is a religious act, because it is a mark of Christian fellowship. Indeed, the Macedonians regard it as a signal token of Divine favour to be allowed thus to help those from whom they had received the gospel; and the poor Jewish Christians, who had made experience of the liberal Christian kindness of the Gentiles, could hardly refuse to call them brethren (2 Co 8<sup>14</sup> 9<sup>11-14</sup>).

The Christian fellowship was world-wide. This brotherhood was one everywhere (1 P 5<sup>9</sup>), and in writing to the Corinthians St. Paul assumes that what he says will be of interest not only to them, but 'to all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, both theirs and ours' (1 Co 12). The Church of God which is in Corinth is a visible but partial manifestation of the larger whole. This idea persisted after the Apostolic age; for 'Brotherhood' alternates with Ecclesia in the oldest sets of ecclesiastical canons, while omnis fraternitas and πᾶσα ἡ ἀδελφότης are used to denote the whole of Christendom' (Lindsay). This world-wide brotherhood was not held together by any outward organization, though the Apostle Paul does group his churches by provinces. But organization is local: it does not follow the lines of provincial units. Of course, Christian life had to be expressed in outward fellowship wherever it was possible, so that all the brethren within a convenient radius, such as a city, would be grouped together to form the Church of God in that place. And the Spirit of God supplied these local churches with leaders who had the necessary gifts for the conduct of their life. This became the basis of a permanent ministry.

From the world they became outwardly separate, 'saints' chosen out of it and consecrated to God (Ro 12, 1 Co 12, Gal 1), and so forming one family, 'the household' of faith (Gal 6, Eph 2), throughout the empire of this world. Hence great stress is laid upon the grace of hospitality (He 13). In that busy world with its thronged highways, the Christian was always sure of a warm welcome wherever there was a church or a group of brethren (see per contra 3 Jn 9), and the sufferings of the saints were made the occasion of active sympathy (He 6, 10, 13). St. Paul experienced many such marked tokens of fellowship, especially at the hands of the Philippians, for whom he cherished the deepest affection. They were unremittingly active in co-operation with him for the spread of the gospel; and whatever his needs, bodily or spiritual, might be, they were ready to do their best by gifts or sympathy to supply the lack. This was true fellowship (Ph 1, 7, 2, 14, 15). Philemon also was a real Christian, whose faith in, and love to, the Lord Jesus was manifested in his kindly offices towards all the saints; and the Apostle delicately suggests that he should not stop till his benevolence becomes complete and embraces even the slave Onesimus (Philem 6, 15, 16).

This religious idea of brotherhood issues in a new grace, 'love of the brethren' (φιλανθρωπία), which is to be cherished as an especial sign of Divine life (1 Th 4, Ro 12, He 13, 1 P 1). A fine word, ἀπλότης ('singleness'), is used by St. Paul to denote the quality of the man in whom fellowship (κοινωνία) is a ruling motive. He is ἀπλός, 'single-minded,' 'liberal.' He does not serve God and Mammon. His eye is single. Looking only at the needs of his brother, he realizes the truth of the Lord's words that it is more blessed to give than to receive (Ac 20). Among the brethren there is no almsgiving. All that is sordid in almsgiving is removed, and generosity becomes a choice token of fellowship (2 Co 8, 9, 13). 'When men thankfully receive God's gifts, and in imitation of His bounty use them for the good of others, so that the recipients also thank God for the benefaction, it is as far as it goes the re-establishment of the right relation between God and men, and men and men.' The slave is not only made partaker of such bounty, but as he possesses this spirit he pays an ungrudging service to his master (Eph 6).

The fellowship of church with church was further increased by the visits of Apostles and teachers, as well as by the interchange of correspondence. What was of interest to one was of interest to all in so far as it touched their common gospel. While we do not find any uniform creed or liturgy in these Epistles, there was almost certainly a substantially similar form of worship, and in their prayers and hymns the brethren gave utterance to the same faith in Jesus Christ, and in their teaching they adhered to the common truths which the Apostles taught (Ro 6, Gal 1). We cannot fail to be impressed by the combination of a sense of unity with great individual freedom. The Spirit took the life of believer or church, and produced in it some distinctive grace or function, which brought diversity without disharmony, enrichment without lack of proportion. manifold, however, as these gifts were, the greatest of all and that which lay at the root of their fellowship was love; for not only was it the best because the commonest, but it tempered and restrained the more individualistic endowments, which might easily destroy the harmony of the Christian company (1 Co 12, 13). True fellowship demands variety in unity, individual freedom working at the impulse of a common spirit.

The noblest exposition of Christian fellowship, outside the Gospel of John, is contained in the Epistle to the Ephesians. In that prose poem in praise of unity, the Church is described as one body of which each Christian is, or should be, a perfect member. A Divine creation purposed from all eternity by the Father's love, it was made actual in history through Jesus Christ. The Church is one because of the unities on which it is based. Its members are baptized into the name of the one Lord whom they confess. They are inspired by the same Spirit, and there is one God and Father of all, who is above all and through all and in all (Eph 4). Historically the Church became one when, in Christ, Jew and Gentile were both reconciled unto God in one body by the cross (24-26); and in the ages to come each individual with variety of function will reach his perfection in this perfect organism, and contribute to the completeness of the whole (47-51). A fellowship so sublime in its ideal must be undisturbed by selfish desires. Only where love, patience, long-suffering and humility reign will there be on earth 'a communion of the saints.' 'In the Apostle's eyes all true life in an Ecclesia is a life of community, of the harmonious and mutually helpful action of different elements, so that he is giving instruction on the very essence of membership when in each of the nine Epistles addressed to Ecclesia he makes the peace of God to be the supreme standard for them to aim at, and the perpetual self-surrender of love the comprehensive means of attaining it' (Hort, Christ. Ecclesia, 123).

All the manifestation of fellowship among the brethren, the very brotherhood itself, is possible only because the individual members of the communion of the saints are in personal fellowship with Jesus Christ. He indeed is the fountain and source of communion. All human fellowship is derivative. The word κοινωνία is used by St. Paul only in 1 Co 10 to express this personal fellowship with Christ, the thought being that in the Lord's Supper believers are united in close communion, because through the cup and the bread they are enabled to participate in the life of Christ Himself. But the idea is central in St. Paul's religion—'I no longer live, but Christ liveth in me' (Gal 2); 'For me to live is Christ' (Ph 1). However, this fellowship of the individual is no selfish enjoyment. Only those who are 'rooted and grounded in love' are able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth and length and depth and height; and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, that they may be filled with all the fulness of God (Eph 3). Now the Apostle expects that even in his own imperfect churches there should be some real enjoyment of this fellowship with Christ. He reminds the Church of Corinth that they 'were called into the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord' (1 Co 1<sup>2</sup>), i.e. the fellowship of which He is the soul. Fractured though the Church is by schism and marred by impurity, it is a society of redeemed sons, whose destiny is to be conformed to the image of Him who is the firstborn among many brethren (Ro 8<sup>29, 30</sup>), and even now it must reflect with real truth some of the glory of that future fellowship. The same conception is conveyed in 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup> in the words, 'the communion of the Holy Ghost'; for the Spirit who unifies the Christian society into a body of redeemed men who have experienced the unmerited favour of Christ and the love of the Father, is the Spirit of Christ (2 Co 3<sup>17</sup>). The Philippian Church also, pervaded by love and comforted by reciprocal compassion, has enjoyed fellowship because of the presence of this Spirit who brings the consolation of Christ Himself (Ph 2<sup>1</sup>).

v. THE JOHANNINE WRITINGS.—Assuming that the books which bear the name of John came from the Apostle, we may consider them together, for they bring before us the conditions of a later period. The Gospel and the Epistles at least are the mature work of one who seeks to set before his readers the mind of Christ, after the attempt had been made for half a century to work His teaching into actual life. Much must be taken for granted. The visible Church is one; the old problem of Jewish and Gentile sections is a dead issue. Now the Church is face to face with the world. Two spiritual forces are opposed—the realm of light over which the Son of God rules, and the world of darkness organized and directed by the Prince of Evil. Error concerning the Person of Christ, and lack of love of the brethren, are disintegrating the Christian society. So the author takes his readers to the fountain of Christian fellowship, and allows them to taste its quality as it was enjoyed by the disciples of Jesus, whom having loved He loved unto the end (Jn 13-17). These discourses illuminate the Lord's Supper, and the feet-washing serves as a noble approach to it. There are two prominent aspects of the Eucharist as interpreted by John: (a) that it is a feast for the spiritual nurture of the faithful (6<sup>48-57</sup>); (b) that it sets forth the love of the Lord, and so becomes a love-feast of brethren. Love is the note of the conversations. Only through the clear atmosphere of love can they see their absent Master. If they obey Him and love one another, He will come to them bringing the peace and the joy which He alone can impart (14<sup>1, 26-27</sup>). So will there be, as Loisy says, 'a hierarchy of love,' the disciples loving one another with the new love which springs from their Master, and their Master loving them as the Father loves Him (13<sup>34, 17<sup>26</sup></sup>). These chapters teach respecting Christian fellowship that (i.) its source is God as revealed in Jesus Christ, (ii.) its agent is the Holy Spirit, (iii.) its condition in the believer is faith in and obedience to Jesus Christ, and (iv.) its fruit is a life of love, joy, and peace among brethren here, and perfect sonship hereafter.

Similar conceptions dominate the First Epistle of John. Fellowship with God is the goal of the Christian life (1 Jn 1<sup>3, 4</sup>). Such fellowship comes through knowledge, which is only another aspect of the love of God (4<sup>7, 8</sup>). But sin is a barrier to this fellowship, which would therefore be impossible were it not that it has been removed by the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ (2<sup>1-2</sup>). No sin is greater than hate; and since all love comes from God (4<sup>7</sup>), he who hates his brother cannot love God. If he love God, that love must first have come from God, and stream forth through the heart of the believer upon his brother. To live in loving fellowship with the brethren is at once the proof of fellowship with the Father and the ethical condition for receiving it, for only to hearts broadened and deepened by love can God reveal Himself and bring fellowship (4<sup>12, 13, 20, 21</sup>).

This mystic, whose spirit was more responsive than any other to the mind of the Master, opens up the profound depth of that fellowship which the early Christian Church enjoyed, as we have seen, in no inconsiderable measure. Since Christ is the soul of Christian fellowship, it is impaired by lack of truth concerning Him. But truth and love are inseparable. Therefore when we seek for the true unity of the Church of Christ, we must begin by keeping our Lord's great command to love the brethren, and thereby advance with all saints to a true knowledge of Christ.

Looking back through the dim distance we discover the foreshadowings of prophet and psalmist growing clearer, till in these latest books of the NT we can almost touch the reality on earth in this ideal of the Apostle whom Jesus loved. The supreme poetic description of that fellowship is the city of the King of Love in Revelation, whose citizens see the face of the Lord (Rev 22<sup>3-4</sup>), the beatific vision for which the psalmists strained their eyes.

The Christian fellowship as it existed on earth in the 1st century was a stupendous creation. Philosophers had dreamed of Utopias. Humane Stoics had taught the brotherhood of man. But all attempts to realize these ideals had been comparatively ineffective. In the Christian Church, however, aliens and the disfranchised found fellowship with those who inherited religious promises and social privilege. Roman and Greek stooped to love the hateful Jew, and the Jew was willing to transfer the sacred name of Israel to Gentiles whose past was unclean. Well-born and slave greeted one another as brethren, without thereby disturbing social order. A love so compelling as to reverse the national and social values, must have been derived from a Presence altogether transcending the measurements of ordinary human life. Christian fellowship is not to be defined as intercourse glowing with human love at its highest. It is primarily a spiritual communion with the Supreme Person, whose love recreates life and makes it a complete expression of love. So the goal must be, as the writer to the Hebrews says, in the world to come, when Jesus shall have introduced His many brethren into the Holy of Holies, where they will, as a company of the redeemed, hold fellowship with the Father (He 2<sup>10, 11, 7<sup>26</sup></sup> 12<sup>24</sup>). FEVER (ἰσχυρός, and in Ac 28<sup>7</sup> of πυρετός, with corresponding participle in Mt. and Mk. πυρετός). There are only five passages in the NT in which fever is spoken of, and three of these, viz. Mt 8<sup>44</sup>, Mk 1<sup>30</sup>, and Lk 4<sup>38</sup>, are parallel passages. One cannot say with certainty what specific fever is alluded to in these passages, or in Jn 4<sup>46</sup>, where the healing of the nobleman's son is spoken of. It may be, indeed, that St. Luke, whose training as a physician naturally led him to speak with exactness about medical matters, does specify the fever from which Peter's wife's mother was suffering (συνεχόμενη πυρετῶ μεγάλῃ). It has been contended that there was a specific fever known as 'the great fever,' and that it was this, whatever it may have been, from which the sick woman in Capernaum suffered. This, however, has been questioned, and perhaps it is rather the intensity of the fever than its specific character that is indicated by the word 'great.' Probably both Peter's wife's mother and the nobleman's son suffered from malarial fever. Professor G. A. Smith tells us that the region about Tiberias is a very feverish region, and Dr. Cunningham Geikie says that malarial fever was common at Capernaum. It is very likely that there has always been a good deal of malarial fever about the shores of the Sea of Galilee, and especially about the more northerly portions of these shores. The fever from which the father of Publius suffered (Ac 28<sup>8</sup>) was fever accompanying or accompanied by acute dysentery. See also artt. ## FIELD.—

The three Greek words (ἀγρίσι, χώρα, χωρίον) rendered 'field' in the Gospels are distinguishable in meaning, and sometimes require more specific renderings. ἀγρίσι in general means 'field' in the sense of cultivated land, or open country thought of as subject to cultivation: e.g. 'sowed good seed in his field' (Mt 13<sup>12</sup>), 'lilies of the field,' 'grass of the field' (Mt 23<sup>29</sup>), etc. χώρα denotes generally a region, or district of country, as 'the region of Trachonitis' (Lk 9<sup>1</sup>), 'the country of the Gadarenes' (Mk 5<sup>1</sup>). χωρίον is more distinctly local, as 'a place called Gethsemane' (Mt 26<sup>38</sup>), 'the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to Joseph' (Gn 47<sup>31</sup>), etc. But, on the other hand, we find ἀγρίσι used also of the country in distinction from the city (Mk 5<sup>14</sup> 9<sup>30</sup>, Lk 3<sup>14</sup> 9<sup>22</sup> 23<sup>2</sup>), χώρα used of fields of ripened grain, as in Jn 4<sup>13</sup> 'Look on the fields, for they are white' (cf. Jn 5<sup>1</sup> 'who have reaped down your fields'); and where St. Matthew uses ἀγρίσι of 'the field of blood' (27<sup>8</sup>), St. Luke uses χωρίον (Ac 12<sup>19</sup>).

A knowledge of certain peculiarities of the fields of Palestine is helpful to the full understanding of several of the parables of our Lord and some other passages in the Gospels. There are now, as there were of old, numerous fields in Palestine where 'the lilies' and many other flowers grow in gorgeous profusion without human care or culture, and where 'the grass of the field,' including fibrous weeds as well as short-lived flowers, when dried by the tropical sun, are still gathered as fuel, and used to heat ovens for baking bread (cf. Mt 6<sup>28-29</sup>). The argument of the Master, drawn from 'the grass of the field which to-day is and to-morrow is cast into the oven,' still holds good, and still finds abundant illustration. It is true occasionally now, also, that after the owner of the land has 'sowed good seed in his field,' an enemy will in sheer spite creep in secretly and 'sow tares,' the noxious darnel (Lolium temulentum); but see TARES.

In Palestine, as in all unsettled countries, it was common, and in parts of the land it is still common, to resort to the field (the cultivated land or the open country) as a fit place in which to hide treasure (cf. Mt 13<sup>12</sup>). In ancient times the land was peculiarly subject to revolutions, exposed to raids from wandering tribes, and, in some districts, liable to plunder from robbers at home. So, in the absence of safety vaults and the like, owners of treasure who feared robbery or thievery (Mt 23<sup>29</sup>), or who were setting off on a journey to a distant country, would bury their money, jewellery, etc., in the field. Then, if the owner were killed in battle, or died in a far country, no one might know where his treasures were hid; and, according to usage, such valuables when found, if no owner appeared to claim them, belonged to the owner of the land—a fact which gives point to the parable of the Hid Treasure (Mt 13<sup>12</sup>, cf. Job 2<sup>1</sup>, Pr 2<sup>1</sup>). Many persons are found digging for hid treasure in Egypt and Palestine to-day, and not a few spend their last farthing in the effort (cf. Thomson, LB ii, p. 640).

In the parable of the Sower (Mt 13<sup>4</sup>, Mk 4<sup>4</sup>, Lk 8<sup>8</sup>), where the AV has 'some (seeds) fell by the wayside,' the picture is really of grains of wheat or barley which fell on the trodden pathway leading across the field, and so were left exposed where the birds could see and devour them (cf. Lk 8<sup>8</sup> 'trodden under foot'). It is still common in Palestine to see flocks of birds following the peasant as he sows his seed, eagerly picking up every grain that is not covered by the quick-following harrow. And where it is said 'some fell upon stony places' (AV), the real allusion is to the underlying rock of limestone. The traveller finds numberless places where a broad, flat, limestone rock lies just beneath the surface of the field, with only a thin layer of earth upon it (cf. Lk 8<sup>13</sup> 'the rock'). 'Stony ground' (AV, following early English versions) suggests a soil abounding in loose stones, such as is often found there producing good wheat; but the picture is rather of a soil into which the seeds could not sink deep, and the film of earth being readily heated because of the underlying rock, they would come up sooner than elsewhere, and at first would look uncommonly flourishing; but, not being able to send roots deep into the moist earth (cf. Lk 8<sup>8</sup>), when the hot, dry weather came the stalks would wither, and thus show that the fair promise of a crop there had been deceptive (cf. Ps 129<sup>6</sup> 'grass upon the house-tops').

In the fields of Palestine, too, there are still found spots that are rich, but are peculiarly infested with briars and thorn-bushes, where one may see the wheat in scattered and spindling stalks struggling for life (cf. Mt 13<sup>7</sup>). In Mk 2<sup>2</sup> and Lk 6<sup>1</sup> (AV) we have 'corn-fields' where the Gr. word (σπέρμα) is the same as in Mt 12<sup>1</sup>, where it is rendered simply 'corn,'—'through the corn' (after Tindale). It is literally 'through the sown (places),' i.e. the grain-fields, as Noyes and Bib. Un. Vers. render it, fields of wheat or barley, not of maize or Indian corn, of course. The picture is of Jesus and His disciples going along, either through the standing grain, or by a footpath which bounded the fields, the grain in either case being within easy reach. It was customary then, as it is now, in Palestine, for the lands of different owners to be separated, not by fences or walls, but usually only by crude individual stones set up at intervals on the surface of the ground as landmarks (cf. Dt 19<sup>17</sup>); and the roads, mere footpaths as a rule, were not distinct from the fields, as they are with us, but ran through them, so that the grain grew right up to the edge of the path. We are not meant to think of Jesus and His disciples as going ruthlessly through the fields and trampling down the grain, but as following one of these paths over or between the fields. But neither plucking the ears of wheat to eat, nor even walking across a pathless field, was, according to Jewish ideas (cf. Dt 23<sup>2</sup>), a violation of the rights of property any more than it is to-day among the Arabs. It was not of this, but of Sabbath-breaking, that the Pharisees complained.

GEO. B. EAGER.

FIERCENESS.—The word 'fierce' occurs twice in AV (Mt 8<sup>28</sup> of the two demoniacs [καλῶν], Lk 23<sup>9</sup> of our Lord's accusers [ἐπίτακτον RV 'urgent']). But the purpose of the present article is to examine in what sense and to what extent this attribute may be attributed to Christ. The popular conception of Him is perhaps too much that of a speaker of smooth things. It is forgotten that He could utter on occasion words of fierce energy. The beauty of the unanswering innocence of the Passion, that type of silent suffering and enduring, has made His outbursts of fierce reproach or condemnation fade from the memory. His 'judge not' (Mt 7), or His parable of patience that has its part in the 'wheat and tares' being allowed to grow together (13<sup>9</sup>), or His doctrine of unlimited forgiveness (Lk 17<sup>4</sup>).—these are thought to be entirely representative. Yet, while they undoubtedly indicate the prevailing elements, something would be lost in our understanding of Jesus if we overlooked the impassioned fierceness with which He sometimes acted and spoke.

Of recorded deeds the incident of the driving out of the vendors and money-changers from the temple precincts (Mt 21<sup>12</sup>, Mk 11<sup>15</sup>, Jn 2<sup>14</sup>) is the most notable: but it is in the vigour of His language that the possibilities of fierceness in Him are most revealed. He has small patience with certain failings, such as the lack of an apprehensive faith, or worldliness, or hypocrisy, or vanity. There is a denunciatory strain in Him much resembling the force of the Baptist's 'offspring of vipers' of Lk 3<sup>7</sup>. It is present in the Nazareth sermon in His OT illustrations of prophets not honoured in their own country (Lk 4); in His declaration of war with evil.—'I am come to send fire on the earth' (12<sup>49</sup>), and 'I came not to send peace but a sword' (Mt 10<sup>34</sup>); it even finds expression in the very phrase γεννηματα ἐχιδνῶν used by the Baptist (Mt 12<sup>34</sup>). None of the mildness of diplomacy is in the message to Herod.—'Go ye, and tell that fox' (Lk 13<sup>31</sup>). When He encounters men or communities incapable of the heavenly vision, His words are swords. To trouble about them is to 'throw pearls before swine' (Mt 7<sup>6</sup>). They are a 'faithless and perverse generation,' or 'a wicked and adulterous generation' seeking after a visible and tangible sign of spiritual things (18<sup>12</sup>); they shall lose the Kingdom of God (21<sup>31</sup>); the heathen of Nineveh shall show themselves better judges of eternal realities (Lk 11<sup>32</sup>); there is more hope for Tyre and Sidon (10<sup>14</sup>) or for Sodom and Gomorrah than for the spiritually blind (Mt 10<sup>15</sup>); 'Ye are of your father the devil' (Jn 8<sup>44</sup>). The fierceness which marks His rejection of the third temptation (Mt 4<sup>10</sup>) is paralleled in the 'Get thee behind me, Satan' with which Peter's proffered intervention is repelled (Mk 8<sup>33</sup>). The perverter of the simplicity of childhood is told that he had better have been drowned with a millstone about his neck (Mt 18<sup>6</sup>). But the white heat of fierceness in the utterance of Christ comes when He meets with Pharisees, scribes, and teachers of the Law, who are unworthy of their high professions. They are 'false prophets' . . . 'ravening wolves' (Mt 7<sup>15</sup>); 'hypocrites' is hurled at them in every phrase of Mt 23, in the close of Lk 11, and in Mk 7, where Isaiah's bitterest words against lip-service are quoted against them. They are 'whited sepulchres,' 'blind guides,' 'sons of them that slew the prophets,' 'serpents.' They 'say, and do not,' so that 'the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom' before them (Mt 21<sup>31</sup>).

Thus to His Divine tenderness did Jesus add a strange fierceness, as though to teach that in faith's war with darkness lightning has its place. See art. ANGER.

LITERATURE.—Seeley, Eccle Homo, ch. xxi.; Butler, Serm. viii.; Dale, Atonement, p. 388 ff. E. DAPLYN.

FIG-TREE (in NT συκῆ, in OT תְּמָרָה); the Ficus Carica, L.).—1. The fig is the principal shade and fruit-tree of Palestine, growing in all parts, in many places spontaneously. It seldom surpasses 20 ft. (Post, in Hastings' DB, s.v. 'Figs,' says 16 ft.) in height, but has a spread of from 25 to 30 ft. Its welcome shade and refreshing fruit make it the emblem of peace and prosperity (Dt 8<sup>10</sup>, Jg 9<sup>10, 11</sup>, 1 K 4<sup>25</sup>, Mic 4<sup>4</sup>, Zec 3<sup>10</sup>, 1 Mac 14<sup>13</sup>). Besides this general symbolism, two characteristics of the tree, appealing respectively to the eye and to the palate, have led to further comparisons.

(a) The fig-tree is conspicuous in early spring by the expanding of the tips of its twigs into little green knobs called עֵץ פַּגְגִּים (Gr. ἀκνῶν, Ca 2<sup>3</sup> RV 'green figs') which are the flower-fruit buds, and together with the leaf-bud, which expands shortly after and soon overshadows the pag, or fruit rudiment, serve as the herald of the coming summer (Mt 24<sup>32</sup> and ff.). This phenomenon of 'all the trees' (Lk 21<sup>30</sup>) is particularly noticeable in the fig-tree because of its early and conspicuous verdure. The ripening of the pag follows the 'appearance of the flowers on the earth,' and accompanies the 'blossoming of the vine' as the feature of the advancing season and the time of mating (Ca 2<sup>24</sup>). In the same connexion may be mentioned the phenomenon of the dropping of great quantities of the immature fruit in consequence of imperfect fertilization, so that the scattered pagim covering the ground under the fig-trees become to the author of Rev 6<sup>13</sup> a symbol of the stars fallen to earth from the firmament, 'as a fig-tree casteth her unripe figs when she is shaken of a great wind.'

(b) The fig-tree has two (not three) successive crops of fruit each year. The first-ripe fig (Heb. תְּמָרָה לֵבְנָה, Is 28<sup>4</sup>, Jer 24<sup>2</sup>, Hos 9<sup>10</sup>, Mic 7<sup>1</sup>) is produced upon the old wood of the preceding year, the buds which remained undeveloped through the winter swelling into the little green pagim already described, towards the end of the season of spring rains (March-April), and coming to maturity in June. The תְּמָרָה עֵנָה, or autumn fig, is the fig of commerce, and is produced on the new wood of the same year. The leaf-bud, which expanded shortly after the pag, and soon distanced it in growth, puts out in its turn a flower-fruit bud which matures in August, or later, according to the variety, the fruit hanging on the boughs until winter, when the branches are again left naked, grey, and straggling.

This phenomenon of successive fruitage in the fig-tree is doubtless the source of the description of the fruit-trees of the New Jerusalem (Ezk 47<sup>12</sup>, Rev 22<sup>2</sup> 'the tree of life') as 'bearing fruit every month.' In the Talmud it is a symbol for the acquisition of learning, which, to be permanent, must come by little and little (Hamburger, RE i. 3, s.v. 'Feige,' p. 300 with references). Hence the saying, 'Whoso sees a fig-tree in his dreams, his learning shall be safe from forgetfulness' (Berakhoth, 57). The capacity of the tree for prolongation of its bearing season leads in fact to certain representations which easily pass over into exaggerations and misunderstandings important to avoid.

Edersheim (Life and Times, bk. iv. ch. xvi. p. 246) refers to 'a species (the Benoth Shuach) mentioned in Shebb, v. 1, of which the fruit required three years for ripening,' but which may more reasonably be understood as simply a late-bearing variety whose fruit reached maturity only in exceptionally favourable seasons, not oftener than once in three years. So with the rhetorical passage of Josephus (BJ III. x. 8) celebrating the delightful climate of the plain of Gennesaret. His statement that 'it supplies the principal fruits, as grapes and figs, uninterruptedly during ten months of the year,' cannot reasonably be made to prove more than the fact that in that semi-tropical depression, 600 ft. below sea-level, fresh fruit, including figs, could be obtained almost to the end of winter.

To explain the narrative of Mk 11<sup>13</sup> two other facts have been advanced of doubtful value and trust-worthiness. It is asserted that neglected relics of the autumn crop sometimes cling to the branches of the fig-tree throughout the winter; but Post (l.c. p. 6) was unable during a residence of 33 years in Syria to find, or hear of, such. The statement of Edersheim (l.c. v. ii. p. 374) that such left-over fruit about April 1 'would of course be edible' becomes admissible only by inserting a 'not' after 'of course.' It is also asserted that the paggim, or green fruit, was eaten, even Benzinger (PEE<sup>3</sup> s.v. 'Fruchtbäume,' p. 304) declaring that 'Jesus might expect to find such winter figs (the paggim) on a tree already in leaf at the season of Pasover, that is before the time of the ripening of figs.' In the sense that the rudimentary fruit-buds would be discoverable under the leaves, upon examination (unless the tree had become sterile by reversion to the wild type, as sometimes occurs) this statement is true: the present writer has found such dry tasteless 'figs' at 'Ain Far'a near Jerusalem, on March 1, the size of an olive, though the tree was leafless. Boys sometimes nibble these buds, but to speak of the paggim at this season as 'winter figs' is misleading. The evidence for the edible quality of the paggim drawn by Edersheim from the Talmud (Bk. v. ii. p. 375, referring to Shebh. iv. 7 and Jerus. Shebh. 355, last lines) suggests only that at a later season the unripe fruit was sometimes used as a condiment 'with bread.' This, however, was after the paggim 'began to assume a red colour, and not when the foliage had only just begun to cover the setting fruit-bud. Apart from the question whether a tree could be properly rebuked for the absence of a quite exceptional product, the alleged phenomena, whether of neglected relics of the autumn harvest, or use of the unripe fruit, have neither of them any real bearing on the difficulty that Jesus should approach a wayside fig-tree, with the intention of staying His hunger, when, as frankly stated in the record itself, 'it was not the season of figs.'

2. The Gospel references to the fig-tree include both parables and incidents, and make allusion to phenomena both of its leafage and its fruitage. As questions arise to how great an extent the incidents may not be symbolic, parables becoming concrete in process of repetition, or even pure symbols, it is best to consider first the two instances in which the fig-tree is made the subject of undoubted parable by our Lord.

(a) The parable of the Fig-Tree (Mk 13<sup>28-29</sup> = Mt 24<sup>32-33</sup>, paraphrased and interpreted Lk 21<sup>29-31</sup>) is based on the early verdure of the tree. Its general sense is clear from Lk 12<sup>40</sup> (= Mt 10<sup>23-24</sup> text), a passage which leads to the insertion in Lk 21<sup>30</sup> of ἄκρωτες ἀγ' αὐράω (cf. 12<sup>27</sup>). The meaning is: As you judge by the softening, burgeoning twigs of the fig-tree that the harvest season is approaching, so read the signs of the times. These (ταῦτα; Mk 13<sup>29</sup>) treats the preceding context as if only remissions of the Day had been spoken of, overlooking vv. 34-37; but cf. Lk 12<sup>35-38</sup>, with Mk 13<sup>32-33</sup>; ταῦτα ταῦτα, Mt 24<sup>33</sup> is more specific but less correct) signs prove that the judgment, the gleaming of God (cf. Mk 4<sup>29</sup>, not 'the kingdom of God,' Lk 21<sup>31</sup>) is close at hand. As regards closer exegesis and criticism, we must say, with E. Schwartz ('Der verfluchte Feigenbaum' in ZNTW I, p. 81): 'Whoever would interpret with exactitude will meet with more than one difficulty.' Besides Schwartz, the reader may consult Gould, Swete, and Wellhausen, ad loc. The paraphrase of Lk. is the earliest attempt to interpret, but smooths over difficulties (note, e.g., the additions 'and all the trees,' 'the kingdom of God,' and other changes).

(b) The parable of the Barren Fig-Tree (Lk 13<sup>6-9</sup>) stands in the same eschatological context as the warning to read the signs of the times (Lk 12<sup>35-38</sup> paralleled by Mk 13<sup>35-38</sup>, 12. 18), and forms its climax. One is tempted to conjecture that the problematic 'parable' referred to in Mk 13<sup>28</sup>, Mt

This is the common prophetic doctrine of the Divine ἀρχή, the presence a time of suspension of the Divine sentence to leave opportunity for repentance.

The once favourite allegorizing method of interpretation (e.g. the gardener—the Messiah, the three years—the three (?) Passovers of Christ's public ministry) is now fortunately discredited. Yet it is incorrect, with Wellhausen (Ev. Lucae, ad loc.) to say that the fig-tree stands for the individual. Not merely is the girdled fig-tree an OT emblem of the punishment of Israel (cf. 17, cf. Lk 23<sup>31</sup>), but the parable concludes a context wherein the men of Jerusalem, overwhelmed by the fall of the tower in Siloam, and the Gallians, cut down by the sword of Pilate, are brought forward as 'signs of the times.' The warning, accordingly, is certainly against 'the overthrow of the Jewish people' (T. K. Cheyne, Exeget. Bibl. s.v. 'Fig-tree,' col. 1521). 'Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish' is not spoken of the fate of individuals, but of the common overthrow, however this may be avoided by individual repentance; cf. Mt. 13<sup>30-42</sup>=Lk. 13<sup>30-32</sup>.

3. The cursing of the fig-tree (Mk 11<sup>13-14</sup>, 20-25 = Mt 21<sup>18-22</sup>).—Parabolic symbolism is so slightly concealed under the narrative features of this story that the majority of critics are disposed to regard it as a mere endowment of the Lukan parable of the Barren Fig-tree with concrete form, just as the parable of the Good Samaritan, and others, were long treated as instances of historical fact.

In favour of this explanation are several features of the narrative and its setting.

(a) The generally admitted incorporation of Mk. by Lk. implies that the omission of Mk 11<sup>13-14</sup>, 20-25 was deliberate. The most natural explanation of it is that St. Luke regarded the story as a double of his parable, Lk 13<sup>6-9</sup>. Conversely the parable does not appear in Mt. or Mark.

(b) The withering of the tree (Mk 11<sup>20-25</sup>), a sequel of the next day after the cursing (11<sup>13-14</sup>), occupies a different position in Mt 21<sup>18-22</sup>, taking place 'on the spot.' In both Gospels this appended sequel proves itself a secondary attachment, both by its material and its language. The contents of Mk 11<sup>20-22</sup> consist in the main of two logia, torn from their proper context (cf. Mt 17<sup>20</sup>, Lk 17<sup>4</sup>, and Mt 6<sup>14-15</sup>) and characterized by non-Markan expressions (cf. 'your Father in heaven,' Mk 11<sup>20</sup>). Such loose agglomerations of stray logia are frequent in our Second Gospel (Mk 3<sup>28-29</sup>, 4<sup>11</sup>, 12, 31, 28, 33, 34-36, 9<sup>48-49</sup>, 10<sup>10-11</sup> etc.). In Mt 21<sup>18-22</sup> the language is alien (ραπαρχήνα, 'on the spot,' vv. 18, 20, occurs 17 times in Lk. and Acts, whereas Mt. and Mk. have invariably elsewhere ἐδός or ἐδέω), and the logia taken from Mk. produce duplication of Mt 17<sup>20</sup> and almost of 6<sup>14-15</sup>. By transposing the sequel into immediate juxtaposition with the cursing, and abridging Mk 11<sup>20-22</sup>, Mt. avoids one of the two interruptions of the principal narrative of the purging of the temple and its consequences (Mk 11<sup>15-18</sup>, 27-28), and heightens the marvel, but fails to remove the evidence of his own dependence afforded by the duplication of 17<sup>20</sup>, and only brings into stronger relief the supplementary and supererogatory character of the sequel.

This superfluity of Mt 11<sup>20-22</sup> is most apparent in the light of such attempted explanations as that of B. Weiss, who says: The cursing of the fig-tree was 'of course' meant by Jesus symbolically, the concrete fulfilment given it by God being without intention on Jesus' part. On this statement Wellhausen (ad loc.) comments sarcastically: 'Weiss understands him. God misunderstood him.' Nevertheless Weiss is clearly right in maintaining that the purpose of Jesus would be just as completely met if the story stopped with 11<sup>14</sup>.

But even more fatal than the superfluity of the sequel is its perversion of the real symbolism of the incident. Nothing is said of that which analogy (Mt 3<sup>10</sup>, 7<sup>16-19</sup>, Lk 13<sup>6-9</sup>) proves to be the real moral lesson; but the appended sayings are adapted to find in it mere evidence of the wonder-working power of belief. The disciples are to learn that the prayer, or even the fiat, of faith—here taken as equivalent to undoubting assurance—can set at defiance the order of nature. This, the writer understands, was the purpose of the cursing. As part of the rebuke of the disciples' half-heartedness (ἀπιστία) in the case of the epileptic boy (Mt 17<sup>22-23</sup>; cf. Lk 17<sup>9-10</sup>; 1 Co 13<sup>2</sup>), the hyperbolic saying on mountain-moving faith is justified. Adapted along with Mt 6<sup>14-15</sup> to give the moral lesson of the withering of the fig-tree, both fall to a lower plane, scarcely above that of mere thaumaturgy. The symbolism of the cursing is lost in the mere wonder of withering a tree, a needless miracle of display.

(c) Even after recognition of the unhistorical character of the addition Mk 11<sup>20-23</sup>, the incident of the cursing is still encumbered with inherent improbabilities, of which the most formidable is the imputation of hunger as the motive of Jesus' approach to the tree. It is not enough to admit that the curse must be explained, if at all, by the discovery, made upon close inspection, that the tree was empty, not only of those supposititious edible products which could not be reasonably expected, but of even the rudiments of a crop in the season, and to suggest that when Jesus arrived 'immediately the disappointment of unsatisfied hunger was lost in the moral lesson which flashed across His mind' (Post, l.c.). Change of motive is inconceivable, because hunger cannot have caused the approach. Helices of the last season's crop, if sought at all, would be sought on a tree whose still leafless branches left them in plain sight, not where they would be concealed by the foliage, if not thrust off by the new growth. So, too, of παγάρι; but the degree of starvation necessary to suggest appeasing the stomach by παγάρι at the season in question is improbable.

There remains as a historical basis for the story only the possibility that Jesus' footsteps might be attracted by the suggestion of a possible moral lesson in the precocious leafage of a wayside tree, the discovery that it covered no promise of fruit leading Him thereupon to an utterance in the vein of prophetic symbolism. Gould (Internat. Crit. Com., 'Mark,' 212) finds evidence in Hos 1<sup>9</sup>, Jn 4<sup>6-12</sup>, Mt 13<sup>20-23</sup> that 'such acted parables were not without precedent among the Jews.' More apposite might be the reference of Δε. xl. 10 to prophets in the early Church who might 'do something as an outward mystery typical of the Church (Eph 5<sup>2</sup>) because in like manner did the prophets of old time'; cf. Ac 21<sup>11</sup>. But the only real parallel in the story of Jesus is the parable (unaccompanied by any narrative of fact) of the Stater in the Fish's Mouth, Mt 17<sup>24-27</sup>. The propensity of the reader, if not of the Evangelist himself, to take this symbolic direction to Peter as implying the real execution of a miracle, shows how easily a symbolic sentence of death, directed against the fig-tree as the representative of unrepentant Israel, might be taken to imply its literal withering away.

Due consideration for all three objections leaves the question still open whether the story of Mk 11<sup>20-23</sup> records a specific utterance of this symbolic kind directed against a particular tree, on a particular occasion; or whether tradition and the Evangelist together have not simply localized between Bethphage ('Fig-town') and Jerusalem, on occasion of the supreme visitation of the latter, a visualized version of the parable Lk 13<sup>6-9</sup>.

In favour of the former view may be cited critics no less radical than H. J. Holtzmann (Hdkom. ad loc.) and J. Weiss (Das Aelteste Evangelium, p. 268). Still more pronounced is Schwartz in favour of connecting the fig-tree of Mk 11<sup>20-23</sup> and even that of Mk 13<sup>24</sup> as well, with some sun-bleached skeleton from the orchards of Bethphage, a lone relic of the siege of Titus, pointed to by Jerusalem Christians as the memorial of Jesus' warning and promise; but Schwartz would not admit a basis of fact for this early identification by tradition of 'the' fig-tree, but rather such as Cheyne instances in 'the inn' of the Good Samaritan.

The phenomena of the text indicate, however, that the process must at least precede our text of Mark. For our Evangelist the symbolic sense has already disappeared, leaving only the work of power. Before this stage of the process could be reached the parable of the Barren Fig-tree must already have been transformed by local tradition into symbolic cursing of some given tree, and the moral lesson have been subsequently eclipsed by the purely thaumaturgic interest.

More conservative criticism, while recognizing the secondary character of Mk 11<sup>20-23</sup>, and perhaps admitting the fundamental identity of the symbolic cursing with the parable whose lesson is so obviously the same, may still demand more evidence before it surrenders the possibility that our Second Evangelist retains a substantially trustworthy tradition of the actual site and occasion of the utterance.

4. The fig-tree of Nathanael (Jn 1<sup>48</sup>). Symbolism admittedly enters to so large a degree into the narrative of the Fourth Gospel (cf. e.g. Jn 9<sup>12-13</sup>), that it is not surprising if the more radical school of interpreters, looking upon it as the uniform product of an allegorizing fancy, should find in the unexplained reference of Jn 1<sup>48</sup> the suggestion of an allegorical sense, the fig-tree having the symbolic meaning of religious instruction applied in the Talmud, or even playing the part of the sacred Bo-tree (Ficus religiosa) in Buddhist legend. The fact that commentators from Schoettgen and Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. ad loc.) downwards have inferred that Nathanael was 'aut orans, aut legens, aut meditans, aut aliquod religiosum praestans' is proof that this mental association is natural; but it cannot be truly said that the Evangelist allegorizes. The words 'when thou wast under the fig-tree' are obscure, not because we fail to apply the key, but because the Evangelist has left something lacking. He utters an enigma, but gives no other clue than the recognition by Nathanael of Jesus' supernatural knowledge. He wishes the reader to guess that Jesus had here proved Himself the καρδιουργὸς λόγος (cf. Wis 15<sup>8</sup>), as in the case of the Samaritan Woman later (4<sup>17-19. 20</sup>); but he either does not trouble himself, or was unable, to relate the facts.

Cheyne indeed (Encyc. Bibl. s.v. 'Nathanael') considers the usual explanation 'hardly adequate. If it simply means, "when thou hadst retired under the shade of the fig-tree for meditation or prayer," we ask why the Evangelist did not express the Master's meaning more distinctly (contrast Jn 4<sup>19</sup>). His answer is a conjectural emendation of the Hebrew (י) in a supposititious source of the Gospel, יבקר יבקר 'when thou wast making supplication,' for יבקר יבקר יבקר 'when thou wast under the fig-tree.' But conjecture of this sort discredits itself. To every reader it is manifest that an element of the narrative is intentionally or unintentionally suppressed. If it be granted that 'the Fourth Gospel is a composite work,' it is not unreasonable to suppose its compiler to have left untranscribed that portion of his source which would have explained the allusion to the fig-tree, just as he has omitted in his story of the feeding of the multitude (6<sup>17</sup>) Jesus' motive for the miracle (logical lacuna of this character form indeed a distinctive feature of this Gospel).

If the traditional view be maintained, the Evangelist's reserve will be accounted for as reflecting the enigmatic nature of the actual dialogue, which, so far as bystanders were able to perceive, had no further explanation.

B. W. BACON.

FIRE (πῦρ except in Mk 14<sup>44</sup>=Lk 22<sup>38</sup> where φῶς occurs) is referred to in the Gospels much more frequently in a figurative than in a literal sense.

1. The allusions to literal fire are the following. (a) Those concerned with the domestic use of fire for heating and cooking. In the better houses in Palestine the rooms were warmed by charcoal fires in portable braziers; in poorer houses the wood or other fuel was burned in a hollow in the earthen floor. The fire into which the epileptic boy fell (Mt 17<sup>12</sup>=Mk 9<sup>17</sup>) would be of the latter description. The fire of coals kindled for warmth in the middle of the court of the high priest's house (Mk 14<sup>44</sup>=Lk 22<sup>38, 39</sup>, Jn 18<sup>18</sup>),* and that employed for cooking on the shore of the Lake of Galilee (Jn 21<sup>9</sup>), would be charcoal fires on the ground. (b) Fire from heaven (lightning, or something of the same kind, natural or miraculous) was a frequent form of Divine judgment in OT. One instance of this (the destruction of Sodom) is recalled in Lk 17<sup>34</sup>, and another (in the life of Elijah) prompted the feeling and suggested the question of James and John in Lk 9<sup>54</sup>.

2. The figurative references to fire are of various kinds. Since wood which was worthless for any other purpose was used as fuel, fire became an emblem of the judgment awaiting spiritual unfruitfulness (Mt 3<sup>12</sup>=Lk 3<sup>9</sup>, Mt 7<sup>19</sup>, Jn 15<sup>6</sup>). A similar idea was suggested by the burning of other worthless things, such as chaff (Mt 3<sup>12</sup>=Lk 3<sup>17</sup>) and tares (Mt 13<sup>30, 41, 42</sup>). The 'furnace of fire,' which is part of the natural imagery of the parable of the Tares, becomes, in the parable of the Drag-net, a starting expression for the destiny of the wicked (Mt 13<sup>49</sup>). Similarly we have 'eternal' (RV) or 'everlasting' (AV) fire (Mt 18<sup>8</sup> 25<sup>41</sup>), 'unquenchable' fire (Mt 3<sup>12</sup>=Lk 3<sup>17</sup>, Mk 9<sup>43, 46</sup>), and (RVm) 'the Gehenna of fire' (RV 'the hell of fire,' AV 'hell fire') in Mt 5<sup>22</sup>, Mt 18<sup>9</sup> (=Mk 9<sup>43, 45, 47</sup>). The last of these expressions is found in the same context as the other two, and gives the key to their meaning. From the OT associations of the valley of Hinnom the name Gehenna had in Christ's time been appropriated in Jewish thought for the place of the final punishment of the wicked—a place of burning and corruption, in which body as well as spirit would be tortured. In the passages above mentioned our Lord must be understood to use the popular religious language of His time, though it may have been in a less literal and more parabolic sense than usual. To the group of sayings in Mk 9<sup>43-48</sup> is attached another (Mk 9<sup>49</sup>), in which fire is the emblem of the self-discipline in this world, by which the destruction of Gehenna in the next world is to be avoided. The destructiveness of fire made the phrase 'I will send fire' a common form of prophetic Divine threatening in OT, and this phrase is taken up by Christ (Lk 12<sup>49</sup>) as expressing, in one aspect, the result of His earthly mission. Fire is used by John the Baptist as an emblem of the purity and intensity of the influence accompanying the baptism of the Holy Spirit which he foretold that Christ should bestow (Mt 3<sup>11</sup>=Lk 3<sup>16</sup>).

The eyes of the glorified Christ, as seen in the vision of the Apocalypse, are compared to a flame of fire (Rev 1<sup>14</sup> 2<sup>18</sup> 19<sup>12</sup>).

Origen (Hom. in Jer. xx. 3) has preserved the following apophthegm of Jesus: 'He who is near me is near the fire; he who is far from me is far from the kingdom.'

JAMES PATRICK.

* In Mk 14<sup>44</sup>=Lk 22<sup>38</sup> φῶς is used instead of πῦρ (cf. Lk 22<sup>32</sup>). In classical Gr. a similar use of the word is found in cases where a fire is thought of as the source of light as well as heat (so also I Mac 12<sup>29</sup>, cf. v. 28 where πῦρ is employed). Its appropriateness in both the Synoptic passages is due to the fact that it was night, and, in the Lk. passage, to the further fact that it was the blaze of the fire which revealed Peter to the maid. In both cases RV brings out the meaning by rendering πῦρ ὡς φῶς, 'in the light of the fire.'

FIRKIN (μετρητής, Jn 2<sup>6</sup> only).—An Attic liquid measure, which is generally regarded as the equivalent of the Hebrew bath (cf. LXX 2 Ch 4<sup>5</sup>), and is therefore 'able to contain seventy-two sextaries' (Jos. Ant. viii. ii. 3), accurately 71.28 pints, or approximately 9 English gallons. 'Firkin' (AV and RV)—the fourth part of a barrel containing from 32 to 36 gallons—as a translation is sufficiently exact for ordinary purposes.

Previously emptied for the ablutions of the guests, the water-pots are filled afresh. Their character and contents prove the reality of the miracle. Very effective is the touch added by the expression ἕως ἄνω, 'up to the brim,' if only in presenting a sure basis for calculating the quantity of this wedding gift. The lowest estimate of the quantity of wine must be over 12 firkins or 108 gallons; yet, had the vessels been larger they had been filled; had there been more vessels, more wine. To such lavishness there need not be imputed indiscretion. Our Lord did not give simply to meet a pressing need, or even for future use, but rather to exemplify the illimitable power of the Giver. 'It is His first miraculous sign . . . it must become the type of the fulness of grace and joy and strength which the only-begotten Son brings to the earth' (Goulet on Jn 2<sup>6</sup>).

FIRST AND LAST (ὁ πρῶτος καὶ ὁ ἔσχατος).—This title occurs three times in Rev. (17<sup>5</sup> 22<sup>13</sup>). In the first two passages it is clearly Christ who claims the title for Himself, as appears from the references to the Resurrection in the immediate contexts. In all probability the same is the case in the third passage (22<sup>13</sup>), else there is an abrupt change of the speaker three verses later (v. 18 'I, Jesus, have sent mine angel,' etc.). However, Alford and some others hold that God the Father is the speaker in 22<sup>13</sup>.

'The First and the Last' is claimed by Jehovah as a description of Himself, with slight variations in the form, in Is 41<sup>4</sup> 44<sup>6</sup> 48<sup>12</sup> (cf. also 43<sup>10</sup>). The Greek form of the title in Rev. is not identical with that given by the LXX in any of these passages, in all of which the LXX has differences representing differences in the Hebrew (41<sup>4</sup> ἐγὼ θεὸς πρῶτος, καὶ εἰς τὰ ἔσχατα ἐγὼ εἰμι; 44<sup>6</sup> ἐγὼ πρῶτος καὶ ἐγὼ μετὰ τὰ ἔσχατα; 48<sup>12</sup> ἐγὼ εἰμι πρῶτος, καὶ ἐγὼ εἰμι εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα). It is plain, however, that a supreme description of Jehovah in the OT is applied in Rev. to Christ, and the significance of the transference as regards the Christology of the book is unmistakable. Besides this, in 22<sup>13</sup>, where, as has been said, it is natural to regard Christ as the speaker, the title 'the First and the Last' stands between two others, 'the Alpha and the Omega,' 'the Beginning and the End,' the first of which is found also in 1<sup>8</sup> and 21<sup>6</sup>, and the second in 21<sup>6</sup>, in which passages the speaker may be either Christ or, as is maintained by some (Hastings' DB, vol. iv. p. 263*), God the Father, or 'God in the Undivided Unity of His Being.' It may be, therefore, that in Rev. itself we have the same supreme titles given to God the Father and to Christ. But whether this be so or not, once it is admitted that 22<sup>13</sup> is spoken by Christ, the accumulation in that verse of descriptions which could only belong to the infinite being of God emphatically marks the belief of the author of Rev. as to the nature of Christ (see Hastings' DB, vol. ii. pp. 690*, 691*, vol. iv. p. 263*).

Of the 'Thirteen Principles of the Faith,' formulated by Moses Maimonides (12th cent. A.D.), the fourth is: 'I believe with perfect faith that the Creator, blessed be His name, is the first and the last' (Authorized Daily Prayer-Book of the United Hebrew Congregations of the British Empire, p. 80). Schoettgen says that the title was also given by the ancient Jews to the Messiah (Hor. Heb. tom. ii. lib. i. 'Nominum Messie, que divinam illius naturam indignant): 'יְהוָה Primus. Ipse Deus. Jesa. xlv. 6. Ego, inquit, primus, et ego novissimus; quibus verbis eternitatem designatam voluit. Judaei vero antiqui etiam Messiam sic vocant'.

The nature of God necessarily transcends definition, but 'the First and the Last' and the parallel titles are endeavours to suggest such conceptions of God as men can comprehend. It would not be enough to say that 'the First and the Last' is the equivalent of 'the Eternal'. The title recalls the old covenant name of God, Jehovah (Jahweh), and its interpretation in Ex 3<sup>14</sup>. It seems plainly to be an expansion of that name, of which 'the Eternal' is not a satisfactory rendering. Ex 3<sup>14</sup> ('I am what I am,' or, more accurately, 'I will be what I will be') does not give to אֲנִי an abstract meaning. אֲנִי is אֲנִיְוָא, not אֵל. It does not mean to be essentially, but phenomenally. The idea of אֲנִי is not of abstract existence, but of active being; manifestation in history. Jehovah is not a God who barely exists, but One who asserts His being, and enters into an historical relation with humanity. Not being determined by anything external to (before or after) Himself, He is consistent with Himself, true to His promises, and unchangeable in His purposes. He will not fail or disappoint His servants. He will approve Himself. What He will be is left undefined, or defined only in terms of Himself, for the very reason that His providential dealings with His people in their ever-varying needs are inexhaustible—are more than can be numbered or expressed (see Driver on 'The Tetragrammaton,' Studies Biblica, Oxf. 1885; and A. B. Davidson in Hastings' DB, vol. ii. pp. 199<sup>b</sup>, 84<sup>b</sup>).

This interpretation of the Divine name is amplified in the prophets. Bultzsch on Is 41<sup>4</sup> says: 'It is the meaning of the Divine name Jehovah which is thus unfolded: (1) the Lord, the first, and with the last, I am he'; for Jehovah is God as the absolute, eternally existing, and absolutely free Ego; and, on 43<sup>10</sup> ('I am he' before me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after me); 'He is the sole realization of the idea of God inherent in human consciousness, and He is this eternally. His being has no beginning and no end, so that no other being with Divine claims and character could precede or follow Him' (cf. also 46<sup>4</sup>, 48<sup>12</sup>, 49<sup>10</sup>, 49<sup>16</sup>). These chapters again and again insist on the 'fundamental truth that God is eternally the same (as He is the only) Self-existent Personal Being.' To Him the whole range of creaturely existence in all its cycles must be visible,—and to Him only can it be so' (Speaker's Com.). The prophets emphasize the expression of the moral unchangeableness of God in the name Jehovah (see esp. Is 26<sup>4</sup>, 44, Hos 12<sup>6</sup>, Mal 2<sup>9</sup>).

It may be said, then, that the title 'the First and the Last,' as applied to Christ in Rev., recalls, and attaches to Him, all that the OT writers had realized of the nature of God. How much more it contains for a writer who uses it in the light of the Incarnation may be gathered from Col 1<sup>18-20</sup>, a passage related as resting upon the same Christological basis of faith, and which is indeed the ὁ πρῶτος καὶ ὁ ἔσχατος of Rev. written out at full length. Both authors alike claim for Christ absolute supremacy in relation to the Universe, the natural Creation, and in relation to the Church, the new Moral Creation, ὅσα γένηται ἐν πάντων αἰώνων. For both Christ is πρωτότοκος πάντων κτίσεων,—prior to all creation and sovereign over all creation. He is the source of life to the Universe, the centre of all its developments, the mainspring of all its motions—ἐν αὐτῷ ἐκτίσθη τὰ πάντα (cf. Jn 1<sup>3</sup> ὁ γέγονεν ἐν αὐτῷ τῶν ἡμῶν). And as all things had their origin in Him (the First), so all things return to Him as their goal and consummation (the Last) τὰ πάντα ἐξ αὐτοῦ καὶ εἰς αὐτὸν ἐκτίσθη (cf. Ro 11<sup>36</sup>, He 2<sup>9</sup>, where the reference is to God). All things have their sphere within the sphere of the life of Him who is 'the First and the Last.' In Him they originate and in Him they cohere—αὐτὸς ἔστι πρὸ πάντων, καὶ τὰ πάντα ἐν αὐτῷ συνέστηκεν (cf. Ac 17<sup>28</sup>, in reference to God). He is the δεσπότης of the Universe. And such also is His position in relation to the Church, the new spiritual creation—He is absolutely prior and sovereign, because there too He is the source of life. His Resurrection is the ground of His headship of the Church (Rev 1<sup>7</sup>. See Lightfoot and Meyer on Col 1<sup>18-20</sup>, cf. Eph 1<sup>3</sup>, Ph 2<sup>9-11</sup>).

It is interesting to trace the same underlying thought about the nature of God in Rev. and in the Fourth Gospel. A connexion has been pointed out between ἐγὼ εἰμι ὁ πρῶτος καὶ ὁ ἔσχατος of Rev. and the similar phrases of Is 41<sup>4</sup> 48<sup>12</sup> and the explanation of the Divine name Jehovah in Ex 3<sup>14</sup>. There seems to be a correspondence between the ἐγὼ εἰμι of the LXX in these and other passages (Is 43<sup>10, 13</sup>, Dt 32<sup>39</sup>) and the ἐγὼ εἰμι of Jn 8<sup>24, 28, 58</sup> (cf. also 13<sup>19</sup>). In all these passages the words have a pregnant meaning. In Jn 8, Christ presents Himself to the Jews not simply as the Messiah, but as One who has 'life in Himself' as being the spring of life. He is infinitely, as God is. He shares the being of God. Therefore He claims supreme control not only of the seen and the finite, but of the unseen and the infinite (see Westcott, ad loc.). Cheyne (on Is 41<sup>4</sup>) thinks that the ἐγὼ εἰμι of Jn 18<sup>5</sup> is intended in the same sense, and finds this view confirmed by the supernatural effect of the sounds described in v. 9.

All existence is necessarily relative to Him who is 'the First and the Last.' Nothing can enter into the final summing up of all things, or partake of eternity, which does not receive its life from Him and is not conformed to His purpose. When Christ claims this title for Himself, it is plainly announced that the revelation of God in Christ, in what He was and what He did, is the key to the issues of human life. Christianity is final. FIRSTBORN—

One of the fundamental ideas with regard to Jehovah in early Israel was that of His being owner of the land, and consequently lord also of all that the land brought forth and of all that lived upon it (Lv 25<sup>9</sup>, Ps 24<sup>1-2</sup>). Closely connected with this idea was a further one to the effect that the land was held in tenure; Jehovah was the landowner, His people the tenants; but their tenancy depended solely on the will of Jehovah (Dt 32<sup>9</sup> etc.). As lord of the land and giver of all that it produced, tribute was due to Him; this tribute took the form of the offering of first-fruits.† Not only, however, was the land Jehovah's possession, but the people who lived upon it, and upon its produce, were likewise His; this would follow naturally by virtue of Jehovah's overlordship. Therefore, just as Jehovah, being owner of the land, received the first-fruits of its produce as tribute due to Him, so, being also owner of the people, did He receive the firstborn as, in the same way, a tribute due to Him. This is not definitely stated in the Bible, but the notices of child-sacrifice lead us to infer that at some early period the rite of the sacrifice of the firstborn was performed, and the analogy of the offering up of the firstlings of the flock points to a similar usage with regard to man (Ex 13<sup>2</sup>, 22<sup>29</sup>, 34<sup>20</sup>); moreover, the prevalence of the practice among ethnologically allied races makes it in a high degree probable that originally the descendants of Abram sacrificed their firstborn as a tribute to the Deity (see below, 'Redemption of the firstborn'). As the firstborn are spoken of as being particularly the possession of Jehovah, one would expect to find them occupying the position of His special ministers; it is possible that this was the case originally (cf. Hannah's vow, 1 S 1<sup>11</sup>), especially as in Nu 3<sup>12</sup> it is said: 'Behold, I have taken the Levites from among the children of Israel instead of all the firstborn that openeth the womb among the children of Israel; and the Levites shall be mine' (cf. 34<sup>6</sup>); as a matter of fact, however, the earliest Code commands the redemption of the firstborn: 'All the firstborn of man among thy sons shalt thou redeem' (Ex 13<sup>15</sup>, cf. 13<sup>15</sup> 34<sup>20</sup>).

From the foregoing one can understand that the term 'firstborn,' πρωτότοκος (that which, as the most precious, belonged, in the first instance, to Jehovah), came to be one of particular honour (cf. Ex 4<sup>25</sup>, Jer 31<sup>9</sup>), and it is used as such in reference to Christ (Ro 8<sup>29</sup>, Col 1<sup>15</sup>, 18).

The only occurrence of the term in the Gospels is in Lk 2<sup>2</sup> καὶ ἔρεσκε τὸν υἱὸν τὸν πρωτότοκον,* and apart from its significance to the Jewish mind as outlined above, its importance lies in its bearing upon the question of the perpetual virginity of the mother of Christ. The term does not necessarily suggest the subsequent birth of other children; for, in the first place, as a title of honour it would naturally be mentioned in connexion with Christ by the Evangelist; and secondly, to Jews the significance of 'firstborn' lay in the special sanctity which attached to such;† this is clear from what has been said in the previous section; indeed, St. Luke directly implies as much when he quotes, in substance, from Ex 13<sup>2</sup> 12: 'Every male which openeth the womb shall be called holy to the Lord' (Lk 2<sup>23</sup>).

Redemption of the firstborn.—In the passage Lk 2<sup>23</sup> two distinct ceremonies are referred to: the presentation to the Lord, and the redemption; the former of these implies the actual dedication of the child to God (cf. 1 S 1<sup>28</sup>); from what has been said above, this ceremony must be regarded as fulfilling in spirit of the primitive act of literally devoting (sacrificing) the firstborn son to the Deity. The distinction between the two ceremonies may be illustrated by the practice of modern orthodox Jews. The father of the child first presents his firstborn to the cohen, and makes a declaration ending with the words: 'It is said, sanctify unto me all the firstborn, whatsoever openeth the womb among the children of Israel, both of man and of beast; it is mine.' This is a definite act of presentation to God, of renunciation on the part of the father,—the child is no longer his. This part of the ceremony corresponds to Lk 2<sup>23</sup> 27, 28. Then the father places fifteen shillings (five selaim or shekels) before the cohen, who thereupon asks: 'Which wouldst thou rather, give me thy firstborn son, the firstborn of his mother, ‡ or redeem him for five selaim, which thou art bound to give according to the Law?' The father replies: 'I desire rather to redeem my son, and here thou hast the value of his redemption, which I am bound to give according to the Law; §' This ceremony corresponds to Lk 2<sup>24</sup>. ¶ This redemption of the firstborn (לִּפְדוֹת בְּרִיָּה) took place thirty days after birth (Lk 2<sup>22</sup>; cf. Lv 12<sup>4</sup>, Nu 18<sup>16</sup>),** and the price of redemption was, according to Nu 3<sup>47</sup> 18<sup>16</sup>, five shekels; in Ex 13<sup>15</sup> the command to redeem the firstborn is given, though the price of redemption is not mentioned, while in Lv 12 there is no mention at all regarding the redemption of the firstborn, reference being made only to an atone-

* In Mt 1<sup>25</sup> πρωτότοκος is read by DC and the OL version only; it must therefore be rejected in this passage.

† Cf. He 1<sup>4</sup>, where πρωτότοκος means 'only-begotten.'

‡ The law of the redemption of the firstborn 'applies to the firstborn of the mother and not of the father. Hence the husband of several wives would have to redeem the firstborn of each one of them, while the husband of a woman who had had children by a previous marriage need not redeem her child although it was his firstborn' (Jewish Encyclopedia, v. 308). Moreover, the first male child of a woman need not be redeemed if a female child has been born before him.

§ The money is sometimes returned, but the Jewish authorities do not look upon this with favour.

¶ See The Authorized Daily Prayer-Book (ed. S. Singer), pp. 308, 309.

** According to Ex 13<sup>15</sup> the redemption of the firstborn was instituted as an abiding act of thanksgiving to Jehovah for having spared the firstborn males of the children of Israel in Egypt. Concerning the connexion between the offering of the firstborn and the Passover, see Nowack, op. cit. § 99.

*** The same custom is kept up by modern orthodox Jews; if the day falls on a Sabbath or a Holy Day, the ceremony is performed on the following day.

ment which has to be made for the purification of the mother; it may be owing to Lv 12 that in Lk 2<sup>22</sup> 'their' purification is spoken of, i.e. of the child as well as of the mother; at any rate v. 24 seems to point to an amalgamation of the offerings due from the mother for purification, and on behalf of the child for redemption,* in the modern service of prayer of thanksgiving for women after recovery from childbirth no provision is made for any offering.

FIRST-FRUITS.—On the offering of first-fruits as a Jewish institution see Hastings' DE, vol. ii. p. 10 f.

The word rendered first-fruits (ἀπαρχή) occurs 8 times in the NT, and only in 1 Co 15<sup>20</sup>. 23 is it applied directly to our Lord: 'Now hath Christ been raised from the dead, the first-fruits of them that are asleep'; 'Christ the first-fruits; then they that are Christ's.' It is possible, as some have suggested, that there is a reference in v. 20 to the specific offering of the sheaf of the first ripe corn on the second day of the Passover feast (Lv 23<sup>10</sup>, 11). The coincidence of our Lord's resurrection on the 16th Nisan—the day on which the sheaf was offered before the Lord—would no doubt suggest the idea of the first-fruits to the Apostle's mind. But, even apart from this specific reference, the figure of the risen Christ as the first-fruits from the dead is perfectly natural. And there is more here than might be at first supposed. Christ's resurrection is the pledge of His people's resurrection, just as the first-fruits were the pledge of the harvest to come. Christ is the first to be raised from the dead, and so stands in the front rank alone, as the first-fruits were plucked before the rest of the produce was ripe; but, just as certainly as the harvest in due time followed the first-fruits, so shall those who sleep in Christ be raised up in due time, and stand in the second rank after Him. But, further, it is clearly implied here, and explicitly taught in other passages, that as is Christ the first-fruits, so shall be the rest of the harvest. There is implied here a community of nature and character between Christ, the first-fruits, and His people. It is only the time of their manifestation that is different. The portion gathered as first-fruits is of the same nature as the rest, and the rest is of the same nature and character and standing as the first-fruits. This is indicated specially in v. 21, where it is said that, as death came by man, so it is only by man that the resurrection can come, i.e. resurrection and triumph over death can be man's possession only when given him by one who is man like himself. Man, therefore, must be of the same nature and character and standing as Christ, the first-fruits. What is suggested here is plainly taught elsewhere (Col 3<sup>4</sup>, Ro 8<sup>29</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>). Christ, according to these passages, is the first-fruits, the firstborn among many brethren, not only as the pledge that, as He rose, so His people shall rise from the dead, but also that as He is, in nature and character, so shall His people be. That is, perhaps, the most glorious promise of the resurrection first-fruits.

In Ro 8<sup>23</sup> the first-fruits of the Spirit received by Christ's people are referred to. That they have received the Spirit in some measure and have been sanctified inwardly, is the pledge that they shall receive it in yet greater abundance, that there shall be a final outpouring of the Spirit by which the body of man shall be redeemed even as the spirit has been sanctified—the psychical body being changed into a spiritual. In Ro 11<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>16</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>16</sup>, Ja 1<sup>16</sup>, Rev 14<sup>16</sup> the reference is to the future redemption of mankind, of which those already gathered in are the first-fruits and pledge. Those already redeemed and presented to God as holy are the first-fruits, the pledge of the coming harvest of a holy redeemed humanity.

FISH, FISHER, FISHING.—The present article is not concerned with the fish of the Mediterranean, nor with those which inhabit various watercourses in the Holy Land, nor even with those that belong to the lower course of the Jordan or of its southern tributaries, or of the other streams that flow into the Dead Sea. The only fish mentioned in the Gospels, the only ones, consequently, which come within the scope of this Dictionary, are those of the Lake of Gennesaret, to which we naturally add those that are found in the upper course of the Jordan or in the springs in the neighbourhood of the Lake.

Fish (OT  $\text{דָּג}$ ,  $\text{דִּשְׁתָּה}$ ) are designated in the NT only by the general term  $\text{ἰχθύς}$ , alternating occasionally with its diminutive  $\text{ἰχθυόδιον}$ , without the employment of the latter term necessarily marking any intended distinction; cf. for an instance in point, Mt 15<sup>24</sup> with v. 28. Nowhere in the whole Bible do we find a special name for a definite species of fish. Fish formed a large part of the food of the Lakeside population. This may be inferred from the threefold question of Jesus (Lk 11<sup>11</sup>, cf. Mt 7<sup>12</sup>), in which the commonest foods are enumerated: bread, fish, eggs. The same conclusion is implied in what is related with reference to the two multiplications of the loaves. On the occasion of the first (Mt 14<sup>13-21</sup>, Mk 6<sup>30-44</sup>, Lk 9<sup>10-17</sup>, Jn 6<sup>1-13</sup>) it is said that there was present a lad with five loaves and two fishes; in the account of the second (Mt 15<sup>28-39</sup>, Mk 8<sup>1-10</sup>) it is mentioned that, in addition to the seven loaves, there were also 'a few small fishes.' We may cite, further, Lk 24<sup>42</sup>.

It is interesting to note that for the 'small fishes' of the other narratives the Fourth Gospel employs the term  $\text{ἰχθυόδιον}$ , which properly signifies simply 'nourishment,' 'food.' Bochart (Hieroz. I. p. 41) has already shown that this word was employed in the same way by the best Greek writers, e.g. Plato, Menander, etc., and that  $\text{ἰχθυόδιον}$  is met with as synonymous with 'fish-eaters.'

It is legitimate to suppose that a trade in fish was carried on between the Lake of Tiberias and the rest of the country. The name of the town of Taricheae ( $\text{Ταρχαῖαι}$ ), situated on the shore of the Lake, implies a business connected with salted provisions ( $\text{ἰσχυρῶς}$ ). It may be that this traffic extended as far as Jerusalem; some have supposed that it was in this way that one of Jesus' disciples, the companion of Simon Peter, was known to the high priest (Jn 18<sup>15</sup>); but this is nothing more than an ingenious conjecture.

'Fisher' or 'fisherman' (Heb.  $\text{יָשֵׁר}$ ) is expressed in the NT by  $\text{ἀλιεύς}$  or  $\text{ἀλιεὺς}$ ; the verb 'to fish' by  $\text{ἀλιεῖν}$ . Several of the first and principal disciples followed the calling of fishermen. The Synoptics describe the scene when Jesus called them to follow Him (Mt 4<sup>18-22</sup>, Mk 1<sup>16-20</sup>, Lk 5<sup>1-11</sup>). These three narratives contain the promise, 'I will make you fishers of men.' Lk. connects the story with the miraculous draught; cf. in this respect also Jn 21<sup>8-11</sup>. In one of the parables of the Kingdom (Mt 13<sup>47-50</sup>) Jesus compares the latter to a net; and the separation which the fishermen make, in their catch, between what is good and what is bad, is used to symbolize the separation of the righteous from the wicked at the Final Judgment. The criterion by which good and bad fish are distinguished is not expressly indicated. The point in view might be the difference between clean and unclean foods as defined by the Law (cf. Dt 14<sup>11</sup>, Lv 11<sup>10</sup>); but there might be other motives, such as those which Lortet indicates in the case of modern fishermen, who reject certain fish on account of their inferior size (Poissons et Reptiles du lac de Tiberiade, p. 52), their disagreeable aspect (ib. pp. 32, 82), or their unpleasant muddy flavour (ib. pp. 35, 58, 64).

The fishermen sometimes carried on their trade in partnership, as is still the case at the present day, when the fishermen of Tiberias form a kind of corporation with fixed rules. The number of fishing vessels on the Lake at the beginning of the Christian era must have been very considerable. Josephus (JF II. xxi. 8) speaks of 330 (v.l. 230); see also Mk 4<sup>13</sup>, Jn 6<sup>10</sup>. Forty years ago Furrer found only a single boat; Lortet saw three in 1875 and six in 1880; Frei counted nine in 1886, and the present writer saw the same number in 1894, while in 1899 he noted fourteen; and no doubt the number has increased since then.

The fishermen made use of nets. One of the Greek terms employed (Mt 13<sup>2</sup>) is  $\text{αἰγάριον}$ , seine, 'drag-net,' a large net which two or more boats arrange in a circle in the lake, in such a way as to enclose a vast space with a kind of vertical wall. It is kept stretched by means of weights and floats. Then the two extremities are brought together, and the whole with its contents is dragged ashore. The other species of net mentioned in the Gospels (Mt 4<sup>12</sup>) is the casting net ( $\text{ἀμφίβλητρον}$ ), which a single man throws with a skilful turn of the hand, and which is of circular form, like an umbrella. Once it has been plunged in the water it is drawn out with the captured fish. This is still the method most frequently pursued in our own time. The other passages where nets are spoken of (Mt 4<sup>20</sup>, Mk 1<sup>16</sup>, Lk 5<sup>2-8</sup>, Jn 21<sup>8-11</sup>) use the general term  $\text{ἄκρονον}$ , which might be applied to any kind of net. Some texts speak of washing and of mending nets (Lk 9<sup>3</sup>, Mt 4<sup>2</sup>, Mk 1<sup>9</sup>). See also NETS.

The Gospels only once mention line-fishing, namely in Mt 17<sup>27</sup>, where we read of Peter casting the hook ( $\text{ἀγκίστρον}$ ), which was certainly placed at the end of a cord or line, but we cannot say whether the latter was attached to a rod or long reed or was simply held in the hand. In the NT there is no mention of harpooning fish (contrast Job 41<sup>7</sup> [He 40<sup>21</sup>]). At the present day we still meet with examples of this practice.

The waters of the Lake of Tiberias are exceptionally rich in fish, especially by the shore of el-Batīha (to the east of the mouth of the Jordan, and in the bay of el-Tabigha. These were in former times the favourite grounds of fishermen, and these spots are still preferred by them in our own day. There, on the shore of el-Batīha lay Bethsaida-Julias; and, if there were two Bethsaias (a much controverted question; see art. BETHSAIDA and CAPERNAÛM), the second was at el-Tabigha or in its vicinity. Now Bethsaida means 'house of fish,' 'fishery.' It was the native town of Peter and Andrew, of James and John,—all four fishermen,—as well as of Philip, whose occupation is unknown to us. According to Jn 21<sup>2</sup> Thomas and Nathaniel (of Cana) appear also to have been fishermen, at least occasionally. The dress of the fishermen was more than simple; according to Jn 21<sup>7</sup> Peter was  $\text{γυμνός}$ , 'naked'; it is not quite easy to see why so many exegetes maintain that this term does not imply complete nudity. It is certainly most natural to suppose that Peter had discarded all his clothes; the fact that he afterwards hastily girds on his  $\text{ἐσθῆδόνην}$ , lit. his 'upper garment,' does not necessarily prove that he was wearing another under it.

The fish of the Lake of Tiberias have been minutely studied and described by two experts, Dr. Lortet, dean of the Faculty of Medicine at Lyons, and Dr. Tristram. Out of 39 (Lortet) or 43 (Tristram) species known in Palestine, from 22 to 24 are found in the Lake of Tiberias and its immediate vicinity. They belong to a number of different genera. The genus Chromis has the richest representation of species: Niloticus, Tiberiadicus, Androea, Simonis, Microstomus, Flavii-Josephi, Magdalensis; belonging to a genus near of kin is Hemichromis Sacra. These fish are the most abundant and make the best eating. The genus Barbus is also extremely prolific; three species belonging to it are found: Canis, which swarms, but is little appreciated; Longiceps, esteemed; and Beldomii, rare. Then, in the family of the Cyprinidae come Discognathus Lamta; four species of Cyprata: Syriaca, Damaecina, Socialis, Sauvagei; Leuciscus (or Phoxinellus) Zeregi; Alburnus Sellal; Acanthocharax Centiguama; three species of Nemachilus: Tygris, Galileus, Leontina. In the family of the Dioninidae: Blenius Favus and Blenius Lupulus. Finally, in the family of the Siluridae we have the strange Clarias Macracanthus, already noted by Josephus (B. J. III. x. 8) under the name καρκίνος, which, in spite of its forbidding aspect, supplies an article of food not to be disdained. This fish has the strange peculiarity that, when it is withdrawn from its natural element, it utters cries like the mewings of a cat, and that it can live for several days out of the water.

A considerable number of the above species belong properly to Palestine, but the fauna of Palestinian fish shows, nevertheless, a close connexion with that of Africa and not with that of the Mediterranean basin. The ancients, e.g. Josephus, had already noted this fact, and they raised the question of the possibility of a subterranean communication between the waters of Egypt and those of Palestine. FLAX.—See SMOKING FLAX.

FLESH (σάρξ).—In every instance where this word is used by the Evangelists we observe that it is confined in its reference to the human race. The same remark, it may be noticed, holds good of the NT writers as a whole (cf., however, 1 Co 15<sup>50</sup>, and the plural σάρκες of Rev 19<sup>18</sup>). The particular conception attaching to it varies in different contexts to a slight extent, though in almost every case a distinction or contrast is either stated or implied which has its roots in OT thought. It is interesting to remark that this is a word employed very rarely by St. Luke in either of his writings; and even when he does use it, we find that, for the most part, he is quoting from the OT (see Lk 3<sup>3</sup> = Is 40<sup>6</sup> [LXX], where in conjunction with πᾶσα it is simply a synonym for all mankind; cf. Mt 24<sup>22</sup>, Mk 13<sup>36</sup>, Jn 17<sup>2</sup>, and Ac 2<sup>31</sup>). The reference, of course, is to the human race in its present condition of weakness and need of help, as contrasted with the power and the active love of God (cf. Dt 5<sup>29</sup>, Ps 56<sup>4</sup> [55<sup>2</sup> LXX]).

In the only other place where the word is found in St. Luke's Gospel (24<sup>39</sup>) we have it used simply to denote the substance flesh considered as a constituent of the human body. The risen Jesus is represented as inviting His disciples to assure themselves by touching Him that He had risen not merely in a spiritual, but in a corporeal sense. The antithesis is that of 'spirit' and 'body' (πνεῦμα and σῶμα), the latter consisting of 'flesh' and 'bones' (σάρξ and ὀστά). See art. BODY.

A still more emphatic expression signifying the distinction between man and God is found in St. Matthew's Gospel (16<sup>17</sup>), where σάρξ is joined with αἷμα to denote man in his present condition of spiritual limitation and of defective knowledge. A somewhat similar antithesis is incidentally, albeit elaborately, pointed out by St. John (1<sup>13</sup>), who, in his reference to the new life communicated through Christ to believers, lays stress on the fact that this higher life is not the result of human birth, whether the latter be considered as the outcome of a long line of descent (ἐκ αἱμάτων), or as springing from natural instinct inherent in the flesh (ἐκ θελήματος σαρκός), or even as the resultant of the will power resident in the entire man (ἐκ θελήματος ἀνδρός). Their infused life has its roots in Him who is the source of all life (· · · ἀπ' ἐκ θεοῦ γεννηθεῖσα), and is conditioned in every instance by their reception of the Word made flesh (ὅσα ἐκ θαλάσσης αὐτῶν, see Westcott, Gospel of St. John, ad loc., who notices a very early variant reading which would make 'the Word' the subject of the whole verse).

Another form of this antithetic relationship occurs in the same writing. In His conversation with Nicodemus Jesus draws attention to the limitations which surround the functions of man's nature considered on its sensuous side (ἐκ τῆς σαρκός), and those of the Spirit which finds scope for activity within another sphere of human life (ἐκ τοῦ πνεύματος). It is not the antithesis of evil and good that is here referred to. It is simply that within the realm of man's being there are two principles of energy which take their origin from two orders of existence. The law of nature which compels like to produce like holds good in man's complex life, and so 'What is born of the flesh is flesh, and what is born of the Spirit is spirit' (Jn 3<sup>6</sup>). With this we may compare another passage in the same Gospel where this idea is expressed in language more explicit still and as emphatic (Jn 6<sup>62</sup>). The contrast here between spirit, which not only has life in itself but can communicate that life as it wills (τὸ ζωοποιεῖν), and flesh, which 'is of no avail' above its own sphere (ἡ σὰρξ οὐκ ἀφελεῖ οὐδέν), is categorically asserted.

So, too, on another occasion when engaged in controversy with the Pharisees, Jesus contrasts their method of judging with His own patience in that respect, and in so doing implies a further contrast—their imperfect and therefore incorrect judgment (κατὰ τὴν σάρκα) which is based on a superficial knowledge, and His just judgment which comes from His 'knowledge of all the circumstances, and aspects, and issues of life' (ἡ κρίσις ἡ ἐκ τῆς ἀληθείας ἐστίν, Jn 8<sup>24</sup>; see Westcott, Gospel of St. John, ad loc.).

Arising out of this conception we have the word employed to mark a psychological distinction between man's flesh and spirit. So real was this distinction to the mind of Jesus that we can almost hear in His words (Mt 26<sup>41</sup>=Mk 14<sup>38</sup>) the echo of personal experience (· · · ἠρηγοροῦμαι μετ' ἐμοῦ . . . τὸ μὲν πνεῦμα πρόθυμον ἢ δὲ σὰρξ ἀσθενής). In this place we may also notice that there was something present in the struggle engaged in by the disciples which was absent in the case of Jesus. They were unsuccessful in their efforts to 'watch,' because not only was their flesh 'weak,' but it had also to contend with an element of discord which further distracted their power for unremitting watchfulness. With Him was also present the flesh of weakness (see 2 Co 13<sup>4</sup> ἐξ ἀσθενείας), but the relationship between His σάρξ and πνεῦμα was not perverted by the indwelling presence of sin, or by the downward tendency inherited as the result of sin.

On one occasion Jesus quotes with approval the translation of the LXX (Gn 2<sup>24</sup>) where the word σάρξ occurs meaning the entire man (Mt 19<sup>26</sup> = Mk 10<sup>18</sup>), and that without any qualifying word. It would be a colorless interpretation of Jesus' words which would limit His teaching on the marriage relationship to a physical oneness following on and produced by the sexual union. The Hebraistic ἐστὶν εἰς (Heb. 7<sup>10</sup>) implies a gradual movement from a physical union to a higher and more complex unity, so that where two separate beings formerly existed there is now but one (ὁμοῦ ἐστὶν εἰς, ἀλλὰ σὰρξ μία, which is Jesus' inference from the Heb. 7<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>11</sup>; see art. EUNUCH). It is because of the ultimately complete and spiritual character of this union that the sin which dissolves it and the human legislation which seeks to render it nugatory assume their dark proportions (cf. Gould, 'St. Mark' in Internat. Crit. Com. on Mk 10<sup>24</sup>).

Passing from the Synoptic to the Johannine use of this word, we find its clothing conceptions which are fuller and richer. In the simple but majestic sentence in which he announces the profound mystery of the Incarnation, St. John employs the word 'flesh' to express the totality of human nature, looked at on the side of its manifold limitations, that is to say, as it touches and is connected with the world of matter and of time (ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο, Jn 1<sup>14</sup>, with which we may compare the positive references to 'the soul' and 'the spirit' of Jesus in the same writing, e.g. 12<sup>27</sup> ἡ ψυχὴ μου, 13<sup>3</sup> τὸ πνεῦμα, etc.). The phrase 'the Word became flesh' implies the existence of an antithesis which has been reduced in its elements to a final and permanent synthesis. The Johannine conception leaves no room for doubt as to the perfection of the human nature of Jesus, which is universal both as regards time and race.

Keeping in mind this usage, we shall be enabled to apprehend more fully the thought underlying the language of Jesus about His power of imparting Himself in His perfect humanity (cf. Jn 6<sup>51-56</sup>). His 'flesh,' by virtue of its union with His Divine Personality, is 'living' (ὁ ζῶν) food, and therefore possesses the power of communicating its life to all who will eat thereof (ἐάν τις φάγη τὴν σάρκα, κ. τ. λ.). Without this participation and consequent assimilation on the part of His followers, there can be no such thing as 'life' within them, for they deliberately reject what contains for them the germinal principle of that 'life' (ὅτι ἔχετε ζῶντα ἐν ἑαυτοῖς).

The question may be asked whether it is possible to trace any likeness or fundamental connexion between the Gospel and the Pauline uses of σάρξ. In St. Paul's writings very marked emphasis is laid upon this word, and for him it clothes a conception rich with ethical significance. The 'flesh' is the present abode of sin, which requires an obedient subject to execute its behests. So closely does he connect the power of sin with the existing weakness of the flesh that he does not hesitate to say from his own experience 'I know that in . . . my flesh dwelleth no good thing' (Ro 7<sup>5</sup>). At the same time, he is careful to point out that this is not the state appointed for man by God. The 'crucifixion' of the flesh is possible for every man who wishes to walk not 'according to the flesh' but 'according to the Spirit' (οἱ . . . τῆς σαρκὸς ἐσταθώσαντες, κ. τ. λ., Gal 5<sup>24</sup>, cf. Ro 8<sup>4</sup>), and those who have the indwelling presence of the Spirit are no longer in the flesh (ἐν σαρκί) but in the Spirit (ἐν πνεύματι, Ro 8<sup>9</sup>). With these we may compare such expressions as 'the mind of the flesh' (φρόνημα τῆς σαρκός) and 'the mind of the Spirit' (φρόνημα τοῦ πνεύματος, Ro 8<sup>6</sup>; ἐν τῷ πνεύματι, Col 2<sup>10</sup>), from which we can gather how present to St. Paul's mind was the connexion between sin and the flesh, and at the same time how strong within him was the glorious hope that such connexion in the ultimate result was abnormal and destined for destruction. There is no sign in the Pauline terminology that he was influenced in his theological conceptions by the spirit of that Greek dualism which wormed its way into subsequent Christian thought with lasting and for the most part evil consequences (see Müller, Christian Doctr. of Sin, l. 320 ff.).

The redemption and the quickening of the body (τὸ σῶμα ἐκλήρωσεν τοῦ σώματος, Ro 8<sup>29</sup>; . . . ζωοποιήσει τὰ θνητὰ σώματα, Ro 8<sup>31</sup>; cf. 6<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>11</sup>) are features essential to the scheme of salvation as outlined and systematized by St. Paul. The condemnation of sin 'in the flesh' by God, who for this purpose sent His Son 'in the likeness of the flesh of sin' (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>), is evidence that there is, for him, no naturally essential connexion between the flesh and evil.

We are not without signs that this is just the point of view from which the Evangelists looked at this question (cf. Jn 1<sup>14</sup> 1<sup>17</sup>, Lk 8<sup>14</sup> 14 = Mt 6<sup>7</sup>), and that neither they nor the Apostle of the Gentiles were touched by that false belief which identified sin with matter, and, therefore, with 'the body of the flesh' (cf. Col 1<sup>21</sup>). The anthropology of the Gospels, as well as the psychological conceptions which emerge but rarely and incidentally from their pages, are essentially Hebrew, and are never stained by the potential immoralities which characterized the later Alexandrian and Hellenistic theology.

FLIGHT.—The story of the flight of the Holy Family into Egypt is peculiar to the First Gospel (Mt 2<sup>13-23</sup>). The omission of it, and also of the manifestation to the Gentiles (Mt 2<sup>12</sup>), from the Third Gospel is surprising, since there rather than in Mt. we should have expected to find any story that brought Jesus into contact with the Gentile world. The surprise would deepen into suspicion were it not that the records of the Evangelists are so fragmentary; but that fact instantly relieves the strain.

O. Holtzmann, who cites the well-known omission in Ac 9<sup>10-26</sup> of any reference to St. Paul's journey to Arabia (Gal 1<sup>7</sup>), frankly states that 'the author who left out this journey of Paul to Arabia might well pass over, in his other account, the journey of the Holy Family into Egypt,' and that 'if we had in Matthew an account absolutely above criticism, it would not be difficult to get over the gap in the narrative of Luke' (Life of Jesus, p. 86).

The silence of St. Luke does not, then, discredit the narrative of St. Matthew. But their records might prove to be mutually exclusive, so that acceptance of the one would involve rejection of the other. How stand the facts? According to the Third Gospel, Nazareth was, prior to their marriage, the home both of Joseph and of Mary (Lk 2<sup>19</sup>), whereas St. Matthew (2<sup>23</sup>) first associates them with Nazareth after their return from Egypt, and gives no hint of any previous residence there. Further, St. Matthew, having told the story of the Nativity (1<sup>18-25</sup>), goes on to record the visit of the Magi (2<sup>1-12</sup>), the hurried flight from Bethlehem and the sojourn in Egypt (2<sup>13-18</sup>), whereas St. Luke records merely the circumcision of the child (2<sup>2</sup>) and His presentation to the Lord (2<sup>22</sup>), and then adds that 'when they had performed all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee, to their own city Nazareth' (28). From those words one would naturally infer that the return took place immediately after the events thus recorded, and that no room was left for the episodes of the First Gospel. Is that inference necessary, or even well founded? If the narrative of Acts must be so adjusted as to take in the sojourn of St. Paul in Arabia, he would be a bold critic who would maintain that the terms of the other narrative inevitably exclude the sojourn in Egypt. It is to be noted also that the timetable of the First Gospel is sufficiently elastic to embrace easily the events recorded in the Third. For we find there that, 'according to the time which he had carefully learned of the wise men,' Herod's inhuman edict included all the children in Bethlehem 'from two years old and under' (Mt 216).

The difficulty, therefore, is not one of chronology. Even if it were, such an objection would lose both point and edge in the hands of those who used it, except on the theory that Jesus was, after all, born in Bethlehem. For, even granting that the immediate return to Nazareth is the natural inference from St. Luke's account, yet the force of any argument based upon it fails the very moment that Nazareth and not Bethlehem is made the scene of the Nativity. On that showing, St. Luke's story is itself untrustworthy, and so cannot be used to discredit another story which is inconsistent with it.

The real difficulty is of quite a different sort: it is that we have not in St. Matthew 'an account absolutely above criticism.' It might very pertinently be asked if we have any right to expect such an account. Stories of the childhood of a great man are never written while he is still a child, but only after he has achieved greatness; and even then they are written, not necessarily because of their own intrinsic importance, but because they have caught some of the glory of the afterglow. Now, it was not until Jesus had already won His place in the hearts of men that our Gospels were written. In the circumstances of the case, therefore, these records could not be other than fragmentary, and a fragmentary account can never be 'absolutely above criticism.'

But presumably the special criticism to which these incidents of the Infancy lie open, is that they are no more entitled to belief than, say, those recorded in the Apocryphal Gospels. The Gospel of the Infancy, e.g., weaves around the Flight into Egypt a fantastic garland of miracle and wonder. This wreath of fairy tales is by common consent stripped off and laid aside as unhistorical embellishment. Should not the Flight itself be laid with them as equally unworthy of credence? The question opens up a subject much too large to be discussed here. But one may at least ask if it is not too drastic a measure to destroy the ship because one has had to remove the barnacles, or to remove the peg because a worthless coat has been hung on it. Are these narratives so much of a piece that, if we reject some of them, we must reject all? Surely the fact is not without significance that the Evangelist preserves the story of the Flight, but records none of the marvels that have clustered round it. For if these other stories were extant when he wrote, he must have been cognizant of them, and his rejection of them must have been deliberate. On the other hand, if they were of a later growth, his tradition is thereby marked as older and, to that extent, more trustworthy.

But, says Keim (Life of Jesus, ii. 94), 'it bears all the marks of a poetic picture.' Is there, then, no poetry in real life? If a story is poetic, is it thereby branded as unhistorical? 'Intertwined with the narrative is a no less than threefold revelation by an angel, almost too much for the thrift of heaven.' The objection would be valid in the case of a story written in modern times by a man of the West, but is shorn of its force when one remembers that this story was written by an Oriental some eighteen centuries ago.

Much more apposite is the contention that 'the enormous toil of such a journey with a little child, was such as only legend, aided or not by miracles, could easily get over.' The toilsomeness of the journey is not denied; no one imagines that it was 'easily got over.' May not our Lord's own words (Mt 24<sup>14</sup>, Mk 13<sup>13</sup>) be an echo of the hardships Joseph and Mary had to endure in bearing Him to a place of refuge? But the cogency of Keim's argument vanishes when we remember that this was a flight for life (see INNOCENTS). In such circumstances, hardships are little accounted. But 'they might have found a nearer refuge among the Arabs of the south or west.' Surely this criticism is singularly inept. A temporary and brief refuge might thus have been found, but no one knew how long it would be ere the wanderers could safely return to their own land. What was needed was an asylum in which they could quietly abide till all danger was past, and where Joseph could find employment which would enable him to provide for his household.

Equally beside the mark is the attempt to explain the story as in some way parallel to the sojourn of Moses in Egypt. The two stories are rich, not in resemblance, but in contrast: they have absolutely nothing in common save the word 'Egypt.' The attempt to derive the one from the other is a triumph of misdirected ingenuity. Quite as little avails the expedient of deducing the narrative from the prophecy of Hosea (11<sup>1</sup>), as O. Holtzmann would evidently do. 'For the story about the Lord's childhood the Gospel of Matthew seems to have drawn principally upon certain indications in the Old Testament (Life of Jesus, p. 89). One can readily enough understand how a Jewish Christian might see in the narrative of the Flight a richer fulfilment of the prophet's words, but it is almost incredible that the incident should be invented as a commentary on the words, and all the more so when the words in question are not a prophecy, but a historical reference. Still less credible does the suggestion become when we find that we should require to believe not merely that the Flight was invented to explain the prophecy, but further that the Massacre of the Innocents had next to be invented to explain the Flight, and the visit of the Magi to explain the Massacre. Acceptance of such a theory involves a much larger draft on one's credulity than does acceptance of the incident itself as historical.

The question may still arise, What motive led the Evangelist to record this event? Need we seek for any motive? He wanted to tell about Jesus: would it not be enough for him that this was a story of the childhood of the loved Master, and that he believed it to be authentic?

'Egypt has, in all ages, been the natural place of refuge for all who were driven from Palestine by distress, persecution, or discontent' (Farrar, Life of Christ, ch. iv.). It need create no surprise, therefore, that it was towards Egypt the fugitives bent their steps. There they would be without Herod's jurisdiction and beyond the reach of his vengeance; the road was a well-known one, and some three days would suffice to bring them to the frontier. Of the incidents of the journey we have no reliable information, nor are we told in what part of Egypt the wanderers at length found rest and refuge. Tradition has assigned this distinction to Matarieh (the ancient Heliopolis), which lies a few miles north-east from Cairo; and there is no good reason why the tradition may not be correct. It is known that in that neighbourhood there was a considerable Jewish population. That fact would have undoubtedly weight with Joseph, as it held out to him the prospect of obtaining suitable employment. The duration of the sojourn in Egypt has been very variously stated, some reckoning it as having extended over one, two, three, or even seven years. But we may take it as certain that it was in reality very brief, seeing the death of Herod occurred very shortly after the period at which the Flight must have taken place. See also art. EGYPT.

HUGH DUNCAN.

FLOCK, FOLD.—For a general treatment of these words see SHEEP, SHEPHERD. But it may be noted here that, whereas in Jn 10<sup>1-16</sup> we find in AV 'fold' three times ('he that entereth not by the door into the sheep-fold'; and 'other sheep I have which are not of this fold'; then also 'I must bring, and . . . there shall be one fold and one shepherd'), there is in the original a marked distinction. Two words, absolutely unconnected with each other, are employed. In v. 1, and in the first clause of v. 16, the Greek word is ἀθήνη—'enclosure,' 'court,' 'fold,' in the strict sense. It is the word used of the enclosed court of the high priest's palace (Mt 26<sup>6</sup>, Mk 14<sup>6</sup>, Lk 22<sup>6</sup>, Jn 18<sup>15</sup>), of the strong man's palace (Lk 11<sup>21</sup>), and of the outer court of the Temple (Rev 11<sup>2</sup>). In using this word our Lord seems to refer to those 'walls of partition' (cf. Eph 2<sup>14</sup>) which separated the Jews from the Gentiles and made them a nation by themselves. Within this Jewish fold (ἀθήνη), our Lord tells us that, at the time when He spoke, He had a number of sheep who were His own; and also that, outside of it, among the Gentiles, dark and miserable as their condition was, He had other sheep, who were His already, and were known to Him, even if they knew it not themselves. These, too, He announces, He must bring, and put them along with His Jewish-born sheep; 'and,' He adds, 'there shall be one flock (He uses here the other word ποίμνη), one shepherd.' He does not say there will be 'one fold' (ἀθήνη), or, indeed, any fold at all. He has unity in view for His sheep—unity; but not such as is to be secured by the erection round His flock of such outwardly-enclosing, or constraining 'walls of partition'—geographical or racial—as had hitherto divided nation from nation and Jew from Gentile. The union wherof He speaks is to be the union of a flock, which is kept together on the one hand by its own instinct of gregariousness, or the mutual affection of the members, and on the other hand by its common subjection to its 'one Shepherd,' who loves it, died for it, and whom through all its members it knows. It does not, however, follow that this unity is not a visible unity. The unity of the flock, as it moves along the road under its shepherd's guidance, is just as visible to the beholder as the unity of the fold whose white walls gleam from the hillside. The difference is not in regard to the visibility of the effect, but the nature of the unifying bond. The distinction is brought out in RV.

JAMES COOPER.

FLOOD.—The Flood is referred to only in Mt 24<sup>38-39</sup> and its parallel Lk 17<sup>37</sup>. Jesus is speaking of the concealment of the day and hour of the coming of the Son of Man, and He uses the Flood as an illustration which would be well known to His hearers. Men and women were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered the ark; and did not know until the Flood came and took them all away. So it would be at the time of the coming of the Son of Man. Jesus was, at the time of speaking, warning men of His coming, and the warning was intended, doubtless, to be sufficient to turn them, if they would be turned, from their evil. The emphasis in the use of the illustration is upon the indifference and wickedness of the antediluvians, as paralleled by that of men in the future who would not receive and act upon the warnings now given. The Gospel use, then, of the Flood is, like the meaning of the word used (κατακλιεσθαι), neutral as to the important questions raised by the OT story of the Deluge. See art. 'Flood' in Hastings' DB, vol. ii.

O. H. GATES.

FLOWERS.—Palestine has a flora of wonderful wealth and variety. The known species exceed three thousand, and even this large list is probably far from complete. But numbers alone convey no adequate idea of its varied nature. This little land contains within its narrow limits the most remarkable diversities of soil, surface, and climate. As is the land so is its flora, which at the one extreme, amid the heights of Lebanon, is Alpine in its character, and at the other extreme, in the gorge of the Dead Sea, tropical.

In the NT there are very few references to flowers, and these are of the most general character (Ja. 1<sup>9-11</sup>, 1 P. 1<sup>24</sup>). In the Gospels the only mention of them is in the words of our Lord, 'Consider the lilies of the field' (Mt 6<sup>2</sup>, Lk 12<sup>27</sup>). It is noteworthy that it is to their beauty that Christ appeals; elsewhere in the NT flowers are the emblem of frailty and evanescence. But in spite of the comparative infrequency of Scripture allusions to them or praise of their beauty, the Jews were lovers of flowers. This is attested by the floral ornamentation on the woodwork of the oracle (1 K 6<sup>29</sup>), the folding-doors (6<sup>32</sup>), and the pillars of the temple (7<sup>22</sup>), the brim of the molten sea (7<sup>23</sup>), and the golden candlestick (Ex 25<sup>31-32</sup>). From the Mishna we learn that at the Feast of Harvest (Ex 23<sup>10</sup>) the first crop of fruit offered at the altar was decked with flowers (Bikkurim, ii. 3).

Among the beautiful flowers of Palestine may be mentioned anemones, crocuses, cyclamens, gladioli, hyacinths, irises, poppies, roses, and tulips.

HUGH DUNCAN.

FLUTE-PLAYERS.—Flute-playing is referred to twice in the Gospels: once in the narrative as an expression of sorrow (Mt 9<sup>23</sup> ἀδελφάς, AV 'minstrels,' RV 'flute-players'); and once in the Lord's teaching as an expression of gladness (ᾠδὴν αἰνοῦντων Mt 11<sup>17</sup> with the parallel passage Lk 7<sup>32</sup> 'we [have] piped'). The latter use, which is referred to several times in the OT and the Apocrypha (1 K 1<sup>40</sup>, Is 5<sup>12</sup> 30<sup>28</sup>, Sir 40<sup>2</sup>, 1 Mac 3<sup>42</sup>), is attested for the later Jews by the mention in the Mishna of 'flutes for a bride' (Baba Mezia vi. 1). The other use, the employment of flutes for mourning, seems to have been widely diffused and of great antiquity, for it is clearly alluded to by Jeremiah (48<sup>36</sup>); and can be traced over a large part of the Gentile world—Phoenicians, Carians, Greeks, Romans, and probably Assyrians. In Greek society (or at least some sections of it) the custom was so general that the flute-player at funerals was described by a special term (τυμβαλῶνς Ælian. Var. Hist. xii. 43). For the Jewish life of the 1st and 2nd cents. A.D. there is ample evidence in the Mishna and elsewhere. 'Flutes for a corpse' are mentioned in Baba Mezia vi. 1, and in Kethuboth iv. 4 is the often cited rule that a man who had lost his wife must engage, no matter how poor he might be, not fewer than two flute-players and one wailing woman. A remarkable historical illustration is supplied by Josephus (J. J. III. ix. 5). When the news of the capture of Jotapata by the Romans in the summer of 67 A. D. reached Jerusalem, 'most people engaged flute-players to lead their lamentations.' Another illustration comes from Roman history. At the funeral of the Emperor Claudius in 54 A. D. there were flute-players in the procession. These funeral musicians seem to have been generally, if not always, professionals, and to have been held in very low esteem. The class seems to be unknown to modern Syrian society. The wailing woman remains, but the funeral flautist has gone (Bauer, Vollleben im Lande der Bibel, 1903, p. 213).

FOLLOWING.—'Follow' represents several Gr. words which it is desirable to distinguish as far as possible.

That great multitudes followed Jesus during His ministry is repeatedly noted; cf. Mt 4<sup>23</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>28</sup> 21<sup>1</sup>, Mk 5<sup>1</sup>, Lk 22<sup>27</sup> (see CROWD, MULTITUDE); publicans and sinners also (ἀκολουθούτων, NB, Vulg. Mk 2<sup>15</sup>, cf. Lk 15<sup>1</sup>). 'Follow me' (ἀκολουθεῖ μοι) was His call to discipleship, Mt 9<sup>9</sup> || Lk 9<sup>28</sup>, Jn 1<sup>42</sup>; δεῦρο ἀκολουθεῖ μοι (Lk 18<sup>22</sup> ||) and δεῦτε ὀπίσω μου (Mt 4<sup>19</sup> ||) also occur. The command would be at once understood in this sense, for 'it was not only the practice of the Rabbis, but regarded as one of the most sacred duties for a Master to gather around him a circle of disciples' (Edersheim, Life and Times, i. 474). Hence 'following' was a mark of belonging to the band of disciples (Mk 9<sup>38</sup> ||). At first it might seem to imply only 'come with me on this journey' (cf. Jn 1<sup>42</sup>), but gradually they learned that it meant abandonment of previous occupations (Mt 4<sup>20</sup> 9<sup>9</sup>) and duties (Mt 8<sup>22</sup>), and possibly the dearest ties (Lk 14<sup>26</sup>), as well as a participation in dangers and even death (Mt 10<sup>28</sup> 38, Jn 16<sup>7</sup>). Such an intensified meaning of following is seen in the case of Peter (Jn 1<sup>42</sup>, Mt 4<sup>19</sup>, Jn 21<sup>19</sup>). The call of Jesus differed from that of other teachers in that He did not simply invite, but commanded obedience as One who had the right, and as if they literally belonged to Himself; the most peremptory claims to rule over the affections and wills of men are found in Mt. and Lk. rather than in Jn., and can be explained only by His being the supreme Lord of life (Liddon). Further, the disciples followed Him not merely to learn more doctrine, but to be prepared for future work (Mt 4<sup>19</sup>; and of the Apostles, Mk 3<sup>14</sup>). Mk 10<sup>28</sup> is especially noteworthy, describing vividly

The literal meaning tends to merge partly or wholly into the metaphorical sense of conforming to the example of Jesus in living, and also, if need be, in dying; cf. Mt 10<sup>28</sup> || 16<sup>24</sup>, Jn 8<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>26</sup> 13<sup>36</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>21</sup> ('follow his steps'), Rev 14<sup>4</sup>. The two meanings seem combined in Jn 21<sup>19</sup>. V<sup>29</sup> implies that Jesus moved away, inviting Peter to follow along the rough shore perhaps for private conversation; and John though uninvited also followed. But there is probably a reference also to Jn 13<sup>36</sup>; and the action of Peter was symbolical of that obedient following in the rugged path of Christian duty, in the work of the Apostolic ministry (Chrys.). In the way of martyrdom (Meyer), which would lead to participation in His Master's glory (see Godet's note). This command differed from the similar command given before the Resurrection, says Westcott, because 'it now required further the perception of His course; the spiritual discernment by which His movements can still be discovered; and yet, further, the readiness to accept martyrdom as the end.'

Lk 9<sup>27</sup>—Mt 8<sup>16</sup> is important. All three aspirants for admission into the inner circle seem to have been already disciples, cf. Mt 8<sup>21</sup>, the use of 'Master' and 'Lord,' and the work contemplated (Lk 9<sup>26</sup> 22). Probably the appointment of the Seventy was in view (Lk 10<sup>1</sup>), or less likely, of the Twelve (so Trench, comparing Mt 10<sup>1</sup>, which, however, does not apply to the εἰσοσφίς, but to the sending out of the Apostles). These were (1) a scribe (εἰς γραμματεῖς, Mt.), who came saying, 'Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest.' He meant, perhaps, 'to the end of the journey, wherever it might be, not aware of the continual wandering life led by Jesus' (Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, ii. 69); but he was warned of the utter homelessness of the Son of Man, and was shown the necessity of counting the cost (cf. Lk 14<sup>28</sup>). (2) Another was called to follow, and professed readiness to obey but alleged a hindrance: 'Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father.' The words 'go and bury' (ἀπελθετε θάψατε), and 'leave the dead,' RV (ἀφετε τοὺς νεκρούς), naturally imply, and are usually taken to mean, that his father was then lying dead (so early Fathers, Alfred, Trench, Godet, Edersheim, etc.). It was a son's most sacred duty to perform the last offices, but this was one of the cases where the Call must take precedence of all else. His going might involve a delay of seven days (the period of pollution, Nu 19<sup>11</sup>), during which good impressions might be dulled; and Jesus would have left the district whither, taking Lk's order, He was not to return. This man, too, was being called to active work for God; cf. regulations in Lv 21<sup>1</sup>, Nu 6<sup>7</sup>. But some later commentators, as Theophylact, suppose that the father was still alive though weak and frail, and that the son wished to remain with him until his death. Thus the seeming harshness of Christ's reply would be mitigated; and it is pointed out that as the burial usually took place on the day of death, it was unlikely that the man would leave his home during the interval between these two events. Wendt (op. cit. p. 70) quotes a striking illustration in support. A young Turk was advised by a missionary in Syria to make a tour of Europe, and answered, 'I must first of all bury my father.' The missionary expressed surprise at the news of his death, as he had hitherto been in good health; but the young man explained that he only meant that one must before all things devote himself to the duties owed to relatives. Jesus did not recognize such duties as sufficient to justify delay in preaching the gospel. Clem. Alex. adopted a tradition that this man was Philip (τοῦ Κυρίου λέγοντος τῷ Φίλιππῳ, ἀπὸ τοῦ πεποδοῦ, κ.τ.λ., Sermon, iii. 4, 50, 51, Migne); if true, it may be taken as an admonition occasioned by some slackness or symptom of decadence on the part of the Apostle (Alf.). (3) A third offered to follow, but wished first to say farewell to his relatives: he showed a divided affection; apparently, therefore, his request involved special danger. A saying of farewell (ἀντίειπεν) in quite a different sense was necessary (Lk 14<sup>26</sup>). Augustine says of these three: 'obtulit se unus ut eum sequeretur et reprobatus est, alius non audebat et exciatus est, tertius differabat et culpatus est.' Eidersheim sums up the three vital conditions of following as here illustrated: (a) absolute self-denial and homelessness in the world; (b) immediate and entire self-surrender to Christ and His work; and (c) a heart and affections simple, undivided, and set on Christ and His work, to which there is no other trial of parting like that which would involve parting from Him, no other or higher joy than that of following Him (Life and Times, ii. 134).

For the result and rewards of following see Jn 8<sup>12</sup>, Mt 19<sup>27</sup> ff.

W. H. DUNDAS.

The ordinary food in Christ's day consisted chiefly of flesh, cereals, fruits, and herbs. Of flesh, that of sheep, oxen, kids, birds (Mt 12<sup>12</sup>, 25<sup>2</sup>, Lk 13<sup>15</sup>, Mt 10<sup>29</sup>), as well as fish (Mt 7<sup>9</sup>, Lk 24<sup>42</sup>, Jn 6<sup>9</sup> 21<sup>12</sup>) was in common use. Of cereals, wheat and barley were favourite food-stuffs (Mt 3<sup>3</sup>, Mk 2<sup>23</sup>, Lk 3<sup>3</sup>, Jn 6<sup>9</sup> 21<sup>12</sup>); of herbs there is mention of mint, anise, and cummin (Mt 23<sup>23</sup>, Lk 11<sup>42</sup>); of fruits, we hear of figs (Lk 13<sup>7</sup>, Mt 21<sup>18</sup>, 19) and grapes (Mt 7<sup>16</sup>, Mk 12<sup>12</sup>). The cereals were prepared by grinding in crude mills, and the flour was made into loaves or cakes baked in ovens. Food was seasoned with salt (Mk 9<sup>2</sup>); mustard leaves and cummin were used as condiments. See art. MEALS.

John the Baptist, like some others of his day, lived nearer to nature, as a rebuke of prevalent luxury, and chose the native food of the wilderness, 'locusts and wild-honey' (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>6</sup>). Jesus came 'eating and drinking' the ordinary food of His time, rebuking the artificial abstemiousness of the Pharisees (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>, Lk 7<sup>34</sup>), as well as the too great anxiety of many as to what they should eat or drink (Mt 6<sup>25</sup>, Lk 12<sup>29</sup>).

FOOL.—This word occurs 6 times in the AV of the Gospels as the translation of ἀφρονος (Lk 24<sup>42</sup>), ἀππων (11<sup>10</sup> 12<sup>20</sup>), and μωρός (Mt 5<sup>22</sup> 23<sup>17</sup>). In the RV it occurs only twice (Mt 5<sup>22</sup> 23<sup>17</sup>), being in Mt 23<sup>17</sup> omitted from the text, and in the three remaining places the rendering given is 'foolish.' Further, μωρός occurs in Mt 7<sup>28</sup> 25<sup>2</sup>, and in these places, both in AV and RV, it is translated 'foolish.'

These three Greek words, confused more or less by the principal versions,—the Harklean Syriac and Coptic are exceptions,—are not synonyms. Ἀφρονος implies a lack of comprehension or understanding, and so is very fittingly used in Lk 24<sup>42</sup>. Ἀππων, signifying 'mindless' or 'senseless,' frequently carries with it, in Biblical usage (cf. its constant employment in the LXX of Proverbs), an underlying meaning of moral defect, impiety, or unbelief; while in μωρός (cf. μωραίνεσθαι, Mt 5<sup>13</sup>, 'to become insipid') the predominant meaning is 'dull,' 'witless,' 'stupid.'

The meaning of μωρός in Mt 5<sup>22</sup> has been much discussed. Alford mentions three interpretations: (1) that it is to be understood as the ordinary Greek word for 'fool'; (2) that it is a transliteration of the Heb. מָרָד (mōrēh), meaning 'rebel' or 'perverse' (cf. Nu 20<sup>10</sup>), a word which is put in RVm as an alternative to 'fool'; (3) that it bears the sense of ἀππων according to the Heb. usage of מָרָד (māhāl, and cf. 1 S 25<sup>22</sup>). However, there seems to be no real reason for supposing the word to be other than the Greek μωρός used in its ordinary Biblical sense.

Our Lord wished to emphasize the enormity of murder. He said, 'Ye have heard that it was said to them of old time, Thou shalt not kill, and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment. But I say unto you that whosoever is angry [the inward feeling] with his brother, is in danger of the judgment; and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca [a contemptuous utterance arising from the inward anger, and probably no definite word; see RACA], shall be liable to a more solemn judgment; but whosoever shall say, Thou fool [the angry feeling formulated in a definite word of contemptuous depreciation], shall be worthy of a more dreadful doom.' This is, in the main, Augustine's explanation (de Serm. Dom. in Mont. I. ix.); and thus our Lord leaves it to be inferred how heinous actual murder is in His eyes.

Every use of the word 'fool' is not, of course, condemned. Our Lord Himself (see above) and St. Paul (Gal 3<sup>3</sup>) employed it in needful rebuke; but that use of it is condemned which springs from angry feelings, and which is one step on the way to violence or even to murder.

ALBERT BONUS.

FOOLISHNESS.—In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus points out the grave sin of saying to our brother, 'Thou fool' (μωρός, Mt 5<sup>22</sup>). When He likened His critics to children in the market-place who would play at neither a sad nor a merry game (Mt 11<sup>16-19</sup>), was He not saying in His heart, 'Ye fools'? But anger and contempt are the sources of the former; wonder and pity, mingled with indignation, shape the latter. He who knew what was in man had occasion to marvel at the foolishness of men. That foolishness is a ruinous self-deception in spiritual things. He points out this folly in these classes:

1. The foolishness of worldly men.—God said to the rich man, 'Thou fool' (ἀππων, Lk 12<sup>21</sup>). The parable (vv. 16-21) was inspired by a request which showed to Christ a heart so absorbed in thought of material good that it could not listen to His message. That fact gives us the point of view from which to consider the parable. The good of life cannot be in earth's riches which pass from owner to owner, and whose possession is at the mercy of death, which is only an accident to the immortal soul. Cf. 1 A. 9:23 & Expos.; 'O foolish men' (AV 'O fools' is too harsh). See preceding article.

soul (v. 20). Covetousness, a man's absorption in heaping up and enjoying things, is folly in so far as it hinders him from attaining to the true riches, treasure of the soul laid up with God (vv. 12-21).

2. The foolishness of the formalist, who shuts his eyes (μῶσοι καὶ τυφλοὶ) to the spiritual side, the inward consecration which gives meaning and value to conduct or to things (Lk 11<sup>40</sup>, Mt 23<sup>27</sup>).

3. The foolishness of the religious.—This thought occurs more frequently. It is a mark of our Lord's teaching that it is concerned rather with the subtler forms of evil which beset the religious class. He assumes that those sins of sense and temper which all the world condemns, need no condemnation from Him. This foolishness consists generally in a lack of seriousness, a lack of whole-heartedness and simplicity in faith and conduct. There are those who hear His words and do them not (Mt 7<sup>26-27</sup>). These are believers whose whole spirit is a contradiction, children of faith in mind, children of unfaith in conduct. This foolishness of believers is the formative thought of the parables of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16<sup>2-9</sup>) and of the Ten Virgins (Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>). The meaning of the former parable is said by Jesus to be, that the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light. That wisdom consists in greater singleness of vision both as regards ends and means. The steward sees his end clearly: he apportions his means to that end, uses as best he may what resources he has. The inference is left as to the wavering vision, both of end and of means, on the part of the children of light. The same thought is in the subsidiary and incidental lesson as to making friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness. Selfishness, not brotherliness, rules this fraudulent steward, but he sees clearly those facts of our human life, gratitude and kindness, which make brotherhood possible, and he turns them to his ends. On the other hand, brotherhood is the faith of the children of light, and yet they greatly neglect this rich field. The parable of the Ten Virgins completes this teaching of the foolishness of a half-hearted faith. It hints the irrevocable loss believers bring upon themselves thereby. Life's opportunities come unexpectedly—calls to service, possibilities of honour and spiritual enriching—and the half-hearted miss these. Their heart-culture, their spirits' discipline have been sleeping; and the chances of life pass them by.

The seat of all these follies is the heart (Mk 7<sup>2</sup>). It is not any mere action of the intellect which here comes into condemnation. All these forms of foolishness are a ruining self-deception. The mind is there the servant of the heart whose desires have confused and led it astray.

RICHARD GLAISTER.
FOOT.—The references in this connexion arise chiefly from the fact that the foot in relationship to the head is the inferior part of the body.

1. Humility and deilement.—A still lower level was reached by the shoes or sandals, which were in direct contact with the common earth. John the Baptist indicated his inferiority to Christ by saying that he was unworthy to unfasten His shoelatchet (Mk 1<sup>7</sup>). To walk barefoot was the sign of a captive prisoner (Is 20<sup>4</sup>), and as a voluntary act of self-infliction often forms part of a personal vow. To be trodden under foot was the symbol of utter degradation (Mt 5<sup>3</sup>, Lk 21<sup>24</sup>, He 10<sup>29</sup>). At the entrance to an Oriental house the shoes are removed, not merely for the sake of cleanliness as a preliminary to sitting down with the feet drawn under the dress, but also out of regard to the sanctity of family life, so that no defilement may touch the rugs and mats that have been hallowed by prayer and the Divine presence. He who stood on holy ground had to put off his shoes (Ex 3<sup>5</sup>, Jos 5<sup>15</sup>).

Orientalists are not accustomed to wear stockings with their open shoes, and it was an act not only of ceremonial duty, but of personal comfort, to bathe the feet after a journey over the hot and dusty ground. It was a courtesy due to a guest to see that this ministry was not omitted. Christ drew attention to the fact that in the house of one who prided himself upon his precise fulfilment of the Law this service had been more than rendered to Him by a woman whom the Pharisee despised as a sinner (Lk 7<sup>44-46</sup>). The charge to His disciples to shake the dust from their feet wherever the message of the Kingdom was not received (Mt 10<sup>14</sup>, Mk 6<sup>11</sup>, Lk 9<sup>8</sup> 10<sup>11</sup>), was a demonstration to both parties of the unfitness of such people for its membership. When Christ washed the disciples' feet, the cleansing meant not only that the feet under which His sacred hands had been placed could never turn aside to paths of evil, but that they could never be set down with harsh and proud authority over the lives and rights of others. His service could never lay upon those disciples any greater humiliation than had been rendered to them. It became a law of the Kingdom to 'wash one another's feet' (Jn 13<sup>14</sup>).

2. Authority and subjection.—To approach the feet of the great was the conceded right of the weak in seeking the presence and help of the powerful. To kneel down and clasp the feet and even to kiss them is still the Oriental preliminary to an important request. When inferiors salute those of higher rank, the first act of gesture is to lower the hand towards the ground as if to imply that the whole body should be there. Sometimes the word is allowed to do service for the deed, as when the supplicant says, 'Allow me to kiss your feet.' The impression meant to be produced is that the party addressed has the power to do what is asked, and that the only unsettled point is the question of his willingness (Mt 18<sup>29</sup> 20<sup>20</sup>, Mk 14<sup>10</sup>).

The foot on the neck as a symbol of conquest seems to have been borrowed from the primitive pastoral life. When an Oriental shepherd wishes to punish a straying and inattentive sheep, he casts it on its side, and with all his weight presses and rubs the iron-studded sole of his shoe against its neck (1 Co 15<sup>27</sup>). In killing a serpent, the Syrian peasant, even with a stick in his hand, usually, after a blow or two, jumps upon the serpent, and by a quick succession of stamps bruises it to death (Ps 91<sup>13</sup>, Ro 16<sup>20</sup>). To sit at the feet of his teacher was the attitude of the disciple (Mt 10<sup>41</sup>, Lk 10<sup>39</sup>, Ac 22<sup>3</sup>). The Pharisees thus sat in Moses' seat (Mt 23<sup>2</sup>).

The risen Lord was recognized by the marks in His hands and His feet (Lk 24<sup>40</sup>); see PRINT. On Mt 18<sup>8</sup> see ASCETICISM, p. 129.

G. M. MACKIE.

FOOTSTOOL (ὑποπόδιον).—With the single exception of Ja 2<sup>2</sup> the word is used figuratively in the NT, to express the idea of 'subjection' or 'complete control.' In this sense it occurs frequently in the Gospels: e.g. Mt 22<sup>4</sup>, Mk 12<sup>28</sup>, Lk 20<sup>28</sup>, where the Synoptists record Christ's quotation from Ps 110—a psalm always regarded by the Jews as distinctly Messianic. In Mt 22<sup>4</sup> RV, on the authority of some of the most ancient MSS and versions, accepts ὑποκάτω instead of ὑποπόδιον, and translates, 'fill I put thine enemies under thy feet.' Similarly in Mk 12<sup>28</sup> ὑποκάτω is read by many ancient authorities, and is adopted by WH. Here, however, RV retains ὑποπόδιον (with marg. note); but (as also in Lk 20<sup>28</sup> and Mt 5<sup>29</sup>) translates more correctly 'footstool of thy (or his) feet' instead of AV 'thy (or his) footstool.'

In its application to Christ the word shows Him in His Kingly office triumphing over His enemies, and bringing all men into captivity to His obedience; cf. 1 Co 13<sup>2</sup> "For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet."

DUGALD CLARK.
FORCE.—1. Force, as defined by modern science, is inherent in matter and inseparable from it. It is defined also as the power of doing work. The modes and the effects of its activities are mechanical. It can neither exist nor act, therefore, within the moral sphere of the universe. And from this fact it follows that force and its activities are entirely foreign to the essential facts and truths of Christianity. This truth is recognized by the four Gospels, for in their records of Christ's life and mission, the entire import of which was moral, no word is employed capable of being construed into the meaning of force as just explained. The word 'force' occurs only twice in these records (Mt 11<sup>12</sup>, Jn 6<sup>9</sup> EV); and in both cases it is used as the translation of ἀπράξια, which signifies to seize or carry off (an object by physical force or compulsion). It is the use of physical force or compulsion that is denoted by St. John's statement that the people wanted to take Jesus by force to make Him a king; and it is probable that our Lord had the employment of force of the same kind in His mind when He said, as St. Matthew reports: "From the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence (ἡδύραται = 'is carried by force or assault'), and the violent (or assailants) take it by force' (ἀπράξουσιν). The order of ideas here expressed is exactly in terms of the principle of domination by force, which was universal in antiquity; a principle which was entirely antagonistic to His essential ideas as to the moral nature of the kingdom of heaven, and the moral conditions by means of which alone entrance to it could be gained. And as He fully realized that the principle alluded to was hostile to the nature, interests, and laws of the heavenly kingdom, and warned His disciples against it (Mk 10<sup>32-42</sup>) it may be concluded that He did not express Himself in the language of the force which the dominating powers of the ancient world employed, meaning thereby that places in the kingdom of heaven, as He understood and wished His hearers to understand the latter, were in great demand, and that men were eagerly doing their utmost to secure them. His real meaning is not quite apparent. He Himself represented the kingdom of God. He had come to found it. In His life and activities its principles came to perfect realization. To subject Him in any way to the abusive treatment of the force of dominating powers or authorities, was to do 'violence' in His Person to the kingdom of heaven; and it was also 'to take' the kingdom, in the sense of making it in His Person an object of violent abuse. When He spoke the words in question His ministry in Galilee was closing in disappointing circumstances. John the Baptist had been already made a victim of violent abuse; and He knew that His 'hour,' a more terrible destiny than John's, would not be long delayed. Might it not be His cross, then, that was in His mind when He spoke the words in question? (For the more usual view that the violence which takes the kingdom by force is the friendly violence of those who seek to enter it, see A. B. Bruce, Expositor's Gr. Test. in Loc., Expositor, t. v. [1877] p. 197 ff.)

2. 'Force,' however, is a term which is not always used in its strictly scientific sense. In ordinary use it is synonymous with strength or power. 'Power' is a word of frequent occurrence in the Gospels, and in many instances where it is employed it possesses moral significance of very high value. The word 'power' in the EV of the Gospels is represented by two Greek terms in the original, viz. ἐξουσία and δύναμις, the former of which is sometimes translated by the word 'authority.'

'Εξουσία may be taken first. Power in the sense of this word is not always spoken of as Christ's power; but it is as His power that it has its chief interest here. The power (ἐξουσία) that Christ possessed was a power in which might was combined with right; and this is why it is sometimes called authority in the Gospels and sometimes power. He was able to do things because He had the right to do them; and no one had any right to hinder Him or to call Him in question. And the things that He had the right and the power to do were all of a nature purely moral; and things, moreover, which He alone could do, and which were of transcendent importance. What were they? (1) He, as the Son of man, had power on earth to forgive sins (Mt 9<sup>1</sup>, Mk 2<sup>10</sup>). (2) He has power to give eternal life to those whom the Father has given to Him (Jn 17<sup>3</sup>). (3) He has power, or authority, also to execute judgment, because He is the Son of man (Jn 5<sup>27</sup>). (4) He is invested with all power in heaven and in earth (Mt 28<sup>18</sup>). (5) Lastly, He had power to lay down His life on earth, and power to take it again (Jn 10<sup>18</sup>). The explanation of the various forms of power (ἐξουσία) possessed by Christ, and of the grounds on which His claim to the possession of them rests, lies in a domain of essential Christian truth.

It needs to be strongly emphasized that all the forms of the power in question are moral. The power to forgive sins, to judge men as moral beings, to give eternal life to men as moral beings, to lay down one's life in perfect self-sacrificing love and service for others' good, to exercise the moral government of heaven and earth,—to do all these things, to have the right and the power to do them, manifestly means the possession and the exercise of moral power of the highest possible order. Again, it is evident that this power in its nature and in all its forms of manifestation belongs to the supernatural order of things. But in the sphere of things into which the order of ideas considered here introduces one, the supernatural and the natural are one. It is within the sphere of the moral order of things that Christ, in His moral position as Mediator between God and men, exercised, or exercises, the forms of His power alluded to. And within this moral sphere there is no absolute distinction between the natural and the supernatural. Here all that is in harmony with God's will and purpose is in Him, and He is in it. This is the real truth; and whether it be called natural or supernatural is only a difference in name.

One more, all the forms of power that Christ claimed for Himself were His by delegation from God. But this does not mean that He had the right and the power to exercise them in a merely official capacity, without their having any relation to and dependence on what He was as a moral Being. He was invested with them by God, as all but one of the passages referred to above indicate. But one of the passages tells us that He had power on earth to forgive sins as the Son of man; and another, that God had given Him authority to execute judgment because He was the Son of man. He was both the Son of God and the Son of man in all that He was as a moral Being when on the earth, exercising the high moral powers that He claimed to possess. And it is as the same moral Being, now glorified, that He exercises every moral power that He claimed as His own by Divine gift and prerogative. In other words, the power to do all the things that have been specified is His because of what He is as a moral Being. To forgive sins, to judge men, etc., are all acts of moral power which belong to the administration of the moral order of the world as it now is with Christ in it as the one only Mediator between God and men. And the reason why the administration of all things belonging to the moral relations between God and men is in His hands, is—that in His life and death on earth He earned the moral right to occupy this momentous position and administer power. For He fills this position and administers power as one who has proved Himself all that God can be to men, and all that every man ought to become and be to God. He is thus, because of what He is, the Divinely human and the humanly Divine, true way of forgiveness, of judgment, of life, and of moral government for men. From His Father's own commandment He had the power to lay down His life, in living and in dying to qualify Himself for this destiny of absolute pre-eminence in the moral universe. And as the Father commanded Him, so He did. Therefore His name is now above every name (Ph 2<sup>9-11</sup>, Jn 17<sup>20-26</sup>).

δύναμις is the other word which is translated 'power' in the EV of the Gospels. It is noteworthy that none of the Evangelists includes the word 'energy' (ἐνέργεια) in his terminology; a word which St. Paul employed to denote the effectual working of God's redeeming power as manifested in (1) the raising of Christ from the dead, and in the setting of Him at God's right hand in the heavenly places, i.e. in the moral order of things (Eph 1<sup>19-23</sup>); (2) the Divine grace that was bestowed on St. Paul himself by the working in him of Divine power (Eph 3<sup>7</sup>); (3) the working of the same Divine power in the creation or evolution of an order of moral unity in the relations of all men to one another in Christ; (4) the working of the same power as in Christ as destined to fashion the resurrected body of believers into the glorious likeness of His own, 'according to the working whereby he is able even to subject all things unto himself' (Ph 3<sup>21</sup>). But the absence from the Gospels of the term 'energy,' which occupies a place of such extensive and high importance in St. Paul's general conception of essential Christianity, does not imply the absence from them of that order of Divine working for which the word stands in the Apostle's writings. The entire body of moral phenomena, reproduced by the Evangelists in their several records, and in which the power of God in Christ was manifested, was a revelation of the Divine energy in St. Paul's sense of the word. But, further, the meaning of the word ἐνέργεια is included in that of the word δύναμις as the latter is used in the Gospels; for in them it signifies, on the one hand, the possession of power capable of action; and, on the other, power manifesting itself in a state of activity, in which case it appears in the form of energy. Power, then, as δύναμις, holds a fundamental place in the Gospels as records of how Christ conceived it and manifested it in His activities.

(1) Christ regarded the power with which He associated Himself and His activities and their effects as moral, and as having its ultimate source in God. He conceived God as a moral Being, and to Him as such He ascribed the power alluded to (Mt 22<sup>29</sup> 26<sup>4</sup>, Mk 9<sup>14</sup>, Lk 22<sup>29</sup>).—(2) But, again, such being Christ's view, He never conceived of Himself as possessing and exercising power independently of God. His feeling of absolute dependence on God for power had a deep and controlling place in His consciousness. It was the feeling He gave unreserved and clear expression to when He said, for instance, 'The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do'; 'I can of mine own self do nothing'; and, again, 'The Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works' (Jn 5<sup>19, 20</sup> 14<sup>10</sup>).—(3) It was, therefore, through His dependence on God that our Lord obtained the power by means of which He was enabled to attain to His perfect moral self-realization, and by means of which He was enabled to finish the work His Father had given Him to do. And the question thus arises as to how He was kept in possession of a continuous supply of power for the great moral task and service of His life. The answer to this question is to be found in the Gospels. The secret of His strength lay in His inner life of perfect, never-broken union and fellowship with His Father in all things. But this life of union and fellowship with His Father needed itself to be continually maintained; and the Gospels also show how this was done by Him. He did it by paying perfect loyalty to His dependence on His Father; by striving in every situation of His life freely and perfectly to identify Himself with His Father's will and purpose for His life and His mission; by means of habits of self-discipline and prayer (Lk 3<sup>21, 22</sup> 4<sup>1-14</sup> 6<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>28-29</sup> 22<sup>26-27</sup>, Jn 3<sup>34</sup> 8<sup>28, 29</sup>).

(4) Christ, moreover, believed that His disciples needed the same Divine power that was His strength, in order to be able to fulfil the moral task in life to which He called them; and He believed that this power would be available for them as it had been for Himself during His life on earth. His Spirit in them would be the very power (δύναμις) that had been His own. And in their task of overcoming temptation, of moral self-realization, of achieving good in service for the kingdom of God, they would find His Spirit's power all-sufficient for them. But they would need to remember that the servant was not greater than his Lord. They would need to depend on Him as He depended on God. They would need to abide in union and fellowship with Him. They must keep His words as being the Father's words. And they must also follow Him in the path of humility, self-discipline, prayer, and self-denial (Mt 10<sup>28</sup> 17<sup>19-21</sup> 26<sup>41</sup>, Lk 11<sup>2-13</sup> 22<sup>27, 28</sup> 24<sup>49</sup>, Jn 12<sup>24-26</sup> 13<sup>12-17</sup> 14<sup>10-18</sup> 15<sup>17</sup> 17<sup>11-19</sup>, Ac 1<sup>4-5</sup>).

(5) It was, finally, in the exercise of the Divine power here referred to that our Lord performed those extraordinary works of His to which the name 'miracle' has been given. In some of the Gospels they are called 'mighty works' (e.g. Mt 11<sup>20</sup>, Mk 6<sup>5</sup>, Lk 19<sup>27</sup>). These works of power (δυνάμεις) were only special forms in which was manifested the same power that was revealed in so many other ways in the moral activities of Christ's life. He wrought His miracles by the same power that enabled Him perfectly to overcome all the temptations of His life, and to accomplish all those other things in which He fulfilled His Father's will and purpose.

Again, it never occurred to Him that in the doing of His mighty works He contravened or suspended any of those uniformities of nature to which the term 'law' is applied by modern science, though with many of those uniformities He was quite familiar, and, besides, attached to them great importance. The question raised for science by His mighty works is in reality not a question of natural law; it is a question of natural force or energy. Are the forces inherent and operative in the physical or moral order of the world of such a nature as to render it impossible for the miracles ascribed to Christ's power to have happened? That is the real point at issue as between the testimony of the Gospels and Science. And the man of science who has the most extensive and the deepest knowledge of the energy or forces of the Universe, and who has therefore entered furthest into the presence of the marvels and the mysteries of these forces and their modes of manifestation, would be the last person to answer the question in the affirmative.

Once more, the mighty works ascribed to Christ in the Gospels are not the most wonderful of His achievements. It is often pointed out in defence of these mighty works, and rightly, that they were wrought to serve beneficent ends, that they were manifestations of power and love ministering in various ways to human well-being; and that as so viewed, they were originally and homogeneously related to all the other beneficent activities of our Lord's ministry. It is also argued in favour of the possibility and the historical truth of the miracles in question, that His perfect personal sinlessness and holiness was a moral miracle as great as, if not greater than, any of the mighty works reported by the Evangelists as performed by Him. There is justice in this argument. It was by the power of God immanent and operative in Him, and by His own free co-operation therewith, that He achieved His perfect moral self-realization in which He was morally as perfect as God. That was a miracle indeed; and, to say the least, there is no mightier work on record in the Gospels and represented there as wrought by Him in the exercise of the Divine power of which He was a personal organ. See, further, MIRACLE.

But that was only the beginning of the mightiest work of all with which the power of God in Christ is associated, and which is only coming slowly to manifestation in the moral progress of humanity. Christ in the power of His Spirit is in the moral life of mankind. He is morally re-creating the life of the human race. The moral order of the world is being evolved by means of His moral power as the Mediator between God and men. By means of His moral power in man's life and history, He is conducting humanity onwards in the path that will bring it to a perfect moral destiny in the kingdom of God. This is the greatest, mightiest of all His miracles; and whosoever understands the momentousness of the moral task it implies will not stumble at any of the mighty works on record in the Gospels.

FORESIGHT.—The interest of the student of the Gospels, and of the life of Jesus which forms their substance, in the topic of this article, is twofold. Jesus is represented in the Gospels as at once the object and the subject of the most detailed foresight. The work which He came to do was a work ordained in the counsels of eternity, and in all its items prepared for beforehand with the most perfect prevision. In addressing Himself to the accomplishment of this work Jesus proceeded from the beginning in the fullest knowledge of the end, and with the most absolute adjustment of every step to its attainment. It is from this double view-point that each of the Evangelists depicts the course of our Lord's life on earth. They consentiently represent Him as having come to perform a specific task, all the elements of which were not only determined beforehand in the plan of God, but adumbrated, if somewhat sporadically, yet with sufficient fullness for the end in view, in the prophecies of the OT. And they represent Him as coming to perform this task with a clear consciousness of its nature and a competent control of all the means for its discharge, so that His whole life was a conscientious fulfilment of a programme, and moved straight to its mark. The conception of foresight thus dominates the whole Evangelical narrative.

It is not necessary to dwell at length upon the Evangelists' conception of our Lord's life and work as the fulfilment of a plan Divinely pre-determined for Him. It lies on the face of their narratives that the authors of the Gospels had no reservation with respect to the all-embracing predestination of God (cf. Hastings' DB iv. 54-56); and least of all could they exclude from it this life and work which was to them the hinge upon which all history turns. To them accordingly our Lord is by way of eminence 'the man of destiny,' and His whole life (Lk 2<sup>40</sup>) was governed by 'the dei of the Divine counsel.' Every step of His pathway was a 'necessity' to Him, in the fulfilment of the mission for which He had 'come forth' (Mk 1<sup>8</sup>; cf. Swete), or as St. Luke (4<sup>40</sup>) in quite Johannine wise (5<sup>22, 24, 26, 28, 32, 33, 35, 40</sup> et passim) expresses it, 'was sent' (cf. Mt 10<sup>40</sup>, Mk 9<sup>37</sup>, Lk 9<sup>48</sup> 10<sup>18</sup>; Mt 15<sup>24</sup> 21<sup>27</sup>, Mk 13<sup>35</sup>, Lk 20<sup>13</sup>, cf. Swete on Mk 9<sup>37</sup>). Especially was all that concerned His departure, the accomplishment of which (Lk 9<sup>51</sup>, cf. v. 31) was His particular task, under the government of this 'Divine necessity' (Mt 16<sup>21</sup> 26<sup>34</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22</sup> 17<sup>25</sup> 22<sup>22, 27</sup> 24<sup>7, 44</sup>, Jn 3<sup>14</sup> 20<sup>9</sup>, cf. Ac 2<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>28</sup>, and Westcott on Jn 20<sup>9</sup>). His final journey to Jerusalem (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>), His rejection by the rulers (Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Lk 9<sup>52</sup> 17<sup>25</sup>), His betrayal (Lk 22<sup>3</sup>), arrest (Mt 26<sup>54</sup>), sufferings (Mt 26<sup>34</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Lk 9<sup>52</sup> 17<sup>25</sup>), and death (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Lk 9<sup>52</sup>) by crucifixion (Lk 24<sup>7</sup>, Jn 3<sup>14</sup>), His rising again (Jn 20<sup>9</sup>) on the third day (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Lk 9<sup>52</sup> 24<sup>7, 44</sup>)—each item alike is declared to have been 'a matter of necessity in pursuance of the Divine purpose' (Meyer, Mt 24<sup>34</sup>), 'a necessary part of the destiny assigned our Lord' (Meyer, Mt 26<sup>34</sup>). 'The death of our Lord' thus appears 'not as the accidental work of hostile caprice, but (cf. Ac 2<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>18</sup>) the necessary result of the Divine predestination (Lk 22<sup>22</sup>), to which Divine dei (Lk 24<sup>7</sup>) the personal free action of man had to serve as an instrument' (Meyer, Ac 4<sup>28</sup>).

How far the several events which entered into this life had been prophetically announced is obviously, in this view of it, a mere matter of detail. All of them lay open before the eyes of God; and the only limit to pre-announcement was the extent to which God had chosen to reveal what was to come to pass, through His servants the prophets. In some instances, however, the prophetic announcement is particularly adduced as the ground on which recognition of the necessity of occurrence rests. The fulfilment of Scripture thus becomes regulative for the life of Jesus. Whatever stood written of Him in the Law or the Prophets or the Psalms (Lk 24<sup>44</sup>) must needs (dei) be accomplished (Mt 26<sup>54</sup>, Lk 22<sup>37</sup> 24<sup>26</sup>, Jn 20<sup>9</sup>). Or, in another form of statement, particularly frequent in Mt. (12<sup>17, 28</sup> 23<sup>41</sup> 37<sup>12</sup> 13<sup>35</sup> 21<sup>4</sup> 22<sup>36</sup>) and Jn. (12<sup>38</sup> 13<sup>18</sup> 15<sup>25</sup> 17<sup>12</sup> 19<sup>36</sup>), but found also in the other Evangelists (Mk 14<sup>49</sup>, Lk 4<sup>21</sup>), the several occurrences of His life fell out as they did, 'in order that what was spoken by the Lord' through the prophets or in Scripture, 'might be fulfilled' (cf. Mt 27<sup>37</sup> 20<sup>34</sup> 27<sup>9</sup>, Lk 24<sup>44</sup>; in Jn 18<sup>31</sup>, Lk 24<sup>44</sup> declarations of Jesus are treated precisely similarly). That is to say, 'what was done stood . . . in the connexion of the Divine necessity, as an actual fact, by which prophecy was destined to be fulfilled. The Divine decree expressed in the latter must be accomplished, and to that end this . . . came to pass, and that, according to the whole of its contents' (Meyer, Mt 12<sup>35</sup>). The meaning is, not that there lies in the OT Scriptures a complete predictive account of all the details of the life of Jesus, which those skilled in the interpretation of Scripture might read off from its pages at will. This programme in its detailed completeness lies only in the Divine purpose; and in Scripture only so far forth as God has chosen to place it there for the guidance or the assurance of His people. The meaning is rather that all that stands written of Jesus in the OT Scriptures has its certain fulfilment in Him; and that enough stands written of Him there to assure His followers that in the course of His life, and in its, to them, strange and unexpected ending, He was not the prey of chance or the victim of the hatred of men, to the marring of His work or perhaps even the defeat of His mission, but was following step by step, straight to its goal, the predestined pathway marked out for Him in the counsels of eternity, and sufficiently revealed from of old in the Scriptures to enable all who were not 'foolish and slow of heart to believe in all that the prophets have spoken,' to perceive that the Christ must needs have lived just this life and fulfilled just this destiny.

That the whole course of the life of Jesus, and especially its culmination in the death which He died, was foreseen and afore-prepared by God, enters, thus, into the very substance of the Evangelical narrative. It enters equally into its very substance that this life was from the beginning lived out by Jesus Himself in full view of its drift and its issue. The Evangelists are as far from representing Jesus as driven blindly onwards by a Divine destiny unknown to Himself, along courses not of His own choosing, to an unanticipated end, as they are from representing Him as thwarted in His purposes, or limited in His achievement, or determined or modified in His aims or methods, by the conditions which from time to time emerged in His way. The very essence of their representation is that Jesus came into the world with a definite mission to execute, of the nature of which He was perfectly aware, and according to which He ordered the whole course of His life as it advanced under His competent control unswervingly to its preconceived mark. In their view His life was lived out, not in ignorance of its issues, or in the form of a series of trials and corrections, least of all in a more or less unavailing effort to wring success out of failure; but in complete knowledge of the counsels of God for Him, in perfect acquiescence in them, and in careful and voluntary fulfilment of them. The 'Divine dei' which governed His life is represented as fully recognized by Himself (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>, Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Lk 4<sup>43</sup> 9<sup>22</sup> 17<sup>22</sup> 24<sup>7</sup>, Jn 3<sup>14</sup> 12<sup>26</sup>), and the fulfilment of the intimations of prophecy in His life as accepted by Him as a rule for His voluntary action (Mt 26<sup>54</sup>, Lk 22<sup>27</sup> 24<sup>46</sup>, Jn 20<sup>9</sup>, Mk 14<sup>49</sup>, Lk 4<sup>21</sup>, Jn 13<sup>18</sup> 15<sup>23</sup> 17<sup>12</sup>; cf. Mt 13<sup>14</sup> 15<sup>7</sup> 24<sup>15</sup> 26<sup>32</sup>, Mk 7<sup>6</sup>). Determining all things, determined by none, the life He actually lived, leading up to the death He actually died, is in their view precisely the life which from the beginning He intended to live, ending in precisely the death in which, from the beginning, He intended this life to issue, undeflected by so much as a hair's-breadth from the straight path He had from the start marked out for Himself in the fullest prevision and provision of all the so-called chances and changes which might befall Him. Not only were there no surprises in life for Jesus (cf. art. AMAZEMENT, p. 48), and no compulsions; there were not even 'influences,' as we speak of 'influences' in a merely human career. The mark of this life, as the Evangelists depict it, is its calm and quiet superiority to all circumstance and condition, and to all the varied forces which sway other lives; its prime characteristics are voluntariness and independence. Neither His mother, nor His brethren, nor His disciples, nor the people He came to serve, nor His enemies bent upon His destruction, nor Satan himself with his temptations, could move Him one step from His chosen path. When men seemed to prevail over Him they were but working His will; the great 'No one has taken my life away from me; I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again' (Jn 10<sup>18</sup>), is but the enunciation for the supreme act, of the principle that governs all His movements. His own chosen pathway ever fully displayed before His feet; on it His feet fell quietly, but they found the way always unblocked. What He did, He came to do; and He carried out His programme with unwavering purpose and indefectible certitude. So at least the Evangelists represent Him. (Cf. the first half of a striking article on 'Die Selbständigkeit Jesu,' by Trott, in Luthard's ZKWL, 1883, iv, 233-241; in its latter half the art. falls away from its idea, and ends by making Jesus absolutely dependent on Scripture for His knowledge of God and Divine things: 'We have no right whatever to maintain that Jesus received revelations from the Father otherwise than through the medium of the sacred Scriptures'; that is a part of His complete humanity' (p. 238).

The signature of this supernatural life which the Evangelists depict Jesus as living, lies thus in the perfection of the foresight by which it was governed. Of the reality of this foresight they leave their readers in no doubt, nor yet of its completeness. They suggest it by the general picture they draw of the life which Jesus lived in view of His mission. They record repeated instances in which He mentions beforehand events yet to occur, or foreshadows the end from the beginning. They connect these manifestations of foresight with the possession by Him of knowledge in general, in comprehension and penetration alike far beyond what is native to man. It may perhaps be natural to surmise in the first instance that they intend to convey merely the conviction that in Jesus was manifested a prophet of supreme greatness, in whom, as the culminating example of prophecy (cf. Ac 3<sup>22, 23</sup>), resided beyond precedent the gifts proper to prophets. There can be no question that to the writers of the Gospels Jesus was 'the incarnate ideal of the prophet, who, as such, forms a class by Himself, and is more than a prophet' (this is what Schwartzkopff thinks Him, The Prophecies of Jesus Christ, p. 7). They record with evident sympathy the impression made by Him at the outset of His ministry, that God had at last in Him visited His people (Mk 6<sup>5</sup>, Lk 7<sup>16</sup>, Jn 4<sup>19</sup> 9<sup>7</sup>); they trace the ripening of this impression into a well-settled belief in His prophetic character (Mt 21<sup>11</sup>, Lk 24<sup>19</sup>, Mt 21<sup>46</sup>, Lk 7<sup>39</sup>, Jn 7<sup>40</sup>); and they remark upon the widespread suspicion which accompanied this belief, that He was something more than a prophet—possibly one of the old prophets returned, certainly a very special prophet charged with a very special mission for the introduction of the Messianic times (Mt 16<sup>14</sup>, Mk 6<sup>15</sup> 8<sup>28</sup>, Lk 9<sup>18</sup>, Jn 6<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>40</sup>). They represent Jesus as not only calling out and accepting this estimate of Him, but frankly assuming a prophet's place and title (Mt 13<sup>67</sup>, Mk 6<sup>4</sup>, Lk 4<sup>24</sup>, Jn 4<sup>4</sup>, Lk 13<sup>33</sup>), exercising a prophet's functions, and delivering prophetic discourses, in which He unveils the future (Mt 24<sup>3</sup>, Mk 13<sup>9</sup>, Jn 14<sup>22</sup>, cf. Mt 28<sup>8</sup>, Lk 24<sup>44</sup>, and such passages as Mt 23<sup>32, 34</sup>, Mk 16<sup>7</sup>). Nevertheless it is very clear that in their allusions to the supernatural knowledge of Jesus, the Evangelists suppose themselves to be illustrating something very much greater than merely prophetic inspiration. The specific difference between Jesus and a prophet, in their view, was that while a prophet's human knowledge is increased by many things revealed to him by God (Am 3<sup>7</sup>), Jesus participated in all the fulness of the Divine knowledge (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, Lk 10<sup>22</sup>, Jn 16<sup>18</sup> 18<sup>16</sup> 21<sup>17</sup>), so that all that is knowable lay open before Him (Jn 17<sup>27</sup>). The Evangelists, in a word, obviously intend to attribute Divine omniscience to Jesus, and in their adduction of instances of His supernatural knowledge, whether with respect to hidden things or to those yet buried in the future, are illustrating His possession of this Divine omniscience (cf. Muirhead, The Eschatology of Jesus, p. 119, where, in partial correction of the more inadequate statement of p. 48, there is recognized in the Evangelists at least a 'tendency' to attribute to our Lord 'Divine dignity' and 'literal omniscience').

That this is the case with St. John's Gospel is very commonly recognized (for a plain statement of the evidence see Karl Müller, Göttliches Wissen und göttliche Macht des Johann. Christus, 1882, § 4, pp. 29-47; 'Zeugnisse des vierten Evangeliums für Jesu göttliches Wissen'). It is not too much to say, indeed, that one of the chief objects which the author of that Gospel set before himself was to make clear to his readers the superhuman knowledge of Jesus, with especial reference, of course, to His own career. It therefore records direct ascriptions of omniscience to Jesus, and represents them as favourably received by Him (Jn 16<sup>30</sup> 21<sup>17</sup>; cf. Liddon, Bampton Lectures, ed. 4, 1869, p. 466). It makes it almost the business of its opening chapters to exhibit this omniscience at work in the especially Divine form (Lk 16<sup>15</sup>, Ac 1<sup>24</sup>, He 4<sup>13</sup>, Ps 138 (139)<sup>5</sup>, Jer 17<sup>18</sup> 20<sup>12</sup>; cf. Swete on Mk 2<sup>8</sup>) of immediate, universal, and complete knowledge of the thoughts and intents of the human heart (cf. Westcott on Jn 2<sup>8</sup>), laying down the general thesis in 2<sup>24</sup> (cf. 6<sup>4</sup>, 7<sup>21</sup>), and illustrating it in detail in the cases of all with whom Jesus came into contact in the opening days of His ministry (cf. Westcott on Jn 1<sup>47</sup>), Peter (1<sup>49</sup>), Philip (1<sup>49</sup>), Nathanael (1<sup>47</sup>), Mary (2<sup>2</sup>), Nicodemus (3), the woman of Samaria (4). In the especially striking case of the choice of Judas Iscariot as one of the Apostles, it expressly explains that this was due to no ignorance of Judas' character or of his future action (6<sup>70</sup> 13<sup>21</sup>), but was done as part of our Lord's voluntary execution of His own well-laid plans. It pictures Jesus with great explicitness as prosecuting His whole work in full knowledge of all the things that were coming upon Him (Jn 18<sup>4</sup>, cf. Westcott), and with a view to subjecting them all to His governing hand, so that His life from the beginning should run steadily onward on the lines of a thoroughly wrought-out plan (Jn 1<sup>47</sup> 2<sup>23</sup>, 24<sup>34</sup> 6<sup>4</sup>, 7<sup>7</sup> 8<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>4</sup>, 12<sup>7</sup>, 22<sup>13</sup>, 21<sup>1</sup>, 21<sup>23</sup>, 14<sup>2</sup>, 16<sup>2</sup>, 22<sup>18</sup>, 24<sup>9</sup>).

It is difficult to see, however, why St. John's Gospel should be separated from its companions in this matter (Schenkel says frankly that it is only because there is no such passage in St. John's Gospel as Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, on which see below. Whatever else must be said of W. Wrede's Das Messiasgeheimnis, etc., 1901, it must be admitted that it has broken down this artificial distinction between the Gospel of John and the Synoptics). If they do not, like St. John (16<sup>30</sup> 21<sup>17</sup>), record direct ascriptions of precise omniscience to Jesus by His followers, they do, like St. John, represent Him as Himself claiming to be the depository and distributor of the Father's knowledge (Mt 11<sup>27-30</sup>, Lk 10<sup>22-24</sup>). Nor do they lag behind St. John in attributing to Jesus the Divine prerogative of reading the heart (Mk 6<sup>9</sup>, Meyer; Mk 2<sup>8</sup>-9<sup>8</sup> 12<sup>28-34</sup>, Swete, p. lxxxviii; Lk 5<sup>22</sup> 7<sup>30</sup>) or the manifestation, in other forms, of God-like omniscience (Mt 17<sup>27</sup> 21<sup>2</sup>, Mk 11<sup>12</sup> 14<sup>18</sup>, Lk 5<sup>19</sup> 19<sup>20</sup> 22<sup>29</sup>; cf. O. Holtzmann, Was Jesus Ekstatiker? p. 14 and p. 15, note). Least of all do they fall behind St. John in insisting upon the perfection of the foresight of Jesus in all matters connected with His own life and death (Mt 9<sup>15</sup> 12<sup>30</sup> 16<sup>24</sup> 20<sup>22-23</sup> 26<sup>21-22</sup> 24<sup>30</sup>, Mk 2<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>31</sup> 9<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>33</sup> 20<sup>21</sup> 4<sup>11</sup> 11<sup>12</sup> 14<sup>18</sup> 15<sup>15</sup> 16<sup>7</sup>, Lk 6<sup>24</sup> 9<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>21</sup> 12<sup>20</sup> 13<sup>31</sup> 17<sup>25</sup> 18<sup>31</sup> 19<sup>30</sup> 22<sup>10</sup> 21<sup>24</sup> 24<sup>44</sup>). Nothing could exceed the detailed precision of these announcements,—a characteristic which has been turned, of course, to their discredit as genuine utterances of Jesus by writers who find difficulty with detailed prediction. The form and contents of these texts, remarks Wrede (Messiasgeheimnis, etc. p. 98), 'speak a language which cannot be misunderstood. They are nothing but a short summary of the Passion history—'cast, of course, in the future tense.' 'The Passion-history,' he proceeds, quoting Eichhorn, 'could certainly not be more exactly related in few words.' In very fact, it is perfectly clear—whether they did it by placing upon His lips predictions He never uttered and never could have uttered, is another question—that the Evangelists designed to represent Jesus as endowed with the absolute and unlimited foresight consonant with His Divine nature (see Liddon, Bampton Lectures, ed. 4, p. 464 ff.; and cf. A. J. Mason, The Conditions of our Lord's Life on Earth, pp. 155-194).

The force of this representation cannot be broken, of course, by raising the question afresh whether the supernatural knowledge attributed by the Evangelists to our Lord may not, in many of its items at least, if not in its whole extent, find its analogues, after all, in human powers, or be explained as not different in kind from that of the prophets (cf. e.g. Westcott, 'Additional Note on Jn 2<sup>4</sup>'; A. J. Mason, Conditions, etc. pp. 162-163). The question more immediately before us does not concern our own view of the nature and origin of this knowledge, but that of the Evangelists. If we will keep these two questions separate we shall scarcely be able to doubt that the Evangelists mean to present this knowledge as one of the marks of our Lord's Divine dignity. In interpreting them we are not entitled to parcel out the mass of the illustrations of His supernormal knowledge which they record to differing sources, as may fall in with our own conceptions of the inherent possibilities of each case; finding indications in some instances merely of His fine human instinct, in others of His prophetic inspiration, while reserving others—if such others are left to us in our analysis—as products of His Divine intuition. The Evangelists suggest no such lines of cleavage in the mass; and they must be interpreted from their own standpoint. This finds its centre in their expressed conviction that in Jesus Christ dwelt the fulness of the knowledge of God (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, Lk 10<sup>22</sup>, Jn 8<sup>58</sup> 16<sup>18</sup> 17<sup>20</sup>). To them His knowledge of God and of Divine things, of Himself in His Person and mission, of the course of His life and the events which would befall Him in the prosecution of the work whereto He had been sent, of the men around Him,—His followers and friends, the people and their rulers,—down to the most hidden depths of their natures and the most intimate processes of their secret thoughts, and of all the things forming the environment in which the drama He was enacting was cast, however widely that environment be conceived, or however minutely it be contemplated,—was but the manifestation, in the ever-widening circles of our human modes of conception, of the perfect apprehension and understanding that dwelt changelessly in His Divine intelligence. He who knew God perfectly,—it were little that He should know man and the world perfectly too; all that affected His own work and career, of course, and with it, equally of course, all that lay outside of this (cf. Mason, Conditions, etc. p. 168); in a word, unlimitedly, all things. Even if nothing but the Law of Parsimony stood in the way, it might well be understood that the Evangelists would be deterred from seeking, in the case of such a Being, other sources of information besides His Divine intelligence to account for all His far-reaching and varied knowledge. At all events, it is clearly their conviction that all He knew—the scope of which was unbounded and its depth unfathomed, though their record suggests rather than fully illustrates it—found its explanation in the dignity of His person as God manifest in the flesh.

Nor can the effect of their representation of Jesus as the subject of this all-embracing Divine knowledge be destroyed by the discovery in their narratives of another line of representation in which our Lord is set forth as living His life out under the conditions which belong naturally to the humanity He had assumed. These representations are certainly to be neglected as little as those others in which His Divine omniscience is suggested. They bring to our observation another side of the complex personality that is depicted, which, if it cannot be said to be as emphatically insisted upon by the Evangelists, is nevertheless, perhaps, equally pervasively illustrated. This is the true humanity of our Lord, within the scope of which He willed to live out His life upon earth, that He might accomplish the mission for which He had been sent. The suggestion that He might break over the bounds of His mission, in order that He might escape from the ruggedness of His chosen path, by the exercise whether of His almighty power (Mt 4<sup>23</sup>, Lk 4<sup>23</sup>) or of His unerring foresight (Mt 16<sup>27</sup>), He treated first and last as a temptation of the Evil One—for 'how then should the Scriptures be fulfilled that thus it must be' (Mt 26<sup>54</sup>)? It is very easy, to be sure, to exaggerate the indications in the Evangelists of the confinement of our Lord's activities within the limits of human powers. It is an exaggeration, for example, to speak as if the Evangelists represent Him as frequently surprised by the events which befall Him; they never predicate surprise of Him, and it is only by a very precarious inference from the events recorded that they can ever be supposed even to suggest or allow place for such an emotion in our Lord (cf. art. AMAZEMENT, p. 48). It is an exaggeration again to adduce our Lord's questions as attempts to elicit information for His own guidance: His questions are often plainly dialectical or rhetorical, or, like some of His actions, solely for the benefit of those 'that stood around.' It is once more an exaggeration to adduce the employment in many cases of the term γινώσκω, when the Evangelists speak of our Lord's knowledge, as if it were thereby implied that this knowledge was freshly born in His mind: the assumed distinction, but faintly marked in Greek literature, cannot be traced in the usage of the terms γινώσκω and εἰσέτινα in their application to our Lord's knowledge; these terms even replace one another in parallel accounts of the same instance (Mt 22<sup>28</sup>, Mk 12<sup>28</sup>; [Mt 9<sup>21</sup>] Mk 2<sup>2</sup>, Lk 5<sup>22</sup>; cf. Mt 12<sup>25</sup>, Lk 6<sup>9</sup>, 11<sup>27</sup>, Jn 6<sup>25</sup>); γινώσκω is used of the undoubted Divine knowledge of our Lord (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, Lk 10<sup>22</sup>, Jn 10<sup>15</sup>, 17<sup>25</sup>, Mt 7<sup>28</sup>; cf. Jn 2<sup>24</sup>, 2<sup>25</sup>, 5<sup>22</sup>, 10<sup>4</sup>, 47); and indeed of the knowledge of God Himself (Lk 10<sup>22</sup>, 16<sup>15</sup>, Jn 10<sup>15</sup> [Mt 11<sup>27</sup>]); and, in any event, there is a distinction which in such nice inquiries should not be neglected, between saying that the occurrence of an event, being perceived, was the occasion of an action, and saying that knowledge of the event, perceived as occurring, waited on its occurrence. Gravely vitiated by such exaggerations as most discussions of the subject are, enough remains, however, after all exaggeration is pruned away, to assure us, not indeed that our Lord's life on earth was, in the view of the Evangelists, an exclusively human one; or that, apart from the constant exercise of His will to make it such, it was controlled by the limitations of humanity; but certainly that it was, in their view, lived out, so far as was consistent with the fulfilment of the mission for which He came—and as an indispensable condition of the fulfilment of that mission—under the limitations belonging to a purely human life. The classical passages in this reference are those striking statements in the second chapter of Luke (2<sup>20</sup>, 22) in which is summed up our Lord's growth from infancy to manhood, including, of course, His intellectual development (cf. art. CHILDREN, p. 302), and His own remarkable declaration recorded in Mt 24<sup>36</sup>, Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, in which He affirms His ignorance of the day and hour of His return to earth. Supplemented by their general dramatization of His life within the range of the purely human, these passages are enough to assure us that in the view of the Evangelists there was in our Lord a purely human soul, which bore its own proper part in His life, and which, as human souls do, grew in knowledge as it grew in wisdom and grace, and remained to the end, as human souls must, ignorant of many things,—nay, which, because human souls are finite, must ever be ignorant of much embraced in the universal vision of the Divine Spirit. We may wonder why the 'day and hour' of His own return should remain among the things of which our Lord's human soul continued ignorant throughout His earthly life. But this is a matter about which surely we need not much concern ourselves. We can never do more than vaguely guess at the law which governs the Divine and excursions which characterize the knowledge-contents of any human mind, limited as human minds are not only qualitatively but quantitatively; and least of all could we hope to penetrate the principle of selection in the case of the perfect human intelligence of our Lord; nor have the Evangelists hinted their view of the matter. We must just be content to recognize that we are face to face here with the mystery of the Two Natures, which, although they do not, of course, formally enunciate the doctrine in so many words, the Evangelists yet effectively teach, since by it alone can consistency be induced between the two classes of facts which they present unhesitatingly in their narratives. Only, if we would do justice to their presentation, we must take clear note of two of its characteristics. They do not simply, in separated portions of their narratives, adduce the facts which manifest our Lord's Divine powers and His human characteristics, but interlace them inextricably in the same sections of the narratives. And they do not subject the Divine that is in Christ to the limitations of the human, but quite decisively present the Divine as dominating all, and as giving play to the human only by a constant, voluntary withholding of its full manifestation in the interests of the task undertaken. Observe the story, for example, in Jn 11, which Dr. Mason (Conditions, etc. p. 143) justly speaks of as 'indeed a marvellous weaving together of that which is natural and that which is above nature.' 'Jesus learns from others that Lazarus is sick, but knows without any further message that Lazarus is dead; He weeps and groans at the sight of the sorrow which surrounds Him, yet calmly gives thanks for the accomplishment of the miracle before it has been accomplished.' This conjunction of the two elements is typical of the whole Evangelical narrative. As portrayed in it our Lord's life is distinctly duplex; and can be consistently construed only by the help of the conception of the Two Natures. And just as distinctly is this life portrayed in these narratives as receiving its determination not from the human, but from the Divine side. If what ance among a class of modern scholars, whose efforts have been devoted to giving to our Lord's life on earth a character more normally human than it seems to possess as it lies on the pages of the Evangelists. The negative principle of the new constructions offered of the course and springs of our Lord's career being rejection of the account given by the Evangelists, these scholars are thrown back for guidance very much upon their own subjective estimate of probabilities. The Gospels are, however, the sole sources of information for the events of our Lord's life, and it is impossible to decline their aid altogether. Few, accordingly, have been able to discard entirely the general framework of the life of Christ they present (for those who are inclined to represent Jesus as making no claim even to be the Messiah, see H. Holtzmann, NT Theol. i, 280, note; Meinhold as there referred to; and Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimnis, especially Appendix vii.). Most have derived enough from the Gospels to assume that a crisis of some sort occurred at Caesarea Philippi, where the Evangelists represent our Lord as beginning formally and frankly to prepare His disciples for His death (Mt 16<sup>7</sup>).

Great differences arise at once, however, over what this crisis was. Schenkel supposes that it was only at this point in His ministry that Jesus began to think Himself the Messiah; Strauss is willing to believe He suspected Himself to be the Messiah earlier, and supposes that He now first began to proclaim Himself such; P. W. Schmidt and Lobstein imagine that on this day He bled out the sweat of His head and faced death looming in His path; Weizsäcker and Keim allow that He thought and proclaimed Himself the Messiah from the beginning, and suppose that what is meant is that only now did He come to see with clearness that His ministry would end in His death,—and as death for the Messiah means return, they add that here He begins His proclamation of His return in glory. To this Schenkel and Hase find difficulty in assenting, feeling it impossible that the Founder of a spiritual kingdom should look forward to its consummation in a physical one, and insisting, therefore, that though Jesus may well have predicted the destruction of His enemies, He can scarcely have foretold His own coming in glory. On the other hand, Strauss and Baur judge that a prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem too closely resembles what actually occurred not to be post eventum, but see no reason why Jesus should not have dreamed of coming back on the clouds of heaven. As to His death, Strauss thinks He began to anticipate it only shortly before His last journey to Jerusalem; while Holsten cannot believe that He realized what was before Him until He actually arrived at Jerusalem, and even then did not acquiesce in it (so Spitta). That He went to Jerusalem for the purpose of dying, neither Weizsäcker, nor Brundt, nor H. Holtzmann, nor Schützler will admit, though the two last named allow that He foresaw that the journey would end in His death; or at least that it possibly would, adds Pfänder, since, of course, a possibility of success lay open to Him (cf. H. Holtzmann, NT Theol. i, 286–286, note). As many men, so many opinions. As the positive principle of construction in all these schemes of life for Jesus is desupernaturalization, they differ, so far as the prophetic element in His teaching as reported by the Evangelists is concerned, chiefly in the measure in which they explain it as due more or less entirely to the Evangelists carrying their own ideas, or the ideas of the community in which they lived, back into Jesus' mouth; or allow it more or less fully to Jesus, indeed, but only in a form which can be thought of as not rising above the natural prognostications of a man in His position. A few deny to Jesus the entire series of predictions reported in the Gospels, and ascribe them in mass to the thought of the later community (e.g. Röhren, Wrede). A few, on the other hand, allow the whole, or nearly the whole, series to Jesus, and explain them all naturalistically. Most take an intermediate position, determined by the principle that all which seems to each critic incapable of naturalistic explanation as utterances of Jesus shall be assigned to later origin. Accordingly, the concrete details in the alleged predictions are quite generally denied to Jesus, and represented as easily explicable modifications, in accordance with the actual course of events, of what Jesus really said. The prediction of resurrection on the third day, for example, is held by many (e.g. Schwartzkopff) to be too precise a determination, and is therefore excluded from the prophecy, or explained as only a periphrasis for an indefinite short time, after the analogy of Hos 6<sup>2</sup> (so even B. Weiss). To others a prediction of a resurrection at all seems incredible (Strauss, Schenkel, Weizsäcker, Keim, Brundt), and it is transmuted into, at most, a premonition of future victory. By yet others (as Holsten) even the anticipation of death is doubted, and nothing of forecast is left to Jesus except, possibly, a vague anticipation of difficulty and suffering; while with others even this gives way, and Jesus is represented as passing either the greater part of His life (Pabst), or the whole of it, in joyful expectation of more or less unbroken success, or at least, however thickly the clouds gathered over His head, in inextinguishable hope in God and His interposition in His behalf (cf. the brief general sketch of opinions in Wrede, Messiasgeheimnis, p. 85).

Thus, over-against the 'dogmatic' view of the life of Christ, set forth in the Evangelists, according to which Jesus came into the world to die, and which is dominated, therefore, by foresight, is set, in polar opposition to it, a new view, calling itself 'historical,' the principle of which is the denial to Jesus of any foresight whatever beyond the most limited human forecast. No pretence is ordinarily made that this new view is given support by the Evangelical records; it is put forward on a priori or general grounds—as, for example, the only psychologically possible view (e.g. Schwartzkopff, Prophecies of Christ, p. 28; cf. Denney, Death of Christ, p. 11, and especially the just strictures of Wrede, Messiasgeheimnis, pp. 2, 3). It professes to find it incredible that Jesus entered upon His ministry with any other expectation than success. Contact with men, however, it allows, brought gradually the discovery of the hopelessness of drawing them to His spiritual ideals; the growing enmity of the rulers opened before Him the prospect of disaster; and thus there came to Him the slow recognition, first of the possibility, and then of the certainty, of failure; or, at least, since failure was impossible for the mission He had come to perform, of the necessity of passing through suffering to the ultimate success. So slowly was the readjustment to this new point of view made, that even at the end—as the prayer at Gethsemane shows—there remained a lingering hope that the extremity of death might be avoided. So far as a general sketch can be made of a view presented by its several adherents with great variety of detail, this is the essential fabric of the new view (cf. the general statements of Kähler, Zur Lehre von der Versöhnung, 159; Denney, Death of Christ, 11; Wrede, Messiasgeheimnis, 36). Only such parts of the predictive element of the teaching attributed to Jesus in the Gospels as are thought capable of naturalistic interpretation are incorporated into this new construction. By those who wish to bring in as much as possible, it is said, for example, that our Lord was too firmly persuaded of His Messianic appointment and function, and was too clear that this function centred in the establishment of the Kingdom, to accept death itself as failure. When He perceived death impending, that meant to Him, therefore, return; and return to bring in the Messianic glory meant resurrection. When He thought and spoke of death, therefore, He necessarily thought and spoke also of resurrection and return; the three went inevitably together; and if He anticipated the one, He must have anticipated the others also. Under this general scheme all sorts of opinions are held as to when, how, and under what impulses Jesus formed and taught this eschatological programme. As notable a construction as any holds that He first became certain of His Messiahship in an ecstatic vision which accompanied His baptism; that the Messiah must suffer was already borne in upon His conviction in the course of His temptation; but it was not until the scene at Caesarea Philippi that He attained the happy assurance that the Messianic glory lay behind the dreadful death impending over Him. This great conviction, attained in principle in the ecstasy of that moment, was, nevertheless, only gradually assimilated. When Jesus was labouring with His disciples, He was labouring also with Himself. In this particular construction (it is O. Holtzmann's) an element of 'ecstasy' is introduced; more commonly the advanced Jesus is supposed to make in His anticipations are thought to rest on processes of formal reasoning. In either case, He is pictured as only slowly, under the stress of compelling circumstances, reaching convictions of what awaited Him in the future; and thus He is conceived distinctly as the victim rather than as the Lord of His destiny. So far from entering the world to die, and by His death to save the world, and in His own good time and way accomplishing this great mission, He enters life set upon living, and only yields step by step reluctantly to the hard fate which inexorably closes upon Him. That He clings through all to His conviction of His Messiahship, and adjusts His hope of accomplishing His Messianic mission to the overmastering pressure of circumstances,—is that not a pathetic trait of human nature? Do not all enthusiasts the like? Is it not precisely the mark of their fanaticism? The plain fact is, if we may express it in the brutal frankness of common speech, in this view of Jesus' career He miscalculated and failed; and then naturally sought (or His followers sought for Him) to save the failure (or the appearance of failure) by inventing a new dénouement for the career He had hoped for in vain, a new dénouement which—has it failed too? Most of our modern theorists are impelled to recognize that it too has failed. When Jesus so painfully adjusted Himself to the hard destiny which more and more obtruded itself upon His recognition, He taught that death was but an incident in His career, and after death would come the victory. Can we believe that He foresaw that thousands of years would intervene between what He represented as but an apparent catastrophe and the glorious reversal to which He directed His own and His followers' eyes? On the contrary, He expected and He taught that He would come back soon—certainly before the generation which had witnessed His apparent defeat had passed away; and that He would then establish that Messianic Kingdom which from the beginning of His ministry He had unvaryingly taught was at hand. He did not do so. Is there any reason to believe that He ever will return? Can the 'foresight' which has repeatedly failed so miserably be trusted still,—for what we choose to separate out from the mass of His expectations as the core of the matter? On what grounds shall we adjust the discredited 'foresight' to the course of events, obviously unforeseen by Him, since His death? Where is the end of these 'adjustments'? Have we not already with 'adjustment' after 'adjustment' transformed beyond recognition the expectations of Jesus, even the latest and fullest to which He attained, and transmuted them into something fundamentally different,—passed, in a word, so far beyond Him, that we retain only an artificial connexion with Him and His real teaching, a connexion mediated by little more than a word?

That in this modern construction we have the precise contradictory of the conception of Jesus and of the course of His life on earth given us by the Evangelists, it needs no argument to establish. In the Gospel presentation, foresight is made the principle of our Lord's career. In the modern view He is credited with no foresight whatever. At best, He was possessed by a fixed conviction of His Messianic mission, whether gained in ecstatic vision (as, e.g., O. Holtzmann) or acquired in deep religious experiences (as, e.g., Schwartzkopff); and He felt an assurance, based on this ineradicable conviction, that in His own good time and way God would work that mission out for Him; and in this assurance He went faithfully onward fulfilling His daily task, bumbling meanwhile egregiously in His reading of the scroll of destiny which was unrolling for Him. It is an intensely, even an exaggeratedly, human Christ which is here offered us; and He stands, therefore, in the strongest contrast with the frankly Divine Christ which the Gospels present to us. On what grounds can we be expected to substitute this for that? Certainly not on grounds of historical record. We have no historical record of the self-consciousness of Jesus except that embodied in the Gospel dramatization of His life and the Gospel report of His teaching; and that record expressly contradicts at every step this modern reconstruction of its contents and development. The very principle of the modern construction is reversal of the Gospel delineation. Its peculiarity is that, though it calls itself the 'historical' view, it has behind it no single scrap of historical testimony; the entirety of historical evidence contradicts it flatly. Are we to accept it, then, on the general grounds of inherent probability and rational construction? It is historically impossible that the great religious movement which we call Christianity could have taken its origin and derived its inspiration—an inspiration far from spent after two thousand years—from such a figure as this Jesus. The plain fact is that in these modern reconstructions we have nothing but a sustained attempt to construct a naturalistic Jesus; and their chief interest is that they bring before us with unwonted clearness the kind of being the man must have been who at that time and in those circumstances could have come forward making the claims which Jesus made without supernatural nature, endowment, or aid to sustain Him. The value of the speculation is that it makes superabundantly clear that no such being could have occupied the place which the historical Jesus occupied; could have made the impression on His followers which the historical Jesus made; could have become the source of the stream of religious influence which we call Christianity, as the historical Jesus became. The clear formulation of the naturalistic hypothesis, in the construction of a naturalistic Jesus, in other words, throws us violently back upon the Divine Jesus of the Evangelists as the only Jesus that is historically possible. From this point of view, the labours of the scholars who have with infinite pains built up this construction of Jesus' life and development have not been in vain.

What, then, is to be said of the predictions of Jesus, and especially of the three great series of prophecies of His death, resurrection, and return, with respect to their contents and fulfilment? This is not the place to discuss the eschatology of Jesus. But a few general remarks seem not uncalled for. The topic has received of late much renewed attention with very varied results, the number and variety of constructions proposed having been greatly increased above what the inherent difficulty of the subject will account for, by the freedom with which the Scripture data have been modified or set aside on so-called critical grounds by the several investigators. Nevertheless, most of the new interpretations also may be classified under the old categories of futuristic, preteristic, and spiritualistic.

The spiritualistic interpretation—whose method of dealing with our Lord's predictions readily falls in with a widespread theory that it is 'contrary to the spirit and manner of genuine prophecy to predict actual circumstances like a soothsayer' (Muirhead, Eschatology of Jesus, p. 10; Schwartzkopff, Prophecies of Jesus Christ, 76, 221, 228, 276, 312, etc.)—has received a new impulse through its attractive presentation by Erich Haupt (Eschatologie, Aussagen Jesu, etc., 1896). Christ's eschatology, says Haupt, is infinitely simple, and all that He predicts is to be accomplished in a heavenly way which passes our comprehension; there is no soothsaying in His utterances—'nowhere any predictions of external occurrences, everywhere only great moral religious laws which must operate everywhere and always, while nothing is said of the form in which they must act' (p. 157). A considerable stir has been created also by the revival (Schleiermacher, Weiss) by Weiffenbach (Der Wiederkehrzeitpunkt Jesu, 1879; Die Frage der Wiederkunft Jesu, 1901) of the identification of the return of Christ with His resurrection, although this view has retained few adherents since its refutation by Schwartzkopff (The Prophecies of Jesus Christ, 1896), whose own view is its exact contradictory, viz. that by His resurrection Jesus meant just His return. The general conception, however, that 'for Jesus the hope of resurrection and the thought of return fell together,' so that 'when Jesus spoke of His resurrection He was thinking of His return, and vice versa' (O. Holtzmann, Was Jesus Erwarteter? 67, note), is very widely held. The subsidiary hypothesis (first suggested by Colani) of the inclusion in the great eschatological discourse attributed by the Evangelists to our Lord of a 'little Apocalypse' of Jewish or Jewish Christian origin, by which Wellfennbach eased his task, has in more or less modified form received the widest acceptance (cf. H. Holtzmann, NT Theol. i. 327, note), but rests on no solid grounds (cf. Weiss, Beyschlag, Haupt, Clemen). Most adherents of the modern school are clear that Jesus expected and asserted that He would return in Messianic glory for the consummation of the Kingdom; and most of them are equally clear that in this expectation and assertion, Jesus was mistaken (cf. H. Holtzmann, NT Theol. i. 312 f.). 'In the expectation that the kingdom was soon to come,' says Oscar Holtzmann in a passage typical enough of this whole school of exposition (Was Jesus Erwarteter? p. 138), 'Jesus erred in a human way'; and in such passages as Mk 9:1, 13:30, Mt 10:23 he considers that the error is obvious. He adds, 'That such an error on the part of Jesus concerning not a side-issue but a fundamental point of His faith,—His first proclamation began, according to Mk 1:3, with the εὐαγγέλιον ἡ βασιλείας τοῦ θεοῦ ἔγγισεν ὑμῶν—does not facilitate faith in Jesus is self-evident; but this error of Jesus is for His Church a highly instructive and therefore highly valuable warning to distinguish between the temporary and the permanent in the work of Jesus.' Not every one even of this school can go, however, quite this length. Even Schwartzkopf, while allowing that Jesus erred in this matter, wishes on this very account to think of the mere definition of times and seasons as belonging to the form rather than to the essence of His teaching (The Prophecies of Jesus Christ, 1895, Eng. tr., 1897, p. 312). Essence of Jesus Christ (1896, p. 8); and in that Baldenpferger is in substantial agreement with him (Seibtheussetzung Jesu, p. 148, 2 p. 205). From the other side, E. Haug (Eschatolog. Aussagen Jesu, 1886, p. 138 f.) urges that Jesus must be supposed to have been able to avoid all errors, at least in the religious sphere, even if they concern nothing but the form; while Wellfennbach (Die Prop. etc. p. 9) thinks we should hesitate to suppose Jesus could have erred in too close a definition of the time of His advent, when He expressly confesses that He was ignorant of the time (cf. Murhead, Eschat. of Jesus, 48-50, and esp. 117). Probably Fritz Barth (Die Hauptprobleme des Lebens Jesu, 1899, pp. 167-170) stands alone in cutting the knot by appealing to the conditionality of all prophecy. According to him, Jesus did, indeed, predict His return as coincident with the destruction of Jerusalem; but all genuine prophecy is conditioned upon the conduct of the human agents involved—'between prediction and fulfilment the conduct of man intrudes as a codetermining factor on which the fulfilment depends.' Thus this prediction has not failed, but its fulfilment has only been postponed—in accordance, it must be confessed, not with the will of God, but with that of man. It is difficult to see how Jesus is thus shielded from the imputation of defective foresight; but at least Barth is able on this view still to look for a return of the Lord.

The difficulty which the passages in our Saviour's teaching under discussion present to the reverent expositor is, of course, not to be denied or minimized. But surely this difficulty would need to be much more hopeless than it is before it could compel or justify the assumption of error 'in One who has never been convicted of error in anything else' (Sanday in Hastings' DB ii. 635—the whole passage should be read). The problem that faces us in this matter, it is apparent, in the meantime, is not one which can find its solution as a corollary to a speculative general view of our Lord's self-consciousness, its contents, and development. It is distinctly a problem of exegesis. We should be very sure that we know fully and precisely all that our Lord has declared about His return—its what and how and when—before we venture to suggest, even to our most intimate thought, that He has committed so gross an error as to its what and how and when as is so often assumed; especially as He has in the most solemn manner declared concerning precisely the words under consideration that heaven and earth shall pass away, but not His words. It would be sad if the passage of time has shown this declaration also to be mistaken. Meanwhile, the perfect foresight of our Lord, asserted and illustrated by all the Evangelists, certainly cannot be set aside by the facile assumption of an error on His part in a matter in which it is so difficult to demonstrate an error, and in which assumptions of all sorts are so little justified. For the detailed discussion of our Lord's eschatology, including the determination of His meaning in these utterances, reference must, however, be made to works treating expressly of this subject.

BENJAMIN B. WARFIELD.

FORGIVENESS.—

Three words are used in the Gospels which are rendered in English by the word 'forgive':—ἀφίεναι, to set free, once only, in Lk 6:7; χαρίζεσθαι, to show oneself gracious, or forgive frankly, in Lk 7:48; and ἀξιωμα, to remit, or let off, 37 times in the Synoptic Gospels. The noun ἄφεσις, 'remission' or 'forgiveness,' is found 8 times in the Synoptics, the words 'of sins' or 'of trespasses' being either added or closely implied.

In the treatment of the subject in this article three things must be borne in mind. First, that the words employed by Christ and the ideas they represent are not entirely new as they come from His lips. Our Lord presupposes and then puts His own characteristic impress upon a doctrine of forgiveness with which His hearers were for the most part familiar, and which for us is embodied in the OT. Secondly, that no complete study of Christ's teaching concerning forgiveness can be made, unless other words, such as 'save,' 'justify,' and 'cleanse,' are taken into account, and the whole subject of release from the guilt and bondage of sin, as promised by Him, is kept in view. And, thirdly, that to stop short with the recorded words of Christ Himself on the matter is—speakingly reverently—not to know His whole mind upon it. It was impossible for Him in the course of His earthly ministry to set forth the full significance of His work for men, before it was accomplished. Hence for a complete account of the significance of His death we turn to the teaching of the Apostles, enlightened as they were by the Holy Spirit whom He had promised. In due course were revealed those 'many things' concerning His cross and passion which His disciples could not 'bear' during His lifetime. Down even to the very close of His short ministry on earth the rudimentary spiritual intelligence of the Apostles was unequal to carrying the full burden of the gospel as they afterwards understood it. The way in which that gospel was to be emphatically one of forgiveness, that 'through this man is proclaimed remission of sins, and by him every one that believeth is justified from all things from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses,' was only made clear afterwards. It being therefore carefully borne in mind that the OT prepared the way for Christ's teaching on forgiveness, and that the Epistles developed and completed it, this article will deal only with that stage in the biblical doctrine of the subject which is represented by Christ and the Gospels. The consideration of it will be divided into four sections: (1) the Divine forgiveness of man, (2) Christ's own power to forgive sins, (3) the duty of men to forgive one another, (4) the extent to which authority to forgive is vested in the Christian community.

1. God the Father as forgiving the sins of men.—The first reference chronologically to this subject in the Gospels is found in the Benedictus, or Psalm of Zacharias (Lk 1:7). The prophecy concerning John the Baptist announces that he is to give 'knowledge of salvation unto his people, in the remission of their sins, according to the tender mercy of our God,' etc. The whole tenor of the canticle goes to show that God's ancient promises were about to be fulfilled in the coming of a Saviour through whom the great boon of remission of sins was to be secured in a fuller sense than had hitherto obtained. When the time came, John the Baptist is declared to have preached the baptism of repentance 'unto remission of sins' (Mk 1:4, Lk 3:3). In the same connexion may be taken the interpretation of the name Jesus in Mt 1:21 'he shall save his people from their sins,' and the 'Saviour, Christ the Lord,' of Lk 24, though the word 'forgiveness' does not occur. It was indeed implicit throughout our Lord's ministry, all His declarations concerning His coming 'not to call the righteous, but sinners' (Mt 9<sup>13</sup>), 'to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19<sup>10</sup>), and His promise of 'rest to the souls' of men (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>), showing that the object of His ministry was to reclaim from sin, by bringing men to that forgiveness and cleansing which God had promised through repentance and faith in Him.

The explicit references to forgiveness of sin are comparatively few, but they are clear and definite in character, and quite sufficient to establish doctrine on the subject. They are: (a) the petition in the Lord's Prayer, 'Forgive us our debts,' Mt 6<sup>12</sup> ('our sins,' Lk 11<sup>4</sup>), combined with Mt 6<sup>14-15</sup>, Mk 11<sup>25</sup>, which assert God's willingness to forgive under certain conditions. With these join Lk 6<sup>37</sup>, a parallel passage with a different turn of expression, 'Release and ye shall be released,' the reference clearly being to sin. (b) The parables of Lk 15, especially that of the Prodigal Son, and of the Pharisee and the Publican in Lk 18<sup>9-14</sup>. (c) Our Saviour's prayer on the cross, 'Father, forgive them,' etc., Lk 23<sup>34</sup>. (d) Statements concerning God's willingness to forgive all sins, including those 'against the Son of man,' but excluding the unpardonable sin against the Holy Ghost, Mt 12<sup>31</sup>, Mk 3<sup>29</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup>; add also Mk 4<sup>12</sup>, in which Isaiah's prophecy is represented as being fulfilled, 'lest they should repent and be forgiven (healed).'

Putting these passages together, we are warranted in concluding that Christ taught the readiness of the Father always to hear the prayer of the truly penitent and in His mercy to pardon their sins, the chief questions being, What is the exact nature of forgiveness? Is it free to all mankind, or to those only who are in covenant relation with Him? Is any condition besides that of repentance laid down?

The meaning of the word 'forgiveness,' and the relation between God and man implied in it, must be gathered largely from the OT. Doubtless under the old covenant a progressive relation is to be recognized, an advance in spirituality of teaching being discernible in its later stages. Doubtless also it is necessary to bear in mind the distinction between the ceremonial standpoint of the Law with its elaborate ritual and appointed sacrifices on the one hand, and the more purely spiritual view of the prophet and psalmist on the other. But, broadly speaking, Christ, like the more 'Evangelical' OT prophets, represents forgiveness as a pure act of grace on the part of God, who on the repentance of the sinner receives him graciously and pardons his transgression in the sense of replacing the offender in his former relation of acceptance and favour. Forgiveness is not mere remission of penalty, the forbearing to inflict deserved punishment, though such release is for the most part included. Punishment may still be exacted, but it has lost its penal character and becomes Divine chastisement inflicted for the improvement of the offender, or for the sake of others. Neither does forgiveness imply any false or arbitrary dealing with the past, any condoning of sin—which is essentially immoral—or ignoring of the transgression, as if it had not been committed—which would imply a weak and false attempt to secure the impossible. Nor, again, can any kind of remission of sins be predicated of God which implies unrighteousness in any form, the solemn sanctions of the eternal law of righteousness being secured by the conditions upon which forgiveness is granted.

But the essence of forgiveness lies in the establishment, or restoration, of a personal relation between sinful man and a grieved and righteously angry God. Omnipotence itself cannot erase the event from the history of the past, and holiness will not permit any concealment or pretence as to the heinousness of the offence committed. But the sinner may be 'covered,' the guilt cancelled, in the sense that on certain conditions it shall be as if it had never been, so far as the relation between God and the sinner is concerned. Hence sin when forgiven is said to be 'cast into the depth of the sea' (Mic 7<sup>19</sup>), 'cast behind thy back' (Is 38<sup>17</sup>), removed 'as far as the east is from the west' (Ps 103<sup>12</sup>), 'remembered no more' (Jer 31<sup>34</sup>) against the sinner.

Ritschl says: 'God, in forgiving or pardoning sins, exercises His will in the direction of not permitting the contradiction—expressed in guilt—in which sinners stand to Him to hinder that fellowship of men with Him which He intends on higher grounds.' It does not, he adds, 'free them altogether from the consciousness of guilt, but from that mistrust which, as an affection of the consciousness of guilt, naturally separates the injured man from the offender.' And again, it is 'a reconciliation of such a nature that while memory, indeed, preserves the pain felt at the sin which has been committed, yet at the same time the place of mistrust towards God is taken by the positive assent of the will to God and His saving purpose.'

Forgiveness can never be adequately understood by means of any figure of speech, commercial or other. It represents a relation of persons, and its essence lies in the restoration of impaired confidence, affection, and favourable regard. It has to do not only with the past, but the present and the future, and it is exercised by God towards men just in proportion as they are capable of receiving it.

Repentance is the one condition clearly laid down and repeatedly insisted on in the Gospels. It is necessary as between man and man, much more between man and God. When John the Baptist comes to prepare the way of the Saviour, nothing can be done without that thoroughgoing repentance which implies reformation so far as man can effect it. Repentance is indeed a necessary ingredient of forgiveness if the two terms are rightly understood. Sorrow for sin and complete renunciation of it are not arbitrary conditions which the Sovereign chooses to exact before bestowing a boon; they belong to the very essence of the personal relation between Father and son which has been impaired or broken by error and disobedience, and which is to be restored in forgiveness. For an impenitent sinner not to be punished is conceivable, but for such a one to be forgiven is a contradiction in terms. The necessity for a forgiving spirit in one who hopes himself to be forgiven is dealt with below.

God is then 'good and ready to forgive' (Ps 86<sup>5</sup>), a God 'keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin' (Ex 34<sup>7</sup>). It would, however, be misleading to generalize and say that this attribute of mercy obviates all necessity for an atonement, or vindication of the law of righteousness, and that throughout the whole history of the world nothing more is needed to obtain Divine forgiveness of sin than confession and repentance on the part of man. The promises of the OT were given to those who stood in a covenant relation with God, in which His righteousness was effectually safeguarded. Christ's ministry was exercised amongst Jews in the first instance, and the presuppositions of OT Scripture must be taken into account.

The same may be said of the two gracious parables of our Lord which chiefly deal with this subject. It is impossible to found accurate doctrine on a parable only, and it is always a mistake to suppose that one parable can cover the whole range of doctrine. The three recorded in Lk 15 were uttered to show the nature of Christ's mission and His desire to seek and save the worst sinners, as well as the willingness of God to receive such, and the joy of heaven and earth when the penitent returns and is pardoned. The moral basis on which this becomes possible in the Divine government is another matter. The cosmic conditions of forgiveness are described in their proper place in Scripture. But in the parable of the Prodigal Son the lesson is impressed that the utmost failure in filial duty will be readily forgiven, if the wanderer will but repent and return. In the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican the essential teaching is the same—the danger lest those who comply with rules of ordinary morality should so plume themselves on their obedience as to lose the sense of their own deep need and ill-desert, and the fact that grave offenders against the fundamental laws of righteousness, like the publican and the harlot, may find their way into the kingdom of grace before the self-righteous Pharisee. But it would be utterly misleading, even to the subversion of the very foundations of ethics, if the inference were drawn that it matters nothing how deeply a man sins, provided that when his evil course is over he regrets his errors and asks for pardon, and that there is no reason in the moral government of the Universe why such a man should not be at once forgiven without infraction of the eternal law of righteousness.

FORGIVENESS

This general conclusion is borne out by Christ's strong language concerning sin, and especially that sin which cannot be forgiven (see Mt 12<sup>32</sup>, Mk 3<sup>29</sup>, Lk 12<sup>31</sup>). In spite of the long controversy which has taken place as to the mysterious sin against the Holy Ghost and the misunderstandings concerning it which have caused unspeakable spiritual anguish to thousands, there seems little question that the only sin thus pronounced unpardonable is that of wilful and persistent sinning against light till light itself is turned into darkness,—the perverting of truth at its very source, where the Holy Spirit Himself instructs the conscience, and thus poisoning the wells of the soul. Therefore, not in virtue of an arbitrary fiat of the Almighty, but by the necessity of the case, such sin cannot be forgiven. 'A lamp's death when, replete with oil, it chokes; a stomach's when, surcharged with food, it starves.' With this explanation harmonizes the Saviour's prayer in Lk 23<sup>34</sup> 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.' The sin of Christ's murderers, heinous indeed beyond expression, was a sin against the Son of man, and—at least in the case of most of those implicated and so far as the full gravity of the offence was concerned—it was not such a deliberate and complete perversion of conscience as to amount to a sin against the Holy Spirit. The reason why the unforgiving cannot be forgiven is to be similarly understood. Hence the general doctrine is laid down in the Gospels in unmistakable terms, that God the Father is ready to receive and pardon all sinners except those who shut themselves out from its possibility by wilfully cherishing a spirit known to be evil, and deliberately hardening their own hearts against the grace which was ready to receive and renew them. See UNPARDONABLE SIN.

2. It is clear that Christ's teaching concerning forgiveness was not exhausted by the proclamation of the Father's willingness to receive the penitent. He Himself claimed the power to forgive, which was recognized by all to be a Divine prerogative. In Mt 9, Mk 2, and Lk 5 is recorded the narrative of the healing of the paralytic, which had evidently impressed itself strongly upon tradition, since it is given by all three Synoptists at greater length than usual and almost in the same words. It was one of the grounds of offence which ultimately caused the death of Jesus, that, whilst lowly in demeanour, He put forth claims for Himself so lofty that to a reverent Jew He appeared often to blaspheme. Jesus does not deny the fundamental assumption that none can forgive sins but God only. To a true believer in one God this is an axiom; there is but one Governor and there can be but one Fount of pardon. Jesus did not thereupon disclaim the possession of a Divine prerogative. He put His own claims to an easily applied test, Whether is it easier to tell a sufferer that his sins are forgiven, or to heal him of an incurable malady? In other words, any prophet may speak words of comfort or absolution, but one who shows the power of healing in order to establish his claim to pronounce forgiveness is no ordinary messenger, but proves Himself to be the Son of God with power. The whole incident evidently made a deep impression, for we are told that the people wondered, praised God, and acknowledged that unprecedented and superhuman power had been entrusted to a son of man.

The close connexion between the work that Christ did for the bodies of men and the power that He claimed over their souls in the forgiveness of sin, is suggested in other narratives, though somewhat less clearly. The inference has been drawn from Jn 5<sup>4</sup> and the early tradition recorded in 8<sup>1</sup>, that Jesus habitually pronounced remission of sin and gave power to amend the life in future, but the brief records in these cases hardly warrant such a conclusion.

The narrative of the woman who was a sinner, recorded in Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup>, is full of instruction on the subject of forgiveness. The mission of Christ to save the outcast and the abandoned is here delicately and beautifully shown. The only doubtful point of interpretation relates to the ground of forgiveness as described in v. 47. Many commentators, including the chief Roman Catholic authorities, make the forgiveness extended to the woman to depend upon the love she showed, and at first reading this might seem warranted by the phrase 'for she loved much.' But on examination this is seen to be impossible. For (1) the whole scope of the parable of the two debtors shows that forgiveness precedes love; (2) the latter part of v. 47 enforces the same lesson; and so (3) does the absolution pronounced in v. 48. The only ambiguity lies in the pregnant use of δρα in v. 47, and the meaning of the clause may be expressed by the paraphrase, 'This is the reason why I tell you that her many sins are forgiven—for (see) she has shown much love; but he who is forgiven little, loves little.' Her repentance and acceptance had taken place before, her grateful love was manifested in return by the outpouring of the ointment; and in v. 48 Christ authoritatively confirms the assurance of her free and full pardon as One who had an absolute right to do so.

The doctrine of the forgiveness of sins on the basis of atonement through the death of Christ is not, properly speaking, revealed by Christ Himself. The Fourth Gospel contains passages like 1<sup>29</sup> and a reference in 19<sup>36</sup> to the Paschal lamb (?), but neither of these comes from the lips of the Master. The nearest approach to such teaching is found in the institution of the Lord's Supper and the reference to His blood as shed for the remission of sins in Mt 26<sup>28</sup>, also perhaps in the directions given to the Apostles in Lk 24<sup>47</sup>. By the time of St. Paul's earliest Epistles the doctrine of the atoning death of Christ as the ground of the forgiveness of sins was fairly developed, and the question is, How far had progress been made in this direction before the death of Christ took place? The answer appears to be that—as with the doctrines of the Incarnation and a Future Life in the OT—foreshadowings only had been given, hints and indications of a revelation which could not be clearly and definitely made until Christ's work was com-plets and the full gift of the Spirit bestowed. A reference is found in Mt 20<sup>28</sup> to the giving up of life by the Son of man 'as a ransom for many,' but the Apostles could not in Christ's lifetime understand at all the need for His death and the full meaning of the shedding of His blood upon the cross; and its connexion with the forgiveness of sins dawning upon them only gradually under the illumination of the promised Spirit.

3. One of the most noteworthy features in Christ's ethical teaching was His inculcation of the duty of almost unlimited forgiveness of man by man. The standard thus set up was practically new. In Pagan ethics to revenge an injury and punish an enemy to the utmost was manly, to forgive was mean-spirited. Some affronts might be passed over by the magnanimous man, simply because it was beneath his dignity, or disturbing to his equanimity, to notice them. But the idea of not only abstaining from vengeance, but actually restoring an offender to a relation of kindly regard, on the ground of human brotherhood and for the sake of helping an erring one to regain his forfeited position, was quite alien to the spirit of ancient morals.

Christ taught not only the duty of forgiveness on repentance, but that it was to be unlimited both in quality and in quantity. No offence was so serious, no repetition of offences so excessive, that forgiveness might be withheld, provided only that penitence were shown. The former of these points is not enlarged on by Christ, but it is involved in the proverbial completeness of the phrase 'unto seventy times seven' (Mt 18<sup>21</sup>). Such forgiveness of injuries was based upon two fundamental principles of Christian ethics: (a) the duty of repressing all personal resentment, closely connected with the virtues of meekness and humility; and (b) that love to all men, including enemies, which—paradoxical as it might appear—Christ enjoined as fundamentally incumbent on all His disciples (Mt 5<sup>44</sup>). The 'love' and forgiveness thus inculcated do not depend upon personal merits, for they are to be exercised even towards the unthankful and the evil. But the one necessary condition—repentance—is insisted on, else the moral character of forgiveness is lost. For, as already explained, forgiveness is a relation between persons, and if it be included as a duty in a moral code, it must imply an ethical relation, such as is altogether lacking if evil is condoned, or its seriousness slighted. Hence the offender must, so far as in him lies, put away the evil thing, if it is to be no longer a barrier between him and one whose course is determined by the law of righteousness. The truly moral nature of Christian forgiveness is brought out in Lk 17<sup>3</sup>, where it is closely joined with the duty of reproving sin—'If thy brother sin, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him.' With this may be compared Lv 19<sup>17</sup>, where the reproof of an evil-doer is spoken of as a mark of love. Just as in the Law the righteous man is bidden to rebuke his neighbour and not 'bear sin because of him,' so under the gospel he is bidden to forgive the penitent wrong-doer, that he may help him to a better life.

The close connexion between God's forgiveness of man and man's forgiveness of injuries against himself is brought out in Mt 6<sup>14, 15</sup>, Lk 11<sup>4</sup>; see also Lk 6<sup>27</sup> and Mk 11<sup>25, 26</sup>. In the last passage, as well as in Mt 5<sup>23, 24</sup>, the duty of being 'in love and charity with our neighbours,' and 'in perfect charity with all men,' is laid down as a condition of acceptable prayer to God. The reason is akin to that described above. There are some states of mind in which a worshipper is not fit to pray, in which he asks for blessings that he is not capable of receiving. The principle is not to be understood as a kind of Divina lex talionis, as in the parable of the Unmerciful Debtor (Mt 18<sup>23</sup>)—that a man does not deserve mercy himself, if he will not show it to others, though this is true and appeals to a natural sense of justice. Rather is it to be understood that the unforgiving man shows essential impotence, or at best an uneducated conscience in respect of his relations with his fellows. A man who cherishes hardness of heart towards those who have injured him so offends against the law of love that he cannot be received by the God of love, and cannot enjoy the restored relationship which he asks for in the Divine forgiveness, the whole significance of which is due to the supremacy of love. Or, as Beyschlag expresses it, 'he who would belong to the kingdom of love as a recipient must belong to it as an agent.' The merciful alone can obtain mercy, or rightly use it when it is granted to them.

4. Similar principles to those which regulate the relation of individuals are to be applied where Christian communities are concerned. The two are closely connected, as is shown by the passage Mt 18<sup>16-18</sup>. Christ deals first with the offending individual; if it can be avoided, recourse must not be had to the authority of the Christian society. It may be that personal remonstrance will suffice to set right the offender, or at least the moral influence of the brotherhood exercised in private by the presence of two or three witnesses. If the whole community is compelled to act, the utmost penalty inflicted is expulsion from the brotherhood, the only rights then remaining to the excommunicated person being the inalienable ones of a fellow-man.

The question of forgiveness or condemnation as exercised by the community arises from the phraseology concerning binding and loosing contained in v. 18, with which should be compared the words addressed to St. Peter in Mt 16<sup>19</sup>, and those addressed to a company which seems certainly to have included more than the Apostles, in Jn 20<sup>23</sup>. The power granted to the Christian community in the words, 'Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained,' is not to be confused with Divine forgiveness of sins on the one hand, or with individual forgiveness on the other. Whilst more significant than the latter, it stops far short of the former. Individual Christians are to do their best privately to stop the progress of ill-feeling and enmity, but 'offences' will still arise. A power of checking them is therefore lodged with the community for the maintenance of purity and the avoidance of scandal. This is described as the power of 'binding and loosing.' Acting in the name of Christ, and presumably in the spirit of Christ, His Church will, He says, in a sense exercise His authority, and their action, whether of permission or prohibition, of condemnation or acquittal, will be ratified in heaven. This power, while great and important, is clearly not comparable to the Divine forgiveness of the individual sinner. This involves a full knowledge of circumstances and of the disposition of the inmost heart which no man can possess in relation to his fellow-man. No authority is given by Christ to a community—still less to a 'priest,' of whom it is needless to say that the Gospels know absolutely nothing—to exercise or to pronounce 'forgiveness' in the case of any individual. But just as an offender belonging to a Christian community needs to be rebuked by the Church in order that the Divine condemnation of wrongdoing may be echoed on earth, and earthly penalties may be inflicted which may arrest further evil and so prevent the terrible danger of worse punishment to come; so the penitent needs assurance from an earthly authority to help him in his upward course of reformation, though the real and ultimate transaction of forgiveness must rest between himself and God alone. The high authority thus conferred upon the Christian society and the responsible character attached to its judgments depend entirely upon its possession of that spiritual discernment which the Holy Spirit alone can bestow, and its acting always in the name of Christ and under the direction and control of the Spirit of Christ.

FORSAKEN.—Mt 27<sup>46</sup> ff. See DERELICTION.

FORSAKING ALL.—

ἀπολείπειν, Mt 4<sup>20</sup> 22 = Mk 11<sup>20</sup>; Lk 6<sup>11</sup>; Mt 19<sup>27</sup> 29 = Mk 10<sup>28</sup> 29 = Lk 18<sup>28</sup> 29; ἀπορραγήναι, 'renounce,' Lk 14<sup>33</sup>. In Lk 9<sup>61</sup> ἀπορραγήναι τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ τὴν γῆν may mean either 'bid farewell to those in my house' (cf. Mt 9<sup>10</sup>, Ac 13<sup>16</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>13</sup>), or 'renounce the things in my house,' renunciare negotiis domesticis (Erasm.).

Jesus had two classes of disciples. First there was the multitude of those who believed on Him; and, while He required that they should give Him the chief place in their affection and shrink from no sacrifice for His sake, He allowed them to remain where He had found them, prosecuting their old avocations, yet rendering no small service to the Kingdom of Heaven by testifying to His grace and confessing what He had done for their souls. Then there were the Twelve, whom He required to be always with Him, following Him wherever He went, sharing His lot, and entering by daily intercourse and discipline into the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven, that they might be fitted for the task of carrying on His work when He was gone. Some of the former, like the Gerasene demoniac, would fain have attached themselves to Him and joined the fellowship of His comrades; but He refused their offer. He had other work for them to do. 'Away to thine house unto thy people, and proclaim to them what great things the Lord hath done to thee, and how he had pity on thee' (Mk 5<sup>19</sup> = Lk 8<sup>39</sup>).

In every instance He laid it down as the inexorable condition of admission to His inner circle that the man should forsake all—home, kindred, and possessions. 'Come after me,' He said to Simon and Andrew when He called them on the shore of the Lake of Galilee, 'and I will make you fishers of men.' And it is written that 'they immediately left their nets and followed him.' Then He called James and John, and they also 'left their father Zebedee in the boat with the hired men, and went away after him' (Mk 1<sup>19-20</sup> = Mt 4<sup>20-22</sup>). And in His commission to the Twelve, when He sent them forth two by two to preach and heal, He reiterated this condition of Apostleship. He laid His hand on the tenderest of human affections and claimed for Himself a prior devotion: 'He that loveth father or mother above me is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter above me is not worthy of me. And one who doth not take his cross, and follow after me, is not worthy of me' (Mt 10<sup>37, 38</sup>).

Of course it was inevitable that those who followed Jesus wherever He went should share His homeless and desolate lot; but He had a special reason for His emphatic insistence on this condition. The men of His generation cherished a secular ideal of the Messiah. They looked for a king of David's lineage who should appear in might and majesty and, driving out the heathen, set up the fallen throne in more than its ancient splendour. Even the Twelve shared this ideal, and they clung to it to the last, reconciling themselves to the lowliness of their Master by the theory that it was only a temporary veiling of His glory, and that He would presently fling off His disguise and flash forth in His proper majesty. They had left all that they might follow Him, but they consoled themselves with the anticipation of a speedy and overflowing recompense.

'Behold,' said St. Peter after the young ruler's refusal to make the sacrifice which Jesus demanded, 'we have left all and followed thee: what then shall we have?' It was towards the close, and the Twelve were beginning to fear that they had been hugging a false hope, and would have no such recompense as they dreamed of. 'Verily I tell you,' answered Jesus, pitying their discomfiture yet resolute to correct their error, 'that ye that have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, shall yourselves also sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. And every one who hath left brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or children, or lands, or houses, for my name's sake, shall receive manifold more, and shall inherit eternal life. But,' He added significantly, hinting at a reversal of their expectation, 'many last shall be first, and first last' (Mt 19<sup>27-29</sup> = Mk 10<sup>28-31</sup> = Lk 18<sup>29-30</sup>). They were right in expecting a recompense, but their recompense would be other than they conceived.

As time passed and He still trod the path of humiliation, they fretted at His inexplicable procrastination; and, as the darkness deepened, and the toils closed about Him, they reasoned that the inevitable dénouement could be no longer deferred. During His last progress to Jerusalem, with His intimation of the Passion in their ears, they were dreaming their worldly dream. He was going up to the sacred capital, and, they assured themselves, it could be for naught else than the claiming of His crown; and James and John, conspiring with their mother Salome, approached Him and essayed to extort from Him a promise that they should be awarded the chief places beside His throne (Mt 20<sup>20-28</sup> = Mk 10<sup>35-40</sup>).

Such was the Messianic ideal which dominated the minds of our Lord's contemporaries; and it was fraught with mischief, hindering more than aught else the recognition of His claims. In truth the marvel is not that so few accepted Him, but that with such an expectation any accepted Him. They were looking for a glorious Messiah, a king with a crown on his head and an army at his back; and Jesus presented Himself, the Son of man, meek and lowly, the very antithesis of what, they believed, the Messiah should be. He lost no opportunity of protesting against the unspiritual ideal, and not the least striking of His protests is this condition which He constantly and emphatically placed before those who desired to attach themselves to Him. A scribe once came to Him and said: 'Teacher, I will follow thee wherever thou goest.' What was his notion? He had been convinced of the Messiahship of Jesus, and, sharing the prevailing expectation, thought to reap a rich harvest of honour and emolument in the new era which would presently be inaugurated. Certainly, he argued, when Jesus won His own and rewarded His faithful followers, He would award the foremost place to one so distinguished by rank and learning.* And how did Jesus answer? 'You are expecting,' He said, 'office and honour in an earthly kingdom. Realize the fact, if you follow me wherever I go, you must forsake all and share my lowly and painful lot. The foxes have holes, and the birds of the heaven nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay down his head' (Lk 9<sup>57, 58</sup> = Mt 8<sup>20, 21</sup>).

Again, when He was travelling through Galilee on His last journey up to Jerusalem, He was followed by an enthusiastic throng. Knowing whither He was bound, they concluded that He was going to declare Himself king of Israel, and they were for following Him all the way and sharing in His triumph. Suddenly He wheeled round (επιστρέψας) and addressed them: 'If any man cometh after me, and doth not hate his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, moreover, even his own life, he cannot be my disciple. Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple.' Then He added two parables,—the Unfinished Tower and the Two Kings,—warning against the folly of embarking upon an enterprise which one is incapable of carrying through. 'So, therefore,' He concluded, 'if ye would follow me, understand the condition. Count the cost, and determine whether you are prepared to meet it. Every one of you who doth not renounce all that he hath cannot be my disciple' (Lk 14<sup>28-33</sup>).

FOUNDATION OF THE WORLD.—The phrase καταβολή κόσμου occurs in Mt 25<sup>34</sup>, Lk 11<sup>50</sup>, Jn 17<sup>24</sup> (κόσμου is doubtful in Mt 13<sup>35</sup>, see RVm). It is a common expression in the NT, e.g. Eph 1<sup>4</sup>, He 4<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>20</sup>, Rev 13<sup>17</sup>. In general it denotes a time sense, implying a strong declaration of priority. It always occurs with the prepositions ἀπό or πρός. καταβολή primarily means the laying down or founding of anything, hence the absolute beginning. κόσμος is a word of much more varied meaning, into the different phases of which we need not here enter. Its present use as applied to the Universe is well established. The whole expression is equivalent to the phrase found in Mk 10<sup>6</sup> 13<sup>19</sup> 'from the beginning of the creation' (ἀπὸ ἀρχῆς κτίσεως). 'Old Testament Hebrew has no term which would quite correspond to the Greek ὁ κόσμος' (Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 162). Mt 13<sup>35</sup> is an unliteral rendering of Ps 78<sup>2</sup> ἡμεῖς, which the LXX translates ἀπ' ἀρχῆς. 'The foundation of the world' stands for the definite epoch when this present Universe was originated.

FOUR.—See NUMBERS.

FOWL.—The word 'fowl' is now almost restricted to poultry, and especially to that familiar bird in a farmyard, the 'barn-door fowl'; but it is used in the NT in a wider sense. The Gr. word πετεινά (lit. 'flying things') does not indeed signify, as its derivation might imply, all winged creatures—a meaning sometimes attached to 'fowls' in Old English (Hastings' DB, art. 'Fowl'). It denotes 'birds,' of which there are many species in Palestine, including some which are only birds of passage with us. Quite arbitrarily AV renders πετεινά by 'birds' in Mt 8<sup>20</sup> 13<sup>32</sup>, Lk 9<sup>33</sup>, and by 'fowls' in Mt 6<sup>26</sup> 13<sup>34</sup>, Mk 4<sup>4-23</sup>, Lk 8<sup>8</sup> 12<sup>24</sup> 13<sup>31</sup>. In every case in which πετεινά occurs in the Gospels RV gives 'birds.'

Borrowing so much as He did from outward nature, our Lord often employed birds to illustrate His teaching. Their nests are contrasted with His own pillowless couch (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>). In the parable of the Sower they devour the seed that falls by the wayside (Mt 13<sup>4</sup>); in that of the Mustard Seed they lodge under the shadow of the huge plant which grew out of such a tiny germ (Mk 4<sup>31</sup>). Their free undistracted lives play an important part in that cumulative argument which Christ builds up in the Sermon on the Mount against the tyranny of care. They neither sow, reap, nor gather into barns, yet the heavenly Father feeds them (Mt 6<sup>26</sup>), i.e. they are inferior to man in two respects. For (1) they cannot anticipate and influence the future as man can by the exercise of his reason or the labour of his hands; (2) God is only their Creator, but He is man's Father, and will not forget His child. Though the 'fowls' cannot foresee, or work, or trust, they have no care. Yet they are fed. How foolish of man, who can do all these things, to fall so far beneath the 'fowls,' and worry over food and drink, when his first duty is to seek the kingdom of God and His righteousness!

FOX (ἀλώπηξ).—Foxes and jackals are referred to indiscriminately in Scripture, although the fox is somewhat smaller in size, and is generally found singly, whereas jackals prowl around villages in small packs. Both animals are of a timid nature, and exhibit similar cunning and stealth in securing their prey, and live in deserted ruins and among the rocks of the mountain gorges. Christ's allusion to them (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>, Lk 9<sup>38</sup>) takes its meaning from the fact that while places of refuge and rest were definitely allotted to such outcast creatures, the Son of Man had not where to lay His head. His reference to Herod as a fox (Lk 13<sup>32</sup>) is not only expressive of contempt, but may allude to the cause of the king's hostility: he was the invader of vineyards who had taken his brother's wife. The verses that follow also indicate that Christ's death must be otherwise brought about. The petty and furtive intentions of Herod must give way to the grander rapacity of Jerusalem as the historical destroyer of the prophets.

FRAGMENTS (κλάσματα, pieces broken for distribution; cf. κλάσματα ἄρτων of LXX Ezk 13<sup>19</sup>).—All the Synoptists record that, when the miraculous feeding of the multitude ended, the broken pieces remaining over from the meal were gathered up and deposited in twelve baskets (Mt 14<sup>20</sup>, Mk 6<sup>9</sup>, Lk 9<sup>17</sup>). St. John adds that this was done in obedience to Christ's command, addressed to the disciples, by whom apparently the work was performed (Jn 6<sup>12</sup>). The surplus thus collected far exceeded the amount of the original stock, and bore witness to the abundance of the meal partaken of. The carefulness shown in collecting the remnants of food was intended to avoid any appearance of waste, and served to correct any tendency to undervalue what had come to the recipients so cheaply. The miracle was one of the very exceptional cases in which Christ provided for men's ordinary wants, was wrought only in view of the urgent necessity that had arisen (Mt 14<sup>19</sup>), and, while it raised expectations of similar benefits in the future (Jn 6<sup>26</sup>), was not designed to produce this result. The storing of the fragments for future use would tend to indicate that such miracles were not to be everyday occurrences. As in all Christ's miracles, there is strict economy of supernatural resources, which are resorted to only when natural resources fail.

FRANKINCENSE (μύκη, λίβανος).—One of the ingredients of incense (σμία), Ex 30<sup>34</sup>, and one of the gifts brought by the Magi to the infant Saviour (Mt 2<sup>11</sup>). The name is derived from μύκη 'to be white,' akin to which is liban, the name by which frankincense is known in Arabia. It is a fragrant gum or resin, the produce of the tree Boswellia Serrata, of the natural order Amyridaceae, from which it is obtained by slitting the bark. The tree itself is a native of Central and Southern India, whence the gum, which requires no further preparation than being allowed to harden, is exported to Europe, the yellowish or inferior quality in larger quantities than the white. Some uncertainty has existed as to the source of the supply. It seems clear that no such tree existed in Palestine, but that the frankincense used there was imported through Arabia (cf. Is 60<sup>6</sup>, Jer 6<sup>6</sup>, where 'incense' in AV ought to be 'frankincense,' and is so rendered in RV). The opening up of India by Britain made it plain that the source of the supply, which had previously come through Persia, was to be found there.

The ritual use of frankincense, in the OT as among the heathen, denotes direct adoration. It is burned as an appendage to the minhah (Lv 2<sup>2</sup>). According to old allegorizing traditions, the frankincense offered by the Magi signified the Divinity of the Holy Child, the gold representing His royalty, the myrrh either His healing powers or His prospect of suffering.

FREEDOM.—See FREE WILL and LIBERTY.

FREE WILL.—It is not easy to give a definition of Free Will that is not tautological,—indeed, strictly speaking, it cannot be defined. It may, however, be described as the ability to determine within oneself as to one's acts or courses of action. We have not anywhere in the Gospels or, indeed, in the NT mention made in specific terms of Free Will, or any statement made in so many words that either the Divine will or the will of man is free. We have little, in fact, of philosophical or philosophico-theological discussion of any kind in the NT. The nearest approach to such a thing is in Ro 9<sup>18-24</sup>, where the question of human freedom is approached, and even there such discussion is rather deprecated, as verging on impiety, than entered upon. But while the question of the freedom of the will, whether the will of God or the will of man, is not formally dealt with in the NT, it is quite plain that God is regarded as acting freely, and that man is recognized as a free agent.

1. That God is not bound by any necessity external to Himself, that He acts according to the counsel of His will, is rather to be gathered from the general spirit of Scripture teaching than to be deduced from particular passages. The freedom of the Divine will is, indeed, plainly implied, although not explicitly mentioned, in such words as (Ro 11<sup>24-26</sup>), 'For who hath known the mind of the Lord or who hath been his counsellor? or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him are all things: to whom be glory for ever. Amen.' But Scripture simply accepts the freedom of the Divine will rather than formally states it. We cannot, however, think of God as acting other than freely, if we are to accept Him as a living God at all. Did we suppose that there was any necessity outside of Himself constraining Him to act in a certain way, we should be making an impersonal force the true Deity. We are constrained to believe that God acts freely. Yet to say that the Most High acts freely does not mean that He acts capriciously. He acts in accordance with His own nature. We can conceive that He might have made the material universe other than He has made it, but we cannot conceive Him as acting otherwise than in love and holiness and justice. Still, the necessity by which, in a sense, He may be said to act where His moral government is concerned is simply the necessity of being true to His own nature.

FREE WILL

2. That man is a free agent is not stated in so many words in the NT, but is assumed everywhere. Surely when our Lord said (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>) 'Come unto me all ye that labour,' and (Jn 5<sup>40</sup>) 'Ye will not come to me that ye might have life,' He accepted the freedom of man as a reality. No doubt He also said (Jn 6<sup>44</sup>), 'No man can come unto me except the Father which hath sent me draw him.' But in saying so He did not mean that men were mere passive instruments, but simply that all that appealed to the heart in favour of spiritual living was from on high, whence also all spiritual aids came. Those who hold that the will is not free, or, as we should rather put it, that men are not free to will, do not as a rule argue so much from Scripture, although they may do that in part, as from philosophical grounds, and what they regard as experience. No doubt those who regard liberty as incompatible with predestination may argue that predestination is the plain doctrine of Scripture, but the conclusion that because predestination is the doctrine of Scripture man cannot be free is their own, and is not taught in Scripture. Whether man is free or not is to a large extent a question of merely academic interest, although not wholly so. We all act upon the hypothesis that we are free. Certainly the conclusion that men are not free operates against contrition for sin and repentance,—hinders one from feeling that he is guilty before God,—and perhaps it is partly with the desire to get rid of the sense of sin that some men argue against our possession of freedom. But in a general way we proceed on the assumption that men are free agents; hence the discussion of freedom is mainly one, as we have said, of academic interest. Scripture, as before remarked, accepts man's freedom as a fact, and we all have the consciousness of being free. It is argued, however, on various grounds that the sense of freedom which we have is illusive. In his Outline of Christian Theology Dr. W. N. Clarke mentions four grounds on which the doctrine of human freedom is challenged: viz. (a) Fatalism, (b) Predestinarianism, (c) Necessitarianism, (d) Determinism.

(a) There is perhaps no need of seriously discussing Fatalism, which seems to be a mere philosophy of despair. We all at times feel the strange inevitableness of things, but fatalism cannot commend itself to us as a reasoned philosophy.

(b) Predestinarianism in some form or other we can hardly avoid accepting, if we believe in an ordered universe; and to resolve predestination, in so far as rational and moral beings are concerned, into simple foreknowledge, does not materially, or at least very materially, help us. Of course it may be argued that the knowledge that a thing is to occur does not necessarily imply that the doer of it must do it. From the antecedents of a man we may judge tolerably well what his course of action in given circumstances will be, but our knowledge as to how he is likely to act does not affect his freedom,—does not compel him to act in the way foreseen. And so, it may be argued, the Divine foreknowledge of an action does not make the action inevitable, does not make it one that must be done. And this is perhaps formally true, but it is only formally so. What God foresees will be done has a material inevitableness about it, and will just as surely be done as if it had been predestinated. And if an action is predestinated, or even Divinely foreseen as being sure to occur, how can it be said that a man does it freely? Freedom seems incompatible with foreordination,—even with Divine foreknowledge. Yet no reasoning, however logical it may appear, can ever make us lose the sense of freedom. We may try to persuade ourselves that we are not free, but the sense of freedom will remain with us notwithstanding, and we shall go on acting as if we were free.

(c) We may say about Necessitarianism, or the doctrine that every volition is caused by its antecedents, that it is in a way true, but that, as urged against the freedom of the will, it neglects consideration of the fact that we ourselves are contributing all along to the antecedents which so far determine every volition.

(d) And with regard to Determinism, or the doctrine that all volitions are determined by motives acting on the will, it may be said that it also is true, but that motives acting on the will are not like forces acting on a body and producing a resultant which may be mathematically calculated. Our motives are our own feelings and desires, however these may be affected by objects without us, and our decisions to act depend upon what we are, though that is not simply what, as we might say, nature has made us, but what to a large extent we have made ourselves. To suppose that we can act without motive of some kind would be to suppose what is contrary to all experience, for we are always more or less conscious of being influenced by motives, but the action of motives is no mere mechanical action. Our freedom, indeed, as Martensen (Christian Ethics, § 31, pp. 109, 110) well points out, is conditioned, not absolute. We are not free save within certain limits, and many things—our native tendency to sin, heredity, environment, above all the force of habit—operate against our acting freely in accordance with our consciousness of what is best. But the sense of freedom which we possess is not illusive. We need, doubtless, the Divine aid in order to true religious living. But we are bound by no iron chain of necessity. We are, save in so far as we may have ourselves enslaved our wills, bound by no outward or inward constraint to will other than the good. And even the enslaved will can be made free by Divine grace.

3. The notion of moral freedom which is presented in the NT differs from all merely philosophical ideas on the subject. Here freedom means the being set free from the bondage of sin, and thus enabled to realize the ideal of human nature as created in the image of God (Ro 8<sup>20</sup>). The freedom of the Christian will lies not in the power to do whatsoever we please, but in the power to choose and follow that for which God made us. God Himself is absolutely free, precisely because He is the absolutely perfect moral Being; and Christ's power to make others free springs from His own Divine freedom—that moral oneness with the Father in the strength of which He did always the things that were pleasing to Him (Jn 8<sup>29</sup>). In Christ's gospel a freedom after His own pattern is offered to all. The Son can make us free so that we shall be free indeed (Jn 8<sup>36</sup>). This freedom comes from union with Christ, for apart from Him we can do nothing (Jn 15<sup>5</sup>). The doctrine of the indwelling of Christ through the Holy Spirit, and the consequent endowment of His disciples with freedom and power, was taught, according to the Fourth Gospel, by Jesus Himself (see esp. 14-17). It is constantly enforced by St. Paul as the testimony of his own experience. Apart from the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, the will is powerless to realize its own ideals (Ro 7<sup>12</sup>, 8<sup>2</sup>). But in accepting Christ as our Master, and yielding to His law as supreme, we pass into 'the glorious liberty of the children of God.' See, further, LIBERTY.

FRIENDSHIP.—1. PRE-CHRISTIAN AND CHRISTIAN FRIENDSHIP.—Friendship was esteemed among the pagans and received memorable treatment at the hands of Aristotle (Ethics, Bks. viii. and ix.) and Cicero (de Amicitia). The latter said, 'There is nothing in the world more valuable than friendship.' Jewish literature treated the same subject, as, for example, in Sirach (6<sup>15</sup>), 'There is nothing that can be taken in exchange for a faithful friend.' This appreciation of friendship as one of the chief means of happiness throws light upon the ancient attitude. The mutual kindness of friends, considered necessary to complete the happiness even of the philosopher, but which was confined to those of the same school or character, makes more prominent the absence of benevolence from the ancient system of virtue. Christianity has also a high regard for friendship, has ennobled it, but has at the same time placed limitations upon it.

(1) The enlargement of Christian friendship is twofold. (a) The area within which the grace may be displayed is much extended by the teaching of Christianity upon the dignity of woman, whereby marriage loses any trace of the offence with which even many enlightened Jews regarded it,* and becomes a lofty friendship. (b) This is further enlarged by the new ideal of benevolence, which is to penetrate all the relations of life. Humanity has been dignified by the Incarnation. Christian Ethics is not the successor to the virtues of paganism, but the new spirit that turned patriotism into brotherhood, elevated friendship into universal love; φιλία becomes φιλανθρωπία. The exceptional exhibitions of goodwill and charity displayed by heathen, remarkable because of their contrast with the prevalent selfishness, are taken for granted among the members of the Kingdom of God. Friendship ceases to be a luxury and becomes a responsibility. Love, the root of all Christian virtues, must pervade all the performances of life.

(2) The limitation placed upon friendship in the new religion follows from the doctrine of the Divine friendship, which causes a complete readjustment of human thought. The pagans found little spiritual rest or inspiration in their religion, and human friendship was neither a reflexion nor a suggestion of a Divine fellowship. With Christ, however, the love for God is paramount, and receives an importance far beyond any other relationship. 'Ye, my friends, shall leave me alone: and yet I am not alone, for the Father is with me' (Jn 16<sup>32</sup>). To furnish this higher friendship is the mission of Christ. He has come that we may have the power to become sons of God (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>). Religion takes precedence over friendship: man may not usurp God's place. The gospel which teaches that man attains his exaltation according as he bows down in humble submission to the will of God, necessarily modifies the view that human companionship is the most valuable thing in the world. The Christian doctrine of God recasts everything in a new mould. Theology reacts upon anthropology. 'God is the beginning and foundation of all true and lasting friendship' (Zwingli).

2. THE TEACHING OF JESUS ON FRIENDSHIP.—This is suggestive and incidental rather than formal and detailed. In parables and conversations Christ indirectly drops sentences which show how general was His observation of all the relations into which people might enter. (1) In the parables of the Lost Sheep and the Lost Piece of Silver. He touches upon the much debated basis of friendship. The joyous discovery of lost possession leads to social communion. 'He (she) calleth together his (her) friends and neighbours, saying, Rejoice with me' (Lk 15<sup>9</sup>). This act is the natural result of the instinct for association. The consciousness of joy breaks through the bounds of individualism and runs over into the sphere of human companionship; for the feeling that life's great emotions are too strong for narrow limits constrains men to seek this expansion among others. The soul delights in self-revelation. 'But no receipt openeth the heart but a true friend: To whom you may impart, Griefs, Joies, Fears, Hopes, Suspicions, Counsels, and whatsoever lieth upon the Heart' (Bacon). This spontaneous overflow, due to the instinct of association, has been implanted by God; and friendship is thus one of the good gifts of Heaven. Cicero also assigned a similar spontaneity to this virtue.

(2) Several types of false friendship are suggested by Jesus. (a) The parable of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16<sup>9</sup>), 'who made friends out of the mammon of unrighteousness,' illustrates the commercial type. The material comforts of fellowship are gained by a clever distribution of money favours apart from all sympathy of heart or mind; and though Christ neither commends nor condemns, He indirectly reveals His mind in the remark, 'The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light' (v. 8). But true friendship is disinterested, and seeks the welfare of another rather than its own. 'Friendship is the wishing a person what we think good for his sake and not for our own, and, as far as is in our power, the exerting ourselves to procure it' (Aristotle, Eth., ii. 4).—(b) The exclusive type of friendship is displayed in the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15). The outwardly proper behaviour of the elder brother is marred by the lack of filial love; and his complaint, 'Thou never gavest me a kid that I might make merry with my friends,' shows how blind he was to the lavish affection of a father who bestowed his all upon him.—'Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine.' The son looked for a friendship apart from the nobler companionship of a loving father. His heart was not really in the home, for his secret longing was for the frivolous joys of the world, the merry-making with friends, which he will have in isolation from the love of home. The unpleasant impression left by the picture of the elder brother is Christ's way of giving His opinion of a friendship which shuts itself up within the circle of favourite comrades, and is careless of the higher claims of love and benevolence. It then becomes a refined selfishness.—(c) The irresponsible type is described in Lk 11<sup>8</sup>, where the householder is so comfortably settled in bed that he refuses to rise and give bread to a friend, who is unexpectedly called upon to show a greater service to his friend. 'Friend, lend me three loaves, for a friend of mine in his journey is come to me.' Friendship here recognizes no responsibilities, and will not discommode itself to the extent of getting out of bed. Are we mistaken in seeing a touch of irony in this portrayal of a bond which lasted only with the enjoyment of benefits, but could not stand the strain of any personal inconvenience? Friendship is mutual assistance. 'A friend loveth at all times, and a brother is born for adversity' (Pr 17<sup>17</sup>).

(3) The claim of old friends was recognized by Jesus when He cast out the devils from 'Legion' (Mk 5<sup>9</sup>). The evil spirit, always an isolating influence, had excluded this unhappy man from the comforts of home and companionship. But when he is healed and the craving for intercourse is awakened, Jesus directs it to old channels: 'Jesus saith unto him, Go home to thy friends and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee.' These associates and guardians of his youth had borne with him through the evil days, and Jesus will not be a partner to any indifference to those obligations contracted by former benefits. He knew how keen was the sting of 'friend remembered not.'

(4) Jesus placed restrictions upon friendship at the feast given by the rich Pharisee, and condemned the selfish narrowing of the acts of hospitality. 'When thou makest a dinner or a feast do not call thy friends . . . but call the poor' (Lk 14<sup>12-13</sup>). The force of the verb is not prohibitive, but restrictive: 'Do not habitually call (καὶ φέρε). Friendship must have open doors, and recognize the larger hospitality. Thus Jesus broadened the stream of friendship by bringing neighbours within the same flow of feeling, as is set forth in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>30</sup>). 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' Nor did Jesus shut out neighbour. He included enemy also. The Christian must have no foes. 'I say unto you, Love your enemies' (Mt 5<sup>44</sup>). The sentiment of love must pervade every motive, filling the soul with gentle kindness. Cicero had said that 'Sweetness both in language and manner is a very profitable attraction in the formation of friendship'; but with him an accident becomes an essential in the Kingdom of Jesus. The distinctive word with Christ is love and not friendship, and, by reason of this, Christianity excels the pagan ideals. The new commandment, 'that ye love one another' (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>), decides all matters of conduct. True friends will not sanction any imperfection, or acquiesce in any weak neglect of talents in those whom they love; while at the same time the charity of the gospel will bear all things, will hope all things.

(5) Jesus also taught that the life of love was endless. The old friendships flourished under dark skies. Fears of an awful end haunted them, and when death came, 'They dreamed there would be spring no more.' But Christ has brought life and immortality to light through His gospel. He has spoken with certainty of the future, and has made the darkness beautiful. The Christian poet can rise out of the calamity of interrupted friendship into the repose of faith and self-control.

'Far off thou art but ever nigh,
I have thee still and I rejoice;
I prosper, cheered with thy voice;
I shall not lose thee tho' I die' (In Memoriam, cxxx.).

Human affection will pass through the cleansing stream of death, and purified of all selfishness and evil will be made perfect in the presence of God.

3. THE FRIENDSHIP OF JESUS.—Christianity is a life as well as a system of teaching; and as each virtue or quality is best interpreted in the light of the highest example of its kind, so also human friendship becomes transfigured by the friendship which Jesus offers to all who will receive Him.

(1) The friendship of Jesus as revealed in the Gospels.—These narratives show how approachable Jesus was. His readiness to accept social invitations, to befriend all classes, to reveal His gracious message, testifies to His genius for friendship, and accounts in part for the contemptuous title, 'Friend of publicans and sinners.' He chose twelve 'that they might be with him' (Mk 3<sup>13</sup>), and to these He revealed what was dearest to His heart. On the Mount of Transfiguration He admitted three of them to the vision of His glory (Mt 17<sup>1-13</sup>); in Gethsemane He opened to the same three the door of His grief (26<sup>38-46</sup>); He told His disciples of the stern struggle with temptation in the wilderness of Judea. The house at Bethany was a second home to Him, and His love for 'our friend Lazarus' was manifested in His visit to the sisters, and in the grief that overwhelmed Him at the grave (Jn 11).

In the second part of the Fourth Gospel the affection of Jesus is seen to lack the slightest 'grain of depreciation,' which Schopenhauer recommends among friends. The constancy of the perfect Friend is the first theme of this intimate writing (Jn 13-17), a constancy unimpaired by sorrow or joy. The foreboding of death ('knowing that he would depart out of this world') threatened to draw away His mind, as also the vision of a transcendent glory ('that he would depart unto the Father') imperilled His attachment; but neither the excess of grief nor the ecstasy of gladness availed to weaken His fidelity to those whom He had chosen; 'having loved his own, he loved them unto the end' (Jn 13). In the following chapters the love of Jesus is unfolded with the eloquence peculiar to St. John's Gospel. Christ breathes about them the atmosphere of God's glory, lifts up their thoughts to the heavenly home, filling them with the fragrant truth of the endless love of God, all of which is summed up in terms of friendship in Jn 15<sup>13-15</sup>. (a) Jesus is a perfect friend because of His personal sacrifice: 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend' (v. 13). Sacrifice is the most convincing evidence in the world, and the surrender of personal advancement for the sake of others is proof of the noble emotion of love. As there is nothing that a man can give in exchange for his life, the death of Jesus for us is the highest evidence of His perfect friendship. Sacrifice is also the food of love, and friendship is growth in self-sacrificing love. Each self-denial strengthens the bond of attachment, and when sacrifice is allowed its perfect work it forms a deathless union. Jesus experienced every stage of self-denial, suppressing His own desires, until His love, perfected through suffering, received its crown and goal on the Mount of Crucifixion. The sacrifice which was the evidence of His perfect friendship was also the only sustenance by which perfect friendship could be nourished.

(b) Christ's friendship is an ethical constraint: 'Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you' (v. 14). He is our kindest friend who makes us do our best, and who helps us to do what we thought we could not do. The consciousness of expanding power is purest joy. Christ arouses enthusiasm for the holy life, imparts new resolves to master temptation, and is the most effectual aid in the attainment of the ethical life. His friendship is our better self, our conscience. (c) There is intimate communion in the friendship of Jesus: 'Henceforth I call you not servants, but I have called you friends: for all things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you' (v. 15). Friendship is fellowship in which undue reserve is cast off. When Christ spoke out on the most sacred matters of religion, and shared with others His knowledge of the Father, He did the friendliest of acts. Christ's love was the most intimate relation into which any man could enter, and His constancy, devotion, communion, and inspiration gave Him the first place among friends.

(2) The Friendship of Jesus as revealed in Christian experience.—The limits of human friendship are many, and suggest the blessings which all believers in Christ have enjoyed by their union with the living Saviour. In our human relationships no words are adequate to express the subtler and more refined emotions and convictions of the soul, so that when we strive to reveal our true self we stammer. Besides, we often cannot define these things to ourselves, and we require one who will first tell us our dream and then interpret it. Inhospitality of soul and our native bashfulness impede communion, while the sense of defect or unworthiness restricts our fellowship. Differences of experience separate us, so that we cannot match each other's moods. Distance and change of occupation place physical barriers, while too often the faults of tempo add vexing cares drive apart those who once were knit together in sympathy. How precarious is our hold upon a friendship which 'death, a few light words, a piece of stamped paper,' can destroy. But Jesus transcends all these limits of human friendship. His spirit can commune with our spirits apart from language. He knows us altogether, and needs not that any should tell Him. He is master of large experience, having been tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin. Physical barriers are all removed, since He will never go away from us or forsake us. He is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. The universal testimony of the Christian Church is that as we abide in the presence of Jesus by prayer, self-denial, and meditation, we are uplifted in soul, encouraged in our holy endeavours, and made partakers of spiritual joy. The believer finds that Christ is the way to the Father, that Jesus leads us to that communion with God which is the greatest fact of all the world. Religion is friendship between the believer and the living Christ.

FRINGES.—See BORDER.

FRUIT.—The consideration of this term as it is used in the Gospels divides itself into three parts: (1) The natural application of the word 'fruit' (καρπός) to the products of the field and the orchard; (2) other references to fruit under their specific names; (3) the spiritual lessons derived from these allusions.

2. Other references to fruits under their specific names, without the use of the word 'fruit': (a) grapes (Mt 7<sup>16</sup>, Lk 6<sup>44</sup>); (b) figs (Mt 7<sup>16</sup>, Mk 11<sup>13</sup>, Lk 6<sup>44</sup>); (c) husks (Lk 15<sup>16</sup>, probably the fruit of the carob or locust-tree); (d) mulberry (Lk 17<sup>9</sup>); (e) olives (Mt 21<sup>7</sup>). Probably the 'thorns' (ἀκανθὰς) alluded to in Mt 7<sup>16</sup> are not the so-called 'Apple of Sodom,' but a generic term covering all sorts of prickly plants. The parallel use with 'thistles' (τριβόλος) suggests that the fruit was inconceivable.

3. Spiritual lessons.—Christ Himself is intimately associated with (a) the Divine quest of fruit; (b) the Divine creation of fruit; (c) the Divine suffering and sacrifice of fruit-production. The processes of agriculture and horticulture are also, in many ways, utilized as symbols of the Christian's culture of the soul.

(a) Jesus describes Himself (Mt 21, Lk 20) under the figure of the Son whom the Master of the Vineyard sends to ask fruit of the husbandman. Our life is a rich gift to us from God; it is a garden which God has designed with lavish care, endowed with unlimited possibilities, and handed over to our complete control. He has a right to expect that we should use our opportunities well.

(b) Jesus uses the figure of the Vine (Jn 15) and the branches to express the vital and mysterious connexion that exists between Himself and His disciples, and the necessity for our dependence upon Him and His continuous inspiration, if we are to bring forth fruit. It is our responsibility to abide in Him by keeping His commandments. But it is His obligation to create the fruit. We who cannot so much as make a blade of grass grow without His co-operation, are not expected to accomplish the impossible and bring forth fruit of ourselves.

(c) Jesus manifestly alludes to His own death and sacrifice (Jn 12<sup>24</sup>) under the allegory of the grain of wheat which falls into the ground and dies, and afterwards rises in the new life of the fruit. This figure betokens the utter consecration and determination of the holiness of God to our redemption. We are apt to shudder and tremble before the holiness of God, as a thing of terrible and inaccessible majesty associated with the Great White Throne. That is because we have not taken full views, but have isolated one part from the rest. God is glorious in His holiness (Ps 145); it is such holiness as man praises when he sees it; it is hospitable, friendly, and devoted to our welfare. It is determined even unto death to share its joy and health and purity with us (Jn 12<sup>24</sup> 17<sup>19</sup>).

In the Museum of the Vatican there is a little glass relic, taken from the Catacombs; it was made as an ornament to be worn round the neck of a woman, and was found in her grave; it represents Christ bringing again the fruit of the Tree of Life.* That relic summarizes the Divine aspects of the question of fruit as it is presented in the Gospels. It is Christ who loves fruit, and who desires to find it in us; and it is He who, in the inspiration and creation of the fruit, virtually gives Himself to us.

But, as in agriculture and horticulture the farmer and the gardener are co-operators with God in the production of the fruits of the earth and the fruit of the trees, so, in many ways, the Gospels lay upon us the injunctions of our duty.

(1) We are the ground which brings forth fruit, according as we receive the Word (Mt 13<sup>23</sup>, Mk 4<sup>20</sup>, Lk 8<sup>15</sup>). If our hearts be like the wayside, trampled over and hardened by the interests and engagements of the world, or if they be readily affected by the opinions of men, or if they be choked by the cares of this life and the deceitfulness of riches, there can be no fruitfulness. It is our duty to prepare the ground by thought and prayer and a regulated life for the reception of God's truth. The harvest will correspond with the tillage.

(2) We are the branches which bear fruit according as we abide in the Vine (Jn 15). Just as the gardener prunes and purges a tree so that it may bring forth more fruit, so there are afflictions in this life which are only God's way of increasing our fruitfulness. The branches which draw most sustenance from the vine are the most productive, so the soul which keeps most faithfully the Lord's commandments abides the most in His love and is most fruitful.

(3) We are the grain of wheat which comes to fruit, if it dies (Jn 12<sup>24-25</sup>). In the first place, the Master alludes to His own death. But the second reference of the figure is to the essential principle of ethical life—'Die to live.'

To Hegel, 'the great aphorism (of Jn 12<sup>25</sup>), in which the Christian ethics and theology may be said to be summed up, is no mere epigrammatic saying, whose self-contradiction is not to be regarded too closely; it is rather the first distinct, though as yet undeveloped, expression of the exact truth as to the nature of spirit. The true interpretation of the maxim—'Die to live,'—is that the individual must die to an isolated life,—i.e. a life for and in himself, a life in which the immediate satisfaction of desire as his desire is an end in itself,—in order that he may live the spiritual life, the universal life which really belongs to him as a spiritual or self-conscious being' (Edward Caird, Hegel, p. 213).

VOL. I.—40

(4) We are the husbandmen, who are expected to tend the Vineyard (Lk 20), and to make it fruitful, and to yield up a proportion of the fruit at rightful times to the Lord of the vineyard. The original application of the parable is, doubtless, to the scribes and the chief priests who rejected Jesus, but it is equally applicable to any who think they can do as they please with their life and ignore all obligations to the Giver and Lord.

(5) We are the trees which are known by their fruit (Mt 7<sup>17</sup>). Men do not gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles. A tree which is true to its nature and to its destiny brings forth its appropriate fruit. Man, who is by nature a child of God and by destiny an heir of Heaven, should produce the fruit of the Spirit of God.

FULFILMENT.—The primary meaning of the English word 'fulfil' is simply to fill—by a pleonasm, to fill (until) full. We find this use in literature—

'Is not thy brain's rich hive
Fulfilled with honey?' (Donne).

Sometimes it is imitated even in modern English, though only by a deliberate archaism. For with us 'fulfil' is specialized to mean not literal material filling, but the carrying out into act of some word—some promise, threat, hope, command, etc. When the AV was made, 'fulfil,' according to the great Oxford Dictionary, meant 'fill,' and began to be used by the translators in its proper sense on the pattern of the Vulgate, which wrote (unclassically) implere and adimplere for Heb. מִלֵּא. Thus the transition from one sense to the other, or the metaphor of filling for fulfilling, is Hebrew. But in Greek, too, it is possible that the same metaphor sprang up independently of Hebrew influence; cf. classical references (under πληροῦν) in Cremer, also in Liddell and Scott (πληροῦν, II. 5). In OT the usage is not very common. Possibly the earliest instance, chronologically, is Jer 44<sup>25</sup>. What the Jews in Egypt have said, they do. Their threat to practise idolatry is not left an empty word; it is filled out, or filled up, in action. At Ps 20<sup>6</sup> we have the word used of answers to prayer: 'Jehovah fulfil all thy petitions'; the empty vessel, as it were, standing to receive the Divine supplies. For 'fulfilling law' or 'fulfilling a command' there is no proper authority in OT, though EV at times introduces the term (Ps 148<sup>8</sup>); literally, the forces of nature 'do' God's word. In 1 K 2<sup>27</sup> 8<sup>16-18</sup> we have the most important usage of all, the 'fulfilling' of the prophetic word or prediction. The passages referred to are marked by modern scholarship as Deuteronomistic. We may therefore probably conclude that the theological conception of 'fulfilling' is part of the religious language of that great forward movement in OT history, the Deuteronomistic reform. Along with these theological applications πληροῦν may mean 'fill' anywhere in the OT. And so in NT (πληροῦν chiefly): in the parable of the Drag-net (Mt 13<sup>48</sup>), the net is 'filled' with all kinds of fish; Mt 23<sup>23</sup>, 'Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers.' More generally, however, the word bears its derivative sense, and has a theological application. Though rare in OT, the usage is quite common in NT, very noticeably, of fulfilled prophecy, in the First Gospel. A beginning of differentiation or specification is made in the NT in this respect, that while πληροῦν may mean 'fill,' the simpler but kindred form πικραῖνα [others assume πληθω as root form] never means 'fulfil.' A second metaphor underlies πληροῦν. This is pro-ably still later theological language. It means specially the fulfilling of prediction. We find it in Ezr 1<sup>2</sup>=2 Ch 36<sup>22</sup>. According to Bertholet (on Ezr 1.c.; he refers to Dn 12<sup>7</sup> also), 'Fulfilment ranks simply as the end of the prophetic word, which, once spoken, enters among the powers of the real world and gradually works itself out.' This word and metaphor are also common in NT. Sometimes we have τελεῖν and cognatus; though here again there is a tendency (less marked, however, than with πληροῦν in contrast to παραλάναι) to prefer a more specialised or technical term—τελεῖν, τελείωσαι. God's work is begun by the prophetic word, but incomplete till the fact matches the promise.

A third term and metaphor are of some moment in OT, but scarcely enter into NT—σπρ, βεβαῖον. (God's promise may seem to be tottering to its fall. —He will buttress it; support it). See Jer 23<sup>3</sup>, Is 44<sup>2</sup>, Ro 15<sup>7</sup>; but in the Gospels only Mk 12<sup>29</sup> 'confirming . . . with signs following.' (How fully this is a synonym for σπρ we see when we note the usage of σπρ at 1 K 14). σπρ, lit. 'return' or 'reward', occurs by an extension of meaning at Is 44<sup>28-29</sup> for 'fulfil'; not imitated in NT. Also, as already implied, EV sometimes introduces 'fulfil' or 'be fulfilled' where the original has merely 'do' or 'be.' And we cannot say that this is illegitimate. A very important passage is the last clause of Mt 5<sup>18</sup> AV; but RV 'till all things be accomplished' [to mark the contrast with πληρώσαι, v. 17. See below—κ—on both verses.]

We have then to look chiefly to σπρ, πληροῦν, while not forgetting other forms. And the question may be raised, whether the NT writers were alive to the implication of steady quantitative growth towards fulfilment? Or had the original suggestions of quantity and of continuousness passed away,—was there assumed a mere correspondence between the word and its fulfilment? (If one pours water into a vessel, it fills by degrees. But if one is fitting together a ball-and-socket joint, the socket is empty at one moment, full at the next. The two correspond, but their correspondence is not reached by gradual growth). We shall have to distinguish in this as in other respects between different senses of πληροῦν (or its synonyms).

1. Fulfilment of time. Here, if anywhere, we may expect to find the ideas of continuity and gradualness. Now 'fulfil' is constantly used in the OT of the elapsing of a given time—alike in Hebrew, Greek, and English; or, in NT, alike in Greek and English. It is used of the period of a woman's gestation (e.g. Gn 25<sup>24</sup>; πληρω, LXX; Lk 1<sup>27</sup> σπρ—παραλάναι; RV 'fulfilled' in all 3 cases). There is no more striking or more frequently noted parable of

The slow sweet hours that bring us all things good,
The slow sad hours that bring us all things ill; or sometimes, as George Eliot has expressed it in Adam Bede, of 'swift hurrying shame,' 'the bitterness of life's bitterness.' But the word is also used of other measured times—of periods fixed by OT law (e.g. Lk 22<sup>12</sup>; παραλάναι, RV 'fulfilled'; cf. Lv 12<sup>4</sup>, σπρ (Qal); LXX πληρω). From such usages as these, we pass on to times of Divine fulfilment.

'The fulness of the time came' (τὸ πλήρωμα τοῦ χρόνου, Gal 4<sup>4</sup>). And our Lord's own message is summed up in Mk 1<sup>9</sup>: 'The time is fulfilled (πεπληρώθη ὁ καιρὸς) and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye and believe in the gospel.' (Probably secondary in comparison with Mt 4<sup>17</sup>, 'Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand'; yet thoroughly significant of Biblical and primitive Christian beliefs, cf. Is 61<sup>1</sup>, Lk 4<sup>18</sup>). The idea is, that God has fixed a time, 'His own good time,' as our pious phrase runs. (Is that a misquotation of Is 60<sup>22</sup>? RV 'in its time'; AV [same sense; archaic English] 'in his time'). The number seventy (70 years of exile, Jer 25<sup>11</sup> [29<sup>10</sup>], cf. Dn 9<sup>2</sup>) was specially important for this conception of a fixed period Divinely appointed. Yet we have signs that the 'time' or its 'fulness' is not, for the Bible writers, mechanically predetermined. The eschatological discourse (Mt 24<sup>29</sup>—Mk 13<sup>29</sup>) tells us that the time of trouble, at the world's end, shall be cut short out of mercy to God's people. [Lk. omits, and inserts a reference to 'times of the Gentiles' which must be 'fulfilled,' 21<sup>34</sup>.] And it is possible that another popular religious phrase—the 'hastening' of God's kingdom—may have Biblical warrant. It appears at Is 60<sup>22</sup> (quoted above). But when (as Marti advises) we refer back to Is 5<sup>19</sup>, we find that the word 'hasten' was introduced originally to express the temper of a sneerer—'Let God hurry up, if He is really going to act [and not simply talk]'. So that 'hasten,' when used at 60<sup>22</sup>, may have come to mean no more than 'fulfil.' Cf. also Hab 2<sup>3</sup> and 2 P 3<sup>4-5</sup>. Still, when the fulness of a Divinely appointed time is spoken of, all these qualifications drop out of sight. In some sense a period of time is Divinely ordained; and efflux of time brings the day when God acts. Fulfilment of time is not indeed identical with fulfilment of God's promise [or threat]. The first is a condition of the second. In regard to the first, at least, the quantitative sense of 'fulfil' is maintained in clear consciousness. ('My time is not yet fulfilled,' Jn 7<sup>8</sup>—'mine hour is not yet come,' 2<sup>4</sup>).

2. Fulfilment of joy (πληρω). Here again there is an ambiguity. When St. Paul says (Ph 2<sup>2</sup>) 'Fulfil ye my joy,' what does he mean? Is it (1) 'Complete my happiness; unless I hear of your being thoroughly at one, I cannot be perfectly happy' (1) or (2) does he mean, 'I have sacrificed many ordinary sources of happiness; give me this my chosen joy'? Authorities seem to prefer the first; perhaps, 'complete the joy I already have in you.' That is, 'fulfilment' of 'joy' is taken as a quantitative and continuous idea. Elsewhere the phrase is peculiarly Johannine (Jn 3<sup>29</sup> 15<sup>11</sup> 16<sup>24</sup> 17<sup>13</sup>, with 1 Jn 1<sup>4</sup>, 2 Jn 1<sup>10</sup>). The Baptist, e.g. (3<sup>29</sup>), has his joy in full. He has all the joy he can expect. Yet there is more than this in the words. He has full joy—'rejoiceth greatly.' In the Johannine passages the two thoughts seem included: the joy (Christ's joy, e.g.) is given; and what is given is a full joy. So prominent is the latter thought—the more quantitative—that one is tempted to regard AV 'full' as a better rendering, in regard to joy, than the more literal 'fulfilled' of RV.

3. Fulfilment of prophecy or of Scripture or of Christ's words (usually πληρω, Mt 1<sup>22</sup> and very often; Mk 15<sup>29</sup> [doubtful text]; Lk 1<sup>2</sup>, Jn 12<sup>38</sup> and elsewhere. In Christ's words, Mt 26<sup>54</sup> [a 'doublet'] = Mk 14<sup>49</sup> [Lk 22<sup>53</sup> has not the word]; Lk 4<sup>21</sup> 21<sup>22</sup> 24<sup>44</sup>, cf. 9<sup>31</sup> 'his decease'; 21<sup>34</sup> 'times of the Gentiles'; 22<sup>16</sup> the Passover 'fulfilled in the kingdom of God'; Jn 13<sup>39</sup> 15<sup>26</sup> and elsewhere. But τελείω, Jn 19<sup>30</sup>. There is perhaps a slight difference in meaning—not the word of Scripture verified, but the terrible things spoken of in Scripture made actual—when we have τελέω at Lk 18<sup>31</sup> 22<sup>27</sup>. Purely in the sense of 'fulfilment,' perhaps, at Jn 19<sup>30</sup>. συντελέω occurs Mk 13<sup>41</sup>; the noun συντέλεια [τοῦ αἰῶνος 'end of the world'; RVm 'consummation of the age'] in Mt. s. ll. 24<sup>2</sup>, and also at 13<sup>38</sup> 4<sup>9</sup> 23<sup>26</sup>. [He 9<sup>26</sup>, συντέλεια τῶν αἰῶνων 'end of the ages,' RV; marg. 'consummation']. τελείω [AV 'finish,' RV 'accomplish'] is used in the Johannine discourses of Christ's work [εργον, 4<sup>34</sup> 17<sup>4</sup>] or works [5<sup>2</sup>, cf. again 19<sup>30</sup>]. As far as the words rendered 'fulfil' are concerned, they are used in the same sense throughout; whether the fulfilment is of the past (the OT) in the present (Christ), or of the present (Christ's words) in the (eschatological) future. And several Greek words are fairly represented by the same English meaning. Moreover, for a full index of the Scripture teaching we should need to include passages like Lk 24<sup>25-27</sup>, where no word 'fulfil' occurs. (But we have it in Lk 24<sup>44</sup>). This holds especially of the fulfilment of Christ's own words. It is true, the word as well as the thought occurs in the Fourth Gospel (18<sup>31-33</sup>), but in the Synoptics the phrasing is different. The nearest approach is Mk 13<sup>31</sup> //, 'until all [these] things be accomplished (γένηται)—a difficult passage, discussed below (under 'Fulfilment of law'). We must lay down, in general, that the NT thinks of fulfilment as occurring in detailed mechanical correspondence with the letter of prediction. God has said so-and-so, therefore it must happen exactly as was said. In Jn 19<sup>28</sup> it is difficult to take any other view of the Evangelist's meaning than that Jesus exclaimed 'I thirst,' because the Passion psalms had spoken of the cruel thirst of the Sufferer. We must not, of course, exaggerate the simplicity of the Bible writers. A few verses earlier, where Jn 18<sup>9</sup> interprets Jesus' protection of His disciples at the moment of His own arrest, as the fulfilment of the word which He spake, 'Of those whom thou hast given me I lost not one,' the Evangelist knows perfectly, and trusts his readers to remember, that the true sense of Christ's words belongs to a different region. In that one instance, at least, he is consciously accommodating, as we might do in quoting a line of Shakespeare. And there is more. The Evangelist discerns in Christ's care for the disciples a type of the supreme spiritual transaction. Even outwardly, Christ saves others, while not saving but sacrificing Himself. Still, in general, the letter of the NT takes the letter of the OT as a magic book, foreshadowing what must happen to Christ. Deeper views are no doubt latent in the NT, but they are nowhere formulated by it. They do not rise to the surface of consciousness in Evangelist or Apostle.

4. Fulfilment of law [and prophets?]. [Fulfilment generally?] The interpretation here raises very difficult questions, hardly to be settled without some critical surgery. First let us take what is simple: to 'fulfil' the Law is to obey it—τελέω—at Ro 2<sup>27</sup>, Ja 2<sup>8</sup>; or πληροῦν, Gal 5<sup>14</sup>, Ro 13<sup>8, 10</sup>. (On these last, see below). Unambiguous, too, is 'to fulfil all righteousness' (πληρώσαι, Mt 5<sup>19</sup>); and the saying may well be historical, though unsupported in the parallels. It fits the circumstances (see present writer's paper on 'Dawn of Messianic Consciousness' in Expos. Times, 1905, p. 215), if perhaps tinged in expression with the Evangelist's phraseology. But what of Mt 5<sup>17</sup> ('Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets; I came not to destroy but to fulfil'—πληρώσαι)? (a) Much has been written on this subject since the present writer discussed the passage in Christ and the Jewish Law, 1886. Even more decidedly than then, he must insist that if v. 18—and especially if v. 19—is a genuine part of Christ's discourse, we are shut up to understand 'fulfil' in the sense of 'obey' (so Cremer's Lexicon, bracketing 5<sup>17</sup> with 3<sup>15</sup>). But (b) the case for omitting v. 18—with its Pharisaic aspect, its at least seemingly exaggerated canonization of the whole letter of the Pentateuch—is being very strongly pressed to-day (e.g. Votaw, art. 'Sermon on the Mount' in Hastings DB, Ext. Vol.). If v. 18 [some would say vv. 18, 19] be a gloss [or belong properly to a different context in a somewhat different form], we may render 'not to destroy but to perfect the law,'—raising it to its ideal height of purity, and carrying it to its ideal depth of inwardness. This view probably holds the field at present. It goes well with vv. 21, etc., where our Lord, in a series of brilliant paradoxes, sweeps away the mere letter of the OT [? or the legal glosses added to it by 'scribes and Pharisees' (v. 20)]. But there are difficulties. It is 'hard' to think that our Lord ever exercised the supposed conscious detailed intellectual criticism of the OT as such (so the late A. B. Davidson, in conversation with the present writer's informant). And would He have called His paradoxes a 'perfected' law? They are at least as like a 'destruction' of the regime of law! Moreover, we have the reference to the 'prophets.' (c) When 'fulfil' is predicated of 'prophecy,' the sense is well known; the 'prophets' become the predominant partner in such a juxtaposition as 'to fulfil law and prophets'; and we have to think of the OT's moral lawgiving as a sort of type, fulfilled, when the word of the prophets is fulfilled, in Christ's person. [Christ and the Jewish Law tried in a particular way to carry through this meaning of 'fulfil']. 'Law and prophets' repeatedly occur together in Christ's words, esp. in Mt. (also at 7<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>40</sup> 11<sup>13</sup>—Lk 16<sup>16</sup>, cf. Lk 24<sup>44</sup>). We can hardly doubt that our Lord Himself used the expression; and it is probable, too, that He used it as a general designation for the OT. Still, it is conceivable that the Evangelist has brought in the phrase here. A further measure of critical surgery would then dismiss (c), and leave the field so far to (a) and (b). But (d) we might raise a new possibility, either by exegesis, or if necessary by a minor form of critical excision. We might take Mt 5<sup>17</sup> either as spoken here in pure abstraction—I am not a destroyer but a fulfiller—or as originally a separate logion worked into this context by the Evangelist.

In view of these rival interpretations one might turn for help to the Epistles. For, especially on ethical points, the teaching of Christ visibly moulds St. Paul's inculcation again and again. And in this way we might learn how the earliest Church understood its Lord's words. Gal 5<sup>14</sup> and Ro 13<sup>8, 10</sup> [see above], while their use of πληροῦν suggests Mt 5<sup>17</sup>, refer in substance rather to Mt 22<sup>38-40</sup> [Mark's //, (12<sup>31</sup>) omits the very element which lives in the Epistles—love to God and man not only the chief duty but the whole of duty. In this case the Epistles decidedly support Mt's tradition. In Luke (10<sup>27</sup>) we have an unwarranted suggestion that the scribes had already woven together Dt 6<sup>5</sup> with Lv 19<sup>18</sup>. Thus Luke's tradition here seems still less exact. On Christ's originality in this matter, comp. Montefiore in Hibbert Journal, Apr. 1905]. Commentators seem to take Gal 5<sup>14</sup>—'all the law is fulfilled (πληροῦνται) in one word, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself'—as parallel not to Ro 13<sup>8</sup> ('all the law is summed up—ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι—in Thou shalt love thy neighbour,' etc.), but rather to vv. 8, 10. 'Love περὶ ἀγάπης—is the πλήρωμα of the law.' St. Paul then takes fulfil=obey, as in (a), above. But does St. Paul's language really support (a)? Is there not something more than obeying law in the Pauline thought of 'fulfilment' (Ro 8<sup>4</sup>)? The requirement—θεωσιμα—of the Law is fulfilled in those who walk not after the flesh but after the spirit. The utmost we can say is that πληροῦν, in the sense of 'fulfil,' had been given such currency in the Greek version of our Lord's words that St. Paul instinctively weaves it in when he is quoting another passage. Thus, after all, the evidence of the Epistles as to the original meaning of Mt 5<sup>17</sup> is neutral, or at any rate not decisive.

Summary.—In Mt 5<sup>17</sup>, then, Christ claims either (a) to render a perfect obedience to law, or (b) to perfect the moral lawgiving of the OT, or (c) to fulfil absolutely the ideals of the OT generally, or (d) to be in general a fulfiller rather than a destroyer. (a) is not without evidence in its support. (b) is perhaps most generally popular. (c) we are inclined to regard as due to the mistaken intrusion in Mt 5<sup>17</sup> of ['law] and prophets,'—words doubtless used by Christ (of the OT as a whole?) in other connexions. (d) was on the whole supported in the above discussion—if necessary, at the cost of regarding v. 17b as by rights an independent logion. (We have not discussed the extravagant suggestion that there was no Sermon on the Mount in Christ's ministry at all).

Mt 23. We have quoted with sympathy a suggestion that this verse ought to be struck out of the context of Mt 5. But there is no ground for denying that it represents one of the sayings of Jesus. We have Luke's 1. 167; and, besides that, all three Synoptics have a similar phrase in the eschatological chapter. There they coincide almost to a word—'This generation shall not pass away till all [these] things be accomplished [γένηται]. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away' (Mt 24. 34 = Mk 13. 31 = Lk 21. 32). This (as has often been pointed out) must surely be an alternative version of the logion Mt 5.14. According to Mt 5, Christ spoke of the perpetuity of the Law; according to Mt 24, of the assured truth of His own words. We must note the presence of 3 corresponding clauses in each of the two passages: heaven and earth passing away—all things being accomplished—a Divine word not 'passing away'. In Mt 5.14 the first two elements jar against each other. The same sentence contains two limits—two clauses each beginning ὅτι etc. In that respect 24. 36 shows to better advantage, and can advance the stronger claim to rank as the original. On the other hand, the verses in ch. 24 are themselves exceedingly difficult. It is no mere blind conservatism which hesitates to believe that our Lord pledged His supernatural knowledge for the conclusion of the world's story within a generation. The words, as we have them, mean that and nothing else; and it is surely incredible that Jesus should have so erred. We do not deny that He may have expected the end shortly; there is at least a strong NT tradition, direct and indirect, that He did. We do say that He would not stake everything with the very greatest emphasis upon a date which besides was a mistaken date. B. W. Bacon's solution is attractive—that the original logion referred to the word of God, but not specifically eterna to the OT law or to the Master's own words, though different lines of tradition insisted on one or the other identification.

5. 'Fulfillment' in general.—Some individual passages. (a) Lk 1. 1 speaks of the things 'fulfilled' among us (ἐκτελέσθησαν); perf. particip., from a derivative of ἑκτέλλω, or at least of ἑκτέλλω. The connexion with v. 4—'the certainty of those things wherein,' etc.—makes AV's rendering tempting; 'things . . . most surely believed.' But authority favours the rendering 'fulfilled.' Not, however, in the sense of 'Divinely fulfilled.' In these, the most classical verses from St. Luke's pen, we must look rather to classical models; and we should probably take 'fulfilled' as meaning 'fully accomplished.' So Holtzmann; or Adeney.—Luke will record complete transactions, a finished story. Probably, therefore, there is nothing to be made of this passage. (b) In Lk 22. 37 we read (RV), 'This which is written must be fulfilled (τελεσθῆναι) in me. And he was reckoned with transgressors; for that which concerneth me hath fulfillment' (τέλος ἔχει). Here there is room for difference of opinion. Holtzmann is respectful to the passage—a 'valuable separate tradition of Luke's,'—but doubts whether the individual verse is a genuine saying of the Lord's. And he takes it as meaning merely that death, or the end, is hurrying near; on the analogy of Mk 9. 31—'Satan if divided against himself 'hath an end.' On the other hand, Adeney, like the Revisers (apparently), thinks that Divine fulfillment is pointed to here. It is an interesting possibility. We can hardly say more. (c) If the suggestion offered above—(d)—regarding Mt 5.17b should be adopted—if that were originally a separate logion, or if, at any rate, it was spoken quite in general—then the central Gospel passage on 'fulfilment' gives us a general point of view, in the Master's own words.

Any of these individual passages, if such an interpretation as we have discussed is warrantable, centres round the idea of the fulfilment of prophecy; though Mt 5.17b would mean something broader or something profounder than what the letter of the NT generally attains to. It will be interesting if we can regard such broader and profounder teaching as coming directly from our Master.

Different senses of 'fulfilment' reviewed again. These do not to any great extent correspond to different Greek words. To fulfil joy is ἡλάρω (usually in the passive), to complete joy, but (sometimes at least, we thought) to give joy in its fullness. To fulfil time (again usually a passive) is also ἡλάρω, but might be the kindred κατέλθω, which is used even in NT in the less theological applications. The appointed time—whatever authority enacted it—is now full. To fulfil Scripture—or prophets' words, etc.—is indifferently ἡλάρω (or cognates, possibly once κατέλθω, Lk 21. 32); and possibly, but not probably, once ἡλάρω, Lk 1. 1; see above, 5), or τελέω (or cognate τελείω; once τέλος ἔχει); nor should we forget ἡλάρω in construction. To fulfil law in the Epistles is τελέω or ἡλάρω. In the Gospels we have ἡλάρω in kindred applications—once, 'to fulfil righteousness'; and once, in the great passage, as we were inclined to think, in a purely general sense, 'to fulfil.' But see above, 4. Cf. further in Epistles ἡλάρω, 'to fulfil one's ministry,' 2 Ti 4. 5; 'fully to proclaim the message,' ῥὸ κήρυγμα, 2 Ti 4. 5.

Can we unify these leading senses? Probably not; probably not any two. They are, of course, connected, especially the first three. It is God who gives joy in fullness, God who ordains times, God who keeps His promise. At His own time His keeping of promise fills His people with joy. Nay more; the fourth sense is also near of kin. Christ, the fulfiller of all promises, is also, on any view of particular passages, the supreme pattern of obedience, and the author of new obedience in others. But the word 'fulfil' probably does not occur on the same ground in any two of the senses discriminated above. There is, in some cases, an idea of fullness as against half fullness (of time, or of joy; two different fullnesses, therefore). In others (prophecy, or law) there is a mere idea of correspondence—fullness against emptiness, so to speak—the act answering to the word (but answering it in two different ways).

Fulfillment: modern theological study. The central subject is fulfilment of prophecy. (It has also the most passages). Modern study of 'Prophecy and Fulfilment'—title of a book by von Hofmann—brings out a truth which (unless possibly adumbrated in our Lord's words, Mt 5.17b) is nowhere formulated in Scripture. Fulfilment is not only like what prediction expected, but is also in some ways different, because the prophets' partial wisdom was not adequate to the full splendour of the fulfilment. Christ, in so far as He differs from the Messianic portrait of the OT, is not lesser but greater spiritually; He necessarily differs. It is true, some elements of the fulfilment are transferred to Christian eschatology. As yet they are unfinished things. But if the First Advent differed (for the better) from the letter of expectation, we may infer that there are symbolical or metaphorical elements in the prophetic pictures of the Second Advent and eschatology. All this, while not formulated in the NT, is learned by believing study of the phenomena of Scripture, and is our age's proper contribution to the conception of fulfilment. The main lines of expectation fulfilled in Christ are perhaps three: (1) The hope of the Messianic King (Is 9 is the great passage)—most important, not because of its intrinsic spiritual depth (in that respect it did not stand very high), but from what we may call its dogmatic sharpness, and its emphasis in the NT age. It lent the Christian Church its first creed—viz. that 'Jesus is Christ.' It was fulfilled only through the transference of Christ's royalty from temporal to exalted, or from present to future conditions. (2) There is the hope of God's own coming to His people in person, Is 40th—and throughout Is 40-55. This pointed strongly to Christ's Godhead. (3) There is the type or ideal of the Suffering Servant, included in Is 40-55 (also in Ps 22 and others), chiefly at Is 52<sup>12</sup>-53<sup>12</sup>. This teaching furnished Christian theology with its deepest elements. We can also now explain what amount of truth is conveyed by the idea of 'double fulfillments.' When the historical reference of a prophecy is to some lesser or earlier personage than Christ, Jesus, yet if that person is important in the history of God's purposes, the same principle may be fulfilled partially in him which is (ultimately) more perfectly fulfilled in Christ. Thus we may have a multiple, a repeated fulfilment of great principles; yet all pointing on to Christ as the grand or absolute Fulfiller. We do not affirm a great cryptogram, with designed artful ambiguity. The prophetic human speaker did not mean two (and just two) sets of events. He meant one event. But his words were capable of meaning many. And something in his spiritual messages corresponds to Christ more than to Christ's forerunner. Again, individual or detailed fulfillments have their own subordinate place. Some indeed may be rather a play of pious fancy than a serious argument. The OT is full of plays upon words; and the NT citations of 'I called my son out of Egypt,' and of 'He shall be called a Nazarene' (Mt 2<sup>23, 26</sup>), are probably of this sort—things that carried more weight in Judaea long ago than they can possibly carry now. At times the resemblance to the OT is—innocently and unconsciously—filled out. The exact reproduction of Ps 22, which we find in Mt 27<sup>45</sup>, is unknown to the earlier narrative of Mark. Where the matter is of some weight (e.g. probably the birth at Bethlehem), its chief importance is that it emphasizes or advertises the deeper analogies and correspondences in virtue of which Christ fulfills—and, may we say, transcends—the spirit or the religion of the OT; alike in Himself and in His gospel.

FULNESS (πληρομα).—The Gr. word is used in the Gospels in its natural, physical sense in Mt 9<sup>15</sup>, Mk 2<sup>21</sup> 6<sup>28</sup> 8<sup>20</sup>. It has a definite theological meaning in Jn 1<sup>9</sup> (the only place in the Gospels where it is Gr. 'fulness'). In the Epistles it is used: of time, to denote the period that fills up a certain epoch (Eph 1<sup>10</sup>, Gal 4<sup>1</sup>; see FULNESS OF TIME); of persons, the full number required to make up a definite figure (Ro 11<sup>12, 26</sup>); of measure, to indicate the full capacity, the entire content (1 Co 10<sup>26, 28</sup>; Ro 15<sup>27</sup>), also this may be said to be its meaning in Ro 15<sup>10</sup> where love is spoken of as the πληρομα νόμου. The word has also a definite theological meaning in Col 1<sup>10</sup> 2<sup>9</sup>, Eph 1<sup>10</sup> 3<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>12</sup>. The central conception of the word, wherever used, seems to be completeness, the totality of the things spoken of, that which binds them into a symmetrical whole. Even when it is the latest addition that is indicated as the πληρομα, the word refers back to the beginning, and signifies the completeness effected by the addition. Thus in the passages in St. Matthew and St. Mark which refer to the sewing of the new patch on the old garment, it is not the patch that is the πληρομα, it is the completeness that results from the patch; and, as Lightfoot correctly points out, the idea meant to be conveyed is the paradox that it is this very completeness which makes the garment incomplete. A false show of wholeness is worse than an open rent,—an idea entirely in accordance with the method of the teaching of Jesus.

The theological meaning of πληρομα in St. John's Gospel must be taken in connexion with its use in St. Paul's Epistles. Granted the authenticity of the Epistles and the Gospel, St. John must have written more than a quarter of a century later, and must have addressed practically the same circle as that which St. Paul had in view in writing to the Colossians and the Ephesians. It is clear that St. Paul is dealing with the word in a technical sense as a word which is familiar to his opponents, but is used by him in a sense different from theirs; and St. John's use of the term is exactly similar. The πληρομα represented a leading thought in the Gnostic heresy, of which we find the first germs referred to in the vigorous polemic of St. Paul. Gnosticism was further developed by Cerinthus, a contemporary of St. John, and reached its culmination in the fully elaborated system of Valentinus. The problem with which these Gnostic heresiarchs were continually wrestling was one that is as old as human thought—how to pass from the infinite to the finite, and reconcile absolute good with the existence of evil. The details of the earlier systems with which the Apostles had to deal are unknown to us, but in the speculations of Valentinus, as preserved in the writings of the early Fathers, especially the Philosophoumena of Hippolytus, we have a system in which philosophical conceptions are clothed in Oriental imagery, and an attempt is made to give a consistent explanation of the mysteries of Creation, Sin, and Redemption.

From the Absolute Being or the Abyssal Depth, there issued twin emanations, having each a relative being in itself, but each pair, as they receded from the primal source of existence, had fainter traces of the pure Divine spirit. These emanations are personifications of the Divine attributes, and in their totality constitute the realm of pure spirit—the πληρομα of the Godhead. Opposed to the πνεύματα is the κίνησις, the κίνησις, the realm of matter and material things, the shadow-world as against the world of reality. It is the philosophical distinction between the noumenal and the phenomenal, the realm of archetypal ideas and the objects of sense perception, with a moral significance imparted into it. In the κίνησις, the thirty Æons of the πνεύματα have their material counterparts, presided over by the Demiurge or Creator, who has no organic relation to the spiritual realm. This world of chaos and ancient night receives from the πνεύματα a spiritual principle, reducing it to a semblance of order, in the person of Sophia Achamoth, an emanation from the Sophia of the spiritual realm. The higher Sophia, the latest of the Æons, and the furthest removed from the Absolute, had been consumed with a desire to reach upwards to the Primal Glory, and to emulate the Uncreated by giving birth to another Æon. The result was an abortion,—a being spiritual in essence but out of harmony with the πνεύματα,—which was cast forth from the spiritual realm and found a place of exile in the κίνησις. Here Sophia Achamoth imparted of her essence to the Æons of the void, and thus introduced a spiritual principle which was capable of redemption. To those who had in them this spiritual essence Christ was sent, each of the Æons contributing something of its own perfection to fit Him for His errand. The Æon Christ entered into the man Jesus, and through Him effected the redemption of those spiritual beings who were involved in the lower realm of matter, but who had received quickening through the infusion of the spiritual principle into the κίνησις.

What degree of elaboration this fantastic theory had reached in the age of St. Paul, and still later in that of St. John, there is not now material to decide; but there are distinct traces of it in the Epistle to the Colossians in the reference to principalities, dominions, and powers (Col 1<sup>16</sup>); and we know that Cerinthus, a contemporary of St. John, thought out the religious problem on very similar lines, and used the word pleroma in a similar sense. We are to regard the use of the term, then, by the two Apostles as an assertion of the true doctrine of the pleroma as against a false doctrine which had wide currency. In the Logos, who became incarnate in Jesus Christ, the whole pleroma of the Godhead is contained. Jesus was not the last of the Æons, created as an afterthought. He is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all created beings (Col 1<sup>24</sup>). The long chain of mediators between God and man is relegated to the realm of myth, and the one Mediator, μεσσηνίας, full of grace and truth (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>), through whom alone God effects His purposes in Creation and Redemption, is held up for the adoration of all men. And this fulness of the Divine, which is in Him through the closeness of His contact with God, is imparted to His disciples (Jn 1<sup>14</sup>) and to the Church which is His Body, and which in its ideality is the fulness of Him who filleth all in all (Eph 1<sup>22</sup>). The Church is here regarded as the complement of Jesus. The Head and the Body make one whole—the pleroma of the Godhead, the full realization of the Divine purpose which centres in the redemption of man. For through this Church, which on earth possesses the potentiality of the pleroma, by means of its varied ministries, the fulness which is in Christ the Head passes to the individual, whose destiny it is to attain to the perfect man, to the possession, in his degree, of the entire pleroma of the Godhead.

It is scarcely sufficiently recognized that the NT doctrine of the Church is a philosophy of the Social Organism which embraces all essential human activities (Eph 4<sup>1-6</sup>). Our difficulty in apprehending it lies mainly in this, that the Apostles, seeing the temporal in the light of eternity, are constantly confusing the boundary lines which separate the actual from the ideal, the process from the consummation.

FULNESS OF THE TIME (τὸ πλήρωμα τοῦ χρόνου).—An expression used by St. Paul (Gal 4<sup>4</sup>) to mark the opportuneness of the coming of Christ into the world, and the ripeness of the age for the great religious revolution He was to effect. It emphasizes the unique significance of the period as the culmination of a long course of events, by which the way had been providentially prepared for Christ's appearance, and His introduction of a purer type of religion. The evidences of such a providential preparation are indeed remarkable. Along different lines of historical development a situation had been created at the very centre of the world's life, that was singularly favourable to the planting and spread of a loftier faith. The main factors usually recognized as contributing to this result were: (1) the peculiar condition which the Jewish people had reached; (2) the dissemination of the Greek language, culture, and commercial activity; and (3) the unifying influence of Rome.

4. The peculiar condition of the Jewish people.—Centuries of chequered discipline had fixed in the Jewish mind the belief in one true and perfectly righteous God, and subsequently to the return from the Exile there had been no relapse into idolatry. Latterly, indeed, through the influence of the scribes and Pharisees, legalism and formality had crept in, and the externalization of religion had been carried far; yet in many classes of society there was a wistful straining after inner purity and a more living fellowship with God; and in spite of the soulless bondage of ceremonial observances, there was an amount of deep and reverent piety that kept the nation's heart sounder than might appear on the surface. At all events, nowhere else in the world did there exist so vivid a conception of the Divine holiness or so high a recognized standard of morality; nowhere else, therefore, were there so many devout minds ready to receive a new spiritual revelation, or so well fitted to furnish heralds and apostles for its propagation.

Then there was the revival of the Messianic hope, which, kept alive by the pressure of repeated misfortunes, had, under the tightening grip of Roman domination, sprung up with passionate intensity. The political situation was galling, and the Jewish people, pining to be free from the foreign yoke, consoled themselves with the thought of a glorious future. It was a time of high-strung unrest and expectancy; yet although the prospect of political emancipation was to a large extent entertained, there were multitudes of earnest souls yearning for a higher form of deliverance, the dawn of a reign of righteousness and peace, in the benefits of which not Israel only, but the whole world, should share.

Outside Palestine, again, the influence of Jewish religious ideas had been widely extended by means of the Dispersion. Conscious of being raised above the manifold forms of heathen superstition around them, the colonies of Jews settled in the trading cities of foreign lands felt themselves impelled to aspire after a certain elevation of life; while the loftier moral teaching they maintained in their synagogues attracted considerable numbers of proselytes from paganism. Thus the conception of the Divine unity and righteousness was being spread over a large section of the heathen world. So far, therefore, both at home and abroad the Jewish people had fulfilled their mission in the moral and religious preparation of the world for the entrance of Christianity.

2. The dissemination of the Greek language, culture, and commercial activity.—Ever since the conquests of Alexander the Great, the Greek tongue had attained supremacy among the civilized nations, and had become the current medium for the exchange of thought. Even the OT had to be rendered into Greek, in the translation known as the Septuagint. Moreover, Greek learning, literature, and speculation exercised a pervasive influence far and near. A significant indication of this is to be found in the rise among the Jews of the Dispersion of a school of thinkers who had imbibed the Greek culture, and who, quickened by the intellectual alertness of the Greek mind, were drawn to take part in the literary productivity of the age. The aim of this Greco-Jewish school was to make the purer religious faith and knowledge of Israel accessible to the world. With its chief seat at Alexandria, its leading representatives, such as Aristobolus and Philo, endeavoured to show that the Mosaic law, correctly understood, contained all that the best Greek philosophers had taught. Thus was brought about a mutual action and reaction of Jewish and Greek ideas, and a soil was being made ready for a more elevated spiritual teaching, based on the unity of the Godhead and the eternal obligation of righteousness.

At the same time the commercial enterprise of the Greeks was rapidly overcoming national exclusiveness, and producing a freer intercourse between men of different races. They were the cosmopolitans of the period—inquisitive, open-minded, eager to enter into all vivid interests; and in the great trading cities in Asia Minor and along the Mediterranean shore they fostered the spirit of toleration and helped to secure full scope for the advocacy of all forms of belief.

But while thus stimulating intellectual receptiveness everywhere, the most important contribution of the Greeks in the preparation for Christianity was the universal prevalence they gained for their rich and expressive language, inasmuch as by this they supplied a common vehicle of intercourse, calculated to be of immense advantage in the announcement and promulgation of the Christian Evangel.

3. The unifying influence of Rome.—That the entire known world was then embraced within Rome's imperial sway was a momentous factor in the situation which had been reached. As the barriers of language had been demolished through the influence of the Greeks, so through the influence of the Romans the barriers of nationality had been broken down. The whole world was but one country; and from the Euphrates to the Atlantic there was settled government, order, and the rule of law under one sovereign sceptre. In the lull of national strifes which had thus come—the pax Romana—merchant and traveller moved safely from land to land, and by the splendid system of roads for which the Roman Empire was famed, the lines of communication were opened in all directions. In this way Rome had performed its distinctive part by bringing about a political condition of the world hitherto unexampled in history.

Thus the three great races of antiquity had contributed their share towards the fulfilment of a manifestly providential design, and the period had now arrived when their several lines of historical development converged to a meeting point, producing a combination of circumstances which rendered issues of vast moment possible. As it has been aptly put, 'the City of God is built at the confluence of three civilizations' (Conybeare and Howson's St. Paul, i. 2).

It is worthy of note also that the little country of Palestine, where the Founder of Christianity was to appear, lay at the very centre of the then known world; and in view of the fact that through the provision of a common language and free means of movement and intercourse the avenues of access were opened to every land, it becomes clear that the most signal facilities were afforded for the dissemination of a faith that was destined to wield a world-wide power.

In addition to this, account has to be taken of the decay of the old pagan religions, and the simultaneous influx of Oriental ideas. There was a strange intermingling of races and also of religious beliefs, with the result that men's minds were unsettled, and a spirit of inquiry was awakened among those who had grown dissatisfied with the popular heathen cults.

Manifestly the age was ripe for a new revelation that would meet the deepest needs of the human soul; and in the situation created by the course of Jewish, Greek, and Roman history, the way for it had at length been prepared. Then Jesus Christ appeared. The 'fulness of the time' had come for the advent of the promised Saviour with His Gospel of life and grace for the regeneration of mankind.

GABBATHA (Γαββαθα) occurs only in Jn 19<sup>31</sup>, as the 'Hebrew' or, more correctly, Aramaic equivalent of Ἀββαρπορος. For the etymology of the word see E. Nestle in Hastings' DB ii. 74 f., with the literature there cited. The word is apparently connected with a root גב, of which the fundamental idea is that of something curved or convex. Hence it cannot be taken as identical in meaning with Ἀββαρπορος, which implies a level tessellated surface. A surface of that kind on the summit of a hill, or with a rounded porch or an open cupola over it, beneath which might permanently stand, or be placed occasionally, the βῆμα or 'judgment-seat,' would best meet the conditions of the case. Such a spot might well be known amongst one class of the people (the Romans and their associates) as the Pavement, and amongst another as Gabbatha. The latter name has not yet been found elsewhere than in the NT. For the attempts to identify the locality, and for the usages involved in the reference, see PAVEMENT.

R. W. MOSS.

GABRIEL is mentioned in Lk 1 as appearing to Zacharias to announce the future pregnancy of Elisabeth and the birth of John, and to Mary with a similar announcement of the birth of Jesus. To Zacharias he declares that he is wont to stand in the presence of God, and that he is sent by Him on the mission stated. When he is asked for a sign, he is competent to impose the severe sign of dumbness until the fulfilment of the prediction that has been made. The Gospel mention of Gabriel, then, is as a messenger of the signal favour of God, at least in connexion with the Messiah and His forerunner.

He has a somewhat similar function in the only OT passage in which he is mentioned, Dn 8-10. Daniel was perplexed at the strange vision which he had seen. Pondering over it, he sees one 'standing before him like the appearance of a man,' and a voice is heard bidding Gabriel, for it is he, explain the vision. Daniel falls in a faint as the messenger approaches, and Gabriel lifts him up and explains the mysterious vision. Again he appears to the prophet under similar circumstances, and is now called 'the man' Gabriel. Still again Daniel has a similar experience (10<sup>9-12</sup>). The details are identical or in harmony with the account in previous chapters, but the name of the messenger is not given. It is, however, generally assumed that the author had Gabriel in mind. He asserts that he is a prince who presides over the interests of Israel, as other supernatural beings preside over other nations.

Gabriel belongs to the creations of the imagination of the Jews in post-exilic times. When God had to them become universal and correspondingly great and glorious, but without parallel spiritualization of His attributes, He was thought to require agents whom He might send as messengers, 'angels' to transmit His messages. These angels were at first nameless, later they received names. Gabriel was one of the most important of them—one of four, of seven, of seventy, according to different enumerations in Jewish writings. See Jewish Encyc. s.v. O. H. GATES.

GADARA, GADARENES.—In the AV in Mk 8<sup>1</sup> and Lk 8<sup>26</sup> Jesus is said to have come into the 'country of the Gadarenes.' In the RV this is corrected to 'Gerasenes.' On the other hand, the AV in Mt 8<sup>28</sup> has 'country of the Gergesenes,' while the RV has 'Gadarenes.' These are the only passages—all referring to the cure of the demoniac and the destruction of the herd of swine—where Gadara is mentioned in Scripture. How the reading Γαδάρων crept in, or, if original, what exactly it meant, we may not be able to explain satisfactorily, but one thing is certain,—the miracle cannot have taken place at the city of Gadara, the modern Umm Keis. For that town stands on a high plateau on the further side of the wide and extremely steep gorge of the Hieromax river, and is about a 3 hours' ride distant from the Lake. As Thomson says (LB ii. p. 354), 'If the miracle was performed at Gadara, then the swine must have run down the mountain for an hour, forded the deep Jarmuk (Hieromax), ascended its northern bank, and raced across the level plain several miles before they could reach the nearest margin of the lake—a feat which no herd of swine would be likely to achieve even though they were "possessed."' In short, no one who has seen the position of Gadara would ever dream of locating the miracle there. See GERASENES.

GAIN.—The word 'gain' occurs ten times in the AV of the Gospels, and on every occasion in one of the sayings of our Lord. These passages fall into three groups: (1) The parallel records of a saying repeated by all the Synoptists (Mt 16<sup>26</sup>, Lk 9<sup>25</sup>, Mk 8<sup>36</sup>); (2) the parables of the Talents and the Pounds (Mt 25<sup>17, 20, 23</sup>, Lk 19<sup>12, 15, 18</sup>); (3) the single record of the saying in Mt 18<sup>14</sup>. It is with the exception of St. Luke's use of διαπραγματεύομαι, προσπεργάζομαι, and πρόσω in the parable of the Pounds always a translation of profitare. This verb and its cognate substantive έρδος are used elsewhere in the NT by St. Paul (1 Co 9<sup>18, 20, 21, 22</sup>, Ph 1<sup>21</sup>, 3<sup>7-8</sup>, Tit 1<sup>11</sup>), St. Peter (1 P 3<sup>1</sup>), and St. Luke (Ac 27<sup>21</sup>, a peculiar use, but not without classical parallels).

1. Mt 16<sup>26</sup> (1; of Ph 3<sup>7</sup> and 12<sup>2</sup>) contrasts gain and loss as they touch the direct personal relation of the soul to God. A man may count the world a thing to be gained, and give his soul as the price of it; or, with the wiser Apostle, may reckon communion with Christ a gain worth the sacrifice of everything else; or, rising to the vision of the great beatitude, may look for the supreme gain, something better even than living here in Christ, to the life beyond the grave. This is the mystic's conception of religion—'I and God are alone in the world.' All gain apart from union with the Divine is really loss; and loss, or what seems loss, incurred in achieving that union is gain. 'Qui invenit Jesum,' says Thomas à Kempis, 'invenit thesaurum bonum; immo bonum, super omnia bonum.' The thought finds its simplest and at the same time its fullest expression in the parables of the Hidden Treasure and the Pearl of Great Price, whose finder sells 'with joy' all that he has, to buy what he has discovered.

2. The parables of the Talents and the Pounds express the gain to character which comes of faithful use of powers and abilities. The thought is of the realization of the possibilities that are in man and the subsequent fitness for higher work. Here the gain depends less on sacrifice than on diligence and faithfulness. This is a common conception of the meaning of the Christian religion. In it life is not a period of aspiration for an unutterable beatitude, but a time of training, in expectation of the gain of the Master's praise and ultimate ability to do more and greater work for Him.

3. Mt 18<sup>14</sup>, with which must be connected 1 Co 9<sup>24</sup>, speaks of the gain of winning other souls for Christ. Here there is the need of sacrifice, the sacrifice of pride, of social and racial prejudice; and there is also the need of faithfulness and diligence. This is the missionary's conception of Christianity. We find it in St. Paul and in all those after him who have felt the necessity laid on them, 'Woe is me if I preach not the gospel.' The joy of this gain is anticipated in Dn 12<sup>2</sup> (cf. Jt 5<sup>14, 20</sup>). Its greatness is most fully known when we realize that we share it with God Himself and His angels (Lk 15<sup>7, 10, 22</sup>).

In all three classes of passages the language is that of the market-place where men get gain by bargaining or labouring; but it is immensely sublimated and purified of all selfishness and greed.

GALILEEAN (Γαλιλαῖος).—Twice Jesus is mentioned as a Galileean: once by a maid-servant (Mt 26<sup>72</sup>); once when Pilate was anxious to transfer the trial of Jesus from his own to Herod's court (Lk 23<sup>7</sup>). It was during the trial of Jesus also that Peter was recognized as a Galileean by the bystanders (Mt 26<sup>73</sup>, Mk 14<sup>70</sup>, Lk 22<sup>69</sup>; see GALLILEE, § 7). In Jn 4<sup>46</sup> we read that Galileans, who had been at Jerusalem and had seen the works of Jesus there, received Him on that account in their own land. In Lk 13<sup>1</sup> we are told of Pilate's (evidently recent) punishment of some Galileans, whom he had slain even while they were sacrificing. This event cannot be identified with any revolt mentioned in history. Some suppose Barabbas to have been arrested in connexion therewith; some would associate it with the revolt of Judas of Galilee (Jos. BJ II. viii. 1), but this took place, according to Ac 5<sup>37</sup>, more than twenty years before. Probably it refers to some small outbreak, severely punished by Pilate as usual (cf. Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, 37).

For characteristics of Galileans see GALLILEE, § 7; People. G. W. THATCHER.

GALLILEE.—1. Name.—The English form of the name 'Galilee' is derived from the Hebrew גליל (Gālīl), Aram. גלילא (Gālīla or Gālīla), through Gr. Γαλιλαία and Lat. Galilæa. The Heb. word denotes simply a 'circuit' or 'district', and in Is 9<sup>1</sup> Galilee is called 'Galilee (RVm 'the district') of the nations,' and in 1 Mac 5<sup>15</sup> Γαλιλαία ἀλλοφθώνων ('Galilee of the strangers'). In other passages of the OT it is simply called 'the district.'

2. History.—When the Hebrew invasion of Palestine took place, the main part of Galilee was allotted to Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali. According to Jg 1<sup>30-33</sup>, Zebulun was not altogether successful in driving out the inhabitants of their portion, while Asher and Naphtali had to be content to settle as best they could among the inhabitants, 'for they did not drive them out.' These inhabitants seem to have been Amorites and Hivites from the Lebanon. An account of one (or two) of the battles fought in this country is found in Jg 4-5. In the days of the Monarchy, Galilee always suffered in the Syrian wars. It was ravaged by Ben-hadad (1 K 15<sup>20</sup>), probably won back by Ahab, taken again by the Arameans under Hazael (2 K 12<sup>18</sup>, 13<sup>2</sup>), and recovered by Jeroboam II. It was also on the high-road of the Assyrian invasion, and was won for Assyria by Tiglath-pileser III. in 734 (2 K 15<sup>29</sup>), many of its inhabitants being carried into captivity. From this time up to the end of the 2nd cent. B.C. the population was heathen, with a small number of Jewish settlers, who attached themselves to Jerusalem after the return from the Exile. About the year 164, Simon the brother of Judas Maccabæus pursued the Syrians to Ptolemais, and on his way back brought the Galileean Jews and their property to Judæa (1 Mac 5<sup>21-23</sup>). Some 60 years later the whole state of affairs in Galilee was changed. According to Strabo, on the authority of Timagenes (Jos. Ant. XIII. xi. 3), Aristobulus (B.C. 104-103) conquered much of Galilee, and compelled the inhabitants to be circumcised and live according to Jewish laws. This work had probably been already begun by John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135-107). Herod at his death bequeathed Galilee to Herod Antipas, who succeeded after much opposition in having his legacy confirmed at Rome.

3. Extent.—The amount of territory covered by the name 'Galilee' varied in different times. Originally it comprised the hilly and mountainous country to the north of the Plain of Esdraelon or the smaller plain of el-Battayf. The boundaries were probably not well defined, but on the north it included Kedesh (Jos 20<sup>21</sup> 21<sup>22</sup>). It was later spoken of in two divisions—Upper and Lower Galilee (cf. Jth 1<sup>8</sup>, 1 Mac 12<sup>20</sup>), and in the Mishna is divided into three parts, these corresponding to the natural divisions of plain, hill-country, and mountain.

The boundaries of Galilee at the time of Christ are thus given by Josephus:

'Now Phoenicia and Syria surround the two Galilees, which are called Upper and Lower Galilee. They are bounded on the W. by the borders of the territory belonging to Ptolemais, and by Carmel, which mountain of old belonged to the Galileans, but now to the Tyrians; and next it is Gaba (*Jôdô**), which is called "the city of horsemen," because those horsemen that were dismissed by Herod the king dwell therein; they are bounded on the S. by Samaria and Scythopolis, as far as the streams of the Jordan; on the E. by Hippene (the district of Hippo, Sûsêpê) and Gadara (the district of Gadara, Umm Gêdâ), and also by Golanitis (Golan) and the borders of the kingdom of Agrippa; and their N. parts are bounded by Tyre, and the country of the Tyrians. As for what is called Lower Galilee, it extends in length from Tiberias to Chablon (Kâbân), and Ptolemais is its neighbour on the coast; and its breadth is from the village called Kalth (Jêdâ), which lies in the great plain, to Bernais, from which beginning the breadth of Upper Galilee is also taken to the village Baca, which divides the land of the Tyrians from Galilee; its length is also from Meloth (Môrô) to Thûla (probably Thû Thûla), a village near the Jordan' (Jth iii. iii. 1).

4. Geography.—The southernmost division of Galilee was Esdraelon (G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 379). It consists of (1) the triangular plain about 200 feet above sea-level, 29 miles long from the foot of Carmel to Jenin, 15 from Jenin to Tabor, and 16 from Tabor to the foot of Carmel; (2) the valley of Jezreel (Nahr Jalûd), running down for 12 miles from Jezreel to Bethshean, some 400 feet below sea-level. The Plain of Esdraelon is watered by the Kishon flowing to the Mediterranean; but, as the edges are somewhat higher than the centre, it is often marshy. It played a great part in the history of Palestine (cf. HGHL p. 391 ff.), but has no mention in the story of the Gospels.

On the other hand, the middle division of Galilee, known as Lower Galilee, contains nearly all the important sites of the Gospel record. Nazareth, Capernaum, Shunem, Nain, Cana, etc., are within its borders. It is bounded on the W. by the Plain of Ptolemais, on the S. by the Plains of Esdraelon and Jezreel, on the E. by the Sea of Galilee (though sometimes a part of the country east of the sea was considered Galilean), and on the N. by a line passing from the N. end of the Sea of Galilee through Ramah to the coast. It consists of four chains of hills running east and west, intercepted by valleys and plains. The hills reach a height of about 1200 feet. The southern chain consists of the Nazareth hills, with Mt. Tabor; the next range contains the Karn Hattin of Crusading fame; the third, the city of Jotapâta; while the fourth consists of the southern slopes of the mountains of Upper Galilee. The central plain of el-Battayf is about 500 feet above sea-level, while the coast of the Sea of Galilee is nearly 700 feet below sea-level. The whole country is well watered by streams flowing east or west, and was extremely fertile. The grass of the plains was green, and evergreen oaks grew on the hills. The cornfields gave a plentiful harvest, and pomegranates abounded.

Upper Galilee ranged from the N. boundary of Lower Galilee to the Tyrian boundary, which seems to have been at the time of Christ just south of Kedesh, which according to Josephus was a Tyrian fortress on the borders of Galilee (Ant. XIII. v. 6; B.J. II. xviii. 1, IV. ii. 3). It is a land of mountains, where the hills run from 2000 to 4000 feet in height. It too was a fertile land, with thick woods, sycamores, olives, vines, and green pastures by its waters.

5. Roads.—Judaea was on the road to nowhere; Galilee is covered with roads to everywhere' (G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 425). Roads in the East even now are often mere tracks, scarcely recognizable by the Western. They are repaired for great occasions, and soon allowed to fall again into their natural condition. Remains of pavements, however, show that at the time of Christ the Roman genius for road-making had been at work in the district of Galilee. Especially was this the case on the great high-road, the 'Way of the Sea,' as it was called in the Middle Ages (from an interpretation of Is 9<sup>1</sup>), which crossed the middle of Lower Galilee. The eastern termini of the main roads were the two bridges which crossed the Jordan. These were (1) the bridge about half-way between Meron and the Sea of Galilee, now called the 'Bridge of Jacob's Daughters.' To this came the road from Damascus and the intervening country. Westward from the river the road ran by Safed and Ramah to Ptolemais. From this a branch struck off a few miles west of the river, passed by Arbela (Irbit), and rejoined the high-road near Ramah. Another branch went southwards to the west coast of the Sea of Galilee at Khân Mînyeh, and proceeded to Bethshean, where it joined the road from (2) the bridge a few miles south of the Sea of Galilee, now called the Jisr el-Mawâmia. Over this bridge came the traffic from Arabia and Gilead. From it one road passed through Bethshean, the Valley of Jezreel, and the Plain of Esdraelon, to the coast of the Mediterranean, and so on to Egypt; another by Cana and Sepphoris to Ptolemais. The main road from the shore of the Sea of Galilee to the highlands went by the Wady el-Hammâm past Arbela, then between Tabor and the Nazareth hills to Esdraelon. Along these and many other roads flowed a ceaseless stream of traffic, and the fulness of their life is reflected in the parables of Christ (cf. Encyc. Bibl. iv. 5191; HGHL p. 430 f.).

6. Government.—Galilee was a part of the Roman Empire; that is, in the days of Christ it was under the emperors Augustus and Tiberius. Roman garrisons were in towns all round the country. Roman influence was felt everywhere. But the mass of the people had little or nothing to do with the Roman Empire directly. The direct government of the land was in the hands of Herod Antipas, to whom, with the title of 'tetrarch,' it was assigned by Augustus after the death of Herod. Antipas was 17 years old at his accession to power, and established his capital at Sepphoris. About the year 22, however, he built a new city on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, named it Tiberias in honour of the emperor, and made it his capital. This city was governed after the Greek model by a council of 600, with an Archon and other officers. In these two cities was centred the chief legal administration of affairs in Galilee during the life of Christ. But in Galilee, as elsewhere, the chief details of life were regulated by the Jews' own religious laws rather than by ordinary civil enactments. The chief authority was the Sanhedrin (see SANHEDRIN) at Jerusalem, to which appeals and a variety of drugs—frankincense, landanum, myrrh, resin, saffron, mastich.* Thus 'wine mixed with gall' and 'myrrhed wine' are equivalent phrases, signifying generally medicated wine (cf. Swete, St. Mark, ad loc.). Mt 27<sup>34</sup> and Ac 8<sup>24</sup> are the only places in the NT where γολύ occurs.

7. People.—Galilee was a populous country. The cities lie very thick, and the very many villages are everywhere so populous from the richness of the soil, that the very least of them contains more than fifteen thousand inhabitants' (Jos. BJ III. iii. 2). In another place Josephus says there were 240 cities and villages in Galilee (Life, 45), and that many of these had strong walls. From each of these to the others must have been a network of tracks and roads in addition to the main roads (see above), and the land was a scene of constant activity. The bracing air of the hills and the activity of everyday life formed a people of energy and vigour. The Galileans are inured to war from their infancy, and have been always very numerous; nor has their country ever been destitute of men of courage' (Jos. BJ III. iii. 2). Regarded with a certain amount of patronizing contempt by the pure-blooded and more strictly theologically-minded Jews of Jerusalem and its neighbourhood, they still had the religious zeal of country-folk. This zeal was quickened by their pilgrimages to Jerusalem, which made a greater impression on their active minds than on those who were more familiar with the life of the Holy City. At any apparent insult to their religion they were ready to break out in revolt. Before, during, and after the life of Jesus, Galilean leaders arose and flew to arms in the vain attempt to secure religious autonomy. Yet they differed in many respects from their Judæan brothers. The very technical terms of the market and the details of their religious customs varied from those of the South (cf. Schürer, HJP II. i. 4). Their pronunciation of the Aramaic language had peculiarities of its own (Mt 26<sup>7</sup>), one of these being the confusion of the guttural sounds. Besides, however, the natural bodily vigour and mental freshness of these highlanders, the most important difference between them and the people of Judæa lay in the different attitude in daily life towards the larger world of the Roman Empire and Hellenistic influence. Knowledge of, at any rate spoken, Greek was to them a necessity of business, and no attempt could be made, as in Jerusalem, to avoid the study of it (cf. Monilton, Prolegomena to Gram. of NT Greek, 1906, p. 8). Many must have been, like Matthew, in Government employ. All were brought into daily contact with Greek and Roman modes of life and thought. It was to this people of larger experience of life and broader ways of thinking that Jesus appealed in the greater part of His earthly ministry, and from it that He chose the men who were first to make His message known to the world. GALL (γολύ, fel).—

It thus appears that γολύ was used of any bitter drug, and there is therefore no discrepancy between Mt 27<sup>34</sup> οίνον [ξύου] and Mk 15<sup>36</sup> δειψομαστόν οίνον. The potion administered to the crucifixion (see CRUCIFIXION) was composed of wine and a variety of drugs—frankincense, landanum, myrrh, resin, saffron, mastich.* Thus 'wine mixed with gall' and 'myrrhed wine' are equivalent phrases, signifying generally medicated wine (cf. Swete, St. Mark, ad loc.). Mt 27<sup>34</sup> and Ac 8<sup>24</sup> are the only places in the NT where γολύ occurs.

GAMES.—In the Gospels there are none of the analogies from athletic contests which are frequently drawn in the Acts and the Epistles. This variety in the range of illustration is traced without difficulty to the different interests of the readers or hearers. The Hebrews, unlike the Greeks and Romans, gave little attention to games. The climate of their land may help to account for this, but the chief reason must be found in their view of life, which made it impossible for them to look upon games with the eye of the Greek. Where the Greek had his Isthmian games, the Hebrew had his Passover, or other solemn festival. The introduction of a gymnasium by Jason (2 Mac 4<sup>1-12</sup>) was accounted an act of disloyalty to the faith of his fathers, and a surrender to Hellenic influences. He was accused of neglecting the altar for the palaestra. Herod is said by Josephus (JW, XV. viii. 1) to have instituted solemn games in honour of Caesar; but such practices never won the approval of the Rabbis, or of the nation as a whole. Jesus preached to a people who knew little of the games of the Greeks, and who had been taught to hate what they knew. But in Galilee the children played their immemorial games:

'A wedding or a festival,
A mourning or a funeral,
As if his whole 'ocation
Were endless imitation.'
(Wordsworth, Ode on Immortality).

From such play Jesus drew a description of the generation which had listened to John the Baptist and Himself (Mt 11<sup>17</sup>, Lk 7<sup>32</sup>). Two groups are playing in the market-place; the musicians are divided from the others. They pipe, but the children will not play; they suggest 'funerals,' but their comrades sulkily refuse to join. The parable is a vivid picture of the fickleness, sulkiness, and self-will of the contemporaries of Jesus. It is not necessary to read into the parable a condemnation of those who should have outgrown childish things but are still playing at life. The 'musicians' have been likened by some to Jesus and John the Baptist, by others to the people (see a discussion by Stalker in Expositor, 4th series, vol. vii. p. 29).

The soldiers probably played with dice when they cast lots for the garments of Jesus (Mt 27<sup>35</sup>); and they may have been playing a game when they said to Jesus, 'Prophecy unto us, thou Christ; who is he that struck thee?' (28<sup>19</sup>).

Jesus did not deal with the problems which arise in modern society from the growing importance of games in the scheme of life. As far as we know, He did not discuss the Rabbinical attitude to the Hellenic games; nor do the Apostolic writers hint of dangers to Christian converts from the contests. The ethical questions must be decided by an appeal to the interpretation of life in the Gospels, and especially to the estimate given by Jesus of the true relations between body and spirit. It is clear that to Him the body was not an end in itself (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>), but must become the docile servant of the soul (18<sup>8</sup>), even at the cost of severe discipline. Games will be approved where they give bodily effectiveness, that it may be the 'earthly support' of the endurance of the spirit. They will be condemned if they lead to a neglect of the serious interests of life (6<sup>22</sup>), or of the duty owed to others. The Christian ideal of a life temperate and just does not include a life whose first interest is amusement, or one in which 'distraction' is necessary to prevent ennui (see Dörner, Christian Ethics, Eng. tr. p. 458).

GARDEN (κῆπος).—In its most precise application the term refers to a level piece of ground enclosed by a wall or hedge, in which plants, shrubs, and trees are cultivated by irrigation. Its area, ranging from a small vegetable plot beside the house to the dimensions of a farm, is limited only by the supply of water. While not excluding the idea of garden familiar in the West, its meaning in general is often nearer to that of our nursery-garden and orchard. In the irrigated garden, vines, fig, walnut, pomegranate, lemon, and other trees are grown for the sake of ornament, shade, and fruit. In the Gospels mention is made of mint, anise, and cummin (Mt 23<sup>22</sup>) as the cheap and common garden produce that occupied the laboured scrupulosity of the scribes and Pharisees, to the neglect of more important matters.

The fact of its being artificially and continually watered, distinguishes the garden proper from the ordinary grain field, the vineyard, and the plantation of olive or fig trees. The necessity, however, of having a protecting wall for fruit trees gives also to such an enclosure in a more general sense the name and character of a garden. These may be resorted to and passed through without objection except during summer and autumn, when the fruit is ripening. Such may have been the garden of Gethsemane, to which Christ retired with His disciples (Jn 18<sup>1-2</sup>). In the garden containing the tomb in which Christ's body was laid, Mary's expectation of meeting with the gardener or caretaker (Jn 20<sup>15</sup>) at the time of Easter would rather point to the more careful cultivation of the irrigated garden.

To the Oriental the garden is a place of retirement and rest. Its sound of falling or running water is one of the luxuries of life. Its shade affords escape from the glare of the sun, and its recognized privacy forbids the introduction at the close of the day of disturbing news, exacting claims, or perplexing decisions. The voice of nature seems to say, 'I will give you rest.' It has thus become a symbol of Heaven, and supplies a common term of immortal hope to the three great monotheistic religions, inasmuch as the Christian 'Paradise' is the equivalent of the Jewish Gan-Eden, 'Garden of Eden,' and the Moslem al-Gannat, 'the Garden.'

GARNER.—See BARN.

GATE.—The gate of a city, like the entrance to a tent and the door of a house, was a place of special importance, and its original use gave rise to various associated meanings.

of defensive strength seems to pass into that of aggressive force (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>).

2. Judicial and commercial.—The settlement of matters affecting contested right, transfer of property and internal administration, were attended to at the open space or covered recess behind the gate (Gn 23<sup>16</sup>, Dt 25<sup>7</sup>, Am 5<sup>12</sup>). The litigant was urged to come to terms with the adversary 'in the way' before the gate was reached, for there the judge sat, and behind him were the officer, the prison, and the official exactors (Mt 5<sup>25-26</sup>). In times of industrial peace, the protective challenge became a fiscal inspection, and there the tax-collector sat at the receipt of custom (Mt 9<sup>9</sup>).

3. Figurative and religious.—While the gates or doors of public buildings within the city might be lavishly ornamented (Is 54<sup>12</sup>, Rev 21<sup>3</sup>; Jos. BJ v. 3, VI. v. 3), the gate of brass was the standard of external protection. The larger and more important the city, the more imposing would be its public gate. The Oriental name for the Ottoman Empire is the High Gate, or Sublime Porte. Christ's allusion to the broad gate that led only to darkness and destruction, and the gate that, though narrow, conducted into a broad place capable of accommodating visitors from all lands (Mt 7<sup>13-14</sup>, Lk 13<sup>24-25</sup>), was in keeping with His other statements as to the startling difference between His Kingdom and the Empire conception of the world.

City gates, as well as those at the entrance to gardens and to the open courts around houses, frequently have a small inserted door from two to three feet square by which an individual may be admitted. It has sometimes been thought that this was referred to when Christ spoke of a camel passing through the eye of a needle (Mt 19<sup>24</sup>); but there is nothing either in the sense of the original words or in Eastern custom to support such a supposition. See CAMEL.

Gates had distinguishing names, indicating the localities to which they belonged or into which they led (Gn 28<sup>17</sup>, Neh 3, Ps 94, Is 33<sup>4</sup>, Mt 16<sup>18</sup>), or describing some characteristic of the door itself (Ac 3<sup>2</sup>). In the prophetic picture of Zion restored and comforted, the gates were to be called 'Praise,' and those which John saw in the New Jerusalem bore on their fronts the names of the 'twelve tribes of the children of Israel' (Rev 21<sup>12</sup>).

For meanings connected more especially with the entrance to tents and houses see DOOR.

G. M. MACKIE.

GEHENNA.—The Heb. name Hinnom is generally preceded in the OT by the word Gē, 'valley' (Jos 15<sup>8</sup>), thus Gē-hinnom, or 'Valley of Hinnom,' whence the NT word γέεννα, which is translated in both the AV and RV 'hell' (Mt 5<sup>22</sup>, 29, 30, 10<sup>28</sup>, 15<sup>23</sup>, 23<sup>33</sup>, Mk 9<sup>43</sup>, 47, Lk 12<sup>3</sup>, Jc 3<sup>6</sup>), from which also we obtain the English word Gehenna. Historically, this valley is the traditional site of the worship paid to Molech, first by Ahaz (2 Ch 28<sup>2</sup>), and later by Manasseh (33<sup>5</sup>), who made their children pass through the fire; but which was later defiled by Josiah (2 K 23<sup>10</sup>), and thereafter seems to have been made the receptacle of the city's offal; and in later Jewish thought became a symbol of the supposed place of future punishments (cf. Enoch xxvii. 1). The NT use of γέεννα is exclusively in this figurative sense. Milton also employs it thus in his familiar lines:

'The pleasant vale of Hinnom, Tophet thence,
And black Gehenna called, the type of hell' (Par. Lost, i. 404).

Opinions differ as to the identification of the valley; but most authorities, including Robinson, Stanley, Buhl, and many others, as well as modern Arab tradition, identify it with the valley on the W. and S. side of the Holy City, the upper portion of which is called in Arabic Wādī er-Rabāḥ; the lower, Wādī Gehennam, or 'Valley of Hell.' It is a 'deep and yawning gorge' (Wilson), and 'never contains water' (Socin), its descent from its original source to Bir Eyyub being approximately 670 ft.

At the lower extremity are found numerous rock-tombs, for here seems to have been the potter's field for the burial of pilgrims, which was purchased with the '30 pieces of silver,' and known as Akeldama, or field of blood (Mt 27<sup>2-5</sup>, Ac 1<sup>19, 19</sup>). On the other hand, the Arab writer Edrisi in the 12th cent. A.D., followed by Sir C. Warren in an extended and somewhat convincing article on 'Hinnom (Valley of)' in Hastings' DB, identifies it with the Kidron on the E. of Jerusalem, including also its continuation below the junction of the Eastern and Western valleys at Bir Eyyub; the whole of the valley in its descent toward the Dead Sea being known to the Arabs as Wady en-Ndr, 'Valley of Firs.' Still another identification is that advocated by Sayce, R. Smith, Birch, and others, who locate it between the Temple area and the City of David, identifying it with the valley known since Josephus' day as the Tyropoon; but the first identification is, on the whole, the most probable.

GENEALOGIES OF JESUS CHRIST.—1. There is no evidence that any special stress was laid upon the Davidic descent of Jesus, either by Himself or in the preaching of the Apostles. It was assumed that He was 'Son of David,' and the title was given to Him as the Messiah; nor does it appear that His claim was ever seriously contested on the ground that His Davidic descent was doubtful. St. Paul in Ro 1<sup>3</sup> speaks of Christ as 'born of the seed of David according to the flesh,' and in 2 Ti 2<sup>8</sup> he names this descent, along with the Resurrection, as one of the salient points of the gospel he preached: 'Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, of the seed of David, according to my gospel.' Similarly in his speech at the Flavian Antioch, as recorded in Ac 13<sup>25</sup>, he says: 'Of this man's (i.e. David's) seed hath God according to promise brought unto Israel a Saviour, Jesus.' St. Peter in his speech on the Day of Pentecost (Ac 2<sup>29</sup>) mentions God's promise to David, 'that of the fruit of his loins he would set one upon his throne,' and points to its fulfilment in Christ; but in addressing Cornelius (10<sup>23</sup>) he speaks of Christ as 'Jesus of Nazareth'; and this would seem to imply that the birth at Bethlehem, which brought into prominence the claim to Davidic descent, did not form part of his ordinary missionary preaching. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (7<sup>14</sup>) says: 'It is evident that our Lord hath sprung out of Judah.' In the Second Gospel blind Bartimeus (Mk 10<sup>47</sup>, cf. parallels) uses the title 'Son of David' in addressing Christ, and the crowds at the Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem (11<sup>9</sup>, cf. Mt 21<sup>9</sup>) 'Hosanna to the Son of David' speak of the 'kingdom that cometh' as the 'kingdom of our father David'; but in a difficult passage (12<sup>32-37</sup>, cf. parallels) Jesus appears to raise difficulties as to the appropriateness of the current application of the title to the Messiah (see Holtzmann, Edcom. ad loc.). In the Apocalypse the Davidic descent is apparently assumed (Rev 22<sup>3</sup>) as well as the birth from the tribe of Judah (5<sup>5</sup>); but the use of the phrase 'the root of David' in both passages shows that the essential and spiritual priority to David was more prominent in the writer's mind than the physical descent from him. The evidence to be derived from the Fourth Gospel is of a doubtful character; in Jn 7<sup>2</sup> we find traces of the phrase of Jewish thought according to which the Messiah would appear suddenly and his origin would be secret: the answer of Jesus implies that the people did indeed know His human, but not His spiritual, origin. It is clear from 7<sup>41, 52</sup> that He was regarded by both the crowd and the rulers at Jerusalem as being of Galilean, and therefore presumably not Davidic, parentage; it is by no means certain, and to many it may seem in no way probable, that the writer, in the interest of a 'tragic irony' (see Westcott, Speaker's Commentary on 7<sup>41</sup>), refrained from noting the fact of the birth at Bethlehem, and the Davidic lineage of Joseph or Mary. Jesus' words in 7<sup>52</sup> show clearly that He did not choose to support His claim by an appeal to fleshly parentage; while the words of Philip (1<sup>6</sup>) 'We have found him, of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph'), and of the crowd at Capernaum (6<sup>42</sup>) 'Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know?', left, as they are, without comment by the Evangelist, suggest that he was unacquainted with the story of the birth at Bethlehem, and laid no stress on the Davidic descent.

In all the books thus far mentioned no intimation is given whether the descent of Jesus is traced through Mary or Joseph; this fact must be recognized, however it is explained. In the Catholic Epistles there is no reference, direct or indirect, to the tribe or family of the Lord. The First and Third Gospels, which (at all events in their present form) teach the doctrine of the birth from a virgin, also contain formal pedigrees of Joseph, with the evident intention of proving that Jesus was the heir of David. In this lies the most important problem which the genealogies of Jesus present for solution.

2. The general facts in regard to the divergences of the two pedigrees of Joseph are well known. St. Matthew (1<sup>2-7</sup>) begins with Abraham, and traces the line in fourteen generations to David; then through Solomon in fourteen generations to Jehoniah at the time of the carrying away to Babylon; then in fourteen (or thirteen according to our present text) generations through Shealtiel and Zerubbabel to Matthan, Jacob, Joseph, and Jesus. Thus he brings the Messiah into relation with all who, whether in a literal or a spiritual sense, could call Abraham their Father.

St. Luke (3<sup>23-38</sup>) makes Joseph the son of Heli, and grandson of Matthat (by some identified without any proof with Matthan of Mt 1<sup>2</sup>), and traces his descent through Zerubbabel and Shealtiel to Nathan the son of David; then (with only slight or textually doubtful divergences from Mt.) back to Abraham; but, not stopping there, he carries the pedigree back to 'Adam the son of God,' thus bringing the Son of man into relation with all men whom God has created. A more detailed examination of the main characteristics of the two genealogies will show the fundamental differences of conception and treatment that exist between them, and prepare us for extracting whatever may be of value from the attempts that have been made to harmonize them.

3. St. Matthew's genealogy.—The heading is translated in the RV 'The book of the generation (βιβλος γενέσεως) of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham': in the margin the alternative rendering is given 'the genealogy of Jesus Christ.' If, as seems probable, the latter rendering is right, this heading will refer only to the pedigree which follows; the phrase βιβλος γενέσεως is most likely taken from Gn 5<sup>1</sup> (αὐτῆς ἡ βιβλος γενέσεως ἀνθρώπων: cf. 6<sup>9</sup> αὐτῶν δὲ αἱ γενέσεως Νώε, and 10<sup>1</sup>), where it introduces a list of Adam's descendants, and thus practically forms the title of a genealogical table. Zahn (Einführung in d. NT<sup>2</sup>, ii, pp. 270 f. and 290) argues without much cogency that the phrase could not be applied to a table of ancestors, and takes it as a title of the whole book; he is, however, no doubt right in rejecting the view that it refers to the narrative of the birth, or of the birth and infancy. Taken as the title of the pedigree, it indicates clearly the intention of the writer—to show that in Jesus, as the heir of David and of Abraham, were fulfilled the promises made to them: the pedigree itself is intended to illustrate this, rather than to prove it, and it is not easy to avoid the conclusion that it is quite artificial, as is indeed implied by the more or less arbitrary division into 3 sections containing twice seven names apiece.

Confining our attention for the moment to the direct male line, we note that in the first section the names are taken from 1 Ch 2<sup>1-15</sup>, and that if Salmon was the younger contemporary of Joshua (as is implied by his marriage with Rahab), there are only four generations to cover the 300 or 400 years between that time and David's reign. In the second section the names are from 1 Ch 3<sup>9-12</sup>, but Josiah, Amaziah, and Azariah are omitted before Jotham, and Jehoiakim before Jechoniah (=Jehoiachin). In the third section only Shealtiel and Zerubbabel are mentioned in the OT [the latter in 1 Ch 3<sup>19</sup> is called son of Pedaiah, the brother of Shealtiel, but in Hag 1<sup>1</sup> and numerous other passages, he is called son of Shealtiel, or Shaltiel, but without any intimation that he was of Davidic descent: it is often assumed that Shealtiel adopted his nephew]. We have no hint as to the source from whence the remaining names were drawn. For about 460 years, from David to the Captivity, we have 14 names, and know there should be 18; for about 580 years, from the Captivity to Christ, we have, against all reasonable probability, only 13 (perhaps originally 14) names.

We now turn to the notes inserted at different points in the pedigree. A very small point may perhaps guide us to a true conclusion in regard to these. Holtzmann (op. cit. on Mt 1<sup>9</sup>) points out that the articles before Δαυὶδ τὸν βασιλέα in v.<sup>8</sup>, and before Ἰωσὴφ τὸν ἀδελφῆ Μαριάμ in v.<sup>13</sup>, are incorrect: it seems probable that the compiler of the Gospel had a pedigree before him in which each step was given in the simple form 'Abraham begat Isaac' (Ἀβραὰμ ἐγέννησεν Ἰσραὴλ), and that he added notes to it at certain points; in v.<sup>8</sup> and v.<sup>13</sup> he did not notice that the use of the article became incorrect when the notes were added. This original document may or may not have ended 'Joseph begat Jesus' (Ἰωσὴφ ἐγέννησεν Ἰησοῦν): it is perhaps the easiest solution of the difficulties of this verse to suppose that, if it did so end, the compiler omitted the last step, as in conflict with his belief in the Virgin-birth, and added a note to the previous step to explain the relation in which Jesus stood to Joseph. If in Westcott and Hort's edition of the NT the notes be struck out, it will be seen that a perfectly symmetrical pedigree of Joseph is left.

Mr. F. C. Burkitt, in a very important note on v.<sup>13-15</sup> (Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, Cambridge, 1904, vol. ii, pp. 258-266), argues with great force that the genealogy is an integral part of St. Matthew's Gospel, and that the compiler himself drew it up; but really his arguments apply only to the notes inserted in the genealogy. He discusses fully the reading in v.<sup>13</sup>, and concludes that we cannot look on the reading of the Sinaitic Syriac ('Jacob begat Joseph; Joseph, to whom was betrothed Mary the Virgin, begat Jesus, who is called the Christ') as containing traces of an original text. Zahn (op. cit. ii, p. 292 f.) thinks that the Curetonian Syriac ('Jacob begat Joseph, to whom was betrothed Mary the Virgin, who bore Jesus Christ') represents the Greek from which the Syriac version was made more closely than does the Sinaitic. If, therefore, the compiler followed a pedigree ready to hand, he did so only as far as the step 'Jacob begat Joseph'; and textual criticism will not help us to reconstruct the presumed original document beyond that point. In the usual text stress is laid on Joseph being the husband of Mary, probably to show that, as he recognized his wife's son as in a legal sense his own, Jesus was legally the heir of David. In the reading that probably underlies the Ferrar group of MSS ('Jacob begat Joseph, to whom being betrothed the Virgin Mary begat Jesus that is called Christ'), and also the Old Latin and Syriac versions, this point is missed, and there is little doubt that the Received Text is right.

Added to v.<sup>8</sup> and v.<sup>11</sup> are notes which mark important turning-points in the history of the family: with David it attained to royal standing, which it lost under Jechoniah at the Captivity. In v.<sup>3</sup> the addition of 'and his brethren' to the name Judah marks the beginning of the tribe, in that Judah is chosen from among his brethren as founder of the royal tribe. The addition of Zerach to Perez in v.<sup>8</sup> marks the division of the tribe, and it is interesting to notice that we find an allusion to the house of Perez in Ru 4<sup>12</sup>; perhaps, too, the compiler may have had in mind the strange story of Gn 38<sup>28-30</sup>, around which some Rabbinic lore may have clustered. The addition of 'and his brethren' to the name Jechoniah is more puzzling. Zahn (op. cit. p. 273) thinks it is meant to mark the fact that till then the fortunes of the Davidic house centred in the reigning monarch, who was heir of all the promises, but that from that time onward a number of Davidic families existed, any one of which might be destined to receive the inheritance. Thus it would mark the change from the reigning family of the second section to a family of royal descent in the third section. But it is not clear from the OT that Jechoniah (=Jehoiachin) had any brothers, for the text of 1 Ch 3<sup>18</sup> seems suspicious. According to 2 Ch 36<sup>10</sup> his successor Zedekiah was his brother, according to 2 K 24<sup>17</sup> his father's brother. Possibly there has been some confusion with Jehoiakim, who had three brothers (including a Zedekiah) according to 1 Ch 3<sup>15</sup>; more probably the compiler has added the note, for the purpose indicated by Zahn, without regard for strict genealogical data.

The four notes not yet referred to are of special interest, naming four of the ancestresses of Solomon. The selection of these names was evidently made with a purpose; it seems as if the compiler wished to show that in the pedigree of the greatest of Jewish kings could be found instances of the breach of laws usually considered most binding. Tamar became a mother through incestuous intercourse with her father-in-law; Rahab was a harlot; Ruth was a Moabitess, and according to the Deuteronomic law (Dt 23<sup>3</sup>, cf. Neh 13<sup>1</sup>) no Moabite was ever to enter into the congregation; Bathsheba was an adulteress. Some have thought that these references to acknowledged branches of morality in the pedigree of David's first great son form some kind of answer to the charges of immorality brought by the Jews against the Virgin: the argument would be that, if they did not reject Solomon in spite of acknowledged moral blots in his ancestry, they ought not to reject Jesus because of unfounded scandal. But this explanation is obviously unsatisfactory; there is no real force in such an argument, even supposing it to be worked out and not merely vaguely indicated; and all must feel that the compiler would have shrunk from drawing a parallel between the Mother of Jesus and notoriously sinful women; also the reference to Ruth remains unexplained, as she was guilty of no immorality. Burkitt (op. cit. vol. ii. p. 260) suggests a different explanation, that these four women are thrust upon our notice 'as if to prepare us for still greater irregularity in the last stage.' But again a comparison between the Virgin-birth and incestuous or adulterous intercourse can hardly have been possible for the compiler.

The simplest explanation is probably the right one: the God about whom Jesus taught had shown Himself ready, in the history of the royal family, to accept strangers and sinners. In the case of Ruth this is fully satisfactory; and the conduct of the other three women is represented in Scripture as justified or pardoned. Judah was obliged to say of Tamar, 'She is more righteous than I' (Gn 38<sup>26</sup>); the remembrance of Rahab's former life was blotted out by her subsequent faith (Ja 2<sup>25</sup>, He 11<sup>31</sup>); there is no intimation in Scripture that Bathsheba was morally responsible for the sin into which she was forced by a powerful king, and certainly the birth of Solomon is not represented as in any way displeasing to God, but rather the contrary (see 2 S 12<sup>24</sup>, where Nathan named the child 'Jedidiah' ['Beloved of Jah'] for the Lord's sake'; of the prophecy of 7<sup>14</sup>). Probably the thought uppermost in the mind of the compiler would be God's acceptance of these women, and not their sin.

In regard to Rahab, there is no evidence for her marriage with Salmon, nor is anything known that would be likely to have suggested the idea; it would seem that the compiler was determined to introduce the name, and therefore, without evidence and against all chronological probability, made her the wife of the father of Boaz.

This examination compels us to conclude that the genealogy is essentially and intentionally artificial; the word 'begat' (γεννησεν) is not intended necessarily to imply physical birth, but merely marks the descent; the compiler was more interested in the throne-succession than the actual lineage, and used his material to illustrate and enforce his main proposition that Jesus Christ was the son of David and of Abraham, and he joined to the bare pedigree a sort of running commentary of notes.

Codex Beza in Lk 3 gives a pedigree in the Lukan form, but the names from Joseph to David are taken from Mt.; the names Jehoiakim and Elisikin are inserted between Jechoniah and Josiah as if they referred to two different persons, instead of being two names for the same man; and also Amasiah, Josiah, and Abasiah between Uziah and Joram (see Resch, TU x. 5, pp. 182-201, and Grafle in SK, 1898, 1).

4. St. Luke's genealogy.—The descent of Joseph is traced through Nathan the son of David. It is possible that the family is referred to in Zec 12<sup>13</sup>, where 'the family of the house of Nathan' is distinguished from 'the family of the house of David,' the latter phrase perhaps meaning the royal line. The rejection of the descent through Jechoniah may have been due to the influence of the prophecy of Jeremiah (22<sup>30</sup>): 'Thus saith the Lord, Write ye this man childless, a man that shall not prosper in his days; for no man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David, and ruling any more in Judah'; but there is no apparent reason why the line of Nathan should be selected, unless St. Luke had evidence of the fact before him; and, in the case of a writer who so evidently based his work upon the results of careful research, it is only fair, and therefore scientific, to assume that he had such evidence. The agreement with St. Matthew's genealogy in the names Zerubbabel and Shealtiel has not been satisfactorily explained; it is, of course, open to any one to assume, without the possibility of either proof or refutation, that Jechoniah was actually childless, and adopted Shealtiel, a descendant of Nathan; but even so the further divergence in the descent from Zerubbabel remains as difficult as ever, for the pedigrees disagree with each other, and with the names given in 1 Ch 3<sup>18-24</sup>. The number of derivatives of the name Nathan, and the repetition of the names Melchi, Joseph, and Jesus in the Lukan pedigree, can be taken equally well to prove its genuineness or the ingenuity of its compiler. Apart from small variations of little interest, there is nothing to notice in the names from David to Adam, except the insertion in v. 38 of a second Canaan in agreement with the LXX of Gn 10<sup>26</sup>.

5. Historical value of the two genealogies.—From what has been said above, it appears that St. Matthew (or the compiler of the First Gospel in its present form) did not aim at historical accuracy; but from what we know of St. Luke's methods it may be assumed that he would not have inserted matter in his Gospel unless he had had satisfactory evidence of its genuineness and historical accuracy, and we have seen that the character of the list of names he gives, from David to Joseph, agrees well with this view. Attempts to harmonize the two genealogies have not been successful, and it is only necessary to indicate the general lines they have followed, and to collect such pieces of evidence as may throw light on the possible transmission of the pedigree.

The question was first discussed by Julius Africanus, who flourished early in the 3rd cent. after Christ, in a letter addressed to an unknown correspondent Aristides, of which a considerable portion has been preserved by Euseb., HE i. 7 (cf. Routh, Reliq. Sacrae, vol. ii. p. 228 ff.). In his text of St. Luke the names Matthan and Levi were evidently left out, so that he regarded Melchi as grandfather of Joseph. He supposed that Matthan, a descendant of Solomon, married a woman named, according to tradition, Estha, by whom he had a son Jacob. On Matthan's death, Melchi, a descendant of Nathan, married his widow, who bore him a son Heli. Heli died without children, and Jacob, in accordance with the levirate law, raised up seed to his brother, and begat Joseph. Thus Joseph was physically son of Jacob, legally of Heli. The difficulties of this theory are sufficiently discussed by Dr. B. W. Bacon in Hastings' DB, art. 'Genealogy of Jesus Christ.' The various modifications of this theory that have been proposed (see, e.g., Farrar's St. Luke in the Cambridge Bible for Schools, Excursus II.) in no way increase its probability, and practically no evidence can be adduced in support of it. Eusebius does indeed speak of a narrative (ιστορία) which Africanus had received by tradition (HE i. 7; cf. vi. 31); Africanus, however, does not assert this in the fragments preserved, and himself admits that the conjecture is unsupported by evidence (et cuius hujusmodi certum), but claims that it is worthy of acceptance till a better or truer one is proposed.

Africanus does, however, mention people called 'Desposyni' on account of their kinship with the Saviour, and applies to them the epithet 'the before-mentioned,' so that in those parts of the letter that are now lost he may have specified more exactly how far his conjecture rested on evidence traditionally derived from them. After giving a very improbable story about the destruction of the public genealogical records of the Jews by Herod Antipas, he says that many people reconstructed their genealogies from memory or private sources, among whom were the Desposyni of Nazareth and Cochaba; probably, therefore, he derived from them the information that Joseph's grandmother was called Estha. The main interest of this statement is that, in spite of its being somewhat discredited by its context, it suggests a source from which St. Luke might possibly have obtained the pedigree he gives; we may well suppose that he pursued his investigations in Palestine during St. Paul's imprisonment at Caesarea.

Hegesippus (quoted by Euseb. HE iii. 19, 20, and 32; see Routh, Reliq. Sacrae, vol. i. p. 212 ff.) supports the statement of Africanus in reference to the Despoyni, though that term is not found in the fragments of his writings that are preserved: he states that when Domitian gave orders to kill those who were of David's race, certain heretics gave information against two grandsons of Judas the Lord's brother according to the flesh, as being of David's race and akin to Christ; Domitian, on finding out that they were ordinary peasants, and that the kingdom they expected was not of this world, released them, and issued an edict stopping the persecution of the Church; they took leading positions in the Church, and lived till the time of Trajan. He also relates that a similar accusation was brought against Symeon son of Clopas, 'the Lord's uncle,' who, in consequence, suffered martyrdom at the age of one hundred and twenty. It would appear, therefore, that nothing was known of any who claimed kinship with Jesus after the time of Trajan, so that the statement of Africanus probably rests, at the best, on mere tradition, and it is not wise to build much on it. The statement of Africanus about the destruction of genealogical records by Herod is most improbable, and tends to discredit his whole story; Josephus (c. Ap. i. 7 and Vita, 1) speaks of the preservation of the genealogies of priestly families in public records in the Temple, but there is no certain evidence that those of other families were similarly preserved.

The expedient of supposing evirate marriages and adoptions is not only improbable, but fails to explain why the descent of Jesus is traced through Joseph. Burkitt (l.c.) is probably quite justified in saying that the compiler of the First Gospel was perfectly aware that the word 'begat' (ἐγέννησεν) was not literally true in the pedigree he gives, and that he would have felt no incongruity between the physical reality of the Virgin-birth and the legal descent from David through Joseph. But this reasoning can hardly be applied to the Third Gospel; the Virgin-birth is certainly not insisted on in it in the same way as in the First; the phrase 'thy father and I' in 2<sup>d</sup> (cf. 2<sup>d</sup> 4) seems almost incompatible with the belief, and there is some reason for thinking, on textual grounds, that the original text has in places been altered; the words 'as was supposed' might easily have been inserted in 3<sup>d</sup>, although the variations of reading afford little or no evidence in favour of this supposition; above all, there is no reason to suppose that the writer had, or was likely to have, in mind the legal relation to Jesus in which Joseph, as husband of Mary, might be considered to stand. If, therefore, the suggestion first made by Annianus of Viterbo in the 15th cent., and since adopted by many eminent theologians, that St. Luke gives the genealogy of Mary, could be accepted, it would have important results. It is a matter on which argument is hardly possible, the only point being whether any unprejudiced person could understand the words in 3<sup>d</sup> to mean 'being (as was supposed, son of Joseph, but really) grandson of Heli'—Heli being taken, without a shred of evidence, to have been the father of Mary. A passage has, indeed, been quoted from the Talmud (Jerus. Chag. 77b) to prove that Mary was called 'daughter of Eli'; but this has been shown to be a mistake by G. A. Cooke, Expos., Oct. 1895, pp. 316 ff. In the Prot-evangelium Jacobi her parents are called Joachim and Anna. The early Fathers generally assumed that Mary was of the same family as Joseph, and that her descent was involved in his; see, for instance, Euseb. HE i. 7 ad fin. and Qu. ad Steph. iii. 2 (Migne, iv. col. 881 f.), where reasons are suggested why Mary's genealogy was not given; this view is based on a mistaken interpretation of Nu 36<sup>d</sup>, as if all women were commanded to marry in their own families, whereas the regulation applied only to heiresses. Proof of the Davidic descent of Mary can be obtained from the NT only by assuming the truth of the doctrine of the Virgin-birth; it was no doubt on this ground that Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 32<sup>d</sup>) inferred that Mary was of the tribe of Judah (cf. Prot-ev. Jacobi, 10, where she is said to be of the tribe of David). St. Matthew (1st) and St. Luke (1st 2<sup>d</sup>) assert the Davidic descent of Joseph, but not that of Mary; contrast Lk 1st, where Elisabeth is said to be of the daughters of Aaron. Sanday-Headlam on Ro 1st point out that in Test. XII Patriarch. we find the theory of a double descent from Levi and from Judah (Sym. 7 and Gen. 8), and they remark that this is no doubt an inference from the relationship of Mary to Elisabeth (Lk 1st).

We must conclude, therefore, that we have two independent attempts to establish the Davidic descent of Joseph, and that they can be harmonized only by suppositions which are incapable of proof and hardly probable.

LITERATURE.—This is sufficiently indicated in the body of the article.
P. M. BARNARD.

GENERATION.—A word of several meanings employed to render two different words in OT and four in NT. All are, however, related in thought, and all have a close connexion with the Gospels and Jewish thought in the time of Christ.

1. In OT 'generation' is used to render (1) the Heb. דור or יָרָא, connected with Assy. dāra, 'to endure,' means primarily a period of time. This meaning has survived in OT chiefly in poetry, and in the phrases דור דור Ps 45th 617, דור דור Ex 31st, דור דור Is 51st, Ps 72nd, and such like, to indicate time stretching away into the past (Is 61st), or (more generally) into the future (Ps 30th 49th). It may refer both to past and future (145th), and is thus parallel to עולם (see ERRATA).

Originally דור must have meant the period defined by the life of a man or of a family (Job 42nd). Hence by a loose usage it comes to mean the people living in that period (Gn 7th, Ex 1st, Dt 24th, Ec 1st, Is 53rd etc. etc.; cf. the modern use of the word 'age'). So also it may be used of a class of men living contemporaneously and possessing certain characteristics (Dt 32nd, Pr 30th 12, 13, 14).

(2) The other word in OT (rendered always plural 'generations') is דור דור. Here the root-idea is 'birth,' 'descent,' 'offspring,' from יָרָא 'to bring forth.' Hence it is used of genealogies (Gn 5th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 27th, Ru 4th etc.), of divisions by families, etc. (Nu 12th, 22nd, 24th etc.). It is even used of the creation of the world (Gn 2<sup>d</sup> lit. 'the begettings of the heaven and the earth').

2. Of the four words rendered 'generation' in NT two are unimportant so far as the Gospels are concerned. (1) In 1 P 2<sup>d</sup> 'a chosen generation,' γένος ἐκλεκτόν, should be rendered as in RV, 'an elect race.' (2) In Mt 1st the rendering should be 'the book of the origin of Jesus Christ,' using the word γένεσις in its widest sense. The meaning in Mt 1st, Lk 1st is slightly different, and is best expressed by 'birth' (EV). (3) The most important word used in the Gospels is γενεά, meaning (a) 'race,' 'offspring,' 'descent'; (b) the people of any given period; (c) a period loosely defined by the life of a man or of a family; (d) in such phrases as εἰς γενεάς γενεῶν (Lk 1st) it is used, apparently as the equivalent of דור דור, to express indefinite time, generally in the future. Cf. the expression in Eph 3rd εἰς αἰῶνας τῶν γενεῶν τοῦ αἰῶνος τῶν αἰῶνων, which, however, is considered by Dalman (Words of Jesus, p. 165, Eng. tr.) as referring to all the generations of 'the current age' of 'the world period.' But the phrase seems rather to be the strongest possible way of expressing 'for ever.' That γενεά (rendered 'generation') does express 'the current age' of 'the world period' is obvious in the Gospels (Lk 16<sup>a</sup>, Mt 24<sup>a</sup>, and less clearly Mt 23<sup>b</sup>); also the people of that age (Mt 12<sup>a</sup>, 16<sup>a</sup>, Mk 8<sup>a</sup>, Lk 11<sup>a</sup>). In the sense of (c) it is found only in Mt 11<sup>a</sup> and apparently never in its original sense (a). (4) This last is expressed by quite a different word, viz. γεννημα. In Mt 3<sup>a</sup> 12<sup>a</sup>, 23<sup>a</sup>, Lk 3<sup>a</sup>, AV has the phrase 'generation of vipers.' The Greek is γεννηματα εχιδωνων, which RV renders 'offspring of vipers.' The rendering of AV is due to Tindale (see Hastings' DB ii. 1429). Elsewhere the word occurs as γεννημα (Mt 23<sup>b</sup>, Lk 22<sup>a</sup>, 2 Co 9<sup>b</sup>), rendered 'fruit.' G. GENNESARET, LAKE OF.—See SEA OF GALILEE.

GENNESARET, LAND OF.—Thither Jesus and His disciples repaired after the feeding of the 5000 (Mt 14<sup>a</sup>, Mk 6<sup>a</sup>). This miracle probably took place on the N.E. shore of the Sea of Galilee. When evening came, the Synoptists tell us, His disciples entered into a boat, and crossing over the sea, came to the land, unto Genesaret, επι της γης της Γεννησαρ (Mt 14<sup>a</sup>, Mk 6<sup>a</sup>).

1. Name.—The 'Land of Genesaret, or Genesaret,' is mentioned but twice in the Bible (Mt 14<sup>a</sup>, Mk 6<sup>a</sup>). The name 'Genesaret,' however, occurs elsewhere: once as the name of the Lake, παρ της Νιμυρ Γεννησαρ (Lk 5<sup>a</sup>), once in 1 Mac 11<sup>a</sup> το ονομα του Γεννησαρ, and is frequently found in Josephus, who uses both Νιμυρ Γεννησαρ (Ant. xviii. ii. 1) and Νιμυρ Γεννησαρ (BJ iii. x. 7); in the Targums, גניסר, גניסר, and גניסר; and in Pliny's writings, Genesarete (v. 15). The name of the Lake was derived from that of the Plain, and that in turn from the name of a city supposed by the Jews to have been situated on the W. shore of the Sea of Galilee; that portion of the plain bordering on Mejdal being called Ard el-Mejdel. On the derivation of the word Genesaret, see art. SEA OF GALILEE.

2. Situation.—It is usually identified with the little plain situated on the western coast of the Sea of Galilee, and known to the Arabs as el-Ghuweir, 'little Ghor or hollow.' This identification is as good as certain. The description of it as given by Josephus can apply to no other. Several years ago an attempt was made by Thrupp and Tregelles (in the Journal of Classical and Sacred Philology, ii. 290-308) to identify it with the plain of el-Batiah, on the N.E. shore of the Lake, but without success (cf. Stanley's 'Note' in refutation, SP 455).

3. Size.—Shut in by the hilly promontory of Khan Minyeh on the N. and the still more prominent hills by Magdala on the S., and extending westward from the Lake only to the base of the rugged uplands of Galilee, its total area is exceedingly small. Its approximate measurements are about 3 miles long from N. to S. by 1½ broad from E. to W. Stanley's measurements are wide of the mark when he says that the plain is 6 or 7 miles long by 5 miles broad (SP 442); and even G. A. Smith exaggerates when he describes it as 'four miles broad' (HGH 443). Josephus' measurements are more nearly correct, viz. 30 x 20 stadia; though in fact it is a little longer than 30 and not quite so broad as 20. In form it is somewhat crescent-shaped or semi-elliptical. Its surface is comparatively level. Its altitude, like that of the Sea of Galilee, is over 550 feet below the level of the Mediterranean.

4. Josephus' description of the Land of Genesaret.—

'Its nature is wonderful as well as its beauty; its soil is so fruitful that all sorts of trees can grow upon it, and the inhabitants accordingly plant all sorts of trees there; for the temper of the air is so well mixed that it agrees very well with these several sorts; particularly walnuts, which require the coldest air, flourish there in vast plenty; there are palm trees also, which grow best in hot air; fig trees also and olives grow near them, which yet require an air that is more temperate. One may call the place the ambition of nature, where it forces those plants that are naturally enemies to one another to agree together. It is a happy contention of the seasons, as if every one of them laid claim to this country; for it not only nourishes different sorts of autumnal fruits beyond men's expectation, but preserves them a great while; it supplies men with the principal fruits, with grapes and figs continually, during ten months of the year, and with other fruits as they become ripe through the whole year; for besides the good temperature of the air, it is also watered from a most copious fountain. The people of the country call it Capharnaum. Some have thought it to be a vein of the Nile, because it produces the coracin fish as well as that lake does which is near to Alexandria. The length of this country extends itself along the banks of this lake that bears the same name for thirty furlongs, and is in breadth twenty. And this is the nature of that place' (BJ iii. x. 8).

This classical passage from Josephus, though probably coloured to some extent, gives substantially the truth about the Plain as it must have been in the time of Christ, and for this reason it is of the utmost importance. Jewish Rabbins of early times corroborate his description. They describe it as possessing both 'gardens and paradises' as one of the garden spots of the world; as irrigated and cultivated so that no portion of it was barren; and as being dotted over thickly with towns and villages. Indeed, ruins of villages have been found at three or four different localities in the Plain, viz. at the opening of Wady el-Hamam, at Ain el-Mudawwarah, south of Ain el-Tin, and on the N. side of Wady er-Rubudiyeh.

5. Its condition to-day.—Josephus' account is especially interesting because of the contrast between its condition then and now. Then, it was a most charming spot—'the unparalleled garden of God,' as a certain Rabbi calls it; and 'the gem of Palestine,' as Merrill speaks of it (Galilee in the Time of Christ, 33); now, it is, as Thomson says, 'pre-eminently fruitful in thorns,' a veritable thicket of oleanders and nubk trees, of gigantic thistles and brambles. And yet even now one finds proofs of its former luxuriance in the wealth of its wild flowers, the heavy-headed wheat and barley growing here and there, and in the stoutness of the thorns and thistles almost everywhere.

(1) The soil is wonderfully rich, like that of the Delta in Egypt. It consists of basaltic loam formed by the mingling of decomposed basalt with the alluvium of the lake. All travellers—Seetzen, von Schubert, Ritter, Burckhardt, Robinson, Wilson, and Thomson—praise the fertility of this Plain, and all except Stanley (cf. SP 451) lament its present desolate and uncultivated condition. The latter erroneously describes it as 'cultivated everywhere.' Only near Magdala are there signs of marsh.

(2) Fountains and streams supply it with water in copious abundance. Three winter torrents rush down from the hill country lying to the west, and bring with them abundance of water for the greater portion of the year. (a) One is known as the Wady el-Hamam, or the 'Valley of Pigeons,' a deep gorge bounded by almost perpendicular cliffs over one thousand feet in height, which enters the Plain from the S.W. This is a tremendous ravine, and from Josephus' day has been known as the ravine of the 'Robber Caves'—the chosen resort of brigands in former days. Thomson describes it in two connexions, as 'a great chasm' and as a 'profound gorge' (Land and the Book, ii. 395-397), and as leading up to a fort or castle known as Kalat ibn Maan, and still on to the village of Hattin. Down this valley are poured large volumes of water, and funnel through this same ravine, as through a funnel, rush sudden blasts of wind, which break upon the Lake. The ruins of Irbid, the Arbela of Josephus and 1 Mac 9<sup>o</sup>, are not far to the south. (b) Another torrent, entering the Plain from the W., is that known as Wady er-Rubudiyeh. This is the largest, and yields the most plentiful supply of water furnished to the Plain. It is used to irrigate the Plain both N. and S., furnishing nearly three times the volume of water supplied by Ain el-Madaunarah. (c) A third torrent enters the Plain from the N.W. It is called Wady el-Amud. Like Wady el-Hamam, it is a deep ravine, and scarcely less striking because of its narrowness. Its waters take their rise in the Jarmuk, the highest mountain in Galilee. For the greater part of its course it is called Wady el-Leinum. It is only a winter torrent. According to Thomson, all of these streams which enter the Plain disappear in summer before they reach the Lake.

Besides these waters which drain the region of Galilee immediately west of the Plain of Gennesaret, there are certain fountains in the Plain itself whose waters were used for irrigation: (a) Ain el-Madaunarah, or 'Round Fountain,' situated a little over a mile N.W. of Magdala, is the largest and most important. It is enclosed by a circular wall of hewn stones, 32 yards in diameter, surrounded by thick trees and brushwood, so that access is difficult; but it yields a copious stream of clear water, which flows from the Plain to the Lake, irrigating right and left. The pool itself contains two to three feet of water and certain fish. Ebrard (SK, 1867, pp. 723-747) identified it with the fountain of Capharnaum mentioned by Josephus, but this has been shown to be highly improbable. Two other fountains assist in watering the southern end of the Plain: Ain el-Bareideh, or 'Cold Spring,' also known as Ain el-Buliyeh, or 'Fountain of the Bean'; and Ain es-Serar, somewhat further to the S.W. (3) Ain el-Tin, or 'Fountain of the Fig Tree,' is another large and important spring. It is situated on the northern edge of the Plain, and bursts forth from under the cliffs of Khân Minyeh. Unfortunately, it is too close to the shore of the Lake to be used extensively for irrigating purposes. The stream which issues from it is choked with a jungle of oleanders and papyrus. Robinson identifies this fountain with the spring of Capharnaum of Josephus. (7) Ain el-Tabigha, or 'Fountain of the Ruined Mill,' formerly supposed to be the scene of the miracle of the feeding of the 5000 (Mk 6<sup>39-44</sup>), is another large spring of water—according to Tristram, the largest in Galilee, and about one-half as large as the fountain at Caesarea Philippi. It is not situated in the Plain, but considerably N.E., about half-way between Khân Minyeh and Tell Hum, the two rival sites of Capernaum; but its waters were formerly conducted by a channel cut in the rock around the promontory on which Khân Minyeh is situated, and made to irrigate the N. end of the Plain of Gennesaret. This aqueduct was discovered first by Sir Chas. Wilson, and since then the fountain has been generally considered to be the spring of Capharnaum of Josephus (cf. Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 429).

(8) Products.—With all these resources of irrigation, it is not surprising that the Plain of Gennesaret should be described by the Rabbins as the 'Garden of God,' or that its superior and delicious fruits 'were not allowed at the feasts in Jerusalem lest some might attend primarily to enjoy these fruits' (Hal. Pesachim, 86; Neubauer, Geog. du Palaïstine, 45 f.). But to-day, though its grapes, figs, olives, and walnuts have vanished, there are to be seen wild figs, oleanders, nubk trees, dwarf palms, papyrus plants, tall prickly centaureas; in summer, magnificent lilac-coloured convolvuli hanging in long festoons of blossom from the prickly shrubs; wild flowers of countless variety—tulips, anemones, irises; rice, wheat, the best and earliest melons and cucumbers in Palestine, sedges and rushes by the Lake; also thorns and thistles, especially in the central portion; in short, a tangle of luxuriant vegetation—a lovely floral carpet in February, a wilderness of thorns in summer. For here, indeed, Nature has lavished her glory in tropical profusion.

(4) Roads.—Two paths cross the Plain from S. to N.—the chief one leading from Magdala to Khân Minyeh in a direct course, and skirting the Lake shore within a few hundred feet; the other following the base of the hills along its western side, and striking over the hills northwards. One of the best views obtainable of the Plain is from the top of the ridge above Magdala.

(5) Inhabitants.—The Plain is without settled inhabitants to-day. The Ghavarineh Arabs, more especially a certain tribe named es-Senebiyeh, roam over it, using it as winter pasture land. Wilson recounts that gipsies from India have been known to sojourn there with their tents and flocks (p. 138). As a rule, solitude reigns except near the village of Magdala and at Khân Minyeh.

(6) Health.—Fevvers are still prevalent in this region as in the days of our Lord, when, not far distant, at least, Peter's wife's mother lay sick (Lk 4<sup>38</sup>). Thomson speaks of 'the heat and malarial influences of the Plain.' This probably accords in part for its present desolation, though under the Turk it has fared but little worse than other portions of the Empire.

Such is the land of Gennesaret, on the immediate edge of which lay Capernaum, and over whose 'Eden-like landscape' the feet of our blessed Lord so often trod as He went about preaching from village to village, healing the sick and raising to life the dead. One can almost see Him, in fancy, pushing out in a little boat along the embayed and shell-covered shore, followed to the water's edge by the multitudes who pressed upon Him daily from populous Gennesaret, and hear Him speaking to them, as they sit upon the shore, concerning the gospel of the Kingdom, drawing illustrations from the sower, who, going forth to sow, allows some seeds to fall by the wayside, others on stony places, still others where they are choked by thorns; and then, when He became weary, retiring to the mountains for rest and spiritual refreshment in prayer, only to return again and repeat His message of goodwill and comfort; until, finally, when the great tragedy on Calvary is ended and He is risen from the tomb, He reappears to those same disciples, who meanwhile have returned to their nets. Surely no other spot of like size can possibly be of equal interest, to the Christian who loves to trace the footprints of His Master's earthly career, with what has justly been called 'the most sacred region of the Lake,' 'the gem of Palestine.'

GENTILES.—In AV of the Gospels, 'Gentiles' and 'nations' are the translations of ἔθνη, RV agreeing with the rendering of AV in every place of the word's occurrence. In Mt 6<sup>7</sup> (ἔθνη) and 18<sup>7</sup> (ἑθνεῖς) AV has 'heathen' and 'a heathen man' respectively; RV 'Gentiles' and 'the Gentile.' In Mt 5<sup>8</sup>, where AV has τελειῶνας, 'publicans,' RV with the reading ἑθνεῖς has 'Gentiles.' Ἑλληνας, occurring in John only, is rendered 'Greeks' in 12<sup>20</sup> RV and AV; in 7<sup>26</sup> RV has 'Greeks,' AV 'Gentiles,' with, however, 'Greeks' in the margin. Ἑλληνίς (Mk 7<sup>26</sup>) is translated 'a Greek' in both versions, but AV has 'Gentile' in the margin. The very wide diffusion of the Greek language after the conquests of Alexander the Great was the reason that in our Lord's day 'Greek' was often used as an equivalent for 'Gentile.' See ΓΡΕΚΕΣ. The word 'Gentiles,' from the Lat. gentilis (adjective of gens, pl. gentes, 'a race,' 'people,' or 'nation'), is used in the Vulgate to render the Heb. גוֹיִם and the Gr. ἔθνη, and has thus passed into English.

For a full discussion of the term 'Gentiles,' reference must be made to the Bible Dictionaries. It is only necessary here to allude to the origin and use of the expression in the OT. Just as ἔθνος in the Gospels, as a rule (for an exception see Mt 21<sup>42</sup>), means the Jewish nation, and ἔθνη the nations other than Jewish, so in the OT גוֹי (as a rule for an exception see Lv 20<sup>17</sup>), stands for the former and the pl. גוֹיִם for the latter; and whilst often used in its purely ethnographical and geographical sense, with the meaning 'foreigner,' it is also constantly employed, especially in the Psalms, as a term of aversion and contempt, as connoting the practice of false religions and of immoral customs. The material and moral evils which the goyim had brought upon Israel in its later history tended to intensify the feelings of hostility with which the Jews looked out upon them from their own religious exclusiveness; and accordingly, in our Lord's day and in the generations following (see Acts and the Epistles passim), they were regarded by the Jews generally as aliens, having no claim whatever to the Divine recognition. This must be borne in mind when estimating our Lord's teaching on the subject.

A full consideration of the attitude of early Christianity towards the Gentiles requires a study of the Acts and Epistles at least, and is beyond the scope of this article; our Lord's teaching, however, afterwards developed by His followers, is quite plainly indicated in the Gospels, and must form the basis of any adequate discussion of the subject.

The fact that Jesus did not pass His youth in the religiously exclusive atmosphere of Jerusalem, but in the freer and more liberal surroundings of semi-Gentile Galilee, fits in with the prophetic word of Simeon at the Presentation, and the declarations of His forerunner: He was to be 'a light to lighten the Gentiles' (Lk 2<sup>32</sup>); and, God was able to raise up to Abraham children (3<sup>9</sup>) who could not boast any natural descent from the patriarch. St. Matthew, although according to the usual account of his standpoint he had no especially Gentile proclivities, records two important prophetic utterances regarding the Gentiles as being illustrated and fulfilled in his Master's work: 'Galilee of the Gentiles; the people which sat in darkness saw great light; and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death light is sprung up' (4<sup>15-16</sup>), and, 'In his name shall the Gentiles trust' (12<sup>21</sup>). At the beginning of His ministry, if we accept St. Luke's chronology (see NAAMAN), Jesus defied the Jewish prejudices of His hearers in the synagogue at Nazareth by citing cases of Gentiles blessed through the agency of Israel's prophets (Lk 4<sup>25-27</sup>); and, when driven from His native town, He took up His abode in a city of despised Galilee which belonged to that less Jewish portion of it known as

'Galilee of the Gentiles' (Mt 4<sup>15</sup>). Moreover, it was in the same Gentile-infected Galilee that the most important part of His ministry was carried on, and He even went into the borders of Tyre and Sidon (Mt 7<sup>24</sup>), and also taught and healed those who came to Him from thence, together with those who sought Him from Decapolis (Mt 4<sup>23</sup>), and from Idumæa, and from beyond Jordan (Mk 3<sup>9</sup>); nor did He disdain to remain on one occasion for two days among the Samaritans at their request (Jn 4<sup>40</sup>). In His public teaching He showed no prejudice in favour of the Jews in His assignment of praise and blame: the grateful leper whom He blessed was a Samaritan (Lk 17<sup>16-17</sup>); it was a good Samaritan who was set forth as an example in one of His most famous parables (10<sup>6-9</sup>); and He commended the faith of the centurion as being greater than any He had found in Israel (Mt 8<sup>10</sup>). On the other hand, the evil generation of whom the Pharisees were representatives, He declared should be condemned in the judgment by Gentiles, the men of Nineveh and the queen of Sheba (12<sup>41</sup>); and, setting the seal to the teaching of His forerunner, He asserted in effect that the true children of Abraham were those who did the deeds of Abraham, and were not necessarily those who were naturally descended from him (Jn 8<sup>39-40</sup>). In the Sermon on the Mount the same broad and world-wide outlook is manifested; there is hardly anything of importance in that great discourse which is local or temporary—it is obviously for all men and for all time. With this, too, coincides the teaching of His many parables about the Kingdom of heaven and that recorded in the Fourth Gospel—in this Gospel particularly all His utterances are in accord with His declaration to the Samaritan woman concerning the true worshippers (4<sup>21</sup>), and with the impression produced on the Samaritans that He was the Saviour of the world (v. 42); for in this Gospel especially His words of warning, of encouragement, and of hope embrace all mankind: 'God so loved the world . . . that whosoever believeth . . . shall have eternal life' (3<sup>16</sup>). And, finally, at the end of His ministry, in the allegory of the sheep and the goats, spoken exclusively with reference to Gentiles, He applies to those on the right hand the word 'righteous,' which in the Jewish language was so often the technical term to designate only the chosen people (Mt 25<sup>37</sup>).

There are two passages in the Gospels which demand a passing notice, as they might seem at first sight to be in opposition to our Lord's usual attitude towards the Gentiles. One is His saying to the Syrophenician woman, 'I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 15<sup>24</sup>); and the other is His injunction to the Twelve, 'Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not; but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (10<sup>6</sup>). In the first case there is little doubt that our Lord's words were intended to test or to call forth the woman's faith, and are not to be understood as implying any unwillingness on His part to assist her (see SYROPHENICIAN WOMAN). And in the second case we are to notice that the prohibition was laid upon the Twelve only, and had no application to His own conduct; and, further, that the prohibition was distinctly removed by Him after the Resurrection in the great commission recorded in Mt 28<sup>19</sup> 'Go ye therefore and teach all nations' [in Mk 16<sup>7</sup> 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature'], and in Ac 1<sup>8</sup> 'Ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judæa, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth.' And there are other passages, such as Mt 24<sup>14</sup> 26<sup>13</sup>, from which it is plain that our Lord contemplated the world-wide preaching of the gospel by His followers, the fulfilment, in fact, of the ancient prediction to the father of the faithful: 'In thy seed shall all the nations (goyim) of the earth be blessed' (Gn 22<sup>18</sup>). See MISSIONS.

GENTLENESS.—St. Paul in 2 Co 10<sup>1</sup> appeals to the meekness and gentleness (πραΰτης καὶ ἐπιεικείας) of Christ. These qualities would be readily admitted to be so characteristic of Jesus as to require no specific illustration. Yet such is the objective character of the Gospels, that with the exception of His own claim to be 'meek and lowly in heart' (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>) and the Evangelist's application of the prophecy, 'Behold, thy king cometh unto thee, meek' (21<sup>5</sup>), neither quality is directly attributed to Him, nor, with the exception of Mt 5<sup>4</sup>, does either word occur in His recorded teaching.

These characteristics of Jesus are not easily defined in themselves, or distinguished from one another. (See art. 'Gentleness' in Hastings' DB, vol. ii, p. 150). πραΰτης is rather an inward disposition of the mind, the quietness of soul which is the result of faith and self-restraint; ἐπιεικεία is an active grace, exhibited in human relations, 'it expresses the quality of considerateness, of readiness to look humanely and reasonably at the facts of a case'; it denotes in Jesus the tenderness of His dealings with the moral and social outcast, the burdened and heavy laden, the weak and ignorant; His gracious courtesy, geniality of address, thoughtfulness, and delicacy of touch. It is not the expression of a nature of such softness as to be always on the verge of tears, or of a sentimentalism which has little strength of conscience, and no power of moral indignation and repulsion. The gentleness of Christ can be appreciated only when it is related to certain other elements in His personality. (1) His consciousness of His Divine origin, and His royal vocation as founder of the Kingdom of God (cf. Jn 13<sup>3-5</sup>). (2) His moral consciousness. His is not the gentleness towards the sinful which arises from moral indifference, or the desire of a sin-marred nature to be judged of leniently. He is conscious of sinlessness; He looks upon sin as the great tragedy of human life, but His passion for righteousness does not make Him harsh in judgment or unmerciful in dealing (cf. Mt 5<sup>45</sup>). (3) His consciousness of Divine power. It is the gentleness not of weakness, but of might. The Lamb of God answering Pilate so mildly was conscious that twelve legions of angels stood at His disposal (Mt 26<sup>53</sup>).

The Baptist, himself stern of soul, foresaw the coming of one greater than he—greater, but not more gentle. The axe, fan, and fire of judgment were at His command, and He would wield these instruments of wrath to the destruction of wickedness (Mt 3<sup>12-13</sup>). But, to John's intense disappointment, Jesus found His ideal and method not in these symbols of violence, but in the conception of the Servant of Jehovah, who did not strive or cry or lift up his voice in the streets, who did not break the bruised reed or quench the smoking flax (Mt 12<sup>18, 19</sup>; cf. Lk 4<sup>18, 19</sup> and Mt 11<sup>4, 5</sup>, and see Is 42<sup>1-2</sup>).

The Gospels abound in illustrations of the winsome manner of Jesus. His reception of the little children (Mt 18<sup>10-13</sup>), His thoughtfulness for the multitude lest they should faint by the way (15<sup>32</sup>), the brotherly touch of His hand upon the leper (Mk 1<sup>4</sup>), the delicacy of His approach to the sorrowing (Lk 7<sup>13</sup>, Jn 11<sup>35</sup>), His tender tones to His perplexed disciples—'little children,' 'I will not leave you orphans' (Jn 13<sup>33</sup> 14<sup>18</sup>), and His sense of their frailty in the words, 'Sleep on now and take your rest' (Mt 26<sup>45</sup>), His consideration, even in the agony of death, for His mother (Jn 19<sup>26, 27</sup>),—are but examples of that gracious gentleness which consisted with, and was the expression of, a Divine dignity of love. His attitude to the sinful is distinguished by the same tenderness. His intense love of holiness, quick moral sensitiveness, and stainless purity, made Him uncompromisingly stern in His rebuke of a self-righteousness which had little capacity of repentance; but He combined with that a deep insight into the possibilities of sin-marred natures; and by His disclosure to them of dormant powers of being, and the tenderness of His dealing with them, He won them to repentance and a new life (Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup> 10<sup>1-10</sup>). And, similarly, His rebukes, touched by His gentleness, become appeals, and are charged with the inspiration of a renewed trust. His 'O ye of little faith' (Mt 8<sup>26</sup>), 'Can ye drink the cup that I drink of?' (Mk 10<sup>38</sup>), 'Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things' (Lk 10<sup>41</sup>), 'Could ye not watch with me one hour?' (Mt 26<sup>40</sup>), 'Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?' (Jn 21<sup>15</sup>),—were rebukes whose gentleness could leave no bitterness or despair, but recalled the soul to its loyalty to Him. So, although Jesus never formally held forth ἐπιεικεία as an ideal of Christian life, He left us an example that we should follow His steps (1 P 2<sup>21</sup>).

GERASENES, GERGESENES.—The 'country of the Gerasenes' (Γερασσηνῶν) or 'Gergesenes' (Γεργεσσηνῶν) is mentioned in Scripture only in connexion with the healing of the demoniac. The AV reads 'Gergesenes' in Mt 8<sup>28</sup>, and 'Gadarenes' in Mk 5<sup>1</sup> and Lk 8<sup>26</sup>, while the RV reads 'Gadarenes' in Mt. and 'Gerasenes' in Mk. and Luke. There is preponderating evidence in favour of the changes (the reading Γερασσηνῶν in N in Mt. is undoubtedly for Γαδαρηνῶν. Many natives in the district surrounding the Sea of Galilee pronounce the Arabic ḡ d and ḡ dh like z—thus 'Gadarenes' they would pronounce 'Gazarenes'). The neighbourhood of the town of Gadara must be pronounced absolutely impossible for the miracle (see GADARA). How then account for the reading 'Gadarenes'? Perhaps, as Thomson suggests, the place where the miracle took place, 'over against Galilee,' was included within the district of Gadara. But as this would not be officially correct, Gadara having been the capital of the country to the south of the town, it might be better to say that popular usage gave to the whole district on the eastern shore of the Lake the name of the principal town. In the same way the reading Γερασσηνῶν might be explained—being derived from the large and important city of the Decapolis, Gerasa—the modern Jerash. (It need scarcely be said that this latter town is out of the question as the scene of the miracle, being some 30 miles from the Lake). The derivation of the reading from the Decapitan city, while not perhaps impossible, is very improbable. A more likely explanation is at hand. According to Origen, the majority of the MSS he had access to had the reading 'Gerasenes.' But this reading he objected to, inasmuch as he knew of only one Gerasa, the town of the Decapolis, which he rightly conceived could not have been the scene of the miracle. He suggested that 'Gergesenes' must be the true reading, as he knew of a town on the eastern shore of the Lake bearing the name Gergessa. Hence, on his authoity, the reading 'Gergesenes' may have originated. But how then account for the, presumably, true reading which Origen found in the MSS? There can be here no certainty, but the probability is that Origen was right, and that the true name of the village or town where the miracle occurred, 'over against Galilee,' was Gergesa. It is extremely rare to find a soft changing into a harsh sound, such as Gerasa into Gergesa. But any one who has lived long in Palestine knows how common it is, among the uneducated natives, to find a hard sound like the second g in 'Gergesa,' not only changing into a softer sound, but dropping out altogether. The pronunciation of 'Gergesa,' among the common people would almost certainly be 'Ger'sa' (Gerasa). Hence from the common speech it would find its way into the text. The modern name of the village which has been identified as the scene of the miracle is Kher'sa or Cher'sa, which is nearer to 'Gerasa' than to 'Gergesa.'

The identification of the ruins of Kher'sa with the Gerasa of the Synoptists is due to Thomson, (LB ii. 335). The identification might have been made much earlier had not men's minds been set on selecting some place near Gadara. Had the eastern shore of the Lake been carefully scrutinized in the light of the three passages, Mt 8<sup>29</sup>, Mk 5<sup>13</sup>, Lk 8<sup>26</sup>, the identification of Kher'sa with the place described must have taken place. There is one spot only on the eastern shore which answers completely to the description of the Synoptists. On the eastern side 'over against Galilee' Jesus landed from the boat, and 'straightway there met him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit.' The encounter, then, must have been close to the shore. Were that all we had to guide us, identification of the spot would be impossible, for there are caves, which may have been used as tombs, all along the mountain side. But it would appear from all three Synoptists that the place where the swine were destroyed ran down somewhat steeply to the water's edge. Now, as we have said, there is only one place on the eastern side where the mountain comes at all near to the beach, and just there the incline is such that one rushing down would be precipitated at once by the impetus into the water. Everywhere else along the coast there is a broad belt—half a mile or more at most parts—between the foot of the hills and the Lake. This spot is at Kher'sa just below Wady Fik, which is almost exactly opposite Tiberias, the next valley, about a mile north, is Wady es-Semak. Close to the seashore directly below the Wady are the ruins of Kher'sa, the walls of which can yet be distinctly traced. Directly below Kher'sa the hills approach close to the Lake, leaving only a narrow pebbly strand, and here the slope of the mountain side is so steep and near to the water that a herd of animals would be likely in a headlong rush to be precipitated into the sea. In the mountains above, where in all probability the swine were feeding, there are numbers of caves and also rock-cut tombs where the demoniacs may have lived. See art. DEMON.

GERIZIM.—In relation to the life and teaching of Jesus, the interest of Mt. Gerizim lies in its being the mountain to which the woman of Samaria referred on the occasion when Jesus uttered His memorable words, 'Woman, believe me, the hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father' (Jn 4<sup>21</sup>).

The establishment of Mt. Gerizim and its temple as the sacred place of the Samaritans in rivalry to Jerusalem, is bound up with the growth of the jealousy and hatred between Jews and Samaritans, which had attained such magnitude in the days of our Lord. The story given by Josephus of the founding of the temple on Mt. Gerizim (Ant. xi. viii. 2-4) is that Manasseh, brother of Jaddua, high priest at Jerusalem, married the daughter of Sanballat (Neh 4). For this marriage he was threatened with expulsion unless he divorced his wife. He thereupon appealed to Sanballat, who built for him the temple on Mt. Gerizim, and made him its first high priest. This story 'seems to be derived from some apocryphal Jewish account of the origin of the Samaritan temple' (Sayce, art. 'Sanballat' in Hastings' DB). According to Neh 13<sup>28</sup>, a grandson of Eliashib the high priest was son-in-law to Sanballat, and was expelled for this 'mixed marriage.' More reliable, if less definite, ground is to be found in 2 K 17<sup>24-28</sup>, from which we learn that the king of Assyria sent back one of the priests whom he had carried away from the Northern Kingdom, to teach the heathen peoples whom he had settled there 'the manner of the God of the land.' Thus the worship of Jehovah was preserved in Samaria, and gradually asserted itself over the 'gods of their own' which every nation made. In the days of Ezra, when the temple at Jerusalem was being rebuilt, the Samaritans, who are called 'the adversaries of Judah and Benjamin,' desired to assist in the task, for they said, 'We seek your God as ye do.' This request was refused (Ezr 4<sup>1-5</sup>), and thus the founding of a rival shrine became inevitable. See also art. SAMARITANS.

The claim of the Samaritans, that Mt. Gerizim was the true centre of the worship of Jehovah, rested upon a statement in their version of the Pentateuch (Dt 27<sup>4</sup>), where 'Gerizim' is substituted for 'Ebal' of MT) definitely prescribing that an altar should be built there. They also supported the claim of their shrine by traditions in which it was represented as the mountain on which Abraham prepared to sacrifice Isaac (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL 334, note), the place where Abraham was met by Melchizedek, and also the scene of Jacob's dream.

Apart from such traditions, the position of Mt. Gerizim and its rival Mt. Ebal, at the head of the pass leading right through from the river Jordan to the sea, and also at the point where the great north road from Jerusalem to Galilee intersects this pass, has given them a commanding place in the topography of the Holy Land, and has led to their association with important events in the history of Israel. Shechem, which lay between Mt. Ebal and Mt. Gerizim, is associated with the entrance of both Abraham and Jacob into the promised land (Gn 12<sup>6</sup> 33<sup>18</sup>). It was near Shechem that Jacob purchased the parcel of land from the children of Hamor, on which he erected an altar, and sank a well for his family and flocks. It was in this parcel of land that Joseph was buried (Jos 24<sup>32</sup>). Mt. Ebal and Mt. Gerizim, again, were the scenes of the great inaugural service of all Israel on taking possession of the promised land (Dt 11<sup>29</sup>, 27<sup>11-12</sup>, Jos 8<sup>30-34</sup>). And it was at Shechem that Joshua gathered together the people for the renewal of the covenant, 'and took a great stone and set it up there under an oak that was by the sanctuary of the Lord' (Jos 24<sup>1-28</sup>). It was on Mt. Gerizim that Abimelech, Gideon's son, spoke his parable of the tress (Jg 8<sup>18</sup> 9<sup>1-7-20</sup>). It was at Shechem also that all Israel gathered to make Rehoboam king (1 K 12<sup>1</sup>), and this was the original capital of the Northern Kingdom.

In order to understand the significance of the question which the woman put to Jesus at the well (Jn 4<sup>21</sup>), it is necessary to remember that she must have been well instructed in the notable history of Mt. Gerizim, and would accept all the traditions of her people without question. At the same time her own religious faith was probably bankrupt. She had not found God on Mt. Gerizim. There is a vein of scepticism in her words, as of one who, having lost personal faith, points with scorn to the differences of those who worship the same God. Yet even in her scepticism there is a faint hope apparent that this 'prophet' may have a living message for her. On the historical question involved Jesus pronounces quite definitely in v. 22, but not before He has lifted the whole subject out of this barren controversy and set it in relation to the fundamental principles of His teaching. There is embedded in the very beginning of the Samaritan worship of Jehovah the idea that Jehovah is the 'God of the land' (2 K 17<sup>7</sup>), and throughout the whole controversy between Jerusalem and Mt. Gerizim there is to be found the assumption that His worship must have a local centre. To this Jesus makes answer, 'God is Spirit.' It flows at once from this fundamental idea of the true nature of God that the essential quality in worship which is acceptable to Him is not the place where it is offered, but the disposition of the worshipper. Wendt points out that our Lord's teaching in this passage as to the true nature of worship is a corollary of His teaching in the Sermon on the Mount, that the heart (the whole inward nature) is the true seat of the righteousness of the people of God. So that for the ethical expansion of Jn 4<sup>23, 24</sup> we naturally turn to Mt 6-7, even as in Jn 4<sup>24</sup> we find the great doctrinal foundation alike of right conduct and right worship.

GESTURES.—Dr. Johnson defines 'gesture' as (1) 'action or posture expressive of sentiment'; (2) 'movement of the body'. Adopting these definitions, we may consider the significance of the gestures recorded or implied in the Gospels.

1. Christ heals or blesses with an outward gesture.—In most of these cases the gesture is probably intended to confirm faith; a visible sign accompanies the action. Thus (a) we read of our Lord taking the sick person by the hand, as in the case of Simon's wife's mother (Mk 1<sup>31</sup> and || Mt.), Jairus' daughter (Mk 5<sup>4</sup> and || Mt. Lk.), and the child with the dumb spirit (Mk 9<sup>17</sup>). Similarly St. Peter takes by the hand the man at the gate of the temple and Tabitha (Ac 3<sup>7, 9</sup>). Dr. Swete (on Mk 9<sup>17</sup>) suggests that this gesture was used when great exhaustion had preceded. (b) Jesus lifted up His hands to bless (Lk 24<sup>40</sup>). (c) Jesus stretched forth His hand to heal, and touched or laid hands on the sick, as in the case of the leper in Mk 1<sup>41</sup> (and || Mt. Lk.). In Ac 4<sup>30</sup> the Apostles speak of God the Father stretching forth His hand to heal. Other instances of Jesus' touching the patients, doubtless, as a rule, to confirm their faith, are: the blind men in Mt 9<sup>30, 31</sup> (the parallels to the latter in Mk-Lk. mention no touching), the bier on which the widow's son at Nain lay (Lk 7<sup>14</sup>), the woman with the spirit of infirmity (Lk 13<sup>16</sup>), perhaps the dropsical man (Lk 14<sup>14</sup>, see Plummer, in loc.), Malchus (Lk 22<sup>31</sup>, the only account of this healing). Further, St. Luke speaks of a large number of sick folk brought to our Lord at sunset, when He 'laid his hands on every one of them and healed them' (Lk 4<sup>40</sup>, not || Mt. Mk.). The healings by anointing would also involve a touch, as by the Twelve (Mk 6<sup>13</sup>), or in the case of the blind man anointed with clay (Jn 9<sup>6</sup>); cf. Ja 5<sup>14</sup> for the custom in the Apostolic Church. Similarly we read of the sick touching Jesus—the woman with the issue of blood (Mk 5<sup>27</sup> and || Mt. Lk.), the sick at Gennesaret and the neighbourhood (Mk 6<sup>56</sup> and || Mt.); and St. Luke (6<sup>19</sup>) says that 'all the multitude sought to touch Him, for power came forth from him and healed them all.' This 'touch' of the Lord is recalled by the cures that are recorded to have been worked by handkerchiefs or aprons carried away from the body of St. Paul (Ac 19<sup>12</sup>), and by the shadow of St. Peter (Ac 5<sup>15</sup>, where it is implied that many tried to touch him). And inasmuch as the Apostles would follow the example of Jesus in lesser and greater things alike (cf. Ac 4<sup>13</sup>), we find that they adopted His gestures, whether for healings or for invocations of the Holy Spirit, or even in speaking. For the touching by laying on of hands, see Ac 6<sup>8, 13, 19</sup> and 9<sup>17, 28</sup>; the last two are cases of healing. (2) Jesus laid on hands to bless, as in the case of the little children (Mk 10<sup>14</sup> and || Mt.). We read twice in Mk. of our Lord's taking children in His arms (Mk 9<sup>36, 10<sup>16</sup></sup> ἔβαλεν αὐτοὺς ἐν ταῖς ἀγκυαῖς), a gesture ascribed to Him in Mk. only, though a similar phrase is used of Simeon in Lk 2<sup>28</sup> ἔθετο αὐτὸ ἐν ταῖς ἀγκυαῖς [αὐτοῦ]. In another way we read of Jesus' blessing with a gesture of the hand, as at the Last Supper (ἔθετο τὰς ἀγκυαῖς, Mk 14<sup>18</sup>) and at the meal at Emmaus (Lk 24<sup>30, 31</sup>). (3) Jesus breathed on His disciples when 'sending' them after the Resurrection, saying, 'Receive ye the Holy Spirit: whosoever sins ye forgive,' etc. (Jn 20<sup>22</sup>). Here the gesture is of a different nature; our Lord, still using an outward sign, makes it signify that which is bestowed—the gift of the Spirit (πνεῦμα ἅγιον, without the article). Breath is the emblem of the Spirit, and by this gesture Jesus shows that the Holy Ghost is the 'Spirit of Christ' as well as of the Father (see Westcott, in loc.).

On the other hand, in some cases Jesus healed with a mere word. One cannot, indeed, always conclude that He did not use any outward gesture, such as touching, merely because an Evangelist is silent on the matter (e.g. cf. Mk 10<sup>22</sup> with Mt 20<sup>34</sup>); but in some cases, at least, Jesus healed in absence. The following are examples of cases where apparently no gesture was used: the paralytic (Mk 2<sup>3</sup> and || Mt. Lk.), the man with the withered hand (Mk 3<sup>3</sup> and || Mt. Lk.), the centurion's servant (Lk 7<sup>9</sup>), the ten lepers (Lk 17<sup>14</sup>), the nobleman's son at Capernaum (Jn 4<sup>46</sup>). We find the same difference in the healings in Acts; thus, in 9<sup>14</sup> no gesture seems to have been used.

The use by our Lord of an outward gesture or sign in His ministerial acts was only in accordance with Jewish thought. We may recall Moses stretching forth his hand over the Red Sea (Ex 14<sup>16, 21, 22</sup>, cf. 17<sup>11</sup>), and, by way of contrast, the stretching out of the hand in OT as an act of punishment (Ex 7<sup>2</sup>; see other instances collected by Plummer in his note on Lk 5<sup>13</sup>). It may be thought that this usage of Jesus in His ministry paved the way for His afterwards appointing outward signs in Baptism and the Eucharist, and for the Apostles' employing them for other Christian rites, such as ordination.

2. Christ uses gestures to emphasize His words, or as an expression of emotion.—(a) We read of the stretching forth of the hand toward the disciples when Jesus claimed them as His mother and His brethren (Mt 12<sup>50</sup>); cf. St. Paul's gesture when addressing Agrippa (Ac 26<sup>3</sup>). We cannot put under this head the hand outstretched in Mt 14<sup>33, 26, 27</sup>, as there it does not express emotion; but we may compare with the above gesture the hands outstretched in prayer (1 K 8<sup>23</sup>, Ps 28<sup>2, 13, 2</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>8</sup>). A 4th cent. writer has interpreted our Lord's 'stretching forth his hands' (cf. St. Peter, Jn 21<sup>18</sup>) of His accepting suffering voluntarily (Testament of our Lord, I. 23). (b) We read of many gestures with the eyes. Jesus looked up to heaven at the miracle of the feeding of the five thousand (Mk 6<sup>41</sup> and || Mt. Lk.), in His last prayer before going to Gethsemane (Jn 17<sup>1</sup>), at the healing of the deaf man with an impediment (Mk 7<sup>31</sup>), and the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11<sup>4</sup>). It is doubtless due to the first two of these passages that we find in many ancient Liturgies, from the Apostolic Constitutions onwards, this gesture ascribed to our Lord when He consecrated the Eucharist—as in the Greek St.

James (in the Syriac St. James it is only implied), St. Mark both Greek and Coptic, Abyssinian (or Ethiopic), St. Basil, Roman and Ambrosian. The gesture is one of prayer, and implies that prayer accompanied the actions described (see Job 22<sup>26</sup>; cf. the publican, Lk 18<sup>13</sup>). Again, the references to the 'glance' or 'look' of our Lord are very frequent. In Mk 3<sup>6</sup> it conveys His righteous anger (|| Lk. does not mention the anger). In Mk 3<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>21</sup> (and || Mt.) and Lk 6<sup>20</sup> 20<sup>17</sup>, it apparently emphasizes the truth taught. In Lk 22<sup>61</sup> it brings conviction of sin to St. Peter after his denials. In Mk 10<sup>21</sup> it is a mark of love; here, as so often, St. Mark alone relates the feelings of our Lord's human soul. The glance to emphasize truth must also be understood where we expressly read of Jesus' 'turning' to those whom He is addressing (Mk 8<sup>23</sup>, Lk 7<sup>34</sup> 9<sup>35</sup> etc.). On the other hand, no special significance must be attached to passages where our Lord's 'look' is mentioned, but where it was merely that He might see, as Mk 5<sup>41</sup> (and || Mt.), Lk 19<sup>21</sup>. Corresponding with this gesture of Jesus is the keen 'gaze' or 'fastening of the eyes' which we read of in the case of the people of Nazareth (Lk 4<sup>23</sup>), the maid-servant (Lk 22<sup>26</sup>), St. Peter (Ac 3<sup>6</sup>, cf. 3<sup>7</sup>), the Sanhedrin (Ac 6<sup>13</sup>), St. Stephen (Ac 7<sup>33</sup>), Cornelius (Ac 10<sup>4</sup>), St. Paul (Ac 13<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>19</sup> 23<sup>1</sup>)—all having arete, one of St. Luke's favourite words; in the case of St. Paul it is difficult to reconcile with the idea that the 'stake in the flesh' was ophthalmia. (c) The gesture of kneeling or prostration is mentioned only once of our Lord, in Gethsemane (Mk 14<sup>35</sup> and || Mt., Lk.), the first two Evangelists speaking of prostration, the third of kneeling. As standing was the usual attitude for prayer* (Mk 11<sup>25</sup>, where see Swete's note, Lk 18<sup>11-12</sup>), we must interpret this kneeling or prostration as specially signifying deep distress, as in the early Church it signified special penitence, being forbidden by the 20th canon of Nicaea on festival occasions like Sundays and Eastertide (so Tertullian, de Cor. Mil. 3). And so it was significant of deep distress in the case of St. Stephen (Ac 7<sup>59</sup>), and probably of St. Peter when he raised Tabitha (Ac 9<sup>40</sup>); in the case of St. Paul's farewells it would be due to the great solemnity of the occasion (Ac 20<sup>36</sup> 21<sup>5</sup>, cf. also 1 K 8<sup>54</sup>, Ezr 5<sup>2</sup>, Dn 6<sup>10</sup>, Eph 3<sup>14</sup>). Nevertheless, the usual standing to pray would not preclude the gesture of prostration at intervals to express special devotion, as is the case to this day among all Eastern Christians. To signify reverence the gesture of kneeling or prostration is frequently practised in the Gospels. We read of many thus kneeling to Jesus—the leper (Mk 1<sup>40</sup> and || Mt., Lk.), demoniacs (Mk 3<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>), Jairus (Mk 5<sup>22</sup> and || Mt., Lk.), the Syrophenician woman (Mk 7<sup>26</sup> and || Mt., Lk.), the rich young man (Mk 10<sup>17</sup>), the blind man (Jn 9<sup>36</sup>), Mary of Bethany (Jn 11<sup>32</sup>), the lunatic's father (Mt 17<sup>14</sup>, not || Mt., Lk.), Salome (Mt 20<sup>20</sup>, not || Mt., Lk.), the Magi (Mt 2<sup>11</sup>), St. Peter at the miraculous draught of fishes (Lk 5<sup>6</sup>), and so the soldiers in derision (Mk 15<sup>19</sup> and || Mt., Lk.). The devil tempts our Lord to kneel to him (Mt 4<sup>8</sup> and || Lk.). The women prostrate themselves at the tomb (Lk 24<sup>5</sup>). Cornelius attempts to do so before St. Peter (Ac 10<sup>25</sup>). St. John before the angel (Rev 19<sup>10</sup> 22<sup>8</sup>). (d) A gesture to emphasize speech may probably be understood in Mk 12<sup>29</sup> where it may be that Jesus pointed to the scribe's phylactery, which contained the words, 'Hear, O Israel,' etc. (e) An isolated gesture is the steeping to write on the ground in the 'Pericope adultera' (Jn 8<sup>8</sup>), apparently signifying 'intentional inattention.' Westcott (in loc.) remarks that the very strangeness of the action marks the authenticity of the detail. (f) We read of gestures expressing grief.

Jesus sighed at weakness of faith (Mk 7<sup>34</sup> 8<sup>12</sup>), and groaned (or was moved with indignation, ἐνεβραμύσατο), shuddered (ἐτάραξεν τὰ ὄντα), and wept at Lazarus' grave (Jn 11<sup>35</sup>, 36); He shuddered at the thought of the betrayal (Jn 13<sup>21</sup>), and wept over Jerusalem (Lk 19<sup>41</sup>).

To speak generally, it may be noted that the Fourth Evangelist is more chary of chronicling our Lord's gestures than the Synoptists. He dwells rather on Jesus' words than on the actions with which He accompanied them.

3. Various gestures by others.—To an Oriental people, gesture is almost a natural method of expressing the meaning as speech. We find in the Gospels frequent references to such a method of communication. This is not only when no other is possible, as when dumb Zacharias makes signs (Lk 1<sup>22</sup>) and the people make signs to him (v. 22; perhaps he was also deaf); just as in Acts, St. Peter has to make signs to procure silence in Ac 12<sup>17</sup>, and St. Paul in Ac 21<sup>10</sup> and perhaps 13<sup>16</sup>. But we find such expressive gestures as shaking off the dust (Mk 6<sup>11</sup> and || Mt., Lk.; this is our Lord's command to the Twelve), to signify the dissociating of oneself from an offender. So Paul and Barnabas did at Pisidian Antioch (Ac 13<sup>46</sup>), and so Paul 'shook out his raiment' against the unbelieving Jews at Corinth (18<sup>18</sup>). Again, rending the garments was a common Jewish gesture of consternation or grief, often mentioned in OT (e.g. Gn 37<sup>29</sup>, 32, Jl 2<sup>13</sup>); in the Gospels we find it mentioned only of Caiaphas (Mk 14<sup>66</sup> and || Mt., Lk.); in Acts (14<sup>14</sup>) only of Paul and Barnabas at Lystra. Smiting the breast as a sign of grief we find in Lk 23<sup>48</sup> (where D adds τὰ μέτωπα), and in Mt 11<sup>17</sup> (ἐκόψασθε) and Lk 18<sup>32</sup>. Wagging the head was the derisive gesture of the passers-by at the Crucifixion (Mk 15<sup>20</sup> and || Mt.; cf. 2 K 19<sup>17</sup>, Job 16<sup>10</sup>, La 2<sup>10</sup>, Sir 12<sup>13</sup>). Pilate's gesture of washing his hands (Mt 27<sup>24</sup>) has furnished a proverbial saying, but it was familiar to the Jews (Dt 21<sup>6</sup>). The kindred idea of washing the hands to express innocency (i.e. ridding oneself of evil) is found in Ex 30<sup>18</sup>, and Ps 26<sup>6</sup> 73<sup>13</sup>, and is a great feature of the Church Orders and the great Liturgies. Lastly, we notice the kiss as the sign of love, real or feigned, as in the case of the sinful woman (Lk 7<sup>45</sup>), of Judas (Mk 14<sup>45</sup> and || Mt., Lk.), and of the Ephesian elders (Ac 20<sup>37</sup>). It is true that the kiss was the ordinary way of greeting a Rabbi (see Swete on Mk 14<sup>45</sup>), but in all these cases much more than ordinary courtesy is intended by the gesture, and probably καταφιλήσας in these passages means 'to kiss fervently,' or (in the case of Judas) 'ostentatiously.' For the kiss in OT, cf. Gn 29<sup>11</sup> 23<sup>45</sup> 45<sup>15</sup>, Ex 18<sup>27</sup>, 1 S 20<sup>14</sup>, 2 S 15<sup>20</sup> 19<sup>20</sup>, many of which passages speak of kisses of greeting like that of Judas, to which Job's is indeed strangely similar.

A. J. MACLEAN.
GETHSEMANE (Γεθσημανε, perhaps for [γ]εθσημα 'oil press').—Gethsemane is usually described as a 'place' with a garden attached to it; but, so far as the words of Scripture show, it may have been simply a garden. St. Matthew (26<sup>30</sup>) and St. Mark (14<sup>26</sup>) use the word κῆπος, St. Luke (22<sup>40</sup>) uses κόπος, and St. John (18<sup>1</sup>), describing it as ὄρος ἢ κήπος, refers to it again (18<sup>2</sup>) as κόπος. It lay east of Jerusalem, across the Kidron (Jn 18<sup>1</sup>), at the foot of or upon the Mount of Olives (Mt 26<sup>30</sup>, Mk 14<sup>26</sup>, Lk 22<sup>40</sup>; cf. Euseb. OS 248. 18, and Jerome, ib. 130. 32). The traditional site is in the Kidron ravine, at a point about equidistant, as the crow flies, from the Golden Gate and St. Stephen's Gate. It is easily reached by the road passing through the latter and crossing the Kidron bridge, just beyond which it lies, a square plot of ground with eight very ancient olive-trees. If the statement of Josephus (BJ VI. I. 1), that Titus cut down all the trees upon that side of the city, be correct, the tradition that those trees are as old as the Christian era, or the tradition as to the site, must be abandoned. Both probably are unfounded, and, according to the general consensus of opinion, this site was fixed upon at the time of the Empress Helena's visit to Jerusalem (A.D. 326).

The scene of Christ's agonizing prayers immediately before the betrayal, and of His betrayal and capture (Mt 26<sup>39-45</sup>, Mk 14<sup>32-40</sup>, Lk 22<sup>39-46</sup>, Jn 18<sup>1-23</sup>), it had long been a favourite resort with the Master and His disciples (Lk 21<sup>7</sup>, Jn 18<sup>7</sup>). GHOST.—Used in the Gospels only in the phrases 'giving up the ghost' and 'Holy Ghost': a survival of the meaning commonly associated with it in the times of the translators, when it was used as equivalent to 'spirit' (Germ. Geist). The usage of the word 'ghost' as equivalent to 'spirit' has become archaic. The meaning now uniformly given to it makes its continued use in our RV inexpedient. This was recognized by the American Revisers, who substituted 'Holy Spirit' in every instance for 'Holy Ghost.' See, further, art. HOLY SPIRIT, SPIRIT.

A. MITCHELL HUNTER.

GIFT.—Christ continually reminds His disciples that the Father is the source of all gifts. 'To Him we must trustfully turn.' 'Ask, and it shall be given' (Mt 7); 'Everyone that asketh receiveth' (Lk 11<sup>10</sup>), and not only 'daily bread' (Mt 6<sup>11</sup>, Lk 11<sup>3</sup>), but 'whatsoever' is asked (Jn 15<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>23</sup>). He will never refuse the gift of the Holy Spirit to them that ask (Lk 11<sup>13</sup>—Mt 7<sup>11</sup>), for it is His 'good pleasure' to give them 'the Kingdom' (Lk 12<sup>32</sup>). When Christ has ascended, it is the Father who will send 'another Comforter' (Jn 14<sup>26</sup>); and when trials and persecution shall arise, it is the Father by whom, Christ says, 'it shall be given you in that hour what ye shall say' (Mt 10<sup>19</sup>). We see this confidence inspiring the multitude to glorify God 'which had given such power unto men' in the healing of the palsied man (Mt 9<sup>33</sup>), and making the practical Martha say, 'I know that whatsoever thou shalt ask of God, God will give unto thee' (Jn 11<sup>22</sup>).

It is notable that Christ's only recorded request for a personal favour should have been the occasion of that deep saying concerning 'the gift of God' (Jn 4<sup>10</sup>). The word used (τὴν δωρεάν) implies a peculiar freedom in the giving; something of bounty not to be purchased. It is used nowhere else in the Gospels (save in the OT quotation in Jn 15<sup>22</sup>); but in the Acts and Epistles it usually occurs as the distinguishing word for God's highest gifts, as of grace itself (Eph 3<sup>7</sup>), of the 'heavenly gift' (He 6<sup>4</sup>), of the 'unspeakable gift' (2 Co 9<sup>6</sup>), of the saving power of Christ's life and death (Ro 6<sup>23</sup>), of Christ in us (Eph 4<sup>7</sup>), or of the Holy Spirit (Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>20</sup> 10<sup>45</sup> 11<sup>17</sup>). In Jn 4<sup>10</sup> some hold that our Lord spoke of Himself as 'the gift of God' (cf. Jn 3<sup>16</sup>), others that He meant the unique opportunity the woman now had of gaining religious enlightenment from Him; and the two ideas blend in His words. But the uppermost thought would be the parabolic suggestion of the water for which Jesus had asked, and 'the gift of God' would most naturally be that 'living water' which He Himself could give her, and which would solve her dimly discerned problems of conduct and worship. The Jews had long connected the precious gift of 'living water' with that ever-new and quickening power of the Spirit which, coming from God, can alone satisfy the soul's thirst for Him (Zec 14<sup>8</sup>, Jer 2<sup>17</sup>). So Christ seems to use it here. If the woman but knew 'the gift of God,' that fount of the living Spirit which, springing up within, and independent of Samaritan books of the Law, is the assurance of eternal life (v. 14), and if she could but recognize the supremacy of love and spiritual power in Him who was speaking, then she would not hesitate to ask an infinitely greater gift than He had asked of her. Thus Christ would be the agency; the Eternal Spirit would be 'the gift.'

The greatest of all gifts would be one's life. This Christ gave. All other gifts of His are included in this. They are the fruit of this complete self-surrender, which could yield up all things for love of men. True, He gave, and gives His disciples, the unfathomable gift of a Peace which the world could not give (Jn 14<sup>27</sup>), a Rest for all weary spirits (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>). To His own He is the Living Water (Jn 4<sup>14</sup>), the Bread of Life (6<sup>51</sup>). He gives the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven (Mt 16<sup>19</sup>), the new commandment of Love (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>), and Life Eternal (10<sup>28</sup>). But the highest gift included these and more. It was the gift of His life, a ransom for many' (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>, Mk 10<sup>45</sup>). This He offered to the Eternal Father, to that Righteousness whose final decision was beyond the Son of man's bestowal: 'To sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give' (Mt 20<sup>23</sup>, Mk 10<sup>40</sup>). For the gift of the Holy Spirit see art. HOLY SPIRIT. See also art. GIVING. EDGAR DAPLYN.

GIRDLE.—See DRESS, p. 498<sup>b</sup>.

GIVING.—The duty of giving springs naturally out of the gospel fact. Jesus Christ is God's gift (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>), and when St. Paul associates the liberality of the Christians of Corinth with this grace of God (2 Co 9<sup>8</sup>), he is true to the mind of Christ. Giving and receiving are correlatives: 'freely ye received, freely give' (Mt 10<sup>8</sup>); the endowment is of Divine power and authority, and the service is to be as wide as human need; cf. Ac 3<sup>9</sup>). Throughout the Gospel narrative the welcome of Christ awakens generous impulses. The new resolve of Zaccheus (Lk 19<sup>9</sup>) is the first expression of his new life. The grace of Christ had come near to him, and he, in that high fellowship, could not but be gracious. So, generally, giving is the necessary expression of Christian faith and love, the spontaneous outcome of Christian life.

Almsgiving is recognized by Jesus as a part of 'righteousness' (Mt 6<sup>1-4</sup> RV), and the duty of praising it is often enforced (see ALMSGIVING). But the care of the poor by no means exhausts the activities of the generous spirit. Treasury gifts for the temple service were recognized by Jesus (Mk 12<sup>41</sup>—Lk 21<sup>1</sup>), and gifts for the upholding of public worship are an essential part of worship.

So, too, Jesus accepted and honoured gifts directly bestowed upon Himself. 'Certain women which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities . . . ministered unto him of their substance' (Lk 8<sup>2-3</sup>). In the same spirit were Matthew's feast after his call (Lk 5<sup>29</sup>), the anointing by the woman of the city (Lk 7<sup>36</sup>), and the supper at Bethany (Jn 12<sup>1</sup>). These were acts of grateful love, and they were welcomed by Jesus. The incident of the outpouring of the spikenard (Jn 12<sup>3</sup>—Mt 26<sup>6</sup>, Mk 14<sup>3</sup>) is the more significant because of the criticism it provoked, and the reply of Jesus, 'Ye have the poor always with you, and whenever ye will ye can do them good' (Mk 14<sup>7</sup>). Is there here a hidden rebuke for neglect of opportunities ever present, on the part of those who here professed disapproval of waste? Certainly the reply suggests the thought 'that expenditure in one direction does not disqualify for beneficent acts in another. The willing-minded will always have enough for all purposes' (Expositor's Gr. Text, in loco). By accepting and honouring this costly act of thankful love Jesus sanctions the utmost that love prompts. It is in such giving that the joy of sacrifice is known and the secret of Jesus realized—'It is more blessed to give than to receive' (Ac 20<sup>35</sup>).

But all service is included in Christ's law of giving, not alms to the poor alone, but all the manifold expressions of love, the helpfulness which springs out of the new family bond of brotherhood. How this spirit works practically is illustrated in the ministry of Jesus. Once and again before His gracious acts of healing or of bounty, it is said, 'he was moved with compassion' (Mt 9<sup>13</sup>, 15<sup>2</sup>, Mk 6<sup>34</sup>); and His fellow-feeling found expression in the sending forth of the Twelve, the feeding of the multitude, and in teaching.

So is it with His disciples. All tender ministries are the expression of a Divine compassion, 'the exceeding grace of God in you' (2 Co 9<sup>14</sup>).

But the law of Christian service goes beyond this. It is founded in justice, the recognition of the true relations which men hold one to another in Christ. The second commandment of love to our neighbour (Mt 19<sup>19</sup>, 22<sup>39</sup>) and the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk 10<sup>25</sup>) teach the true inwardness of generosity.

True helpfulness is that which is due from one man to another because of the ties of humanity. Hence the personal equation in beneficence. All true giving resolves itself into self-giving, the expression of sympathy, reverence, affection, the charity of personal care and thought (Lk 6<sup>27-35</sup>). It is this service of man as man, and because of the ties of a Divine humanity, which is the service of Christ. 'Ye did it unto me' (Mt 25<sup>40</sup>) covers the whole ground.

But while it is ever true that 'money values are not the standard of gifts in the Kingdom of God,' this must not be pressed so as to minimize gifts of money. These must often measure 'the moral value of the giver.' Indeed, this is the lesson of the Treasury (Lk 21<sup>1</sup>), they 'of their superfluity,' she 'of her want.' The frequent references to money in the Gospels show the importance which Jesus attached to this factor in life. The stewardship of all possessions is taught in the parable of the Rich Fool (Lk 12<sup>16</sup>); for 'rich towards God' cf. 1 Ti 6<sup>17</sup>. Judgment is pronounced upon the selfish use of wealth in the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19</sup>). Hence the warnings against covetousness (Lk 12<sup>15</sup>). Giving, thus exercised, becomes a 'means of grace,' by which the heart is cleansed (Lk 11<sup>4</sup>); a suggestive rendering of this saying is given in Expositor, II. v. [1883], 318, 'but as to what is within, give alms, and behold all things are clean unto you'.

The test of the young ruler (Lk 18<sup>21</sup>) is not so much 'a counsel of perfection' for all, as the word in season for the individual. The general lesson on wealth and its uses is in the parable of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16<sup>1</sup>). Confessedly difficult of interpretation as this parable is in detail, its main lesson can hardly be overlooked—Heaven, which cannot be bought by gold, may yet be prepared for by the best uses of wealth. The giving of money by men who know its value, and whose keenest activities are directed to get it, is a searching test of their self-denial and devotion. True liberality is the Divinely appointed safeguard against covetousness, with this caution, 'to whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required' (Lk 12<sup>48</sup>).

The question of definite 'proportionate giving' may be briefly dismissed. It has been sought to press the law of a tenth as binding upon all, and the words of Jesus (Mt 23<sup>23</sup>) are quoted in support. But the ground is insufficient. An incidental reference cannot set aside the whole spirit of the Gospel. Any rule imposed from without is alien to the free spirit of love. Rules which the individual may lay down for his own guidance are for the individual conscience to determine, but 'the Christian law is the spirit of Christ, that Enthusiasm of Humanity which He declared to be the source from which all right action flows' (Ecce Homo). 'Charity has no other limit than charity itself' (Godet). Cf. Lk 6<sup>30</sup>.

GLAD TIDINGS.—See GOSPEL.

GLORY.—There are few commoner words in the English Bible than 'glory,' and few more difficult of definition. The word appears on the surface to be used in a strange variety of meanings and applications, and with both good and bad connotation. Reputation, praise, honour (true and false), splendour, light, perfection, rewards (temporal and eternal)—all these varying conceptions seem covered by the same word.

Nevertheless the underlying thought is simpler than would appear. In the OT a large number of words are translated in English by 'glory,' but by far the most common is qay, of which the root idea is 'heaviness,' and so in a metaphorical sense, 'weight,' 'worthiness.' The LXX frequently employs δῶξα to translate this, as well as a great number of other Hebrew words; and δῶξα (with its connected verb δοξάζω) is the usual NT word rendered 'glory.' This word is derived, of course, from the root of doxa, 'to think or suppose,' and the primary meaning of δῶξα is, no doubt, 'thought or opinion,' especially, favourable human opinion, and thus in a secondary sense 'reputation,' 'honour,' etc.

But an important new shade of meaning comes into the word when it is used in religious language. The δῶξα of man, human opinion, etc., is shifting, uncertain, often based on error, and its pursuit for its own sake is unworthy. But there is a δῶξα of God which must be absolutely true and changeless. God's 'opinion' marks the true value of things, as they appear to the eternal mind; and God's 'favourable opinion' is true 'glory.' This contrast is well seen in Jn 5<sup>44</sup>, 19<sup>9</sup>. Hence 'glory,' whether applied to God Himself or to His works as seen by Him, must imply the absolute truth which underlies all phenomena. This gives us the connecting link between 'the glory that cometh from God' and the 'glory' which man conceives of as belonging to God Himself. The 'glory of God,' therefore, must mean His essential and unchanging Godhead as revealed to man. And the familiar ascription 'Glory to God' would imply not only a right human praise, but the assigning to God of what He truly is, for nothing higher can be given Him. Similarly the true 'glory' of man or nature must be that ideal condition, that final perfection, which exists as a real fact in the Divine mind. The glory of God is what He is essentially; the glory of created things is what they are meant by God to be, though not yet perfectly attained (He 2<sup>9</sup>, Ro 8<sup>18-21</sup>).

Passing on to that which this article is specially concerned with,—What is meant by the 'glory' and the 'glorifying' of Jesus Christ? It must mean (a) the revelation of His essential Deity, that which He is in the mind of the Father, though veiled from man by the limitation of the Incarnation. See Jn 17<sup>5</sup>, He 1<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>8</sup>, Ja 2<sup>1</sup>. (b) The revelation of the ideal and perfect condition of human nature, as elevated by its union with God in the Incarnation to that which God means it to be by the law of its creation, that which already in the mind of God it essentially is. Then the glory of Christ is the explanation and justification of Gn 1<sup>27</sup> (cf. 2 Co 3<sup>18</sup>).

But besides this fundamental conception of 'glory' which springs out of the primary meaning of the Greek word, it is to be noticed that 'glory' in Scripture usually carries with it ideas of 'light', 'splendour', and 'beauty.' Thus pre-eminently 'the glory of the Lord' in the OT is the visible shining forth of light, by which the Divine Presence is recognized by man, the  $\text{קָדוֹשׁ}$  of the later Jews. So the 'glory' appeared to Israel at Sinai (Ex 24<sup>16-17</sup>), at the door of the Tent (Lv 3<sup>2</sup>, Nu 14<sup>10</sup> 16<sup>19</sup>), at the dedication of Solomon's Temple (1 K 8<sup>10-11</sup>), in the visions of Isaiah (6<sup>1-3</sup>) and Ezekiel (1<sup>28</sup> 3<sup>2</sup> 8<sup>4</sup>). Similarly the Messianic hopes of Israel are expressed under the figure of 'glory dwelling in the land' (Ps 85<sup>9</sup>). See art. 'Glory (in OT)' and 'Shekinah' in Hastings' DB. Passing to the NT, the same conception of 'glory' is seen in St. Luke's account of the Nativity (2<sup>9</sup>). And this is brought into direct connexion with the Person of Christ in the narratives of the Transfiguration, especially in St. Luke's (9<sup>28-36</sup>). There the 'glory' of Christ shines forth visibly in the dazzling brightness of His countenance. It encompasses the forms of Moses and Elijah (v. 31); it even transfigures material objects like Christ's clothing (v. 29). With this passage should be compared the visions of Stephen in Ac 7<sup>55</sup>; of Saul of Tarsus (Ac 9<sup>17</sup> 22<sup>3-11</sup> 26<sup>13</sup>), and of St. John in Patmos (Rev 1<sup>12-16</sup>).

A more metaphysical conception of the 'glory' of Christ is seen in St. John's Gospel. The Evangelist may indeed be alluding to the Transfiguration in 1<sup>14</sup>, and to the visible glory of Isaiah's vision in 1<sup>14</sup>. But in 2<sup>11</sup> and 11<sup>2</sup> he is evidently describing some revelation to the inward eye of what Christ essentially is, some intuition of His Divine power (only suggested by a visible 'sign') borne in upon the soul of the believer. In Christ's words and works His true nature, as the 'effulgence' of the Father's glory, flashes upon and illuminates not the intellectual faculties merely, but the whole being of man, filling it with the sense of light and beauty and satisfaction.

Thus we seem to arrive at a conception of 'glory' which combines both the ideas of  $\delta\acute{\omicron}\lambda\alpha$ , as 'splendour' and as the manifestation of eternal truth as it is in the Divine mind.

In this sense Christ looks forward to and prays for the 'glorifying' of Himself by the Father (Jn 13<sup>31</sup>, 17<sup>1</sup>, 17<sup>24</sup>). This glorifying is in a true sense accomplished in the Passion, as issuing in the Resurrection, whereby the true nature of Christ and His redemptive work were recognized and rejoiced in by the faithful. There is a 'glory' which is yet to come, but the present revelation to the Church of Christ's glory is of the same order as the future one which will complete it (17<sup>24</sup>). The Christian community, already ideally perfected by the separation of Judas (Jn 13<sup>31</sup>), is henceforth to recognize permanently what individual intuition had already perceived and confessed at different points of the ministry. And this 'glorifying' of Christ is to be the 'glorifying' of the Father (Jn 17), for the completion of Christ's work will reveal the Divine mind and purpose to the Church; and it is also the 'glorifying' of the believer and of the Church as a whole (v. 24), for the Church will be the permanent witness of God to the world (v. 23), and man in union with Christ is on the way to attain the Divine ideal (v. 23).

The same profound conceptions of 'glory' appear in the writings of St. Paul and St. Peter. The object of the Christian calling is 'the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ' (2 Th 2<sup>14</sup>). The invisible 'glory' of the Christian Church through its union with Christ by the Spirit is greater than the visible 'glory' of the Old Covenant (2 Co 3<sup>11</sup>). The 'glory' of God recognized in Christ by the believer is a new creation of light (4<sup>6</sup>). Present limitations and sufferings will be abundantly compensated in the full future revelation of 'glory' (v. 17, cf. Ro 8<sup>18</sup>). Indeed, the 'glorifying' of the believer is already ideally complete (Ro 8<sup>30</sup>); it will be visibly completed in the Resurrection of the body (Ph 3<sup>21</sup>, cf. 1 P 5<sup>1-4</sup>).

In the Resurrection life, therefore, Christ will be seen and known by all the faculties, the whole being of man redeemed, as sharing fully and essentially in the 'glory' of the Godhead. His Divinity will be recognized in the 'glory' which was ever inseparable from it; His humanity will be seen filled full, illuminated by its union with His Divinity, 'taken up into God' (Quicumque vult), and so constituting the perfect expression and vehicle of His Divinity (1 Jn 3<sup>3</sup>). Hence in the ideal and perfected Church, as described in the Apocalypse, both humanity and its material setting are illuminated with 'the glory of the Lamb,' whose glorified humanity is, as it were, the 'Lamp' (Rev 21<sup>23</sup>) in which shines the 'glory' of the Godhead.

It will be seen that this one word 'glory' is really a summary of the Divine purpose for creation as revealed in Scripture—

'From Eden's loss unto the end of years.'

The 'glory of God' is revealed in the 'glory of Christ,' and both nature and man are in Christ progressing towards 'the liberty of the glory of the children of God' (Ro 8<sup>21</sup>).

GLUTTONOUS.—In Mt 11<sup>19</sup> = Lk 7<sup>34</sup> we are informed that our Lord was reproached as a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber. The Greek is alike in both passages—ἀδύρατος φάγος καὶ οἰνοπότης. The English versions are probably right in their rendering of φάγος and οἰνοπότης as implying intemperate excess. But this hardly lies in the words themselves. φάγος (Liddell and Scott, s.v.) is found only in these passages and in later ecclesiastical writers. οἰνοπότης does by usage (not by etymology) imply excess (Anacreon, 98; Call. Ep. 31; Polyb. x. 8, 2). In Pr 23<sup>31</sup> it answers to  $\text{כִּי נֶאֱמַר}$  'one who is drunken with wine' (cf. Dt 21<sup>20</sup>, Ezk 23<sup>42</sup>, Hos 4<sup>13</sup> for use of the Heb. root); and it is parallel with μέθυστος in 23<sup>31</sup>. In Pr 31<sup>4</sup> (24<sup>7</sup> Swete) the verb οἰνοπορεύω occurs in the bad sense. But it is possible that the real force of the insult to our Lord is shown by Dt 21<sup>20</sup>. The rebellious son is to be brought by his parents to the elders, to whom the parents are to say, 'This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice, he is a riotous liver and a drunkard.' He is then to be executed by stoning. It is true that the LXX here συμβολοκορῶν οἰνοπορεύει has no resemblance to the phrase in the Gospels, but Pr 23<sup>30</sup> has μὴ δὲ ἐρέθισον συμφοροῦν as one half of the doublet, 'among gluttonous eaters of flesh' ( $\text{כֹּחַל וְחַיִּי}$ ); and in Pr 23<sup>33</sup> Aq., Sym., Theod. agree in using the Deuteronomic word συμβολοκότος for  $\text{כֹּחַל}$ . Delitzsch in his Heb. NT uses the words found in Dt 21<sup>20</sup>.

We need not wonder at the non-agreement with the LXX. For the discourse has several indications of having been spoken in Aramaic, such as the parenomias probably to be found in the cry of the children (Mt 11<sup>7</sup>, Lk 7<sup>22</sup> 'danced' and 'wept'; cf. Farrar, Life of Christ, I, 22; and the Peshitta), and the variation ἐξουσία—ἐξουσία (Mt 11<sup>23</sup>, Lk 7<sup>29</sup>) which is best explained by supposing some error in reading an Aramaic document.

GNASHING OF TEETH (ὁ βρυγμὸς τῶν ὀδόντων, Mt 8<sup>12</sup> 13<sup>22</sup>, 22<sup>23</sup> 24<sup>24</sup> 25<sup>25</sup>, Lk 13<sup>22</sup>).—A phrase describing a gesture which expresses mainly fury or baffled rage: Job 16<sup>9</sup>, Ps 35<sup>18</sup> 37<sup>12</sup>, Ac 7<sup>54</sup>; cf. Ps 112<sup>7</sup> 'The wicked shall gnash with his teeth, and melt away'; but these OT parallels* seem hardly sufficient to account for the set form which the phrase has in the Gospels.† The expression occurs in every case but one in parables of the Last Judgment, and even that exception (Mt 8<sup>23</sup>) may be called a parabolic representation. This does not detract from the force of the warning, but rather the pictorial element is added because of the Speaker's passionate desire to make the terrific consequences of sin vivid and memorable in order to the salvation of those that heard Him, and to deter them and us from the course that would lead to such a fearful end.

GOD.—Introduction.—The sphere of the revelation of Jesus was limited to the Fatherhood of God (see FATHER), and all His other references to the Divine Being are more or less incidental. They involve conceptions which He shared with OT prophets, and to some extent also with contemporary Judaism; but the form which some of these conceptions take in His teaching, and the relative emphasis which He laid upon them, are modified by that truth which was central and fundamental in His own experience and thought of God. Jesus, in all His references to God, spoke after the manner of a prophet, and not after the manner of the Rabbin or the Christian theologian. He never sought to prove the existence or the personality of God. These were invariably assumed. He never communicated any speculative views regarding the nature or the attributes of God. All that He said stood in direct relation to right conduct.

The aim of the present article is to set forth briefly those views of God, expressed or implied in the words of Jesus, which may properly be considered apart from the Divine Fatherhood, and which are, to some extent, characteristic of Jesus.

1. God is one.—To Jesus, as to His people through many centuries, God was one. He did not modify this ancient belief. To the scribe who asked which commandment was greatest, Jesus quoted the familiar confession from Deut. (6<sup>4</sup>), which begins with the words, 'Jehovah our God is one Jehovah' (Mk 12<sup>29</sup>); and the author of the Fourth Gospel represents Jesus as addressing these words of prayer to the Father.—'This is life eternal, that they should know thee, the only true God' (τὸν ἀμὸν ἀληθινὸν θεόν, Jn 17<sup>3</sup>).

Jesus spoke of the Holy Spirit; and if there is any place at which He suggests a personal distinction in the Divine Being, it is here. It is necessary, therefore, to consider His words on this subject. His references to the Spirit in the oldest Gospels are extremely rare; and in only one instance do all the Synoptics agree in reporting the use of this term. This is the passage concerning blasphemy against the Spirit (Mk 3<sup>29</sup>, Mt 12<sup>31</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup>). There are three other* occasions on which, according to one or two of the Synoptics, Jesus spoke of the Spirit. (a) The first of these occasions was when He spoke words of encouragement to His disciples in anticipation of their future need of support when called before governors and kings.

* Βρυγμὸς is used in Pr 19<sup>12</sup> of the roaring of a lion, and in Sir 61<sup>2</sup> of beasts 'ready to devour.'

According to Matthew (10<sup>20</sup>), He said to them, 'It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you.' In Luke we have two passages referring to the same, or at least very similar occasions; one of these speaks of the Holy Spirit (τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα), while in the other Jesus is represented as saying, 'I will give you a mouth and wisdom, which all your adversaries shall not be able to withstand' (Lk 12<sup>12</sup> 21<sup>15</sup>). Mark has a similar word of Jesus, but puts it on a different occasion. The situation of the disciples is the same, and Jesus says, 'It is not ye that speak, but the Holy Spirit' (Mk 13<sup>11</sup>). The thought which all the accounts have in common is that of Divine assistance. The agent who assists is either the 'Holy Spirit,' the 'Spirit of your Father,' or Jesus Himself.

(b) Another reference by Jesus to the Spirit is found in His reply to those who accused Him of working in league with Beelzebul. Here He said, 'If I by the Spirit of God cast out demons' (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>); or, according to Luke, 'If I by the finger of God cast out demons' (Lk 11<sup>20</sup>).

(c) Finally, according to Mark (12<sup>29</sup>), Jesus referred to the 110th Psalm as spoken in the Holy Spirit. Mt. has simply ἐκ πνεύματος, and Lk. no reference to the Spirit.

Now the language of these passages does not appear to suggest a different view of the Spirit from that of the old prophets. If Jesus as a rule represented His disciples as dependent on the Father, and the Father as caring for them, and then in a single instance, when speaking still of the Divine aid, said, 'the Spirit of your Father' or the 'Holy Spirit,' we cannot suppose that He made any personal distinction between them. His word is an echo of such a passage as Is 61<sup>1</sup> 'The Spirit of the Lord Jehovah is upon me,' and is in part a fulfilment of the promise in Joel (2<sup>28</sup>) that the Spirit shall be poured out upon all flesh. The statement of Jesus regarding the 110th Psalm, that it was spoken in the Holy Spirit, is quite parallel to this word concerning His disciples. It shall be with them as it was with the author of this psalm. The Spirit of their Father will speak in them.

Again, when Jesus said, 'If I by the Spirit of God [or the finger of God] cast out demons,' it is manifest that His thought is that of God's presence and aid. It is like the language of Micah when he said, 'I am full of power by the Spirit of Jehovah' (3<sup>8</sup>). The Fourth Gospel expresses the same thought when it represents Jesus as saying, 'The Father abiding in me doeth his works' (Jn 14<sup>10</sup>).

Finally, when Jesus warned the scribes and Pharisees concerning the irremissible sin of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, it is obvious that we cannot draw any personal distinction between this Spirit and God. These men had attributed the manifestly good work of Jesus to the prince of bad spirits. Thus they had wilfully called good evil (cf. Is 5<sup>20</sup>). They had violated conscience; they had quenched, at least for the moment, this inner and fundamental voice of God. This manifestation of God within them is called the Spirit of God in accordance with OT usage, which ascribes a spirit to Jehovah, in and through which He

The teaching of the Fourth Gospel (Jn 14-16) regarding the Spirit marks an advance on that of the Synoptics, both in quantity and in character; but this teaching, as it now stands, like the other discourses of John, cannot be attributed directly to Jesus. It appears to represent a stage of thought fully as late as that which we find in Mt 28<sup>19</sup>. We need not, therefore, discuss it in this connexion, where we are concerned with the teaching of Jesus. And we conclude this paragraph with the statement that there is nothing in the narrative of the genuine teaching of Jesus which suggests a modification of the old prophetic conception of a pure monotheism.*

2. God is holy.—The conception which Jesus had of the holiness of God is implied rather than expressed in His teaching; yet though not directly stated, it is fundamental, and marks an advance on the teaching of the OT. How fundamental this conception was in the teaching of Jesus may be illustrated from the Sermon on the Mount. According to this, the standard of the Kingdom of God called for a righteousness that exceeded the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 5<sup>20</sup>). The Law declared that a man should not kill, but Jesus taught that anger exposed one to the same danger of judgment (v. 21). The Law declared against adultery, but He declared against the lustful desire (v. 27). Now this profounder conception of sin, this attaching of the gravest penalties to the secret feeling of anger and to the unclean desire, implies a clearer and more ethical conception of the holiness of God.

Again, Jesus' sense of the holiness of God is reflected when He says that it is the aim of His mission to call sinners (Mt 9<sup>13</sup>, Mk 2<sup>17</sup> [Lk 5<sup>27</sup> adds, 'to repentance']); and His feeling is still more significantly seen in the Beatitude for the pure in heart (Mt 5<sup>8</sup>). Finally, the intensity of His appreciation of God's holiness may be measured by the severity of His judgment on impenitent sinners. One of such tenderness of heart as Jesus showed in all His relations to others—a tenderness which He believed was an attribute of God—could not have uttered such words of judgment as Mk 3<sup>29</sup> 12<sup>9</sup> and Mt 23<sup>34</sup>, unless He had had an open vision of the Divine purity.

It is obvious from this brief survey that, to the thought of Jesus, the holiness of God was a fundamental fact, and it is equally plain that His conception of this Divine attribute was profoundly ethical. Its demands could not be satisfied, as the scribes taught, by the performance of any number of statutes. Nothing but a righteous state of the heart could satisfy them. Jesus taught His disciples to ask for the pardon of their sins, not on the ground of any fulfilment of the Law, any good works of any sort, but simply on the ground, as far as the human side of the pardon is concerned, that they themselves have a forgiving spirit (Mt 6<sup>13</sup>, Mk 11<sup>25</sup>). The ethical character of Jesus' conception of the holiness of God is seen also in His own relation to sinners; for it is clear that His thought of God's relation to sinners was illustrated by His own attitude toward them. Now we are told that He came into personal contact even with the worst of men. He ate with publicans and received harlots, having no fear of defilement from them. He represented God under the figure of a father embracing a son who had wasted his substance in riotous living (Lk 15).

In the thought of Jesus, therefore, the holiness of God did not imply, as with the scribes, that He was far removed from sinful men, being Himself subject to defilement. His holiness is not ritual, but purely ethical. It is that quality or side of His being which makes it incumbent on all men to 'hallow' His name (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>). It is that which defines His character with reference to sin. It is that attribute of God which renders it impossible to trace the origin of evil up to Him. Jesus everywhere assumes that evil originates either in the freewill of man (Mk 3<sup>28-29</sup>), or with a power called the 'devil' (Mt 13<sup>23</sup>) or 'Satan' (Lk 13<sup>16</sup>). It cannot come from God, for He is the one absolutely good Being (Mk 10<sup>18</sup>).

* The story of the experience of Jesus at His baptism is probably to be traced back to Himself. This speaks of a descent of the Spirit and a voice from God. It recalls Is 61, and presupposes the same conception of the Spirit.

The conception of the holiness of God involved in the teaching of Jesus, and perfectly illustrated in His character, is thus seen to have been fundamental in importance and ethical in nature. It has parallels in the OT, as, for example, in Ps 51<sup>6</sup> and Hab 1<sup>13</sup>; but the clearness and intensity with which it is expressed in the Gospels are unique.

3. God is near.—There is a third feature of Jesus' thought of God which, though wholly incidental and subordinate when compared with His revelation of the Divine character, is nevertheless so conspicuous that it helps to mark off the Gospel from the writings of the Old Covenant, and far more noticeably from the views of contemporary Judaism. This is the conception of the nearness or presence of God. To certain extent Jesus shared the thought of His countrymen, and used the current phraseology regarding God's habitation. Thus He spoke of heaven as the throne of God, and the earth as His footstool (Mt 5<sup>34</sup> 23<sup>34</sup>).

The idea of a Divine revelation clothed itself to His mind in the imagery of an open sky, the descent of the Spirit, and a voice out of heaven (Mk 13<sup>11</sup>). But there is no special emphasis in the teaching of Jesus on the thought that heaven is the dwelling-place of God in a peculiar sense. The emphasis is laid on another point, viz. the practical thought of God's nearness. Though His throne is said to be in heaven, He is no 'absentee' God. On the contrary, He is personally present with men. One may meet Him in the inner chamber (Mt 6<sup>6</sup>). He reveals the mysteries of the Kingdom of heaven unto 'babes' (11<sup>25</sup>). He worked in and through Jesus (12<sup>28</sup>), and Jesus said that God would speak in His disciples (10<sup>20</sup>). This statement may well be taken as suggesting the way in which Jesus generally conceived of God's presence with men. It is an inner spiritual nearness, a fact of which the soul takes cognizance, and which is manifested to the world only through the life of the man who realizes it.

But God is present not only with those beings who are capable of communion with Him: He is present also in Nature. He arrays the lily in beauty (Mt 6<sup>28</sup>). He cares for the birds (v. 26), notes the fall of a sparrow (10<sup>29</sup>), and is unceasingly active in works of mercy and kindness (Jn 5<sup>17</sup>). How Jesus pictured to His mind this presence of God in the material world we cannot learn from the Gospels. His belief in this particular, as also in regard to God's presence with men, was probably like that of the Psalmists and Prophets (see, e.g., Ps 28<sup>1</sup> 130<sup>7-12</sup>, Is 40<sup>1</sup> 66<sup>1</sup>), though a more constant and marked element of His teaching. It was, doubtless, a consequence of His religious consciousness of God rather than a product of philosophic thought.

GEORGE HOLLEY GILBERT.

GODS.—The single passage in the Gospels where the word deoi occurs (Jn 10<sup>34</sup>.) affords an excellent example both of the style of Jesus' arguments with His Jewish adversaries and of His attitude to the OT. The phrase, 'I said, Ye are gods,' is a literal quotation of Ps 82 (LXX 81)<sup>6</sup>, and is introduced as such by the word invariably employed for that purpose (ἵνα γερμαίνουσι, cf. γερμαίνας of Mt 48.6.7.10). It is plain that in quoting these words Jesus is arguing after the manner of the well-known argumentum ad hominem, from His use of the personal pronoun 'your,' as well as from His application of the title 'law' to the Psalms (ἐν τῷ νόμῳ ὑμῶν, cf. τὸ δυνάμεις in 8<sup>17</sup>; and for a similar use of the term 'law,' cf. Jn 12<sup>50</sup> 16<sup>25</sup>). It is an appeal to authority, the validity of which His hearers would be the first to recognize. It was impossible for them to escape a conclusion so immediately the outcome of premisses universally accepted as true. At the same time it is an argument a fortiori. If their beloved Law, to which they were constantly appealing, hesitated not to designate as 'gods' (εἰσὶ θεοί) the judges whose partiality and injustice provoked their arraignment by God, and the solemn warning to 'judge the weak and fatherless, do justice to the afflicted and destitute' (Ps 82<sup>1</sup>), surely the charge of blasphemy came badly from those men who recognized in this Law their final court of appeal. His claim to be 'the Son of God,' whom the Father, in a unique sense, both 'sanctified and sent,' could be judged by His works, and it was sufficient to contrast those works which they could daily witness with the works of men whom God designated 'sons of the Most High' (ἱσὶ υἱοὶ θεοῦ, Ps 82<sup>6</sup>).

Jesus in this place seems to adopt the interpretation of this Psalm which is given by the Targum, and which applies the title 'gods' to the earthly judges acting in their capacity as representatives of God. He, moreover, countenances the extension of the term 'Law' to other portions of the OT besides the Pentateuch. This was a common practice in the writings of the Jewish Rabbins, who spoke of 'the threefold Law'—Pentateuch, Prophets, and Histories (Shaloheth, 390). Compare also the Talmudic tractate Sanhedrin, fol. 91, 92, for the question of R. Joshua, 'in what manner is the Resurrection of the dead proved from the Law?' with the answer that it is said in Ps 84<sup>1</sup> 'They shall praise thee'; not 'they have praised thee.' To the same question propounded by R. Chisai the answer is that the Resurrection is proved from Is 63<sup>9</sup> (see Wünsche, Neue Beiträge zur Erläuterung der Evangelien aus Talmud und Midrasch).

There is another explanation current among the Jews which applied the term elohim in this place to the Israelites who stood before Mt. Sinai and received the law (ἔπειτα εἶπεν ὁ θεὸς πρὸς Μωϋσῆν, Jn 10<sup>33</sup>). If, said they, their fathers had not sinned in the matter of the golden calf, they would have been as the angels; they would neither have begotten children nor been subject to death. For this reason it was, according to this interpretation, that the Psalm says, 'they shall die like men' (εἰσὶ ἄνθρωποι), in spite of the fact that they were so marvellously privileged (see the Talmudic tractate Abodah Zarah, fol. 5. 1, quoted in J. Lightfoot's Hor. Heb. et Talm., vol. iii. p. 369).

The evidential value of the whole passage with respect to Jesus' attitude to the OT Scriptures will, to some extent at least, be measured by the nature of the clause, 'the Scripture' cannot be broken.' If it is parenthetical, we have a direct assertion by Jesus that He regarded the OT as containing elements of abiding significance, and, moreover, that its meaning found its final and true explanation in His person and life (cf. Jn 13<sup>35</sup> and Mt 5<sup>18</sup> etc.). On the other hand, it is by no means certain that the clause is of the nature of a parenthesis, and not dependent upon the preceding conditional particle (εἰ). In this case the sense would be 'if the Scripture cannot be broken,' which would have the effect of presenting the argumentum ad hominem in a still stronger and more merciless form. This is again made more forcible by His use of the emphatic pronoun (ὅτι), as if He intended to say, 'How is it possible for you, of all people, in face of the fact that you assert the inviolability of this passage, to find fault with the claims which I have put forward, and to say that I am a blasphemer?' (see Plummer in Cambridge

<sup>6</sup> It is to be noted here that εἰσὶ θεοί does not mean the OT in general, for which the word would be οἱ ἄγιοι, but refers to the particular passage quoted (cf. Jn 20<sup>22</sup> etc.).

Greek Test., and Westcott's Gospel of St. John, ad loc.).

It might be possible for an objector to urge that the whole argument was unworthy of the dignity of its alleged Author, and was too like what His hearers would themselves employ. On the other hand, we know that He did not shrink, at times, from meeting the Jews on their own ground (see art. ACCOMMODATION, p. 19 ff.), and indeed it would seem that He had no option but to do so, if His teaching was ever to penetrate their understandings. Nor did He at any time avoid confounding His adversaries out of their own mouth (cf. Mt 22<sup>6</sup>, Lk 10<sup>34</sup> etc.). At the same time it is evident that there is a profounder significance attaching to the quotation than at first sight appears, and it is in this fact that we have a more certain ground for the estimation in which the OT writings were held by Jesus. Whatever may have been the personal character of those who were designated elohim in the Psalm, they were men unto whom the word of God had come, and who derived their title to be in a sense Divine from the fact that God delegated to them an authority which was His to give, and that He communicated His will through them to the people over whom they were placed.

The phrase ὁ λόγος τῶν θεῶν, occurring as it does in this passage, can hardly have been recorded by the author of the Fourth Gospel without a conscious reference to that Personal Word, about whom he speaks in his Prologue. The Logos, pre-existent and active, was the means by which God was effecting the eternal movement of man towards Himself and of Himself towards man. This movement became finally complete in the union of the Incarnation, when God and man met in an everlasting unity (ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο, Jn 1<sup>14</sup>). Nor was this marvellous synthesis 'sprung upon,' so to speak, the human race. It was being foreshadowed continually in the OT. The prophetic 'Thus saith the Lord' (cf. e.g. Is 38<sup>1</sup>, Jer 19<sup>1</sup>, Hos 4<sup>1</sup> etc.) was the outcome of a consciousness which felt its power to speak and act as God's earthly representative, and the fitness of this claim is vindicated by the oft-repeated assertion, 'The word of the Lord came unto [me]' (cf. Jer 16<sup>1</sup> 10<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>, Is 8<sup>1</sup>, Jl 1<sup>1</sup> etc.; see the emphatic ἤκουσεν in Ezek 1<sup>1</sup>, where the prophet lays stress on the reality of his experience).

The union of God and man accomplished in the 'Word made flesh' was indirectly suggested in the bold words of the Psalmist, 'I said, Ye are elohim,' and it is not difficult to believe that in repeating this expression Jesus had in His mind the realization of this profound idea, and that He desired to disclose it as an accomplished fact to those who had ears to hear and hearts to understand (Mt 13<sup>35</sup>).

GOLD.—1. Value.—The Bible references to gold are in terms of use and abuse, in accordance with the great fundamental truth, 'The gold is mine, saith the Lord of hosts' (Hag 2<sup>8</sup>). Being the most precious of metals, it represents the possession and influence of wealth. It has a central place in the trilogy of life—length of days, riches, and honour (1 Ch 29<sup>1</sup>). It seems to have a purchasing power over the other two—on the one hand in securing the conditions that tend to prolong life (Ps 17<sup>11</sup> 73<sup>12</sup>), and on the other by influencing opinion in favour of its possessors (Mt 19<sup>23</sup>, Ja 2<sup>2</sup>). As the highest quotation of earthly values, it supplies a standard for estimating what surpasses it (Job 28<sup>1</sup>, Ps 119<sup>107</sup>, Ps 34<sup>8</sup> 10<sup>10</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>7</sup>). It is only when, as the most beautiful and precious material available, it is used to give visible form to the Divine glory that gold becomes a thing of worthlessness (Ps 115<sup>4</sup>, Is 31<sup>7</sup> 46<sup>8</sup>). The blindness that led to such idolatrous perversion among the Gentiles (Ac 17<sup>20</sup>) is also found among the Jews (Mt 23<sup>14, 17</sup>).

2. Associated evil.—As the emblem of wealth, gold is closely connected with that covetousness in the will and heart of man which is described as the motive and meeting-place of all idolatries (Col 3<sup>5</sup>). Job can plead that he has not made gold his hope (31<sup>24</sup>). Solomon is commended because he did not make request for riches (1 K 3<sup>1</sup>). The deceitfulness of riches is given as one of the explanations of the unfruitful life (Mt 13<sup>22</sup>). The self-centred ambitions and gratifications of wealth are all against the perception and service of a Kingdom in which even the poor seek the enrichment of other lives (Mk 10<sup>24</sup>; 2 Co 6<sup>10</sup>). The order given to the disciples forbidding them to take gold or silver with them on their journey of proclamation (Mt 10<sup>9</sup>), was not meant as a commendation of poverty for its own sake. Indeed, it was just because money, clothing, and the wayfarer's staff were the often-proved necessities of ordinary travel, that the omission of them in their case would impart to their message about the Kingdom a meaning of instantaneousness and urgency. The guest-law of the land would provide food and shelter for the passing stranger; and where they were asked to prolong their stay, those who were thus interested in their words would attend to their wants.

After playing many parts, such as being a medium of decorative art, a standard of value, and a means of good and evil in society, along with higher uses in the coinage of empires and the representation of the Godhead, gold renders its last symbolic service in providing a pavement for the feet of the saints (Rev 21<sup>3</sup>).

G. M. MACKIE.

GOLDEN RULE.—This name is given to a saying of Jesus recorded in the Sermon on the Mount. In Mt 7<sup>12</sup> its form is fuller and probably more original than in Lk 6<sup>31</sup>. The omission of the sentence, 'for this is the law and the prophets,' by the Gentile Evangelist, is in accord with the purpose of his Gospel; other variations may be due either to changes made in the course of oral transmission, or to divergences in two translations into Greek from the Aramaic. The two versions of the saying are as follows:

Mt 7<sup>12</sup> 'All things therefore whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them: for this is the law and the prophets.'
Lk 6<sup>31</sup> 'And as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise.'

The saying is rightly called a rule, for it lays down a general principle for moral guidance, and furnishes a ready test of the social value of words and deeds. But it presupposes an ideal of social well-being which determines the end of conduct; its function is to prescribe means for the attainment of that end. To the disciples of Christ the coming of the Kingdom of God is the supreme end; for them this saying is, therefore, the golden rule, furnishing a standard of excellence whose practical value consists in its universal applicability. Interpreted in the spirit of Christ, the rule, 'Do as you would be done by,' implies the embodiment in action of the prayer, 'Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth'; they who walk by this rule are doing all that in them lies to bring in the Golden Age. Disparagement of the saying is the result either of failure to fathom the depths of its meaning, or of the rejection of Christ's teaching in regard to the blessedness in which all men's good consists.

The interpretation of the Golden Rule is little, if at all, affected by the connexion of thought. In the two Gospels the context varies. Wendt follows Luke's order, though this necessitates the reference of 'therefore' in Mt 7<sup>12</sup> to Mt 6<sup>33</sup>—the verse which corresponds to Lk 6<sup>30</sup>. On this supposition the word 'therefore' is made to appear superfluous; Zahn rejects it on slight MS authority, because it seems to introduce a summary, which he regards as out of place here (n<sup>o</sup> L. minn. Syn<sup>opt</sup> on. 47). Yet Bengel's pithy comment, 'imitate the Divine goodness,' suggests a natural link with the previous verse: as the Father gives 'good things' to His children in response to the prayer which expresses desire to receive them, so the motive of His children's actions should be a wish that others may share in the enjoyment of those good things from above. Another interpretation which preserves the unity of the Sermon on the Mount is that our Lord followed His encouragement to prayer by the reminder that if prayer is to be heard there must be a good life (Chrysostom). It is equally true, however, that the good life is impossible without prayer; the Father hears us when we ask His help, 'therefore the most difficult duties of unselfish brotherly love to men become possible to us' (Dykes, Manifesto of the King, p. 572). The two views are complementary and not mutually exclusive. If we are doing unto others as Christ would have us do, He assures us that His Father will hear our prayers; on the other hand, if we will pray, He assures us that His Father will bestow the gifts of grace which will enable us to walk in love. In our Lord's farewell discourse there is a similar interdependence of thought. Communion with the Father in Christ's name is a means to an end, even the bearing of much fruit (Jn 15<sup>16</sup>); on the other hand, it is to disciples whose lives are fruitful that the promise of receiving what they ask is given (v. 19).

The Golden Rule is not, as some philosophers have held, a mere law of nature. Nevertheless, at the basis of this contention there lies a truth, well expressed by Wesley: 'It commends itself, as soon as heard, to every man's conscience and understanding; inasmuch that no man can knowingly offend against it, without carrying his condemnation in his own breast' (Sermon, xxx, § 22). Hobbes declares that moral regulations, which he calls 'immutable and eternal laws of nature,' may all be summarized in the simple formula, 'Do not that to another which thou wouldst not have done to thyself.' 'It is clear,' as Sidgwick points out (Hist. of Ethics, p. 167 n.), 'that Hobbes does not distinguish this formula from the well-known "golden rule" of the Gospel,—cf. Leviathan, ch. xv, p. 79, and ch. xvii, p. 85,—whereas the formula above quoted is, of course, the golden rule taken only in its negative application, as prescribing abstinences, not positive services.'

In its negative form the saying is found in both Jewish and pagan sources before the Christian era. Tobias is admonished by his father Tobit to love his brethren, 'and what is displeasing to thyself, that do not unto any other' (To 4<sup>11</sup>). Hillel's concise reply to a Gentile inquirer who asked to be taught the whole Law while standing on one foot, was, 'What is hateful to thee, do not unto thy fellow-man; this is the whole law, the rest is mere commentary' (Bab. Shab. 31a). A saying of Confucius is, 'Do not to others what you would not wish done to yourself' (Legge, Chinese Classics, i. 191 f.). Gibbon (Decline and Fall, liv n.) quotes from a moral treatise of Isocrates, ἡ παράνομος ἐπ' ἐρέβω ἀργίστερόν, ταῦτα τοῖς ἄλλοις μὴ ποιεῖν. The passage occurs in an address (written by Isocrates, a professional writer) of Nicoteles, king of Cyprian Salamis (c. 374 B.C.), to his subjects, dealing with their duties as such (Isocrates, Nicoteles, 61b).

The unique value of the Golden Rule of Jesus does not depend upon its never having been uttered by any earlier teacher in its positive form, but upon its connexion with His revelation of man's chief good. His perfect example of devotion to that good, and His power to inspire and sustain those who, at His bidding, become followers of that which is good. It remains true, however, that there is little evidence of the existence of any pre-Christian parallel to the positive rule. Diogenes Laertius (v. 21) tells us that Aristotle was asked how we should act towards our friends, and replied: 'as we would they should act to us.' The saying is quoted with no context, but a comparison with Nicom. Ethics, ix. 8 fin., is in favour of its genuineness. Prof. Legge, commenting on the assertion that Confucius gave the rule only in a negative form, says: 'but he understood it also in its positive and most comprehensive force, and deplored, on one occasion at least, that he had not himself always attained to taking the initiative in doing to others as he would have them do to him' (Encyc. Brit. vi. 264<sup>a</sup>).

In the Apostolic and post-Apostolic ages the negative form of the rule is more frequent, both in Christian and non-Christian writers. The oldest Christian authority is probably Didache, 1<sup>2</sup>. It is also inserted in the Western text of Ac 15<sup>20-29</sup>, but the source of the variant is uncertain. Zahn refers the addition to the Didache; but, as Rendel Harris says, 'the negative precept turns up everywhere in the early Church, having been absorbed in the first instance from Jewish ethics.' (Cf. Knowling's succinct note on Ac 15<sup>20</sup> in Expos. Gr. Test.). Other examples are Const. Apost. vii. 1; Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. 23, 130; Tertullian, c. Marc. iv. 16. In non-Christian authors the negative form of the rule is found in Philo (Eusebius, Prap. viii. 7. 6). One of the best of the Roman emperors, Alexander Severus, had it inscribed in his palace and on public buildings (Lamprid. c. 51). Westermarck (Origin and Development of the Moral Ideas, I. 693) directs attention to an interesting passage in Epictetus (Fragm. 42): the keeping of slaves is condemned in these words, 'What you avoid suffering yourself, seek not to impose on others.' The rule in its positive form is loosely quoted in Clem. Rom. ad Cor. c. xiii. 'As ye do, so shall it be done unto you . . . as ye are kind, so shall kindness be shown unto you.' Harless (Christian Ethics, p. 110) ascribes to Seneca the saying, 'ab altero expectes alteri quod feceris,'—a suggestive and rare contrast to the Stoic maxim, 'Quod tibi fieri non vis, alteri ne feceris.'

A fair inference from these facts is that the positive form of the Golden Rule has been generally regarded as marking a distinct advance upon the negative form, its ideal of social duty being higher and therefore more difficult to realize. But Professor Hirsch takes the opposite view; in the Jewish Encyclopedia (vi. 229) he says: "'What you would have others do unto you,'" makes self and possible advantages to self the central motive; "what is hateful to you do not unto another" makes the effect upon others the regulating principle.' But how can self-interest be the motive for doing good to thankful and unthankful alike? The positive precept puts 'doing' first, and bids us take thought in doing good; we are to give what would please us, if we were in the place of those whom we are trying to benefit, though it may be quite certain that we shall receive nothing in return. The command of Christ accords with His teaching that they are 'blessed' who do not invite to their feasts those who will probably return the invitation, but those who cannot make such recompense (Lk 14<sup>12</sup>). It is still more difficult to understand how 'doing nothing' to another ensures that our conduct will be regulated by altruistic principles. To do no harm is consistent with extreme selfishness. 'The negative confines us to the region of justice; the positive takes us into the region of generosity or grace, and so embraces both law and prophets' (Bruce, Expos. Gr. Test. in loc.).

A subtle way of obtaining a negative result from the positive precept is mentioned by Schliermacher (Vorstufen, II. 84 f.). One may say in haughty independence, 'What I wish is that others would let me go my own way; therefore, I let them go theirs.' It is rightly said, in reply, that such pride is incompatible with obedience to the command of Jesus. His words, 'whosoever ye would that men should do unto you,' are a recognition of the fact of men's mutual dependence. 'We are members one of another, and our chief danger is not that we should forget our claims on others, but that we should neglect our duties to others; nevertheless there are occasions when our possibilities of doing good to others will be lessened by unwillingness to be served by others.'

A practical difficulty presents itself to the minds of many who desire to walk in accordance with Christ's rule. A king cannot do to his subject what he desires his subject to do to him, nor can a father to his child, nor a master to his servant. But our Lord's command is 'even so do ye unto them.' The narrow interpretation is not only false to the spirit, but also to the letter. The saying of Christ leaves abundant room for good actions which the recipient may be known to be altogether unable to return,—another reason for refusing to see in the positive form of the Golden Rule an appeal to self-interest. The Gr. word used is ōtra, not ra; its meaning is rightly given by Alford (Com. in loc.), 'After the pattern of ōra &c. . . . Because what might suit us might not suit others. We are to think what we should like done to us, and then apply that rule to our dealings with others.' A baldly literal interpretation would miss the beauty of St. Paul's words, when, after enumerating the duties of servants to their masters, he says, 'And, ye masters, do the same things unto them' (Eph 6<sup>9</sup>). The rule for masters and servants alike is 'unto the Lord'; on each side of this and of every human relationship there is opportunity for 'goodwill' and for 'doing the will of God from the heart' (v. 6<sup>a</sup>).

Many modern writers regard the Golden Rule as identical with the ethical maxim of Kant: 'So act as to treat humanity, whether in thine own person or in that of any other, in every case as an end and never as a means only' (cf. Volz in Hastings' D.B. Extra Vol. p. 49<sup>a</sup>; Gore, Sermon on the Mount, III. 1; Loofs, Vorstufen, II. 227). In the language of philosophy, Kant forcefully expresses what is implied in the simpler words of Jesus. Doubtless it is inconsistent with the Golden Rule to expect men for gain or for pleasure; in a word, to have one ideal for ourselves and another for our neighbours. Loofs shows clearly how the universality of the ethical imperative on which Kant so strongly insists is a distinct note in the command of Jesus. He also makes an instructive application of this principle to a concrete case, and shows how vainly partners in guilt try to shelter themselves behind their own parody of this rule. As though mutual agreement could ever be any excuse for collusion in dishonest actions, deceitful evasions, or even immoral pleasures. His reply to those who act on the principle of the German proverb, 'The left hand washes the right, and the right hand washes the left,' is in substance as follows: Jesus does not say, 'Whosoever one of you would that another should do to him, let him do the same to that other.' The rule is universal. There must be no arbitrary limiting of the extension of the term 'men' in the saying, 'Whosoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye also unto them.' A thief and his accomplices may, for the sake of dividing the spoil, wink at each other's crimes; that is what is called honour among thieves. But neither of the accomplices can wish to make the rule of action universal; they cannot desire to be deceived by all men as they have agreed to combine in deceiving others.

In the Golden Rule, John Stuart Mill found a fitting expression of the essential principle of his ethical system. 'To do as you would be done by, and to love your neighbour as yourself, constitutes the ideal perfection of utilitarian morality' (Utilitarianism, p. 323). But when the crucial question is asked: How is the ideal perfection to be attained? the reply is that utility enjoins, 'as the means of making the nearest approach to this ideal,' that (1) 'laws of social arrangements,' and (2) 'education and opinion' should strive to 'establish in the mind of every individual an indissoluble association between his own happiness and the good of the whole' (op. cit. p. 323). But no external force, such as law or education, can supply either the motive for doing as we would be done by, or the power to fulfil the precept we approve. It is true that on the lips of Christ the Golden Rule has its perfect expression; but its superiority as an ethical maxim rests upon a broader basis. It is more to exemplify a rule than to formulate it; it is still more to furnish the inward inspiration which constrains men to obey it. The disciples of Christ have another Golden Rule for their actions one toward another; it is expressed in His words, 'as I have done to you'; and their all-powerful motive is the assurance that 'ye did it unto me' (Mt 23<sup>40</sup>).

will be their abundant reward, if whatsoever they would have done to Christ Himself, even so they do unto men, serving them lowly and lovingly in His name and for His sake.

GOLGOTHA (Γολγοθᾶ, Aram. ܩܠܘܬܐ, Heb. ܩܠܘܬܐ [2 K 9<sup>25</sup>], 'skull').—The name of the place where Jesus was crucified. This name is mentioned by three of the Evangelists (Mt 27<sup>33</sup> 'a place called Golgotha, that is to say, The place of a skull'; Mk 15<sup>22</sup> 'the place Golgotha, which is, being interpreted, The place of a skull'; Jn 19<sup>17</sup> 'the place called The skull, RV). Vulg. uses here the Latin equivalent Calvaria, whence 'Calvary' in A.V.

Three explanations of this name have been suggested: (1) Jerome (Com. in Eph 5<sup>4</sup>) mentions a tradition that Adam was buried at Golgotha, and that at the Crucifixion the drops of Christ's blood fell on his skull and restored him to life. The skull often seen in early pictures of the Crucifixion refers to this. (2) It is supposed by some to have been the place of public execution, where bodies were left unburied (Jerome, Com. in Mt 27<sup>33</sup>), but (a) it is most unlikely that dead men's bones would have been left lying about so near the city, when, according to the Mosaic law, they made any one unclean who touched them; (b) there was no reason why the place should have been named from the skulls rather than from any other parts of skeletons; (c) the expression is κρανίον τόπος, not κρανίου τόπος, as we should expect it to be if this derivation were correct. (3) The most probable view of the origin of the name is suggested by the form of the expression in St. Luke, 'the place which is called The skull.' It was probably so called because of its skull-like contour. The use of the article by the Evangelists seems to indicate that the place was well known, but they never call it a mountain. The Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) speaks of it as monticulus Golgotha, and the expression 'Mount Calvary' appears to have come into use after the 5th century.

The site cannot be identified with certainty. All that we know from the Bible is that it was outside the walls of the city (He 13<sup>13</sup>, Mt 27<sup>33</sup>, Jn 19<sup>13, 17</sup>), that it was nigh to the city (Jn 19<sup>20</sup>), that it was in a conspicuous position (Mk 15<sup>40</sup>, Lk 23<sup>40</sup>), that it was close to some thoroughfare leading from the country (Mt 27<sup>33</sup>, Mk 15<sup>22, 32</sup>, Lk 23<sup>40</sup>), and that it was near a garden and a new tomb hewn out of the rock, belonging to Joseph, a rich man of Arimathea (Jn 19<sup>41</sup>, Mt 27<sup>57, 60</sup>, Mk 15<sup>42, 46</sup>, Lk 23<sup>53</sup>). These particulars are not sufficient to justify a positive decision in favour of any one of the proposed identifications of Golgotha, but they seem to be decisive against the first of the four conjectures mentioned below, to bear against the second slightly, but against the third more heavily, and to be most nearly satisfied by the fourth.

1. The peculiar theory of Fergusson (Essay on the Anc. Topog. of Jerus., and art. 'Jerusalem' in Smith's DB), that Golgotha was on Mount Moriah, and that the mosque of Omar is the church erected by Constantine over the Holy Sepulchre, was quickly shown to be untenable (e.g. by Bonar, art. 'Jerusalem' in Fairbairn's DB).

2. Barclay (City of the Great King, p. 79) and Porter (Kitto's Cycl. of Bib. Lit. art. 'Golgotha') maintained that the site of the Crucifixion was east of the city, between the then existing wall and the Kidron Valley. This place could have been quickly and easily reached from the palace of Pilate and the judgment-hall, which probably stood at the N.W. corner of the Haram area. According to this view, the soldiers, instead of taking their prisoner across the city towards the west, or out in the direction of the Roman road, hurried him through the nearest gate and crucified him near the road leading to Bethany. Two objections are urged against this: (a) that the Gospel narratives imply that the road passing Golgotha was a more frequented thoroughfare than this road to Bethany, and that the great highways of Jerusalem are all on the north and west of the city; and (b) that there is no skull-shaped site in this region.

3. That Golgotha was where the Church of the Holy Sepulchre now stands, seems to have been almost universally believed from the age of Constantine down to the 18th century. It is now agreed on all hands that the present Church of the Holy Sepulchre occupies the site of the one erected by Constantine in A.D. 335. On what grounds did he select this as the true site of the Crucifixion? Those who still believe it to be the true site generally assume not only that the early Christians at Jerusalem had a knowledge of the places where the Lord was crucified and buried, but also that this knowledge was handed down as a reliable tradition through three hundred years, notwithstanding the utter demolition of Jerusalem by Titus and again by Hadrian, and the altering of the whole aspect of the city by the latter when he rebuilt it as a Roman colony and changed its name to Aelia Capitolina. But Eusebius, in describing the discovery of the site by Constantine, says it had been 'given over to forgefulness and oblivion,' and that the Emperor, 'not without a Divine intimation, but moved in spirit by the Saviour Himself,' ordered it to be purified and adorned with splendid buildings.

Such language, certainly, would hardly be appropriate in speaking of a spot well known and definitely marked by long tradition. The Emperor, too, in his letter to Macarius, regards the discovery of 'the token of the Saviour's most sacred passion, which for so long a time had been hidden under ground,' as 'a miracle beyond the capacity of man sufficiently to celebrate or even to comprehend.' The mere removal of obstructions from a well-known spot could hardly have been described as a miracle so stupendous. Indeed, the whole tenor of the language both of Eusebius and Constantine goes to show that the discovery of the Holy Sepulchre was held to be the result, not of a previous knowledge derived from tradition, but of a supernatural interposition and revelation (Robinson, BRP, Boston, 1841, ii. 75).

The same impression is made by the accounts of the writers of the 5th century, who, however, unanimously attribute the discovery not to Constantine, but to his mother Helena. Their story is that, guided by a 'Divine intimation' as to the place, she came to Jerusalem, inquired diligently of the inhabitants, and, after a difficult search, found the sepulchre and beside it three crosses, and also the tablet bearing the inscription of Pilate. At the suggestion of Bishop Macarius, the cross to which the inscription belonged was ascertained by a miracle of healing. The three crosses were presented in succession to a noble lady of Jerusalem who lay sick of an incurable disease. Two of them produced no effect, but the third worked an immediate and perfect cure. Eusebius, though contemporary with the alleged events, makes no mention of the discovery of the cross nor of the agency of Helena. But whether we accept the account of Eusebius or that of the writers of the 5th century, the traditional site of Calvary rests on a miracle, and, in the case of the latter, on a double miracle.

Those who now favour this site (e.g. Sanday, Sac. Sites of the Gospels, pp. 72-77) labour to show that there was a previous tradition which determined Constantine's selection of the spot, but the only proofs they adduce are: (a) vague allusions to visits made by early pilgrims to the 'Holy Places' of Palestine, an expression which is used of the Holy Land at large, and not of the Holy City only; and (b) the alleged regular succession of bishops from the Apostle James to the time of Hadrian, through whom a knowledge of the place might have been handed down. This regular succession of bishops is more than doubtful. The only authority on the subject is Eusebius, who lived two centuries afterwards, and he says expressly that he had been able to find no document respecting them, and wrote only from hearsay. Moreover, even if it were possible to prove the existence of an earlier tradition, its value would be open to serious question, as is shown by the falsity of other traditions which did actually exist in the age of Constantine. For instance, Eusebius in A.D. 315 speaks of pilgrims coming from all parts of the world to behold the fulfilment of prophecy and to pay their adorations on the summit of the Mount of Olivets, where Jesus gave His last charge to His disciples and then ascended into heaven. This is hardly consistent with the explicit statement of St. Luke (24<sup>46, 47</sup>) that 'he led them out until they were over against Bethany, and . . . he parted from them and was carried up into heaven.' Other sites shown to pilgrims in that uncritical age were impossible, such as that of Rephidim in Moab. The Bordeaux Pilgrim places the Transfiguration on Olivet, and the combat of David and Goliath near Jezreel. The fact that no pilgrimages were made to the site of the Holy Sepulchre before the visit of Helena, though they were made in plenty to the summit of Olivet, goes to show that there was no tradition concerning the Holy Sepulchre.

In the present Church of the Holy Sepulchre are shown not only the site of the Sepulchre and the rock of the Crucifixion, with the cleft made by the earthquake and the three holes, five feet apart, in which the three crosses were inserted, but also a great number of other traditional sites. Almost every incident of the Passion and Resurrection is definitely located. The very spots are pointed out where Christ was bound, where He was scourged, where His friends stood afar off during the Crucifixion, where His garments were parted, where His body was anointed, where He appeared to His mother after the Resurrection, and to Mary Magdalene; the rock tombs also of Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea; the place where Helena's throne stood during the 'Invention of the Cross,'—and many others. The number of these identifications, all under one roof, does not increase our confidence in ecclesiastical tradition.

Not less damaging to the claims of the traditional site is the topographical evidence. Our Lord suffered 'without the gate' (He 13<sup>9</sup>). The Church of the Holy Sepulchre lies far within the walls of the present city, and, as Jerusalem at the time of the Crucifixion was much larger than it is now, the fair presumption is that it included the site of that church rather than excluded it. If we place Golgotha at the traditional site, we make Jerusalem at the time of its greatest prosperity no larger than the poverty-stricken town of the present day, 'containing not far from 200 acres, from which 36 acres must be deducted for the Haram area' (Merrill). This difficulty arising from the present location in the heart of the city seems to have been felt as early as the 9th cent., and also in the 12th and 14th, but the first to reject the tradition openly was Korte, who visited Jerusalem in 1738, and who urged that the traditional site could not have been outside the ancient city, because of its nearness to the former area of the Jewish temple. The argument against this site has been greatly strengthened by the determination of the rock levels of Jerusalem and the probable course of the 'second wall' of the three mentioned by Josephus. The first wall, that of David and Solomon, encompassed the Upper City (Zion), and its north line ran eastward from the tower of Hippicus to the wall bounding the temple area. 'The second wall had its beginning from the gate called Gennath, which belonged to the first wall, and encircling only the northern quarter of the city, it extended as far as the Tower Antonia' (BJ v. iv. 2). This wall, which was probably built by Hezekiah, running in a circle or curve, seems to have had no angles like the first and third, and therefore to have required no extended description. If this curve included the Pool of Hezekiah (which must surely have been within the walls), it would naturally have included also the traditional site of the Sepulchre. If, in spite of the statement of Josephus, the wall be drawn with a re-entering angle so as to exclude the traditional site, there still remain apparently insuperable difficulties in the nature of the ground, since in this case the wall must have been built in a deep valley (Tyropœon), and must have been dominated from without by the adjacent knoll on which the Church of the Holy Sepulchre now stands (Acra). But 'fortresses stand on hills, not in deep ravines.' 'The wall must have stood on the high ground' (Conder). Immediately east of the Tower of David (at or near which Hippicus must have stood) a narrow ridge runs north and south, connecting the two hills Zion and Acra and separating the head of the Tyropœon Valley from the valley west of the Jaffa gate. As this is the only place where the wall could have protected the valley on the east and commanded the valley on the west, the natural course for the engineers would have been to build the wall along this ridge. Exactly along this ridge the remains of an ancient wall were found in 1885 by Dr. Merrill. One hundred and twenty feet of it were exposed in a line running north-west and south-east, at a depth of 10 or 12 ft. below the present surface of the ground. At some points but one course of stone remained, at others two, at others three. The stones correspond in size and work to those in the base of the Tower of David, a few yards farther south. This is probably a portion of the second wall. Later, another section, 28 ft. long, of similar work, was found farther north, besides traces at several other points. In explanation of the fact that entire sections are found towards the south and only debris of walls towards the north, Dr. Merrill cites the statement of Josephus, that Titus 'threw down the entire northern portion,' but left the southern standing and placed garrisons in its towers. From the statement that Titus made his attack 'against the central tower of the north wall' he argues further, that if the wall ran from near Hippicus to Antonia, in such a way as to exclude the traditional site of the Sepulchre, the two parts of the wall after it was broken in the middle should have been designated the 'eastern' and 'western'; but Josephus calls them the 'northern' and 'southern,' a description which is obviously more appropriate to a wall which ran wall to the west and north of the traditional site (Presb. and Ref. Rev. iii. p. 646).

Parts of an ancient ditch and remains of walls have been recently discovered east of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and Schick regards these as remains of the second wall and of the city moat. But, as Benzinger says (Hilprecht's Explorations in Bible Lands in the 19th Cent.), his explanation 'is not convincing in itself, and there stand opposed to it important considerations of a general nature,' such as have been cited above, e.g. the military objection to locating a wall in a valley dominated from without by higher ground, and the fact that, had this been the course of the wall, Jerusalem could not have accommodated its great population at the time of Christ.

The existence of an undoubted Jewish tomb at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the one now called the Tomb of Joseph of Arimathea, has been cited as evidence that the place was outside the old city wall, 'but we know from the Talmud that ancient half-forgotten tombs were allowed by the Jews to exist within Jerusalem, and any writer will admit that, in the time of Agrippa at least, this particular tomb was within the circuit of the town.' The third wall, which ran far to the north-west and north of the present city wall, was built by Agrippa only ten or eleven years after the Crucifixion, to enclose a large suburb that had gradually extended beyond the second wall. So that, even if it could be shown that the Sepulchre was outside the second wall, it certainly lay far within the line of the third, and in the midst of this new town which at the time of the Crucifixion must have been already growing north of the second wall. The words 'without the gate' and 'nigh to the city' could scarcely mean 'within the suburbs' (Schaff).

The genuineness of the traditional site has been defended by Chateaubriand (Itinéraire Paris à Jérusalem), Williams (The Holy City), Kraft (Die Topographie Jerusalems), Tischendorf (Reise in den Orient), de Vogüé (Les Églises de la Terre-Sainte), Sepp (Jerusalem), Clermont-Ganneau (L'Authenticité du Saint-Sépulchre), Sanday (Sacred Sites of the Gospels), and others. It has been attacked by Korte (Reise nach dem gelobten Lande), Robinson (B.P. and Bibliotheca Sacra for August and November 1847), Tobler (Golgotha), Wilson (The Lands of the Bible), Barclay (The City of the Great King), Schaff (Through Bible Lands), Conder (Tent Work in Palestine), and others.

4. The theory that Golgotha is the skull-shaped knoll above Jeremiah's grotto, outside the present north wall, near the Damascus gate, was first suggested by Otto Thenius in 1849. A similar view was put forward independently by Fisher Howe (The True Site of Calvary) in 1871. Since that time the theory has come rapidly into favour, and has been accepted by Gen. C. E. Gordon, Sir J. W. Dawson, Dr. Merrill, Dr. Schaff, Col. Conder, and others. It answers all the requirements of the Gospel narratives, being outside the walls, nigh to the city, in a conspicuous position, near a frequented thoroughfare—the main north road, and near to ancient Jewish rock-hewn tombs, one of which was discovered by Conder about 700 ft. west of the knoll. The so-called 'Gordon's Tomb,' about 230 ft. from the summit of the knoll, is thought by Conder to be a Christian tomb of the Byzantine age; but Schick says it 'was originally a rather small rock-cut Jewish tomb, but became afterwards a Christian tomb.' The great cemetery of Jewish times lay north of the city.

Moreover, Jewish tradition regards this hill as the place of public execution, and the Jews still call it 'the Place of Stoning.' Christian tradition also, as old as the 8th cent., fixes this as the place of the stoning of Stephen. The fact that Christ was put to death by the Roman method of crucifixion and not by the Jewish method of stoning does not break the force of this argument, for there is no reason to suppose that Jerusalem had two places of public execution. No other place would have been so convenient to the Romans for this purpose, starting, as they probably did, from Antonia. The castle seems to have been itself a part of the outer ramparts on the north-east, with the north wall of the temple area stretching from it to the east and the second city wall to the north-west. There must have been some feasible route for the soldiers of the garrison, who were constantly going back and forth between this fortress and Caesarea. There was no such route to the east or south. To go west would have taken them through the heart of the crowded city, with its narrow streets and its perils from the mob. What more natural than that there should have been a road leading directly from Antonia to the open country northwards? Here, accordingly, only a short distance north of the city, we find the remains of a Roman road.

'If executions were to take place near the city, I think they must have been carried out on the line of such a road, where the soldiers would have free ground to act upon in case of an emergency, without being hampered by crowded streets, and where only one gate would be between them and their stronghold, and that one entirely under their own control' (Merrill).

GOMORRAH (Γομόρρα, Γομόρρα [fem.] or Γόμορρα [neut.]).—

The word should be fem. in Greek as in Hebrew, but the final α led to its being treated as neut. plural. In the LXX it is fem. 9 times, neut. 5 times, and in 6 passages the gender is indeterminate. In the NT it is fem. in 2 P 2<sup>o</sup> and Mt 10<sup>18</sup> (CD), but neut. in id. (KAB).

The name occurs in the NT in Mt 10<sup>15</sup>, Ro 9<sup>20</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>o</sup>, Jude 7. (In Mk 6<sup>11</sup> it occurs in a sentence wrongly inserted in A and some Lat. MSS, whence it found its way through the TR into the AV). In every case it is coupled with Sodom, as it is invariably in the OT. It is to be noticed, however, that Sodom is mentioned alone in Mt 11<sup>24</sup>, Lk 17<sup>34</sup>, Rev 18. Not only so, but in Lk 10<sup>12</sup>, the parallel passage to Mt 10<sup>15</sup>, Gomorrah is omitted. It seems probable, therefore, that in St. Matthew the insertion of the name is editorial and not original; and, moreover, the text is uncertain; NAB Γομόρρα, C Γομόρρα, D Γομόρρα; again NC insert γῆ before Γομ., while ABD omit it. Our Lord, then, used 'Sodom' (or 'the land of Sodom') alone; in Ro 9<sup>20</sup> the passage is a direct quotation from Is 1<sup>9</sup>; while the OT expression 'Sodom and Gomorrah' is found only in the two late, and closely connected, writings, Jude and 2 Peter.

For the lessons drawn by our Lord from the wickedness and the destruction of Sodom, see art. SODOM. A. H. M'NEILE.

GOOD (ἀγαθός, καλός).—It is not easy to define Christ's idea of what is good. His expressions vary from a conception of the Good as one with the infinitely and inimitably Perfect to the most commonplace uses of the word. He speaks of old wine as 'good' (Lk 5<sup>39</sup>), of the wedding-guests as 'both bad and good' (Mt 22<sup>13</sup>), of salt as 'good' (Mk 9<sup>50</sup> || Lk 14<sup>34</sup>), of certain ground as being 'good' (Mk 4<sup>8</sup> || Lk 8<sup>8</sup>), of God making 'his sun to rise on the evil and on the good' (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>), and He says of Judas, 'Good (καλός) were it for that man if he had not been born' (26<sup>24</sup> || Mk 14<sup>21</sup>). Yet when the young ruler comes to Him with the same conventional usage of the word, 'Good Master (ἀγαθαὶ ἀγαθὲ), what good thing shall I do to inherit eternal life?' (Mk 10<sup>17</sup> || Lk 18<sup>18</sup>; cf. Mt 19<sup>16</sup>), and WH's 'Notes on Select Readings' ad loc., Jesus rejects the title as applied to Himself, and asserts that 'none is good save one, even God.' Whether this be read as 'not denying that He is good, but insisting that none should call Him so who did not believe Him to be God' (Liddon, Exempt. Lect. i. 23), or as 'the self-judgment which felt hurt by the epithet good' (Martineau, Seat of Authority, 651), there can be little doubt that Jesus purposely made use of the young man's phrase to point him to the ideal Good. Behind the things to be done, which were in the questioner's mind,—greater than matters of law or ritual, or even charity,—was the necessity that he should recognize the Supreme Good, the Eternal Spirit of all goodness. This did not imply that man should be hopeless of attaining a certain measure of the good, that it was something beyond the reach of the race, but that the fundamental idea of the good is God, and that to define or limit it is as impossible as to define or limit the Eternal Himself. Only on this occasion does Jesus so suddenly soar beyond the intention of any questioner who approaches Him. Elsewhere He tells a parable, and puts into the mouth of the master of the vineyard (a most human representative of the Heavenly Master) the question, 'Is thine eye evil because I am good?' (Mt 20<sup>19</sup>); and He speaks of 'the good man' who 'out of his good treasure bringeth forth good things' (12<sup>35</sup> || Lk 6<sup>45</sup>). So we may look upon the story of the Rich Young Man as a unique expression of Christ's highest thought of the Good, but not as thereby ruling out all lesser conceptions. A man may begin to do good or to live a good life before he learns that the foundation of all the good he accomplishes or attains to is God Himself; that no ethical aims are good which lack a Divine sanction. It is better for a man when this inward recognition of the Eternal Goodness precedes the active goodness of his life, for then he finds the peculiar secret of St. Paul's dogma (Ro 8<sup>20</sup>), 'All things work together for good to them that love God.' But the doing of good for its own sake may be a man's first step towards the Kingdom of God, and later he will be prepared for any self-denial or self-sacrifice that may bring him nearer the heavenly perfection (Mt 18<sup>3</sup> || Mk 9<sup>35</sup>, 43-47), when he has learned that it is God's Kingdom he approaches and not the invention of his own sympathetic impulses alone.

In line with this thought of Christ's is the liberty in the modes of doing good which He frequently asserted. With Him the present was always the fitting opportunity of the good, though He might occasionally ask the opinion of the Pharisees and scribes as to whether it was 'lawful to do good on the Sabbath' (Mt 12<sup>13</sup> || Mk 3<sup>4</sup>, Lk 6<sup>7</sup>).

Some element of altruism enters into all His conceptions of good. The Greek masters (especially Plato and Aristotle) assert the good of a man to lie in his 'well-being' (Sidgwick's constant rendering of eudaimonia), a condition which depends on certain visible 'goods' that are his own personal possession, and in no way bring him into contact with less fortunate men, such 'good things' as wealth, health, beauty, and intellect. But Christ regards that alone as good which lessens the distance between man and man, and man and God. The good a man should seek is that of each and all men, even 'them that hate you' (Lk 6<sup>27</sup>), for the doing of good to others is the final test of the practical value of religion, and became the distinctive note of the character of Christ in the Apostolic days when He was described as one who 'went about doing good and healing' (Ac 10<sup>38</sup>). This is indicative of all the visible elements of the good in His teachings. Love, His supreme dogma, finds its essence in self-surrender. The parables of conduct, such as the Good Samaritan, are insistent upon the actual doing of some good. When Jesus sends the Baptist His own record, the good things that will bear witness to Him, it is a tale of deeds of brotherly kindness, of help for the blind, lame, lepers, deaf, the poor, and even the dead (Mt 11<sup>4</sup>). Zaccheus is assured of his salvation when he has learned to share with his poorer brethren (Lk 19<sup>9</sup>). The fact of giving is accepted by Christ as the evidence of a desire to do good (Mk 14<sup>7</sup>). The good man is not only devout; his personal piety may be the surest basis for the true spirit of goodness in him; but the good must take form in some actual warring with the world's evils, some earnest attempt to remedy the miseries, sufferings, diseases, afflictions, sorrows, or poverty of men. This is the vital test applied in the great parable of the Judgment (Mt 25<sup>31-46</sup>). The Son of Man there asks no question as to spiritual apprehension, or intellectual convictions, or ecclesiastical obedience. 'The kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world'—from the moment of the birth of mankind—is for those who saw and served the King in brethren who were hungry, thirsty, outcasts, naked, sick, or in prison. Christ sanctions the popular judgment of what constitutes a good man,—that effectiveness in well-doing which moves steadily and lovingly towards the ultimate conquest of the world, that social message of the gospel which is the enthusiasm of true goodness, and is able to 'overcome evil with good' (Ro 12<sup>21</sup>). But all such doing rests on being. It is intimately connected with each man's own spiritual vision and condition, for it is the rudimentary realization of the Kingdom of heaven; it issues from that Kingdom which is 'within' (Lk 17<sup>21</sup>), where 'glory, honour, and peace' are the blessings which come 'to every one that worketh good' (Ro 2<sup>10</sup>)—a Kingdom which a man may never have explored, but which is the ground from which grows all the practical good he does (Mt 12<sup>30</sup>). If the tree is good, the fruit is good (v. 23), and when the whole being of a man is awake to the inflowing of the Divine Goodness, he becomes the more keenly sensitive to Righteousness, Truth, Love, and the Brotherhood, and finds increasingly St. Peter's utterance at the Transfiguration to be his own: 'Lord, it is good for us to be here' (Mt 17<sup>4</sup> || Mk 9<sup>10</sup> || Lk 9<sup>35</sup>). The Good enters imperceptibly; it is not born of the law, nor of any ethical analysis; and in the unexpectedness of its joy the disciple is conscious of having reached the highest heaven, of having found that delight in whatever is good which helps him to understand the true end of life, 'to glorify God and to enjoy Him for ever.'

GOODNESS.—As resignation is the ideal of the Buddhist, and valour of the Mohammedan, so the essence of Christianity is goodness. Its Founder was the absolute personification of this characteristic quality. Nothing short of this could have so inspired the Apostles and Evangelists. Veiled within the few imperishable pages of the Gospels, and perhaps seen only by the meditating mind, is the figure of a perfect goodness once realized upon earth. It is not the novelty of His teaching that has attracted men, nor His deep sympathy with humanity, nor any spiritual utterances to the Father (which are all too rarely recorded). Behind the words and deeds of the four biographies stands a shining personality, a living type of goodness—One of whom they could speak as being 'without sin.' The Evangelists knew nothing of the dogmatic spirit, and could probably have given no clear definition and explanation of the sinlessness of Christ. To them He was the human expression of the Divine Goodness, and it mattered little whether a man should say that the Goodness was from eternity, so that by its nature sin had never been a moment's possibility, or that at birth Christ had been uniquely endowed with a passion for goodness that turned naturally from everything selfish, injurious to others, or sinful either to God or man; or that at His baptism He had been set aside to that brief ministry (which is nearly all men know of His earthly life), when the voice from heaven was heard saying, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased' (Mt 3<sup>17</sup>). However its genesis might be spoken of, the 'sinlessness' of Christ is the utterance of the measure of His goodness as it affected the disciples.

Throughout the Sermon on the Mount they would hear that note of human tenderness blended with unhesitating virtue which constitutes goodness. This alone could be the source of that merciful utterance which is perhaps His only new doctrine—'Love your enemies.'

In His message of the Divine Fatherhood they would behold that goodness sending 'rain upon the just and the unjust' (Mt 5<sup>45</sup>), forgiving the penitent as the father forgives the prodigal son (Lk 15<sup>17-20</sup>), and even forgiving those whose repentance is yet to come (23<sup>34</sup>). Such conceptions would be born of the goodness within Himself, that breathed out in the intense sympathy of the story of the woman taken in sin (Jn 7<sup>53-8<sup>11</sup></sup>), or the defence of Mary Magdalene in the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup>), or in the parable of the Good Samaritan (10<sup>25-35</sup>). The same spirit marks the greater number of the miracles. None could be considered as entirely separated from human interest and influence, and the great majority (thirty-one out of thirty-seven recorded) were wrought openly and intentionally for the good of others. The blind, the deaf, the palsied, the lame, the lepers, the lunatic, the hungry crowd, the timid fishermen, the mourners for the dead,—all shared in the effective power of the innate goodness of our Lord. It was as though, in His purity and sinlessness, the very forces of nature became obedient to His transparent will,—the one will that sin has never overcome, the one luminous purity in which sin has found no vitalizing atmosphere. He had been tried at the beginning of His mission, but the temptations of the desert had ended in triumph. The goodness that was the breath of His being rose instinctively above the low promptings of a selfish wonder-working, or the presumption of pride, or the vanity of power, even though over all the kingdoms of the earth' (Mt 4<sup>1</sup>; Lk 4, Mk 1<sup>3</sup>). He spoke harshly to the Temple, for goodness does not always win by mild passivity against evil. He who knows that God is the beginning and the end of all goodness will waste little time in diplomatic parley with the powers of darkness. Victory will often lie in swift attack. So the goodness of Christ is not lessened by His fierce handling of the money-changers and traders within the Temple (Mt 21<sup>12-13</sup>, Jn 2<sup>13-16</sup>), for He knows that lower ideas of God and goodness will unconsciously prevail if the house of God becomes a place for barter and bargain. It is part of the same zeal that had kept Him about His 'Father's business' in the days of His boyhood (Lk 2<sup>4</sup>), though it takes the more vigorous form we might expect in manhood. The inward knowledge of the simplicity and holiness of His motives makes fear not only impossible, but non-existent; and this is the spirit that inspires every true missionary. He also, as his Master, would show the winning charm of the visibly good—the goodness embodied in a life rather than in doctrines only—that which in Christ could say to the world, 'I am the bread of life' (Jn 6<sup>35-48</sup>), 'I am the way, the truth, and the life' (14<sup>6</sup>), and 'I am the light of the world' (8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>5</sup>), the witness of which is described by St. Paul, when he says that the fruit of the light is in all goodness and righteousness and truth' (Eph 5<sup>9</sup>).

The goodness of Christ brought a new force into Jewish religion, one that changed the nature of it. Judaism was formal, ceremonial, mainly an external worship. Its prophets had striven to kindle it into a moral and spiritual faith. But prophet and priest had stood apart. In Christ the middle wall was broken down, and into the old religion was poured the new spirit. Henceforth religion could not be separate from the moral life. A man could not be unrighteous, an evil-doer, and yet be religious. Goodness became a synonym for true and undefiled religion. For man, having once seen the perfect manhood of the Christ, and felt His power to overcome sin and death, had gained a vision of religion that might perpetuate such a type, and the vision would not lightly fade. Through failures from within and tyrannies from without the Christian would bear witness to his Lord and to his faith, by a life of goodness modelled on that of his Master. This was the highest evidence he could offer of the Divine Incarnation.

GOODWILL.—See COMPLACENCY, p. 356<sup>b</sup>.

GOSPEL.—'Gospel' is the modern form of the Anglo-Saxon word 'godspell,' representing the Greek word εὐαγγέλιον. Formerly it was thought to be the literal translation, meaning 'good-story.' But now it is generally accepted as meaning 'good-story.' εὐαγγέλιον was originally used for 'the reward of good tidings,' and traces of this usage are found in LXX; cf. 2 S 4<sup>10</sup>. But the word came to denote the 'good tidings' themselves; and this is the Christian usage. It may be noted here that Dalman (The Words of Jesus, p. 103) says: 'In the verb ἠγγεῖν, which must be assumed to be the original Aramaic expression, the idea of glad tidings is not so inherent as in the Greek εὐαγγελίζεσθαι. Even in the OT (1 S 4<sup>17</sup>) ἠγγεῖν is used of mournful tidings. . . . It thus appears that the sovereignty of God is the content of a "message" or "tidings," and not without further qualification of "a message of glad tidings." It would seem, however, that the original of the Greek verb εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, as well as the contexts of the word in the Gospels, provide that "further qualification."

1. The source for the Christian usage is found in Isaiah. In 61<sup>1</sup> the prophet describes the function of the Servant of Jahweh (or perhaps his own function) in these words: 'The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek. . . .' The word is εὐαγγελισαῖν. The meek are the exiles in Babylon. Good tidings are announced to them. God is coming to save them, and He is near. It is the acceptable year of the Lord, when He shall deliver His people from their enemies and restore them to their native land. A similar reference occurs in 52<sup>7</sup>. A messenger hastens to Jerusalem, as she sits in the dust of her ruins, bringing 'good tidings.' The exiles are to return to her, and she shall be inhabited again by her long-lost children. These instances exhibit clearly the meaning 'good tidings'; and both are claimed in NT to describe the Christian message. St. Paul quotes Is 62<sup>7</sup> in Ro 10<sup>15</sup>; and Jesus makes Is 61<sup>1</sup> the text for His sermon at Nazareth (Lk 4<sup>18</sup>).

This use of the word by Jesus stamps it at once with its Christian significance. 'He began to say, To-day hath this scripture been fulfilled in your ears.' He claimed to be a preacher of good tidings to the poor. The poor, the captives, the blind, the bruised, are no longer political exiles. They are the bond-servants of sin, those who waited for the consolation of Israel, the poor and outcast to whom Judaism had no message of hope. He is Jahweh's Anointed sent to bring good tidings of great joy to all the people (Lk 2<sup>10</sup>). This description of His mission seems to have endeared itself to the heart of Jesus. He made frequent use of the word, and soon after the rejection in Nazareth He described His Messianic function by it: 'I must preach the good tidings of the kingdom of God to the other cities also; for therefore was I sent' (Lk 4<sup>43</sup>). In particular, Jesus appropriated the name 'gospel' for the contents of His message. This was His description of it from the beginning of His ministry. St. Mark sums up that beginning thus: 'Jesus came into Galilee preaching the gospel of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye and believe in the gospel.' There are many proofs that Jesus used this word 'gospel' to describe His message; cf. Mt 24<sup>14</sup> 29<sup>12</sup>; Mk 1<sup>15</sup> 3<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>29</sup> 13<sup>9</sup>; Lk 7<sup>21</sup> 11. It is not surprising, therefore, that the word came into general Christian use to describe the contents of the preaching of Jesus. All the Synoptics reflect this usage. In Acts and the Epistles it is an established custom. 'The gospel' became the normal Christian title for the message which Jesus came to proclaim, and which He sent forth the Apostles to preach to every creature.

2. But closer examination shows that the term was not used by the Evangelists to describe all that Jesus said; nor was the verb 'preach good tidings' descriptive of all His work. In Mt. this sentence occurs twice: 'Jesus went about in all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness among the people' (4<sup>23</sup> 9<sup>35</sup>). It seems to be an accepted formula summarizing the work of Jesus. It contains three main words—'teaching,' 'preaching,' 'healing.' The same distinctions are noticed elsewhere. St. Luke distinguishes 'teaching' and 'preaching the gospel' (20<sup>1</sup>); and in 9<sup>2</sup> he tells that the Twelve were sent forth 'to preach the kingdom and to heal the sick.' St. Mark does not contrast the two words 'teach' and 'preach the gospel' in the same verse; but in 1<sup>4</sup> 21, he ascribes to Jesus 'preaching the gospel' and 'teaching.' In the latter case the effect produced by His 'teaching' is different from that due to His 'preaching.'

It would seem, therefore, that the work of Jesus was threefold: He preached the gospel, He taught, and He healed. If this distinction is valid, the term 'gospel' did not apply to all that Jesus said and did. It was reserved for the 'good tidings' that He preached. In addition to these 'good tidings,' there was 'teaching' that belonged to another category. Listeners would hardly describe such teaching as Mt 5<sup>13-48</sup> by the title 'good tidings,' nor could the word apply naturally to Mt 10<sup>4-29</sup> 12<sup>21-27</sup> 19<sup>2-12</sup> 21<sup>33-44</sup> 23. 24 11. It seems clear that Jesus distinguished the gospel that He preached from the teaching that accompanied it.

3. What then was implied by the term 'gospel'? It was essentially 'news' or 'tidings.' It was the proclamation of a fact rather than instruction in the art of living well. It was offered to belief, and its acceptance must be preceded by repentance (Mk 1<sup>15</sup>). It is called 'the gospel of God' (in Mk 1<sup>14</sup> RV); the 'gospel of the kingdom' (in Mt 4<sup>23</sup> 9<sup>35</sup> 24<sup>14</sup>). St. Luke uses the compound phrase, 'the gospel of the kingdom of God' (Lk 4<sup>43</sup> 16<sup>16</sup>). These phrases must be studied, and in addition it must be noted that Jesus connected the gospel with His own person.

(a) The phrase 'the gospel of God' indicates a message from God and about God that is good news to men. It is certain that Jesus gave the world a new idea of God; and this gospel of Jesus was the revelation of God as 'our Father in heaven.' He did not discover the category of Fatherhood in its relation to God. This had been done under the Old Covenant. But He invested the idea with such radiance as to make it a new revelation. More specifically, He illumined the Fatherhood of God by teaching 'the infinite value of the human soul.' God is not merely the Father of a people. He is the Father of each individual soul (cf. 'thy Father,' Mt 6<sup>9-12</sup>). His Fatherhood extends to all sorts and conditions of men (Mt 12<sup>30</sup>). In particular, the Father seeks each sinner (Lk 15<sup>11-20</sup>), and welcomes even the prodigal to His home (vv. 11-20). This 'gospel of God' includes, further, the good news to the heavily laden Jew that 'the Father seeketh true worshippers to worship in spirit and in truth' (Jn 4<sup>23</sup>; cf. Mt 11<sup>25</sup>), and that the Father is willing to forgive sins without sacrificial offerings (Mt 9<sup>13</sup>). And when the child of God has entered into this blessed relationship with his Father in heaven, that Father may be trusted implicitly (Mt 6<sup>22-24</sup>). Prayer must be offered to this Father continually (Lk 18<sup>1</sup>). The Lord's Prayer (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>) shows the gospel to be the Fatherhood of God applied to the whole of life; to be an inner union with God's will and God's kingdom, and a joyous certainty of eternal blessings and protection from evil' (Harnack).

The Johannine tradition lays special emphasis upon this Divine Fatherhood in its relation to Jesus; the relation between the Father and His children is referred to in terms of love. Indeed, St. John sums up this aspect of the gospel in the immortal words, 'God is love' (1 Jn 4<sup>8</sup>). Jesus Himself spoke chiefly of love as the duty of man. To love God and to love one's neighbour are the supreme laws for human conduct (Mt 22<sup>37-39</sup>). But by His constant speech about the Father, Jesus taught also God's love to men. This relation of love between God and man has been pointed to as the distinguishing feature of the gospel. Thus Réville writes:

'The Christian gospel is essentially characterized by its declaration that the bond between God and man is one of love. God is the Heavenly Father; man is the son of God; God loves man; man ought to love God; the relation between the principle of the universe and the individual is one of love, in which the two terms subsist. God and man—man not losing himself in God, God not remaining aloof from man—meet in a living communion, so that man's dependence on God should no longer be one of compulsion, but of free and joyful self-consecration, and that the sovereignty of God over man should no more appear a tyranny, but a rule which we love and bless. Such is the distinctive mark of the Christianity of Jesus, differentiating it from the other great religions.'

(b) The phrase 'the gospel of the kingdom' describes the good news brought by Jesus in its relation to that Kingdom of God or of heaven which He proclaimed. It implies that the Kingdom has 'a gospel.' The gospel and the Kingdom are not co-extensive any more than the gospel and God are. But there is good news concerning the Kingdom, and this good news is an essential part of the message of the Kingdom. In brief, this gospel was that the Kingdom of heaven is opened to all believers. The message of Jesus was that the Kingdom was not for select classes or nations, but for all. All Jews were summoned to share it; even the publicans and sinners may come (Mt 21<sup>3</sup>, Mk 2<sup>17</sup>). Nor are Jews alone to walk in its light. All nations must be invited to sit at its hospitable table (Mt 8<sup>11</sup> 23<sup>3</sup>, Mk 13<sup>30</sup>). The conditions of entrance make it accessible to all. It is offered not to the rich or to the wise, but to all who will become as little children (Mt 11<sup>12</sup> 18<sup>17</sup>; Jn 3<sup>3</sup>). Moreover, this Kingdom, which is offered to all, is a far higher good than men dreamed (cf. Mt 13<sup>33</sup> 44-46). It is a spiritual blessedness, infinitely transcending the ceremonial righteousness secured by legalism, and the political supremacy envied by the patriots. The Kingdom, as Jesus preached it, offered the highest conceivable good to all men. It satisfied the religious instincts of the race; and because these are the deepest and most universal instincts, the message that they can be satisfied is indeed 'good news' (cf. Mt 13<sup>17</sup>). Men had never found true satisfaction in the material forms of a ritualistic religion. These were the husks that contained no nourishment for the soul. Jesus preached 'the gospel of the kingdom' when He offered the highest spiritual good to all penitent and humble souls.

(c) But these two forms of the gospel do not exhaust its fullness. The presence of Jesus in the world was itself a gospel. He connected the good tidings with His own person. As the good news Rhoda brought to the praying Church was that Peter himself was at the door (Ac 12<sup>14</sup>), so the presence of Jesus in the world was 'glad tidings of great joy to all people' (Lk 2<sup>10</sup>). This was due to the significance attached by Jesus to Himself. He was the Messiah (Mt 16<sup>16</sup>). His use of the title 'Son of man' implies His special significance for the race. In several of His parables He referred to Himself as the Son of God (Lk 20<sup>13</sup>), as the Judge and King of men (Mt 25<sup>31</sup>), as the bridegroom (Mt 9<sup>10</sup> 25<sup>1</sup>); these and other titles indicate the peculiar value of His person. The interest was not metaphysical but religious. His presence in the world manifested the love of God (Jn 3<sup>17</sup>). It proved that God had not forgotten men, but had come to their help.

In this connexion the significance of Jesus' offer of pardon must be noted. He raised much opposition by claiming 'power on earth to forgive sins' (Mk 2<sup>10</sup>). Nevertheless He exercised the power (Lk 7<sup>40</sup>, Jn 5<sup>24</sup>). There is a close connexion between this 'good news' and the good news about God and about the Kingdom. The barrier between God and the soul is sin. It is sin that hinders enjoyment of the Kingdom. Therefore the best news that men can have is a message of full and free forgiveness for all repentant, trustful souls. And this was the message preached by Jesus. He removed pardon out of the sphere of material sacrifices in the temple, which limited the scope of forgiveness to a few, and He made forgiveness a possible boon for everybody. Thus He opened the way into the Kingdom even to the publicans and sinners.

(d) But the core of this aspect of the gospel is reached only when it is connected definitely with the redemption of Jesus. He was conscious of a profounder mission than preaching the gospel. More than once He gave utterance to words that touch the deepest mysteries of redemption. He came to give His life a ransom (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>). He was the Good Shepherd giving His life for the sheep (Jn 10<sup>11</sup>). He foretold His death and resurrection, directly He had brought His disciples to confess His Messiahship (Mt 16<sup>21</sup>). On the betrayal night in the upper room, He gave the cup, saying, 'This is my blood of the covenant which is shed for many' (Mk 14<sup>24</sup>). It was impossible for Jesus to connect the gospel chiefly with His death, before He was crucified. But it seems unquestionable that He referred to His death as achieving a wonderful deliverance for men in respect of sin. The sacrificial element was not introduced into His life for the first time when He offered Himself to die. 'The Son of man came to minister'; and all through His ministry He was giving Himself up for others. Nevertheless, He looked upon His own death as having a peculiar significance, awful for Himself (cf. Mk 14<sup>22-24</sup>), but blessed for men (Jn 14<sup>27</sup>). It is certain that His followers accepted this interpretation of the cross. At once the death of Jesus, followed as it was by His resurrection, was made the main theme of Apostolic preaching (Ac 2<sup>24</sup> 3<sup>14</sup> 4<sup>10</sup> etc.). So central was this preaching about the death of Christ, that St. Paul identifies 'the gospel' with the message about 'Christ crucified' (I Co 1<sup>17</sup>).

The meaning of the term 'gospel' as used by Jesus may now be summed up. It seems to describe the message He taught concerning—(a) the fatherly nature of God; (b) the inclusiveness and spirituality of the Kingdom; and (c) God's provision for men's deliverance from sin through His own mediation. This gospel was not only the theme of His preaching, but was exemplified continually in His manner of life. He revealed the Father by

His own attitude to men. He illustrated the spirit of the Kingdom by seeking the lost. He mediated the grace of God by His unsparring self-surrender. In particular, He accepted death upon the cross in obedience to the Father's will, in order that thereby the scattered sons of God might be gathered again to their Father (Jn 11<sup>52</sup>).

4. We must return now to the distinction between 'preaching the gospel' and 'teaching.' Much of the teaching of Jesus could not be directly classed under the 'gospel' as sketched above. It was ethical teaching. It rested upon the gospel as its foundation. It appealed ultimately to the nature of God for its sanctions. It was connected with the Kingdom, being the legislation that befitted such a Kingdom of grace. Nevertheless it was an ethical code, intended to guide those who have previously accepted the gospel. The teaching of Jesus is the law-book of the Kingdom. The gospel of Jesus is the manifesto of the Kingdom, explaining its nature and inviting all to become its citizens.

This probably explains the subsequent use of the term 'gospel.' Wonderful as the teaching of Jesus was, the gospel seemed still more marvellous. At any rate, that gospel seemed of first importance. It had to be preached before the teaching of Jesus could follow; and whilst points of contact could be found between the teaching of Jesus and other ethical systems, there was nothing in the world like the gospel of Jesus. And thus the term 'gospel' was most frequently on the lips of the Apostles; and by a natural process it was extended to cover the entire contents of their report of Jesus, including His teaching. All that the Apostles had to tell about Jesus was called 'the gospel.' This usage is reflected in Mk 1<sup>1</sup>, where the word refers to the whole story of Jesus Christ.

5. Two points need a further reference. The gospel brought by Jesus was not entirely new. It had its roots in the past. The preaching of Jesus was in historic continuity with the preaching of the prophets and of the Mosaic law (Mt 5<sup>17</sup>). But that earlier preaching was the faint light of dawn: His words are the strong light of noonday (Jn 8<sup>12</sup>). Hitherto men had only heard rumours of varying trustworthiness; He brought official news that was full and final. Some keen-eyed spirits had caught sight of the Fatherhood of God, as the Alps may be seen from the terrace at Berne on a fine evening. But Jesus led men into the heart of the mountains. The hopes of the nation had hovered for centuries round a kingdom. But only Jesus disclosed the true nature of the shining city of God. Prophets had encouraged lonely exiles with the cry, 'Behold your God cometh!' But it was not until Jesus appeared that one who waited for the consolation of Israel could say, 'Mine eyes have seen thy salvation' (Lk 2<sup>30</sup>). The gospel preached by Jesus gave full substance and final form to the faint and tremulous hopes of centuries. For this reason the gospel must be the unchanging element in the Church's message. Being 'news' about God and the Kingdom, it cannot change until they change.

A distinction has been drawn between the gospel which Jesus preached and His ethical teaching. The Church's teaching of the Christian ethics must be a changing message. It is the application of the principles of Christ's teaching to present circumstances. The Christian ethic of the last generation is out of date in presence of to-day's problems. The Church must study the ethical principles enunciated by Jesus, in order to apply them to modern needs. But whilst the Christian ethic develops and is modified by circumstances, the Christian gospel cannot change. It is good news about facts. It must be stated in modern phraseology, that men may hear it in their own tongue and understand it. But it remains an 'Old, old Story' through all time. If this distinction is remembered, it will explain the confusion that is felt in modern times as to the Church's true function. All are agreed that this is to preach the gospel. But very different views are held as to what is included under the term. In particular, there is an increasing demand for a social gospel, whilst some maintain that the gospel cannot be concerned with social conditions. Probably the term 'gospel' is being used in two senses. As Jesus used it, 'the gospel' is a definite message, distinct from the Christian ethic, and also distinct from the work of healing practised by the Lord. But from Apostolic days onward the term 'gospel' has been used to cover the threefold function—preaching the gospel, teaching the ethic, and healing the sick. In its original and more limited sense, 'gospel' is simply the 'news' brought by Jesus. In its historical and broader sense, 'gospel' is the whole 'God-story': it includes the entire record of Jesus Christ's life and work. Thus used, the term covers the ethic that Jesus Christ taught, and the social service that He practised. In this sense 'gospel' includes all ethical teaching and social service that are in accordance with the mind of the Master. It is open to question, however, whether the Church has not suffered loss by broadening the reference of this word. Jesus used it to describe the 'good news' He brought to the poor and the meek of the earth; and this 'gospel' must ever be the foundation upon which the Church builds, though the foundation is not to be confused with the fabric erected upon it.

6. A brief space must be given to the consideration of the gospel in the rest of NT in so far as it is connected with Christ. In one sense this would involve an exposition of many chapters of Acts and of all the Epistles, for He is 'the head-stone of the corner,' and the gospel is only 'complete in Him.' But all that can be attempted is an indication of the place occupied by Christ in the gospel as preached by the Apostolic Church.

When we pass from the Gospels to the Acts and the Epistles, we are conscious at once of a change of standpoint. In the Gospels, Christ's disciples are a group of learners. They stand beside their Master at the very centre of truth, and they try to follow His gaze as it sweeps the horizon of the love and the kingdom of God. In the Epistles the relative positions are altered. The disciples have become teachers; but they do not stand by their Master's side at the centre. Christ alone is at the centre; the disciples are on the circumference of the circle and are gazing at Him. Their efforts are directed towards the Lord, whom they would persuade everybody to know (Ac 2<sup>28</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>2</sup>). The Lamb is in the midst of the throne, and those who have been gathered into the Kingdom of God worship Him (Rev 5<sup>7</sup>). The Apostles are seeking to obey their Lord's injunction to preach the gospel to every creature (Mk 16<sup>15</sup>). But their interpretation of this command was to urge their hearers to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ (Ac 16<sup>31</sup>).

This identification of 'the gospel' with Christ Himself may be accounted for partly by the experience of the Apostles. They went forth as witnesses (Lk 24<sup>48</sup>), not as philosophers. They had to tell what great things God had done for their souls. They could do this only by talking of Jesus. For He had become to them the mediator of God's redeeming love (Mk 8<sup>3</sup>, Jn 1<sup>14</sup>). They could not be witnesses concerning repentance and remission of sins without filling their lips with the one 'name given among men wherein we must be saved' (Ac 4<sup>12</sup>).

But another point must be considered. The Apostles were commanded to 'preach the gospel.' The instruction had a definite meaning because of their Master's use of the words. Jesus Christ preached the gospel of the fatherly love of God, establishing a Kingdom into which all men might be admitted, and He offered Himself as the authoritative proof of that love (cf. Mk 12<sup>1</sup>, Jn 8<sup>46</sup>). The presence in the world of the Son of man, the Messiah of prophecy, demonstrated God's love in providing for men's deepest needs. Now it is evident that the crucifixion of Jesus shook such a gospel to its foundations. If the life of the Messianic Son of man ended with the cross, His speech about God's fatherly love and a heavenly Kingdom seemed worse than idle talk. How could the gospel preached by Jesus survive His death? Only if He Himself survived His death. To rehabilitate

His gospel, His authority must be rehabilitated. This result was secured by the resurrection of Jesus and by His ascension. When they had seen Him 'alive after His passion,' His disciples were prepared to go and 'preach the gospel to every creature' (Ac 1<sup>8</sup>).

But it is evident also that these events themselves had profound importance. They did more than rehabilitate the authority of Jesus: they brought His own significance for the gospel into clear relief. Such unique events set the personality of Jesus in the heart of the gospel, investing Him with peculiar importance (Ac 2<sup>28-29</sup>, 3<sup>13-15</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>3</sup>, Ro 1<sup>4</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>3</sup>). Although they could not realize at once all that was involved in such events, the Apostles were compelled to take a new attitude to Jesus, and to adopt a fresh theory of His person. He had been their Master; now He becomes 'the Lord.' The primitive Christian community used the term before it was able to construct an adequate Christology. But it called Jesus 'the Lord' because He had sacrificed His life for it, and because its members were convinced that He had been raised from the dead and was then sitting on the right hand of God (Harnack).

The significance of Jesus was decided religiously, though not metaphysically, at once. From the first, Jesus Christ had the religious value of God. Men were exhorted to believe in Him (Ac 2<sup>28</sup>). The final expression of the Apostolic meditation upon the person of the Lord was given by John (Jn 1<sup>1-9</sup>). But in Apostolic thought the gospel could never be preached apart from Jesus Christ, nor could the significance of Jesus Christ be understood apart from the gospel. In Him God's redemptive purposes and the sinner's acceptance of them may meet. Thus He is the central figure in history (Col 1<sup>15-19</sup>). He is at once the Saviour appointed by the Father (Ac 2<sup>22</sup>, Ro 1<sup>3</sup>, Gal 4<sup>4</sup>) and the Head of the redeemed race (1 Co 15<sup>2-4</sup>, Gal 3<sup>2</sup>, Eph 1<sup>22</sup>).

But this conception of the person of Jesus gave a deeper meaning to the great events in His experience which had so affected His disciples. It may be said that the events and the person reacted upon one another. Such events glorified the person; the glorified person deepened the significance of the events. At the first the Crucifixion of Jesus was looked upon as the wicked act of the Jews, which God had frustrated and even turned to His own glory by raising Jesus from the dead (Ac 2<sup>22</sup>, 24<sup>14</sup>, 19<sup>41</sup>, 5<sup>20</sup>). The Resurrection was accepted at once as a proof of Divine Sonship (i.e.). The Ascension not only sealed this proof of Jesus Christ's Messianic dignity, but also exalted Him to a place of sovereignty over the world (Ac 2<sup>28</sup>, 3<sup>21</sup>, 4<sup>12</sup>, 5<sup>20</sup>). But further reflexion upon them invested these unique events with profounder significance. His Death is the means whereby all men may be forgiven and may be reconciled to God—a sacrifice for the sins of the world (Ro 3<sup>25</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>18</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup>). His Resurrection is the earnest of the new life into which all those are introduced who are born anew by faith in Him (Ro 6<sup>4</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>9</sup>). He is the first-fruits of them that sleep; His Resurrection involves the resurrection to eternal life of all in whom He lives (1 Th 4<sup>14-15</sup>, 1 Co 15). His Ascension is the pledge of the glorification of all who are united to Him (Ro 8<sup>29</sup>, Ph 3<sup>20</sup>, 21).

This aspect of the gospel is reflected in the Apostolic preaching. The Apostles 'preached Christ' (1 Co 1<sup>23</sup>). All the sermons in the early chapters of Acts are full of Christ. The Epistles identify the gospel with Him (Ro 1<sup>16</sup>). In particular, the preaching dwelt upon His Crucifixion, His Resurrection, and His Ascension, though the same 'mind' was discerned in the whole story of the Incarnation (Ph 2<sup>o</sup>). It should be remembered that all this reference to 'Christ and him crucified' as 'the gospel,' is shot through and through with Jesus Christ's own message of the love of God in establishing the kingdom. Although the gospel as it was presented by the Apostles assumed a new aspect, becoming a message about Christ who died and rose and ascended to the Father's right hand, this was not intended to divert attention from the fatherly love of God and the Kingdom into which He invited men. But it was only through this message about Christ that such a gospel could be offered authoritatively to the world. Moreover, the gospel was seen in its true glory only when viewed through the medium of Christ's Death and Resurrection and Ascension. Without the interpretation of these events, God's fatherly love was a vague dream, and the heavenly Kingdom was an impossible ideal (1 Jn 4<sup>o</sup> 19, Eph 2<sup>o</sup> 5, 1 P 2<sup>o</sup> 13). Thus Wellhausen, JGZ, p. 386, declares that St. Paul's especial work was to transform the gospel of the Kingdom into the gospel of Jesus Christ, so that the gospel is no longer the prophecy of the coming of the Kingdom, but its actual fulfilment by Jesus Christ. In his view, accordingly, redemption from something in the future has become something which has already happened and is now present. He lays far more emphasis on faith than on hope; he anticipates the sense of future bliss in the present feeling of being God's son; he vanquishes death and already leads the new life on earth. The presence of Christ among men is unceasingly emphasized as the supreme proof of the love of the heavenly Father (Gal 1<sup>o</sup> 24<sup>o</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>o</sup>, Ro 3<sup>o</sup> 11-26, 1 Jn 4<sup>o</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>o</sup> etc.). 'The kingdom' is mentioned frequently as the objective of Christian effort (Ac 8<sup>o</sup> 14<sup>o</sup> 19<sup>o</sup> 20<sup>o</sup> 28<sup>o</sup>, 31, Ro 14<sup>o</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>o</sup> 20, 15<sup>o</sup>, Gal 5<sup>o</sup>, Eph 5<sup>o</sup>, Col 1<sup>o</sup> 4<sup>o</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>o</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>o</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>o</sup> 18, Heb 12<sup>o</sup>, Ja 2<sup>o</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>o</sup>, Rev 1<sup>o</sup> 12<sup>o</sup>); and the ideas of Jesus about the Kingdom are woven into the texture of Apostolic preaching. But the primary interest of the Apostles was to preach the gospel of the Kingdom; and that meant the proclamation of Jesus Christ as the Divinely appointed Saviour, through whom all men may share the privileges of sonship with God.

Finally, it may be pointed out that although the term 'gospel' already in Apostolic times was used in the broader sense with which we are familiar, yet the NT does distinguish the gospel, as a glad message of life and peace that everybody is urged to accept at once, from the ethical teaching that the converts must obey. The 'gospel' is news about God and the Kingdom, which is maintained as true against the older conceptions enshrined in Judaism. The writer to the Hebrews emphasizes the Christian gospel as the fulfilment of the types of the Old Covenant. St. Paul, who was dogged by Judaizers, fought to keep the Christian gospel free from the trammels of Judaic sacramentalism. The NT writers preach the gospel as a message of transcendent importance and of great joy to all people. But they do not rest content with preaching the good news. St. Paul spoke of a 'wisdom of God' which could be taught only to the spiritual (1 Co 2). And most of the Epistles are attempts to explain that 'wisdom,' and to enforce obedience to it, on those who had already become Christians by accepting the gospel.

GOSPELS.—The canonical Gospels (including the Synoptic Problem) are fully discussed in separate articles, so that the scope of this article does not necessarily include more than the subjects indicated in the following outline:

1. Definition of the term 'Gospels.'
2. What brought Gospels, oral or written, into being.
3. Transition from oral to written Gospels.
4. Literary use of the term 'Gospel' in the Pauline Epistles.
5. Source of St. Paul's knowledge of the Gospel story.
6. Evidence of the existence of Gospels, oral or written, when St. Paul wrote.
7. A Gospel is not a Life of Christ.
8. NT use of the term 'Gospel' in the sense of a written document.
9. Principle which guided the Church in her selection of Gospel material.
10. Relation between the canonical Gospels and recent literary discoveries.
11. Discussion of the evidence from Papias as to an original Hebrew Gospel.
12. Other considerations bearing on an original Hebrew Gospel.
13. A possible theory of the Synoptic Gospels.

1. The word 'Gospels' in Christian terminology, and as employed in this article, signifies accounts of the earthly life of our Lord Jesus Christ, of His manifestation in the historical sphere, narratives of His words and works, it being unimportant whether such narratives were delivered by word of mouth or committed to writing.

The term εὐαγγέλιον occurs for the first time, in extant Christian literature, in the well-known passage in Justin Martyr's First Apology, c. 66, where he refers to it as being the usual designation of the Memoirs of the Apostles, εἰς τὴν ἀποστολὴν καὶ τὴν προσηγορίαν τῶν ἀποστόλων ἡμετέριον εὐαγγέλιον, κ.τ.λ. Justin's language here certainly implies that, when he wrote, the term 'Gospels' was in common use in the Christian Church. The phrase τὰς ἀποστολικὰς κείμενας ἀποστολὰς (c. 67) is intended only as a description, intelligible to heathen readers, of the nature and authority of the εὐαγγέλιον.

2. The first question that presents itself is, What was it that called Gospels into being? The answer is to be found in that characteristic of Christianity by which it is distinguished from all other religions, viz., that it concerns the relation of mankind to a Person, not the relation of mankind to a new system of morals or philosophy. Jesus Christ was, of course, a great—we would say the greatest—moral teacher of mankind; yet the Christian consciousness has always felt that what Jesus was, and did, and suffered, has an importance and significance far transcending that which He taught. Christian ethics is derived from and dependent upon the Person of Jesus the Son of God manifested in time. If it be permissible to use in this connexion the metaphor in which the Nicene Creed endeavours to set forth the relation of the Second Person of the Trinity to the First, the ethical teaching of Christ is light generated from light. It is not that Jesus Christ is important and significant to the historian as the originator and promulgator of a singularly lofty code of morals, but rather that in the days of Caesar Augustus, 'the eternal life which was with the Father was manifested unto us' (1 Jn 1<sup>o</sup>); and from that life so manifested certain new commandments of love resulted as a necessary consequence, and 'old commandments which we had from the beginning' (2<sup>o</sup>) awoke into new life, and put on a strength which they had not had before.

Nothing, perhaps, more clearly proves the truth of what has been just said as to the importance in the Christian system of the personal history of Jesus, than the fact that His human origin and His death are treated in the Gospel narrative as having a significance outweighing all else. In the case of all other great men, birth and death, which are universal and inevitable, have for the most part only a chronological importance. But in Apostolic references to the life of Jesus Christ His human ancestry is co-ordinated with His resurrection, e.g. Ro 1<sup>1-4</sup> 'the gospel of God . . . concerning his Son, who was born of the seed of David . . . who was declared to be the Son of God . . . by the resurrection of the dead'; and 2 Ti 2<sup>8</sup> 'Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, of the seed of David, according to my gospel.' Acknowledgment of the Lordship of Jesus, and belief in the historical fact of His resurrection, are declared to have saving efficacy (Ro 10<sup>9</sup>). It is evident, therefore, that a narrative of the main facts in the history of Jesus must have been from the very first the foundation or framework of the preaching of those who propagated His religion. These preachers met inquirers for the way of salvation, not with a recitation of the Saviour's gracious words, but with 'truth embodied in a tale': 'Believe on the Lord Jesus and thou shalt be saved' (Ac 16<sup>31</sup>). A little consideration will make it clear that a proclaiming of the resurrection of One who had been slain entails of necessity an account of who and what manner of man He was, and why He was put to death.

From indications scattered through the Book of the Acts, we gather that an evangelic narrative described Jesus as fulfilling in His lineage, character, and actions the various foreshadowings of Messianic prophecy as hitherto accepted; while the fact that He had suffered, and died, and been raised the third day, was shown to reveal the Messianic character of passages of the OT which had not been hitherto clearly understood. The Resurrection, again, was declared to constitute an authentication by God Himself of the prediction of Jesus that He would come again to judge the living and the dead; and salvation from the terrors of the judgment to come was offered on the conditions of repentance, followed by baptism into the name of Jesus. This is the barest outline of the main features in the first Christian preaching; the accomplishment in Jesus of all that was hoped for in the Christ; His death and resurrection illuminating the dark places of prophecy, and proving the truth of His own claims; judgment; repentance; baptism.

It is scarcely necessary to add that these facts or requirements would be 'recommended to every man's conscience' (2 Co 4<sup>2</sup>) by examples of the wisdom, sublimity, and beauty of the Saviour's moral and spiritual teaching. Of this we have an example in St. Paul's speech at Miletus (Ac 20<sup>25</sup>). In this case the audience was composed of Christian elders; and it may be that a true instinct led the early preachers, in addressing the unconverted, to dwell on the Woes rather than on the Beatitudes. However this may be, the meagre sermon sketches contained in the Book of the Acts do not enable us to make a positive statement as to what the preachers said, beyond what is indicated in the outline given above.

3. We may say, then, that it was the needs of the Christian Church in her natural expansion that first called Gospels into existence. The language of St. Luke (1<sup>1-2</sup>) confirms what we might have otherwise guessed as to the history of the transition from oral to written narratives. Those who had been privileged to be 'eye-witnesses and ministers of the word' ('παροιδῶσαι') to others what they deemed essential in what they had seen and heard in the course of their attendance on their Master, and 'many' of their hearers 'took in hand to draw up narratives' (ἀναρτάσθαι διήγησιν). It may be remarked in passing that St. Paul, who always claimed an authoritative knowledge of the capital events of the Evangelic history, uses the word παροιδῶσαι of his own communications to his converts (1 Co 11<sup>2</sup> = 15<sup>2</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup> 3<sup>2</sup>).

It is impossible to say how early the necessity for written Gospels arose. The expansion of the Church beyond Judaea began possibly immediately after the Pentecostal outpouring of the Holy Spirit; it certainly was in operation after the martyrdom of Stephen (Ac 11<sup>19</sup>). The number of those who could be reckoned as 'eye-witnesses and ministers of the word' cannot have been very great. Even if we make the large assumption that every one of the 120 persons who were gathered together for the election of Matthias (Ac 1<sup>15</sup>), or of the 500 brethren to whom the Lord appeared (1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>), could be so described, and that they were all subsequently engaged in active evangelistic work, yet the labour of spreading the new faith, even within the limits of Palestine, would have soon outgrown their power to cope with it. As far as the original witnesses were concerned, their memory would enable them to tell all that was necessary of the Saviour's life, even as much as is contained in the longest of our present Gospels. Indeed, there can be no doubt that from constant, perhaps daily, repetition of some portion of the story, the recollection of the whole would soon assume a stereotyped form. But as the number of evangelists who had not 'known Christ after the flesh' multiplied in every direction, it would very soon become impossible for the original witnesses even to instruct all those who were to teach others. To meet this imperative and growing need—the instruction of preachers—was, we may well believe, one of the objects with which the narratives alluded to by St. Luke in his preface were first drawn up. It is natural to suppose that at first such narratives were used to refresh the memory of the evangelists; afterwards, when the first generation of believers had quite passed away, the written Gospels would be openly read, as being the most authentic account of what the original witnesses had seen and heard.

Dr. Salmon is of opinion that even before the Crucifixion some of our Lord's discourses, or portions of them, had been committed to writing. Without going so far as this, it is scarcely open to reasonable doubt that written Gospels of some sort were in circulation well within the period covered by the Acts of the Apostles. In order the better to see this, we shall examine the evidence supplied by the Epistles of St. Paul. His writings, from their extent and the comparative certainty with which they can be dated, afford the most satisfactory grounds on which to base a conclusion.

4. It is obvious that the question when the word εὐγγέλιον was first used in the sense in which we use it when we speak of the 'Gospel according to St. Matthew,' is quite distinct from the question as to when such written narratives first appeared and received any degree of public recognition. The first step towards what may be called the literary use of the term εὐγγέλιον is to be found in passages where the word is used, not of the 'good news' itself, but in the sense of someone's presentation of it.

1 Th 1<sup>5</sup> 'Our gospel came not unto you in word only.'

2 Th 2<sup>14</sup> 'God called you [unto salvation] through our gospel.'

Gal 1<sup>11</sup> 'The gospel which was preached by me . . . is not after man.'

Gal 2<sup>2</sup> 'I laid before them the gospel which I preach among the Gentiles.'

Ro 2<sup>16</sup> 'God shall judge the secrets of men, according to my gospel, by Jesus Christ.'

1 Co 15<sup>11</sup> 'I make known unto you . . . the gospel which I preached unto you . . . in what words I preached it unto you.'

2 Ti 2<sup>8</sup> 'Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, of the seed of David, according to my gospel.'

In these instances, certainly in most of them, the word 'gospel' means not so much St. Paul's manner or method of presenting the good news of salvation to his hearers, as the actual substance of what he said. It is true that the substance of what any preacher of the gospel would say would include more than a narrative without comment, such as is one of the Synoptic Gospels; yet St. Paul's gospel evidently did contain some merely historical matter. This point will come up for consideration later. Here it is sufficient to say that the above instances of St. Paul's use of the word 'gospel' as meaning the substance of his evangelic preaching, would naturally suggest the application of the term to a narrative embodying all that it was necessary to know of the life of Jesus Christ as a means of salvation. So much was, no doubt, claimed by their compilers for the short narratives which St. Luke's Gospel was intended to supersede; much more may it be claimed for any one of the four Gospels which have come down to us.

B. An interesting question now arises, What was the content of the Gospel presented by St. Paul to the Churches which he evangelized? and what was its relation to our existing Gospels, or any of them? It ought to be unnecessary to remark that in an examination of the Pauline Epistles for the purpose of this question, any inference drawn from silence is peculiarly precarious. It is as unreasonable to expect to find Gospel material in St. Paul's letters as it would be to find it in the letters of a pastor or bishop of our own day. Paradoxical as it may at first seem, it is probably none the less true that the Churches to which St. Paul wrote had a more intimate and living acquaintance with the facts of the Gospel history than is usual with Christians in our own day. Every member of those Churches had been recently converted from either heathenism or Judaism. Consequently the interest they felt in their newly-acquired faith was fresh and absorbing; and the Apostle writes as though the main facts of the Gospel history were familiar to his readers. He is able to appeal in the most natural way to their knowledge of the character of Jesus, e.g. Ro 15<sup>3</sup> 'Christ pleased not himself'; 2 Co 8<sup>9</sup> 'Though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor'; and 2 Co 10<sup>1</sup> 'I . . . intreat you by the meekness (ὡς ἄνθρωπος) and gentleness of Christ.' It would doubtless be impossible to prove that St. Paul had in mind recorded sentiments of Christ similar to, or identical with, 'The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister' (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>); 'The Son of Man hath not where to lay his head' (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>, Lk 9<sup>58</sup>); 'I am meek (ἡραπεία) and lowly in heart' (Mt 11<sup>29</sup>). But it may be safely affirmed that there was in those to whom St. Paul wrote a knowledge of deeds and words of Christ that made the Apostle's appeal intelligible.

What then was the source of St. Paul's knowledge of the Gospel narrative? To many, perhaps most, Christians this question may appear superfluous, in view of the Apostle's own explicit statements; Gal 1<sup>11</sup> 'The gospel which was preached by me . . . came to me through revelation of Jesus Christ,' and 1 Co 11<sup>28</sup> 'I received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you.' Even if we grant, what is likely enough, that the passage from Galatians refers to St. Paul's favourite doctrines, yet his language to the Corinthians seems to imply that his knowledge of an objective historical circumstance came to him in a miraculous manner. The present writer has no desire to minimize the miraculous element in the NT narrative, or to call in question the reality of St. Paul's visions; but in this case an explanation can be given of the expression 'I received of the Lord' which will both satisfy the requirements of St. Paul's language and also take the matter out of the region of subjective visions, and so render the statement historically intelligible and verifiable. The question is, What would one of St. Paul's contemporary fellow-Christians have understood by 'I received of the Lord'? The answer is supplied by parallel phrases in the Book of the Acts, and by what we learn from that book and other sources as to the ministry of prophets in the Apostolic Church. When we read (Ac 13<sup>3</sup>), 'The Holy Ghost said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul,' etc., and again, (16<sup>7</sup>) 'The Spirit of Jesus suffered them not,' it is natural to ask, How did the Holy Ghost speak? and how did the Spirit of Jesus control the movements of St. Paul and his company? It was through the utterance of an accredited prophet, or number of prophets, in either case. This is placed beyond doubt by an instance given later (21<sup>10</sup>), where a prophet, Agabus, begins his prediction with, 'Thus saith the Holy Ghost' (cf. 20<sup>23</sup> 'The Holy Ghost testifieth unto me in every city'). We see, then, that Ac 13<sup>3</sup> means that the separation of Paul and Barnabas was in consequence of an utterance of the prophets, or one of them, who are mentioned in the previous verse; while in 16<sup>7</sup> it was an utterance of St. Paul, if not of Paul himself (see Ac 13<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>27</sup>), that forbade the missionaries to cross the frontier of Bithynia.

We are now enabled to understand 'I received of the Lord' (1 Co 11<sup>28</sup>) in the same sense as we interpret 'The Spirit of Jesus suffered them not.' St. Paul did not really mean that his knowledge of the Gospel history had been acquired without human intervention, nor can he have intended his readers so to understand him. What he meant to convey was that he was convinced that the evangelist, or the source whence he derived his information, was indeed inspired by the Spirit of Jesus.

The alternative—evangelist, or source—has been purposely suggested, in order to leave it an open question, as, indeed, with our scanty information it must remain, whether St. Paul derived his knowledge of our Lord's life from oral teaching or from a written document. At the time of his conversion there was a Christian community of some importance at Damascus; and it is probable in the highest degree that the Church there had the advantage of hearing the story of Jesus from one of those who had accompanied with Him during His ministry. On the other hand, St. Paul's own statement (Gal 1<sup>18, 17</sup>), 'I conferred not with flesh and blood . . . I went away into Arabia,' suggests a retirement for solitary study, meditation, and prayer. There does not seem any extreme improbability in supposing that even at that early date there was in circulation a Gospel narrative in Aramaic, or even in Greek. In any case, it is unreasonable to question that Saul the persecutor needed some instruction or study before he could 'proclaim Jesus, that he is the Son of God.'

It cannot be denied, however, that the language of the heavenly vision (Ac 26<sup>14</sup>), 'It is hard for thee to kick against the goad,' points most naturally to a long previous struggle between prejudices inborn and trained and the strange attractiveness of Jesus of Nazareth, whose glorious deeds and gracious words may have become known to the young Pharisee when he first arrived in Jerusalem from Tarsus. For him the gospel was a thing to which he could not be indifferent. It was either an execrable heresy or the only way of salvation. All that he had learnt from man urged him to 'crush it, like a vine of blood, upon the threshold of the mind' (In Memoriam, ii.); the preventing grace of God bade him 'embrace it as his natural good.'

All that we can certainly state with regard to the Gospel story known to St. Paul, however he acquired his knowledge, is that his allusions to it, direct and indirect, 'proceed,' to use Paley's phrase (Evidences, i. 7), 'upon the general story which our Scriptures contain'; while it certainly was not identical with any of the four we now possess. This latter point is proved by the enumeration in 1 Co 15 of the appearances of the risen Lord. Of the five appearances there mentioned, two, namely that to James and that to 500 brethren, are not mentioned in the canonical Gospels. It is to be noted, as possibly significant, that the appearance to James was recorded in the Gospel according to the Hebrews (Jerome, de Vir. illustr. c. 2).

6. It would be irrelevant to the purposes of this article to call attention to any correspondences between the Pauline Epistles and our present Gospels other than those that are historical or literary. It would lead us too far afield to discuss St. Paul's Christology, and to inquire how far it was based on extant recorded statements of Jesus about Himself, how far on OT and subsequent Messianic conceptions, and how far on what we may for convenience call the Johannine theology, which, as distinct from its Johannine expression, seems to have existed in the Church from the beginning.

The faithfulness of God to His promise that the Christ should be not only of the seed of Abraham, but also of the lineage of David, is as markedly emphasized by St. Paul as it is in the Gospels: Ro 15<sup>8</sup> 'Christ hath been made a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, that he might confirm the promises given unto the fathers'; words which echo those of Zacharias (Lk 174-79); Ro 15 'Born of the seed of David according to the flesh'; 2 Ti 2<sup>8</sup> 'Of the seed of David, according to my gospel.'

There is no explicit reference to the Virgin-birth in the Pauline Epistles. The expressions 'born of a woman' (Gal 4) and 'the childbearing' (1 Ti 210) refer, the former probably, the latter possibly, to 'the seed of the woman' (Gen 310).

The account of the institution of the Lord's Supper, which St. Paul 'received of the Lord' (1 Co 1123-25), alludes to the betrayal of the Lord Jesus, and otherwise approximates most closely to that given by St. Luke, who possibly in a second edition of his Gospel revised his account in accordance with information received from St. Paul. In the previous chapter (1 Co 1010) and in 14<sup>8</sup> we have allusion to the words of Institution which have always been used in the blessing of the bread and wine.

St. Paul's references to the death of Christ are for the most part doctrinal, not historical. He insists on its voluntary character: 'He gave himself for our sins' (Gal 1<sup>4</sup>, cf. 2<sup>20</sup>, Eph 5<sup>2</sup>, Tit 214). The words of Jesus, extant only in Mt 20<sup>28</sup> 'The Son of man came . . . to give his life a ransom for many,' seem to underlie these passages, as well as those in which the death of Jesus is spoken of as an atonement or ransom (Gal 31<sup>10</sup>, Ro 2<sup>8</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>6</sup>, Tit 214). Of course the sacrificial aspect of Christ's death is also strongly emphasized in His own words when instituting the Supper.

It cannot perhaps be certainly affirmed that Col 313 'Even as the Lord forgave you, so also do ye' (cf. Eph 4<sup>32</sup>), was suggested by the sentiment of 'Father, forgive them' (Lk 2334), for the verb is different, Lk. having ἀφίεναι, Col. and Eph. χαρίζεσθαι. Nor can we base any argument on the statement in 1 Ti 214 that 'the Jews killed the Lord Jesus' (see Ac 313). There remains one definite historical allusion, 1 Ti 618 'Christ Jesus, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed the good confession.' Our Lord's answer, 'Thou sayest' (i.e. 'yes'), to Pilate's question, 'Art thou the king of the Jews?' which is the only confession before Pontius Pilate reported in the Synoptic Gospels, hardly satisfies, important though it is, the requirements of St. Paul's solemn adjuration.

The proclamation by Jesus before Pilate of the nature of His Kingdom, and that He had come for the sole purpose of bearing witness unto the truth, which is recorded in the Fourth Gospel, is indeed a 'good confession'; and we must remember that although St. John did not commit his Gospel to writing until long after the death of St. Paul, yet, unless we are prepared to assert that it is a work of fiction, it seems unreasonable to question that the circumstances recorded in it, or some of them, were known to St. Paul. The omission in the Synoptic Gospels of the substance of 'the good confession' of which we are speaking is not more remarkable than their silence as to the appearance of the risen Lord to James and to '500 brethren at once.'

Passing on now to allusions by St. Paul to the moral and spiritual teaching of Jesus, there are only two explicit references to sayings found in our present Gospels. These are: (1) 1 Co 710 'But unto the married I give charge, ye not I, but the Lord, That the wife depart not from her husband (and if she depart, let her remain unmarried, or else be reconciled to her husband); and that the husband love not his wife.' Our Lord's general prohibition of divorce is found in all three Synoptics; but the prohibition of divorce of her husband by a wife, of which, or its equivalent, St. Paul here chiefly speaks, is found only in Mk 1012. It is conceivable that the prohibition was omitted by Mt. and Lk. either as unnecessary, such divorce being almost unheard of, or as implied in our Lord's declaration that marriage, generally speaking, is indissoluble. (2) 1 Co 914 'The Lord ordained that they which proclaim the gospel should live of the gospel.' The reference is to 'The labourer is worthy of his food' (Mt 1010), or, more probably, to the form preserved by St. Luke (107), in which 'hire' is substituted for 'food.' That the reference is to the latter form is almost certain from the fact that the saying is given in 1 Ti 518 exactly as in Lk 107. The natural sense of 1 Ti 518 is that the saying in question was already 'Scripture' in the same sense as was the quotation from De. with which it is coupled. This view does not involve the assumption that St. Luke's Gospel was then not only in circulation but also received as authoritative by the Church; it merely affirms that the saying was contained in some authoritative narrative of the life of Jesus, or some collection of His sayings.

The passages which speak of Christ as Judge at the Last Day (Ro 214, 1 Co 45, 2 Co 510), accompanied by angels (1 Th 416, 2 Th 17), and executing His will with fire (1 Co 313-14, 2 Th 14), and that which states, as matter of common knowledge, that 'the saints shall judge the world' (1 Co 62), can none of them be necessarily referred to the words and parables of Christ in the Gospels, which affirm the same things, inasmuch as these eschatological conceptions were part of the current Messianic ideas, and may all of them be derived from Dan 7. There are, however, two details which cannot be referred to that source: (1) that the coming of Christ to judge would be heralded by the sound of a trumpet (1 Th 416, 1 Co 1552), and (2) that it would be sudden and unlooked for (1 Th 52). The wording of this latter passage is remarkable: 'Yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night.' The only place in our present Gospels where the judgment trumpet is mentioned is Mt 242, and in v. 4 of the same chapter we have the illustration of the thief's unexpected and unsuspected attack.

There are, in conclusion, a number of passages in which it is difficult not to see references to recorded sayings of Christ. Ro 127 'Render (ἀποδοτε) to all their dues,' etc. See Mt 222, Mk 1217, Lk 2028 'Render unto Caesar,' etc. (ἀποδοτε), Gal 514, Ro 139 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself,' quoted as a summary of the second table of the Law. See Mt 228.

Ro 1414 'I know, and am persuaded in the Lord Jesus, that nothing is unclean of itself, based on our Lord's teaching in Mt 1511, more distinctly brought out in Mk 715-19.

Ro 1611 'I would have you wise (σοφους) unto that which is good, and simple (ἀπλοους) unto that which is evil.' See Mt 1019 'Be ye therefore wise (σοφισθητε) as serpents, and harmless (ἀβλαβητοι) as doves.'

1 Co 67 'When deprecating litigiousness, 'Why not rather take wrong, be defrauded?' See Mt 528-30, Lk 628-30.

1 Co 711 'It is good for a man not to touch a woman.' This private opinion, or preferred sentiment, of St. Paul's, is in agreement with that remarkable saying preserved only by St. Matthew (2418), 'There are eunuchs, which made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He that is able to receive it, let him receive it.' The caution with which our Lord prefaces this saying, 'All men cannot receive this saying, but they to whom it is given, finds also an echo in St. Paul's conclusion: 'Howbeit each man hath his own gift from God,' etc.

1 Co 87 'I have a stewardship intrusted to me.' See Lk 1242 'Who then is the faithful and wise steward?' etc.

1 Co 1218 'If I have all faith, so as to remove mountains.' See Mt 1720-21 = Mk 1118.

Col 128 'The gospel . . . which was preached in all creation' (ἡ κηρυχθῆσα). See Mk 1615 'Preach the gospel to the whole creation' (κηρυξτε εἰς ὅλην τὴν κτίσιν).

The meagreness of historical material contained in these references to Jesus, His acts and sayings, which are to be found in the Epistles of St. Paul, will cease to surprise us when we compare them with the baldness of the Creeds of the Church, even of the Constantinopolitan.

7. The truth is that we have been hitherto misled by the 'Lives of Christ' which have from time to time appeared. The assumption that underlies an attempt to write the Life of any one is that it is possible to give an account not only of his birth and death, but to arrange in some orderly chronological sequence the movements of his life, using the term 'movement' in its most comprehensive signification. This it is well nigh impossible to do in the case of our Lord's earthly ministry. Between the age of twelve years and His death the only events which really mark intervals are, His baptism by John, the Temptation, and the Transfiguration. It is true that the Fourth Gospel notes the Passovers which took place during our Lord's ministry; but it cannot be said that any of the attempts to arrange the circumstances and discourses recorded in the Synoptics so as to fit in with St. John's notes of time have been such as to compel belief. Moreover, although conclusions based on internal evidence must always be more or less precarious, yet there are instances of sayings of Jesus which have an early place in the Synoptic record, but which from their tone it is difficult to assign to an early stage of our Lord's ministry.

A Gospel, in fact, is not a biography. What are of saving efficacy in the events of our Lord's life are His birth, death, and resurrection. The fact that 'He went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil' (Ac 1038), and that His example and His moral and spiritual discourses threw a new light on the relations of men to God and to one another, this too is of great importance; but there is not any practical significance whatever in the order in which this or that miracle was performed, or this or that discourse spoken. It is not likely that the Apostolic preachers dwelt more on the historical sequence of the works and words of Jesus than do those in modern times; and in consequence, speaking generally, such sequence would be disregarded, even by original witnesses. The events of any one memorable day might be remembered and repeated exactly in the order in which they had occurred; and thus we have, no doubt, in Mk 1 an account of the incidents that were indelibly impressed on Peter's mind in connexion with the day on which he finally left all and followed Jesus.

8. We are now ready to discuss the question, Is there any instance in the NT of the term 'Gospel' applied to a written document? There are perhaps two such cases.

Before citing them, it may be well to premise, (1) that they were written at a time when there must have been written accounts of some sort of our Lord's words and works, and when the term 'Gospel' was unquestionably applied to oral narratives of the life of Jesus; and also (2) that in Ignatius (Phil. 5) 'the Gospel' is quite naturally applied to the Evangelic story, and, being co-ordinated with 'the Apostles' and 'the Prophets,' implies that the story was written.

The passages are: Mk 1<sup>1</sup> 'The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God'; and Rev 14<sup>1</sup> 'I saw another angel flying in mid heaven, having an eternal gospel to proclaim unto them that dwell on the earth.' However visions are to be explained, they are essentially pictures, seen by the eye before they are interpreted by the mind. This picture of the angel 'having an eternal gospel' plausibly suggests a figure with a scroll or roll in his hand.

The opening clause of St. Mark's Gospel has indeed been explained as parallel to Ph 4<sup>15</sup>, where 'the beginning of the gospel is relative to the person apprehending it' (Grimm-Thayer), as though it referred to the preaching of John the Baptist. This interpretation seems to the present writer far-fetched. It is surely more natural to take it as the title of the book, and, as Dr. Salmon thinks, modelled on Hos 1<sup>2</sup> 'Ἀρχὴ λόγου Κυρίου ἐν Ὀρῆ. It is not easy to give reasons why a considerable interval should elapse between the application of the term 'Gospel' to an oral narrative, and to the same narrative when committed to writing. It may be fairly asked, How would the writer of the Second Gospel have been likely to describe his work? It is not probable that St. Mark's Gospel, as we have it, was actually the first narrative drawn up. Nor can it be fairly said that the language of St. Luke, in his preface, proves that he was unacquainted with the term 'Gospel' in the sense of a document. The use of a Christian technical term would have seemed to St. Luke out of place in a section in which he was carefully using what he deemed his best literary style.

9. What has been said in explanation of St. Paul's statement that his knowledge of Gospel facts had been received from the Lord, i.e. from a man inspired by the Lord, a prophet-evangelist, suggests the answer to the question, How did the Church recognize the inspiration of the narratives which she finally, and at a very early date, acquiesced in as authoritative Gospels? It was through the double and almost simultaneous action of the original Evangelist or Evangelists, and the judgment of the Church on the sections of the Gospel story delivered on successive Lord's Days, both directed and suggested and controlled by the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of Jesus.

It is the intention of the writer of the present article to deal with this subject from the standpoint of the Christian Church to a greater degree than is usual now among critical writers. The indignant remonstrance of St. Paul to the individualistic Corinthians has a certain relevance to some modern exponents of early Christian literature: 'What? was it from you that the word of God went forth? or came it unto you alone?' (1 Co 14<sup>19</sup>). One sometimes hears or reads discussions on Christian literature which indicate that for the speaker or writer the Christian Church has no existence. The collection of writings which we call the NT is treated as though it were a fortuitous collection, the selection of which was determined arbitrarily, or at least on principles which have now no claim to respect; as though Christianity were merely a matter of literary or antiquarian interest, so that some new discovery might change our whole conception of Christ's work and words, or alter the value of the Gospels already received. Now the existence of the Christian Church during the first centuries of our era is a fact; a fact the recognition of which has no connexion with any special views we may hold as to what ought to be the constitution or organization of the Church in our own times. It is surely unphilosophical to ignore a fact which was admittedly one of transcendent importance to the first Christians. The Gospels, as we have them now, are a product of the Church of Apostolic and Apostolic times. It is, to say the least, conceivable that some principle determined the Church in her final selection of Gospels; and any suggestion as to what that principle was cannot be without interest, even if it fails to compel assent.

It may be proper to remark, by way of caution, that an inference into the principle or principles by which the Church was guided in her selection of authoritative Gospels is not precluded by any theory of inspiration. Even if we hold that the sacred books only are inspired, and that the Church was not inspired, or guided by the Holy Spirit, in her choice of them, the question must arise, How did the Church recognize the inspiration of the books?

'As the Father hath sent me, even so send I you' (Jn 20<sup>21</sup>). These words of the risen Lord express the idea that the Church is the representative of Christ on earth, and that, as 'in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily' (Col 2<sup>9</sup>), so is the Church His body, a body not only quickened by His life, but indwelt by His mind: 'We have the mind of Christ' (1 Co 2<sup>16</sup>). In the context immediately preceding this quotation, St. Paul claims for those who have this mind the possession of a special critical sense, a faculty of discernment in spiritual matters; and other passages exhibit the practical operation of this critical sense, as it may be termed, e.g. 1 Co 14<sup>29</sup> 'Let the prophets speak by two or three, and let the others discern,' and v. 37 'If any man thinketh himself to be a prophet, or spiritual, let him take knowledge of the things which I write unto you, that they are the commandments of the Lord.' This special sense was formed by those who had been 'from the beginning eye-witnesses and ministers of the word.' Their reports of what their Master had done and said, the conditions in which He worked, the tone and temper of His utterances, formed a standard by which it was possible to decide the claims to genuineness of stories told about Him. There is really nothing fanciful in this: it only supposes the Apostolic Church, or at least the leading members of it, to have had the same sort of sense of discernment which is undoubtedly possessed by good critics in other departments of literature. The very best attempts to imitate the style of a great poet or prose writer ring false in the ear of one who knows.

But not only did the Church, thinking through the accredited teachers 'who had the spirit,' or if it be preferred, the sanctified 'common sense of most,' determine which were the Gospels inspired by God; but also their form—at least so far as the Synoptics are concerned—was in all probability determined by the use made of them in the weekly Church assemblies. This use must have obtained from the very earliest times at which meetings were held for distinctively Christian worship. We cannot otherwise account for the familiarity on the part of his readers with the general tenor of the Evangelic story which is assumed by St. Paul in his Epistles.

In Justin Martyr's time (Apol. i. c. 67) the established custom was that two lessons were read, one from the Prophets, another from the Gospels. We cannot press Justin's language too closely, so as to exclude from public reading the non-Prophetic parts of the OT, or the Apostolic Epistles. We must remember that his intention was to give heathens a general idea as to the nature of the Christian worship; he was not composing rubrical directions for the clergy. It is more likely than not that more use was made of the Prophetic books than of any other portion of the OT; and in any case, it is to them that Justin most constantly refers his Gentile readers. That the Apostolic Epistles were also read in the Christian assemblies we know from other sources; but it is not likely that a Lord's Day ever passed without a recitation of some portion of the narratives of the words and words of Jesus.

When we examine the canonical Gospels with this consideration in our mind, we are struck by the fact that it is easy to imagine that the first three were compiled from sections read with a view to practical instruction, and that it is not so easy to think of the Fourth Gospel as having had this origin. The stories and discourses in the Synoptics have the effect of pictures reproduced in the words of the original witness, while the impression was still fresh in his memory, and before he had time to place them in any systematized doctrinal setting. St. John's Gospel, on the other hand, has the air of being an attempt to write a history, a spiritual history if you will, still a history, an orderly statement of words and deeds meditated on in the study, and recorded as they emerged from the writer's inner consciousness after the lapse of many years. To say this is not to undervalue the historical truth, much less the inspiration, of the Fourth Gospel. The difference between it and the Synoptics is similar to that between a diarist and a historian; a diary chronicles facts, a history interprets them.

It is possible that St. John's Gospel was known as a history for private reading only, for some considerable time before it was read in the congregation. This supposition would partly explain why so few of Justin's quotations of Christ's words are taken from it, although we have sufficient proof of his acquaintance with it. Even in our own day it is doubtful whether any judicious apologist for Christianity, in citing examples of our Lord's discourses to a non-Christian public, would make much use of the Fourth Gospel, though he might regard it as of inestimable value in his own devotional reading. He would feel instinctively that its wisdom is for those whom St. Paul calls 'the perfect,' or 'full grown,' not for 'babes' in Christ, much less for 'them that are without.' Moreover, apart from this difference in quality between St. John's Gospel and the Synoptics, the difference in literary style must have, even from the first, delayed its adoption in general public use. Those who think, as they read or listen, soon become aware that its simplicity of vocabulary and grammatical structure conceal great subtlety of thought; we are out of our depth after the first step.

10. A word is necessary as to the relation between the canonical Gospels and the fragments of early Gospel material which have already repaid the patient toil of scholarly excavation in Egypt. In 1892 a fragment of the lost Gospel of Peter, discovered at Akhmim in 1886-7, was published by U. Bouriant; and in 1897, Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt published a papyrus containing eight Sayings of Jesus in a more or less fragmentary condition; and another fragment of five Sayings has since appeared. We are not at all concerned here with the so-called Gospel of Peter. It is confessedly the production of a sect of Docetæ not earlier than the latter half of the 2nd century. It is undoubtedly interesting and valuable, as illustrating the beliefs of Gnostics; but it has no claim whatever to be an original source of information. It is instructive as a harmonistic narrative based chiefly on the canonical Gospels.

To the student of the Gospels, the recovery of the lost Gospel of Peter, or of a portion of it, has the same kind, but not the same degree, of interest as the recovery of a lost work by Justin Martyr would have; it serves as an illustration of the way in which the canonical Gospels were employed in the 2nd century. But the case is different with the newly discovered Sayings of Jesus. These seem to claim to be Gospel material. The question is, Are they bona fide Gospel material which has been practically rejected by the responsible thinkers of the Church, or are they only pseudo-Gospel material?

We have seen that a complete 'Gospel' must have contained a narrative of those facts of our Lord's life which have a redemptive significance; but besides Gospels, it is very probable, indeed almost certain, that there were current in Apostolic times sayings of our Lord, without any note of the occasion when they were spoken. We have one such saying in Ac 20<sup>38</sup>, and in the extant Gospels there are many passages which it is difficult to believe are not based on collections of Sayings. An almost certain case is Lk 16<sup>4-18</sup>, where we have a group of four Sayings, none of which has any connexion with the others, or with the parable that follows.

This example proves that the disconnected nature of the Sayings in the recently discovered papyri affords no presumption against their being genuine Gospel material. Moreover, the record by St. Luke of St. Paul's quotation (Ac 20<sup>38</sup>) of a saying of Jesus which is not found in any canonical Gospel, proves that while St. Luke was no doubt desirous to make his Gospel as full as possible, he was yet aware that there were accessible to him sayings besides those of which he made use. So that we cannot reject the papyri Sayings on the ground that the canonical Gospels must necessarily contain all the sayings of Jesus that were known in Apostolic times.

On the other hand, on the principles we have adopted, we must decide that St. Luke, in his selection of sayings and discourses, was guided by the Spirit of Jesus; and it may be remarked that the fact that he did select is a presumptive proof that he wrote at a time sufficiently early for it to be possible for a Christian to consider any authenticated saying of Jesus to be not worth preserving. Contrast the eager anxiety of Papias to gather up every crumb from the recollections of early disciples. At best, the papyri Sayings belong to the same class as the interpolations in Codex D, that is to say, they are rejected Gospel material, rejected because the mind of the Church in the 1st cent. thought it to be unsuitable for preservation. The present conclusion to St. Mark's Gospel, on the other hand, and the Pericope adulteræ, are instances of floating Gospel material which have been stamped with the approval of the mind of the Church.

It may happen, however, that further discoveries and mature consideration will suggest that these papyri Sayings have only a relative value and significance, as being fragments of the very extensive religious literature of the 2nd century. If more of this literature had survived to our own day, we should be able to view them in a juster proportion. We know that, even in the lifetime of the Apostles, Christianity had developed so rapidly that there was an exuberant growth of 'divers and strange teachings' (He 13<sup>8</sup>). Each of these sects, or schools of thought and speculation, must have had both its authorized expositions and its literary propaganda. We are apt to forget that the business of book production in the first centuries of the Christian era was enormous in volume.

We know from the lists given by Eusebius, and allusions in other authors, that our extant ante-Nicene Fathers represent a very small fraction of the literature of the Church before his time. We may judge from this fact how unlikely it would be that much of the writings of heretics would survive. Such literature did not belong to a body with a continuous organized life, as is the Christian Church, a life continuous in doctrine as well as by personal links. The doctrine of the Christian Church, being a living thing, grows and develops from one generation to another; but the new always has to reconcile itself with the old; they are connected. And so even uninspired Christian writings would continue to be preserved and respected long after they had ceased to be generally read. Whereas heresy, as it was called, is essentially transitory; its literature, even when not merely the expression of the thoughts of an individual, reflects the conception of only one generation. Those who inherit it have no reason for retaining interest in it after it has ceased to represent precisely their thoughts. On the whole, it seems to the present writer that these papyri Sayings of Jesus must be regarded as not an expression of the main line of Church thought of any century. They are, of course, profoundly interesting, as casting light on the religious conceptions of some, we cannot tell how many, in the 2nd cent., but they do not exhibit the general mind of the Church.

11. In any discussion as to the language in which the first Gospel narrative was composed, it is impossible to leave out of account the evidence preserved in the fragments of Papias that are cited in Eusebius, HE iii. 39.

It is not intended here to give a résumé of the controversy that has raged over these few lines; but merely to state what seems to the present writer their most probable sense and value. The title of Papias' book was Λόγιον Κυριακῶν Ἐξηγήσις. Besides Eusebius, Irenæus seems to be the only writer, of those whose works have come down to us, who exhibits a first-hand acquaintance with the book of Papias. The other writers who allude to him evidently knew no more about him than what they found in Eusebius or Irenæus. The nature of the work may be guessed from what Papias himself states in one of the fragments: 'I shall not hesitate also to put down for you, along with my interpretations, whatsoever things I have at any time learned carefully from the elders.' The book, then, had a twofold character: interpretations, and also oral traditions. It is these latter to which Eusebius refers when he says that the book contained 'certain strange parables and teachings of the Saviour, and some other more mythical things'; and from the fact that Eusebius quotes from Papias two statements concerning the Gospels of Matthew and Mark respectively, it is at least probable that the interpretations dealt with our Gospels. Eusebius does not conceal his contempt for Papias' literary capacity: 'He appears to have been of very limited understanding (σφόδρα ἀμικρὸς τὸν νοῦν), as one can see from his discourses.' This adverse verdict is certainly borne out by the puerile extracts preserved by Irenæus; and it does not seem reasonable to attribute Eusebius' hostile criticism to his want of sympathy with Papias' millenarian opinions. Eusebius speaks in unqualified praise of Irenæus, who shared those opinions.

We may now discuss the term λόγια κυριακά, as it occurs in the title of Papias' book. The word λόγια may certainly be rendered 'oracular utterances,' as Professor Stanton points out (The Gospels as Historical Documents, p. 53); but λόγια κυριακά is not naturally rendered 'oracular utterances of the Lord,' in the sense uttered by the Lord,—which would be λόγια Κυρίου,—but oracular utterances relating to the Lord, just as κυριακὸν δεῖπνον does not mean the supper eaten by, or given by, the Lord, but the supper ordained as an institution by Him. κυριακός has the same force in the phrase ἡ κυριακὴ ἡμέρα.

As regards λόγια, it would, of course, be absurd to question the possibility that Papias was familiar with the word in the sense 'oracular utterances'; but it is more likely that his use of λόγια was intentionally analogous to that found in the NT (Ac 7<sup>38</sup>, Ro 3<sup>2</sup>, He 5<sup>12</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>1</sup>), where the term, variously qualified, is used of the Scriptures of the OT. λόγια κυριακά, then, would mean Holy Scriptures connected with the Lord, i.e. the Gospels. This meaning harmonizes with what we have otherwise inferred as to the nature of the book written by Papias. It dealt primarily with interpretations of the Gospels, and secondarily with oral traditions, of which he was evidently a very uncritical collector.

Papias distinctly tells us, as Eusebius points out, that among his informants were persons old enough to have had personal intercourse with the Apostles. He distinguishes two classes of authorities: (1) Persons who could tell him what Andrew, Peter, etc., said (εἶπεν), and (2) what Aristion and the presbyter John, the disciples of the Lord, say (λέγουσι). Eusebius, who had read the book, states that the language of Papias implies that he was himself a hearer of Aristion and the presbyter John. We are certainly entitled to infer that they were his elder contemporaries; very much elder, if they really were 'disciples of the Lord' in the strict sense of the phrase. See, further, art. ARISTION.

'The order of the list' of elders given by Papias is, as Professor Stanton remarks (op. cit. p. 162), 'a somewhat strange one.' He gives the true explanation as to why John and Matthew are mentioned last, i.e. 'For the very reason that they had embodied their testimony in writing, they were less important than the rest for the particular purpose of which he is speaking here—the illustration of the written "oracles" by matter orally handed down.' It may be added that the omission in this list of Mark and Luke was most probably due to the consideration that these Evangelists could not be supposed to be able, from personal knowledge, to add anything to what they had embodied in their Gospels. One cannot help noting that the other names, Andrew, Peter, Philip, Thomas, James, are those of the Apostles who are introduced in the Gospels as making observations, and that the first three names occur in that order in the first chapter of St. John's Gospel. We do not know which James Papias meant. Moreover, while Eusebius expressly states that Papias mentions Aristion and the presbyter John frequently by name, and gives their traditions in his writings, he does not quote from Papias any tradition whatever based on the authority of an Apostle. We are forced to the conclusion that in point of fact Papias had none to record; and that when he questioned those who had been followers of the elders in regard to their words, he learnt nothing of permanent interest. It is impossible to imagine that if Eusebius had found in the book of Papias any statement whatever as from an Apostle, he would not have preserved it in his History.

Of the two celebrated remarks cited from Papias about the Gospels of Mark and Matthew respectively, the first is given expressly as the statement of the presbyter John, and it is natural to suppose that the second came from the same source. Papias was credulous and unintelligent; but he does not seem to have made any statement on his own authority; so that it would be unreasonable to discount the statements of the presbyter John because of the stupidity of the person who recorded them. On the other hand, it is unreasonable to assume that the nearness of the presbyter John to the times of the Apostles is a guarantee that his assertions as to the composition of the Gospels are altogether to be depended on. We need have no hesitation in rejecting any, or all, of them, if more convincing arguments oblige us to do so; but the demonstrated falsity of one statement would not of necessity throw discredit on the others.

Thus, that Mark was 'the interpreter of Peter' is so probable a tradition that it has met with general acceptance; it is, moreover, an assertion as to which it is quite impossible now to produce any rebutting evidence. But the assertion that Mark did not compose his narrative 'in order' is, at the present day, as generally rejected by those who have carefully studied the Synoptic Problem. Dr. Salmon, in particular, has pointed out that if we desire to follow the growth of our Lord's reputation as a teacher and healer, and the corresponding development of hostility against Him, we must consult the Gospel according to St. Mark in preference to the others.

Passing on to the statement of the presbyter John about St. Matthew, and judging it in the light of all the evidence at present available, we seem to find the same mixture in it of truth and error. The testimony of St. Jerome does not leave us room to question that there was an orthodox Hebrew Gospel which, as extant in his time, contained matters not found in any of the four canonical Gospels. This work had such a very limited circulation that it is impossible for us now to affirm with any confidence as to whether its peculiar features were in the original, or were later interpolations; but we have no rebutting evidence that in its original form it was not the work of St. Matthew. On the other hand, nothing is more certain than that the Greek First Gospel, which has always been known in the Church as the Gospel according to St. Matthew, is not in its present form, which there is no reason to think was ever different—a translation from one Hebrew original. How then are we to explain 'Everyone interpreted them,' i.e. Matthew's Hebrew λόγια, 'as he was able'? Dr. Salmon's solution seems to give the most likely explanation of this ambiguous phrase. John the presbyter meant that the Greek St. Matthew was a translation of the Hebrew St. Matthew, and not by the author himself. The assertion is of the same kind as that about St. Mark, that he did not write 'in order'; and both statements were suggested by an extreme theory of biblical inspiration, a theory which was very generally held until quite recent times—the absolute inerrancy of Holy Scripture in every detail.

One has sometimes heard discrepancies between different historical statements in the OT explained by the assertion that the errors which cause the discrepancies were not in the original, as it left the hand of the Divinely inspired writer, but were due to the slips of uninspired copyists; and thus it is thought possible to reconcile belief in the inerrancy of the Word of God with the actual state of the case. The statements of the presbyter John about the Gospels of Mark and Matthew are best explained by supposing that he held some such theory of inspiration.

When he finds what seems a disagreement between the Gospels, he is satisfied there can be no real disagreement. Mark's order may be different from Luke's (who declares in his preface that it was his intention to write in order—κατά τάς ἡμετέρας ἀκολουθίας); but, then, that was because it was not Mark's design to recount the facts in their proper order. . . . If in Matthew's Gospel, as he read it, there seemed any inaccuracy, this must be imputed to the translators; the Gospel as Matthew himself wrote it was free from fault' (Salmon, Introd. to NT, p. 68).

The conclusion, then, to which we are driven is that if the existence of an original Hebrew Gospel depended on the testimony of the presbyter John, we could not safely make any positive affirmation on the subject. The only other witness to Matthew's Hebrew Gospel who seems to be independent, i.e. Irenaeus, may not really be so. It has been generally believed that he adds to what Eusebius quotes from Papias a note of time, 'while Peter and Paul were preaching and founding the Church at Rome'; but the Rev. J. Chapman has proved (JThSt vi, 563) that this clause is neither derived from Papias nor is it a note of time.

12. However, whether St. Matthew wrote a Gospel in Hebrew or not, there can be no doubt, both from a priori considerations and also from the internal evidence of the extant Greek Gospels, that there was current in the infancy of the Church a Gospel in the Hebrew language as then commonly spoken in Judaea. The last command of our Lord, as recorded by St. Luke (24<sup>47</sup>), that the gospel should be preached, 'beginning at Jerusalem,' is in itself a sufficient proof that one of the first Gospels, in the sense in which we have used that word, must have been in the Aramaic tongue. Even if our Lord sometimes, and in some places, taught in Greek, yet Aramaic was His mother tongue, and that of His Apostles, and of the vast majority of His hearers. In the early Jerusalem Church it is plain that the Hebrews outnumbered the Hellenists (Ac 6<sup>1</sup>). These considerations make it certain that one of the forms which the Evangelic narrative assumed from the very first was in Aramaic. The facts that such a Gospel is not now extant, and that the external evidence for its existence at any time is so scanty, are fully accounted for by the destruction of Jerusalem in the year A.D. 70. That world-shaking event, among its other immediate consequences, was followed by the disappearance of the Hebrew-speaking Church of Jerusalem. Then, after not many years, the Hebrew-speaking Christian community in Palestine lost touch with the main current of Christian thought, and, in consequence, sank to the position of an obscure sect with an out-of-date theology.

It has been stated above that the internal evidence of the extant Greek Gospels suggests an Aramaic original. It must be confessed that the presence in a Greek document of Aramaic turns of phrase does not necessarily prove that it is a translation from the Aramaic. Dean Armitage Robinson has given good reasons for his theory that the Aramaisms in the first two chapters of St. Luke's Gospel are due to a deliberate imitation of the LXX of 1 Samuel. But there does not seem any likelihood that the author, or authors, of the common Synoptic narrative were, like St. Luke, conscious literary artists; and even if we cannot follow Weiss in every application of his conclusions, there remains proof enough to render the theory of an original Aramaic Gospel, as underlying the Synoptics, probable to a high degree. This supposition is even more plausible in the case of the portions of St. Matthew's Gospel which are peculiar to that Evangelist. Bishop Westcott long ago pointed out, with regard to the quotations from the OT found in the Synoptic Gospels, that, while the cyclic quotations, as he calls them, agree with the LXX, those that are peculiar to St. Matthew seem to be independent translations from the Hebrew.

13. This is not a discussion of the Synoptic Problem; but it may not be out of place to conclude this article with a suggestion as to the relations of the three Synoptic Gospels to each other. It is generally held now that the First and Third Gospels are altogether independent of each other, but that Mt. and Lk. derived the matter which they have in common with Mk. either from St. Mark's Gospel, or from an earlier source from which St. Mark selected the incidents and discourses which he relates. On the hypothesis that Mt. and Lk. copied our St. Mark, we have to assume the existence of another early Gospel, from which they derived the non-Markan matter which they have in common. In this case we conclude that the details peculiar to St. Mark were an original feature of that Gospel, and that Mt. and Lk. for various reasons omitted them. On the other hand, if the common Synoptic matter and the matter common to Mt. and Lk. be both assigned to one original, it will then be natural to think of St. Mark's peculiar details as additions made by him, probably on the authority of St. Peter.

The problem has been rendered unnecessarily complicated by an assumption that it is impossible that an Evangelist should have omitted anything from his work which he had reason to believe was true. The fallacy of this assumption will be evident, whichever hypothesis we adopt. The simplest method to account for all the facts is to suppose a Greek translation of an Aramaic original as the source of all the common Synoptic matter, and also of the matter common to Mt. and Lk. In this document the OT quotations would have been given in a LXX form. At least two other sources must be postulated for the matter found only in Mt. and Lk. respectively. We have already found reason to hold that the matter peculiar to Mt. was a translation from an Aramaic original.

Whatever solution of the Synoptic problem be ultimately adopted by the general consensus of critics, it does not seem likely that the complicated hypotheses of the German school of a generation ago will again commend themselves to scholars of sober judgment. It is a sound canon of criticism that sources are not to be multiplied beyond the necessity of the case.

GOSPELS (APOCRYPHAL).—i. TITLE.—In the sense in which the term is popularly understood, 'apocryphal' is synonymous with 'spurious' or 'false'; when, however, it is applied as a title to writings of the early Christian centuries, it bears the significance of 'extra-canonical.' By Apocryphal Gospels are, accordingly, meant all writings claiming to be Gospels which are not included in the Canon of the NT, without any implication that their contents are necessarily false or of questionable origin. (See, further, for the meaning of the term, art. 'Apocrypha' in Hastings' DB i. 112 ff.; also Hennecke, NT Apokr. 3* ff., Handb. vii ff.; and Zahn, Gesch. d. NT Kan. i. 127 ff.).

ii. ORIGIN.—For a generation after the death of Jesus, His teaching and the facts about His life were preserved by oral tradition in the circle of believers. With the rise of a second generation, however, the need was felt for reducing the oral reminiscences to written form. The reason for this was twofold. For one thing, the number of those who could give personal testimony of what Jesus did and said was rapidly becoming smaller; and for another, the Christian faith was spreading far beyond the limits of its original home in Palestine. Both these facts made it imperative that, if trustworthy accounts of the teaching and life of Jesus were to be preserved for the guidance of the scattered communities of Christians, the tradition should be committed to something more permanent and less liable to disturbing influences than oral reminiscence. The impulse of this necessity gave rise to our written Gospels, and to many other Evangelic records which have disappeared. Of the many attempts to write the story of Jesus, to which St. Luke in his prologue refers, none (with the exception of Mt. and Mk.) can be said with any certainty to have survived;* although it is possible that the Gospel Fragment of Papias may be the wreckage of one of them. In any case, some of the earlier non-canonical Gospels, which are extant in more or less fragmentary condition, are probably the products of the general desire, that was everywhere felt, to have a more certain knowledge of Jesus and His teaching than was possible from the oral instruction of wandering evangelists. The Gospel according to the Hebrews, which is but little later than the Synoptics, belongs almost certainly to this class; and the same may be true also of the Gospel according to the Egyptians.

The majority of extra-canonical Gospels are due, however, to other causes. Written at a time when the present Four Gospels were gaining, or had already gained, a place of exceptional authority,† they came into existence in answer to two desires, urgently felt in certain circles of Christians. (1) The first was the desire, popularly entertained, for fuller information about the life of Christ than that given by the four Gospels. This intelligible and not unnatural curiosity was directed chiefly to the facts antecedent to Christ's advent, and to those periods of His life which the older Gospels left in shadow—His parentage, His birth and childhood, and the period after the Resurrection. It is noteworthy that the writers who endeavoured to satisfy this desire for fuller knowledge made no attempt to fill up the silent years between Christ's childhood and His entrance on His public ministry, the reason in part probably being that 'it seemed too daring for them to illumine a darkness, for which there was not the slightest historical suggestion in the New Testament' (Hofmann, *PRE*² i. 655). With greater probability, however, it may be said that the reason was, not so much any self-restraint through loyalty to the data of history, as the absence of any clear dogmatic motive; and dogmatic motives, as will appear, were almost invariably associated with the desire to satisfy curiosity. It may be safely assumed that, had any doctrinal interest called for the history of the silent years, no scruples about historical truthfulness would have prevented writers from enlivening them with the products of their fancy. In the main it is certain that the details furnished by the apocryphal writings regarding matters about which the canonical Gospels are silent, have little or no historical basis. They are in reality Christian haggadoth, popular stories similar to those in Jewish literature which were framed for purposes of pious entertainment and instruction. The Gospels of the Infancy and Childhood, for example, are full of legendary matter drawn from various sources, or freely invented by the fancy of the writers. Where the details are not entirely imaginative, they have their origin in the transformation of utterances of Christ into deeds, or in the literal interpretation of OT prophecies and Jewish expectations about the Messiah, or in the ascription to Jesus of miracles similar to those recorded in the OT (Hofmann, *PRE*² i. 655).

* The probability is that most of them disappeared early, being unable to maintain their position alongside of the Gospels which are now in the Canon.

† The authoritative position of the canonical Gospels, which was beginning to be recognized before the middle of the 2nd century, was assured by the end of the century.

As an example of the way in which the Christian haggadist worked, it may suffice to mention his treatment of OT texts. Ps 145<sup>1</sup> reads: "Praise the Lord from the earth, ye dragons"; accordingly, in pseudo-Matthew dragons are represented as coming out of a cave and worshipping the child Christ. The picture of Paradise regained in 1816 suggested the legend that all kinds of wild beasts accompanied the Holy Family on the way to Egypt (Cowper, Apoc. Gosp., lix, c).

But although the Apocryphal Gospels abound in legendary accretions of this kind, the mistake should not be made of assuming that there is no authentic material in the additions to the narratives in the four Gospels. Oral tradition maintained itself for a time after our present Gospels were reduced to writing, and it is not improbable that genuine sayings of Christ and authentic details about His life have been preserved in uncanonical books. On this point see further in § iii.

(2) A much more powerful motive than the desire to satisfy curiosity, leading to the production of Gospel writings, was the dogmatic interest, the desire to find support for beliefs which were held in various sections of the Church. This was especially marked in Gnostic circles, where numerous Evangelic writings (running into thousands, Epiphanius says [Hær. 26]) were produced, claiming the authority of a secret tradition for their peculiar doctrines.

Even in the earlier Apocryphal Gospels, which are of the Synoptic type, it is clear that theological prepossessions played a considerable part, as indeed they did to some extent in the canonical Gospels. Thus, in the Gospel according to the Hebrews the conception of Christ has an Ebionitic tinge, and in the Gospel of Peter there are expressions which betray Docetic sympathies on the part of the writer. The dogmatic motive is prominent as well in those writings which fill up with fictitious details the empty spaces of the Gospel narrative, and thus have generally been regarded as due to the desire to gratify the irresistible longing for fuller knowledge. It is doubtful if this latter motive, although it was certainly operative, would have led to the invention of such a mass of fictitious matter, had it not been powerfully stimulated by dogmatic considerations. In the Prot-evangelium of James the legendary history of Mary's antecedents and of the circumstances of Christ's birth was due not merely to any horror vacui, but to the imperative dogmatic necessity, as the writer conceived it, of safeguarding in this way alike the true Divinity and the true humanity of Jesus Christ. Similarly, the Childhood Gospel of Thomas, with its repulsive stories of the child Christ's miraculous power and knowledge, would never have found acceptance in Christian circles had it not been for the witness which the miracles were supposed to bear to Christ's supernatural origin.

III. RELATION TO CANONICAL GOSPELS.—The fragmentary condition and the uncertain text of many of the Apocryphal Gospels render a confident judgment as to their relation to the canonical Gospels exceedingly difficult. Where the question of affinity is raised, the problem to be solved is whether the uncanonical Gospels are dependent on the canonical, or draw from a common oral source. The latter possibility is one not to be dismissed without careful consideration; but, on the whole, the evidence points in almost every case to the use of some or all of the four Gospels by the authors of the apocryphal writings. Only in the case of one Gospel, the Gospel according to the Hebrews, is there a strong consensus of opinion in favour of independence (see, however, vii. A. 1). Where there is an appearance of independence, this is frequently to be accounted for by a free manipulation and embellishment of old material, to bring it into line with the writer's peculiar point of view, or to suit it to the character of his surroundings.

While a large degree of dependence on the canonical Gospels must in general be maintained in regard to the Apocryphal Gospels, this must not be pressed so far as to exclude the possibility of their embodying details drawn from reliable oral sources. The fact must steadily be borne in mind that the stream of living oral tradition continued to flow for several generations, though in ever decreasing volume, alongside of the written Gospels;* accordingly, where the uncanonical Gospels deviate from the canonical record, either by slight interpolations into common matter or by additions peculiarly their own, the possibility is always open that in these additions we have early and reliable traditions, either unknown to the four Evangelists or passed over by them as unsuitable for their purpose.

Two important considerations must, however, be kept in mind in estimating the trustworthiness of all such additions. In the first place, the authoritative position which the canonical Gospels early reached as authentic sources of the life and teaching of Jesus entitles them to be used as a touchstone of the probable authenticity of the additional matter contained in the Apocryphal Gospels. No saying of Christ or detail about His life has any title to be regarded as genuine if it does not fit into the conception which the four Evangelists have given us of the teaching and personality of Jesus. Secondly, when we keep in view the undoubted fact that fictitious writings were common in which the life and teaching of Christ were freely handled in the interest of heretical sects, it is clear that extreme caution must be observed in receiving as authentic any addition to the canonical record. If it would be less than just to say that all the Apocryphal Gospels stand in the position of suspect witnesses, with a presumption of unreliability against them in respect of their peculiar matter, it is nevertheless true that their exclusion from the Canon, as well as the notoriously tainted origin of some of them, render it imperative that their claim to embody a genuine tradition must be carefully sifted, and allowed only after the clearest proof.

IV. VALUE.—The question of greatest moment which arises in estimating the value of the Apocryphal Gospels naturally has reference to their worth as additional sources for the life and teaching of Jesus. From what has been already said about their origin and their relation to the canonical Gospels, their value in this respect will appear to be extremely slight. A comparison of the Apocryphal Gospels with those in the Canon makes the pre-eminence of the latter incontestably clear, and shows that as sources of Christ's life the former, for all practical purposes, may be neglected. The simple beauty and verisimilitude of the picture of Jesus in the four Gospels stand out in strong relief when viewed in the light of the artificial and legendary stories which characterize most of the Apocryphal Gospels. The proverbial simplicity of truth receives a striking commentary when (for example) the miracles of the Canonical Gospels are compared with those of the Apocryphal writings. The former, for the most part, are instinct with ethical purpose and significance, and are felt to be the natural and unforced expression of the sublime personality of Jesus; the latter are largely theatrical exhibitions without ethical content. In them we find no worthy conception of the laws of providential interference; they are wrought to supply personal wants, or to gratify private feelings, and often are positively immoral (Westcott). In a few of the Gospels which show signs of independence, there may be here and there a trace of primitive and trustworthy tradition; but all such details, which have a reasonable claim to be considered authentic, do not sensibly increase the sum of our knowledge about Christ. The conclusion, based on the comparison of the Apocryphal with the Canonical Gospels, is amply warranted, that in rejecting the former and choosing the latter as authoritative Scriptures the Church showed a true feeling for what was original and authentic.

Though the Apocryphal Gospels afford us little additional knowledge about Christ, they are invaluable as enabling us to realize more clearly the conditions under which the four Gospels were received in the Church, until they were finally established as authoritative in the Gospel Canon. The existence of so many Evangelic writings shows that for some time after the Canonical Gospels appeared, they had no position of commanding influence. The high place which oral tradition—the living and abiding voice—still retained in the estimation of the Church (cf. Euseb. HE iii. 39. 4) militated against the acceptance of any written Gospel as authoritative beyond the communities in which it was current. In the early part of the 2nd cent. we have, accordingly, to think of the four Gospels as having merely a local and circumscribed authority, while in different sections of the Church the production of Evangelic literature still proceeded, in which the tradition was handed more or less freely to suit the dominant conceptions and needs. But by the middle of the century there were indications that the four Gospels, already widely known through the constant intercourse that united Christian communities together, were being elevated above their competitors to a place of exceptional authority. This was due, not to mere good fortune or to any arbitrary dealing on the part of the Church, but to the superior claims of the writings themselves, which were recognized when the necessity arose of counteracting, by trustworthy and authentic records, the rapid growth of a pseudo-tradition in Gnostic circles. This rise of our four Gospels to a commanding and unchallengeable position leaves us not only to their inherent value,—which the Church, with a fine spiritual sensitiveness, perceived,—but to the conviction that, as opposed to fictitious writings which appeared under the names of Apostles, they embodied the testimony of Apostolic writers. By the time of Irenæus (c. 180) the Gospel canon may be regarded as definitely fixed; and although Apocryphal Gospels continue to circulate, the authoritative position of the four Gospels was finally assured.

Perhaps the chief value of the Apocryphal Gospels is to be found in the light which they cast on the conditions of life and thought in early Christian times. They are of service in the difficult work of reconstructing the complex environment in which Christianity grew up.

When, for example, one reads in the Childhood Gospel of Thomas the account of the miracles wrought by the child Christ, and marks the spirit of diablerie so frequently exhibited, one is conscious of nothing but a painful feeling of wonder, that fables so bizarre and so revolting could ever have been tolerated in a community of Christians. Of any ethical sympathy with the spirit of Christ, of any recognition of the beauty and simplicity of Christ's childhood, as He grew in grace and wisdom, in favour with God and man, there is in this Gospel hardly the faintest trace. Though worthless as an account of Christ's childhood, the Gospel of Thomas is yet a mirror in which we see reflected the curious condition of the society which accepted it. We see here, in a typical instance, how strong were the external influences which played on the development of Christianity in early times. In the process of permeating the heathen world with its great thought of Redemption and its lofty ethical sentiment, Christianity, as was inevitable, was itself coloured, and in certain circles distorted, by the foreign elements of its environment. Oriental mythology and Greek philosophy had met, and given rise to syncretistic systems which exerted a deep influence on men's conceptions of the Christian faith and life. Traces of this are clearly discernible in the Apocryphal Gospels, most plainly in the Gnostic Gospels. Buddhist influences are possibly responsible for the childhood stories in the Gospel of Thomas.

The confusion and vagueness of the Christological views in the different Apocryphal Gospels also bear witness to the great variety of influences which were at work in the early Church, and enable us to realize with what trouble the conception of the Divine manhood of Jesus was eventually established. The indecision and one-sidedness which are revealed in doctrinal matters are also traceable in the interpretation of the ethical content of Christ's teaching and life. Ascetic and Encratite views are found in several Gospels, and no doubt were characteristic of all the Gnostic Gospels. A close sympathy with the true ethical spirit of Christianity is, however, noticeable in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, in which stress is laid on acts of mercy and brotherly kindness; and in the 'Traditions of Matthias' mentioned by Clement of Alexandria, and possibly identical with the Gnostic Gospel of Matthias, the doctrine of Christian responsibility for others' welfare, in its most stringent form, is very forcibly put: 'If the neighbour of an elect person sins, the elect has sinned; for if he had lived according to the counsels of the Word, his neighbour would have so esteemed his manner of life that he would have kept free from sin.'

The apologetic interest which is so characteristic of 2nd cent. writers (witness the Apologies of Aristides, Justin, Tertullian, etc.) is reflected in several of the Apocryphal Gospels.

Traces are to be found in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, in which the servant of the high priest is a witness to the Resurrection. A later stage of the apologetic movement may be observed in the Gospel of Peter, where Pilate is practically exonerated from blame for Christ's condemnation, and is made to bear witness to Christ's Divinity. In the Acts of Pilate (Gospel of Nicodemus) the movement has reached its climax in the reverence which the Romans pay to Jesus at His trial, in the miraculous homage of the Roman standards, and in the irrefutable evidence given of Christ's resurrection, to the conviction of His enemies.

A subsidiary element in estimating the value of the Apocryphal Gospels is their antiquarian interest. A passage in the Protevangelium of James (ch. 18) affords an interesting parallel to the scene in the fairy tale, 'The Sleeping Beauty,' when by a magic spell the whole of nature suddenly stands still, and all living beings are immovably rooted where they are. The Childhood Gospel of Thomas, useless as it is as a source of information about Christ's youth, gives a remarkably vivid and convincing picture of Jewish village life. Caution must be observed in trusting the details of Jewish life in the Protevangelium; many of them are entirely unhistorical.

v. DOCTRINAL CHARACTERISTICS. — As stated above in § ii., one of the main impulses which led to the production of Apocryphal Gospels was the desire to establish peculiar tenets held in certain Christian circles. Gospels of this type, although professedly narratives of our Lord's life and teaching, were in reality Tendenzschriften, doctrinal treatises conceived and written in the interests of a definite system of thought. Such were the numerous Gnostic Gospels, of which the smallest fragments remain. But even those Gospels in the production of which there was no deliberate dogmatic purpose, are doctrinally significant. It is true of them, equally with the canonical Gospels, that they were written in the interests of faith, ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν; the writers were not mere chroniclers of past events, giving information about One in whose life and personality they had no vital concern; they were believers, for whom Christ was Lord. The religious value which Jesus had for them, and the manner in which they conceived of His person, were reflected in their narrative of His life. However small the value of the writings may be as authentic sources of information regarding Jesus, they are interesting as showing by a side light what men thought about Him. How far the early Church as a whole was from any clear and uniform conception of Christ, is apparent from the Apocryphal Gospels. In them we have not only the reflexion of views representing the main stream of Christian thought, but also the foreshadowings of doctrines which later, in their developed form, were rejected as heretical.

The majority of the Apocryphal Gospels betray a heretical tendency, which varies broadly according as the Divine or the human nature of Christ is denied. On the one hand, there is the Ebionitic conception of Jesus, with its rejection of His heavenly origin; on the other, the Doctric, with its obscuration or denial of His true humanity. Both these opposing views find expression in the Apocryphal Gospels. The former is found in the Gospel according to the Hebrews and in the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles; the latter, somewhat veiled, in the Gospel of Peter, but fully developed in the Gnostic Gospels, in which the Saviour—the heavenly Christ—freed from the association with the phantasmal earthly Christ, and made the possessor of His full powers through the death and resurrection, declares the true wisdom to His disciples.

The Childhood Gospels stand in the main current of ecclesiastical doctrine in their view of the person of Christ. The Gospel of Thomas shows that the circles in which it found acceptance held to the doctrine of Christ's human and Divine natures. There are traces that point to a Gnostic origin, and to a conception of Christ in which His true humanity was obscured; but in the later form in which it was current in the Church, the humanity and Divinity of our Lord are alike emphasized. The child Jesus is a boy among boys, taking His part in the usual games and occupations of childhood; and yet the belief in His supernatural dignity is evidenced by the extraordinary miracles attributed to Him, and by His astonishing knowledge, which drew the confession from His teacher: 'This child is not earth-born; assuredly he was born before the creation of the world' (ch. 7). The Protangelium of James, too, it is clear, was written in the interests of orthodoxy, which were imperilled, alike by the belief current in Jewish-Christian circles that Joseph was the father of Jesus, and by the Gnostic doctrine that, in being born of Mary, Jesus did not partake of her human nature, but passed through her like water through a pipe (Epiphanius, Her. 31. 7). In opposition to this double attack on the generally accepted doctrine, the writer of the Protangelium, while not leaving it in doubt that Jesus was born as a human child (the infant took the breast from His mother), sought to make His Divinity secure by depicting Mary as holy from her birth, as fed only on angels' food, as conceiving by the word of the Lord, as bringing forth her child in virginity, and as remaining a virgin to the end. It is noteworthy that, although the primary object of the Protangelium was to safeguard the orthodox conception of Christ's person against hostile attacks, the method adopted had the result of elevating Mary above the ordinary levels of humanity, and of initiating a movement which, deriving strength from other sources, terminated in the worship of Mary, the All-Holy mother of God.

vi. INFLUENCE.—Although after the 2nd cent. no Gospels were reckoned as authoritative, those now in the Canon, the Apocryphal Gospels continued to be read for purposes of edification, both in public and in private. Those which were distinctly heretical gradually disappeared as the power of the Church grew, while those which were of a type similar to the canonical Gospels were unable for any lengthened period to maintain their position alongside their authoritative rivals. Still we find that the Gospel according to the Hebrews was read in some quarters in Jerome's day (end of 4th cent.), and was highly esteemed by that Father himself; while the vitality of the Gospel of Peter is evidenced by the fact that a large portion of it was placed in the grave of a monk in the early Middle Ages (8th–12th cent.). The popularity of the Childhood Gospels was remarkable, especially in the Churches of the East. There the Protangelium was so highly prized as a book of devotion that it was used for reading in public worship, and furnished material for the homilies of preachers. Translations of it circulated in Syriac, Coptic, and Arabic, and, along with other childhood legends, its stories, often greatly embellished and exaggerated, found a place in a comprehensive Gospel of the Infancy and Childhood, the so-called 'Arabic Gospel,' which had a wide circulation not only in the Churches in the East, but in Mohammedan circles. Passages from the Protangelium stand in the lectionaries of the orthodox Church, for use at the festivals held in honour of Mary and of her reputed parents, Joachim and Anna.

In the Western Church the Apocryphal Gospels were regarded with more suspicion. Towards the close of the 4th cent. their authority was repudiated in the plainest terms by Jerome and Augustine, the former characterizing certain stories as ex deliramentis apocryphorum petita (Tappern, Ausserbiblische Nachrichten, 15). On the other hand, their contemporaries, Zeno of Verona, and Prudentius, the greatest poet of early Christian times, drew from the Protangelium in their works in praise of Mary. The combined influence of Jerome and Augustine, however, determined the ecclesiastical attitude to the Apocryphal Gospels, and the ban of the Church fell upon them under Damasus (382), Innocent I. (405), and Gelasius (496). In the long run this condemnation by ecclesiastical authority proved unavailing to check the popular appetite for the apocryphal legends; and by various devices the writings, which had incurred the censure of the Church, were brought back again into public circulation.

Harnack truly remarks that 'the history of apocryphal literature is a proof that the prohibition of books is powerless against a pressing need. In all sections and in all languages of the Church this literature is perhaps the most strongly represented alongside of the canonical writings, in a form, as one would expect, that is always changing to suit the taste of the age. It was really apocryphal, that is to say, it had what may be termed a subterranean existence; but, suppressed and persecuted though it was, it always forced its way back to the surface, and at last the public tradition of the Church was defenceless against it' (Gesch. d. altchr. Litt., i. ix. note 5).

Within a century after the Decretum Gelasii, Gregory of Tours in his book de Gloria Martyrum (i. ch. 4) had no scruples in using the extravagant legends contained in the 'Transitus Marie'; indeed, so little store was apparently set by ecclesiastical condemnation, that about 435, thirty years after the decree of Innocent I., a mosaic of the Annunciation in S. Maria Maggiore in Rome, prepared under the direction of Sixtus III., embodied apocryphal details. Apocryphal writings are used by pseudo-Chrysostom (c. 600); and in the epic poem of the nun Hroswitha († 968), entitled Historia nativitatibus laudabilibus conversationis intactae Dei genitricis, the material is in part drawn from the later Gospels of the Childhood. From the 12th cent. onwards, the Apocryphal Gospels afforded an inexhaustible mine for poets and minstrels in Germany, France, and England; and numerous miracle-plays represented incidents drawn from the same source. A powerful impulse was given to the spread of these legends by the Dominican Vincent de Beauvais, who in his work entitled Speculum Maya, published about the middle of the 13th cent., and translated in the following century into many languages, transcribed large portions of pseudo-Matthew and the Gospel of Nicodemus, etc. The latter half of the 13th cent. also saw the appearance of a collection of legendary Lives of the Saints, the Speculum Sanctorum, better known as the Golden Legend, written by another member of the Dominican order, Jacobus de Voragine, Archbishop of Genoa. This work, in which many of the apocryphal legends find a place, had an immense influence, there being manuscript translations extant in English, German, French, Italian, and Spanish. With the invention of the printing-press this influence was largely extended, the Legenda Aurea and Vincent's Speculum being among the earliest books to be set up in type. From that time onwards, the stories of the Apocryphal Gospels have had an influence on popular Christianity in Catholic countries far exceeding that of the Biblical narrative.

Roman Catholic writers have denied their claim to be in any sense authoritative sources of Evangelic history, and have uttered warnings against their incautious use; an unfavourable judgment was passed upon them by the Papal Congregation of Rites as recently as 1884, in connexion with the proposal to celebrate in the following year the nineteen hundredth anniversary of the birth of Mary; but, all this notwithstanding, these apocryphal stories, likened by Harnack to twining plants which, when cut down, spring up again from beneath and choke what that is healthy, have securely rooted themselves in the popular imagination, and have been the fruitful source of many superstitious beliefs. Even Tappern, a Roman Catholic writer, who, in his scholarly treatise on The Apocryphal Gospels of the Childhood, etc., speaks with deep regret of the tendency to accept these writings as trustworthy historical sources, cannot resist the temptation to retain as much of their contents as has been taken up into ecclesiastical tradition. He accepts, for instance, as reliable, the names of Mary's parents, the circumstances relating to her birth, her dedication to the Temple service, the marvellous story of her death, resurrection, and ascension, and declares that use of these apocryphal data may be made with an easy conscience for the purpose of religious edification (op. cit. 88).

The narratives of the Apocryphal Gospels have had an extraordinary influence on Christian art. Reference has already been made to the attraction which the legends had for poets from the earliest times, and especially since the date of the publication of the Legenda Aurea. (For details of the earlier poetry see von Lehner, Die Marienverehrung, 256 ff.). Sculpture and painting also owed many of their subjects to apocryphal sources, or were influenced in their treatment by apocryphal details. The history of Mary's reputed parents, her service in the Temple, her betrothal to Joseph, the Annunciation, the Birth of Jesus in a cave, the Flight into Egypt, the Assumption of Mary—these and other incidents described in the Apocryphal Gospels were favourite themes of painters and sculptors, especially during the Renaissance.

A marble tablet of the 4th or 5th cent. in the crypt of St. Maximin in Provence, represents Mary in the attitude of prayer, with the inscription in barbarous Latin, MARIA VIRGO MISTRE DE TEMPULO GEROSALE—The Virgin Mary, servant of the temple at Jerusalem (von Lehner, op. cit. 327). The events in the life of the Virgin, arranged in a series, were depicted by different painters of the Renaissance, one of the best known series being that by Taddeo Gaddi in the Baroncelli Chapel at Florence (Mrs. Jansson, Legends of the Madonna, introd. iii). Mary's presentation at the Temple, and her marvellous ascent of the Temple steps (narrated in pseudo-Matthew, ch. 4 and the Infancy, ch. 5), supply a subject for one of Titian's masterpieces (in the Academy, Venice), while her marriage to Joseph is represented in many pictures, notably in Raphael's beautiful early work (in the Pinacoteca, Milan). The Annunciation is a favourite theme in Christian art; in accordance with the narrative in the Protogospelium, Mary is represented either at the well with a pitcher of water or spinning wool for the veil of the temple (as in the mosaic, already referred to, in S. Maria Maggiore in Rome). Pictures of the Nativity betray the influence of the apocryphal stories; they show the mother and child and Joseph in a cave, where, according to the Protogospelium, Jesus was born; a dazzling light radiates from the face of the child; an ox and an ass (first mentioned in pseudo-Matthew) bow in adoration before Him—a frequent representation in early reliefs (von Lehner, op. cit. 314 ff.)—or in later pictures are introduced as mere picturesque details. An incident in the Flight to Egypt, the bending down of a palm-tree to yield its fruit to Mary, affords a subject for many beautiful works (e.g. by Pinturicchio, William Blake). The Assumption of Mary was frequently represented in paintings from the 10th cent. onward (e.g. Titian's in the Academy, Venice; Botticelli's in the National Gallery), while the consummation of her life is depicted in her coronation as Queen of Heaven (among others by Raphael, Fra Angelico, and Taddeo Gaddi). The second part of the Gospel of Nicodemus—The Descent into Hell—gives a subject to Fra Angelico (San Marco, Venice) and to Dürer (in his series of woodcuts composing 'The Little Passion').

The narratives in the Koran about Jesus, who is regarded as a forerunner of Mohammed, are drawn largely from apocryphal sources, either directly from the so-called Arabic Gospel of the Infancy, or indirectly from the popular tales which had an apocryphal origin. An account is given, for instance, of Mary's nativity,—in the Koran her parents are named Imran and Hanne,—of her dedication to the Temple, of the miraculous choice of Joseph to be her protector, etc. Jesus is represented as working miracles in His childhood; His making of birds out of clay (Gospel of Thomas) is mentioned. The Koran represents strongly Docetic views in its denial that Jesus died upon the Cross. In Surah 4, 155 the Jews are reported as saying: 'We have killed the Messiah, Jesus, the Son of Mary, the Messenger of God'; to which the answer is immediately given: 'Yet they did not kill and crucify Him, but a phantom appeared to them. . . . In truth they did not kill Him, but God raised Him to Himself; for God is strong and wise.' Other legends about Jesus, not mentioned in the Koran, were collected by Moslem commentators, notably by Kessemus. See art. CHRIST IN MOHAMMEDAN LITERATURE in Appendix to vol. II.

A. 1. Gospel according to the Hebrews.—The earliest mention of this Gospel occurs in the Trophiata of Hegesippus about the year 180 (Euseb. HE iv. 22. 8). The name 'according to the Hebrews' is not original; in the circles in which the Gospel was current, it apparently had no distinctive name, that which it now bears having been given to it by outsiders, to indicate that it was the Gospel in use among Hebrew Christians, the descendants of the original Church in Judaea. There is some probability in the view, which is strongly advocated by Harnack (Chron. i. 637 f.), that the Gospel was in use in the Jewish-Christian community in Alexandria, and that the title was given to it to distinguish it from the Gospel used by the native Christian community, the Gospel according to the Egyptians. The language in which the Gospel was written (as we learn from Jerome, contra Pelag. iii. 2) was West Aramaic, the language of Christ and His Apostles,—a circumstance which betrays its influence on the narrative in the fact that the Holy Spirit is represented as female ('My Mother the Holy Spirit', the Aramaic ruha being feminine). The Gospel was translated into Latin and Greek by Jerome, who had a very high opinion of it, and was inclined to regard it as the original Matthew; but it is more than probable that it had already circulated in a Greek version in different parts of the Church, and found considerable recognition. It was wrongly identified by Jerome with the Ebionitic Gospel—the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles, also attributed to Matthew—which was written originally in Greek, and was in use among the Gnostic Ebionites.

As the fragments which have been preserved to us show, the Gospel according to the Hebrews was of the Synoptic type. Whether it contained a story of the Nativity is uncertain, but (considering the Jewish-Christian standpoint of the book) highly improbable. Included, however, were the Baptism, the Temptation, the Lord's Prayer, the Healing of the man with the withered hand, the pericope adulterae (or something similar), the injunction to forgive unto seventy times seven, the conversation with the Rich Young Ruler, the entrance into Jerusalem, the parable of the Pounds, the Trial, the denial of Peter, appearances after the Resurrection, and sayings of Jesus not elsewhere recorded. As a rule, the fragments show a somewhat closer resemblance to Mt. than to the other Synoptics, but there are also details which have their nearer parallels in Luke.

The divergences from the Synoptics are in several cases remarkable in character, and point, in the opinion of many scholars, to an earlier and more reliable tradition. In the narrative of the Baptism, Jesus, in answer to the proposal of His mother and brethren that they should go and be baptized by John for the remission of sin, says: 'In what have I sinned, that I should go and be baptized by him? Unless perhaps this which I have said be ignorance,—an utterance which is generally interpreted as meaning that Jesus, though conscious of no sin, was humble enough not to make the claim of sinlessness. (This passage, regarded by some as primitive and authentic, is better understood as the product of reflection at a time when Christ's baptism was felt to be a problem requiring solution. In the earliest days the presence of the problem was not felt. The writer of the Gospel, who holds to the sinlessness of Jesus, solves the difficulty by pointing to His deep humility.

After the Baptism, the descent of the Spirit is described with greater fullness than in the Synoptics: the dove is awaiting, but the voice from heaven is put into the form of an utterance by the Spirit: 'It came to pass, when the Lord was come up out of the water, that the whole fountain of the Holy Spirit came down and rested on Him and said unto Him, My Son, in all the prophets I awaited Thy coming, that I might rest on Thee. For Thou art my rest; Thou art my firstborn Son, who reignest for ever.'

A passage, which probably belongs to the narrative of the Temptation, reads: 'The Lord said, Just now My mother, the Holy Spirit, seized Me by one of My hairs and bore Me away to the high mountain Tabor,'—a fantastic description on the model of Eek 38 and Bal and the Dragon 8.

In the Lord's Prayer the fourth petition runs: 'Give us to-day our bread for to-morrow.' In the Aramaic mahar ('to-morrow') we may have the word used by Jesus Himself; in which case tesawar, translated 'daily' in Mt 6<sup>11</sup>, Lk 11<sup>3</sup> would be an adjectival form derived from tesawar (the following day). On the other hand, there are scholars who believe that the converse is the case, and that mahar is an attempt to give the meaning of tesawar (Meyer in Henn. 18, Zwands. 381.). The former alternative is the more probable.

The narrative of the healing on the Sabbath of the man with a withered hand represents the man as appealing to Jesus on the ground that he was a mason who earned his bread by working with his hands,—a detail which may well be authentic.

In the longest fragment of the Gospel we have a version of Christ's interview with the Rich Young Ruler, which shows notable differences from the Synoptic account. Where the Synoptists speak of the rich man's sorrow because of his inability to accept Christ's terms, the Gospel according to the Hebrews, in vivid and homely language, represents him as showing astonishment and a touch of resentment: '(He) began to scratch his head, and it did not please him.' Whereupon Jesus rebuked him for claiming to have fulfilled the law, when he had neglected offices of mercy and brotherly kindness: 'How sayest thou, I have done the law and the prophets? Since it is written in the law, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, and behold, many of thy brethren, the sons of Abraham, are covered with filth and are dying with hunger, while thy house is full of many good things, and nothing at all goes out of it to them.' If this account is to be taken as genuine, it is clear that our estimate of the Rich Young Ruler's character, based on the Synoptic tradition, will have to be considerably revised. It is, however, more probable that in this passage we have a mistaken combination of the story of the Rich Young Ruler with the parable of Dives and Lazarus related by Luke.

After the Resurrection, Jesus is represented as appearing first to James, to release him from a vow which he had taken at the Last Supper: 'James had sworn that he would not eat bread from that hour, when he had drunk the Lord's cup, until He should see Him risen from those that are asleep.' This is an obviously later form of the tradition of Christ's appearing to James, due most likely to the desire of Jewish Christians to exalt their head above the Apostles of Christ. It should be noted that James is here portrayed as one of Christ's followers who partook of the Last Supper,—an unhistorical detail. There is probably a confusion between James the just and James the brother of John, an inference borne out by the reference to drinking the Lord's cup (cf. Mt 26<sup>27</sup>).

Into the difficult question of the relation of the Gospel according to the Hebrews to the Synoptics, it is impossible in this article to enter with any fulness. That it is closely allied to them, especially to Mt., is clear from the character of the fragments. Three different solutions of the problem have been suggested, all of them supported by competent authorities. (1) Hebrews is held to be the original Aramaic Matthew (Hilgenfeld), or an elaboration of it (Zahn), and as such, the groundwork of our canonical Matthew. This view is now almost universally rejected. (2) Hebrews is held to be independent of the Synoptics, the affinity being explained by a common reliance on oral tradition. This view, which is the one at present most widely held, is strongly supported by Harnack, who goes so far as to express the hope (Chron. i. 645) that, after Zahn's penetrating discussion of the question, no one will have the hardihood to repeat the statement that the Gospel according to the Hebrews is based on one, or more canonical Gospels. That hope has not been realized. For (3) the view has recently been confidently advocated by Wernle (Synop. Frage, 248 ff.) that Hebrews is dependent on all the Synoptics, making use of Matthew, and in some cases combining the accounts of Matthew and Luke. Meyer (in Henn. 18) supports this view, and strongly emphasizes the secondary character of the Gospel. In this judgment the present writer is disposed to concur. It appears to him that all the facts of the case are satisfactorily explained, if we hold that the Gospel according to the Hebrews was written by one who used canonical Matthew (and Luke), and built up his Gospel on the basis of a separate tradition, under the influence of his own doctrinal prepossessions.

But even should the view of the Gospel's independence be accepted, this does not necessarily imply that in it we are face to face with an earlier, or an equally early, stage of the primitive tradition. The realistic presentation, the fondness for little details, the quaint and, in some particulars, undignified language, which are characteristic of the Gospel, may possibly be indications that in some narratives we have the tradition in its original form; on the other hand, these features may with as much probability be due to later manipulation by popular evangelists. Details, such as Christ's words before His baptism, which are by some regarded as primitive on the ground that they are of such a character that they could not have been added later, are believed by others (in our opinion more justly), to be products of an age of reflection. Traces of a later age than that of the Synoptics are found in the Resurrection fragment: there is the unhistorical detail in reference to the appearing of Christ to James, and the later apologetic interest is shown in securing witness for the resurrection from the enemies of Christ. (After rising from the dead, Jesus handed the linen cloth to the servant of the high priest.) The judgment is warranted that, while the Gospel according to the Hebrews probably retains in some points the freshness of the original tradition, it contains many elements that are secondary, and that, as a whole, it represents not an earlier, but a somewhat later stage of the Gospel tradition than the Synoptics. A date towards the end of the 1st cent. is probable.

On the view here taken of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, the value of its fragments as a source of the life of Jesus is inconsiderable. It cannot justly lay claim to be an authority, as Oscar Holtzmann regards it, on the same level as the Synoptics. Some sayings, however, ascribed to Christ and not elsewhere recorded, have a genuine ring, giving us, if not the ipsissima verba of Jesus, at least true echoes of His voice. Christ is represented as saying to His disciples: 'Never be glad, except when ye look upon your brother in love,'—a singularly beautiful precept condemning Schadenfreude, the disposition to rejoice in another's misfortune. The Gospel also reported a saying in which it was reckoned among the greatest offences that one should sadden the spirit of one's brother. Another striking saying, quoted from this Gospel by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. ii. 9. 45) and accepted by many as substantially a genuine utterance of Jesus, runs as follows: 'He that wonders shall reach the kingdom, and having reached the kingdom shall rest.' In another passage (Strom. v. 14. 96) Clement records the saying in a longer form, which agrees almost verbally with one of the Oxyrhynchus sayings: 'He who seeks shall not cease until he finds; and when he finds, he shall be astonished, and being astonished he shall reach the kingdom, and having reached the kingdom he shall rest.'

The ethical teaching of the Gospel, from all that we can gather, was in sympathy with the mind of Christ, stress being laid on brotherly love and forgiveness. Doctrinally, the Gospel occupies the position of the old Jewish Church. It exhibits Jesus as 'the Messiah sent from God, not as the Son of God conceived of the Holy Ghost in a special sense, but as the long expected Messiah of David's

A. 2. Gospel according to the Egyptians.—This Gospel, whose ancient date may be inferred from the fact that, like the Gospel according to the Hebrews, it bears no author's name, was current in native Christian circles in Egypt. Our information regarding it is very slight: it is mentioned by Origen in his discussion of the prologue in Luke's Gospel, and characterized by him, apparently on the ground of his own knowledge of it, as a heretical writing ('Ecclesia quattuor evangelia habet, hereses plurima, e quibus quoddam scribitur "secundum Ægyptios"'). It, by Jerome. All that can with certainty be said to remain of the Gospel is a small group of sayings, recorded by Clement of Alexandria in treating of the attitude of different Christian communities to marriage. References to the Gospel are also found in Hippolytus (Philos. v. 7), who states that it was used by the sect of the Naassenes to support their peculiar views about the nature of the soul, and in Epiphanius (Her. 62. 2), who mentions its use by the Sabellians.

The fragments which remain are part of a conversation between Jesus and Salome, and are all of the same character, dealing with the transient (if not sinful) nature of the sex relations. They read as follows:

1. "Salome asked, "How long shall death reign?" The Lord answered, "So long as ye women give birth." When Salome had said, "Then should I have done well, if I had not given birth!" the Lord answered, "Eat every plant, but that which is bitter, eat not" (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 6. 45).

2. "When Salome inquired when those things (the coming of the Kingdom) should be, the Lord said, "When ye trample on the garment of shame, and when the two become one, and the male with the female, neither male nor female" (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 13. 95).

3. "The Saviour said, "I came to destroy the works of the female" (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 9. 48).

The Encratite tendency of these sayings is recognized by the majority of scholars, but is energetically denied by Zahn, who, however, rejects No. 3 as not having stood in the Gospel according to the Egyptians. If the third saying be put aside, it is certainly arguable that the first two do not go much farther in an ascetic direction than Mt. 23:9 ('In the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels in heaven'). This view finds some support in the fragment of a Gospel discovered at Oxyrhynchus in 1903 (Grenfell and Hunt, New Sayings, 44). That Cassian, the Gnostic leader of the Encratites, from whom Clement quoted the sayings, used them to support his ascetic condemnation of marriage, is not decisive. It is noteworthy that Clement rejected Cassian's interpretation, and understood the sayings in a mystical sense. If, however, the Encratite sense of the words be maintained, Harnack is certainly justified by Clement's attitude in concluding that 'Encratism cannot have been the aim of the Gospel, in fact cannot have been stamped upon it as its characteristic feature, but that probably only this one passage occurred in it which could be adduced in favour of the extreme ascetic practice' (Chron. i. 616). That the Gospel contained much else that was entirely free from suspicion of heresy is probable; and this natural inference becomes a certainty, if we accept the widely received opinion, that the Gospel according to the Egyptians was used as a principal authority by the writer of the so-called Second Epistle of Clement of Rome (c. 170). In this writing, besides a passage closely reminiscent of the Gospel according to the Egyptians,* there are several, containing sayings of Jesus, of which some show verbal agreement with the Synoptics, while others, with considerable divergences, are similar in character. On the assumption, which is possible though incapable of proof, that 2nd Clement drew the sayings of Jesus recorded by him from one main source, and this was the Gospel according to the Egyptians, Harnack based the conclusion that the Gospel 'contained nothing heretical, else the Roman Church about 170 would certainly not have read it'; and, further, that it was an independent Gospel, having affinities with Matthew and Luke,

* The Lord Himself having been asked by some one, When will the kingdom come? said, When the two shall be one, and the outside as the inside, and the male with the female, neither male nor female. (2 Clem. xii. 2).

and containing in some instances sayings in a form even more original than they (Chron. i. 639 f.). One must confess that so extremely favourable a judgment, reared on a somewhat uncertain basis, does not inspire entire confidence when over against it one places Origen's view of the Gospel as heretical and its use by the Naassenes and Sabellians. While it may be allowed that there were probably passages in the Gospel which ranked it with the Synoptics, it seems clear that it showed affinities with the speculative teaching of Gnostic schools. It contained references to ' manifold changes ' of the soul which were relied on by the Naassene sect in building up their system of thought; and Epiphanius in refuting the heresy of the Sabellians, who made use of the Gospel according to the Egyptians, declared that 'there were in it many things put into the mouth of the Saviour, and said as in a corner mystically, such as His declaration to the disciples that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit were one and the same' (Her. 62. 2).

With so little to rest a confident judgment on, it is extremely difficult to characterize this Gospel, but it may be near the truth to say that it was a Gospel of the Synoptic type with a slight Gnostic colouring.*

The disposition to refer to this Gospel isolated fragments and utterances of Jesus, such as the Parable Fragment and the Oxyrhynchus Sayings, is extremely hazardous. All that can with certainty be said is that some of the recently discovered sayings 'belong to the same sphere of thought' as the Gospel. Further than that it is impossible to go (see Grenfell and Hunt, New Sayings, 27 ff.).

The date of the Gospel is about the middle of the 2nd cent., probably between 130 and 150.

A. 3. Gospel of Peter.—In his enumeration of Petrine writings, Eusebius mentions (HE iii. 3) a Gospel which, along with the Acts, Preaching and Apocalypse of Peter, he declares to be spurious, and not considered authoritative by any ecclesiastical writer. Until fourteen years ago, our knowledge of the contents of the Gospel was of the scantiest description, being based on a slight reference by Origen, on a letter by Serapion, bishop of Antioch (end of 2nd cent.), and on a passage in Theodoret, now generally discredited, which states that the Nazarenes, who honoured Christ as a just man, used the Gospel according to Peter (Her. Fabb. ii. 2). Origen's reference (Com. in Matt. bk. x. 17) tells us nothing more than that those who believed the brethren of Jesus to be the sons of Joseph by a former wife relied on the Gospel of Peter and the Book of James; from which we infer that the Gospel contained the narrative of the Virgin-birth. From Serapion's letter (part of it preserved in Euseb. HE vi. 13), which was written to the Church in Rhossus in the diocese of Antioch, we gather the following facts about the Gospel. When on a visit to Rhossus, Serapion had the Gospel brought under his notice, as being the occasion of some ill-feeling in the Church. Not suspecting any heretical leanings on the part of those who were favourable to the Gospel, the bishop, without any careful examination of its contents, sought to establish peace by authorizing it to be read. Having learned afterwards that the Gospel had originated among the Docetæ, he procured a copy from some members of that party, and found that, while it contained much true teaching, there were additions of a questionable character, to which he proceeded to call attention. Until recently this was all that was known of the Gospel of Peter; not a single fragment had been handed down; one could only gather that it was a * Von Dobschütz (Die urchr. Gemeinden, 190) finds in the Gospel a trace of the Gnostic idea of the subversion of all ordinary standards of value, from which 'it is only a short step to the perversion of all ethical conceptions.' This view is justly opposed by Zahn (NT Kan. ii. 640).

Gospel with a slight Docetic colouring, but for the most part entirely orthodox.

Of this long lost Gospel we have now a fragment of considerable length dealing with the Passion and Resurrection of Christ. The fragment was found in the winter of 1886-1887 at Akhmim, in Upper Egypt, by the French Archaeological Mission, and was published by M. Bouriant in 1892. The narrative claims to be the personal witness of the Apostle Peter, and reveals the Docetic tendency referred to by Serapion. The fragment begins at the end of the judgment-scene, after Pilate had washed his hands, and ends in the middle of a sentence, which introduces the narrative describing the appearance of Christ to His disciples at the Sea of Galilee. The nature of the contents can here only be indicated.

Herod is regarded as the real judge of Christ; throughout there is the evident intention to exculpate Pilate, who washed his hands, while Herod refused. It is Herod who gives the order for the crucifixion, and his permission is required for the disposal of the body of Jesus. When Jesus was handed over to the people, it is stated that they clothed Him with purple and set Him on the seat of judgment, saying, Judge righteously, O King of Israel. On the cross we learn that Jesus held His peace, as in no wise having pain. One of the ministrators approached the Jews standing round the cross (not his fellow-sufferer, as in Lk 23:35), and they, being angered with him, commanded that his legs should not be broken, that he might die in torment. After referring to the darkness which came over the land, the narrative runs: 'And the Lord cried out, saying, My power, My power, thou hast forsaken Me. And when He had said this, He was taken up.' After the death of Christ the Jews began to feel compunction for what they had done; they began to lament and to say, Woe for our sins; the judgment and the end of Jerusalem are nigh. . . . All the people mourned and beat their breasts, saying, If by His death those most mighty signs have happened, behold, how righteous He is. The Jewish authorities, having received soldiers from Pilate to guard the tomb for three days, themselves took part in the watch. The Resurrection is described with many miraculous details; there is a voice from heaven; two men, encircled by a great light, descend and enter the tomb, from which the stones roll away of itself. Then the watchers see three men coming out of the tomb, the two supporting the one, and a cross following them; and the heads of the two reached as far as heaven, but that of Him that was led overtopped the heavens. And they heard a voice from heaven saying, Hast thou preached to them that sleep? And a response was heard from the cross, Yea. When Pilate was informed of all that had happened, he said, I am pure from the blood of the Son of God. He was entreated by the Jewish authorities to command the centurion and the soldiers to tell nothing of what they had seen, for it is better (say they) for us to be guilty of the greatest sin before God than to fall into the hands of the people of the Jews and be stoned. The rest of the fragment deals with the visit of Mary Magdalene and other women to the sepulchre, and with the grief of the disciples. The fragment closes as follows: 'But we, the twelve disciples of the Lord, wept and were grieved; and each one, being grieved for that which was come to pass, departed to his home. But I, Simon Peter, and Andrew my brother, took our nets and went to the sea; and there was with us Levi, the son of Alphaeus, whom the Lord . . .'

The writer's peculiar point of view is clear from the quotations which have been given. (1) The most noticeable feature of the Gospel is its pronounced apologetic interest, shown in its friendliness to Pilate and its antipathy to the Jews. Pilate is freed from all blame in the death of Christ, Herod being the responsible judge; Joseph, who cared for the body of Jesus, is 'the friend of Pilate.' Pilate, too, is represented as acknowledging the Divine dignity of Jesus. On the other hand, the Jews acknowledge their sin in putting Jesus to death, and confess Him to have been a just man. The writer's fierce hatred of the Jews is betrayed in the utterance ascribed to the Jewish authorities, that they would rather be guilty of the greatest sin than fall into the hands of men. (2) The Docetic sympathies of the writer, which are somewhat guarded, are revealed in the statement that Jesus kept silence on the cross, 'as in no wise feeling pain'; in the cry of dereliction, which points to a distinction between the impassible Divine Power residing in Jesus and His passible human nature; in the representation of Christ's death as a being taken up. That the Docetism was not of an extreme type is shown by the fact that the dead Christ is referred to as 'the Lord.' Gnostic influences are discernible in the speaking of the cross, and in the supernatural height of Jesus and the angels.

The Gospel is of the Synoptic type. It has close linguistic and material relations with the Synoptics, although there are many deviations in order and detail. There is a considerable probability that the author knew and made use of all our canonical Gospels, which he treated with great freedom, embellishing the narrative in the interest of his own point of view, and making additions of a legendary and highly miraculous character. That he had an independent tradition at his command is possible, and even probable (? ancient Acts of Pilate); but whether that be so or not, his Gospel adds nothing to our knowledge of the life of Christ. It appears to be a fair example of what may be called the second generation of non-canonical narratives, which are based upon the earlier and authentic records, and do not yet depart very widely from them, though they may have special tendencies in various doctrinal directions. (Kenyon, Gospels in the Early Church, 34.)

The date of the Gospel is about the middle of the 2nd cent., although some critics put it considerably earlier. Its place of origin was almost certainly Syria.

A. 4. Fayûm Gospel Fragment.—A number of papyri were, in the year 1882, brought from Fayûm, a province in Central Egypt, to Vienna, by the Archduke Rainer. Among these, Dr. Bickell of Innsbrück discovered a small Gospel fragment, dealing with the incident in which Jesus foretold the denial of Peter. The fragment, which is badly mutilated, was published in 1885 by Bickell, who confidently maintained that it was a part of a very ancient lost Gospel, of the class referred to in Lk 11. The contents of the fragment closely resemble the Synoptic narrative (Mk 14:27-30, Mt 26:31-34), with the omission of the verse containing Christ's promise to go before His disciples into Galilee after rising from the dead. Owing to the condition of the papyrus, the text, especially at the beginning of the fragment, is very uncertain; but, according to the reconstruction of Zahn (NT Kan. ii, 785), the translation is as follows:

'[When they had sung a hymn, after] supper, according to their custom, He said again, This night ye shall be offended, according to the Scripture, I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered. But when Peter said, Even if all shall be offended, I will not, He said, To-day before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny Me thrice.'

The nature of the document to which the fragment originally belonged is altogether uncertain. Bickell's opinion, that it is a part of a Gospel of high antiquity, has received the support of Harnack, who inclines to regard it as an excerpt from either the Gospel according to the Hebrews or the Gospel according to the Egyptians (TU v, 4, 493 ff., Chron. i, 590). On the other hand, Zahn believes it to be an extract from a Patristic writing, a free quotation from Mark made by a preacher or by the writer of a book for edification. This would satisfactorily account for the omission of Mk 14<sup>28</sup> (Mt 26<sup>28</sup>). That the fragment probably belonged to a writing of this kind is further borne out by two striking deviations from the Synoptic phraseology. Instead of ἀλεκτρον (cock) the fragment has the more classical ἀλεκτρονίς; instead of the colourless φωνήν (crow) it has the more descriptive word κωκυτήν. The probability is that the canonical expression is the original, which a preacher replaced in the one case by a more elegant word, in the other by one more significant' (Zahn, NT Kan. ii. 788). Hennecke (NT Apokr. 9) thinks it possible that the fragment may have been a part of a collection of sayings, but subscribes to Krüger's judgment, that 'the possibility is not excluded that the fragment merely represents an extract from one of our Gospels, or belonged to a Gospel harmony, perhaps even is drawn from a homily, and that one is not justified in drawing far-reaching conclusions from it.'

A. B. Oxyrhynchus Gospel Fragment.—In the year 1903 Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt discovered at Behnesa, the ancient Oxyrhynchus, in Central Egypt, a small portion of a Gospel containing the conclusion of a discourse by Jesus similar to a part of the Sermon on the Mount. This they published, along with a second collection of 'Sayings,' in the following year. The papyrus is in a very broken state, only a small part of that which it originally contained being decipherable. From the handwriting the discoverers adjudged the fragment to have been written not later than A.D. 250, although the original composition was much earlier.

The translation of the fragment, slightly altered from that given by Grenfell and Hunt (New Sayings, 40), is as follows:

'Take no thought from morning until even, nor from evening until morning, either for your food what ye shall eat or for your raiment what ye shall put on. Ye are far better than the lilies which grow but spin not. Having one garment, what do ye (lack)? . . . Who could add to your stature? He Himself will give you your garment. His disciples say unto Him, When wilt Thou be manifest to us, and when shall we see Thee? He saith, When ye shall be stripped and not be ashamed. . . . He said, The key of knowledge they hid; they entered not in themselves, and to them that were entering in they opened not; but ye, be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves.'

The sayings here given are, for the most part, parallel to passages found in Matthew and Luke, in a form generally somewhat shorter than the canonical version. Christ's answer to the question of the disciples as to when He should manifest Himself, 'When ye shall be stripped and not be ashamed . . .', recalls the saying reported in the Gospel according to the Egyptians: 'When ye trample upon the garment of shame,' etc., and suggests the conclusion that the fragment stood in intimate relation with that Gospel. The simpler form of the saying in the fragment, and the more direct allusion to Gn 3<sup>7</sup>, point to an earlier date than that of the version in the Gospel according to the Egyptians. Though it is possible that the fragment represents a tradition independent of the Synoptics, it is more probable that the Gospel to which it belonged worked up the material found in Matthew and Luke into new combinations, and added matter drawn from other sources.

The date of the Gospel was probably somewhat earlier than the middle of the 2nd century.

B. HERETICAL AND Gnostic GOSPELS.—Only a few of the more important Gnostic Gospels are referred to in this article. Many are known to us by name merely, or by some indication of the circles in which they were current. Although the Gnostics repudiated the canonical Apostolic writings, they sought in many instances to secure authority for their Gospels by attributing them to Apostles or to others well known in Apostolic times. Besides those mentioned below, there were Gospels of Matthias, of Bartholomew, of Andrew, of Barnabas; and even the name of Judas Iscariot was associated with the authorship of the Gospel. Gnostic Gospels sometimes bore the name of the founder of the school (Valentinus, Basilides, Cerinthus), but in these cases the writer of the Gospel claimed to have received his information from some Apostle or follower of an Apostle. OT names were also attached to some Gospels; Epiphanius (Hær. 26. 2) refers to a Gospel of Eve. For whatever knowledge we have of these Gospels, readers are referred to Hofmann's article (PRE<sup>3</sup> i. 661 ff.) or to Tasker's article (l.c. 437 f.).

B. 1. Gospel of Marcion.—Shortly before the middle of the 2nd cent., Marcion, a native of Pontus, settled in Rome, where he devoted himself to the work of purifying the Church from all Jewish influences. The underlying principle of his system was the conception of the absolute antagonism between the God of the OT and the God of the NT. Only in Christ was the true God made known. He accordingly rejected the OT, and prepared the Churches which he founded a canon of NT writings, divided into 'the Gospel' and 'the Apostle.' The original Apostles, he maintained, had misunderstood the teaching of Christ; only Paul had grasped the true significance of the gospel. Into his canon he admitted ten Epistles of Paul, largely expurgated, and one Gospel, which he claimed to be the Pauline Gospel (τὸ εὐαγγέλιον μου, Ro 2<sup>16</sup>). This Gospel, according to the testimony of early Church writers, was the Gospel of Luke, from which great omissions had been made to free it from all Jewish colouring. All citations from the OT were cut out, and everything else which looked with favour on the Jews. From the quotations given by Tertullian, Epiphanius, and others, it is possible to reconstruct Marcion's Gospel. The whole of the Infancy narrative, the Baptism, and the Temptation were omitted, nothing of the first three chapters in Luke being retained but the chronological notice in 3<sup>1</sup>. The history of Jesus commences with 4<sup>14</sup>, and from that point to the end of the Gospel larger or smaller portions are excised, amounting in all to over 120 verses. Among the passages excluded are the parables of the Prodigal Son and of the wicked Husbandmen. In all, including the omissions of the first three chapters and part of the fourth, we find that Marcion's Gospel was shorter than Luke's by fully 300 verses.

Against all Patristic testimony some critics (Semler and Eichhorn in the 18th cent., Baur, Ritschl, and Schweigler in the 19th) maintained the priority of Marcion's Gospel to that of Luke. The traditional view was, however, so completely vindicated by Hilgenfeld and Volkmar, that Ritschl retracted. In our own country, somewhat later, the battle was refought, with the same result. The author of Supernatural Religion revived the theory of Marcion's originality, and called forth a reply by Dr. Sanday (Gospels in the Second Century, ch. viii.), in which he conclusively proved, to the satisfaction of his opponent, that Luke's Gospel was from one hand, the same characteristics of style being evident in Marcion's Gospel and in the sections of Luke not found in it.

Where the text of Marcion differs from Luke, there is evidence in some cases to show that the variance is due, not to any arbitrary change made by Marcion in the interest of his peculiar views, but to the copy of the Third Gospel which lay before him. The readings of Marcion thus de-tempted yet, because she was of the family of David. There is no reason, however, for supposing that these different traditions were combined by any one man, or that the author of the latter.

With the exception of the Zacharias group of incidents, the Pseudo-Matthew is a well-constructed unity, a skillfully constructed romance, in which the author, with the help of material lying ready to his hand, achieved to his own satisfaction the definite purpose which he had in view. What this purpose was it is not difficult to divine. It was to defend the orthodox conception of Christ's person against a double attack, and to give an answer to those who treated Christ with the levity of not shaming the birth of Jesus. Accordingly, Mary was represented as of royal descent, the daughter of a wealthy man, brought up in the pure atmosphere of the Temple; that was a sufficient answer to every calumny about her character, and to every sneer about her humble rank. Against the Gnostic view that Jesus, in being born of Mary, did not partake of her human nature, it was enough to mention that the infant took the breast from His mother. The whole strength of the author was, however, devoted to safeguarding the Divinity of Jesus against Jewish-Christian misconceptions. That end, he conceived, could be best attained by exalting the person of Mary, by revealing her as one who, from birth to womanhood, had retained an absolute purity and virginity. She was born, in answer to prayer, to parents who had long been childless; she was brought up in the Temple, and fed on heavenly food; in virginity she conceived by the power of the Lord; in virginity she gave birth; in virginity she remained to the end; at every stage her virginity is raised above suspicion; the drinking of the water of the ordeal guaranteed her virginity in conception; the witness of Solomon established it in the birth; with the statement, given under the authority of James, that the brethren of Jesus were sons of Joseph by a former wife, was sufficient to remove any doubts of her virginity to the last.

The author of the Pseudo-Matthew, it is clear, was an Jewish Christian. His ignorance of Jewish usage is notably betrayed in the representation of Mary as a temple-virgin (an absurd notion of thing among the Jews), and in the water of the ordeal being administered to Joseph (see No. 5). The Hebraistic colouring is due to the sources which the writer used. In certain of the incidents he is influenced by OT narratives (birth and dedication of Samuel, Aaron's rod, etc.), which he doubtless read in the Greek version. The canonical accounts of the Annunciation and Nativity have been largely drawn upon. Conroy's view, that the Pseudo-Matthew was the source of Matthew and Luke (Die Quelle d. ev. Kindheitsgeschichten), and that it was originally written in Hebrew (SK, 1889, p. 728 ff.), have received no support. The former view Henrichs characterizes as "critische Gesch-macklosigkeit".

The Pseudo-Matthew was condemned by the Western Church in the decree of Damasus (282), Innocent I. (405), and Gelasius (495). Popular Christianity, however, demanded something in the place of that which had been forbidden, and letters were forged, one to Jerome from which the bishops Chromastus of Aquileia and Heliodorus of Alimera, the other the answer of Jerome, from which it appeared that the learned Father had acceded to the bishops' request to translate into Latin the original Hebrew Matthieu. This explains the appearance of The Gospel of pseudo-Matthew, which freely worked over the contents of the Pseudo-Matthew, gave an account of the Flight to Egypt and the miracles wrought on the way, and added narrative drawn from the Childhood Gospel of Thomas. A detail, which is frequently represented in Christian art, — the ox and the ass at the manger, — appears for the first time in this Gospel. The exception of Mary, which received an impulse in the Pseudo-Matthew, has now grown to greater proportions; she is glorified as the Queen of the Virgins; and her holy, man-like manner of life is dwelt upon at considerable length. The date of ps. Matth. is 6th century.

The Gospel of the Nativity of Mary, also connected with Jerome by another forged letter, covers the same ground as the Pseudo-Matthew (with the exception of the Zacharias legend). The aim of the book is to exalt Mary as the spotless virgin; after her betrothal to Joseph she does not go home with him, but returns to her parents' house. There she receives the angel's message. The Gospel closes with the bare mention of the birth of Jesus. This new recension of the Pseudo-Matthew was doubtless due to an orthodox revival of feeling against the somewhat coarse and extravagant nature of pseudo-Matthew. The date is probably late in the 6th century.

B. 2. Gospel of the Twelve Apostles.—Among the heretical attempts to write the history of Jesus, Origen in his Homily on Lk. 1st mentions 'the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles' (τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τῶν δωδεκά ἀποστόλων). That this Gospel is the same as one which Epiphanius (Hær. 30, 3) describes as 'The Gospel according to Matthew' in use among the Gnostic Ebionites, is clear from the fact that in the opening passage quoted by Epiphanius we have the call of the twelve Apostles, of whom Matthew is specially addressed ('and thee, Matthew, I called, while thou wast sitting at the seat of custom'). Epiphanius further states that the Ebionites called their Gospel 'The Gospel according to the Hebrews,' a reference which may rest on a confusion on the part of Epiphanius (as Harnack thinks), but more probably is quite accurate. Nothing seems more likely than that the Gnostic Jewish-Christian sect, acquainted with the tradition that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Hebrew, should have claimed that their Gospel was the genuine Gospel of Matthew, and, accordingly, the true Hebrew Gospel (Hennecke, NT Apokr. 24). If this be so, we have an explanation of the error into which Jerome fell when he identified the Gospel according to the Hebrews with the Gospel according to the Apostles in use among the Nazarenes (c. Pelag. iii. 2). That these two Gospels were entirely different is apparent from the widely divergent accounts of the Baptism—the one incident, common to both, described in their extant fragments.

All that remains of the Gospel of the Ebionites is found in Epiphanius (Hær. 30, 13, 14, 16, 22). The Gospel opens with the ministry of the Baptist: 'It came to pass in the days of Herod, the King of Judaea, that John came baptizing with the baptism of repentance in the river Jordan.' Then somewhat abruptly, after the manner of the Fourth Gospel, Jesus is introduced in the midst of the narrative dealing with the Baptist. 'There was a certain man named Jesus (and He was about thirty years old), who chose us.' An account of the calling of the Apostles follows, special emphasis being laid on the call of Matthew. Then the broken thread of the narrative is again taken up. 'And John was baptizing, and Pharisees came out to him and were baptized, and all Jerusalem. . . His food was wild honey, the taste of which was the taste of manna, like a honey-cake in oil.' In the narrative of Christ's baptism which follows, three voices come from heaven; the first, 'Thou art My beloved Son, in Thee I am well pleased,' being repeated for the benefit of the Baptist, 'This is My beloved Son,' etc.; the second is addressed to Christ, 'I have this day begotten Thee.' Another fragment describes the incident recorded in Mt. 12:40 in words which vary only very slightly from the canonical version. Characteristic of the teaching of the Gospel are the two remaining fragments: 'I am come to destroy sacrifices, and except ye cease from sacrificing, wrath will not cease from you'; and 'Surely I have in no wise desired to eat flesh at this passover with you.'

The tendency of the Gospel is characteristically Ebionitic. All that is reported of Jesus is in harmony with the views of the Gnostic Ebionites (Elkesaites), who combined the old Jewish-Christian belief in Jesus as a mere man, anointed to be Messiah through the descent of the Spirit at baptism, with the doctrine of a heavenly Christ, 'who wanders over the common earth among men, like a strange guest from heaven, in order that He may lead into His eternal kingdom all that is spiritual and pure in this impure material world' (Hennecke, 25). The matter-of-fact way in which Jesus is introduced in the Gospel ('there was a certain man named Jesus') points to the view that of Himself Jesus was nothing to the members of this sect, but only became significant as the object of faith through the descent of the heavenly Christ. The ascetic (vegetarian) views of the Ebionites and their hatred of sacrifices of blood are manifest in the fragments. In accordance with his vegetarian sympathies, the author removes locusts (ἀκρίδας) from the Baptist's diet, and by way of compensation states that the honey which he ate tasted like honey-cake (εὐκαίσι) in oil. The play on the words ἀκρίσι and εὐκαίσι shows that our Greek Gospels, and not a Hebrew original, lay before the writer.

The author in the composition of his work made use of the canonical Gospels in a free and clumsy manner. The narrative of the Baptism, in particular, is extremely awkward and badly told. No scruples deterred the writer from changing the words of Christ to the directly opposite sense by the simple insertion of a negative ('I have in no wise desired to eat this passover-flesh with you'; cf. Lk. 22:15).

The date of the Gospel is late in the 2nd cent.; Zahn puts it at 170; Harnack not earlier than 180, and perhaps as late as the beginning of the 3rd cent.

B. 3. Gospel of Thomas.—A single citation from a Gnostic Gospel of Thomas is given by Hippolytus (Philos. v. 7), who states that he found it in a writing in use among the Naasenes: 'He who seeks me shall find me in children from seven years old; for there concealed in the fourteenth year I shall be made manifest.' Origen (Hom. in Luc. i. 1) speaks of a Gospel of Thomas; and a Gospel bearing that name is placed by Eusebius (HE iii. 25, 6) among heretical writings. Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. iv. 36), referring to 'spurious and noxious Gospels,' mentions a Gospel according to Thomas written by the Manicheans; and in another passage (Cat. vi. 31) he warns all against reading it, as it is written not by an Apostle, but by 'one of the three evil disciples of Manes.' The Decretum Gelasii condemns a Gospel of Thomas which was used by the Manicheans. In what relation (if any) the Manichean Gospel stood to the Gnostic Gospel, referred to by Hippolytus, is indiscoverable, as no fragment of the former is known. That the Gnostic Gospel bears some relation to the Childhood Gospel of Thomas is practically certain from what we know of the latter, and from the character of the passage cited by Hippolytus. There are indications in the Childhood Gospel which point to a Gnostic origin; and this being the case, if the two Gospels were entirely independent, it would be nothing less than marvellous that, while the one is composed of narratives of Christ's childhood, the only fragment preserved of the other should contain a cryptic utterance of Christ about children. (See below, C. (a) 2, where also literature will be found).

B. 4. Gospel of Philip.—A solitary fragment of this Gospel is preserved in Epiphanius (Hær. 26, 13), who states: 'The Gnostics cite a Gospel, forged in the name of Philip the holy Apostle, as saying:

'The Lord revealed to me what the soul must say in ascending to heaven, and how she must answer each of the upper powers: "I have known myself and gathered myself from all quarters, and I have borne no children to the Archon (the ruler of this world), but I have rooted up his roots and gathered the scattered members, and I know who thou art. For I am one of those who are from above." And so she is released. But if one be found who has borne a son, she is kept below until she is able to recover her own children and to educate them for herself.'

The Coptic Gnostic writing, the Pistis Sophia, bears witness to the existence in the 3rd cent. of the Gospel of Philip in Gnostic circles in Egypt. It is there stated: 'And when Jesus had made an end of speaking these words, Philip leaped up and stood, and laid down the book which was in his hand, for he it is who writes all things which Jesus said and did' (Harnack, *Gesch. d. altchr. C. (b) 2. The Legend of Abgar.—In Eusebius (HE i. 13, 6 ff.) we find letters purporting to have passed between Abgar v. king of Edessa, and Jesus. Eusebius states that the letters were preserved in the royal archives, and gives a literal translation of them from the Syriac. Abgar, who was suffering from an incurable disease, having heard of Christ's wonderful power of healing, wrote, entreating Christ to come and cure him, and offering Him a residence in Edessa, where He would be safe from the malice of the Jews. Jesus replied that He must accomplish His mission and ascend to Him who had sent Him, but that after His ascension He would send one of His disciples, who would cure the king and bring life to him and all who were with him. Then follows an account, also translated from the Syriac, of the fulfilment of Christ's promise in the sending by the Apostle Thomas of Thaddæus, one of the Seventy, to Edessa.

The legendary character of the correspondence is beyond all doubt, although its genuineness was accepted by Eusebius, and has been defended by several scholars, among them Cureton and Phillips in England (see Phillips, Addai the Apostle, ix ff.). It had its origin some time after the introduction of Christianity into Edessa (c. 170), owing to a desire to have an Apostolic foundation for the Church. The date of it is probably the second half of the 3rd century.

The correspondence and the narrative of Addai's mission found a place, with many additions, in the Syriac Teaching of Addai, which dates from about 400. The legend had a wide influence, and found credence in all sections of the Church, notwithstanding the doubts expressed regarding it in the Gelasian Decree; a Greek recension of it—the Acts of Thaddæus—contains in addition the story of the portrait of Jesus miraculously stamped on a napkin. See also art. ABGAR.

The legendary letter of Christ was in widespread favour as a talisman to guard against dangers of all kinds. For this purpose it was placed at the city gate of Edessa and at the doors of private houses. Up to quite recent times copies of the letter were to be found framed in the houses of the peasantry in England (see Donohoo, Apocryphal and Legendary Life of Christ, 223).

D. Gospel of Tatian.—The Gospel of Tatian, better known as the Diatessaron,* was a Harmony of the four Gospels, in all likelihood written originally in Syriac for the use of the Church at Edessa. The author of the Harmony was a disciple of Justin Martyr in Rome; but, being condemned for heretical views, he returned to his native land in the valley of the Euphrates about the year 172. Between that date and the close of the 2nd cent. his 'patchwork Gospel' was written, in which, using the chronological scheme of the Fourth * Diatessaron (διὰ τεσσάρων) is variously interpreted. The expression is generally regarded as signifying a compilation in which only the four Gospels were used; but as the word was in use as a musical terminus technicus to denote a harmony, Tatian might have employed it as a description of his work, no matter how many Gospels he had drawn upon (Hamlyn Hill, Earliest Life of Christ, 21; Jülicher, Einführung, 391 f.).

Gospel, he wove into a connected narrative the four different accounts of our Lord's life. It is doubtful whether, before the appearance of the Diatessaron, the four Gospels circulated separately in the Syrian Church; but however that may be, it was clearly Tatian's intention to provide a Gospel for popular use which should obviate the disadvantages of having the narrative of Christ's life in different forms. The evidence goes to show that the Diatessaron was in general use in the Syrian Church up to the beginning of the 5th cent. In the Teaching of Addai (c. 400) we read that 'a large multitude of people assembled day by day and came to the prayer of the service, and to the reading of the Old and New Testament, of the Diatessaron, etc. (Phillips, Addai the Apostle, 34). In the middle of the 4th cent. Ephraem used the Diatessaron as the basis of his famous commentary on the Gospels. But from the 5th cent. onwards Tatian's Gospel was displaced from public worship by the new translation of the separate Gospels made under Rabbulā,—the Peshiṭta, the Syriac Vulgate,—although, largely owing to the commentary of Ephraem, it continued to be read and to exert an influence for many centuries later.

Neither the Diatessaron nor the commentary of Ephraem has been preserved to us in the original Syriac. There are, however, Latin and Arabic versions of the Diatessaron, and two distinct Armenian versions of Ephraem's commentary. For the reconstruction of the text of the Diatessaron, Ephraem's commentary is of the highest value, and the work has been brilliantly executed by Zahn (Forschungen, i.). Unfortunately, while the Latin and Arabic versions keep Tatian's arrangement of the narrative, they are of no value for the restoration of the text. The Latin Harmony (Codex Fuldensis), which belongs to about the beginning of the 6th cent., gives throughout the text of the Vulgate; while the Arabic version, which was originally made in the 11th cent., is evidently a translation from a text of the Diatessaron which had been accommodated to the Peshiṭta. In the 9th cent. an epic poem entitled Heliodor was written, based on a translation of the Codex Fuldensis. It became widely known, and to it our Anglo-Saxon forefathers were largely indebted for their knowledge of the life of Christ (Hamlyn Hill, op. cit. 20, 38).

In accordance with Tatian's peculiar views, the Diatessaron reveals a slight Encratite tendency. According to Theodoret (HE v. Fab. i. 20), it omitted the genealogies of Christ and everything dealing with Christ's birth ('all things that show our Lord to have been born of the seed of David according to the flesh'). The Birth-narratives of Luke and Matthew are, however, found in the Arabic and Latin recensions, as well as in Ephraem's commentary.

GOVERNOR.—The word 'governor' (ἑπάρχων, Lat. præses, dux) is a comprehensive term, being the only Greek word which includes every class of provincial governor under the Roman empire. The following officials, for instance, are included under this title:—(1) Governors of Senatorial Provinces, namely, pro consularibus who are ex-consuls, and pro consularibus who are ex-prætors. The former class ruled the governmental spheres of duty, Asia and Africa; the latter all other provinces which by the arrangement between Augustus and the Senate in 27 B.C. were put under the authority of that body, such as Sicily, Macedonia, Achaia. (2) Governors of Imperial Provinces, namely, legati Augusti pro praetoribus who are ex-consuls; legati Augusti pro praetoribus who are ex-praetors; procuratores; praefecti Aegypti, etc. Examples of Imperial provinces are Syria, the Gauls (except Narbonensis), Judea, and Egypt. These governors were all accountable to the Emperor, being put in charge of his provinces, but were by no means of equal rank. The legati were always members of the Senate, but the others were of the lower rank of equites. It was to this class that Pilate belonged (Mt 27. 28; see under PROCURATOR, PILATE). Every senator, being a member of the same class as the Emperor himself, was a possible rival to him; those of inferior rank were practically in the position of his servants.

Governors of provinces had certain powers of jurisdiction delegated to them, which it is now impossible accurately to define. These were embodied in mandata given to them before setting out. They were also, of course, influenced by the traditions of the province to which they were going. They administered the law with a competence and a justice which have never been surpassed. As the provinces had an appeal from their decisions to the Senate in the case of Senatorial provinces, and to the Emperor in the case of Imperial, it was dangerous for a governor to go against the strongly expressed wish of the subjects of Rome. A procurator, for example, could be cast aside by the Emperor and ruined for life, without the slightest chance of redress.

Governors were commonly changed annually. The emperor Tiberius, however, retained many governors for a number of years in one position, and he also instituted the custom of payment of definite salaries to such, thus doing away with the necessity for plunder in order to recoup themselves.

The Roman system was sufficiently elastic to permit the appointment of officers for special service and the suspension of the regular order of things. It was probably under an arrangement of this kind that P. Sulpicius Quirinius was 'governor of Syria' (Lk 2<sup>9</sup>) in A.D. 6-9 (Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? ch. xi.), in order to carry on a campaign against the Heronadenses, and leave the ordinary governor free for civil duties. See art. BIRTH OF CHRIST.

In Mt 10<sup>3</sup>, Mk 13<sup>3</sup>, and Lk 21<sup>23</sup> 'kings' are coupled with 'governors.' The reference here is to 'client-kings' of the Roman empire (such as Herod) as well as the ordinary governors. The territory ruled by such kings was part of the imperium Romanum in the fullest sense of that term. In other words, the Romans had suzerainty over these kingdoms; but they left them under the rule of their kings until they were sufficiently civilized to become ordinary provinces under ordinary governors. Then they were taken over. In Lk 21<sup>23</sup> the 'kings' are mentioned before the 'governors.' If this change is not accidental, it would appear that St. Luke wished βασιλείς to be understood in the sense of 'emperors,' a sense quite in accordance with the Greek. The plural need be no difficulty, as it was the common practice for emperors to have their successors invested with the imperial powers, while they themselves were still alive and active.

ALEX. SOUTER.

GRACE (χάρις).—The Gr. χάρις, with which 'grace' in Eng. fully corresponds, is one of those words (cf. ἀγάπη, ἀγάπη, 'love') which have been raised to a higher power and filled with a profound content by the revelation of Jesus Christ. In accordance with its derivation from χαίρω, it originally signified in classical Gr. something that gives joy or delight, hence charm or winsomeness. From this it came to be used in a subjective sense of a courteous, kindly, or, as we say, a 'gracious' disposition; and so became equivalent to goodwill or favour. From the sense of favour as an attitude of will and feeling, the transition was natural to 'a favour,' a concrete token of kindness and goodwill. Finally, as grace implies not only a giver but a receiver, it was employed to denote the gratitude felt by the latter for the favour bestowed, and the thanks by which gratitude is expressed (cf. the Eng. phrase 'grace before meat'). In nearly all these senses the word is found both in the LXX and the NT. But, while the LXX does not carry us beyond the point reached in the classical authors, when we pass to the NT the old meanings of χάρις are wonderfully enlarged, until, as Cremer says (Lex. s.v.), 'it has become quite a different word in NT Greek, so that we may say it depended upon Christianity to realize its full meaning and to elevate it to its rightful sphere.'

1. Grace in the Gospels.—In AV of the Gospels, 'grace' occurs only 4 times, once in Lk. (2<sup>9</sup>) and thrice in Jn. (1<sup>14</sup>, 15, 17). When we turn to the RV, however, and include the marginal readings, we find the word in 4 other Lukan passages. Thrice it is used as a marginal alternative for 'favour' or 'favoured' (Lk 1<sup>28</sup>, 30, 22<sup>9</sup>), while in one important passage (4<sup>29</sup>) 'words of grace' is substituted for 'gracious words.' In every case, both in Lk. and Jn., the corresponding Gr. word is χάρις, with the exception of Lk 1<sup>28</sup> where the derivative ἡ χάρις is used. Besides these passages in which either in AV or RV it is rendered 'grace,' χάρις occurs 4 times in Lk. (3<sup>22</sup>, 33, 34, 17<sup>9</sup>) in the sense of 'thanks.'

(1) We observe that grace is not a word or idea that is used by the Synoptists generally, St. Luke being the only one who employs it. It is also worthy of notice that the term is not one which the Evangelist ever attributes to Jesus Himself. It is true that he represents Jesus as using χάρις 4 times, but only in the ordinary colloquial sense of thanks. Thus, although χάρις or 'grace' was to undergo something like a transfiguration through the influence of Christianity, and indeed was to become not only a specifically Christian word, but a word of which we might say that it shines like a jewel on the brow of Christ Himself, whose life and death and teaching gave birth to the ideas which it has come to express, it is not a term which we find in any of our Lord's recorded utterances.

In 4 out of the 5 Lukan passages in which 'grace' occurs, it has the ordinary sense of 'favour.' Twice the Virgin Mary is declared to have been the object of the Divine favour (Lk 1<sup>28</sup>, 30). Of Jesus it is said in one passage that the grace (or favour) of God was upon Him (2<sup>9</sup>), and in another that He advanced in favour (or grace) with both God and men (3<sup>22</sup>). The remaining passage (4<sup>29</sup>) is the only Synoptic one which may possibly carry us on to the peculiar Christian significance of the word. When Jesus preached His first sermon in the synagogue at Nazareth, His fellow-townsmen are said to have wondered ἐπὶ τοῖς λόγοις τοῦ χάριτος. AV renders 'at the gracious words'; RV, more literally, 'at the words of grace.' But what does the expression mean? Does it point merely, as has commonly been supposed, to our Lord's winsomeness and charm as a speaker, His grace of manner, His possession of one of the most effective of the gifts of an orator? Or is χάρις to be taken not as a Hebraistic gen. of quality, but as an objective gen., so that 'words of grace' = 'words about grace'? It is not impossible that by this phrase, which is thus capable of a double interpretation, St. Luke intended to convey a twofold meaning, and to let his readers understand that the words of Christ, as Dr. Bruce puts it, were 'words of grace about grace' (Exp. Gr. Test. in loc.). In any case, however, it seems probable that the objective meaning was the one immediately before the Evangelist's mind. The fact that genitives of quality are frequent in writings influenced by Heb., and that parallels to the use of χάρις to denote the quality of charm in a speaker can be added not only from the LXX (Ec 10<sup>13</sup>, Ps 44<sup>2</sup>, Sir 21<sup>19</sup>), but from the classical authors (Hom. Od. viii. 175; Dem. Orat. li. 9), weighs little in comparison with the analogies offered by the usage of St. Luke himself in Acts. It is admitted that λόγος τῆς χάριτος αὐτοῦ (Ac 14<sup>26</sup>) means the message of salvation, and that τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τῆς χάριτος τοῦ θεοῦ (20<sup>24</sup>) means the gospel of the grace of God in the full Pauline and Christian sense of the expression. Moreover, the text from which our Lord preached His Nazareth sermon (Lk 4<sup>18-19</sup>, cf. Is 61<sup>1-2</sup>) lends itself most readily to this larger interpretation, and so do the opening words of the sermon, and that 'This day hath this Scripture been fulfilled in your ears' (v. 21). Noteworthy, too, in this connexion is the fact that in quoting the glowing words of the Evangelical prophet regarding 'the acceptable year of the Lord,' Jesus made the utterance still more gracious by omitting any reference to a coming day of Divine vengeance (cf. v. 19 with Is 61<sup>2</sup>). But, above all, we must bear in mind that whether the Third Gospel was written or not by Luke the companion of St. Paul, it is matter of common consent that strong Pauline influences run through it, and that more than any other it gives prominence to those aspects of our Lord's life and teaching which present His gospel as a message of Divine grace. This is the Gospel of the publican (18<sup>10c</sup>, 19<sup>20c</sup>), of the 'woman which was in the city, a sinner' (7<sup>36c</sup>), of the malefactor forgiven even as he hung upon his cross (23<sup>39c</sup>). Above all, it is the gospel of the great 'Parables of Grace'—the Lost Coin, the Lost Sheep, the Prodigal Son (15). It seems natural, therefore, to conclude that the Evangelist, on whom Christ's grace to the sinful had made so deep an impression, intended in this 'frontispiece' to his story of our Lord's public ministry, when he described the listeners in the synagogue as wondering at 'the words of grace which proceeded out of his mouth,' to set Jesus before us not merely as a winning speaker, but as the anointed herald of the grace of God. See also art. GRACIOUSNESS.

(2) When we come to the Fourth Gospel, we find that in the Prologue the word 'grace,' no doubt through the Pauline teaching and its consequences, has blossomed fully into those greater meanings with which the Church had become familiar.* In 1<sup>14</sup> the author describes the Incarnate Logos as 'full of grace and truth' in His revelation of the Father's glory. The phrase recalls the frequent OT combination of 'mercy and truth' (חַסֵּד וְאֱמֻנָה, LXX ἔλεος καὶ ἀλήθεια) as a summary description of

* It is worthy of remark that while in the Prologue χάρις appears as a fundamental note of the revelation of Jesus Christ, the word is not used elsewhere in the work. In the rest of his Gospel, as in his Epistles, the author prefers the idea of love (20<sup>19</sup>, 1 in 20<sup>26</sup> and constantly). Like the Synoptists, he never once puts ἀγάπη into the mouth of Jesus, not even in a passage like 7<sup>19-22</sup> (cf. 6<sup>10-13</sup>), where Jesus is speaking of His relation to the law of Moses. Does this not go to support the essential historicity of Christ's teaching as reported in the Fourth Gospel?

Jehovah's character (Ex 34<sup>7</sup>, Ps 25<sup>10</sup> 85<sup>10</sup> 89<sup>14</sup> etc.). But the grace of Christ in the NT is something more than the mercy of God in the OT. It is remarkable that in the LXX χάρις is not considered a rich enough word to render the Heb. חַסֵּד. There χάρις signifies the Divine kindness or favour (corresponding to Heb. חַסֵּד cf. Gn 18<sup>26</sup> and חסד), but is not used of those energies which belong properly to the sphere of redemption. For the חַסֵּד or mercy of God the word ἔλεος is employed; so that in the LXX ἔλεος may be said to be a stronger and richer word than χάρις. When we come to the NT, however, the case is reversed. χάρις, as applied to the Christian conception of grace, has become a grander word than ἔλεος; for while ἔλεος denotes the Divine compassion in the presence of man's pain and misery, χάρις is used to express God's attitude to man's sin. It is more than a Divine attribute, although it is that. It is the sum of those Divine forces from which our salvation flows.

In v. 16 the Evangelist says that out of Christ's fulness we all received 'and grace for grace' (χάρις ἀπὸ χάριτος). In its general use, as we have seen, χάρις passes from a disposition of goodwill to be applied to the blessings which goodwill bestows. Here the reference is to the blessings of the Christian salvation. Christ's fulness is inexhaustible, and His grace is constantly bestowing itself upon His followers. But 'grace for grace' does not mean merely 'grace upon grace'—one grace added to another. The force of the ἀπὸ is not to be neglected. In the next verse the author is going to contrast the NT system of grace with the legal system of the OT. And here, by a bold use of language, he applies to the economy of grace the very formulae of the opposite dispensation, so the better to bring out its 'complete gratuitousness' (Godet, Com. on Jn. in loc.). Under the Law, with its system of exchanges, a blessing was received as the reward of (ἀπὸ) merit, but under the gospel it is Christ's free grace itself, received and appropriated, which becomes our title to fresh and larger bestowals.

'For the law was given by Moses,' adds the Evangelist; 'grace and truth came by Jesus Christ' (v. 17). Here we have the justification of what we said above as to the χάρις καὶ ἀλήθεια of the NT being much more than the ἔλεος καὶ ἀλήθεια of the OT. The Divine mercy (ἔλεος) was an essential part of the OT revelation. It was on Sinai itself, and in connexion with the giving of the tables of the Law, that God revealed Himself to Moses as 'a God full of compassion and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy and truth' (Ex 34<sup>6</sup>). But in comparison with the glory of the Christian revelation, the revelation to Moses was legal and hard. It lacked that element of spontaneous favour towards the sinful, and apart from every thought of merit gained by obedience, which belongs to the very essence of grace as we know it in Jesus Christ.

2. The grace of Christ in the Pauline Epistles.—In discussing the meaning of grace in the Third and Fourth Gospels, we have been obliged to anticipate in part what has now to be said about the Pauline teaching. For there can be no doubt that in the minds of both Evangelists that teaching was subsumed. It was the use which St. Paul had made of the word that determined its significance for Christianity ever afterwards.

(1) And first we notice that when the Apostle speaks of grace, he is invariably thinking of Jesus Christ in connexion with it. Most frequently it is the grace of God that he names; for God the Father is always recognized as the primal fountain of all the blessings of the Christian salvation, and no greater misrepresentation can be made of St. Paul's gospel than to describe him as bringing the grace that is in Christ into some kind of opposition to the justice that is in God. Sometimes again  $\eta \chi \alpha \rho \iota \varsigma$  stands alone; for the Apostle treats it at times not merely as a Divine attribute, but as the operative principle of the whole economy of redemption. But as it is Christ who embodies this great principle in His own person, as it is in Him that the Father's grace is revealed, and by Him that it is mediated to men; as, to use his own words, 'the grace of God was given you in Christ Jesus' (1 Co 1<sup>3</sup>), and 'grace reigns through Jesus Christ our Lord' (Ro 5<sup>21</sup>), he does not hesitate to speak of it again and again, and especially in the benedictions with which he concludes his Epp., as 'the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ' (Ro 16<sup>25</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>4</sup>, Gal 6<sup>18</sup> etc.; of the opening salutations, Ro 1<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>2</sup>, Gal 1<sup>3</sup> etc.).

(2) When we ask how St. Paul arrived at this distinctive conception of the Christian gospel as an economy of grace, and of Jesus Christ as the dispenser of grace, the answer undoubtedly is that he owed it to that revelation of the Lord Jesus Himself near the gates of Damascus by which his whole life was suddenly transformed. As a Pharisee he had sought to earn salvation by his zeal for the Law. But everything he had done had proved ineffectual. The commandment which was unto life he found to be unto death (Ro 7<sup>10</sup>). Nay, in his endeavours to be exceedingly zealous according to the Law he had been led into the greatest sin of his career — his furious opposition to Jesus Christ, his savage persecution of the saints. Then came the great, astonishing act of spontaneous grace. Christ appeared in person to this bitter enemy, convincing him beyond the possibility of doubt that that Jesus whom he persecuted was no other than the Lord of glory, and at the same time addressing him in those tender and gracious and yet heart-shaking words of reproach and appeal by which Saul the persecutor was turned into the slave of Christ. From that day Christ was to Paul the Lord of grace no less than the Lord of glory. It was the grace of God in Christ, and that grace alone, which had called him and saved and made him what he was (Gal 1<sup>15</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>10</sup>). And that same grace which had redeemed Paul at the first was with him all along. It guided him in the path of wisdom (1 Co 3<sup>10</sup>). It enabled him to be more abundant in labours than all others (15<sup>9</sup>). It taught him how to behave himself in the world (2 Co 12<sup>13</sup>). And when the messenger of Satan came to buffet him, and he thrice besought the Lord that this thing might depart, it was the Lord Himself who said to His servant, 'My grace is sufficient for thee' (12<sup>9</sup>).

(3) What did St. Paul understand by the grace of Christ, as he used that term in his fully developed teaching? What distinctive contents did he put into this great Christian idea, which he knew in his own experience to be a great Christian fact? (a) We shall perhaps find our best starting-point in a passage in which he sets a certain view of that grace before the Corinthians as one with which his teaching had made them familiar. He regards it as an act of astounding self-sacrifice. 'For ye know,' he writes, 'the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might become rich' (2 Co 8<sup>9</sup>). How much was involved in this self-sacrifice he shows more fully in another Epistle, where he describes it as a self-emptying, on Christ's part, of His Divine form, the assumption of a lowly human nature, and the rendering of a lifelong obedience even unto the death of the cross (Ph 2<sup>6-8</sup>). It is in this quality of self-sacrifice most of all that the grace of Christ in the NT differs from the mercy of God as revealed in the earlier dispensation. Christ's grace is not merely the compassion which a great and strong and blessed nature feels for one which is sinful and sorrowful and weak. It is the self-renouncing love which so yearns to save that it surrenders all the wealth that is its own, and welcomes all the poverty that is another's. It is that love which finds its crowning symbol, as it found its absolute expression, in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. 'I am poor and needy,' said a saint of the OT, 'yet the Lord thinketh upon me' (Ps 40<sup>17</sup>). 'The Son of God,' exclaims St. Paul, 'loved me, and gave himself up for me' (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>).

(b) The absolute freeness of Christ's grace was another element in the Apostle's conception. This brings us to his characteristic antithesis between grace and law. We noticed this antithesis already in the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel, but it was St. Paul who first formulated it when he wrote, 'Ye are not under law, but under grace' (Ro 6<sup>14</sup>). Formerly the Divine blessings were secured by obedience to the Law. Righteousness was the fruit of works, and rewards were reckoned not as of grace, but as of debt (Ro 4<sup>4</sup>). But now we are 'justified freely (δωρεάν) by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus' (Ro 3<sup>24</sup>). The grace that saves us has nothing to do with works (Ro 11<sup>9</sup>); it is the 'free gift' of God by 'the one man, Jesus Christ' (Ro 5<sup>15</sup>, cf. Eph 2<sup>8</sup>).

(c) Again, Christ's grace, in St. Paul's view of it, was marked by its sin-conquering power. Besides the great antithesis between grace with its free gifts on the one hand, and the Law with its works and debts on the other, we have in the Apostle's teaching a further antithesis between grace and sin. This antithesis follows of necessity from the former one, for it is the fact of the Law that leads to the imputation of sin (Ro 5<sup>13</sup>), and it is the coming in of the Law that causes trespasses to abound (v. 20). But that same grace of Christ which rises superior to the Law shows its power to master the sin which is the transgression of the Law.

'Where sin abounded, grace did abound more exceedingly' (5<sup>20</sup>). And this superabundance of grace over sin is manifested in two distinct ways: (a) It removes the guilt of sin and the dread consequences which flow from guiltiness. This it does by not only forgiving the sinner (Eph 1<sup>7</sup>), but justifying him freely (Ro 3<sup>24</sup>), bestowing upon him the gift of righteousness (Gal 2<sup>21</sup>), and giving him the assurance that as sin reigned unto death, even so shall grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life (Ro 5<sup>21</sup>). (b) It breaks the dominion of sin over the sinner's heart. The antinomian indeed may say, 'Let us continue in sin, that grace may abound.' But St. Paul's answer is, 'God forbid!' (Ro 6<sup>15</sup>, cf. v. 1). The free gift bestowed by the grace of the One Man (5<sup>12</sup>) carries within it an 'abundance of grace' (v. 17). And among the things included in this abundance of grace are a death to sin and a life unto God (6<sup>22</sup>). The fact that we are not under the Law, but under grace, implies that sin's tyranny over us is broken (v. 14), and that we have been set free from it (v. 12) for a life of righteousness and holiness in the service of God (vv. 18, 22).

(d) Finally, we may say that in the Pauline teaching the grace of Christ, the 'riches of his grace,' as we have it in Eph. (1<sup>7</sup>), stood for the sum-total of all Christian blessings. There is an abundance and superabundance in grace (Ro 5<sup>17, 20</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>15</sup>), which makes it a stream of endless benediction flowing from an inexhaustible fountain. Christ's riches are unsearchable (Eph 3<sup>8</sup>), but all that Christ is His grace is, for grace is the most essential quality of His being, while He Himself is the very incarnation of everything we mean by grace. We are called by grace (Gal 1<sup>15</sup>), and justified by grace (Ro 3<sup>24</sup>), and sanctified by grace (6<sup>4</sup>). Through grace also we obtain eternal comfort and good hope (2 Th 2<sup>16</sup>), and strength (2 Ti 2<sup>1</sup>), and liberality (2 Co 8<sup>1</sup>), and happy songs (Col 3<sup>16</sup>). And so it was the great Apostle's custom, when he would gather up into a single word all his wishes and hopes and prayers for the Churches, to say, 'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all' (2 Th 3<sup>16</sup>, Ro 16<sup>24</sup>, cf. 1 Co 16<sup>23</sup> etc.).*

3. The grace of Christ in the rest of the NT.—The material here is very much scantier than in the Pauline writings, but it is quite sufficient to show how deeply the great Pauline word had lodged itself in the general Christian mind. It is true that we do not find grace defined as to its nature by those antitheses of law and works and sin which give the Pauline conception its peculiar colouring, but the word is still used to express the Divine favour as revealed in Christ, and those saving blessings of which He is the Mediator. The chief relevant passages in Acts have been referred to already in connexion with the usage of the Third Evangelist. In 1 Peter we find the grace of salvation made to depend on the revelation of Jesus Christ, and associated in particular with the Saviour's sufferings and the glories that followed them (1<sup>13-14</sup>). The author of 2 Peter exhorts his readers to 'grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ' (3<sup>18</sup>). In Hebrews the fact that Jesus is our great High Priest is urged as the reason why we should draw near with boldness unto the 'throne of grace' (4<sup>14-16</sup>); and the treading under foot of the Son of God is regarded as equivalent to doing despite to 'the Spirit of grace' (10<sup>29</sup>). As in the Fourth Gospel apart from the Prologue, so in the other Johannine writings, love takes the place held by the idea of grace in the Pauline teaching. But the familiarity of the thought of Christ's grace is shown by its appearance in the forms of salutation (2 Jn 3, Rev 1<sup>4</sup>). And what could be more fitting than that the NT as a whole, of which grace is the distinctive watchword, and over every page of which we might inscribe the words 'Grace reigns,' should conclude, in the last sentence of the Apocalypse, with the benediction, 'The grace of the Lord Jesus be with the saints' (Rev 22<sup>21</sup>)?

J. C. LAMBERT.

GRACIOUSNESS.—The word 'graciousness' does not occur in the EV of the Gospels. The adjective 'gracious' occurs only once (Lk 4<sup>22</sup>) in the AV and not at all in the RV. The idea, however, covered by the noun is of very frequent occurrence, and may truly be said to be one of the leading characteristics of Jesus Himself, and of the gospel He came to proclaim.

4. The passage Lk 4<sup>22</sup> is rendered in the AV, 'And all bare him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth.' The RV keeps more closely to the form of the Gr. expression, and renders 'wondered at the words of grace.' In so doing it departs from the general practice of the older English versions, which from Tindale onwards adopted the form of the AV. Wyclif and the Rhemish version support the rendering of the RV, following in all probability the example of the Vulg. in verbis gratie which

* Besides the use of the word 'grace' in the Pauline Epp. to designate the spontaneous favour of God to sinners as revealed and mediated by Jesus Christ, it is employed in various derivative senses, such as (Ro 5<sup>2</sup>) the state of grace (gratia gratiae), a particular gift of grace (Eph 4<sup>7</sup>), the special grace required for the Apostolic office (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>, Eph 2<sup>7</sup>). The discussion of these, however, lies somewhat beyond the scope of this Dictionary.

VOL. I.—44

they rendered literally. The best modern version (Weymouth's) paraphrases and expands the expression thus, 'wondering at the sweet words of kindness which fell from his lips'; while Weizsäcker's admirable German version translates simply die lieblichen Worte. The best rendering, where the phrase is thus understood, is probably that of Plummer, 'winning words.' The words of the original, ἐν τοῖς λόγοις τῆς χάριτος, suggest such a rendering, since the original meaning of χάρις, as it is found in Gr. literature, is that of 'comeliness' or 'winsomeness' (see the Lexicons for examples). But general, popular, and attractive as such an interpretation is, another is probably the correct one. See preceding article.

2. The Gr. word χάρις occurs on several other occasions in the Gospels, and is variously rendered in the English versions. In order to gain a clearer idea of its meaning, it is necessary to examine these. Of the youthful John we read in Lk 2<sup>29</sup> 'the grace of God was upon him,' and of the child Jesus (2<sup>29</sup>) that He 'advanced in favour (RVm 'grace') with God and men.' Weymouth uses 'favour' in both passages. On three occasions, in Lk 6<sup>28, 32, 34</sup>, we have the expression, 'What thank have ye?' representing the Gr. ὡς χάρις ἐστίν; and the same sense of the word is found in Lk 17<sup>9</sup>. The only other passage in the Gospels where the word occurs is in the prologue to the Fourth Gospel, where it is found three times (Jn 1<sup>14, 16, 17</sup>), and is rendered in each case 'grace.' See GRACE.

3. There remains for us to see how the quality of 'graciousness' is manifested in Jesus during His earthly ministry. Many who take the word 'gracious' of Lk 4<sup>22</sup> in the narrower sense noted above, look only for the 'graciousness' of our Lord to be revealed in His manner of dealing with men, in His outward conduct and speech. This view is, of course, true. His readiness to take part in all the festivities and social functions of everyday life marked Him off clearly to His contemporaries from the ascetic attitude of John the Baptist. His playful, gentle winsomeness that won the children to His knee was a scandal to His disciples. His brotherly attitude towards the diseased and stricken, His generous help, His readiness of sympathy, emboldened leprosy, blind, and ashamed humanity to dare the publicity it shrank from, or the menace and rebuke of the crowd, to cast itself at His feet, and throw itself upon His gracious consideration. This same characteristic is revealed in His intimate association with the household at Bethany, and His special affection for John and Lazarus, as well as in such exquisitely human touches as His longing look of love given to the young questioner (Mk 10<sup>21</sup>).

* Men could approach near to Him, could eat and drink with Him, could listen to His talk, and ask Him questions, and they found Him not accessible only, but warm-hearted, and not occupied so much with His own plans that He could not attend to a case of distress or mental perplexity' (Ecce Homo, ch. 9).

This peculiar graciousness was displayed in such acts as washing the feet of His disciples, and in His patient tolerance of the scepticism of Thomas.

But when we go deeper than form of speech or nature of deed, we find this quality still more clearly manifested. If 'graciousness' is to bear the richer meaning we have seen it may carry, then its significance in the words and works of Jesus is all the greater. His parables (e.g. the Lost Sheep, the Prodigal Son, the Good Samaritan), how full they are of this peculiar quality of the Divine revelation! His conduct to sinful men and women, how sharply did it contrast with the attitude of His contemporaries (Lk 7<sup>36-50</sup>, Mk 10<sup>28-49</sup>)! His prayer for His enemies shows wonderful tenderness how this spirit did not desert Him at the moment of greatest trial, how inherent it was, therefore, in His very nature (Lk 23<sup>41</sup>). In His thought the gracious method of His treatment of men was to become a general standard of conduct (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>), and would even constitute the basis of final judgment (Mt 25<sup>31</sup>). It should not be overlooked that, while St. Luke is the Evangelist who most frequently and clearly reveals this characteristic of Jesus, and dwells most distinctly upon it, each of the others supplies sufficient evidence to prove that St. Luke's picture is no imaginary one, nor even his emphasis exaggerated. See GRACE.

GRASS.—In the OT there are several Heb. words which are translated 'grass,' but they are all very general terms; in the NT the only word so translated is χόρτος. Strictly speaking, no plant should be called a grass unless it belongs to the botanical order Gramineæ, but this is a comparatively modern distinction. The Biblical writers do not, of course, employ the term with scientific precision. The modern Arab includes, under the common designation hashish (grass), field-flowers such as anemones, poppies, and tulips. If, as is probable, it was in this wider sense that Christ and His contemporaries used the word, it lends new point and charm to His appeal, 'If God so clothe the grass of the field' (Mt 6<sup>29</sup>), and invests with fresh beauty the familiar words, 'All flesh is grass, and all the glory thereof as the flower of grass' (1 P 1<sup>24</sup> RV; cf. Ja 1<sup>10, 11</sup>).

The true grasses of Palestine are very numerous; Dr. Post gives the figures for Palestine and Syria as 90 genera and 243 species (Hastings' DB-II, 258). Pasture grasses vary greatly in quality and profusion according to climate, soil, and elevation. Turf is rare. Grass is much used as fuel (Mt 6<sup>30</sup>), especially in districts where wood is scarce (see OVEN). HUGH DUNCAN.

GRAVE.—See TOMB.

GRAVE-CLOTHES.—The account in the Gospels of the circumstances attending the burial of our Lord illustrates fully the general practice of the time with regard to grave-clothes. The body of Jesus, doubtless after being bathed, after the manner of the Jews as well as of the Greeks (Ac 9<sup>37</sup>, cf. Gospel of Peter, 6), was 'wrapped' (ἐπεβάλετο, Mt 27<sup>5</sup>, Lk 23<sup>53</sup>) or 'swathed' (ἐσθλάσθη, Mk 15<sup>46</sup>) in the shroud of linen cloth (συνθῆλον) which Joseph of Arimathea had procured on his way back to Golgotha, and which is described as 'fresh' or 'unused' (καθαρῆ, Mt 27<sup>59</sup>), in accordance with the sacred use to which it was put (cf. Mk 11<sup>2</sup>). Spices were next crumbled between the folds of the linen (ἐστὶ τὸν ἀρωματισμὸν, Jn 19<sup>40</sup>), and the whole was then bound together with strips of cloth (θῆραι, Jn 19<sup>40</sup>; cf. κερίαι, Jn 11<sup>44</sup>). The face was covered with a separate face-cloth or 'napkin' (τὸ σενδάριον, Jn 20<sup>7</sup>).

In later Judaism it was held that the resemblance of the future to the present body was so close that men would rise in the same clothes in which they were buried, on the analogy of the grain of corn which comes up from the earth not naked, but clothed (cf. 1 Co 15<sup>52</sup>). And accordingly the Rabbis were in the habit of giving careful directions as to their grave-clothes (Weber, Jud. Theol.,<sup>2</sup> p. 370). This frequently led, however, to such unnecessary expense in the way of luxurious wrappings, that by way of protest Rabbi Gamaliel left directions that he was to be buried in simple linen garments, while his grandson limited the number of grave-clothes to one dress (see Edersheim, Sketches of Jewish Social Life, p. 168 f.). At the present day, among Jews as well as Mohammedans, the corpse is attired in the ordinary holiday attire of life.

GREATNESS.—1. The greatness of Christ.—Greatness is an attribute which more than once in the Scriptures is applied to Jesus Christ. It is used both relatively, in passages which suggest a comparison between His powers and those of such OT heroes as Jacob (Jn 4<sup>12</sup>), Jonah and Solomon (Mt 12<sup>41, 42</sup>), and Abraham or the prophets (Jn 8<sup>25</sup>); and in an absolute sense, with reference to the esteem in which He was to be held in the eyes of Jehovah (Lk 1<sup>32</sup>). In the teaching of Jesus Himself, however, greatness is less a status than a quality. In the few words in which He alludes to His own human greatness, He makes it to consist in capacity for service and for sacrifice (Mk 10<sup>45</sup>), and it is significant that in the Epistles also the attribute is ascribed to Him only where the idea of service and sacrifice is prominent in the context (He 4<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>2</sup> 13<sup>30</sup>).

In one passage the greatness of the Son is compared with that of the Father (Jn 14<sup>28</sup>). This is admittedly a difficult saying. The important point to be borne in mind is that the statement must not be interpreted apart from the rest of Christ's teaching concerning His relationship to the First Person in the Trinity. A careful study of His whole attitude seems to show that, whether He is here referring to such inferiority as is involved in His possessing the Divine essence by communication or to that which belonged to His subordination as being incarnate upon the earth, the words 'are perfectly consistent with the belief in the unity of the Divine nature, and therefore with the belief in the equality of the Godhead of the Son with the Godhead of the Father' (Westcott, ad loc.; cf. Godet, ad loc.).

2. The greatness of Christ's followers.—Christ has less to say about His own greatness than about that of His followers. For there is a greatness that belongs to His Kingdom, and this He covets for each one of them. So exalted is it that it surpasses the highest conception of greatness hitherto received (Mt 11<sup>11</sup>—Lk 7<sup>28</sup>). But this greatness of the Kingdom differs essentially from that in which the world delights. The world has confused greatness itself with certain caricatures of it known as 'fame' and 'power'. The teaching of Jesus draws clear lines of distinction.

(a) Greatness is not fame. Men's fame consists in what others say about them; Christians' greatness consists in what they themselves are. Of the former consideration Christ bids His followers to be exultingly independent (Mt 5<sup>12, 13</sup>), note the strong word ἀλλοτρίως. Indeed, to share in their Lord's greatness will involve not praise but persecution (Jn 15<sup>20</sup>). But upon the second consideration, that is to say, upon their character, their claim to greatness wholly depends. And the character demanded includes, not the assertive qualities of notoriety, but the milder attributes of childlike humility (Mk 9<sup>35</sup>, Mt 18<sup>1-4</sup>, Lk 9<sup>48</sup>), and obedience to the Divine law (Mt 5<sup>19</sup>—a passage which has an important bearing on the relationship of the new dispensation to the old).

(b) Greatness is not power. This, it is true, is the current conception of it. In the world's view, to be great is to be able to exact from others as much as is possible of respect and service. The more servants a man has at his disposal, the wider the sphere in which he can command obedience, the greater he is held to be (Mk 10<sup>42</sup> ¶). Such was also the disciples' conception. Two of them were ambitious of sitting the one on Christ's right hand and the other on His left in His Kingdom; the others were jealous, because they coveted these seats of authority for themselves (Mk 10<sup>37-41</sup> = Mt 20<sup>20-28</sup>). In striking contrast with this view Jesus places His own pronouncement on greatness. According to His teaching as well as His example (see above), to be great is not to exact, but to give, as much service as possible. A man's greatness is measured less by the service he commands than by the service he renders (Mk 10<sup>43-45</sup> ¶). In a glorious paradox the highest in the Kingdom is he who assumes the lowest place (Mt 23<sup>11</sup>, Jn 13<sup>14-15</sup>, and, for the supreme example, Ph 2<sup>5-11</sup>).

The practical importance of such teaching can scarcely be over-emphasized. Until the time of the Incarnation the position of a servant was the lowest of all; but when the Son of God appeared, He, in St. Paul's words, 'took the form of a servant' (μορφὴν δούλου, Ph 2<sup>7</sup>), and from that day the whole status of honourable service, in whatever capacity, has been consecrated and raised. The position it occupies is no longer menial; it is the most exalted of all. The servant's life, indeed, may be a life of greatness, inasmuch as Christ has placed the very essence of greatness no longer in power to command, but in willingness to minister. The very title which our Lord uses of Himself in appealing to His own example (Mk 10<sup>46</sup> ¶), suggests that the nearer a man's life approaches to the ideal of humanity, the more completely will he realize his greatness in the service of others.

The exact significance of the title 'Son of Man' (wh. see) has been much discussed. To the present writer the truest explanation appears to be that which makes it point to Christ as the ideal of humanity. That is to say, He was not only a man, but also the perfect representation of mankind. There was nothing in Him that is foreign to ideal human nature, nor anything lacking that belongs to it. He was, if we may so express it, the perfect specimen of what man was intended to be. It will be seen that, if this view is correct, the application of the title made above is justifiable.

One more saying of Jesus must be included in our study. To His followers, as we have shown, greatness does not mean power in any earthly sense. And yet the very men who refuse to exert such power shall be possessed by a power superior to all earthly might—the power of the Father's protection (Jn 10<sup>29</sup>—according to the probable reading).

GRECIANS, GREEKS.—i. DISTINCTION OF THE WORDS.—1. Greek.—The name Ἕλληνας, derived from a small tribe living in Thessaly, was extended to include all of Greek race, whether natives of Greece or of the Greek islands or colonies. This is the use in classical Greek, and it also appears in the NT, e.g. Ac 18<sup>7</sup> (TR). 'All the Greeks took Sosthenes, etc.'; Ro 1<sup>4</sup> (the Greek division of mankind into Greeks and non-Greeks or Barbarians); perhaps also 1 Co 12<sup>22-23</sup> (Schleusner). This meaning was widened by the Jews to include all non-Jews who lived as the Greeks, using their language and manners. Where Ἕλληνας are opposed to Jews, the primary reference is to a difference of religious worship (Grimm).

So in LXX of Is 9<sup>6</sup> where Ἕλληνας appears for 'Philistines'; cf. also 2 Mac 4<sup>13</sup> and 6<sup>3</sup>. Thus the Jews divided mankind into Jews and Greeks, which corresponds to the division of Jews and Gentiles; cf. Ac 14<sup>1</sup> 19<sup>9</sup>, Ro 1<sup>4</sup> 2<sup>10</sup> 3<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>12</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>32</sup>, Gal 3<sup>28</sup>, Col 3<sup>11</sup>. In this sense Titus was a Greek (Gal 2<sup>3</sup>), and also the father of Timothy (Ac 16<sup>1</sup>). This use of the word was continued by the Christian Fathers, such as Justin Martyr, Tatian, and Athanasius.

2. Grecian.—Ἑλληνιστής (from Ἑλληνίζω), AV 'Grecian,' one who copies the customs and uses the language of the Greeks, received among the Jews the technical meaning of a Jew of the Dispersion, born outside Palestine and living among the Gentiles. These remained faithful to Judaism, but spoke Hellenistic Greek, the vernacular of daily life in the Gentile world. In the NT Ἑλληνιστής is opposed to Ἐβραῖος, a Palestinian Jew (see Trench, NT Synonyms); cf. Ac 6<sup>1</sup>. See J. H. Moulton, Gram. of N.T. Greek, ch. 1.

ii. GREEK INFLUENCE IN PALESTINE.—1. Historical.—The conquests of Alexander the Great (B.C. 331) opened the East to Greek settlers. Numbers of his veterans settled in Syria, and Greek colonists were welcomed by his successors. Old towns (as Gaza, Askalon, Ashdod, and Samaria) were Hellenized, and new Greek towns (as Scythopolis, Pella, and Gerasa) were built. Alexander's policy of Hellenizing his conquests was to a great extent successful, and a large section of the inhabitants of Palestine favoured Greek culture. It appeared likely that Hellenism would slowly conquer Judaism, and that the zealous adherents of the Mosaic law would become a minority in the nation. Had this happened, the blending of Greek culture with Judaism might have taken place on Palestinian soil as it did in Alexandria. Judaism, however, was saved through the injudicious action of Antiochus Epiphanes, who ruled Syria B.C. 175-164. In B.C. 168, Antiochus endeavoured to thoroughly Hellenize Judea. He forbade the Jewish worship, and ordered sacrifices to be offered to heathen deities in the cities of Judea. The penalty of disobedience was death (1 Mac 1<sup>41-67</sup>). This led to the rebellion of the Maccabees. During the troubled years which followed, the Jewish national party regained much of their lost ground. Hellenism was discouraged, and even persecuted. Subsequently Jewish patriotism took the form of zealous observance of the Law, and there resulted the strongly marked division between Jew and Greek which we find in the Gospels.

2. Extent of Greek influence in Palestine in the time of Christ.—(1) Greek districts.—The districts of Palestine which in the time of Christ were chiefly Jewish were Judea, Galilee, and Peraea (Jos. BJ iii. 3; Schürer, HJP ii. 1. 3 ff.). Close to these were districts predominantly Greek. The towns of Philistia had heathen temples. The whole seaboard of the Mediterranean was Greek except Joppa and Jamnia. On the north, heathen territory was reached in Caesarea, Philippi, where there was a celebrated temple to Pan. On the east we find the Greek league of Decapolis (G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 593). Even in central Palestine heathen temples existed at Samaria and Scythopolis. In the Greek cities athletic contests took place, and the usual amusements of the theatre and gymnasium were provided. Thus within a few miles of the scenes of the Saviour's ministry there were Gentile cities with temples, society, and culture, fully Greek. But although Jesus went into the country districts of the Gentile portions of Palestine, we have no record of His entering any Greek cities. For instance, we do not know that He ever entered Tiberias, although frequently in that neighbourhood.

(2) Jewish districts.—Even in the Jewish districts of Palestine, Greek influence was distinctly felt. Foreign as the theatre and amphitheatre were to Jewish notions, they were built at Jerusalem by Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. xv. viii. 1), and they also existed at Jericho. Greek architecture found its way even into Herod's Temple. Even in the most Jewish localities there must have been a considerable number of Gentiles. Commerce and civilization bear witness to strong Greek influence.

The Greek language must have been understood by many, although Aramaic was the usual tongue. This linguistic influence is evident in several ways: (a) the Greek words which are transliterated into Hebrew in the Mishna; (b) the three languages in which the inscription on the cross was written; (c) the Greek names of some of the Apostles, as Philip and Andrew; (d) the NT writers' use of the colloquial Greek as found on papyri; (e) the quotations from the LXX in the NT. Hence Christ lived among a people which, although strongly Jewish, was greatly influenced by Gentile thought and civilization. (See Schürer, HJP II. i. § 22; Edersheim, Life and Times, I. 84-92.)

III. CHRIST'S CONTACT WITH THE GREEKS.—In two cases only do we find it explicitly stated that Greeks came to the Saviour. These are:

(1) The Syro-Phœnician woman (Mk 7<sup>26</sup>).—The Saviour was either on Gentile ground (note the strongly supported reading ἐκ Σιδῶνος, Mk 7<sup>27</sup>) or very near it (so Edersheim). The woman was a native of the country, and is called a Greek, in the sense of not being a Jew, and she was a heathen. Legends of the woman's life are to be found in Clem. Homilies, II. 19.

(2) The Greeks who asked to see Jesus (Jn 12<sup>20</sup>).—Some have considered that these Greeks were really Grecian Jews (properly Ἑλληνισταί) (so Calvin, Ewald, and others). But there seems no reason for thinking that the word 'Greek' is not used here, as commonly, as equivalent to 'Gentile.' Evidently they were also proselytes (Jn 12<sup>20</sup> 'to worship').

There are other cases in which Christ apparently came in contact with 'Greeks,' but without the term being used—(a) The healing of the demoniac (Mt 8<sup>28-34</sup>, Mk 5<sup>1-20</sup>, Lk 8<sup>26-30</sup>). Notwithstanding the uncertainty in the name of the place, it was evidently on the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee, where the inhabitants were mainly Gentile (note Decapolis, Mk 5<sup>20</sup>). The keeping of so large a herd of swine betokens the presence of a Gentile population. (b) The centurion whose servant was healed (Mt 8<sup>5-13</sup>, Lk 7<sup>1-10</sup>). That the centurion was not a Jew appears from Lk 7<sup>1</sup>. (c) The healing of one deaf and dumb (Mk 7<sup>31-37</sup>). This was in the Greek region of Decapolis.

IV. CHRIST AND THE GRECIANS.—The Dispersion of the Jews had compulsory and voluntary causes. Large numbers of Israelites had been carried away captive by the Assyrians and Babylonians; and Pompey had taken many Jewish captives to Rome. But a much larger dispersion was due to voluntary emigration. From the time of Alexander the Great, Jewish colonies were gradually formed in the great commercial centres. Thus large numbers of Jews were to be found in Alexandria, in Antioch, in all the important cities on the Mediterranean, and even in Bithynia and Pontus. These Grecian Jews were active representatives of Judaism among the Gentiles, and won large numbers of proselytes from heathenism.

The word 'Grecian' (Ἑλληνιστής) does not occur in the Gospels, although, owing to the attendance of non-Palestinian Jews at the feasts and the residence of many in Palestine, our Saviour must often have met with Grecians. One reference only occurs, Jn 7<sup>52</sup>. The Jews wondered whether Christ would go to 'the dispersed among the Gentiles' (ἡ διασπορά τῶν Ἑλλήνων), and, from working among these Hellenistic Jews, proceed to teach even the Greeks (Ἑλλήνας). In this surmise they really anticipated the way in which Christianity found in the Grecian Jews a bridge by which it passed to the conquest of the Gentile world.

For the Greek language see LANGUAGE OF CHRIST.

F. E. ROBINSON.

GREETINGS.—'To greet' and 'to salute' stand in NT for the same Gr. verb, ἀσπάζεσθαι: AV renders indifferently 'greet' and 'salute'; RV almost uniformly 'salute.' The exceptions are Ac 20<sup>1</sup> AV 'embraced,' RV 'took leave of'; Ac 21<sup>6</sup> AV 'took leave of,' RV 'bade farewell'; He 11<sup>18</sup> AV 'embraced,' RV 'greeted.' χαίρειν is used for 'greeting,' and in imper. in the sense of 'hail' or 'farewell'; s.g. χαίρειν is the greeting, while ἀσπάζεσθαι is general, circumstances determining in each case what the greeting is. Thus in Mk 15<sup>28</sup> ἤρξαντο ἀσπάζεσθαι αὐτὸν Χαίρειν, 'they began to salute him, Hail.'

The Oriental has always attached great importance to the formal courtesies of life. However easy in demeanour and free in conversation he may be, the laws regulating social customs, sanctioned only by immemorial usage, are punctiliously observed. Any breach of these is regarded as a grave offence. His honour (sharaf), in all matters of ceremony, is very delicate and brittle, but strangely tough in things of greater moment. He will bear lightly an exposure that would cover us with perpetual shame; treat him with less formal respect than he desires, and he will fall into a paroxysm of rage over his 'broken honour.'

Greetings vary with the rank of parties, from the abject prostration of the subject before his sovereign, to the familiar kiss of friendly equals. One of humbler station salutes in silence, showing respect by bending his hand to the ground, then touching his lips and forehead. He will, at times, kiss the hand of his superior, and raise it to his brow. One interceding for another (Mk 7<sup>32</sup>), or begging a favour (Mt 18<sup>26, 29</sup>), will fall down flat; while in token of utter submission one may kiss a benefactor's feet (Lk 7<sup>38, 40</sup>). Slaves or servants kiss the sleeve or skirt of their lord's clothing. To touch (Mt 9<sup>30</sup>) or kiss the hem of the garment indicates great reverence. Dervishes and other 'holy men' are thus saluted. In the Greek Church worshippers often kiss the skirt of the priest's robe. To kiss upon the cheek is a sign of warm affection (Lk 15<sup>20</sup>), of the love and esteem of friends. This stains with a darker infamy the treachery of Judas (Mt 26<sup>48</sup> etc.).

Usually the rider salutes the footman, the traveller those whom he passes on the wayside, the smaller party the larger (one speaking for the rest in each case), and the young the aged. In a crowded street it is, of course, impossible to greet everyone. Only venerable sheikhs, or men distinguished by rank, wealth, or sacred learning, are saluted. The Jews freed the Rabbis from all obligation to salute. To be saluted 'Rabbi' was a coveted honour (Mt 23<sup>7</sup>, Mk 12<sup>29</sup>). They merely acknowledged the salutation and passed on. The Moslem salutes both on entering (Mt 10<sup>41</sup>) and on leaving a house.

To every form of salutation custom prescribes an answer. To use any other is regarded as proof of ignorance or vulgarity. The common salutation is salam aleik, 'peace be upon you' (Lk 24<sup>36</sup>), to which the answer is, 'And upon you be peace.' It is a Moslem's duty to give this salutation to another; but it may be omitted without sin. When, however, the salutation is given, the Moslem is bound to return it. The Moslems claim this as 'the salutation of Islam, and not for the mouths of the heathen, with whom is no peace nor fellowship, neither in this world nor in the next' (Doughty, Arabia Deserta, i. 503). Once Mr. Doughty was gravely imperilled because he 'had greeted with Salaam Aleik, which they [the Arabs] will have to be a salutation of God's people only—the Moslem' (ib. ii. 369). If a Moslem by mistake give it to a non-Moslem, it should not be returned. On discovery the former may revoke it, as he does should a Moslem fail to return it, saying, 'Peace be on us and on the righteous worshippers of God' (Lk 10<sup>9</sup>). The insecure life of Hebrew and Arab, ever exposed to alarm of war or robber raid, no doubt gave special meaning to the greeting 'Peace.' At meeting of friends, greetings are lengthy and wearisome. Of the Arabs, Doughty observes, 'The long nomad greetings . . . are for the most, to say over a dozen times with bashful solemnity the same cheif ent, cheif ent. "How dost thou? and how heartily again?"' (ib. i. 453). Dr. Mackie gives a good example of the more elaborate trifling of the Syrians (Bible Manners and Customs, p. 150). The phrases are set and conventional, the maximum of words conveying the minimum of meaning.

The Rabbis forbade one mourning for the dead to salute. Interruption of prayer was forbidden, even to salute a king, nay, to uncoil a serpent from the foot. The Rabbis all agreed that to avoid distraction, no one should be saluted immediately before prayer (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, ii. 137). The nature of the salutations indicated above sufficiently explains these restrictions, and also enables us to understand the prohibition of Jesus, 'Salute no man by the way' (Lk 10<sup>9</sup>). The urgency of that mission could brook no such delays. W. EWING.

GROWING.—

Under this term students of the Greek Testament have to do with only one word—and that a verb, αἰξάνω. The consideration of the corresponding substantive does not properly form the subject of inquiry in this Dictionary. Rare in classical literature, αἰξάνω is used only twice in the NT, viz. in Eph 4<sup>18</sup> and Col 3<sup>9</sup>. The verb is, however, employed some twelve times within the four Gospels. It is a verb of exceedingly doubtful derivation, but probably is etymologically linked with the German wachsen and our own wax; less certainly with the Latin augere. Its underlying meaning is that of additional size, bulk, or power. The normal usage of the verb in the Classics implies that such access comes from without, it is superimposed by some external agency. This significance lies both in the transitive and intransitive use of the verb, and affords, as will be seen, a striking contrast with its use in the Greek Testament. Quotations are not needed. The verb is employed by classical writers from Homer downwards to mark efforts to increase the power of the state or of a country, of special honour paid to parents, of the exaggerations of orators, of the waxing of the moon, of the noontide heat of the sun, of the height of the waves of the sea. Enough to say that in classical literature the verb marks an increase or addition to a person or thing brought about by external agency.

The Hebrew language is very rich in terms which signify 'growth.' There are some 16 words, verbs and nouns substantive, which bear this general meaning. It is enough to say here that they are capable of a single classification. One set of expressions corresponds to αἰξάνω in the sense already indicated; the other, which is preponderant, marks 'growth' of the physical order, seminal growth; and is applied with a great wealth of illustration to the life of plants, trees, the brute creation, and of man himself. Every student of the Psalter or of the Prophetic books is aware of the word-pictures here in which the writers take delight, a delight which is spiritual more than intellectual, of the heart rather than the mind. The natural laws of physical development are by these writers boldly made to apply to the spiritual world. Jehovah, supreme in the one sphere, is supreme in the other. Growth is from within, but yet it is 'God who giveth the increase.'

When the student turns to the NT, and to the idea of growth which finds expression there, he finds that there is a greater affinity of conception between the inspired writers of both Testaments than there is between the writers of the NT and classical Greek writers. The affinity simply lies in the common conception, with its spiritual applications, of a germinal growth, expanding and blossoming unto fruitage whether in nature or in grace.

1. References in the Gospels.—With the above preliminaries, the issue may now be considered in relation to the four Gospels. And first, the less careful student must be warned that the quotation which records the pathetic plea of the disciples to their Lord, 'Increase our faith,'* stands out as an exception. The translation (AV and RV) may serve, but it is doubtful whether 'our' is admissible. Despite the verb, it is questionable whether the disciples then asked for a growth of that spirit of which they were consciously possessed. Were they not rather asking for some gift new and strange to their experience? In any case growth of the physical order is not in place here; for this we must look, as has been shown, almost exclusively to the verb αἰξάνω. This verb is of frequent occurrence in the Gospels, although only once employed by the Fourth Evangelist,† when the Baptist's language is rendered as expressing the growing authority of the new Teacher, and the increasing number of His adherents. It is interesting to observe that with regard to all other instances of the occurrence of this word, they either apply, as here, to the Lord Himself, or else form a part of His own utterances; nor is the interest of the point largely affected by the admission that our Lord would normally use Aramaic. The Evangelists doubtless discovered in the verb αἰξάνω what they wished to convey about His childhood, and what they understood Him to teach in lessons drawn from the natural world.

In his unique account of our Lord's childhood the Second Evangelist declares of Him (Lk 2<sup>40</sup>) that which he had in precisely the same terms declared of the Baptist (1<sup>8</sup>), that 'the child grew and waxed strong, filled with wisdom' [of the Baptist, 'in spirit']; that is, the development of Christ, both spiritually and physically, was normal and equable in its character. The phraseology of St. Luke suggests a contrast with the Apocryphal Gospels, whose account of Christ's infancy makes Him appear a wonder-working prodigy, a phenomenal child, anxious for the display of supernatural powers. St. Luke will have none of this. He is not content with a single protest, for later (3<sup>22</sup>) he solemnly declares that as the child Jesus advanced in years so He developed in wisdom and in favour with God and men. Here, however, the 'growth' is not explicitly stated, the rare verb (πρόεκοιτο) used marking rather advancement, or progress triumphing over difficulties in the way.

The remaining instances of the verb αἰξάνω appear for the most part in our Lord's parabolic discourses. Thus it is seen to be the characteristic feature of the seed sown.‡ There is a process of secret assimilation between it and the good ground; and growth, not sterility or a rash prematurity, is the consequence.§ In the immortal contrast (Mt 6<sup>28</sup>, cf. Lk 12<sup>27</sup>) between the lilies of the field and the garish splendour of Solomon's court dress, it is less upon the beauty of the flowers that Christ lays stress than upon their growth, gradual and all unconscious, spontaneous, effortless. In the parable of the Tares and Wheat this characteristic verb appears in the permission, at once generous and awful, of the master to his servants to let both grow together until the harvest (Mt 13<sup>30</sup>). In the same parabolic discourse it is the growth of the mustard-seed, the development of the surprisingly little, which furnishes an analogue of the spread of the Church universal (Mt 13<sup>21</sup>). Lastly, although we have not here the verb ἀσφάδω, we find the mysterious condemnation passed upon the barren fig-tree (Mt 21<sup>19</sup>), a condemnation of that which is purely physical, sterility in fruit, which fruit in the world of men as in the life of plants and trees is the consequence of all true growth.

2. The underlying idea.—It seems somewhat strange, since the OT is so full of religious teaching drawn from physical growth, that only in the one instance, quoted above, of our Lord's childhood is a spiritual application of the idea directly made in the Gospel narrative. Christ, we may reverently say it, was content to lay the conception which was ever before Him, in garden, harvest field, and orchard, also before His own. If they had eyes to see these things, and ears to hear them,—if they would only 'consider' (Lk 12<sup>24-27</sup>) them,—heart and conscience would do the rest. Then they, as we, would perceive this natural law in the spiritual world—a growing within, secret, beautiful, fertile, in men, and yet not of man, yielding the increase and harvest of the Spirit, His fruit rather than their works.

3. Application of the idea.—But if it is thought even by devout and careful students that such ideas are more than may be gathered from our Lord's actual utterances, those who treasured His sayings in the Apostolic age did not think so. St. Peter and St. Paul no longer use the idea of growing as a metaphor. It is a gracious fact both for the Church and the individual believer. Thus the Apostle of the Gentiles uses the conception of inward Christian growth (Eph 4<sup>15</sup>), and so as to form a shrine wherein the Divine presence may be manifest (2<sup>21</sup>); his prayer for his Colossian converts is that they may grow in further knowledge of God (Col 1<sup>10</sup>); his promise to them if they 'hold the Head' (2<sup>19</sup>), is that they shall grow with a Divine increase. Twice he assures the Corinthians (1 Co 3<sup>8</sup>) that this growth, although in them, has a Divine origin. St. Peter (1 P 2<sup>2</sup>, cf. 2 P 3<sup>18</sup>) shows that the Holy Scriptures have their own function in the growth of grace. It is enough; the conception is carried through from one Testament to the other, and its teaching is consecrated, its consolation is secured in and through Him whom the great Evangelical prophet (Is 11<sup>1</sup>) prefigured as the very symbol of growing: 'There shall come forth a shoot out of the stock of Jesse, and a branch out of his roots shall bear fruit.' That fruit is still seen in every plant planted by the Divine Husbandman (Mt 15<sup>13</sup>).

GUARD.—1. RV rendering of κρουσθία (Lat. custodia), Mt 27<sup>65</sup>, 28<sup>11</sup>, AV 'watch'; obtained by the chief priests and Pharisees from Pilate to guard the sepulchre. The need of Pilate's authorization and the risk of punishment from him (Mt 28<sup>14</sup>) show that this guard must have consisted, not of the Jewish Temple police, but of soldiers from the Roman cohort at Jerusalem; possibly, though not probably, the same as had guarded the cross (Exere, 2<sup>70</sup>), is probably imperative, 'have (take) a guard'. A watch usually consisted of four men (Polyb. vi. 33), each of whom watched in turn, while the others rested beside him so as to be roused by the least alarm; but in this case the guards may have been more numerous.

2. 'A soldier of his [Herod's] guard' (RV tr. of κρουσθίας, Lat. speculator, AV 'executioner') beheaded John the Baptist, Mk 6<sup>27</sup>. Speculatores were originally spies or scouts (from specula, 'a look-out'); but we find them chiefly employed (a) as messengers or couriers, carrying official despatches; (b) as military executioners. A certain number were attached to each legion, besides others belonging to the Praetorian guard, who were closely attached to the Emperor's person and ready for any special service. There are many examples in classical writers (e.g. Seneca, de Ira, i. ii. 4), Acts of Martyrs, and Rabbinic writings, of their employment as executioners; for ref. see Schürer, Weststein, etc. The Herods had bodyguards (δορυφόροι, σωματοφύλακες, Jos. BJ i. xxxiii. 7-9, ii. xv. 1, etc.), and may have given them the Roman title of speculatores; or the word may here be used generally for an executioner. Herod sent some of his guards (δορυφόροι) to kill his son Antipater (Ant. xvii. vii. 1, BJ i. xxxiii. 7).

HAROLD SMITH.

GUEST.—Hospitality was, and to a large extent still is, one of the chief virtues of Oriental life. This was due in large measure to the nomadic character of Eastern peoples, among whom there was no provision for the traveller apart from private entertainment. The casual passer-by, the unknown stranger, even the enemy, were welcomed to tent or house, provided with food and lodging, waited on often by the host himself, and dismissed without being expected or even allowed to pay for their entertainment. Even yet, where the influence of travellers and tourists from the West has not corrupted the ancient manners, the offer of payment is regarded as an insult. The practice of ages has invested the guest with a peculiar sacredness: a breach of hospitality is an almost unheard-of disgrace. Underlying this ready hospitality of the East is the idea that every stranger is daif Ullah, 'the guest of God.' The host himself is a sojourner (Heb. gér, Arab. jar) with God; the stranger is a fellow-guest, and loyalty to God demands that he should be hospitably entertained. Not unlike this, though on a higher plane, is the teaching of Jesus as to God's knowledge of and provision for our needs, which frees the trustful, childlike heart from all undue anxiety (Mt 6<sup>25-34</sup>, Lk 12<sup>22-31</sup>).

In the Gospels, however, it is not the free hospitality of the nomad desert life that meets us, but the more restricted hospitality of the town, of meals and banquets.

The word 'guest' occurs in AV of the Gospels only in Mt 22<sup>10</sup>. (In the parable of the Wedding Feast, where 'guests' = ἀναμνησθέντες; and in Lk 14<sup>17</sup>, where 'to be guest' (RV 'to lodge') = ναρῶσθαι. The Gr. word ἀναμνησθέντες, which indicates the reclining posture then generally adopted, occurs frequently in reference to meals or banquets, and is usually translated 'sit at meat' (e.g. Mt 14<sup>19</sup>, 26<sup>7</sup>). In Jn 13<sup>23</sup> ἀναμνησθέντες is rendered in RV 'at the table reclining.' The same word is used in Jn 6<sup>11</sup> in the narrative of the feeding of the 5000, though they, of course, had neither couch nor table. In a few passages ναρῶσθαι occurs, with the same reference to reclining at table; e.g. Lk 7<sup>36</sup> (of a meal at which Jesus was present as a guest) 14<sup>8</sup> (in Christ's warning against seeking the chief place); cf. art. GUEST-CHARLES. The cognate verb ἀναμνησθῆναι is similarly used several times, e.g. Mt 8<sup>11</sup> 14<sup>19</sup> etc.

During His ministry Jesus was frequently invited to be guest in private houses. Thus Matthew (Levi) entertained Him when He had called him from the 'place of toll' (Lk 5<sup>27</sup>); Martha 'received him into her house' (Lk 10<sup>38</sup>); Zacchaeus 'received him joyfully' (Lk 19<sup>10</sup>). He was one of the guests at the marriage in Cana of Galilee (Jn 2<sup>12</sup>), and after His resurrection He 'sat down to meat' in the house of the two disciples at Emmaus (Lk 24<sup>29</sup>). The Pharisees complained bitterly of His eating with publicans and sinners, yet several of them invited Him to be their guest (Lk 7<sup>36</sup>, 11<sup>37</sup>, 14<sup>16</sup>), not, as it seems, with the purest motives of hospitality. The words of Jesus to His host on one of these occasions (Lk 7<sup>36</sup>.)

introduce us to the courtesies which, if not necessarily shown to a guest, were marks of honour and regard, the giving of water to wash the feet, the kiss of welcome, the anointing of the head with oil.

It should be noted here that the request of Jesus to the Samaritan woman, 'Give me to drink' (Jn 4<sup>7</sup>), was virtually, according to Eastern ideas, a claim on her hospitality, and in ordinary circumstances it would have been recognized and responded to at once. Her astonishment at the request reminds us that between Jew and Samaritan there was no recognition of the law of hospitality (cf. Lk 9<sup>3</sup> 17<sup>9</sup>).

Some of the parables of Jesus reflect this aspect of Oriental life. The man to whom a friend has come unexpectedly at midnight is distressed because he has nothing in the house to offer him (Lk 11<sup>5</sup>). In the parable of the Wedding Feast (Mt 22<sup>10</sup>) we note the early invitation of the guests, the calling of them by servants on the appointed day (with καλεῖν τοὺς κλητῶνους, cf. Heb. קָרָאָהוּ 1 S 9<sup>13</sup> 22), the provision of the wedding garment.

In some other passages in the Gospels we have what seem to be traces of Oriental ideas as to the reception of guests, e.g. the instructions to the Twelve (Mt 10<sup>13</sup> 14; see also vv. 40-42), to the Seventy (Lk 10<sup>10</sup>). There is an Eastern saying that 'the guest while in the house is its lord'; the host often ministers to his needs with his own hands. With this we may perhaps compare such sayings as Mt 23<sup>1</sup>. In Mt 8<sup>11</sup>, Lk 13<sup>29</sup> the final blessedness of the Kingdom of Heaven is spoken of under the figure of a feast, at which guests from the east and the west shall sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob. Most striking of all is the great prophecy of final judgment (Mt 25<sup>1-12</sup>), where the destiny of men is made to turn on their granting or refusing to Christ, in the person of 'one of these my brethren, even the least,' the position and provision of a guest.

GUEST-CHAMBER.—This word occurs in RV only in the parallel passages Mk 14<sup>14</sup>, Lk 22<sup>11</sup>. Peter and John, sent by Jesus to prepare His last Passover, are told to ask the master of the house to which they would be guided, 'Where is the (Mk. 'my') guest-chamber, where I shall eat the passover with my disciples?' The Greek word here used (καρδία) occurs elsewhere in NT only in the narrative of the Nativity (Lk 2<sup>7</sup>), 'There was no room for them in the inn' (ἐν τῷ καταλύματι). It is used by LXX as the rendering of יָחַד (Ex 4<sup>24</sup>, RV 'lodging place') and of מִשְׁכָּה (1 S 9<sup>25</sup>, RV 'guest-chamber'). [It may here be noted that the cognate verb καταλύω, rendered in RV 'lodge', occurs in Lk 9<sup>3</sup> 19<sup>7</sup>. The guest-chamber of the last Passover is also spoken of by Jesus as 'a large upper room' (ἀνάγαιον, Mk 14<sup>14</sup>, Lk 22<sup>11</sup>). With this may be compared the ὄψερον of Ac 1<sup>13</sup> 9<sup>37</sup>. 20<sup>8</sup>. It has been conjectured by some that the ἀνάγαιον of Mk. and Lk. and the ὄψερον of Ac 1<sup>13</sup> are identical, but there is no evidence in support of this.]

We must associate several incidents in the life of our Lord besides the last Passover with the guest-chambers of the houses in which they took place, e.g. the anointing, in the house of Simon the Pharisee, by the woman who was a sinner (Lk 7<sup>36</sup>); the later anointing by Mary of Bethany in the house of Simon the Leper (Jn 12<sup>3</sup>); Levi's feast (Lk 5<sup>27</sup>); the dinner, or rather breakfast (ἀποστροφή), of Lk 11<sup>37</sup>; and the miracle and sayings of Jesus recorded in Lk 14<sup>17</sup>.

The guest-chamber occupied in our Lord's time, as it does at the present day, an important place in the arrangement and economy of Oriental houses. In it all festivities took place; it was set apart also for the entertainment of guests during their stay. It varied in position and character with the size of the house. The smaller houses (see HOUSE) had only one court; in these the guest-chamber was on the ground-floor, the women's apartments being above. But in the larger houses of the wealthier classes, which had two or three courts, the women's apartments were hidden away in an inner court, and the guest-chamber occupied the first floor of the outer court (hence ἀνάγαιον, ὄψερον). In either case it was open to the court, so that all that took place in the one could be seen from the other. On the opposite side of the court was another chamber, equal in size to the first, but fronted with lattice-work filled in with coloured glass; this served as a winter guest-chamber. In some cases a room on the flat roof, the most pleasant and most retired part of the house, was used as a guest-chamber. This is the ἡγία of the OT (cf. 1 K 17<sup>13</sup>).

The guest-chamber was, of course, furnished according to the means of the owner of the house. Many no doubt were, as indeed they are still, like the prophet's chamber of 2 K 4<sup>10</sup>, furnished with 'a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick.' But those of the wealthy were furnished with the greatest luxury. In our Lord's time the custom of reclining at meals was common. The couches and tables, which in the larger houses were placed on a raised part of the guest-chamber called the huzan, occupied three sides of a square, and the guests reclined with their heads toward the table, the feet outward toward the wall, and the left arm resting on a cushion. This must be borne in mind in reading such narratives as those of the two anointings and of the last Passover. The places at table were allotted to the guests according to a strict etiquette, as to the details of which there is considerable uncertainty. The eagerness of the Pharisees to secure for themselves the 'chief seats' (προπολίτια) at feasts brought on them the rebuke of Jesus (Lk 14<sup>7</sup>), and gave occasion to His warnings to the disciples to avoid such unseemly eagerness for personal honour (Mt 23<sup>1</sup>, Mk 12<sup>36</sup>, Lk 20<sup>9</sup>).

Besides the guest-chambers of private houses, there were, as there are now, in most villages one or more guest-chambers, provided and maintained at the public expense, for the accommodation of travellers who arrived in larger numbers than could be privately entertained. They were shelters for man and beast of a very simple kind. Some think that the 'inn' of Bethlehem (Lk 2<sup>7</sup>) was of this character, but others are of opinion that it was rather an inn under the care of a host, like the πανδοχεῖον of Lk 10<sup>8</sup>.

GUIDE.—1. The word 'guide'.—In AV of Gospels the noun 'guide' is found only in Mt 23<sup>16</sup> 24, where it represents ἡγήγως (lit. 'a leader of the way'). ἡγήγως occurs also, however, in Mt 15<sup>14</sup>, where RV has consistently substituted 'blind guides' for 'blind leaders' of AV (cf. Ac 1<sup>8</sup>, Ro 2<sup>19</sup>). As a verb, 'guide' in AV of Gospels represents two different words in the original. (a) ἀγγέλω (from ἀγγέλλω) in Jn 16<sup>22</sup>. ἀγγέλω is found also in Mt 15<sup>14</sup>, Lk 9<sup>38</sup> (cf. Ac 3<sup>21</sup>, Rev 7<sup>13</sup>), but is there rendered 'lead' in AV, which RV again properly changes to 'guide.' (b) εὐθετώω (lit. 'to make straight'), which occurs only once in Gospels (Lk 1<sup>2</sup>; but cf. 1 Th 3<sup>4</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>3</sup>). An interesting contrast might be drawn between the false ἀγγέλω, the 'blind leaders of the blind' (Mt 15<sup>14</sup>, 23<sup>16</sup>, Lk 6<sup>39</sup>), and the true ἀγγέλω (who is also Himself ὁ ὁδός, Jn 14<sup>6</sup>), who came into the world to 'set our feet straight' into the way of peace (Lk 1<sup>7</sup>), who promised before His departure that He would send the Spirit of truth to guide His people into all the truth (Jn 16<sup>13</sup>), and who will Himself hereafter 'guide them to life-giving springs of water' (Rev 7<sup>17</sup>). With Christ as ἀγγέλω of His people cf. the ἀρχηγός of Ac 3<sup>21</sup> 5<sup>2</sup>, He 2<sup>20</sup> 12<sup>2</sup>.

2. Christ as our Guide.—To communities and to individuals, otherwise walking in darkness, Christ is their Guide, the Shepherd leading His sheep, the Light preceding His people. There can be only one Guide,—a man cannot follow the lode-star and also make for every flickering will of the-wisp that allures and entices him. Christ has deliberately and finally claimed the guidance of mankind. He bade sincere aspirants after life follow, not the Law as such, nor even God as unincarnate, but Himself, the Law-in-character and the God-in-man (Lk 18<sup>22</sup>, Mt 16<sup>18</sup>, Jn 12<sup>27</sup>). His guidance is to be universal in its scope (Jn 14<sup>23</sup>), and will be sufficient in its nature (Jn 21<sup>27</sup>). Without Him the mass of men are as sheep without a shepherd (Mt 9<sup>36</sup>). He alone reveals God to man (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>), and so displays the goal of man's being. He taught, therefore, as one having unique authority (Mt 7<sup>29</sup>), and rightly draws all men to Himself (Jn 12<sup>32</sup>). He Himself, and no other conceivably or possibly, is the Way, as well as the Truth and the Life (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>). Hence the warning: 'Take heed that no man lead you astray' (Mk 13<sup>3</sup>). And so, on the other hand, the impossibility of the Christian's seeking any other guidance, expressed in St. Peter's exclamation: 'Lord, to whom shall we go?' (Jn 6<sup>68</sup>). Of this sole claim and unique authority the three chosen disciples heard the ratification in the bewildering glory of the Transfiguration: 'This is my beloved Son: hear ye him' (Mk 9<sup>7</sup>). This guidance Christ gives to His follower by His Holy Spirit, guiding into all the truth (Jn 16<sup>13</sup>); and very especially through the Holy Scriptures, which tell of Him (Jn 5<sup>39</sup>), and whose meaning He can make plain (Lk 24<sup>27, 45</sup>). Christ Himself ratified the guidance afforded by Scripture at crises of His life, in which example and precept were wedded together in indissoluble union, as in the Temptation, the Cleansing of the Temple, and on the Cross (Lk 4. 19<sup>46</sup> 23<sup>34</sup>).

To put it in another way, the Father's will was Christ's will, even to the uttermost: 'Not what I will, but what thou wilt' (Mk 14<sup>36</sup>). So Christ guides us to union with God, our true destiny; through Him we come to the Father (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>). Hence His guidance is into peace (Lk 1<sup>7</sup>), as the aged Zacharias felt and declared. It is the steady, unvarying guidance of the heart towards its Divine home, the love of God, as the name Immanuel suggests (Mt 1<sup>23</sup>). It is an absolute guidance, or no guidance (Lk 9<sup>27-28</sup>).

W. B. FRANKLAND.

GUILT.—See DECEIT.

GUILT is the state of the sinner before God, whereby, becoming the object of God's wrath, he incurs the debt and punishment of death. So closely are Sin, Guilt, and Death connected, both in the OT and NT, that the terms are almost interchangeable, and can be adequately discussed only in relation to one another (see art. SIN). It will suffice in the present article to show that the removal of guilt was the object of Christ's death, and that the recognition of sin as guilt is in consequence a prominent, if not the primary feature of the teaching of the NT concerning sin.

1. The gospel, as first preached by the Baptist (Mt 3<sup>2</sup>) and Jesus Himself (Mk 1<sup>2</sup>, Mt 4<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>7</sup>), was the Kingdom of God. Even the Fourth Evangelist, who usually presents it as Eternal Life, witnesses to this fact (Jn 3<sup>3</sup>). The message, therefore, as coupled with the summons to repentance, involves a restoration of personal relations, God reigning in the midst of a reconciled people. Baptism, though the symbolism of cleansing is employed, is 'unto remission' (Mk 1<sup>4</sup>, Lk 3<sup>3</sup>) rather than to the washing away of sins; remission being not a vital act by which sinners are made just, but a personal favour (Mt 6<sup>12</sup> cf. 1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup>) by which they are accounted righteous. The risen Lord expressly carries on this view of His atoning work into the proclamation of the completed Christian gospel. Remission of sins was to be preached in His name among all the nations (Lk 24<sup>47</sup>, cf. Mt 28<sup>19</sup>). To this message the primitive preaching shows an exact fidelity (Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 5<sup>21</sup> 10<sup>43</sup> 13<sup>38</sup> 26<sup>18</sup>). The expression 'blotted out' in Ac 3<sup>19</sup> emphasizes forgiveness as the cancelling of an account. And the statement of St. Paul in Ac 17<sup>30</sup> (cf. Ro 3<sup>25</sup>), that God had 'overlooked' the times of ignorance, again gives prominence to the personal relation.

It is the guilt rather than the infection of sin which appears in the teaching of Jesus. The analogy between disease and sin, which the miracles of healing suggest, might appear to show the contrary. But it is doubtful whether the transition from the sickness of the body to that of the soul would have presented itself to the Hebrew in this form, and not rather through the conception of suffering as the punishment of sin. It is this, for example, that makes the problem of the 'marred visage' of Jehovah's Servant (Is 52<sup>14-15</sup> 53). And the interpretation given by our Lord Himself in the case of the paralytic seems to be decisive. His power to cure the body is the evidence, not of His power to heal the soul, but of His authority (ἐξουσία) to forgive sins (Mk 2<sup>10</sup>). It is the 'debts' which remain as the permanent result of past trespasses, for which we ask forgiveness in the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>, Lk 11<sup>4</sup>); and when we crave deliverance, it is not from the sick will, but from the 'Evil One' (Mt 6<sup>13</sup>), the personal enemy of God who has received a guilty allegiance. The importance of this aspect of sin is further marked by the requirement of human forgiveness as the condition because the pattern of Divine remission (Mt 6<sup>14-15</sup> 18<sup>35-36</sup>). What, therefore, is removed is not, in the first instance, the subjective consequences, but an objective result of sin. If it be urged that Christ discharges the latter only in virtue of the fact that He destroys the former, as expressed in the words 'it is he that shall save his people from their sins' (Mt 1<sup>23</sup>, but cf. Ro 5<sup>9</sup>), the reply is that Jesus is here represented as Saviour in the sense in which Messiah was to save, and that this is determined by the meaning of 'salvation' as developed in the theology of the OT. The root idea of the Messianic salvation is liberation not remedy (Ex 14<sup>13</sup> 15<sup>2</sup>, Is 45<sup>17</sup> 46<sup>13</sup> 52<sup>10</sup>, Lk 100. 71. 77).

Again, attention must be paid to the prominence given to judgment, especially the Day of Judgment, in the Synoptic narrative (Mt 5<sup>22</sup> 27. 2 10<sup>15</sup> 11<sup>22-24</sup> 12<sup>31-32</sup> 24. 4. 15<sup>29</sup> 25 19<sup>28</sup> 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100). The unquenchable fire is not merely the automatic result of sin bringing forth death, but punishment inflicted by judicial sentence (Mk 9<sup>43-45</sup>, Mt 25<sup>41</sup>). The wicked are workers of ininiquity giving account for idle words and deeds (Mt 12<sup>34</sup> 16<sup>27</sup>). Blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, however it be interpreted, incurs condemnation as the unpardonable sin (Mk 3<sup>28, 29</sup>, Mt 12<sup>31, 32</sup>). It is the personal relation, and therefore the guilt of sin, which appears in the parables of the Lost Sheep, etc. (Lk 15). The joy of the angels is represented as arising out of the reconciliation between the Father and the penitent (Lk 15<sup>10</sup>). The expiatory character of the Cross is not so fully evident. But Jesus gives His life a ransom (Mk 10<sup>45</sup>); the Agony was a cup given by His Father (Mk 14<sup>36</sup>); the sorrow of death was the forsaking by God (Mk 15<sup>34</sup>); the peace of Calvary the self-committal to the Father (Lk 23<sup>46</sup>).

2. The Gospel of St. John, dwelling, as it does, upon the gift of God as life, truth, and light, might seem on a superficial reading to obscure, if not to ignore, the view of sin as guilt. But even the Prologue couples grace, or God's free favour, with truth as that which came by Jesus Christ, and that in antithesis to the Law given by Moses (Jn 1<sup>7</sup>). The witness of the Baptist is to the Lamb of God (1<sup>29, 36</sup>), a sacrificial term involving expiation (19<sup>36</sup>; cf. Ex 12<sup>21</sup>, Nu 9<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>, Jn 6<sup>52</sup> with Westcott's note). To believe on the name of the Son of God is to escape judgment (Jn 3<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>24</sup>). It is 'accusation to the Father' which the Jews have to fear (5<sup>40</sup>). Through Christ we come to the Father (14<sup>6</sup>). The commission of the risen Christ to His disciples is to forgive sins (20<sup>23</sup>), a sacrificial term involving expiation (16<sup>7</sup> 18<sup>18</sup>). It is the confession and forgiveness of sins which the First Epistle represents as effecting the cleansing from sin and unrighteousness through the sacrificial blood and heavenly intercession of our Advocate with the Father (1 Jn 2<sup>1-2</sup>). The use of ἀνομία, 'lawlessness,' as a synonym for ἀμαρτία, 'sin,' implies the guilt of a broken law (3<sup>9</sup>). The condemnation or acquittal of the heart reflects the judgment of God (3<sup>20</sup>). In the Apocalypse, sin is set in relation to Him that sitteth on the throne (Rev 4<sup>7</sup>), incurring His wrath (6<sup>16</sup>), noted in His books (20<sup>12</sup>), and receiving His plagues (15<sup>1</sup>).

3. It is difficult to set forth St. Paul's theory of guilt without entering upon the whole question of his view of sin. But a few considerations will make it clear that he looks at sin, in the first instance, as incurring guilt. It is represented as an act committed against God (Ro 1<sup>21</sup>). All its essential features are recapitulated in each individual sin or transgression. It is only through the Law that it can appear as what it is (3<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>1</sup>). It can only be separated from its actual manifestations by being represented, not as a predisposing cause of these, but as itself an act of disobedience on the part of Adam (5<sup>19</sup>). Death is not so much its consequence as its punishment or wages (5<sup>12</sup> 6<sup>23</sup>), not following automatically, but inflicted by the sentence of an offended God (1<sup>18</sup>, Eph 5<sup>2</sup>, Col 3<sup>6</sup>). It involves responsibility (Ro 1<sup>20</sup>), desert (1<sup>12</sup>), condemnation (3<sup>18, 19</sup>). The work of Christ is primarily an act of righteous obedience (5<sup>12, 19</sup>, Ph 2<sup>8</sup>), undoing the act of disobedience in which all sin is included; an offering for sin condemning sin in the flesh (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>), and wiping off the score of trespasses (Col 2<sup>14</sup>). Its effect in the broadest view is a reversal of the sentence of condemnation (Ro 8<sup>1</sup>) and reconciliation with God (5<sup>10</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>18, 20</sup>). St. Paul's view of the function of law must here be remembered. The analogy of a therapeutic drug, administered in order that the disease may declare itself, is apt to mislead. This is not in the Apostle's thought. For trespasses or transgressions are themselves sin, not merely its symptoms (Eph 2<sup>1-2</sup>). It is the removal of these, not of a cause distinguishable from them, which is the purpose of the Cross (Ro 4<sup>25</sup>; cf. 5<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>32</sup>). Death, which passed upon all men in consequence of transgression (5<sup>12</sup>), reigned from Adam to Moses (5<sup>14</sup>). The figure is that of a ruler to whose sway all men have as a penalty been judicially consigned, and from whose custody the free favour of God in Christ releases them. 'All have sinned' (5<sup>12</sup>), whether with or without an explicit publication of law. St. Paul would not have allowed that through an involuntary taint of heredity men had at any time suffered without personal guilt. The Gentiles have the Law, being enlightened by conscience (2<sup>14, 15</sup>; cf. Mt 23<sup>1-46</sup>). Though the Law is not explicitly revealed, they are in effect transgressors. If in Ro 4<sup>15</sup> St. Paul declares that 'the law worketh wrath,' because 'where there is no law, neither is there transgression,' in Gal 3<sup>10</sup> he says rather that the Law was added (προσέτεθη), came in between the promise and its fulfilment, because of transgressions; i.e. to bring home unmistakably to those who were already guilty the conviction of their offences.

So we are brought to the evidence of the doctrine of justification. Without pressing the forensic metaphor to a point inconsistent with St. Paul's thought, which would relegate the whole theology of guilt to a region of formal conceptions unchecked by experience, we are bound to remember that the Apostle is concerned with the probation of guilt assumed to exist, which is necessary before the sinner can throw himself upon the offer of free salvation secured to him through the gospel. Justification is not in itself a change of character, a transformation of life, but an alteration of status (Ro 5<sup>1, 2</sup>, Eph 2<sup>10</sup>), a reversal of relations whereby the 'servants of sin' (Ro 6<sup>17</sup>), 'the children of wrath' (Eph 2<sup>3</sup>) become 'children of grace,' 'sons of God' (Gal 3<sup>26</sup>). It is the antithesis of trespasses (Ro 4<sup>20</sup>), no more to be confused with sanctification, which is its fruit (6<sup>22</sup>), than is transgression with uncleanness, which is its issue (13<sup>1</sup>). To be justified from sin is to have escaped—either by paying the penalty of death (6<sup>7</sup>) or by believing in Christ Jesus (3<sup>24, 25</sup>)—from what in a figure is regarded as its claim or dominion over the life (6<sup>12-14</sup>), involving an obedience or yielding of the members. This is entirely in harmony with the conception of sin, from which St. Paul starts, as a voluntary withdrawal of allegiance admitting of no excuse.

We shall be saved from confusion with regard to the Pauline view of guilt, and the necessity of conforming the whole doctrine of sin to this primary idea, by considering what he means by 'adoption' and 'grace.' There is no clear instance in any Epistle of the use of the word χάρις in its later ecclesiastical sense of an infusion of spiritual strength (see Sanday-Headlam, Romanesque, note on 1<sup>2</sup> χάρις). In some passages, apart from other considerations, the term admits of this interpretation (e.g. Eph 4<sup>7</sup>). But the root idea is the free favour of God through Christ (Ro 4<sup>16</sup>). It is not, therefore, an imparted gift, but an attitude of the Divine Mind. Again, the conception of sonship, as applied to the relation of the believer to God, while not excluding community of nature, gives prominence rather to the elective purpose of the Father (Eph 1<sup>5</sup>). It is not reached as a deduction from membership in Christ, as though the highest action of Divine grace were nothing more than the operation of a natural law. Modern theology, with its leading idea of solidarity, has tended to obscure the personal action of the Father in admitting mankind to fellowship. St. Paul's thought, on the other hand, is guided by the Hebraic conception of the son and heir, with its notion of privilege rather than primogeniture (Ex 4<sup>22</sup>, Jer 31<sup>9</sup>, Ps 89<sup>7</sup>, Gal 1<sup>4</sup>, He 12<sup>8</sup>; cf. Job 18<sup>13</sup>, Is 14<sup>30</sup>). Thus the Christian attains his rank in the family of God by 'adoption' (Gal 4<sup>5</sup>, Eph 1<sup>5</sup>; cf. Gal 3<sup>26</sup>), where sonship is presented as a privilege granted ἐκ χάριτος. The Spirit which makes him a member of Christ is the 'Spirit of adoption' (Ro 8<sup>15</sup>), freely given by God to those whom He takes for His children (Gal 4<sup>6</sup>, Ro 8<sup>15, 16</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>13</sup>). Membership in Christ is thus rather the result than the cause of the filial relation. The Christian life depends, not upon the eradication of evil, but upon the forgiveness of sin (Eph 1<sup>7</sup>), the clearing of the guilty on the part of a personal God in consequence of the personal satisfaction offered by Christ (Ro 3<sup>24, 25</sup>, cf. Ex 24<sup>11</sup>). This view of sonship, as involving God's elective purpose and man's free response, frequently underlies St. Paul's argument. Isaac is the child of promise (Gal 3<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>28, 29</sup>, Ro 9<sup>8, 10</sup>), Abraham the father of the faithful (Gal 3<sup>7</sup>, Ro 4<sup>12</sup>). The redemption of the body is itself an 'adoption' (Ro 8<sup>23</sup>).

4. The Epistle to the Hebrews brings out the various elements in the conception of human guilt with conspicuous clearness. We have to do with the living God (He 3<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>31</sup>), who is a consuming fire (12<sup>29</sup>), self-existent and separate from creation (12<sup>18-21</sup>), the supreme lawgiver and judge (10<sup>29</sup> 12<sup>29</sup>), whom to see, therefore, demands a purifying separation on the part of His suppliant worshipper (9<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>21</sup>). What man needs is boldness to approach His throne (4<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>19</sup>), and so to enter into His rest (4<sup>10</sup>). But there is an obstacle, typified by propitiatory rites and attested by universal experience (9<sup>2-10</sup> 10<sup>1-11</sup>). The omens thereunto need a reluctance (2<sup>10-11</sup>), the accomplishment of a preliminary act of satisfaction (27<sup>3</sup>) which shall render them competent. The experience, which justifies the fulfilment of rites felt to be inadequate, is the fear of death (2<sup>11</sup>), the spirit of bondage (ib.), the evil conscience (10<sup>22</sup>). This is not the same thing as ignorance, error, or infirmity (5<sup>3</sup>), all of which are recognized as present in human character and requiring to be dealt with. It is the consciousness that the offerer has a past which repentance cannot separate from him in respect of his relation to the Everliving (10<sup>2-2</sup> 26<sup>27</sup>), a record of offences for which none but One who Himself 'ever liveth' can atone by an abiding intercession (7<sup>25</sup>, cf. 10<sup>2</sup>). The conscience must be purged from dead works (9<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>2</sup>), which are to be distinguished from their present results in character. The 'redemption of transgressions' (9<sup>12</sup>; cf. Ae 17<sup>26</sup>, Ro 3<sup>24-25</sup>), the removal of a burden (2<sup>25</sup> εργα δουλείας, cf. Ja 2<sup>2</sup>), is the method whereby consecration to God's service and boldness of access are secured. Even sanctification itself in Hebrews (12<sup>14</sup>, cf. 2<sup>11</sup> 10<sup>10-14</sup> 13<sup>12</sup>) is, not indeed the formal consecration of the sinner, but the removal of the 'weight' of guilt (12), of which the fulness of faith (10<sup>22</sup>) is the counterpart in spiritual experience.

5. That guilt is original, i.e. attaches to all mankind, and may be predicated of each individual before particular evidence of transgression, is implied in the facts of redemption (see art. SIN), and explicitly taught in the NT. In the famous passage Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup> nothing is said of a transmitted tendency to sin, though it has been often supposed that this is implied. But St. Paul does say that death 'passed unto all men' through Adam's transgression. The context shows that death is here regarded as a punishment inflicted by God. And guilt is implied in the remarkable sentence 'all have sinned', which interprets the statement that 'through one man sin entered.' How St. Paul reached this apparent paradox seems clear from a consideration of Jewish theology. The OT bears abundant witness to the belief that the sins (plural) of the fathers are 'visited' upon the children (Ex 20<sup>5</sup> 34<sup>7</sup>), while at the same time the teaching of Ezekiel balances it by an emphatic vindication of the separate responsibility of each soul (Ezk 18<sup>20</sup>). Apart from the narrative of the Fall, which indicates a penalty involving the seed of the woman (Gn 3<sup>16-17</sup>), this is, perhaps, as far as the OT carries us. But the Book of Wisdom (2<sup>24</sup>) represents death as entering the world through the envy of the devil, and Sirach (25<sup>24</sup>) declares that sin originated from a woman, and 'because of her we all die.' The teaching of the Rabbis, however, differentiating the actual transgression of Adam from the potentiality of sin involved in his creation, expressly asserts that death was decreed against the generations of Adam. Elsewhere death is spoken of as incurred by the personal guilt of each individual, and the statement of the Apocalypse of Baruch (54<sup>12-13</sup>), that 'each of us is the Adam of his own soul,' looks like an attempt to express a mystery which alone can reconcile these divergent views. According to Weber (Altsynag. Theol. p. 216), the nett result of Talmudic teaching appears to be that 'by the Fall man came under a curse, is guilty of death, and his right relation to God is rendered difficult.' It is probably only in the sense of transmitted taint that Ederstein (Life and Times, etc. i. p. 165 ff.) disallows original sin as part of the doctrine of the older Rabbis; for, in common with other writers, he acknowledges the frequent assertion of inherited guilt. That St. Paul was familiar with this prevalent view hardly admits of doubt, or that he availed himself of it to interpret the relation of Jesus the Messiah to the whole human race, as giving the victory over sin, the wages of which is death (Ro 6<sup>23</sup>), and the power of which is the outraged law (1 Co 15<sup>26</sup>).

GULF (χάσμα, from χαίρω, to yawn, gape, open wide, Lk 16<sup>26</sup> only. Chasma (shortened, chasm) is the exact transliteration of the Greek, but this word, in general use, is later than the AV. Findale has 'a great space,' and the Geneva VS 'a great gulfe,' with 'swallowing pit' in the margin.—It is interesting to compare with this other representations of the division between the worlds of the unseen. In Plato's vision in the Republic there is an intermediate space where judges are seated, who divide to the right hand or to the left according as men are found just or unjust. Return to the upper world is possible; but when any incurable or unpunished sinners tried to ascend, 'the opening, instead of receiving them, gave forth a sound, and then wild men of fiery aspect, who were standing by and knew what the sound meant, seized and carried them to be cast into hell (Jowett's Plato, iii. 512 f.). Virgil's vision is of 'a cavern, deep and huge, with its vast mouth, craggy, sheltered by its black lake and forest gloom, o'er which no birds might speed along unharmed; such an exhalation, pouring from its black jaws, rose to the vault of heaven; wherefore the Greeks named the spot Avernus.' The 'dreadful prison-house' is guarded by a 'gate of ponderous size, with pillars of solid adamant; so that no mortal might, nay, nor the dwellers in the sky, are strong enough to throw it down in war' (Aeneid, vi. 236 f., 553 f.). Coming to Jewish representations, the Book of Enoch speaks of three separations between the spirits of the dead,—'by a chasm, by water, and by light above it' (ch. 22). In Rabbinical teaching (cf. Weber, Jüd. Theol. 341) the separation between Paradise and Ge-hinnom is minimized; it is but 'a wall,' 'a palm-breadth,' a 'finger-breadth,' 'a thread.' With this representation the 'great gulf' of the parable is in striking contrast. It would be obviously wrong to interpret literally, or even to insist upon some spiritual counterpart of the detail of the parable, as it would be wrong to base upon the parable as a whole any doctrine of the future over and above its clear moral lesson and warning. But the solemn words of Jesus as to the possibility and danger of the fixity of character in evil must not be lightly set aside (see ETERNAL SIN).

HADES.—See DEAD, ESCHATOLOGY, and HELL (DESCENT INTO).

HAIR.—The Jews seem to have shared with other peoples the belief that the hair is really 'a living and important part of the body' (W. R. Smith, RS 324; Frazer, Golden Bough, iii. 390). This lent importance to the oath by the head which was common among them (Mt 5<sup>33</sup>), and it accounts for the attention given to the hair in connexion with vows (Ac 18<sup>18</sup>; Jos. BJ II. xv. 1; on hair as offering and in vows see W. R. Smith, l.c. 323 ff.; Frazer, l.c. i. 370 ff.). In NT times long hair was regarded as a glory of women, but a disgrace to men (1 Co 11<sup>14-15</sup>). Opinion had changed since the days of Absalom.

Among the Arabs the ancient sentiment survives. Many stalwart men, not merely 'immature lads' (RS 329), take pride in their long glossy locks. It is interesting also to note a change from the NT attitude to women's hair. The Jews in Poland permit no married woman to wear her own hair; it must be cropped close before the wedding, and replaced by a high head-dress of wool or silk. It is a terrible sin to neglect this rule (Sommer, 'The Jews', p. 363, in Story of the Nations).

It was customary to dress the hair with ointment (Mt 6<sup>17</sup>), and women bestowed much care upon the coiffure (1 Ti 2, 1 P 3<sup>2</sup>). It was a shame for a woman to appear with locks unbound and hair dishevelled.

Lightfoot (Works, ed. 1823, xii. 361) gives two Rabbinic quotations in point. 'Kamitha had seven sons who all performed the office of high priests; they asked of her how she came to this honour? She answered, "The rafters of my house never saw the hair of my head"' (Vayyikra Rabba, fol. 188. 2). 'The priest unloosed the hair' of the suspected woman, about to be tried by the bitter water, 'for greater disgrace' (Sota, fol. 5. 1).

When Mary (Jn 12<sup>3</sup>) wiped the feet of Jesus with her hair, she thus 'testified that, as no sacrifice was too costly for her purse, so no service was too mean for her person' (Godet, in loc.).

Abundant hair on head and chin has always been regarded by Easterns as lending dignity to manhood, and the beard is an object of special reverence. 'I smooth my beard,' says Doughty, 'toward one to admonish him in his wrongful dealing with me, and have put him in mind of his honour. If I touch his beard, I put him in remembrance of our common humanity, and of the witness of God above us. The beard is taken in Arabia for human honour, and to pluck it is the highest indignity. Of an honest man they say, "His is a good beard"; of a vile, covetous heart, "He has no beard"' (Arabia Deserta, i. 268). What indignity then He suffered of whom the prophet wrote, 'I gave . . . my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair' (Is 50<sup>7</sup>).

Single hairs are taken to illustrate the minuteness of God's care (Mt 10<sup>30</sup>, Lk 12<sup>7</sup> 21<sup>18</sup>). White hairs are a symbol of reverend and glorious majesty (Rev 1<sup>4</sup>). The long hair, as of women, adds to the grotesque and terrible appearance of the locust-monsters (Rev 9<sup>7</sup>).

The Baptist's garment of camel's hair (θριξ καμηλου, Mt 3<sup>4</sup>) is probably identical with שער ערבה of Zec 13<sup>8</sup>, and that of his great prototype (2 K 1<sup>8</sup>), where we should read with RVm 'a man with a garment of hair'. The rough outer cloak generally worn is of goats' hair. Wabur et-ibul, the hair, or wool, (θριξ can also mean 'wool,' II. iii. 273, Hes. Op. 515) of the camel is softer, and of this an inner cloak is often worn, e.g. in winter by the fishermen on the Sea of Galilee.

Goats' hair is not named in NT, but most likely this was the material in which the Apostle Paul wrought at his trade (Ac 18<sup>3</sup>), his native province supplying it in great quantities.

HALL.—'Hall' appears in the AV in a way to cause not a little confusion, as tr. sometimes of αὐλή and sometimes of πραιτώριον. In Mt 27<sup>17</sup> AV has 'the soldiers of the governor took Jesus into the common hall' (a circumlocution for πραιτώριον). In Mt 13<sup>36</sup> AV has 'into the hall called Praetorium,' as tr. of εἰς τῆς αὐλῆς ὃ ἐστὶν πραιτώριον. RV has not entirely relieved this confusion. The English Revisers render πραιτώριον by 'palace,' following Rhem.; while the American Revisers, more literally, give praetorium, the Latin word which was carried over, transliterated, into the Greek, and which denoted originally the praetor's tent or abode, or the general's headquarters. Tindale introduced 'judgement-hall' for πραιτώριον, and is followed by AV in Jn 18<sup>28</sup>, 33 19<sup>9</sup> etc. The AV renders αὐλή by 'palace' in Mt 26<sup>3</sup>, 28-29, Mk 14<sup>64</sup>, 66, Lk 11<sup>21</sup>, Jn 18<sup>16</sup>, when the reference is to the place where the governor dispensed justice; by 'fold' in Jn 10<sup>1-9</sup> of the place where the sheep were kept at night; and by 'court' in Rev 11<sup>2</sup>, as designating the court of the temple. RV more consistently renders αὐλή by 'court' instead of 'palace,' everywhere except in Jn 10<sup>1</sup> ἢ αὐλή τῶν προβάτων, where it has 'the fold of the sheep' (cf. AV 'sheepfold'), and in v. 10, where it has simply 'fold.' Cf. Mt 20<sup>3</sup>, 28-29, where the inner court of the high priest's official residence seems to be meant; in v. 9, 'Peter sat without in the palace' (AV); 'without' stands in contrast with the audience-room in which Jesus was appearing before the authorities, i.e. Peter was not in the room of the official residence where the trial was going on, but out in the open court, around which the house was built; and this was 'beneath,' or on a lower level than the audience-room. See also COBET, PRETORIUM. GKO. B. EAGER.

HALLEL ('praise').—A technical Hebrew liturgical term, applied in Rabbinical literature to certain Psalms and psalm-pieces of praise, which characteristically have as their keynote the expression Hallelujah ('Praise ye Jah'). It is more particularly applied to one group of Psalms (113-118) regarded as a liturgical unit (so always in the Synagogue-liturgy).

Pss 113-118 form 'the Hallel' הַהַלֵּל, as distinguished from the 'Hallel of Egypt' (Pss 113-114) and the 'great Hallel' (הַהַלֵּל הַגָּדוֹל) which is usually understood to mean Ps 136. In the Talmud and Midrash, however, the Psalms included in the 'great Hallel' are variously given, viz.: (1) Ps 136, (2) Pss 135-136, and (3) Pss 120-136. The question is discussed in Jerusa. Pes. v. 7. See, further, Joel Müller, note to Sepheres xviii. 2 (p. 253). In one passage of the Mishna (Pes. x. 5) the Hallel (Pss 113-118) is designated 'Hallehujah.' For 'half-Hallel' see below.

1. Origin.—In its present form the Psalm-group (113-118) seems clearly to have been compiled for liturgical purposes at a comparatively late date. The most probable view is that the collection was formed in Maccabean times for recitation on the Feast of Hannukkah (Dedication), on the eight days of which it is still chanted in the synagogue.

Ps 118<sup>24</sup> ('This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it') points to some day of public * הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה הַלְלוּ אֱלֹהֵינוּ Ber. 56a. See J. Müller, op. cit. p. 288. In a baraita (Bab. Shabb. 118b) Pss 145-148 are apparently called a 'Hallel.'

thanksgiving; vv. 4-8 suggest the Syrian war, and recovery of and entrance into the Temple. At the same time, the collection embodies other elements. Thus Ps 113<sup>29-32</sup> seems to be an old song of praise for the Feast of Tabernacles. With this agree the fact that, according to an old tradition preserved in the Jerusalem Talmud (Sukka iv. 5), the Hallel was recited on 'eighteen days and one night of the year—the eight days of Tabernacles; the eight of Hānuccā; Pentecost (one day); and the first day of Passover with its preceding night.' It is noticeable that Tabernacles and Hānuccā are placed first in this list; and it should be remembered that the latter feast seems originally to have been regarded as a sort of extension or reduplication of the former (cf. S. Mac 19); Chayne (OP p. 88, note n) remarks: 'that the recitation of the Hallel on these occasions (Dedication and Tabernacles) goes back to Simon can hardly be doubted.' A curious indication of its liturgical use may perhaps be seen in the fact that the Midrash on the Psalms counts only five psalms in the Hallel, Ps 115 not being regarded. The LXX and many Hebrew MSS treat the latter psalm as part of Ps 114. The reason assigned in one of the smaller Midrashim is as follows: 'The Torah consists of five-fifths; the Feast of five-fifths; and the Hallel of five-fifths.'

2. Jewish liturgical usage.—As already stated, the Hallel, according to tradition, was regularly recited at the Feasts of Tabernacles, Dedication, Pentecost, and Passover (first day and preceding night).†

On certain other days of the year it became customary to recite the Hallel, viz.: on the last 6 days of Passover, and on new moons other than the new moon of Nisani (which introduces the solemn penitential period). But this usage was apparently late and unauthorized. This is shown (a) by the omission on these days of two sections of the complete Hallel, viz.: Ps 113<sup>11</sup> and 113<sup>12</sup>; and (b) that both Saadia and Maimonides protested against the use of the regular benediction before 'half-Hallel,' on the ground that its employment on these days was merely a pious custom without authority.

The recitation of the Hallel is preceded and followed by special blessings.‡ Certain parts are also recited with a responsive refrain:

(a) The first four verses of Ps 118 are said by the Reader, the people responding after each: 'O give thanks unto the Lord, for He is good: for His mercy endureth for ever.' (b) The last nine verses of the same Psalm are also repeated, in part alternately, in part together, by Reader and congregation.

According to the Mishna (Pes. v. 7), which embodies old and (there is every reason to believe) trustworthy traditions as to the Temple-ritual, the complete Hallel was recited by the Levites during the slaughter of the Paschal lambs in the Temple-courts.¶ The use of Hallel in the Paschal meal at home, when the lamb was eaten, must be carefully distinguished from the above. Here the data are somewhat conflicting.

According to the Mishna (Pes. x. 6 and 7), the Hallel was here recited in two parts, and this is still the custom at the Jewish Paschal meal. The first part (Pss 113-114) immediately follows the Haggada proper (the narrative of redemption) and precedes the drinking of the second cup of wine. It is appropriately closed by a special benediction for redemption. The second part (Pss 115-118, followed by 119 and the 'Blessing of Song') follows after the mixing of the fourth cup, when the banquet and grace after meat have been completed. And this arrangement is attested in the Mishna (6). The contents of the first part were, however, a subject in dispute between the schools of Shammai and Hillel, the former concluding it at Ps 114, the latter at Ps 118. The wording of the benediction for redemption was also not fully determined (6b). It looks as though the recitation of the Hallel in the home-service were a reminiscence of the Temple-ritual, the family meal being partaken of between the two parts as a family sacrifice, just as the Passover lamb was sacrificed in the Temple during the singing of the Hallel. The custom, as the Mishna suggests, may quite well have arisen before the destruction of the Temple.

3. Usage in the Gospels.—It is usually assumed that the hymn referred to in Mt 26<sup>30</sup> || Mk 14<sup>26</sup>

* Cf. also Bab. Arakha, 12a.
† Periz (Encyc. Bibl. s.v. 'Hallel') connects the liturgical recitation of the Hallel with the Passover-meal (he denies that it was sung in the Temple-service), and thinks that it attained its present compass only 'during the first half of the second century.' But this is to ignore the data given above, which connect it primarily with Tabernacles and Hānuccā.

‡ With the doubling of the initial days of Festivals that takes place 'in exile,' the 18 days originally comprised in the above now amount to 21, and 1 night to 2.
§ Hence the designation 'half-Hallel' for this form.

¶ For these cf. Singer's Heb. Eng. Prayer-Book, pp. 219, 224.
¶ For a graphic description of this see Ederstein, The Temple: its Ministry and Services, p. 191 f.

('when they had sung a hymn' [ἠμῶν]) was the second part of the Hallel (Pss 115-118)* sung at the conclusion of the Paschal supper (see above). This is quite possible, in view of the probability that the custom had been established in connexion with the Paschal meal in the time of Christ.

In Delitzsch's Heb. NT the expression is well paraphrased: 'After they had completed the Hallel' (בְּתוֹמָתָהּ 722). But there are some indications that the usage was subject to variation in the earlier period. Thus, according to one authority, for the 'completion' of the Hallel at the Paschal meal Ps 25 might suffice (Pes. 116a). The expression לְהַשְׁמִיעַ certainly suggests a Paschal meal. It is significant, however, that it is absent from the Lukan account.

HALLOWED.—Used of the name of our Father—first petition in the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6<sup>9</sup> || Lk 11<sup>2</sup>) = 'revered' or 'counted holy'. It is, says Godet (Comm. in loco), a prayer that 'unworthy conceptions of God and of His character may no longer prevail among men. The child of God beseeches Him to manifest with effect His holy character, in the conscience of men, so that all impure idolatry, gross or refined, as well as all formal Pharisaism, may be completely removed, and that every human being may unite with the seraphim in the anthem of adoration, "Holy, Holy, Holy."'

The verb קָדַשׁ is in constant usage in LXX to render the different forms of Heb. קָדַשׁ (see Concord. s.v.). Isaiah (813 29<sup>27</sup>) and Ezekiel (passim, e.g. 204 26<sup>27</sup>) employ the word (rendered 'sanctify' AV and RV) of the Lord and His name, in exactly the same sense as the Lord's Prayer, of causing to be revered, whether by judgment or by deliverance. OT usage with reference to שְׂמִיכָה אֱלֹהִים, etc., ought to be compared. Our Lord uses אָב, (1) of Himself (Jn 10<sup>36</sup> 17<sup>19</sup>) in the sense of consecration ('sanctify' AV and RV, cf. marg.) to the office of Messiah by His submitting to death; and (2) of His disciples (Jn 17<sup>19</sup>) as consecrated by the truth. The root idea is setting apart for holy purposes, with the consequent development of a holy character. This ethical sense is derived from Lv 114 אָשֶׁר-בְּהַרְבֵּי אֲנִי אֲשֶׁר אֵרְבֶּה, וְנִי אֲשֶׁר אֵינִי אֵינִי יְשׁוּעָה (see Lightfoot on Ph 1<sup>2</sup>). See, further, ART. CONSECRATE and SACRIFY.

For usage of the English word see Hastings' DB (s.v.). R. MACPHERSON.

HALTING.—A deficiency in gait, when one is not able to walk without limping. The word refers to the imperfection in the art of walking, rather than to the deficiency, injury, or weakness of the limb or limbs which is the cause. This differentiation is illustrated by a passage from Brand (1789): 'He hath a halt in walking occasioned by a lameness in one of his legs'; also Tennyson (Guinevere): 'If a man were halt or hunch'd'; Bunyan (Pilg. Prog. pt. ii.): 'Mr. Ready to Halt, cf. Ps 38<sup>17</sup>; Shaks., Timon, Ac. IV. Sc. I.: 'Thou old scintia, cripple our senators, that their limbs may halt as lamely as their manners' (an illustration also of the metaphorical use of the word 'halt' similar to that of 'lame'); so Richard III., Ac. I. Sc. 1.—

* Sent before my time
Into this breathing world, scarce half made up,
And that so lamely and unfashionable,
That dogs bark at me as I halt by them.'

'Halt' is the tr. of חָלַל in Mt 18<sup>8</sup>, Mk 9<sup>45</sup>, Lk 14<sup>10</sup>, Jn 6<sup>8</sup>; but the translators of neither AV nor RV maintain a close distinction between the lame and the halt. The halting are included in the general healings wrought by Jesus among the multitude, and many of them would doubtless be of a character to yield readily to the method of our Lord, acting as He did on the line of existing therapeutic forces, even while going far beyond our present knowledge and experience of these forces.

HAND (ἡ, ἡ) 'palm or hollow of the hand'; χεῖρ; δεξιὰ 'right-hand', ἀριστερά 'left-hand'.—

OT usage.—In the OT there is a very large variety of meanings attaching to the word 'hand' and to expressions and phrases in which it occurs; a detailed consideration of these is not necessary here, but a brief reference seems appropriate in view of the fact that NT usage is to some extent based, through the LXX, on that of the OT. In its origin the Hebrew word probably meant 'strength' (cf. Assy. idū = 'strength'), and it is used in this figurative sense in Jos 8<sup>20</sup> ('there was not in them strength [lit. hands] to flee'), Ps 78<sup>2</sup> ('none of the mighty men have found their hands, i.e. they are powerless'). The word is used in a number of other figurative senses, see the Oxford Heb. Lexicon under γ. Instructive is the passage Ex 14<sup>8</sup> ('the children of Israel went out with a high hand' [cf. Ex 15<sup>10</sup>, Nu 11<sup>20</sup> 33]); the reference is to the hand of Jehovah ('with a high hand' = with the help of the high hand, a meaning which the preposition frequently has); the 'hand', strictly speaking, the 'right hand' (ἡ δεξιά), of God is the planet Venus; this antique conception is much softened down, though a literal, anthropomorphic sense is still implied in the use of 'hand' in Ps 102<sup>2</sup> ('The heavens are the work of thy hands').

In reference to man the word is used (just as is the case in the NT) in a variety of senses, according to the phrase in which it is found: 'to put one's life into one's hand' (Jg 13<sup>9</sup>), means to be ready to jeopardize one's life; 'to clap the hands' is a sign of joy (2 S 11<sup>10</sup>); 'to fill the hand' (RV 'consecrate') is to install in office (Jg 17<sup>10</sup>); 'to lift up the hand' (whether towards heaven or towards the altar is not always certain, see Novack, Heb. Arch. ii. 290) was a symbolic action which accompanied an oath, it implied the calling of the Deity to witness (De 32<sup>40</sup>); the same action, with both hands, was the attitude adopted when blessing (Ps 134<sup>2</sup>); 'to open the hand' is to show generosity (De 15<sup>11</sup>); to place the hands upon the head was a sign of grief (2 S 13<sup>19</sup>); to kiss the hand towards was a sign of homage (to a heathen deity in Job 31<sup>27</sup>); 'to lay the hand upon the mouth' was done to keep hush (Pr 10<sup>3</sup>); 'to strike hands' meant to go surety for someone (Pr 6<sup>1</sup>). All these symbolic actions with the hand were common in the time of Christ, as they are at the present day also in Syria, Arabia, etc.

There is one other use of the word in the OT which demands a passing notice: it means a sign or monument (S 15<sup>12</sup>, 2 S 18<sup>18</sup>, cf. Gn 31<sup>19</sup>); according to Schwally, ¶ it was originally so called because a hand was depicted upon the monument or pillar, this hand being a token of that wherewith the vow had been made (the uplifted hand), or perhaps wherewith an offering had been brought; in view, however, of what has been said above, it is more likely that this hand, was a representation of the hand of the Deity.

Usage in the Gospels.—In a very large number of cases in which 'hand' occurs, it is used in the ordinary literal sense; there is no need to give references for these. Not infrequently there is the expression 'at hand' in the EV where in the original χεῖρ does not occur: e.g. 'the kingdom of heaven is at hand' (ἤγγικεν); such passages do not properly belong to this article, and are not taken into account.

1. All those things which are done by means of the hand, or in which the visible part is done by the hand (such as the working of miracles, or taking hold of a person or thing) are described as being performed διὰ χειρῶν, διὰ τῶν χειρῶν—τινος, Mk 6<sup>2</sup> etc.; ἐν χειρῶν, Mt 4<sup>6</sup>, Lk 4<sup>11</sup>; εἰς τὴν χεῖρα, Lk 15<sup>2</sup>. 'Hand' is used frequently as a synonym for 'power' (Mt 17<sup>26</sup>, Mk 9<sup>1</sup>, Lk 1<sup>24</sup> 9<sup>4</sup>); in the slightly different sense of 'protecting power' (Lk 22<sup>6</sup>); still in the sense of power but coupled with the idea of 'possession' (Jn 10<sup>28</sup> 29); as used in Lk 1<sup>6</sup> it contains the idea of God's 'furtherance'; then, again, it is used loosely, ** in the sense of 'finger', in Lk 15<sup>22</sup> ('put a ring on his hand'); lastly, it is referred to (in a peculiarly Oriental manner) as though it had, metaphorically speaking, sense: 'if thine hand offend thee' (ἐκκαθάσθη), and the same idea is conveyed in Mt 6<sup>3</sup> 'let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth.'

Arabian cylinder seals are also given, showing 'the hand of God' with the planet Venus above it; the Divine hand has seven fingers.

2. But the most interesting use of 'hand' in the Gospels, as in the OT, is seen in idiomatic phrases in which it occurs; these may be briefly enumerated as follows:—To wash the hands (ἰκονίπτει τὰς χ.) was a symbolic action denoting a repudiation of responsibility or a declaration of innocence (Mt 27<sup>24</sup>, cf. Ps 26<sup>6</sup> 73<sup>12</sup>); the same phrase, very nearly, ἰκονίπτει τὰς χ., refers to the washing before meals in obedience to tradition* (Mt 15<sup>2</sup>). To 'lay hands on' is used in several senses; ἐπιβάλλει τὰς χ. ἐπὶ τινα (or simply with the dat.) means to take hold of with violent intent (Mk 14<sup>16</sup>); ἐπιτίθει τὰς χ. (or τῶν χ.) ἐπὶ τινα (or with dat.) is synonymous with healing (Mt 9<sup>18</sup>, Mk 5<sup>23</sup>); τίθει τὰς χ. ἐπὶ τινα is used of blessing children (Mk 10<sup>16</sup>); 'to put the hand to the plough' (ἐπιβάλλει τὴν χ. ἐπὶ ἀροτρον) is a metaphorical expression denoting the undertaking of some duty (Lk 9<sup>62</sup>); different meanings attach to the phrase 'to stretch forth the hands': ἐκτείνει τὰς χ. ἐπὶ τινα is used of taking someone prisoner (Lk 22<sup>23</sup>), or (with the same construction) to indicate a person (Mt 12<sup>20</sup>); ἐκτ. τῶν χ. in Mt 14<sup>3</sup> means to save from harm; the same expression in Jn 21<sup>16</sup> seems to be used in reference to the stretching out of the hands (in the sense of arms) on the cross. 'To lift up the hands' (ἐρρίπτει τὰς χ.) is the attitude of blessing (Lk 24<sup>50</sup>); 'to take by the hand' (ἁρπάξει τῶν χ.) means to take hold of someone with the purpose of helping (Mk 13<sup>1</sup>); 'to deliver up into the hands of' (παροδίδωαι εἰς χ. τινος) is to give into the power of, with evil intent (Mt 17<sup>7</sup>), while δίδωαι εἰς τῆ χ. τινος means to commit to the care of (Jn 3<sup>25</sup>); 'to commend (the spirit) into the hands of' (παρὰθεῖναι τὸ πνεῦμα εἰς χ. τινος) is to place oneself under God's protection (Lk 23<sup>46</sup>).

3. Lastly, there are many words in connexion with which 'hand' is not expressed, but implied; all these convey one or other, or both, of the root conceptions of this word, viz. strength and activity. W. O. E. OESTERLEY.

HANDMAID.—'Handmaid' (Lk 1<sup>38</sup>; 'handmaiden', v. 46; in the American Standard RV 'handmaid' in both passages) answers to the Gr. δούλη, which means literally, as the RVm shows, 'slave'. In the LXX rendering of Hannah's vow (1 S 1<sup>11</sup>), which is clearly echoed, almost cited, in Lk., δούλη represents the Hebrew 'amāh, which, with the Aramaic equivalent 'amta and the Bab. amta, seems to have been a common Semitic designation of a female slave in Canaan and the neighbouring countries. It was sometimes used in courteous self-deprecation (1 K 1<sup>7</sup>, 1 S 22<sup>24</sup> 26. 4; the letter of an Assyrian lady in Johns' Babylonian and Assyrian Laws, Contracts, and Letters, p. 378), and then was naturally applied to relation to God (the above-mentioned vow, also Ps 86<sup>16</sup> 116<sup>16</sup>). In the Aram. text, which probably underlay the Song of the Virgin, 'handmaiden' would be 'amta with suffix (Pat. Lect. of Gospels, 1899, p. 234). The use of the word in the Gospels illustrates the Oriental habit of describing man as the slave of God, of which there are so many examples in the OT (Ps 131<sup>1</sup>, Neh 1<sup>6</sup> 11 etc.), in the so-called Babylonian Penitential Psalms, in ancient Semitic names—Obadiāh found both in the Bible and on an ancient seal, Abdiel (Jer 36<sup>2</sup>), Abdiel (1 Ch 5<sup>1</sup>), Abdnego (Dn 1<sup>7</sup>), Abd Ninip (Tell el-Amarna Letters, No. 53, Winckler), Abd Ashtoreth (KAT[ZW] 129); and in names current in the Holy Land at the present time, such as Abdallah (for many examples from southern and central Palestine cf. PEFS, 1904, p. 155, and 1905, p. 48 f.). These illustrations, however, refer mainly if not entirely to men. In connexion with a list of personal names collected from various Moslem villages in the south of Palestine (PEFS, 1904, p. 155), it is remarked that female names of the type of Abdallah have not been found. Still it must always have been easy for an Oriental woman to call herself 'the handmaid' of Deity. The transition from the courteous to the religious use would be readily effected.

* It is probable that the origin, of which this custom was a remnant, is to be sought in a ceremonial purifying before partaking of the sacrificial meal, as which the deity was conceived of as being present; cf. W. R. Smith, RS<sup>2</sup> p. 229.

W. TAYLOR SMITH.

HAPPINESS. — i. Pagan and Christian Ideals Compared. — Happiness was much discussed among the Greeks under the term 'well-being' (eudaimonia). Aristotle said: 'For on the subject of happiness and what conduces to it, and of its opposites, exhortation or discussion is always conversant, and this because we needs do the things which procure it or any of its constituents, and refrain from doing the things which destroy or impede it' (Rhet. i. 5). The differences of the philosophic schools arose from the question wherein this well-being consisted. Was it in knowledge, pleasure, virtue, freedom from pain, wealth, or well-doing? The record of the answers to this forms the history of ancient Ethics. Jesus did not use the word 'happiness' (eudaimonia), or propound any theory of the relation between duty and pleasure; but absence of the word is no proof that the subject was foreign to His mind. It is inconceivable that the 'Son of Man' should neglect in His system so universal an instinct as the desire after happiness; for in the final summation joy must be a part of the perfect state. The comparison between ancient and Christian Ethics must not be made on verbal or literary lines, but the systems must be judged by their actual contribution to well-being or happiness.

(1) The failure of Paganism. The systems of Plato and Aristotle did not bring any large satisfaction with them, nor did they discover any permanent refuge for the race. Of all the products of Greek speculation, Stoicism survived longest, and had the largest influence upon the civilization of the world; but while, by its stern grandeur, it shaped a few noble characters which remained as a protest against the lax manners of the Empire, it failed to open up any fountain of joy for man. The Stoic sage was powerless to convert his theories into conduct, as he himself confessed; and the passionlessness of soul which he advocated was a poor match for the strong impulses of the human heart. Where reliance upon human reason was undermined, it was met with an impotent religiousness; and where reverence for the natural order was impaired, there was no message of a future life in which compensations would atone for present inequalities. Also the examples of the earlier leaders created a preference for suicide, which was a confession of failure to procure the well-being of life. Paganism withdrew from the struggle to provide happiness. It despaired, and was therefore defeated.

(2) The success of Christianity. The characteristic word of Christianity is Life; for while the moral code and example of Christ are superior to others, it is not on this that His supremacy rests. Christ's Person is the vital force of the new religion. 'As the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself' (Jn 5<sup>26</sup>). This same blessing is bestowed upon all who believe in Christ; and so rich is this gift, that each believer becomes a constant source of life (Jn 6<sup>27</sup> 7<sup>9</sup>). Life is imparted to the believer in many ways, but chiefly through Christ's words (6<sup>24</sup> 15<sup>7</sup>). This life is the realization of all human aspiration, enabling the Christian to hold on with courage and hope in the face of temptation and doubts; and the history of our civilization is the evidence that Jesus has succeeded where all others failed. To an age that was exhausted and desponding, that had failed to satisfy the deep desires of human nature, Christ came with convincing and converting power. When He spoke, men believed and lived again. Through Him rose

'One common wave of thought and joy,
Lifting mankind again.'

Stoicism and Neo-Platonism produced thoughts of great beauty and purity. 'Yet neither of them could enable artisans and old women to lead a truly philosophic life. Christianity could and did; the apologists point triumphantly to the realization of the moral ideal among Christians of every standing. That was due to the power which issued from Jesus Christ and actually transformed man. The certainty and confidence of faith based on Him, with reliance on God's grace in Jesus Christ, begat in Christians a matchless delight in doing good' (von Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, p. 329).

ii. THE TEACHING OF JESUS. — The NT verbal equivalent for 'happiness' is 'blessedness' (which see), but it is not conceived in terms of pleasure. It is a religious idea, drawing its worth from the blessing which God imparts. The adjective 'blessed' occurs frequently in Mt 5<sup>2-12</sup>. This representative discourse may be entitled 'Christ's way to happiness.' Here Jesus describes how people become happy, but refrains from all abstract definition. Each of these Beatitudes falls into two parts. In the first half those virtues are mentioned the possession of which constitutes people happy; in the second part the reward or result of each virtue is given. The following statements may be made as to Christ's teaching on this way: (1) The joy begins immediately on the commencement of the journey, and is not reserved for the future. Thus, all who are pure in heart are happy. (2) More depends upon the traveller than upon the outward conditions. Happiness rests in dispositions, such as purity, meekness, righteousness, peace, and not in possessions, such as wealth, health, fame. The happy man makes his own scenery. Christian joy, like other Christian graces, is inward; and the OT conception of blessedness, in so far as it consisted in prosperity and length of days, yields to a more spiritual ideal. All who go Christ's way are like the Happy Warrior,

'Whose high endeavours are an inward light
That makes the path before him ever bright.'

(Wordsworth).

(3) This happiness is not a passivity, but an activity, coinciding with some function of the will or mind. It cannot rise of itself as a mere state of emotion, but accompanies an act of service either for God or man. Happiness is associated with piety (Mt 5<sup>8</sup>) and probity (vv. 7-11). It follows upon doing the will of God, or upon seeking the well-being of others. Socrates also regarded happiness as eupratia, well-doing. (4) This way, unlike the world's way, is endless, for the joy that begins on earth is an anticipation of the full joy of heaven (vv. 12-13). (5) The pursuit of this way is a duty. All who walk with Christ not only will but ought to rejoice. Happiness is an imperative, 'Rejoice and be exceeding glad' (v. 12). The ethical ideal of Jesus differs from Hedonism, in which morality and happiness are synonymous terms, because with Him blessedness is the associate of virtue. Christ neither confuses nor separates these two. Happiness and virtue are twin stars. The further use of the Beatitude in Christ's teaching continues to emphasize the spiritual ingredients of happiness. In Lk 11<sup>2</sup>, Jn 13<sup>7</sup>, blessedness and obedience are associated; in Mt 16<sup>17</sup> blessedness and knowledge are united; in Jn 20<sup>28</sup> blessedness and faith are joined. In many places blessedness is reserved for the future (Lk 7<sup>28</sup> 12<sup>27-29</sup> 14<sup>13</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel Jesus distinctly offers fullness of joy (Jn 16<sup>24</sup>).

iii. HAPPINESS AS REVEALED IN CHRIST'S PERSON.—The birth of Jesus was a proclamation of joy (Lk 2<sup>10</sup>). Though called the 'Man of sorrows,' He was not unhappy. Sorrows never distorted His soul, nor left the faintest shadow of melancholy or accidie. He was 'still cheerful and helpful and firm.' His first miracle contributed to the innocent pleasure of social intercourse (Jn 2<sup>1-11</sup>). The impression left by His address was pleasing; nor was His voice the voice of grief (Lk 4<sup>22</sup>). His gospel was a joyous prize (Mt 13<sup>44-45</sup>). He delighted in healing pain (Lk 4<sup>40</sup>). Instead of reflecting the sadness of households, Jesus removed it (Jn 11<sup>38</sup>, Lk 8<sup>25</sup>). He spoke of a joy that was His own peculiar and characteristic possession (Jn 15<sup>11</sup>), and promised entrance into His own joy as a supreme reward (Mt 25<sup>21</sup>). This joy He offered all who followed Him (Jn 16<sup>24</sup>), and He was anxious to complete the joy of His disciples (Jn 15<sup>11</sup> 17<sup>13</sup>). Christ shunned the moroseness of asceticism (Mt 11<sup>19</sup>), as He turned from the selfish happiness of the epicurean (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>). The joy of Christ arose from several causes—(1) He was free from sin, that root of sorrow and bitterness: 'For by sinning we kept neither piety nor felicity' (Augustine). (2) He had the intense joys of a Saviour (Lk 15<sup>7</sup>). His was the happiness that comes from being the creator of another's good (Lk 19<sup>10</sup>). The keen pleasure of rescue work filled His soul (Lk 15<sup>4-7</sup>). The thought of the countless hosts who would obtain eternal rest through His death was a secret potion to sweeten His bitter cup. For the joy set before Him He endured the cross. (3) The self-sacrifice of Jesus issued out of pure love (Jn 15<sup>13</sup>). He was happy as a lover. (4) He rejoiced in the sense of Divine sonship. This was His earliest thought (Lk 2<sup>49</sup>). To do the will of God was better than food (Jn 4<sup>34</sup>). The knowledge of His Father was life (Jn 17<sup>3</sup>). It was an incomparable ecstasy for Him to dwell upon the love of God (Jn 17). This relieved Him of fear (Lk 23<sup>46</sup>, Mt 6<sup>34</sup>); also it freed Him from the distracting care of false ambition (Jn 18<sup>20</sup>). Being thus free from many of the vexing thoughts and struggles that disturb our peace of mind, He was able to find comfort in Himself and His cause. He was the first citizen in the Kingdom of Heaven, which is righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. Though tempted in all points like as we are, and acquainted with grief, Christ was nevertheless a man of joy.

Christ gives happiness by giving Himself. 'He that hath the Son hath life,' and the causes which led to His peace act in measure in all those who turn to Jesus. The first and last Beatitude of the Gospels is to those who believe in Him (Lk 1<sup>4</sup>, Jn 20<sup>31</sup>). All life culminates in God, and man's summum bonum is God as He is revealed in Christ. Partnership with Him, even when joined with personal suffering and sacrifice, is more valuable than all worldly prosperity (Mt 16<sup>26</sup>). Plato had climbed to a lofty place when he declared that man's happiness was to be found in a supernatural good, in the knowledge of ideas, especially the idea of God. But Christianity rises higher. Jesus leads us up from imitation of God and acquaintance with Divine ideas to the sublime fact that we may know God personally. Not a resemblance, but a partnership; not a certainty that God is good, true, and wise, but a certainty that He loves us, and that we may love Him in return—this is the new faith (Jn 15<sup>9</sup>). Jesus is the Christian's joy. Into our restlessness of soul, due in part to imperfect ideas, Christ comes with a fellowship and an ambition grand enough to supply man with the peace after which he is ever struggling (Mt 11<sup>28</sup>). Through Christ our sins are forgiven, our anxieties removed, our sorrows softened, our hopes revived, while He alone imparts that supreme gift of fellowship with God which is our highest good. Thus purest happiness comes, which some will still prefer to call blessedness, as more appropriate to such intimate and spiritual relationships.

JAMES W. FALCONER.

HARDENING OF HEART.—(a) The relation in Scripture between the blood and the life (Lv 17<sup>11</sup>) is such that the heart is naturally the typical centre of personal life' (cf. Westcott on He 4<sup>12</sup> and 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup> Add. Notes); the seat of understanding (1 K 3<sup>12</sup>), affection (Dt 6<sup>5</sup>), will (Jer 5<sup>22</sup>), character (1 K 9<sup>4</sup>, Ezk 11<sup>2</sup>); the fountain at which all issues (Pr 4<sup>28</sup>) may receive a Divine direction. (b) It is described as tender (2 K 22<sup>32</sup>), hard (Ex 8<sup>19</sup>), of flesh or of stone (Ezk 11<sup>19</sup>), not in the popular sense of merciful or cruel, but according to its receptivity (or otherwise) of Divine impressions. Of the Greek words employed to express such hardness the two more remarkable (see below) represent the heart as callous (i.e. ossified) or fat. (c) An important distinction is to be made between two expressions:—(i.) 'Hardness of heart.' To a certain extent this is an unavoidable infirmity of the man's natural condition. As such, it is the object of Divine condescension, which (as Christ directly asserts) is the explanation of much OT legislation (Mt 19<sup>18</sup>). It is referred to in the Gospels as (1) σκληροκαρδία, Mt 19<sup>8</sup>; Mk 10<sup>5</sup> [16<sup>14</sup>]; as (2) καρὸς πεπωρωμένη, Mk 6<sup>52</sup> 8<sup>17</sup>. (ii.) 'Hardening of heart.' This is a voluntary process, the object therefore of Divine condemnation (cf. Mt 11<sup>20</sup>, 13<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>8</sup>, Ro 9<sup>17</sup>). Its active nature, as distinguished from passive infirmity, is indicated by the form παρρησία, Mk 3<sup>3</sup> (cf. Ro 11<sup>25</sup>, Eph 4<sup>18</sup>), in contrast to the pt. pt. pass. Mk 6<sup>52</sup> 8<sup>17</sup>. (d) Hardening is represented, alternatively with conversion, as a direct consequence of contact with grace and the gospel (Mt 13<sup>12</sup>, Jn 2<sup>10</sup> 9<sup>39</sup>; cf. 2 Co 2<sup>14</sup>). The origin of the process is variously stated, according to the side from which it is viewed. Thus—(1) The heart is hardened, as though by the action of a mechanical law: Mt 13<sup>12</sup> = Is 6<sup>10</sup> LXX (cf. Ac 18<sup>6</sup>, Ro 11<sup>7-8</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>14</sup>). (2) Man hardens his heart. This aspect, though necessarily involved in man's responsibility and often stated in the OT (Ex 9<sup>12</sup>, 1 S 8<sup>5</sup>, 2 Ch 36<sup>2</sup>), is not expressly referred to in the NT, except in He 3<sup>8</sup> = Ps 95<sup>8</sup>. (3) God hardens it: Jn 12<sup>40</sup> = a paraphrase of Is 6<sup>10</sup>; see Westcott, ad loc., and cf. Ro 9<sup>18</sup>. This is often known as 'judicial hardening': it is 'the inexorable law of moral consequence' (Westcott on He 3<sup>9</sup>). It comes to pass that 'he who will not turn at last converts. And God, who established that law of man's nature, is said in Scripture to do that which occurs under it or results from it' (Vaughan on Ro 9<sup>18</sup>). (e) In the OT the typical case is that of Pharaoh; in which all three statements are remarkably exemplified (Ex 7<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>25</sup> 9<sup>32</sup>). Bunyan's 'Man in the iron cage' is a powerful picture of hardening in its final stage: at the same time, the man who is past repentance is usually past feeling (Eph 4<sup>18</sup>).

HARLOT.—This is the term usually employed in AV as tr. of πόρνη, the only other tr. being 'whore.' The practice of prostitution dates from the earliest times. While in Egypt, the Israelites must have been familiar with the fact that prostitution prevailed in connexion with Egyptian cults. No sooner were they settled in Oanaan than the purity both of their morality and their religion was endangered by the contaminating influence of Semitic rites, in which the consecrated harlot (bedehah) played no small part. From glimpses of social life afforded us by the prophets (e.g. Jer 5, Hos 4, 5), we can perceive the prevalence of ordinary prostitution in their day. One of the blessings of the Exile was the extinction among the Jews both of idolatry and of religious prostitution. The Apocrypha, however, witnesses to the continuance of the common harlot. She haunts the streets (Sir 9), and employs singing as one of her seductive arts (9). In the time of the Maccabees the gentiles in Palestine 'dallied with harlots,' and had to do 'with women within the circuit of the holy places' (2 Mac 6). Cf. also Ps 73.

The Gospels supply us with little information as to the extent of prostitution in Palestine during the time of Christ. In Mt 21<sup>30</sup> our Lord refers to harlots as a class. The woman of Lk 7, 'who was a sinner in the city' (v. 37 v.l.), probably belonged to the class. In the parable of the Prodigal Son, the far country in which he devoured his living with harlots (Lk 15<sup>16</sup>) might be supposed to be possibly within Palestine. Again, our Lord's reference to the sin of fornication (Mt 19<sup>9</sup>) suggests the existence of immoral women. The popular idea of Mary Magdalene as a woman of evil life is rejected by many of the best exegetes.

In Christ's day, Palestine was in many ways demoralized by Greek and Roman influences. Wherever the Greeks and Romans went, the ετραπα and the meretriz abounded. Religious prostitution reappeared in connexion with the Mysteries of Aphrodite, which culminated in vicious orgies, and these rites were not confined to Greece. Pagan gods and goddesses 'had their due secret solemnities whithersoever Greek (and partly Roman) colonists took their Lares and Penates' (Baring-Gould in Chambers' Encyc. vii. 369). Nor would the immorality of women employed in shameless rites be confined to religious ceremonies, any more than is the case to-day amongst similar women attached to Indian temples. In cities upon the coast of Asia Minor immoral cults prevailed in NT times.

To the Christian mind the matter of chief interest is the attitude of Jesus towards this class of sinners, and the significance of His gospel in respect of them. Here we cannot fail to contrast the harsh temper of the Pharisees towards such women with the holy and redemptive sympathy of Jesus. Even the austere John the Baptist had evidently welcomed them as penitents and as candidates for baptism (Mt 21<sup>28</sup>),—a fact of which Jesus reminded His Pharisaic hearers. Our Lord plainly indicated that sins of fleshly frailty are less heinous and less likely to prove fatal than lovelessness, spiritual pride, and hypocrisy; for 'the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you' (Mt 21<sup>31</sup>). His compassionate tenderness in this connexion appears very beautifully in St. Luke's story of the sinful woman, whose newness of heart was intensified by the love and gratitude consequent upon the pity and pardon experienced at the Saviour's hands. It may be added in respect of guilt of this description, that the peace of conscience begotten of faith in the Redeemer's atoning blood is oftentimes as deep as the sense of guilt was poignant. Nor should it be forgotten that the general effect of the way in which the Master admitted women to His intimate fellowship is to raise the status of woman in such a manner as to render her degradation through prostitution unthinkable.

HARVEST.—See AGRICULTURE.

HATING, HATRED.—Although the noun does not occur in the Gospels, yet the verb (μισέω) is often found. The passages may be grouped as follows: (1) those which speak of the world's hatred to Christ and His people; (2) those dealing with the Old Law, and Christ's hatred of sin; (3) those which prescribe hate; (4) some remaining passages.

1. The world being opposed, according to St. John's use of the term, to 'all that is of the Father' (1 Jn 2<sup>16</sup>), it was inevitable that the holy and sinless Jesus should arouse its antipathy; and this is specially noted in the Fourth Gospel. The world hated Him because He testified that its deeds were evil (Jn 7<sup>7</sup>). Its instinctive opposition to the light as manifested in Him was immediately aroused (3<sup>2</sup>). Thus He said 'the world hath hated me' (μισήσιν με, 15<sup>18</sup>), the perfect tense expressing 'a persistent abiding feeling, not any isolated manifestation of feeling' (Westcott); and it was 'without a cause' (δυσέειν, 15<sup>20</sup>), cf. Ps 35<sup>19</sup> 69<sup>4</sup>; no reason could be found for such hostility except that He condemned its wickedness. This hatred carried with it hatred of the Father also (Jn 15<sup>23</sup>), in which character He had revealed God to men, cf. 15<sup>24</sup> 'they have both seen and hated both me and my Father'; therefore they had no excuse for their sin, perhaps here the special sin of hatred to Him and His (Alford). Cf. in the parable of the Pounds, 'his citizens hated him' (Lk 19<sup>14</sup>).

Christ's disciples consequently may expect to experience the same hatred in proportion as they truly follow their Lord (Jn 15<sup>18-20</sup>). 'When they came before the world, it showed at once and decisively its position of antagonism to the gospel' (μισήσιν, 'hated,' RV 17<sup>4</sup>) (Westcott), the ultimate cause being that men had no true knowledge of Him who sent Jesus (15<sup>24</sup>). He foretold that they should be 'hated of all men' for His Name's sake (Mt 10<sup>22</sup>), more precisely 'of all nations' (24<sup>9</sup>); cf. for its fulfilment Ac 12<sup>2</sup> 28<sup>22</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>14-15</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>12</sup>; Tacitus, Ann. xv. 44, 'quos per flagitia invisos vulgus Christianos appellabat'; Suetonius, Nero, xvi., 'Christiani, genus hominum superstitionis novæ et maleficæ.' In so far as the world-spirit crept in among the disciples, there would be similar exhibitions of hatred among themselves (Mt 24<sup>10</sup>); cf. Gal 5<sup>15</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>15</sup>, the deadly hatred of the Judaizers towards St. Paul, and the name ἑξοφύου ἀθέτου apparently given to him in the Pseudo-Clementines. The world's hatred, however, should be a cause of rejoicing (Lk 6<sup>22</sup>), and not of wonder (1 Jn 3<sup>13</sup>, where 'if,' as in Jn 15<sup>18</sup>, implies no doubt of the fact). The disciples might well suspect their loyalty if they escaped the enmity of those who hated their Lord (Jn 7<sup>7</sup>), while their experience of it was a proof that they had been chosen out and united to Him (15<sup>18-20</sup>), as also a pledge of their future glory (Ro 8<sup>17</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>12</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>13</sup>); 'Christianos quoque aut summo amore prosequuntur homines aut summo odio. Qui omnibus semper placent, sibi merito suspecti esse debent' (Bengel).

Groups (2) and (3) raise an apparent difficulty: the feeling which is forbidden in the one seems commanded in the other. Westcott has a valuable note on 1 Jn 2<sup>9</sup> which suggests the solution: 'there is a certain ambiguity in the word "hate," for it serves as the opposite both to the love of natural affection (φιλία) and to the love of moral judgment (ἀγαπή). In the former case hatred, which may become a moral duty, involves the subjection of an instinct; in the latter case hatred expresses a general determination of character.' Thus μισέω as opposed to ἀγαπή is condemned (Mt 5<sup>21</sup>, Eph 5<sup>2</sup>, 2<sup>1</sup> 1 Jn 2<sup>9</sup>, 3<sup>14</sup>, 15<sup>17</sup> 4<sup>20</sup>), while as opposed to φιλία it may become a duty (Lk 14<sup>26</sup>, Mt 10<sup>37</sup>, Jn 12<sup>25</sup>).

2. 'Ye have heard that it was said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thine enemy: but I say unto you, Love your enemies' (Mt 5<sup>43</sup>); 'do good to them that hate you' (Lk 6<sup>27</sup>, omitted by best authorities in Mt.). The first part of the maxim is found in Lv 19<sup>18</sup>; but in the latter clause Jesus 'is not quoting precisely any OT or extra-Biblical utterance on record (cf. Sir 18<sup>20</sup>)' (Hastings' DB, Extra Vol. p. 30). The question then arises—Is it a fair deduction from, and does it represent the spirit of, the OT, or is it an unwarranted extension and addition of the scribes? In favour of the latter it is urged that this hatred is not conceived of as following in Lv 19<sup>18</sup>, and that passages much nearer the Christian standard are found. The utmost consideration was to be shown even to an enemy's beast (Ex 23<sup>5</sup>); the fact that the owner cherished hate was no reason why help should be refused to him in his trouble (23<sup>7</sup>). Cf. as to rejoicing over an enemy in calamity, Job 31<sup>29</sup>; as to returning evil for evil, Pr 24<sup>29</sup>; and as to the better spirit often shown in OT, Gn 45<sup>14</sup>, 1 S 24<sup>7</sup>, 2 K 6<sup>26</sup>, Ps 7<sup>1</sup>, 35<sup>13</sup>. Jewish sages ordained that 'if a man finds both a friend and an enemy in distress, he shall first assist his enemy,' in order to subdue his evil inclination; and held that it is not permitted to 'hate any one except only sinners who, having been duly warned and admonished, do not repent' (Kalisch on Leviticus, quoted in Alexander, The Witness of the Psalms to Christ and Christ's City, p. 274). Pr 24<sup>17</sup>, 25<sup>21</sup>, 28<sup>29</sup> are sometimes quoted as approaching the Christian spirit, but the reason given in each case militates considerably against their force ('lest the LORD see it and it displease him, and he turn away his wrath from him,' and the LORD shall reward thee'). Hence some suppose that 'hate thine enemy' was an illegitimate inference (the pesquisse glossed in Engel), drawn by Rabbis from the precepts laid down concerning the Amalekites and other nations under the curse (Ex 23<sup>22</sup>, Dt 7<sup>1</sup>, 23<sup>3</sup>, 25<sup>17</sup>); by giving to 'neighbour' the sense of 'friend,' and taking 'enemy' as meaning a 'private enemy,' they were easily turned into a justification of private hatred. On the other hand, it is held by many that this clause was really implied in Lv 19<sup>18</sup> and truly expressed the spirit of OT. The election of Israel, taken with the rules concerning the above nations, would foster an aversion to foreigners which was ever increasing in intensity; cf. Ps 83, Jon 3<sup>10-4</sup>, Est. In time the Jews came to have such a profound contempt and disregard for all others as caused them to be charged with being enemies of the human race ('apud ipsos fides obstinata, misericordia in promptu, sed adversus omnes alios hostile odium,' Tac. Hist. v. 5. 2; 'non monstrare vias eadem nisi sacra colenti,' Juv. Sat. xiv. 103). Therefore Bp. Gore holds (Sermon on Mount, p. 97) that we must accept Mozley's conclusions, which are as follows.—The whole precept, as it stands, undoubtedly represents, and is a summary of, the sense of the Law; nor is there any occasion to refer 'it hath been said' to the Law in the case of 'Love thy neighbour,' and to the tradition of the scribes in the case of 'Hate thine enemy': all the other precepts which the Lord takes as instances of an inferior morality are precepts out of the Law, and there is no reason to distinguish this particular one from the rest with respect to its source. In the first place, it applied to 'neighbour' and 'enemy' in a national sense, and tended to strengthen the union of Israelites; it was the inculcation of an esprit de corps which was the very bond of it, and incentive to, union in the early ages. But it also referred to a private enemy, and was conceived in the general spirit of retaliation (cf. Mt 5<sup>38</sup> and such Psalms as 109).

It is evident from Mt 5<sup>44</sup> that Jesus took 'enemy' as meaning a 'private enemy,' who in the new Kingdom is to be loved, and to whom good is to be done. He used ἀγαπήτω, not φιλέτω, on which Tittmann (see Alford) says, 'φιλέτω, amare, pessimum quemque vir honestus non potest; sed poterit eum tamen ἀγαπήτω, i.e. bene ei cupere et facere quippe homo homini, cui etiam Deus benefaciat. Amor imparatus non potest, sed dilectio.' Cf. Clem. Alex. τὸ ἀγαπήτω τὸν ἐχθρὸν οὐκ ἀγαπήτω τὸ κατὰ λέγει, and Aug. 'sic dilige inimicos ut in fratres optes, sic dilige inimicos ut in societatem tuam vocentur, sic enim dilexit ille qui in cruce pendens ait, Pater ignosce illis, quia nesciunt quid faciunt.' According to the teaching of Christ, therefore, the hatred of sin only is permissible, which is the necessary corollary of the Gospel of Love, and is according to His own example; cf. He 1<sup>9</sup>, Rev 2<sup>6</sup>, where Lyra remarks (see Alford), 'non dixit Nicolaitas, sed facta: quia personæ sunt ex charitate diligendæ, sed eorum vitia odio sunt habenda.'

3. Lk 14<sup>26-28</sup>, Jesus turned and said unto the multitude, 'If any man cometh unto me, and hateth not his own father, and mother, and wife (peculiar to Luke), and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple'; cf. Mt 10<sup>37</sup> 'He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me'; and Jn 12<sup>25</sup> 'He that loveth his life loseth it, and he that hateth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eterna.' We may at once dismiss such an interpretation as Renan put forward, viz. that Christ was here 'despising the healthy limits of man's nature,' 'warring against the most legitimate cravings of the heart,' and 'preaching a total rupture with the ties of blood.' The whole tenor of His life and teaching is against such an idea. He forbade hatred even of an enemy (Lk 6<sup>27</sup>); He condemned evasion of the Fifth Commandment (Mk 7<sup>12-13</sup>), and taught the sanctity of the marriage bond (Mk 10<sup>2-9</sup>); He showed tender thought for His mother (Jn 19<sup>26</sup>), and loved children (Mk 10<sup>13-14</sup>); His new commandment was 'that ye love one another, as I have loved you' (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>). St. John certainly did not understand the word love in Renan's sense (1 Jn 2<sup>11</sup>, 3<sup>15-17</sup>, 4<sup>16-20</sup>); nor St. Paul (Eph 5<sup>2</sup>, 1 Ti 5<sup>8</sup>, Tit 2<sup>4</sup>, Ro 13<sup>8</sup>), who would regard those acting in such a way as ἀσπογγαί 'without natural affection,' a vice of the heathen (Ro 1<sup>31</sup>).

Some have given to 'hate' in these passages the meaning of 'love less,' comparing Gn 29<sup>30-31</sup>, De 21<sup>15</sup>; but it follows from the above that Jesus cannot have intended to condemn any degree of right affection as if it amounted to loving others more than Him. 'The love which Christ condemneth differs not in degree, but in kind, from rightful affection. It is one which takes the place of love to Christ, not which is placed by the side of that of Christ. For, rightly viewed, the two occupy different provinces. Wherever and whenever the two affections come into comparison, they also come into collision' (Edersheim, Life and Times, i. 650). There is a foolish affection which would do injury both to the giver and the receiver (cf. Pr 13<sup>20</sup>), and then hate is not only consistent with, but absolutely necessary for, the highest kind of love. It is 'that element in love which makes a wise and Christian friend not for time only, but for eternity.'

The words had special application to the time when they were spoken, and must have sounded strange to the multitude, which, for the most part, was following because of that very love of life which is condemned, desiring to get material benefits (cf. Jn 6<sup>26</sup>). Jesus' enemies were becoming more violent, divisions in families would take place (Mt 10<sup>34-36</sup>; cf. Ex 32<sup>26-28</sup>, Dt 33<sup>9</sup>), and discipleship would in many cases be impossible without the renunciation of the dearest ties. The mission field affords a parallel nowadays, where the hostility of relatives often the greatest hindrance to the confession of Christ. The statement is made in the most startling form to arrest attention; conditions must be supplied as in Mt 5<sup>26</sup>. Even where renunciation is not outwardly necessary, there must be potential alienation and the acknowledgment of Christ's claims as paramount. The key to the true explanation lies in 'yea and his own life also' (cf. Jn 12<sup>25</sup>), it is presupposed that friendship is a source of enjoyment for ourselves; 'Jesus does not indicate a course of action whereby we do evil to others, but such as constitutes a painful sacrifice for ourselves' (Wendt). At bottom our own life only, the last citadel (Job 24), is to be hated, and everything else only in so far as it partakes of this principle of sin and death (Godet); 'secundum eam partem, secundum quam es ipse odisse debet, a Christo aversam' (Hengel). 'He that so prizes his life that he cannot let it out of his own hand or give it up to good ends, checks its growth, and it withers and dies; whereas he who treats it as if he hated it, giving it up freely to the needs of others, shall keep it to life eternal' (Dodgson, Expositor's Greek Text). 'Nec tamen sufficit nostra relinquere, nisi relinquamus et nos' (Gregory, Hom. xxxii.).

Westcott on He 7<sup>3</sup> quotes a striking passage from Philo which throws light on Lk 14<sup>26</sup>; he describes the Levites as being in some sense 'exiles who to do God's pleasure had left parents and children and brethren and all their mortal kindred, and continued—' γὰρ ἀποστρέφοντες τὸν θυμὸν τῶν ἰσχυρῶν ἀναγινῶν τῶ πατρὶ καὶ τῶ μητρὶ, ὄντες ἰσχυρῶν ὄντων καὶ τῶν ἀδελφῶν ἢ τῶν ἀδελφῶν καὶ τῶν υἱῶν ἀποστρέφονται ἑαυτοὺς τῶν θεῶν. For the abstraction of the sinful desire to injure from the word 'hate,' leaving in its holding but an aversion of being of the kind, Wendt compares the use of 'violence' and 'force' in Mt 11<sup>19</sup>, where they are used only so far as they denote energetic seizure and appropriation, but not the unlawfulness of this seizure.'

4. Other passages—Mt 6<sup>24</sup>=Lk 16<sup>13</sup> 'No man can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one and love (ἀγαπήσει) the other; or else he will hold to the one and despise the other.' Here also 'hate' must get its full meaning in order to bring out the opposition and the division of the man's nature who attempts to serve both God and mammon. The change of words in the second part is remarkable (καταφρονήσει for μισήσει, and ἀντίθετος for ἀγαπήσει), 'non dixit odisset sed contemnet: sicut solent minas ejus, postponere cupiditatibus suis, qui de bonitate ejus ad impunitatem sibi blanduntur' (Aug.); to which Trench adds—'No man actually and openly professes to hate God and love the devil; and therefore in the second clause, when the Lord is putting the converse case, He changes both words, which would be no longer the most appropriate; the sinner 'holds to' Satan when he follows his rewards; he practically 'despises' God when he holds not His promises and His threatenings; however little he may acknowledge to himself or to others that he is doing either this or the other.'

Lk 17<sup>3</sup>, 'salvation from our enemies and from the hand of all that hate us,' exhibits a parallelism with no particular distinction between the clauses, cf. Ps 137<sup>7</sup> 106<sup>34</sup>.

W. H. DUNDAS.
HEAD (κεφάλη).—1. Natural importance.—The relationship of the head to the body is that of master to servant. In this service the body is expected to ignore its own wants, and homelessness is to be without a resting-place for the head (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>). The anointing of the head was an accompaniment of festive happiness (Mt 23<sup>6</sup>, Mk 14<sup>3</sup>, Lk 7<sup>45</sup>), and this mark of joy was to be borrowed by Christian self-denial (Mt 6<sup>17</sup>). A crown of thorns on the head was part of the mock dignity thrust upon Christ as King of the Jews (Jn 19<sup>3</sup>).

The importance thus attached to the head gave a higher significance to the gestures which, among an emotional people, often emphasized or took the place of words. Such movements of the head are practised to-day in Palestine alike by young and old, and are resorted to on occasions similar to those described in the OT and NT. Thus a rapid shaking of the head from side to side, with a similar twirling of the open hand on the wrist, indicates that one is perplexed by some mystery, as when the owner of the garden asked why that useless fig-tree was still there (Lk 13<sup>7</sup>). It also indicates that the hearer has not heard distinctly, or grasped the meaning of what has been said. An abrupt jerk of the head backward does duty, especially when at some distance away, for an emphatic 'No.' The bending of the head downward is the attitude of the inferior in the presence of his superior (Is 58<sup>3</sup>, Lk 18<sup>9</sup>). The slow turning of the head once in one direction means that the words just heard or the scene witnessed pass all description. Such a gesture would be common among those who looked upon Christ's miracles of healing power. This motion, repeated several times, along with a disassociating wave of the hand, means contempt or disgust towards some action, or the abandonment of hope in the case of some party referred to (Jer 18<sup>16</sup>, Zeph 2<sup>13</sup>). The movement of the head up and down is the soliloquy of one speaking to himself and saying, 'It is as I expected; I knew it must come to this' (Lk 24<sup>4</sup>, Mt 27<sup>7</sup>). The head laid to one side, with a slight protrusion of the underlip, means, 'Causes must have consequences, you may do as you please' (Ps 22<sup>7</sup>). Such a gesture seems to fill the gap in the debate over the fig-tree in the garden (Lk 13<sup>9</sup>).

2. Figurative authority.—The connexion thus recognised between head and body was used to express all situations involving a relationship of authority and submission. The patriarchal East, with regard to both secular and sacred matters, has always attached more importance to the sceptre than to the statute. It does not understand impersonal edicts, and gives its homage to the official who can enforce his decrees. Its conception of life is of graded authority rather than of democratic equality. It was not so much in disapproval of this as by way of supplying a new line of action to the familiar instinct, that Christ said that in the coming Kingdom of God the way to honour would have to be sought through abundant and self-humbling service (Mt 23<sup>11</sup>-23<sup>13</sup>). The customs of swearing by the head and of appealing to heaven and earth and Jerusalem, are condemned, because, while such a habit of appealing under distress to the name of some one who could and must come to deliver and punish was a protection to the oppressed under primitive conditions of life, it was here diverted from its original meaning when the appeal was made to that which was not free, but already belonged to another. The practice was at once foolish and idolatrous. The true help is from the Lord which made heaven and earth; and this help is for those whose speech is 'Yea, yea; nay, nay' (Mt 5<sup>33-37</sup>). For the headship of Christ see following article.

G. M. MACKIE.
HEADSHIP.—1. IN THE GOSPELS.—1. The word 'head' (κεφαλή), as applied to the relation of Christ to His Church, occurs only three times in the Gospels, and there in the passages in the Synoptics (Mt 21<sup>42</sup> || Mk 12<sup>36</sup> || Lk 20<sup>17</sup>) in which, applying the lesson of the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen, Jesus quotes Ps 118<sup>22</sup> in the Septuagint version, 'The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner' (ὄλιθος ἐτεθήθη εἰς κεφαλὴν γωνίας), where the expression κεφαλῆ γωρίας is an exact rendering of the Hebrew ראש עמ. The meaning of the passage is clear. The building of which the Psalmist speaks is the theocracy, Israel as the people of God. The corner-stone, a stone fitted into an angle of the building and binding together the walls which meet at that point, and without which the structure must collapse, represents the Messiah, through whom the theocracy finds its realization.

What the Psalmist says about the rejection of the stone on the part of the builders has been explained by some as an allusion to an alleged incident in the building of the Second Temple.

Some stones, a fragment, we may conjecture, of the Old Temple, rescued from its ruins, had seemed to the architects unfit for the work of binding together the two walls that met at right angles to each other. They would have preferred some new blocks of their own fashioning. But the priests, it may be, more conversant with the traditions of the Temple, knew that that was the right place for it, and that no other stone would answer half as well. The trial was made, and the issue answered their expectations' (Plumptre, Biblical Studies, quoted by Perowne, Psalms, in loc.).

It is more likely, however, that this story was suggested by Ps 118 than vice versa. Probably what was in the Psalmist's mind was Is 28<sup>16</sup>: 'Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone.' Ps 118<sup>22</sup> was applied by Christ to His relation to the Church as uniting Jew and Gentile, and to His approaching rejection by Israel. Thus quoted and applied, the words of the Psalm speak of the Messiah as of Him 'upon whom depend the maintenance and development of the theocracy, without whom it would fall to pieces, as the corner-stone is the upholder and stay of a building' (Meyer). They speak of Christ as representing the principle of unity, that which constitutes the Church a grand whole. If we compare with this application by our Lord of Ps 118<sup>22</sup> the use made of the same figure by St. Peter in the Acts of the Apostles (4<sup>11</sup>) and in his First Epistle (2<sup>6-8</sup>), where he speaks of the Church as a temple built of living stones, and by St. Paul when he describes Jesus Christ Himself as the chief corner-stone of a holy temple (Eph 2<sup>20</sup>), we find the connecting link between the idea of the Headship of Christ as it is expressed in the Gospels and the similar conception of St. Paul in his Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians (compare also 1 Co 11<sup>17</sup>).

St. Peter, while keeping to the architectural figure suggested by the passages quoted from the Psalms and Isaiah, and speaking of Christ as 'head stone of the corner' (κεφαλῆ γωρίας), adds the thought of life to that of unity. St. Paul, still further working out the same idea, adopts a different figure, that of the head as the seat of life in the body, that which controls and regulates the action of each individual member (Eph 1<sup>22, 23</sup>, 4<sup>12, 16</sup>, 5<sup>22, 23</sup>, Col 1<sup>18, 20</sup>). See § ii.

2. The idea of Headship is suggested in the Gospels in connexion with another figure, in our Lord's similitude of the Vine (Jn 15<sup>1-8</sup>), in which He illustrates and works out in detail the thought that He is the source of life and fruitfulness for the whole Church and for each individual member of the Church, the vital principle which unites all in one. As the head no less than the heart is the seat of life in the human body, inasmuch as the brain is the centre of the nervous system, and the nerves radiating from the brain and spinal cord are the source of the healthy activity of every part, the beautiful description which St. Paul gives (Col 2<sup>9</sup>)—'the head, from which all the body by joints and bands having nourishment ministered and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God'—corresponds to what Christ says in His parable of the Vine of the source of life and fruitfulness, with the thought of the healthy flow of life-giving sap which His words suggest: 'As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine, no more can ye except ye abide in me. I am the vine, ye are the branches: he that abideth in me and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without me (χωρὶς ἐμοῦ—marg. 'severed from me') ye can do nothing' (Jn 15<sup>4-5</sup>).

3. Again, the thought of Headship is involved in that view of the Church's relation to Christ which our Lord presents in the blessing pronounced on St. Peter at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16<sup>18-19</sup>), and in a passage from the same Gospel, in many respects similar, in which He repeats His promise of power to bind and to loose (Mt 18<sup>18-20</sup>). These passages are the more worthy of note in this connexion, that they are the only instances in which the Gospels represent Jesus as using the expression 'Church' (ἐκκλησία). According to the first, that which constitutes the being and the strength of the Church is her faith in Jesus as the Christ, the Son of the living God. Jesus speaks of the community which is founded upon faith in the Christ as 'My church' (μου τῆς ἐκκλησίας), and then promises to invest this Church in the person of her representatives (in this case St. Peter as spokesman of the Twelve) with the power to bind and to loose. The other passage occurs in connexion with our Lord's injunction to make 'the church' the final court of appeal in cases of disputes among brethren. In it Jesus repeats the promise of power to bind and to loose, and states, in more universal terms than He employs in His promise to St. Peter, what constitutes the Church, or what entitles any body of believers to the name of 'Church'. That is the presence of Christ Himself in the midst of them. 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.' That which constitutes the Church and invests her with authority and power, that which is the source of her life and energy, is the presence with her of Christ as her living Head, in whose name and guided by whose Spirit she discharges her spiritual functions.

ii. IN THE PAULINE EPISTLES.—The Headship of Christ, suggested in the teaching of our Lord Himself, is expressly taught in the Pauline Epp., and is applied, moreover, to a much wider sphere than that of Christian discipleship. For while emphasis is especially laid on Christ's Headship over the Church, suggestions are given for a doctrine of His Headship over the human race and even over the whole created universe.

1. Christ's Headship over the Church.—In 1 Co 12<sup>27</sup> (cf. Ro 12<sup>5</sup>) we find St. Paul, in his desire to impress his readers with a sense of their unity and mutual dependence, describing the local church as 'a body of Christ' (σῶμα Χριστοῦ)—conceiving of it, i.e. under the figure of a body whose several members (eye, hand, head, feet, v.<sup>21</sup>) are individual Christians. In Eph. and Col. this figure is elaborated at more points than one. In the first place, Christ is no longer thought of as Himself the whole body, of which individuals are the members—the head being a particular member like the rest. The Church is now the body, from which He is distinguished as the Head (Eph. 1<sup>22</sup>, 4<sup>16</sup>, 5<sup>23</sup>; Col. 1<sup>18, 20</sup>). He is the vital centre, the ruling and directing power of the whole organism. Moreover, as the use of the art. before σῶμα (absent in 1 Co 12<sup>27</sup>) now shows, it is the writer's intention that the figure should be applied not to any local church merely, but to the Church universal, and to this Church ideally conceived—the actual Church, no doubt, but regarded sub specie aeternitatis, so that the radiance of the heavenly antitype shines through the earthly form. To this Church, Christ is 'head over all things'; while it is 'his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all' (Eph 1<sup>22</sup>). See, further, art. BODY, ii. (3).

2. Christ's Headship over the human race.—In 1 Co 11<sup>3</sup> the Apostle writes, 'The head of every man is Christ.' Here we have a doctrine of Headship stretching out beyond the limits even of the universal Church. The statement, as Hort points out (Chr. Ecclesia, p. 151), is a natural application of St. Paul's view of Christ as the Second Adam (1 Co 15<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>9</sup>, cf. Ro 5<sup>12</sup>). The incarnation not only reveals the kinship of the 'man from heaven' with all the sons of men; it sets Him before them as the true spiritual Head of humanity, in whom the race is ideally summed up.

3. Christ's Headship over the universe.—In Eph 1<sup>10</sup> we read that it is God's purpose 'to gather together all things under a head (ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι τὰ πάντα) in Christ, the things in the heavens and the things upon the earth.' And in Col 2<sup>10</sup> Christ is expressly called 'the head of all principality and power'—words which are explained in 1<sup>15</sup> 1<sup>6</sup>, where He is declared to be 'the firstborn of all creation,' in whom 'were all things created, in the heavens and upon the earth, things visible and things invisible, whether thrones or dominions or principalities or powers; all things have been created through him and unto him; and he is before all things, and in him all things consist.' In these passages there is affirmed of Christ a relation of Headship to the universe alike for the past, the present, and the future. In Him all things were created at the first. In Him they even now consist as their vital Head, the underlying ground of their very being. And unto Him from whom they had their origin they shall all finally return, in the day of that great consummation when God shall 'gather together all things under a head in Christ.'

With this Pauline doctrine of the Headship of Christ over (1) the Church, (2) the human race, (3) the universe, it is interesting to compare the teaching of the Fourth Gospel regarding (1) the union of Christ as the living Vine with His people as the branches (Jn 15<sup>1</sup>); (2) the true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world (1<sup>9</sup>); (3) the creative Logos 'without [whom] was not anything made that hath been made' (1<sup>3</sup>).

HEALING.—See CURES.

HEARING.—1. There are two Gr. verbs (ἀκούω, εἰσακούω) used for 'hear' in the Gospels, and they are sometimes rendered in the EV by 'hearken,' 'listen' (RV), 'come to the ears of,' 'to be noised.' Another verb (ἰσακούω) is used, Mt 18<sup>33</sup>, and translated 'refuse to hear' (RV), and Mk 5<sup>34</sup> where the RV is 'not heeding' (mg. 'overhearing'). The noun (ἀκοή) also occurs, and is rendered 'hearing,' 'fame,' 'report,' 'rumour.'

2. The most obvious meaning of 'hear' is, of course, to be endowed with the faculty of hearing, as opposed to deafness; and in this sense it is used in Mt 11<sup>5</sup> (Lk 7<sup>22</sup>), Mk 7<sup>32</sup>. (See CURES, DEAF AND DUMB).

Next, perhaps, in order of common usage are such meanings of the word as (a) to have immediate perceptual experience through the organ of hearing—the object being either personal, as Mt 2<sup>2</sup> 'Hearing heard the king, or impersonal, as Mt 11<sup>4</sup> 'Tell John the things which ye do hear'; (b) to find out (by hearsay), to have information about, learn (i.e. hear of mediately)—the object again being either personal, as Mk 7<sup>3</sup> 'A woman . . . having heard of him,' or impersonal, as Mk 9<sup>3</sup> 'where they heard he was.' In connexion with (a) and (b) it is interesting to note the passages in which the experience of Jesus is referred to: e.g. (a) Mt 8<sup>10</sup> (Lk 7<sup>9</sup>) 21<sup>16</sup> 27<sup>13</sup>, Mk 5<sup>34</sup>, Lk 8<sup>50</sup> 18<sup>22</sup>; (b) Mt 4<sup>13</sup> 9<sup>13</sup> (Mk 2<sup>17</sup>), Jn 9<sup>32</sup> 11<sup>4</sup>.

3. The suggestive uses of the word, however, are those in which more complex experiences than the previous ones are signified by it. (a) The first usage to be named under this head is where the verb 'to hear' is used to mean the receiving of inward communications. For example, Jesus predicts the coming of the hour 'when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God' (Jn 5<sup>25</sup> 27). Again He uses the word to describe His own experience in relation to the revelation of the truth which He received from the Father and made known to men. 'As I hear, I judge' (5<sup>30</sup>); 'The things which I have heard from him (that sent me), these speak I unto the world' (8<sup>26</sup>)—these as well as 8<sup>26</sup> and 15<sup>3</sup> are instances in point. The Evangelist John, speaking of Jesus, says, similarly, 'What he hath seen and heard, of that he beareth witness' (3<sup>22</sup>). In two places Jesus refers to the occurrence of this experience in the case of others: 'Ye have neither heard his voice at any time,' He says to His Jewish audience, 'nor seen his form' (5<sup>37</sup>); 'Every one that hath heard from the Father, and hath learned, cometh unto me' (6<sup>4</sup>). Finally, the inward communication may be far otherwise than Divine in its source. To the Jews, Jesus is reported by the Evangelist John as having said, 'Ye do the things which ye heard from your father' (8<sup>19</sup>), and later on in the same chapter (v. 44) their father is declared by Him to be the devil. It is characteristic that all the above usages are found in the Fourth Gospel. (b) In a few contexts the word 'hear' is used with reference to God's attitude to prayer. For example, we read that at the grave of Lazarus 'Jesus lifted up his eyes, and said, Father, I thank thee that thou hearest me. And I knew that thou hearest me always' (11<sup>41</sup> 42). In His teaching with regard to prayer Jesus warns His hearers against using vain repetitions, 'as the Gentiles do: for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking' (Mt 6<sup>7</sup>). To Zacharias the angel Gabriel is reported as having said, 'Fear not, because thy supplication is heard' (Lk 1<sup>13</sup>). [εἰσακούω is the verb used in both the preceding contexts]. The man, blind from his birth, whom Jesus cured on the Sabbath, thus addressed the Jews, 'We know that God heareth not sinners; but if any man be a worshipper of God and do his will, him he heareth' (Jn 9<sup>31</sup>).

(c) Another context may be noticed here, viz. that one in which Jesus, describing the function of the Spirit, says of Him, 'He shall not speak from himself; but what things soever he shall hear, these shall he speak' (16<sup>13</sup>). (d) In certain passages emphasis is placed on the privilege of 'hearing' or 'becoming acquainted with' the gospel. 'Blessed are your eyes,' said Jesus to the disciples, 'for they see; and your ears, for they hear. For verily I say unto you, that many prophets and righteous men desired to see the things which ye see, and saw them not; and to hear the things which ye hear, and heard them not' (Mt 13<sup>16</sup> 17, Lk 10<sup>23</sup>). The duties attached to this privilege may be grouped in the following way—(1) in respect to the exercise as such: 'He that hath ears to hear, let him hear' (Mt 11<sup>15</sup> 13<sup>9</sup>, cf. Mk 4<sup>9</sup> 7<sup>9</sup>, Lk 8<sup>8</sup> 14<sup>35</sup>); (2) in respect to that which the attention is given to: 'Take heed what ye hear' (Mk 4<sup>24</sup>); (3) in respect to the manner of hearing: 'Take heed therefore how ye hear' (Lk 8<sup>18</sup>). (e) In a large number of passages, especially in the parable of the Sower, 'hearing' either implies one or other of certain richer experiences, or it is ex-explicitly connected therewith as a prefatory experience. (1) Sometimes the experience implied, or mentioned as that in which 'hearing' fulfils itself (or does not fulfil itself), is understanding or learning. For example, referring to the multitude generally, Jesus said to the disciples, 'Therefore speak I to them in parables: because seeing they see not, and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand' (Mt 13<sup>35</sup>, Mk 4<sup>12</sup>, Lk 8<sup>9</sup>). (See art. SEEING). 'Hear and understand. Not that which entereth into the mouth defileth the man; but that which proceedeth out of the mouth, this defileth the man' (Mt 15<sup>10</sup>, Mk 7<sup>14</sup>). 'With many such parables spake he the word unto them, as they were able to hear it' (Mk 4<sup>23</sup>), etc. (2) Sometimes the experience is believing. For example, some of the Samaritans are reported as having said to the woman who conversed with Jesus at the well, 'Now we believe, not because of thy speaking: for we have heard for ourselves' (Jn 4<sup>42</sup>). 'Verily, verily, I say unto you,' said Jesus to the Jews, when they were seeking to kill Him, 'He that heareth my word, and believeth him that sent me, hath eternal life' (5<sup>24</sup>). 'This is an hard saying,' said many of the disciples after Jesus had spoken of Himself as the bread which came down from heaven, 'who can hear it?' (6<sup>60</sup>). Cf. also the references in Jn 10 to the sheep 'hearing' the voice of the Good Shepherd. (3) Sometimes the experience is doing, bearing fruit, or keeping. For example, the verses at the close of the Sermon on the Mount, 'Every one which heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them . . . Every one that heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them not' (Mt 7<sup>24-27</sup>, Lk 6<sup>47-49</sup>),* 'He that was sown upon the good ground, this is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it; who verily beareth fruit and bringeth forth,' etc. (Mt 13<sup>23</sup>, Mk 4<sup>20</sup>, Lk 8<sup>15</sup>). When it was told Jesus that 'His mother and His brethren stood without desiring to see Him, He said, 'My mother and my brethren are these which hear the word of God and do it' (Lk 8<sup>21</sup>). When a certain woman out of the multitude said to Jesus, 'Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the breasts which thou didst suck,' He answered, 'Yea rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it' (Lk 11<sup>28</sup>, cf. Jn 12<sup>47</sup>).

The above divisions represent the main usages of the word 'hearing.' It is interesting to notice the contexts in which (1) the interest displayed in anticipation of hearing is described, and these may be collected together without further remark: Mt 12<sup>48</sup> (Lk 11<sup>28</sup>), 12<sup>57</sup> (Lk 10<sup>36</sup>), Mt 23<sup>37</sup> (cf. Mt 4<sup>23</sup>, Mk 2<sup>17</sup> etc.), Lk 21-18 6<sup>17</sup> 15<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>28</sup> 21<sup>28</sup> 23<sup>35</sup>; and (2) those in which certain emotional results are described as resulting from 'hearing,' e.g. wonder, astonishment, amazement, etc., joy, rejoicing, gladness, etc., indignation, wrath, etc., sorrow, fear, trouble, perplexity, offence (see articles on most of these subjects).

In conclusion, it may be pointed out that the antinomy which is found throughout Scripture and is testified to by the human consciousness in connexion with religious experience, viz. between 'man's working out and God's working in,' appears in what is said about 'hearing' in the Gospels. For along with exhortations addressed to men to 'hear' and to fulfil that experience in understanding, believing, and doing, there occurs a saying of Jesus like this, 'Every one that hath heard from the Father and hath learned, cometh unto me' (Jn 6<sup>45</sup>). The 'ability to hear' (Mk 4<sup>23</sup>, Jn 6<sup>45</sup>) implies an inward communication from God and an exercise of man's natural faculties.

* In connexion with this passage it is worth noting that the point of difference between the 'rock' and the 'sand' as foundations is just that between 'hearing and doing' and 'hearing and not doing.' The basal element is the same in both cases—'hearing,' but that which gives it the cohesiveness and permanence of 'rock' is 'doing'—habitual obedience.

HEART

HEART.—In the NT 'heart' (καρδια) is the word most commonly used to denote the inner nature of man, the secret core of his being, where the springs of his intellectual and moral activity reside. In this, its general significance, it is the equivalent of the Hebrew term לֵב or לֵבָב in the OT. Originally employed to designate the bodily organ which is the centre of the animal life, it came by a natural process of thought to be applied to the invisible centre of the thinking and responsible life. In this sense it occurs with notable frequency in the Gospels; but there, like the corresponding word in the OT, whilst always referring to man's interior nature, it is used in a variety of applications; according to the particular functions or aspects of that nature which are meant to be expressed. This is the case also in the other NT writings:

i. SHADES OF MEANING IN THE GOSPELS.—Heart in the Gospels is variously regarded—1. As the faculty of thought, intelligence, and memory.—Persons are spoken of as pondering (Lk 24<sup>28</sup>), musing (3<sup>34</sup>), reasoning (5<sup>27</sup>), having thoughts arising (Mt 9<sup>4</sup>, Lk 9<sup>47</sup> 24<sup>48</sup>) in their heart; understanding or not with their heart (Mt 13<sup>15</sup>, Mk 6<sup>52</sup> 8<sup>17</sup>); keeping, or laying up, things said or done, in their heart (Lk 1<sup>68</sup> 2<sup>21</sup>).

3. As the source of purpose and volition.—The disciples are enjoined to settle in their hearts not to meditate what they shall say (Lk 21<sup>14</sup>); the fell design of Judas was put into his heart by Satan (Jn 13<sup>2</sup>); the adulterous act is virtually done in the intention of the heart (Mt 5<sup>28</sup>).

4. As the organ of moral discernment and religious belief, i.e. of conscience and faith.—Reproofs are given for the hardness of heart which prevents the reception of the truth (Mt 19<sup>8</sup>, Mk 3<sup>5</sup> 16<sup>14</sup>), and for slowness of heart to believe (Lk 24<sup>25</sup>); there is an exhortation not to doubt in the heart, but believe (Mk 11<sup>22</sup>); and the pure in heart have the promise of Divine illumination (Mt 5<sup>8</sup>).

In one passage only we find the phrase 'the heart of the earth' (Mt 12<sup>40</sup>).

ii. CHRIST'S EMPHASIS ON THE HEART.—The superlative importance which Christ attached to the heart and its right condition was one of the pre-eminent characteristics of His teaching. He possessed an unrivalled insight into the workings of the heart (Jn 2<sup>24</sup>, 25), and could read what was going on there with a penetration and accuracy often startling (Mt 9<sup>4</sup> 12<sup>22</sup> 22<sup>18</sup>, Mk 2<sup>8</sup>, Lk 9<sup>47</sup>). But His unique peculiarity was the seriousness and persistency with which He dealt with the heart, and laboured for its purification as the one concern vital to the well-being of men. To the heart He always appealed, and on its deepest instincts He sought to bring His influence to bear; and although in many of His utterances the heart is not expressly named, it is still obvious that He had it directly in view. This was the 'inwardness' which constituted His great secret. The main points on which He insisted were:

1. The heart as the source of all the good or the evil in men's lives.—He dwelt on this with special earnestness—e.g. in His reply to the tradition-bound objectors, 'Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries,' etc., 'the things which defile a man' (Mt 15<sup>19</sup>); and in that suggestive saying, 'A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good, and an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is evil' (Lk

6th) and the idea is to be found running through all His teaching.

2. The dispositions and motives of the heart as determining the religious value of actions.—Jesus unfailingly taught that the test of a man's worth before God was not the outward propriety of his conduct, but the heart-inclinations and purposes by which he was swayed (Lk 16th). Even a correctly decorous Pharisee like Simon did not stand so high in the Divine estimation as the frail woman who had erred sadly, because, while he was proud and self-satisfied in his moral respectability, she, amid all her failings, was melted into heartfelt penitence and gratitude (7th-23rd). A man's conduct may be free from all formal commission of impurity, but if he lust after a woman in his heart, the stain of impurity is already incurred (Mt 5th). Many things outwardly right and proper were done by the religionists of His day—seasons of prayer duly observed, alms given, etc.—which yet He pronounced to be of little moral value because done from a false motive, the desire for social credit, 'to be seen of men' (6th-5). On the other hand, humble and obscure actions, like the widow's offering and the publican's supplication, He declared to be of inestimable worth in the eye of Heaven, by reason of the genuine heart-feeling from which they sprang (Mk 12th-4, Lk 13th-14). And in the great Judgment-picture (Mt 25th-46), He made it clear that it is the frank, unaffected generosity of the heart, finding expression in deeds of simple dutifulness, that ranks high in the Father's sight and secures the reward of immortal blessedness. Always and everywhere He pierced below surface appearances, and demanded inner rectitude as the criterion of worth.

3. The regeneration of the heart as essential both to a right relation to God and to true happiness.—The repentance Jesus preached meant a change of heart (Mt 4th 9th, Lk 13th); the conversion He urged as a necessity was a turning of the heart to God as the source of life and grace (Mt 13th, Mk 4th, Jn 12th), a restoration of the childlike spirit (Mt 18th), a new birth within, apart from which it is impossible to enjoy the blessings of the heavenly Kingdom (Jn 3th-7).

iii. EVILS COUNTERACTED BY CHRIST'S TEACHING.—Of these, four at least may be specially noted:

1. A pretentious ecclesiasticism.—Men's minds were drawn away from dependence on the mere institutional aspects of religion, and confronted with the absolute necessity of internal righteousness. When orthodox Jews took a stand on their connexion with an ancient religious organization with its high covenanted privileges, and boasted of being children of Abraham, Christ flatly challenged their right to such a title, because of the vile purposes they cherished in their hearts, which proved that they did not possess Abraham's spirit (Jn 8th). He avowed that a scorned publican like Zacchæus, who was outside the pale of ecclesiastical recognition, was more truly a son of Abraham, in virtue of the higher dispositions which had been stirred in his heart, and which placed him in the line of moral and spiritual descent (Lk 19th). Again, in face of the arrogant presumption that restricted Divine blessing and salvation to those within the bounds of Judaism and its religious system, He held up the kind services of a generous heart as sufficient to raise even a Samaritan to a level of equal worth before God (10th-37).

2. An external ceremonialism.—Jesus attacked, sometimes with fiery indignation, the superficiality of that righteousness which was based on a punctilious attention to certain prescribed observances,—the tithing of mint and cummin, when justice, mercy, and the faith of the heart were neglected

(Mt 23rd, Lk 11th); the fastings which had no genuine penitence behind them (Mt 6th-16); the careful washing of hands, while the heart was inwardly defiled (15th-2). It was His dominant idea that on the disposition of the heart the spiritual value of worship depends (Jn 4th), and He had strong warnings to utter against the offerings at the altar when sinister feelings were nursed within (Mt 5th), and the ascription of honour to God with the lips while the heart was far from Him (15th). With scathing rebukes He exposed the pretensions of those who claimed peculiar sanctity on the ground of their ceremonial scrupulousness, characterizing them as whitened sepulchres, outwardly fair, but inwardly full of uncleanness (23rd). Thus He represented all external acts of righteousness which do not spring out of an upright, pious heart as a mere hypocritical show, and not real righteousness (6th-6).

3. A legalistic moralism.—In view of the fact that the great spiritual ideas inculcated by the prophets had been hardened into fixed laws and rules, in formal obedience to which righteousness was made to consist, Christ's endeavour to recall men to the supreme importance of inner motive was calculated to exert a powerful effect. The confidence which many had in their moral respectability was necessarily shaken when they found themselves forced to look within, and judge themselves by something higher than a legal standard; as, e.g., in the case of the young man who had great possessions, and whose conduct outwardly was without reproach (Mt 19th-22). And there can be little doubt that the uneasiness and irritation created among the professedly religious classes by Christ's teaching was largely due to the consciousness it awakened in them of the insufficiency of the grounds on which their claim to righteousness was based. In the light of the stress He laid on the hidden springs of action in the heart, their moral regularity of life, founded on mere conformity to laws and rules, was bound to appear unsatisfactory and poor.

4. A self-sufficient secularism.—Such teaching, setting the renewed dispositions of the heart far above the riches and honours of the world in value, supplied a potent counteractive to the proud security and self-assumption which prosperous worldliness is apt to beget. It forced home the sense of something wanting within, even when the outward fortunes were flourishing. The parable of the Rich Fool is a vivid picture of the real poverty of the man who trusts in his worldly success and is not rich in the things that belong to the inner life (Lk 12th-21); while in the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus there is another picture, fitted to break down the self-confidence of the prosperous, showing that the day will come when conditions may be reversed, and when heart-qualities alone will determine the status and happiness of men (Lk 16th-31).

iv. THE REVIVIFYING EFFECT ON RELIGION.—By His insistence on the heart as the vital element in righteousness, Christ transformed the whole character of religion. He made it (1) living,—not mechanical, a matter of prescribed and outwardly imposed form, but dynamical, a free, spontaneous spring of high purpose and feeling; not something put on, but a bent and impulse of the spirit within. Thus He gave religion an elasticity and perpetual vitality which prophesy for its permanence and power,—'a well of water springing up unto everlasting life' (Jn 4th). He made it (2) effectually operative,—an energizing force, working itself out in practical life, impressing its hallowed ideas and aims on the world of affairs, and proving its reality by the heightened quality of the actions to which it leads. And He made it (3) a gracious influence,—commending itself to the general conscience, winning reverence, inspiring self-devotion, and transmitting from heart to heart fervours of aspiration after the things of God.

The only reference in the Gospels to heat for the purpose of warmth is Jn 18<sup>18</sup> 'a fire of coals' (ἀνθρακιά), i.e. 'of charcoal' RVm, coals having probably still this meaning at the time of the AV. See WIND.

HEATHEN.—The Anglo-Saxon heathen, 'one who lives on the heaths and in the woods,' as opposed to a town-dweller; cf. 'pagan,' from paganus, 'a countryman or villager.' This word is an indication of the fact that, as a rule, country-dwellers were Christianized later than those living in towns and cities. 'Heathen' occurs in AV of the Gospels in Mt 6<sup>7</sup> 18<sup>7</sup>, and not at all in RV, which gives 'Gentiles' and 'Gentile' respectively in these two places (see GENTILES).

It has been pointed out that paganus also means 'a civilian' in opposition to 'a soldier,' and that thus a pagan would also mean one who was not a soldier of Christ. This secondary meaning of pagan probably came into use through a contemptuous designation by soldiers of non-military persons as 'countrymen.'

HEAVEN (οὐρανός, sing. and plur.; in Mt. plur. chiefly, and always in ὁ πατήρ ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, and ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν).

Three uses of the word may be classified, omitting parallel passages—

(a) Cosmological. Heaven and earth as constituting the entire Universe: as in the phrases 'till heaven and earth pass away' (Mt 6<sup>10</sup> 24<sup>35</sup>, Lk 13<sup>31</sup>); 'Lord of heaven and earth' (Mt 11<sup>20</sup>); 'Heaven is 'the firmament, where are fixed the stars and 'the powers' (Mt 24<sup>35</sup>), the sky (Mt 16<sup>2</sup> AV), the air (Mt 6<sup>26</sup> 8<sup>30</sup> 13<sup>32</sup>, Lk 8<sup>3</sup>, AV in each), the treasury of the clouds (Mt 24<sup>29</sup> 26<sup>26</sup>), the winds (Mt 24<sup>31</sup>), the lightning (Lk 17<sup>24</sup>), the rain (Lk 4<sup>26</sup>); and from whence are signs and portents (Mt 24<sup>29</sup>, Lk 21<sup>11</sup>).

(b) The abode of God and angels. Heaven is 'the throne of God' (Mt 6<sup>34</sup> 23<sup>32</sup>, et. 'Our Father which art in heaven,' Mt 6<sup>9</sup>; 'your Father . . . in heaven,' Mt 5<sup>48</sup> et. Mt 18<sup>14</sup> 23<sup>9</sup>; 'My Father . . . in heaven,' Mt 7<sup>21</sup> 10<sup>32</sup> 33 12<sup>50</sup> 16<sup>17</sup> 18<sup>10</sup> 19<sup>13</sup>; so also 'Heavenly (οὐρανοῦ) Father,' Mt 5<sup>48</sup>

(c) As a synonym for 'God.'

The use of 'Heaven' for 'God' is put beyond question by Lk 15<sup>18, 21</sup>, where 'aimed against heaven' can only mean 'against God.' There are other uses only less certain—thus 'from heaven or from men' (Mt 21<sup>27</sup>) is clearly 'from God or from men' (cf. Ac 2<sup>24</sup>); so also 'given him from heaven' (Jn 3<sup>27</sup>) must be 'from God.' But the most striking instance of this use of 'Heaven' as a synonym for 'God' is in the phrase 'the Kingdom of Heaven,' almost uniformly in Mt. for 'the Kingdom of God' of Mk. and Lk., and this in exactly parallel passages. It is quite possible to make a distinction between these titles, but it seems best to accept them as synonymous.*

Admitting the use of this metonymy, there can be no objection to its use in other instances where a clear meaning follows. Thus 'bound, loosed in heaven' (Mt 16<sup>19</sup> 18<sup>18</sup>) = 'of God'; 'The keys of the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 16<sup>19</sup>) = the authority of God; 'names written in heaven' (Lk 10<sup>20</sup>) = acceptance with God, cf. Ex 32<sup>32</sup>. The demand for 'a sign from heaven' (Mt 16<sup>1</sup>, Lk 11<sup>16</sup>), while it may refer to the expectation of some visible wonder out of the sky, has ultimate reference to some direct act of God. Anything 'from heaven' is an act of God, of the judgment upon the cities of the Plain (Lk 17<sup>29</sup>), also the request of the disciples (Lk 9<sup>40</sup>). Even the phrase 'treasure in heaven' has its exact equivalent in 'rich towards God' (Lk 12<sup>21</sup>). Additional instances of the use of periphrasis are seen in 'joy in the presence of the angels of God' (Lk 10<sup>20</sup>) for the 'joy of God'; 'confess before the angels of God' (Lk 12<sup>8</sup>, et. Mt 10<sup>32</sup>); 'power' 'from on High' (Lk 24<sup>49</sup>); 'Dayspring' 'from on High' (Lk 1<sup>7</sup>); 'from above' (Jn 19<sup>11</sup>); 'in thy sight' (Mt 11<sup>26</sup>); 'the Most High' (Lk 12<sup>7</sup> 26, et. Mt 5<sup>7</sup>).

The transition from Heaven as the abode of God to 'Heaven' as a synonym for 'God' is illustrated in the custom of uplifting the eyes to Heaven when God is addressed. 'The thought of the Temple as the dwelling-place of God led to the habit in prayer of turning the face towards Jerusalem and towards the Temple (see 1 K 8<sup>48</sup>, Dn 6<sup>10</sup>, Ps 28-135). With the higher faith of God's transcendence, as One dwelling in the Heaven of Heavens, came the custom of lifting up the eyes to the Heavens (Ps 123). The psalmist 'would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven' (Lk 13<sup>14</sup>, et. Ezr 9). So in prayer, Jesus 'lifted up his eyes' (Mt 11<sup>14</sup>), 'to heaven' (Jn 17<sup>1</sup>); 'looking up to heaven' (Mt 14<sup>19</sup>, Mt 7<sup>9</sup>). There are several passages which present difficulty, but whatever conclusion may be come to as to the objective occurrences in the opening of the heavens (Mt 3<sup>16</sup>), and the voice 'out of the heavens' (Mt 3<sup>17</sup>, Jn 12<sup>28</sup>), or 'out of the cloud' (Mt 17<sup>5</sup>), the subjective experience is the vital matter, the attestation to Jesus of His commission from and fellowship with God.

It is this which is symbolically represented in 'Ye shall see the heaven opened and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man' (Jn 1<sup>51</sup>). Here, in a figure, the mediatorship of Jesus is declared. His revelation of God to man and intercession for man with God. The striking saying, 'No man hath ascended into heaven but he that descended out of heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven' (Jn 3<sup>13</sup>), has additional difficulty. The weight of MS authority is against the last clause, and the words may have been added as a gloss after the ascension. If, with the RV, we retain them as the words of Jesus, they must be taken as qualifying the preceding utterance, which then becomes a declaration of His perfect fellowship with God (cf. Jn 1<sup>19</sup>) rather than as a reference to Heaven as a place. The 'heavenly things' (Jn 3<sup>12</sup>) are without doubt the things of God, the new revelation of His grace in Jesus Christ.

In what has been said above there is little that is distinctively Christian. The threefold use of the word 'Heaven' is common alike to the OT and Jewish thought of the time. But after this preliminary study we ought to be in a better position to consider the characteristic teaching of Jesus and the Christian faith.

4. The Kingdom of God finds its perfect realization in a future state, a world above and beyond earth, the Kingdom in Heaven. This is the reiterated lesson alike of parable and of direct discourse. All the judgment parables, where separation between the righteous and the wicked is declared, clearly teach a future inheritance of bliss or of woe. So the parables of the Tares (Mt 13<sup>37-43</sup>), the Virgins (Mt 25<sup>1-13</sup>), the Talents (Mt 25<sup>14-30</sup>), and the Unjust Steward (Lk 16<sup>1-8</sup>), where under the figure of 'eternal tents' the future Canaan is 'the past idealized'. In accommodation to Jewish thought and hope, the reward is 'to sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 8<sup>11</sup>, Lk 13<sup>28</sup>), a hope which reaches beyond the life of earth. The final consummation must be where Jesus Himself is, and He, who came from heaven (Jn 3<sup>12, 31</sup>, 6<sup>38, 38, 41<sup>1</sup></sup>), was 'received up into heaven' (Mk 16<sup>19</sup>, Lk 24<sup>51</sup>, Jn 20<sup>17</sup>). The MS uncertainty here in Mk. and Lk. does not affect the argument, which has the testimony of the Apostolic writings. This is the final reward of the faithful, the inheritance of the Kingdom prepared before the foundation of the world (Mt 25<sup>34</sup> 26<sup>29</sup>, Jn 14<sup>17</sup>).

2. The nature of Heaven.—As the life of the Kingdom is fundamentally ethical (Mt 5<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>21</sup>), so is the nature of Heaven itself. It is the fullness of the eternal life, which in the Fourth Gospel is the synonym of the Kingdom. Then it is, and there, that 'the righteous shine forth as the sun' (Mt 13<sup>43</sup>), a glory certainly of character whatever else may be implied. There, too, is the perfect vision of God (Mt 5<sup>8</sup>).

It cannot be doubted that Jesus meant to localize the thought of Heaven. The sharp contrast between Heaven and earth (Mt 6<sup>19-21</sup>) can have no other meaning. In His teaching God is no mere all-pervading Spirit, lost in negative infinitude. God, as transcendent, immanent, infinite, alone, does not satisfy His revelation of 'the Father in heaven.' That name implies that in some world beyond there is a supreme manifestation of His Presence,—a Father's House, an enduring Holy of Holies. This, for Christian faith, is the Glory of Christ (Jn 17<sup>24</sup>), and to be with Him where He is and to behold His glory is the hope set before us in the gospel (Jn 17<sup>24</sup>).

What the activities of Heaven may be is told only in part. They that are accounted worthy to attain to that world 'are as angels' (Mk 12<sup>29</sup>, Lk 20<sup>36</sup>), and the ministry of angels enters into the Gospel story. The faithful are to be 'set over many things,' and to 'enter into the joy' of their Lord (Mt 23<sup>21-23</sup>), which, in the light of the gospel, can only mean higher service.

As to when this inheritance is entered upon, very different conclusions are drawn even from the words of Jesus. The question is considered, for the most part, from the standpoint of retribution. So far as the reward is considered, it may be said definitely that the doctrine of an Intermediate State finds no support in Christ's gospel. The 'farewell discourses' of the Fourth Gospel would lose all their force by the introduction of this doctrine. So for Christian faith the highest hope of Heaven finds its confident expression in the words of St. Paul: 'absent from the body . . . at home with the Lord' (2 Co 5<sup>8</sup>).

HEAVENLY THINGS.—See EARTHLY AND HEAVENLY.

HEDGE.—This word belongs to the vocabulary of the parables of Jesus. It occurs in that of the Vineyard (Mt 21<sup>33</sup>, Mk 12<sup>1</sup>), and in that of the Great Supper (Lk 14<sup>16</sup>).

1. Literal application.—The hedge is a detail in the outfit of a vineyard, one of many other properties (Mt 21<sup>33</sup>) in such a possession. It is a feature in the landscape of Palestine in the other case ('highways and hedges,' Lk 14<sup>29</sup>). There is a connexion between the uses and the associations of the word. The contour of the land is controlled by the tillage of the soil. Vines need hedges. The word (φραγμός) used for a hedge in the Gospels 'denotes a fence of any kind, whether hedge, or wall, or palings' (Hastings, DB ii. 340*). Another word might rather have called up a stone wall. φραγμός includes all the different kinds of hedges to be found in a country so furrowed with hills and valleys as is Palestine.

2. The parabolaical use of the 'hedge' is rooted in the education of Israel. God made sea and desert a hedge of Palestine. Cf. Ellerton's hymn—

'Praise to our God, whose bounteous hand
Prepared of old our glorious land,
A garden fenced with silver sea.' . . .

He hedged the people. He gave them individuals, institutions, the whole national economy, as hedges to protect their life and to restrain it. Enemies raided the land and broke down the hedges (Ps 79. 80). Patriots and prophets saw and sang their gaps, and did their best to repair the historic institutional hedges. The tragedy of Jesus and the hedges was that He wanted them rooted up, while the chief priests hated the idea of their removal (Mt 21<sup>42</sup>). Through the tragedy gleams the philanthropic import of the hedge (Lk 14<sup>29</sup>). The eye of love sees humanity submerged. 'Them also he would bring.' He would make hedge-row people happy. He had seen their misery as He stole to silent midnight prayer, up the hillsides with their mosaic of fields, along whose hedges and through the gaps of which He passed to pray to the Father in secret. It is humanity's ragged regiment whom He would see housed by the compulsion of 'the love (Lk 14<sup>29</sup>) that will not let them go.'

LITERATURE.—Geikie, Life of Christ, i. ch. 17; Thomson, Land and Book, ch. 14; Philochristus, ch. 1-3 for 'Hedge of the Law'. JOHN K. LEGGIE.

HEIR.—The heir (κληρονόμος) is one who enters on a position of privilege different from that of servants (Mt 21<sup>33</sup>), through no personal exertion of his own, but as the result of filial relationship. This position is a thoroughly right and legal one, and absolutely valid. The thought of succession to a title upon the death of the present holder is not insisted upon. The son is naturally the heir, and the title is one of present privilege as well as the assurance of fuller possession in the future.

Christ, the Son, is the heir of all things (He 1<sup>2</sup>; cf. our Lord's application of the term to Himself in the parable of the Wicked Husbandman, Mt 21<sup>38</sup>). The complete lordship over Creation was given to Adam (Gn 1<sup>26</sup>, Ps 8<sup>9</sup>). The land of Canaan, again, was promised to Abraham and his seed (Gn 13<sup>14-15</sup>). These assurances given to Adam and to Abraham were absolutely fulfilled in Christ, who, as the firstborn of all creation, Himself both the Agent of the Creator's work and summing up in His own Person all created objects (Col 1<sup>16-17</sup>), enjoys an eternal and incorruptible inheritance. 'The heirship of the Son was realised in the Incarnation, and in its essence is independent of the Fall (Westcott on He 1<sup>2</sup>), though conditioned by it as to its circumstances.' It was the sin of man which caused the suffering and humiliation through which Christ, after the work of redemption was complete, won a name which is above every name (Ph 2<sup>9</sup>). He had inherited in the eternal purpose of God (θεοκεν, He 1<sup>2</sup>) a name more excellent than the angels (1<sup>4</sup>).

The title of 'heir,' then, passes on to those who have obtained the blessing of Divine sonship in Baptism or Regeneration, corresponding spiritually to the promise made to Abraham. The Old Covenant (Testament) could not make men perfect, therefore God provided them with more strength, and in place of a worldly inheritance gave them a spiritual and eternal one. This title of heirship may be forfeited, if those who are called to it are not worthy of their inheritance. So Christ speaks in the Apocalypse: 'He that overcometh shall inherit these things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son' (Rev 21<sup>7</sup>). We, then, being made children of God through faith in Christ, are heirs according to the promise made to Abraham, who was accepted through faith in God's word against all appearances. No longer servants, but heirs, we are entitled to the Divine privilege of sonship through adoption. We are called to inherit a blessing as all true servants of God through Baptism.

It remains to be seen who are specially mentioned in the Gospels as heirs to this privilege: (1) 'The meek shall inherit the earth' (Mt 5<sup>5</sup>); (2) Those who have given up houses, lands, earthly relationships, etc., shall receive an hundred-fold and inherit eternal life, Mt 19<sup>29</sup>, Mk 10<sup>27</sup>, Lk 18<sup>18</sup>. (3) The sheep in the parable of the Sheep and the Goats (Mt 25<sup>34</sup>), i.e. those who have shown mercy to the weak and suffering, and whose service has been accepted by Christ as done to Himself, shall inherit the Kingdom prepared for them from the beginning of the world. But, on the other hand, no fornicator or unclean person or covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the Kingdom of God and of Christ (Eph 5<sup>5</sup>). See also INHERITANCE.

HELL.—See ESCHATOLOGY, GEHENNA, and the following article.

HELL (DESCENT INTO).—During the 16th cent. the Descent of Christ into Hades was made the subject of acrimonious debates. Though commentators still differ, they discuss the subject in a more peaceable spirit, and offer some hope of future agreement on the main question. We must review—(1) the evidence of the NT, (2) early Christian tradition, to explain (3) the insertion of such teaching in Creeds and Articles of Religion. We may then (4) summarize the history of the controversy in modern times.

1. The evidence of the NT.—It is important to distinguish between the bare statement of the Descent as a fact in the history of our Lord as the Son of Man, which is acknowledged by all who believe that He truly died, and any theory of His mission in the unseen world, which can claim acceptance only after careful scrutiny of incidental references to it in the NT supported by the independent testimony of the earliest Christian tradition.

Hades (Αἴδης), corresponding to the Heb. Sheol, which in the AV of the OT is rendered by 'hell,' means both in the LXX and in the NT the abode of departed spirits. This was the general meaning of the word 'hell,' the unseen, hidden place which is the abode of the dead.

In the OT a sense of gloom and unreality was felt about the lot of the spirits of men taken away from the light and activity of earthly life. At first no distinction was supposed to exist in that shadowy realm between good and bad any more than between king and subject. But in NT times such ideas had grown up, and our Lord sanctioned current belief when in the parable of Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>) He contrasted happiness in the society of Abraham with misery 'in torments.' This agrees with His promise to the penitent thief (23<sup>43</sup>): 'To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise.' St. Peter in his first sermon (Ac 2<sup>24-25</sup>) quotes Ps 16<sup>10</sup> and explains the words, 'Thou wilt not leave my soul in Hades,' as a prophecy of the Resurrection of Christ, which received no fulfilment in the case of David. He distinctly implies that Christ's soul passed into Hades at His death.

St. Paul (Ro 10<sup>7</sup>), adapting Dt 30<sup>12</sup> teaches the same truth inferring that it is not necessary to search the depth, since Christ is risen from the dead. He regards the Descent as the preparation for the Ascension, Eph 4<sup>9</sup> 'Now this, He ascended, what is it but that he also descended into the lower parts of the earth?' In the LXX rendering of Ps 124<sup>3</sup> (123), this phrase, κατωβιβαται εως γης, is referred to Hades. It is therefore probable that St. Paul uses it in the same sense.* Obedience even unto death secured for the Lord the sovereignty of the underworld; His descent was the pledge of His lordship over it (Ph 2<sup>10</sup>).

The famous passage 1 P 3<sup>18-20</sup> (cf. 4<sup>6</sup>) introduces the question of the object of the Descent: 'Because Christ also suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh, but quickened in the spirit; in which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison, which aforetime were disobedient, when the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing; † For unto this end was the gospel preached even to the dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit.'

The earliest Christian tradition, which was probably independent of this passage, certainly supports the interpretation that Christ preached to the spirits of the men and women who were perished in the Flood. Not until the time of St. Augustine was any other interpretation offered. The Apostle is endeavouring to encourage his readers in Christlike patience under persecution. Christ died, the just for the unjust, but His death in the flesh was followed by quickening in the spirit. Therefore we need not fear death, which will bring us freedom from sin and increase of spiritual energy. The reference which follows (v. 20) to the Ascension suggests that this preaching took place after Christ's death, and not that Christ in Noah preached to the men of Noah's time.

In view of modern interpretations, however, we must enter further into detail. πνευματων in the NT generally refers to angels (Ac 23<sup>5</sup>), but it refers also to spirits of the dead (He 12<sup>23</sup>, cf. Lk 24<sup>37-39</sup>). And 1 P 4<sup>6</sup> proves that this is the sense here.†

Some critics suppose that the preaching was to the fallen angels mentioned in 2 P 2<sup>4</sup>, Jude 6; according to Baur, after Christ's death; according to Spitta, before the Incarnation. This view is regarded by Charles (art. 'Eschatology' in Encyc. Bibl.) as the only possible alternative. But Charles holds that Christ preached a gospel of redemption between His death and His resurrection. Salmond thinks that the key may be found in a non-canonical Jewish book. Others, again, think that Enoch was regarded as an incarnation of the Messiah, and that the passage refers to his preaching. But as Clemens says (Niedergafahren, p. 131), while we hear in the Book of Enoch (12<sup>4</sup>, 13<sup>8</sup>, 14<sup>12</sup>) of a preaching of punishment to fallen angels, we hear nothing of a preaching of salvation to the souls of men.

Perhaps the most extraordinary interpretation of all is that which Clemens quotes from Cramer. An unknown person, in possession of 1 and 2 Pet., is supposed to have been reminded by v. 20 of a former βραχυς of angels, and therefore on the basis of 2 P 2<sup>4</sup> with which he compared Jude 6, 14 and also the Book of Enoch, is supposed to have written in the margin: 'Ενώχ τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύμασι πορεύοις ἐκρήμασε, κ.τ.λ., understanding πνεύμασι of angels and ἐκρήμασε of a concio damnatorum. Some one else at a later time, referring the first word to the souls of the departed and the latter to the preaching of salvation, reading ΕΝΩΧ for ΕΝΩΧ, and this again for ἐν ᾧ καί, took the whole into the text after v. 23!

* Some commentators explain the words as contrasting the earth beneath with the heavens above, and refer them to the Incarnation when Christ descended to the earth.

† The tense of εβραχυθη shows that the preaching was regarded as a completed act in the past.

Such speculations are absurd. On the other hand, it is reasonable to explain the ἐκρήμασε of the one passage by the ἐπαγγέλιον of the other, to maintain that repentance was offered, rejecting the suggestion that Christ preached only to the righteous, or to those who had repented at the moment of death, or to some the gospel and to others damnation.

If it is asked, Why should only the generation of Noah profit by it? we can say that they were typical sinners, cut off in their sins, whose fate was questioned at that time. Bigg shows that 'it is possible that St. Peter is here expressing in a modified form a belief which was current in the Jewish schools.' Certain passages in the Book of Enoch seem to mean that the antediluvian sinners have a time of repentance allowed them between the first judgment (the Deluge) and the final judgment; e.g. 69<sup>ab</sup> 'There was great joy among them because the name of the Son of Man was revealed unto them,' Βερεσθιήκ Ζαβόα: (c) 'But when they that are bound, they that are in Gehinnom, saw the light of the Messiah, they rejoiced to receive Him'; (d) 'This is that which stands written: "We shall rejoice and exult in Thee." When? When the captives climb up out of hell, and the Shekinah at their head.'

We may hope that research will yet further enlighten us on these points. Enough has been said to prove that, in the words of Professor Charles (art. cited):

'These passages in 1 Peter are of extreme value. They attest the achievement of the final stage in the moralization of Sheol. The first step in this moralization was taken early in the 2nd cent. b.c., when it was transferred into a place of moral distinctions, having been originally one of merely social or national distinctions. This moralization, however, was very inadequately carried out. What they were entering Sheol, that they continued to be till the final judgment. From the standpoint of a true theism can we avoid pronouncing this conception mechanical and unethical? It precludes moral change in moral beings who are under the rule of a perfectly moral being.'

2. Early Christian tradition.—The belief that Christ's descent into Hades changed in some way the condition of the faithful departed meets us in the earliest Christian tradition.

Ignatius (A.D. 115), writing to the Magnesians (c. ix.), says: 'Even the prophets, being His disciples, were expecting Him as their teacher through the Spirit. And for this cause He whom they rightly awaited, when He came, raised them from the dead.'

Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho (c. 72) accuses the Jews of cutting out the following passage from Jeremiah: 'The Lord God remembered His dead people of Israel, who lay in the graves, and descended to preach to them His own salvation.'

Irenaeus quotes this passage both from Isaiah (in iii. 22) and from Jeremiah (in iv. 36), and (in iv. 65) without naming the author. It is probably a fragment from some Jewish Apocryphal. Irenaeus (iv. 42) also quotes a presbyter 'who had heard it from those who had seen the Apostles and from those who had been their disciples,' as saying that 'the Lord descended to the underworld, preaching His advent there also, and declaring remission of sins received by those who believe in Him.'

Tertullian (de Anima, c. 55) taught that Christ 'in Hades underwent the law of human death; nor did He ascend to the heights of heaven, until He descended to the lower parts of the earth, that there He might make patriarchs and prophets sharers of His life.'

We may even claim the heretic Marcion as a witness to this widespread tradition, though in his view, according to Irenaeus (l. xxvii. 9), it was Cain and the Sodomites and other sinners who were released by the Lord from Hades.

The apocryphal Gospel of Peter, which may be dated possibly from about A.D. 165, contains the following passage: 'They see these men coming forth from the tomb, two of them supporting the other, and a cross following them; and the head of the two reached to heaven; but that of Him who was led by them overpassed the heavens. And they heard a voice from the heavens saying, Hast thou preached to them that sleep? and a response was heard from the cross, Yea.'

The apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, a name given in the 15th cent. to two much older books, the Acts of Pilate and the Descent into Hell, tells the same story of the two brothers with a considerable amount of dramatic power.

Clement of Alexandria is the first Christian writer who brings the passage in 1 Peter into connexion with the tradition that Christ's Descent benefited OT saints. He taught that the heathen, as well as the Jews, shared in the revelation made to the souls in Hades. He quotes Hermas (Sim. ix. 16), who taught that the Apostles and first teachers of the gospel, when they entered into rest, preached to the souls in Hades. Clement (Strom. ii. 9, p. 452) explains the passage as including righteous heathens as well as Jews, though it is not clear that Hermas himself contemplated such an application of his words. The example quoted by St. Peter appeared to him to be only one example of a far-reaching law (Strom. vi. 6).

Origen seems to have been the first to suggest that, since the coming of Christ, the souls of the faithful can go at once to Paradise instead of Hades, regarding Paradise as an intermediate state (in Exp. Hom. 2). In his treatise against Celsus (ii. 43), to the scoff, 'You will not surely say that Christ, when He failed to persuade the living, went down to Hades to persuade those who dwell there?' he replies: 'His soul, stripped of the body, did there hold converse with other souls that were in like manner stripped, that He might there convert those who were capable of instruction, or were otherwise in ways known to Him fit for it.'

Athanasius speaks of the warders at the gates of Hell 'covering in fear at the presence of the Lord,' quoting in this connection Mt. 27<sup>54</sup>. He thinks (de Stat. Advers. 9) of the soul of Adam as held fast under the sentence of death, and crying to his Lord evermore, and of those who had pleased God, and had been justified by the law of nature, as mourning and crying with him, till God in His mercy revealed the mystery of redemption. He quotes 1 P. 3<sup>19</sup> in connexion with the Descent (Ep. ad Episc. 5).

The later Fathers, while they regarded Hades as a place of rest for the just, regarded Paradise as something better. Both Ambrose (de Fide ad Gratian. iv. 1) and Jerome (Com. in Eccles. c. iii.) followed Origen on this line of thought. This notion became the germ of the medieval doctrine of the Limbus Patrum.

Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. iv.) classed the doctrine of the Descent among the ten necessary dogmas, interpreting it as designed for the redemption of the just. 'Could you wish,' he asks, 'that the living should enjoy His grace, and that the holy dead should not share in freedom?' Having named OT saints, he explains John the Baptist's question 'Art thou he that should come?' as referring to the Descent. In this opinion he was followed by Rufinus.

Hilary of Poitiers (on Ps 118<sup>65</sup>) speaks of the souls of the faithful as knowing, on the witness of the Apostle Peter, that when the Lord went down into Hades, words of comfort were preached even to those who were in prison and were formerly unbelieving in the days of Noah. It is interesting to add that the Venerable Bede quoted the words, without naming the author, in order to condemn them, on the ground that the Catholic faith taught only the release of the faithful.

It was reserved for Augustine to give a new interpretation to St. Peter's words. In his earlier books he accepts the current teaching, but confuses Hades and Gehenna. In de Gen. ad litt. xii. 63, he says that there is reason for believing that the soul of Christ descended to the regions where sinners are punished, that He might release from torment those whom He, in His righteous judgment, which is hidden from us, found worthy to be loosed.

In his letter to Eudius, Bp. of Uzala, on the right interpretation of 1 P. 3<sup>19</sup>, as Bp. Horsley puts it, 'he perplexes himself with questions.' Why, out of all the tens of thousands who had died before the coming of Christ, some at least, though heathen, penitent and believing, did He bestow the knowledge of the gospel on those only who had perished in the Flood? He accepts the common belief that Adam was released. He notes that some believed this of Abel, Seth, Noah, and other patriarchs. Still confusing Hades with Gehenna, he asks, How could Abraham's bones be a synonym for Paradise? Were the patriarchs worse off than Abraham? If they were at rest, how could they be benefited by Christ's descent into Hades? What was done for the disobedient of Noah's time should be done for all who died in ignorance before or since. But the idea that a man might believe after death would weaken the appeal of Christian preaching to the 'terrors of the Lord.' Not able to believe in salvation without Baptism, he cuts the knot of the difficulty by denying that the words of St. Peter had anything to do with the descent of Christ into Hades. Christ preached in spirit in the days of Noah as in Galilee in the days of His flesh. Flumpert truly says: 'he leaves all the questions which He had started as to the descent itself unanswered.' Finally (de Herz. 73), he reckoned it a heresy to believe that Christ cleared Hell of all the souls that were there in former times.

3. Creeds and Articles of Religion.—At the end of the 4th cent., Rufinus, commenting on the clause 'descended into hell' in the Creed of his native city of Aquileia, noted that it was not contained in the Creed of the Church of Rome or in Eastern Creeds. This is true of Baptismal Creeds, but not of others. The words had found a place in three confessions of faith put forward by Arian Synods at Sirmium, Nice, and Constantinople.

Sirmium, A.D. 359.	Nice, A.D. 359.	Constantinople, A.D. 380.
καὶ εἰς τὰ καταχθόνια κατεβήντα, καὶ τὴν ἐκείσε ἀποκαύσαντα ἐν πυλῶνι Ἰδοῦ ἰδόντι ἱερῶν.	καὶ ταβήντα καὶ εἰς τὰ καταχθόνια κατεβήντα ἐν πυλῶνι ἰδοῦ ἰδόντι ἱερῶν.	καὶ ταβήντα καὶ εἰς τὰ καταχθόνια κατεβήντα ἐν πυλῶνι καὶ αὐτοῖς ἰδοῦ ἰδόντι ἱερῶν.

It is interesting to compare also the recently discovered 'Faith of St. Jerome,' which contains the words 'descended into hell, trod down the sting of death.' It has been found by Dom G. Morin, O.S.B., in some four MSS, and is probably the Confession of Faith which Jerome notes in one of the letters he had drawn up for Cyril of Jerusalem. This 'Faith' contains elements which may have been drawn from his Baptismal Creed of Pannonia. In like manner it is possible that the Sirmium Creed, quoted above, at this point quoted the Baptismal Creed of the district, since Sirmium is in the south-east corner of Pannonia. But it seems that the Creed was drawn up mainly by Mark, Bp. of Arethusa in Palestine; and there are traces of the influence of Cyril of Jerusalem elsewhere in this document. The doctrine was one on which he felt strongly; and, therefore, in default of further evidence as to the Pannonian Creed, it is safer to trace to his influence the occurrence of the words in the Creed of Sirmium, on which the Creeds of Nice and Constantinople are dependent.

As regards the interpretation put on the clause in the Creed of Aquileia, Pearson is incorrect when he suggests that Rufinus merely regarded it as equivalent to 'buried,' which was omitted. The Creed certainly contained the word 'buried,' and Rufinus was at pains to show that this word in the Eastern Creeds, as in the Roman, included the idea of a descent into Hades. Swete (p. 61) suggests that Rufinus had lost the clue to the interpretation of the clause, and that the addition was made long before his time, possibly to meet the Docetic tendency of the latter part of the 2nd century. The difficulty about this suggestion is that the Docetic apocryphal Gospel of Peter, as we have seen, distinctly teaches belief in the descent. The present writer would rather regard pseudo-Peter as witnessing to the common belief of the 2nd cent., and explain the addition in the Aquileian Creed as derived from the ordinary catechetical teaching, of which it may have been as 'necessary a dogma' then in Aquileia as in Jerusalem in the 4th century.

In the time of Rufinus it might seem more necessary to insist on such teaching in view of the rise of the heresy of Apollinaris, who denied that the Lord had a human soul. But Rufinus himself gives no hint of this. There is more reason to connect the occurrence of the clause in the so-called Athanasian Creed, now generally accepted as a Gallican writing of the 6th cent., with opposition to Apollinarianism, because the author obviously had that heresy in view. There is no proof, however, that the clause had yet passed into any Gallican Creed. By the end of the century we find it in the Creed of Caesarius of Arles, and in the century following in the Creeds of Venantius Fortunatus of Poitiers and of the Spanish Bishop Martin of Bracara. Thus it passed into the Received Text of the Western Creed.

During the Middle Ages the idea of the 'Harrowing of Hell' was made popular by the Gospel of Nicodemus, and as the theme of Mystery Plays, and at a later time by Christian Art. Discussion seldom arose. But the opinion of Abelard that the soul of Christ entered the underworld only virtually and not substantially, was condemned by the Council of Sens (1140) and Pope Innocent II. It found favour with Durandus and Pico della Mirandola, whose names may suffice to show that the debate was not extinct in the 15th century. During the Reformation period, controversy began to wax fierce, and was reflected in some of the more famous Articles of Religion. In the Confession of Augsburg the bare fact of the Descent is stated, but the Geneva Catechism taught that the Descent meant only the terrible anguish with which the soul of Christ was tried. The Catechism of the Church of the Palatinate explained that Christ descended in order that the Christian in all his mental and spiritual agonies might know that there was One who had borne them and could sympathize with them. These Catechisms reflect the opinion of prominent leaders of thought. Luther, in his Table Talk (ccvi.), spoke of the laying of the devil in chains as the purpose of the Descent. His view fluctuated, but in his Com. on Hos 6th he wrote that Peter clearly teaches that Christ preached to some who, in the time of Noah, had not believed, and who waited for the long-suffering of God—that is, who hoped that God would not enter into so strict a judgment with all flesh—to the intent that they might acknowledge that their sins were forgiven through the sacrifice of Christ.

It was Calvin (Institut. ii. 16) who taught the revolting doctrine that the Descent means that in His suffering on earth, in Gethsemane and on the Cross, Christ suffered all the horrors of hell. To which Pearson's words are a sufficient reply: 'There is a worm that never dieth which could not lodge within His breast; that is, a remorse of conscience, seated in the soul, for what that soul hath done; but such a remorse of conscience could not be in Christ.' Zwingli (Prælii chr. exp., art. 'de Christo,' 7) taught that when Christ died the weight of His Redemption penetrated to the Underworld. The Westminster Standards practically ignore the question of the Descent. The Confession of Faith is wholly silent, and so is the Shorter Catechism. The only allusion to the subject is in the Larger Catechism, where the answer to Question 50 runs: 'Christ's humiliation after His death consisted in His being buried, and continuing in the state of the dead, and under the power of death till the third day; which hath been otherwise expressed in these words, He descended into hell.'

Bishop Alley of Exeter, in a paper drawn up for the Convocation of 1555 wrote: 'There have been in my diocese great inventions between the preachers.' He asked that some certainty might be set concerning this doctrine. Perhaps this explains the form which was given to the third of the Forty-two Articles of 1553.

'As Christ died and was buried for us: so also it is to be believed that He went down into hell. For the body lay in the sepulchre until the resurrection: but His ghost departing from Him was with the ghosts: i. e. were in prison or in hell, and did preach to the same, as the place of St. Peter doth testify.'

Bishop Alley's 'hope of certainty' was not fulfilled, and in 1563 the Elizabethan revisers, with rare wisdom, struck out the last clause.

The Roman Catechism* speaks of the release of holy and just men as the purpose of the Descent, of the imparting of the fruit of the Passion, and of the Beatific Vision.

4. Summary of the controversy in modern times.—We may begin this section with the names of Pearson and Hammond, who agreed in teaching that the only meaning of St. Peter's words was that Christ by His Holy Spirit inspired the preaching of Noah.

Hammond (ad loc.) writes: 'The spirits in the prison are those souls of men that lay so sheathed, so useless and unprofitable in their bodies, im-' mersed so deep in calamity as not to perform any service to God, who inspired and placed them there.' He quotes Is 42<sup>d</sup> 49<sup>o</sup> 61<sup>l</sup> to prove that elsewhere it is 'a figurative speech to express wicked men.' 'By His Spirit is evidently meant that Divine power by which He was raised from the dead after His crucifixion.' We have already noted the objections to this interpretation, and also the fact that Pearson on this point confuses Hades and Gehenna. He writes, indeed, 'less lucidly than is his wont,' but in regard of the Descent regarded as a fact his final summary strikes no uncertain note.

'I give a full and undoubting assent unto this as to a certain truth, that when all the sufferings of Christ were finished on the Cross, and His soul was separated from His body, though His body were dead, yet His soul died not; and though it did not, yet it underwent the condition of the souls of such as die; and being (i. e. since) He died in the similitude of a sinner, His soul went to the place where the souls of men are kept who die for their sins, and so did wholly undergo the law of death.'

Barrow taught to the same effect (Serm. xxviii.): 'If we do thus interpret our Saviour's descent into hell, for His soul's going into the common receptacle and mansion of souls, we shall so doing be sure not substantially to mistake.' He adds: 'I cannot well be at the pain to consider or examine their conceits, which pretend to acquaint us why and to what effect our Saviour descended into hell.' This almost contemptuous refusal to discuss the passages in St. Peter is partly explained by the gaps in the line of evidence of early Christian tradition which was known at that time. Coming from a man of Barrow's calibre, it has probably had great weight.

On the other hand, Jeremy Taylor,* while he avoids any explanation of St. Peter's reference to the Deluge, maintains the Patristic view that Christ improved the condition of holy souls.

*And then it was that Christ made their condition better: for though still it be a place of relation in order to something beyond it, yet the term and object of their hope is changed; but when He that was promised came, He "preached to the spirits in prison," He communicated to them the mysteries of the gospel, the secrets of the kingdom, the things hid from eternal ages, and taught them to look up to the glories purchased by His passion, and made the term of their expectation be His second coming, and the objects of their hope the glories of the beatific vision. . . . But now it was that in the dark and undecorated mansions there was a scene of the greatest joy and the greatest horror represented, which yet was known since the first falling of the morning stars. Those holy souls, whom the prophet Zechariah calls "prisoners of hope," lying in certain showers and gracious visitations from God and illuminations of their hope; now that they saw their Redeemer come to change their condition, and to improve it into the neighbourhood of glory and clearer revelations, must needs have the joy of intelligent and beatified understandings, of redeemed captives, of men forgiven after the sentence of death, of men satisfied after a tedious expectation, enjoying and seeing their Lord, whom, for so many ages, they had expected. But the accursed spirits, seeing the darkness of their prison shine with a new light, and their empire invaded, and their retirements of horror discovered, wondered how a man durst venture thither, or, if he were a God, how he should come to die.'

Bishop Horsley's sermon on 1 P 3<sup>o</sup> at the end of the 18th cent. is the next important contribution to the subject. He regretted the alteration of the Third Article of 1563. He found it difficult to believe that 'of the millions who died in the Flood all died impenitent.' He taught that Christ 'certainly preached neither repentance nor faith, for the preaching of either comes too late for the departed soul.' He faced the great difficulty why only this one class of penitents should be mentioned, having 'observed in some parts of Scripture an anxiety, if the expression may be allowed, of the sacred writers to convey distinct intimations that the antediluvian race is not uninterested in the redemption and the final retribution.' The following words also deserve quotation, for they go to the root of the matter. 'If the clear assertions of Holy Writ are to be discredited on account of difficulties which may seem to the human mind to arise out of them, little will remain to be believed in revealed or even in what is called natural religion.'

About the same time, Dr. Hey, Norrisian Professor at Cambridge, gave in his lectures a succinct account of the history of the doctrine, and discussed the difficulty of using the metaphor of descent in popular language (3rd ed. p. 654).

There is an excellent survey of the literature of the subject down to the middle of the last century in Dean Alford's Greek Testament. Both he and Bishop Wordsworth accepted the Patristic view that Christ preached salvation to the disembodied spirits of those drowned in the Flood if found penitent. Thus light is thrown on 'one of the darkest enigmas of Divine justice.' Bishop Harold Browne expounded the Article to the same effect, and has been followed recently by Bishop Gibson. But not all writers were equally bold. Bishop Harvey Goodwin was content with what was practically Pearson's position. Bishop Westcott (Historic Faith, p. 77) feared to say more on 'a mystery where our thought fails us and Scripture is silent.' Surely this is too dogmatic in face of the great consensus of opinion which interprets 1 P 3<sup>o</sup> literally.

There is a full account of modern German literature on this subject in Clemen's Niedergefahren zu den Toten. He interprets 1 P 3<sup>o</sup> as referring to human spirits, and builds on it an argument in favour of 'the larger hope,' though he does not commit himself to any theory of Universal Restitution. He makes much use of English books, especially Dean Plumptre's The Spirits in Prison.

This survey of the whole course of the controversy leads to the conclusion that eventually agreement will be reached as to the exegesis of the passage in 1 Peter. The weighty authority of Professor Charles may be invoked to prove that the interpretation which accepts Christ's mission to the dead fits in with our fuller knowledge of contemporary Jewish literature. It throws light on one of the darkest enigmas of the Divine justice. At the same time full justice will be done to the early Christian tradition that in some way or other Christ benefited the souls of the faithful departed. But it must be admitted that the bare statement of the Apostles' Creed asserts only that Christ's soul passed into the condition which our souls will enter at death, sanctifying every condition of human existence. Harnack writes that 'the clause is too weak to maintain its ground beside the others, as equally independent and authoritative,' but, as Swete (p. 62) says, he fails to point out in what the weakness lies, while 'to us it appears to possess in a very high degree the strength which comes from primitive simplicity and a wise reserve.'

Thus the consensus of theological opinion justifies the teaching of the poet of the Christian Year: *

'Sleep'st Thou indeed? or is Thy spirit fled
At large among the dead?
Whether in Eden lowers Thy welcome voice
Wake Abraham to rejoice,
Or in some drearier scene Thine eye controls
The thronging band of souls;

That, as Thy blood won earth, Thine agony
Might set the shadowy world from sin and sorrow free.'

HEM OF GARMENT.—This is the AV translation of ἡμάριον in Mt 9<sup>20</sup> 14<sup>36</sup> (of touching the hem of Jesus' garment with a view to healing). In these places, as on its occurrence elsewhere (Mt 23<sup>8</sup>, Mk 6<sup>56</sup>, Lk 8<sup>44</sup>), RV adopts the rendering 'border.' See art. BORDER.

HEN.—See ANIMALS, p. 64<sup>a</sup>.

HERB.—In modern botanical science, 'herb' is a well-defined term, and is applied to plants whose stem dies down annually. In the Bible it is used in a popular sense, being employed to translate several Hebrew and Greek words of varying significance. In the NT it is (except in He 6<sup>1</sup>, where the original has βοτάνη) the rendering of λάχανα (Mt 13<sup>25</sup>, Mk 4<sup>2</sup>, Ro 14<sup>14</sup>) or λάχανον (Lk 11<sup>42</sup>), which denotes garden-herbs or vegetables. Many of these, such as lettuce, parsley, mint, etc., are in constant use to the present day. Delitzsch (Heb. NT) renders this word by πῦ, which means 'green herbs' (cf. Dt 11<sup>16</sup>, Pr 15<sup>17</sup>). The other term, βοτάνη, means 'pasture,' but is evidently used (l.c.) of herbage in general, including cereals. Delitzsch's translation is πῦ, ἔσθη, which has the same significance.

HERMON.—A mountain on the north-eastern border of Palestine, the culminating point of the range of Anti-Lebanon, rising to an elevation of 9200 ft. above the sea. Its dome-like summit, usually covered with snow till late in summer, can be seen from almost every part of Palestine. Jesus in His youth must have often seen it from the hill west of Nazareth, and, during His ministry, from the Sea of Galilee. It is not mentioned by name in the Gospels, but is generally believed to be the 'high mountain' of Mt 17<sup>1</sup>, Mk 9<sup>9</sup>, and the 'mountain' of Lk 9<sup>38</sup> where the Transfiguration took place. This was probably not on the summit, which could be reached only by long and hard climbing, but on one of the elevated platforms on the southern slope. That Hermon, rather than Tabor (on which there was then a fortified city), is the 'high mountain' referred to, seems clear from the fact that the conversation (Mt 16<sup>21-28</sup>) which preceded the Transfiguration by six days was closely connected with Peter's confession; and this occurred at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16<sup>13-28</sup>), which stood just at the base of Hermon by the springs of Jordan. See also art. TRANSFIGURATION.

LITERATURE.—For description of Hermon, see Robinson, ERP iii. 344, 357; Stewart, Land of Israel, 298-301; Conder, Tent-Work, ch. viii.; SFP ('Jerusalem' Volume, Appendix, and Volume of Special Papers).

HEROD (Ἡρώδης).—The rise of the Herodian dynasty* to the throne of the Hasmonæan priest-kings, begun by Antipater the Idumæan, and realized by his second son, Herod the Great,† was closely connected with the ascendancy of Roman power in Palestine. Antipas or Antipater, the grandfather of Herod, had indeed been appointed governor of Idumæa by Alexander Jannæus (Ant. xiv. i. 3), but it was not until after the death of Alexandra (B.C. 67) that Antipater, who had succeeded his father Antipas in Idumæa, found opportunity to advance his interests in the dissensions between Hyrcanus, the legal but weak heir to the throne in Jerusalem, and the younger but more vigorous Aristobulus. Allying himself with Hyrcanus, Antipater secured the aid of the Arabian king Aretas to establish his candidate in the government. Thereupon appeals were made by Hyrcanus and Aristobulus to the Roman general Scourus, who had been sent by Pompey to Damascus. The Roman power, thus appealed to, at first favoured Aristobulus, but eventually, after Pompey had taken Jerusalem in B.C. 63, made Hyrcanus high priest (Ant. xiv. iv. 4; BJ i. vii. 6), and committed the administration to Scourus, who in turn was succeeded by Gabinus. Antipater, however, proved himself useful to the Romans, both in the government and in their military operations against the Arabs, and also against the Hasmonæans, Aristobulus and his sons Alexander and Antigonus. He thus acquired considerable political influence (Ant. xiv. vi. 4, viii. 1; BJ i. viii. 7; cf. Schürer, GJP i. 343, n. 14). After the battle of Pharsalus (B.C. 48) and the death of Pompey, Caesar confirmed Hyrcanus in the high priesthood, and made him ethnarch. Upon Antipater he conferred Roman citizenship and constituted him procurator of Judæa (Ant. xiv. viii. 3, 5, ἐπίτροπος in the sense of ἐπιμελητής; cf. Wellhausen, IJG 316, n. 2). Soon afterwards (B.C. 47) Antipater appointed his eldest son Phasael governor of Jerusalem, and committed the administration of Galilee to his second son Herod, a young man about twenty-five years of age (Ant. xiv. ix. 2; the transmitted text reads νέωτε καὶ βέτα, but is conjecturally emended by Dindorf and Bekker to read νέωτε καὶ ἐκκοῖ; cf. Schürer, i. 348, n. 30; Grätz, Hist. 77, reads 'twenty'). The present article is concerned only with the Herods of the Gospels.

1. Herod the Great.—Among the first acts of Herod's administration of Galilee was the suppression of a band of robbers* that harassed his country and parts of Syria (Ant. xiv. ix. 2; BJ i. x. 5). These he captured, and their captain, a certain Hezekias, he slew, along with many of the robbers, —revealing in the energy with which he suppressed disorders a trait of character that even at this time attracted the attention of the Roman governor of Syria, Sextus Cæsar, and that subsequently made him an acceptable ally of the Romans. This act, however, brought Herod under the suspicion of the leaders at Jerusalem, who persuaded Hyrcanus that Herod should be summoned before the Sanhedrin for trial for violation of the national law in putting Hezekias to death without trial. Herod obeyed the summons, but took care to have a sufficient bodyguard to accompany him. At first the members of the Sanhedrin were overawed by such a show of force. They were recalled to a proper sense of their duty by the courageous words of scornful rebuke spoken by Sameas the Pharisee (Ant. xiv. ix. 4; BJ i. x. 5).† When the Sanhedrin was about to condemn Herod, Hyrcanus, who had received instructions from Sextus Cæsar to have him acquitted, adjourned the sitting and advised Herod to withdraw from Jerusalem. This he did, returning to Damascus. When he had been appointed governor of Cœle-Syria by Sextus Cæsar, he threatened Jerusalem with an army; but, having so far satisfied his anger, he withdrew, on the advice of his father Antipater and his brother Phasael.

After the murder of Cæsar (15 Mar. B.C. 44), and * Grätz (Hist. 78, less distinctly, 'All true patriots mourned') and Derenbourg (169 ff.) regard these robbers as patriots, the predecessors of the Zealots, Judas the Galilean being the son of Hezekias (Ant. xvii. x. 5; BJ ii. iv. 1; Ac 5<sup>37</sup>). I. Broydé (Jewish Encyc. vi. 366) calls them 'a band of fanatics, who had attacked heathen cities and robbed caravans' (cf. also Wellhausen, 317).

† Cf. Ant. xv. i. 1, where Pollio is said to have made this speech, and Sameas is called his disciple. In Palestinian tradition (cf. Derenbourg, 147 ff.) Sameas is called Simeon ben Shebat, identified by Derenbourg with Schemai, who, with Abtalon (Pollio), was, he thinks, at that time at the head of the Sanhedrin (similarly Grätz, Hist. 79, and I. Broydé, Jewish Encyc. vi. 366; cf. also Schürer, ii. 358 f.).

the poisoning of Antipater (43),—apparently with the knowledge, if not the consent and participation, of Hyrcanus (Ant. XIV. xi. 3, 6; cf. Wellhausen<sup>4</sup>, 319, n. 1, 327, n. 3).—Herod's fortunes reached their lowest ebb. Antony, indeed, while he was in the East, made Herod and Phasael tetrarchs (Ant. XIV. xiii. 1; BJ I. xii. 5); but not long afterwards, Antigonus, with the help of the Parthians, gained possession of Jerusalem, capturing Phasael and Hyrcanus. Phasael killed himself; and Hyrcanus, after his ears had been cut off, was taken by the Parthians to Babylon. Herod, who with his family was in Jerusalem, escaped by night, and, after many difficulties, in the midst of which he was on the point of taking his life, came to the fortress Masada. Here he left his family in charge of his brother Joseph and hastened to Rome. Antigonus, in the meantime, had established himself in Jerusalem, where he reigned for three years (B.C. 40–37) as Matthias, the coins of Antigonus bearing the inscription ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΑΝΤΙΓΟΝΟΥ כהן מתתיהו בן נתניאל (cf. Madden, Coins, 99 ff.).

In Rome, Herod had little difficulty, with the aid of Antony and the concurrence of Octavius, in convincing the Senate that they would be serving their own interests by making him king of Judaea instead of Antigonus, who had been placed on the throne by the Parthians (Ant. XIV. xiv. 4; BJ I. xiv. 4). Appointed king by a decree of the Senate (B.C. 40), Herod now had before him the difficult task of conquering his kingdom. He returned to Palestine, raised an army, subdued Joppa, relieved Masada, and was eager to invest Jerusalem. The assistance of the Roman forces under Ventidius and Silo was far from effective; Galilee had to be conquered; it was not until the spring of 37 B.C. that the siege of Jerusalem could be seriously begun. It was during this siege that Herod, having put away his wife Doris and her son Antipater, celebrated in Samaria his marriage with Mariamne,* daughter of Alexander (son of Aristobulus) and Alexandra (daughter of Hyrcanus) (Ant. XIV. xv. 14; BJ I. xvii. 8; cf. Ant. XIV. xii. 1; BJ I. xii. 3).

Three months after the siege began, Jerusalem fell (Ant. XIV. xvi. 4; BJ I. xviii. 2; cf. Sieffert, PRE<sup>3</sup> vii. 762, l. 24 ff.). The city was saved from plunder and desecration only by a plentiful use of money on Herod's part. Antigonus surrendered himself to the Romans (Ant. XIV. xvi. 2; BJ I. xviii. 2), and at Herod's urgent request was beheaded in Antioch (Ant. XIV. xvi. 4; BJ I. xviii. 3). Herod also had forty-five members of the Sanhedrin slain, but passed over Pollio and Sameas because during the siege they had advised the city to yield to him (Ant. xv. 1, 2).

Established in his kingdom by force of the Roman arms, and occupying the status of a rex socius, Herod fully understood that his continuance in power was dependent on the good-will of Rome and her rulers. Hence, throughout his reign of thirty-four years, he did not fail to cultivate in every possible way friendly relations with his overlords. His government, however, though not without some following among the people, never obtained the cordial support or willing consent of the great majority of its subjects. At the beginning of his reign he treated the Sadduceean aristocracy with severity, made the high priesthood subject to his own appointment, and deprived the Sanhedrin of all political influence. The Essenes and many of the Pharisees refused to

The spelling Μαριαμνῆ is given as a variant by Niese in Ant. xv. § 207, but in BJ I. § 433 Μαριαμνῆ. take the oath of allegiance to him or to the Roman emperor. The incipient Zealots or patriotic nationalists, whether gathered in the robber bands of Galilee or cherishing more quietly the old Hasmonean ideals, were his natural and determined enemies. Herod, moreover, had no natural claims to his throne. Of Idumean descent, he was in the eyes of his subjects but half-Jew (Ant. XIV. xv. 2), and had to endure, not only from his enemies but within the circle of his own family, taunts upon his low origin. Careful though he was not to offend the religious prejudices of the people in some respects,—for Herod was wiser and more cautious than Antiochus Epiphanes,—his whole reign breathed the spirit of Hellenism and pagan secularization so offensive to the Jews. Even his self-denying and efficient provision for the country when visited by famine, or his remission in part of a burdensome taxation, or his magnificent restoration of the Temple, called forth only momentary gratitude in the hearts of the people. Successful at Rome, unsuccessful in Jerusalem, Herod greatly increased the material interests of his country, and by the favour of Rome enlarged its borders. But while he rebuilt the Temple and dedicated it with great splendour and large sacrifices—boasting that he had done what the Hasmonaeans were not able to accomplish—he placed above the Temple gate a golden eagle in honour of the Romans, built a theatre, amphitheatre, and hippodrome in or near Jerusalem for Greek plays and heathen games, and in other places erected temples for the cult of the emperor Augustus. He built or restored many cities and fortresses throughout his territory, and constructed a splendid harbour (Sebastus) at Strato's Tower, which he enlarged and called Caesarea. He colonized restless Trachonitis with Jewish warriors from Babylon, and extended his munificence far beyond the bounds of his own country, to Syria, Asia Minor, Rhodes, Greece, and Macedonia. Antony, Cleopatra, Agrippa, and Augustus were entertained by him with royal honours, and in his will he made handsome bequests to his friends of the imperial household in Rome.

It is customary to divide the reign of Herod into three periods. The first extends from his accession in B.C. 37 to the death of the sons of Babas in B.C. 25, when the last male representatives of the Hasmonean family were removed from his pathway. This period was characterized by the establishment and extension of Herod's power. The principal forces that he had to combat came from the royal family he had supplanted and to which he was allied by marriage. Alexandra, the mother of Mariamne, knew how to enlist the interest of Cleopatra, and Cleopatra had the ear of Antony. The measures adopted by Herod to meet the situation were not of the gentlest kind. He recalled Hyrcanus from Babylon, and though he treated him with every consideration, Josephus attributes to Herod the motive of wishing to get Hyrcanus in his power.* In view of the fact that Hyrcanus could not be appointed to the high priesthood, and that Aristobulus, the brother of Mariamne, was only about seventeen years of age, Herod made Ananel, a Babylonian Jew of priestly family, high priest. This did not please Alexandra, and she appealed to Cleopatra on behalf of her son. Thereupon Herod deposed Ananel and appointed Aristobulus in his stead. But the popularity of the young Hasmonean aroused Herod's suspicion, and Aristobulus was crowned soon after the feast of Tabernacles (Hist. of NT Times, 115, n. 1) rejects Josephus' account of Herod's motive (cf. also Schürer, I, 378; Wellhausen<sup>4</sup>, 324; and Woodhouse, Encyc. Bibl., II, 2206, n. 4). On the other hand, cf. Sieffert, PRE<sup>3</sup> vii. 762, l. 43 ff., and the indications given above that Hyrcanus was implicated in the death of Antipater.

nacles in the year B.C. 35. At the instance of Cleopatra, who learned of the event from Alexandra, Herod was summoned before Antony to give an account of the death of Aristobulus. Before answering the summons, Herod gave instructions to his uncle Joseph, in whose hands he left the government, that Mariamne should be put to death in the event of an unfavourable issue of his mission. Herod regained the favour of Antony, but had eventually to surrender to Cleopatra one of the most fruitful parts of his territory, the famous palm- and balsam-growing country about Jericho, together with the coast cities from the river Eleutherus to Egypt, with the exception of Tyre and Sidon. On his return from the conference with Antony at Laodicea (Syrian), Herod learned through his sister Salome, the evil genius of his family troubles, that Joseph had revealed his command to Mariamne. Joseph was put to death, but a fruitful soil for suspicion against Mariamne remained. When Cleopatra, who had accompanied Antony on his expedition to Armenia, returned through Judaea, Herod entertained her; and, although he successfully withstood her charms, he was compelled to rent from her the territory about Jericho, and to guarantee similar payments due to her from the king of Arabia. The debt thus contracted proved to be a bad one, for the king of Arabia was slow in meeting his financial obligations. Hence, when war broke out between Antony and Octavius, and Herod was desirous of giving aid to Antony, Cleopatra, never doubting that Antony would be victor, thwarted Herod's purpose and sent him instead against the Arabians, in the hope that the two kings would destroy one another. Herod at first defeated the Arabians, but finally suffered a severe reverse, through the treacherous intervention of Cleopatra's general Athenio. About this time an earthquake brought great suffering on the people, and Herod's soldiers were discouraged. The Jewish ambassadors sent to the Arabians had been slain, and Herod's condition seemed desperate. His own courage, however, inspired his troops, and a decisive victory was gained over the enemy.

But Herod had scarcely re-established his power when news of the battle of Actium (2nd Sept. B.C. 31) brought him face to face with the crisis of his reign. Before going to Octavius to learn his fate, Herod had the aged Hyrcanus put to death for plotting with the Arabian governor Malchus to escape from Jerusalem.* Placing the government in charge of his brother Pheroras, and leaving his mother and sister at Masada, but Mariamne and Alexandra at Alexandrinum in care of Sohemus, with instructions that Mariamne and her mother should be killed if disaster overtook him,† Herod went to meet Octavius in Rhodes. He appeared before the emperor in royal apparel, laying aside only his diadem. His appeal for favour was based on a frank avowal of his friendship for Antony, and of his desire to aid him at Actium. But Antony had refused to take his advice about Cleopatra, and had fallen. He now offered Octavius the same loyalty and support that he had given Antony. Moreover, Herod had already had opportunity of proving his loyalty to his new master by preventing * Josephus (Ant. xv. vi. 1), consistently with his account of Herod's motive in recalling Hyrcanus from Babylon, intimates that Herod sought an occasion of removing Hyrcanus. Schürer (l. 384) questions Josephus' account of the treasonable letter, on the ground that such an action would be unlikely in a man of Hyrcanus' age. He accepts the account of Herod's motive in this instance, however, regarding it as a more probable and a sufficient explanation of Hyrcanus' death (cf. also Mathews, 120, n. 8. On the participation of the Sanhedrin, cf. Ant. xv. xvi. 2, and Wellhausen, 227, n. 1).

† On the historicity of the two incidents related in Ant. xv. iii. 5-6, 9; BJ i. xxii. 4, 5; Ant. xv. vi. 5, vii. 1-6, cf. Schürer, l. 285, n. 51; Mathews, 120, n. 4.

Antony's gladiators from passing through his territory to join Antony in Egypt. At the close of the interview Octavius restored Herod's diadem, and confirmed him in his kingdom. In a short time Octavius even enlarged Herod's kingdom, restoring the territory taken from it by Antony for Cleopatra, and a number of cities, such as Gadara, Hippos, Samaria, Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa, and Strato's Tower. This was done in recognition of Herod's aid to the imperial army as it passed into Egypt.

When Herod returned from Rhodes, his old suspicions against Mariamne were aroused by discovering that Sohemus had repeated the folly of Joseph. Sohemus was executed, and soon afterwards Mariamne was tried on the charge of attempting to poison Herod, and put to death about the year B.C. 29. But Herod had loved her with a wild passion. After her death his remorse and an uncontrollable yearning for her (which Byron has finely expressed in one of his Hebrew Melodies) quickly brought him to the verge of insanity (cf. also Stephen Phillips, Herod). At length, when he fell sick in Samaria, Alexandra sought to gain possession of the fortresses in Jerusalem. But Herod, rousing himself from his stupor, had her put to death (B.C. 28). Costobar also and the sons of Babas were put to death on the evidence of Salome, who revealed the hiding-place of these men of Hasmonean descent, and partizanship, and the part played by her husband in their protection (B.C. 25). Herod was now well established on his throne, in favour with Augustus, and triumphant over his enemies.

The second period of Herod's reign, extending from B.C. 25 to B.C. 13, was characterized by extension of his kingdom and great building operations. Trachonitis, Batanaea, and Auranitis were given to him by Augustus about B.C. 23 (Ant. xv. x. 1; BJ i. xx. 4), and to these the tetrarchy of Zenodorus together with the country of Ulatha and Panias was added about three years later (Ant. xv. x. 3; BJ i. xx. 4; Dio Cass. xlv. 9). During this period many cities were built or beautified by Herod, both in his own territory and in surrounding countries. Fortresses were constructed, and temples in honour of Augustus adorned Samaria (Sebaste), Panias (Caesarea Philippi), and Strato's Tower (Caesarea). But the greatest of Herod's works of construction were the harbour at Strato's Tower and the Temple at Jerusalem. The latter, begun about B.C. 19, was partially completed in a year and a half (the inner temple), and the whole brought to a temporary completion in about eight years, when it was formally dedicated, although work was continued on it until the time of Albinus (procurator A.D. 62-64, cf. Ant. xv. xi. 5, 6, xx. ix. 7; Jn 2<sup>29</sup>). Herod also built himself a magnificent palace in Jerusalem. Theatre, amphitheatre, and hippodrome were the scenes of plays and games not only in Caesarea and Jericho, but in Jerusalem. Mercenary troops, aided by spies and strict police regulations, kept the people in subjection. Outlying districts such as Trachonitis were colonized to suppress disturbances. Herod's power was at its height. In his court were men of Greek learning, such as Nicolaus of Damascus and his brother Ptolemy. As a rex socius, Herod had the right to issue copper coinage. His friendship with Rome was firmly established. He interested himself in the Jews of the Dispersion, and helped to secure them their rights in Asia Minor. He also made generous provision from his private means to alleviate the suffering caused by a famine (B.C. 25), and on two occasions remitted part of the people's taxes, one-third in B.C. 20 and one-fourth in B.C. 14. But the glory of his reign and the material splendour of his works were offensive to the religious consciousness of his subjects, and his sporadic acts of unselfishness failed to arouse any permanently cordial response in the people.

* Just what their descent was does not clearly appear from Josephus. They seem to have been related to the Hasmoneans. They were to have been killed when Herod took Jerusalem. But Costobar saved them, and had kept them concealed until Salome, his wife, left him, and made the matter known to Herod.

The last period of Herod's reign, from B.C. 13 to B.C. 4, was one of family intrigue which formed, as Wellhausen aptly puts it, 'a chapter of court history in true Oriental style.' After the death of Mariamne, Herod had married another Mariamne, daughter of a certain Simon, a priest whom Herod had made high priest. He had also other wives, seven in number. His first wife had been recalled to court. His sister Salome and his mother Cypros had already shown some ability in the gentle art of false suggestion. Herod's brother Pheroras, whom he had made tetrarch of Perea and Idumæa, was at hand with his wife. There were present also the two heirs to the throne, Alexander and Aristobulus, sons of Mariamne I., both proud of their Hasmonæan descent, possibly a little haughty in their manner, certainly a little unwise in their confidential conversations; having a grievance in the unjust death of their mother, but no protection against its misuse by their enemies; holding their mother's opinion of Herod's kindred,—an opinion shared by Glaphyra, wife of Aristobulus and daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and fully reciprocated in kind by Salome and Cypros. If to this we add the villainy of a scoundrel like Euryclus, the presence of Antipater, Herod's eldest son, recalled to court for the purpose of checking presumptuous hopes of succession on the part of Alexander and Aristobulus; and, finally, the suspicious nature of Herod, now made more so by age, and the use of an absolute power over the lives of his subjects to extort evidence by torture,—under such conditions as these, 'where many things were done and more were believed and repeated,' intrigue could hardly fail to ripen into tragedy.

Soon after the return of Alexander and Aristobulus from Rome, where they had been educated, they were suspected of plotting vengeance on Herod for their mother's death, and of entertaining premature hopes of succession to the throne. Herod himself preferred charges against them before the Emperor at Aquileia, but Augustus succeeded in effecting a temporary reconciliation. Subsequently Alexander was arrested, but released through the influence of Archelaus. Gradually, however, the meshes of intrigue closed around the Hasmonæan brothers. Permission was obtained from Augustus to bring them to trial, but the Emperor's suggestions about the constitution of the court were not strictly adhered to. Herod himself appeared as a witness against his sons, and the court condemned them by a majority vote, Saturninus and his sons dissenting. They were strangled at Sebaste (Samaria), and buried at Alexandrinum about the year B.C. 7. Finally, on the death of his brother Pheroras, Herod discovered that Antipater, who had gone to Rome bearing the will of his father, which named him as successor to the throne, was himself implicated in a patricidal plot. Thereupon Herod wrote to Antipater, urging with great solicitude and paternal affection his speedy return. On arriving in Jerusalem, Antipater was brought to trial before Varus, Nicolaus of Damascus appearing to prosecute the case for Herod. And when Antipater failed to clear himself, he was cast into prison, while Herod awaited permission from Augustus to put him to death.

Herod was now grown old. His physical constitution, naturally powerful and robust, began to give way. The hot baths of Callirhoë gave little or no relief to his disorders. It soon became known that he was suffering from an incurable disease, and the signs of popular rejoicing only embittered the last hours of his despotic reign. The stirring of his anger, as on a former occasion, seemed to rouse his waning energy. When the disciples of two popular teachers of the Law in Jerusalem, Judas and Matthias, cut down the golden eagle from the gate of the Temple, Herod promptly returned, and had forty-two of the participants, including their teachers, burned to death. His sufferings now became more intense. A bath in warm oil ordered by his physicians almost killed him, and in a fit of despair he even attempted to take his own life. Josephus also reports that he gave orders that at the moment of his death all the principal men of the country, whom he had gathered in the hippodrome at Jericho, should be put to death, in order that the people might have cause to sorrow at his departure. But this order was never carried out (cf. Wellhausen<sup>4</sup>, 345, n. 2). The imprisoned Antipater about this time, thinking that his father was dead, sought to escape; but Herod, learning of it, and having just received authority for his execution from Rome, gave the order for his death. On the fifth day after the death of Antipater, Herod died at Jericho, in March or April of the year B.C. 4, being about seventy years of age, and having reigned thirty-seven years since his appointment by the Roman Senate and thirty-four since the taking of Jerusalem. His body was carried to Herodium, and interred with military honours.

Herod had received from Augustus at Aquileia the right to dispose of his kingdom as he willed, and apparently at that time contemplated abdication in favour of his sons, but was restrained by the Emperor (Ant. xvii. iv. 5). When he returned to Jerusalem, he made public announcement of his intention that the succession should go to Antipater first, and then to Alexander and Aristobulus. Before his death he made three wills. In the first, made about B.C. 6, Antipater was named to succeed to the throne, or, in case of his death, Herod (Philip) the son of Mariamne the high priest's daughter (Ant. xvii. iii. 2; BJ i. xxxix. 2). In the second, made after the treachery of Antipater had been discovered, Antipas was named as his heir (Ant. xvii. vi. 1; BJ i. xxxii. 7). In the third, made shortly before his death, Archelaus was appointed to succeed to Judæa and Samaria, with the title of king; Antipas was given Perea, with the title of tetrarch; and Philip, with a similar title, received Trachonitis, Auranitis, and Batanæa (Ant. xvii. viii. 1; BJ i. xxxiii. 7).

Although Josephus gives a very detailed account of Herod's reign, depending to a far greater extent on Nicolaus of Damascus than his occasional citations would indicate (cf. Schürer<sup>5</sup>, i. 82 ff.), it is not historically probable that he has recorded every incident found in his sources, much less every incident that occurred during this period. For, while his representation has in its main features and even in most of its details the appearance of a faithful and trustworthy narrative, it is not unlikely that he has misunderstood or misrepresented some movements, such as the character of the robbers in Galilee; others he has neglected for some reason, such as the Messianic ideas of the time, and their popular influence witnessed by the Psalms of Solomon and the NT (cf. Mt 2nd; and Mathews, Hist. 126, The Messianic Hope in the NT, 13 ff.). It is possible also that Josephus misrepresented some details of the history through misunderstanding his sources, such, for example, as the day of the fall of Jerusalem, or, again, assigned wrong motives for actions, and even narrated as fact what did not happen. There are some descriptions of different events which reveal striking similarities, and there are some apparent inconsistencies. The narrative in BJ is closely parallel with that in Ant., but in some instances the one contains what the other omits. However highly, therefore, we may estimate the trustworthiness of Josephus as an historian, his silence can be used as an argument against the historicity of an event, otherwise attested, only in case it can be shown that Josephus or his source could not have been in ignorance of the event, and would have had good reason to mention it had it occurred, and no good reason for omitting it if known. But even should this be established, the argument from silence would have only secondary value in confirming a negative judgment, since any judgment in such a case must depend primarily upon the character of the source in which the event is recorded.

Both St. Matthew and St. Luke assign the birth of Jesus to a time shortly before the death of Herod (Mt 2<sup>19</sup>, Lk 1<sup>5</sup> 22, 24). This event, although not mentioned by Josephus, could not have taken place later than the spring of B.C. 4. St. Luke, indeed, brings the event more directly into connexion with the emperor Augustus by mentioning the imperial decree of enrolment, which caused the journey of Joseph and Mary from Nazareth to Bethlehem. St. Matthew, on the other hand, by narrating the visit of the Wise Men from the East (Mt 2<sup>1-12</sup>), gives us a glimpse of Jerusalem and Herod wonderfully true to the historical and psychological probabilities that may be inferred from Josephus and other sources. The arrival of the Magi in Jerusalem, the form of their question revealing the fact that they were not Jews, the Messianic significance of their question and its appreciation by the people and by Herod, the consequent effect on the city and on the king, Herod's questioning of the scribes where the Christ, i.e. the Messiah, should be born, the answer according well not only with OT prophecy, but with the Messianic ideas of the time (cf. Zahn, Math. 94, n. 86; Bousset, Religion des Jüd. 214), and, finally, the character of Herod, suspicious, dissimulating, treacherous,—the whole description vividly reflects the historical conditions of the closing years of Herod's reign. The local colouring betrays no false touch. The ideas and scenes are appropriate to the times, and the character of Herod is quite his own. When St. Matthew tells us that Herod in his anger at being deceived by the Magi slew all the children of two years and under in Bethlehem and its borders, we still recognize perfectly the man whose closing years were filled with passion and bloodshed. Josephus, indeed, does not mention the incident. What he does narrate of Herod, however, bears indirect testimony to a fact so entirely consistent with Herod's character. If the fact therefore be denied, the denial will rest on subjective rather than historical grounds.

Grätz, indeed, remarks (Hist. of the Jews, ii. 116): 'A legend of later date tells how Herod was not assisted with shedding the blood of his own children, but how, in a passion, he ordered all children under two years of age in Bethlehem and the surrounding country to be massacred, because he had heard that the Messiah of the house of David had been born in that place. But Herod, criminal as he was, was innocent of this crime.' Similarly I. Brody (Jewish Encyclopedia, vi. 380), who, however, makes appeal to the fact that 'the massacre of the Innocents as related in the NT is now generally admitted by independent Christian thinkers to be legendary.' For this opinion, however, no historical evidence is advanced. The asserted legendary character of St. Matthew's narrative and its later date, even when strengthened by appeal to independent Christian thinkers, is only subjective and dogmatical. In the latter case, indeed (cf. Holtzmann, Handbook, 341), the attempt is made to ground such a judgment historically by comparing Mt and Lk, and inferring from their differences the untrustworthy character of each. The fundamental objection to the historicity of the Gospel narratives is, however, not so much the differences between them, which simply prove their relative independence, as the supernatural facts which they record, and in particular, in this part of St. Matthew's narrative, the star of the Magi. Dr. Zahn (Math. 981) has suggested an interpretation of this phenomenon as a purely natural occurrence, described, however, not in terms of scientific precision but in popular language, and from the point of view of the Magi. But even should such an explanation be thought exegetically inadequate, the historicity of the narrative could be denied, and the narrative itself justly described as legendary, only on principles of interpretation whose 'independence' by reason of their dependence on naturalistic premises, logically excluded from the sphere of history all miraculous events, and necessarily explained the narratives of such events as legendary in character and origin.

For an account of Herod's son Archelaus see ARCHELAUS.

2. Antipas.—The second son of Herod and Malthaake, the full brother of Archelaus, is called by Josephus Ἀντίπας (Ant. xviii. vii. 1) or Ἡρόδης (xviii. ii. 1). In the NT and on the coins only the name Ἡρόδης appears. Under his father's last will, as ratified by Augustus, Antipas received Persea and Galilee, with the title τetrάρχης (see TETRARCH). He is commonly designated by this title in the NT, although the popular ὁ βασιλεὺς occurs in Mk 6<sup>47</sup>, Mt 14<sup>7</sup>.

We know little concerning the events of Antipas' long reign (B.C. 4–A.D. 39). The narrative given by Josephus is very meagre after the death of Herod the Great.* Having little to tell of Archelaus, Josephus introduced very interesting digressions about the Pharisees, Sadducees, Zealots, and Essenes (Ant. xviii. 1–vii. 24). But, having equally little to tell of Antipas, he filled in his narrative in Ant. with an account of the Parthians and their relations with Rome—with which, indeed, Antipas was incidentally connected (cf. Ant. xviii. ii. 4, iv. 4; Schürer<sup>2</sup>, i. 447). We learn from Josephus, however, that Antipas rebuilt and strongly fortified Sepphoris and Betharamphtha for the protection of Galilee and Persea. He also built and colonized Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee. On one occasion, when in Rome at the house of his brother Herod Philip (Ant. xviii. v. 1; cf. Mk 6<sup>7</sup>), son of Mariamne the high priest's daughter, Antipas secured the consent of Herodias, his brother's wife, to leave her husband and marry him, on condition that he put away his own wife, the daughter of Aretas, King of the Nabateans. When Antipas returned, his wife, who had learned of his understanding with Herodias, asked permission to go to Macharus, a fortress near the border of her father's territory. Without suspecting her purpose, Antipas granted her request; but she continued her journey to Arabia, and enlightened her father concerning the dutiful intentions of his son-in-law. Because of this and certain boundary disputes, enmity arose between Aretas and Antipas, which eventually issued in war, and a crushing defeat for Antipas.

It is difficult to determine just how soon after the marriage with Herodias the war between Antipas and Aretas broke out. Vitellius, although harbouring an old grudge against Antipas, and thus naturally disposed to make haste slowly in coming to his assistance, was, nevertheless, under orders from Rome, marching against Aretas to punish him for his rough treatment of Antipas, and had got as far as Jerusalem when news came of the death of Tiberius (A.D. 37). The defeat of Antipas can hardly have been later than the year 38. Josephus, however, remarks (Ant. xviii. v. 2) that the defeat of Antipas was popularly regarded as a Divine punishment for the murder of John the Baptist. Hence it has been inferred by Keim and others that neither the death of John nor the marriage with Herodias can have preceded this event by many years. Keim advocated the year 34 as the date of John's death, and assigned the death of Jesus to the year 35 (Jesus of Nazara, ii. 287 ff.). Sieffert dates the journey of Antipas to Rome, when he gained the consent of Herodias to their marriage, in the year 34 (PLZS vii. 729, i. 49). The concise character of Josephus' narrative, however, as well as the condition of the text in this section of Ant., renders it precarious to infer, from the order of events, close chronological sequence (cf. Schürer<sup>2</sup>, i. 448 ff.; Wellhausen<sup>4</sup>, 354). Equally uncertain is the chronological inference from the popular conception of Antipas' defeat with the death of John, since such a judgment is too flexible to furnish any very definite chronological datum.

The arrest, imprisonment, and death of John the Baptist are narrated in the Gospels and in Josephus (cf. Mt 4<sup>12</sup> 11<sup>25</sup> 14<sup>22</sup>, Mk 1<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>17</sup>, Lk 3<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>33</sup> 9<sup>7</sup>, Jn 3<sup>24</sup>; Ant. xviii. v. 2). Both sources give an account of John's preaching and baptism. Josephus mentions a political motive for John's arrest; but, while such a motive is not unlikely in view of the popularity of John's ministry (Mk 1<sup>1</sup>, Mt 3<sup>2</sup>, Lk 3<sup>2</sup>, cf. Jn 5<sup>3</sup>) and the Messianic character of his preaching (Mk 1<sup>1</sup>, Mt 3<sup>2</sup>, Lk 3<sup>2</sup>, cf. Jn 1<sup>9</sup> sec. or 3<sup>26</sup>), it does not fully explain his death. We learn also from Josephus that John was imprisoned in the fortress of Machærus, but nothing is said concerning the length of the imprisonment. The Gospels, however, give a personal motive for the arrest of John, indicate that the imprisonment lasted for some time,—probably about a year,*—and attribute his death to the enmity of Herodias (Mk 6<sup>17-29</sup>, Mt 14<sup>1-12</sup>, Lk 3<sup>19-20</sup>). For John had rebuked Herod for his marriage with Herodias, and for this had been imprisoned. The imprisonment seems to have been moderated by the free access of his disciples to him, and Herod himself heard John from time to time. At length, however, on the occasion of a birthday feast,† celebrated by Herod with the chief men of his government, probably at the palace in Machærus, a favourable opportunity presented itself for Herodias to be avenged on John for his attack on her marriage. Salome, the daughter of her former marriage,‡ danced before Herod and his guests. Herod was pleased, and promised to do for her what she might ask. At the suggestion of her mother, her request took an unexpected form; but because of his promise Herod granted her the death of the prophet, who, like his predecessor in the days of Ahab, had been bold to arraign immorality in high places.

The boyhood of Jesus and most of His public ministry were spent within the territory of Antipas. It was not, however, until the mission of the Twelve that Herod's attention was attracted to Jesus; for, though labouring on the shores of the Sea of Galilee, and from Capernaum as a centre extending His work into the surrounding country, Jesus apparently did not visit Tiberias. Shortly after Jesus learned that Herod had heard of Him, He withdrew from Galilee, going into the region of Tyre and Sidon (part of the Roman province of Syria). On one occasion Jesus warned His disciples against the leaven of Herod (Mk 8<sup>15</sup>); on another the Pharisees, manifesting an unwonted interest in Jesus' safety, brought Him word that Herod was planning His death (Lk 13<sup>31</sup>). The reply of Jesus on the latter occasion—'Go tell that fox'—shows that He saw through the cunning design of Herod to be rid of Him. True to His own word,—*for it cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem,—it was not at the hand of Herod that the Saviour of the world suffered, but at the hands of the Roman world-rulers and their procurator, * Jesus' Galilean ministry began just after the imprisonment of John (Mk 1<sup>14</sup>, Mt 4<sup>12</sup>). John's ministry was looked back upon as past at the feast of Jn 5<sup>1</sup>, cf. 5<sup>2</sup>. Messengers came from the imprisoned John to Jesus in the midst of the early Galilean ministry. News of Jesus reached Herod about the time of the mission of the Twelve, and in this connexion the Gospels mention the fears of Herod that John was risen from the dead. The inference is not improbable that John's death was a matter of recent occurrence.

† On the meaning of γενεθ in Mk 6<sup>21</sup>, Mt 14<sup>6</sup>, cf. Schürer<sup>2</sup>, i. 438, n. 27; Zahn, Matth. 504, n. 81; Jos. Ant. xix. vii. 1; Oxyr. Pap. i. 112. 4, iii. 404. 24, 521, iv. 750. 56, 57; Fay. Pap. i. 114. 20, 115. 6, 119. 30.

‡ The reading Mk 6<sup>22</sup> αἰρώ in NBDLA, adopted by WH, is probably a corruption for αἰρώ (cf. Swete, The Gosp. acc. to St. Mk. 118; Schürer<sup>2</sup>, i. 441, n. 29).

Pontius Pilate. At the trial of Jesus, Herod's wish to see Him was at length gratified. For Pilate, when he learned that Jesus was of Galilee, and thus subject to Herod's jurisdiction, at once sent him to Herod, who was in Jerusalem at that time. This act of consideration, prompted possibly by the strained relations between the two rulers (Lk 23<sup>9</sup>, cf. 13<sup>1</sup>), proved an effectual peace-offering, and cemented anew the bonds of friendship between them. Herod, however, had no desire to assume responsibility for the death of Jesus. His desire to see Jesus sprang from simple curiosity, stimulated by the hope that He would perform some miracle in his presence. But Jesus was silent before Herod and His accusers. Herod, therefore, when he had mocked Him, sent Him back to Pilate arrayed in fine garments. [The part taken by Herod in the trial of Jesus is the subject of legendary elaboration in the apocryphal Gospel of Peter.]

Stirred by envy at the advancement of her brother Agrippa to royal dignity, Herodias persuaded Herod, against his better judgment, to seek from Caligula a similar honour. When he came to Rome, however, Agrippa preferred charges against him, and called attention to the military supplies that had been collected by Herod. Herod was unable to deny the existence of the supplies, and was banished by Caligula to Lyons in Gaul, probably in the summer of A.D. 39 (cf. Schürer<sup>2</sup>, i. 448, n. 46; Madden, however, Coins, 122, gives the year 40). Herodias proudly refused the Emperor's generosity, and accompanied her husband in his banishment (Ant. xvii. vii. 2; BJ ii. ix. 6). Herod's tetrarchy was given to Agrippa.

3. Philip.—Philip was son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra of Jerusalem. When Archelaus went to Rome to secure the ratification of his father's will, he left Philip in Jerusalem in charge of his affairs. Later, when Varus gave the Jews of Jerusalem permission to send an embassy to Rome to oppose Archelaus, Philip went also, at the suggestion of Varus, to profit by whatever course events might take. When Augustus ratified Herod's will, Philip received Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, Galanitis, and the territory of Panias (Ant. xvii. viii. 1, xi. 4, xviii. iv. 6; BJ ii. vi. 3). In Lk 3<sup>1</sup> the territory of Philip is described by the phrase, 'the region of Iturea and Trachonitis' (τῆς Ἰτρούπιας καὶ Τραχωνιτιδος χώρας; cf. Schürer<sup>2</sup>, i. 425, n. 23). The Trachonitis had on two occasions been colonized by Herod the Great—once with three thousand Idumeans, and again with Jewish warriors from Babylon (Ant. xvi. ix. 2, xvii. ii. 1-3). But the population of Philip's territory was chiefly Gentile, his coins, unlike those of his brothers, bearing the image of the Emperor. Philip rebuilt Panias, and called it Cæsarea in honour of Augustus, and also Bethsaida on the Sea of Galilee, calling it Julias after the Emperor's daughter. His reign was a mild and peaceful one. He lived in his own country and administered justice as he travelled from place to place (Ant. xviii. iv. 6). He married his niece Salome, daughter of Herodias and Herod Philip (Ant. xviii. v. 4). The Gospels narrate a journey of Jesus into the territory of Philip when He went north from Galilee into the region of Caesarea Philippi (Mk 8<sup>27</sup>, Mt 16<sup>13</sup>; cf. CÆSAREA PHILIPPI). Philip died in the year 33 or 34, in the twentieth year of Tiberius, having reigned thirty-seven years. His territory was added to the province of Syria, but was given shortly afterwards by Caligula to Agrippa. See also art. HERODIAS.

HERODIANS (Ἡρῳδαῖοι).—Apart from the weakly attested reading in Mk 8<sup>18</sup> the Herodians are mentioned but three times in the NT and on only two occasions, Mt 22<sup>18</sup> being parallel with Mk 12<sup>18</sup>. The name Ἡρῳδαῖοι does not occur in Josephus. In BJ i. xvi. 6 the form Ἡρῳδαῖοι is used of the party of Herod, and in Ant. xiv. xv. 10 the phrase ἐν τῷ Ἡρῳδῷ φοροῦντες occurs (cf. also Ant. xiv. vii. 4). (For the formation in -αῖοι like Χαρταῖοι, cf. Blass, Acta Apoc. 136, Gram. of NT Greek, § 27, 4; Harnack, Mission u. Ausb. d. Christ. 294 ff.; Etyim. Magn. s.v. Ἡρῳδαῖοι).

If the party of Herod in Josephus be the same as the Herodians of the NT (cf. O. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgesch. 157 f., but, on the other hand, Cheyne, Encyc. Bibl., ii. 2034), then the origin of the party must be sought in the time of Herod the Great. This view of the origin of the party will also determine our conception of its nature. It cannot have been a religious sect or party like the Pharisees or Sadducees, but was most probably a political party composed of the adherents and supporters of the Herodian dynasty. From the combination of the Pharisees with the Herodians (cf. Mt 23<sup>2</sup> and Mk 12<sup>13</sup>), it is not unlikely that the Herodian party was composed principally of Sadducees (cf. Lk 20<sup>19</sup> and Mk 8<sup>18</sup> with Mt 16<sup>6</sup>). After the death of Herod the Great, the deposition of Archelaus, and the establishment of Roman rule in Judaea, the aims and purposes of the party would naturally centre in Antipas, the presence of the Herodians in Galilee, indicated in Mk 3<sup>6</sup>, cannot be set aside with the remark of Cheyne: 'This, however, is evidently a mistake. In the country of the tetrarch Antipas there could not be a party called the Herodians' (op. cit. ii. 2043). Members of a party which wished to see Antipas sit upon the throne of his father may have been in Galilee as well as in Jerusalem; for their ideal was a national one, differing from the ideal of the Zealots as royalist from democratic. Their union with the strong Pharisaic party, and their attempt to entrap Jesus with the question about tribute to Caesar, find explanation not in any sympathy with the Pharisees or fondness for the traditions which Jesus' activity imperilled, but in their readiness to oppose and suppress any Messianic agitation of the people.

Other views attach some religious significance to the party, connect them with the Bethusians or with the court of Antipas as members of the Herodian family, officers or servants, and attribute to them a friendly or hostile attitude towards the Roman sovereignty (cf. Tert., ad Omm. Her. i.; Epiph. Her. xx.; Steph. Thesaur. s.v.; Ewald, HT v. 409 f.; Renan, Vie de Jésus, 226; Edersheim, Life and Times, i. 237 ff., ii. 384; Bleek, Syn. ii. 327; Zahn, Matth. 528, n. 44, 632, n. 45).

HERODIAS (Ἡρῳδίας).—Herodias was the daughter of Aristobolus (son of Herod the Great and Mariamne the Hasmonaean) and Bernice (daughter of Salome, Herod's sister, and Costobar), and thus the full sister of Herod, king of Chalcis, and Agrippa I. (Ant. xviii. v. 4). She married first her half-uncle Herod, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, the high priest's daughter. In Mk 6<sup>17</sup> and Mt 14<sup>8</sup> the first husband of Herodias is called Philip, the brother of Herod (Antipas). This Philip, therefore, most probably bore also the name 'Herod' (as did also his brothers Archelaus and Antipas), and is to be distinguished from Philip the tetrarch (Lk 3<sup>1</sup>; cf. Mt 16<sup>18</sup>, Mk 8<sup>27</sup>), who married Salome, the daughter of Herod Philip and Herodias (Ant. xviii. v. 4). In Mk 6<sup>17</sup> the reading Φιλίππου is given by Tisch. (ed. maj. viii.) without citation of a variant. In Mt 14<sup>8</sup> Φιλίππου has the support of NBCL, etc., but is omitted in D a c e ff' g' k vg. In Lk 3<sup>19</sup> Φιλίππου is inserted by ACK, etc., cop syrst arm<sup>sa</sup> aeth, but omitted by BBDL, etc. The reading thus appears to be original in Mk., probably original in Mt., and derivative in Luke. The statement (Encyc. Bibl., ii. 2032), 'In spite of Mk 6<sup>17</sup> we cannot hold that he ever really bore the name Philip,' as well as the remark of Schürer<sup>3</sup> (i. 435, n. 19), 'Since, according to Josephus, not the tetrarch but the above-named Herod was the first husband of Herodias, the statement of Mark and Matthew is evidently a mistake' (ein entschiedenes Versehen) are too positive. They do not rest on any more substantial evidence than the fact that Josephus calls this son of Herod the Great simply Herod. The argument that two sons of Herod would not have borne the same name Philip is weakened by the fact that even according to Josephus two sons of Herod bore the same name—Herod, son of Mariamne, the high priest's daughter, and Herod, son of Cleopatra (Ant. xvii. i. 3, xviii. v. 4). Herod Philip had been designated in the first will of Herod the Great as the alternate of Antipas in succession to the throne (Ant. xvii. iii. 2; BJ i. xxix. 2), but was subsequently omitted because of his mother's connexion with the plot of Antipater (Ant. xvii. iv. 2; BJ i. xxx. 7). He continued in private life in Rome, where Antipas, while guest in his brother's house, persuaded Herodias to desert her husband and marry him. This second marriage of Herodias was especially offensive to the Jews, because her husband, to whom she had borne a child, was still alive (cf. Lv 18<sup>16</sup>, Dt 25<sup>5</sup>; also Ant. xvii. xiii. 1). John the Baptist rebuked Antipas for his action, and paid the penalty with his life for rousing the anger of an ambitious and unscrupulous woman. Her connexion with the downfall of Antipas has been mentioned (cf. art. HEROD under 'Antipas'). In the last recorded incident of her life, when Herodias voluntarily followed Antipas into exile and haughtily refused the Emperor's bounty, she displayed, like her grandmother Mariamne when unjustly sentenced to death, the proud fortitude and fine dignity of the old Hasmonaean house now brought so low through its union with the Herods (Ant. xviii. vii. 2; cf. xv. ix. 5).

HEZEKIAH.—One of the kings of Judah, mentioned in Mt.'s (19<sup>2</sup>) genealogy of our Lord.

HEZRON.—A Judahite ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1<sup>8</sup>, Lk 3<sup>35</sup>).

HIGH PRIEST.—The terms 'high priest' and 'chief priest' in the NT represent the same original (ἀρχιερεῖς), varied in translation to correspond with the use of the term as explained below. The office of high priest in the Jewish nation can be traced back to the early years of post-exilic times. The priestly writings then adopted as authoritative assign its origin to the time of Moses, but the earlier writings contain no suggestion of the existence of the office, and cultural conditions before the Exile preclude an early date for its establishment. Immediately after the Return the office was a religious one, the secular power being in the hands of the 'prince'; for, great as was the emphasis in the new community upon law and ceremony, there seems to have been an equal emphasis upon the hoped for restoration of the State to a dignified and independent position. It very soon became evident that this hope was impossible of fulfilment, and the secular functions, so far as they were exercised by the Jews, were merged in the duties of the high priest. At first the position was for life and hereditary. In practice the principle was often violated, the violations being occasioned not so much by deliberate purpose as by the turmoils of Greek and Roman times. Moreover, internal conditions in the Jewish community were of themselves sufficient to have unsettled the principle. At the time of the Hasmonean uprising, the assumption of high priestly functions and title by this family was essential to the success of the revolt. Under the Roman supremacy, the fortunes of the political parties in Rome added to the tendencies that made for the disappearance of the last vestige of permanence in the high priestly office, and at the time of Christ we find it entirely at the will of Rome, both as to appointment and tenure. Under these conditions there had grown up a caste of high priestly families, descended from high priests and otherwise connected with them; these formed a high aristocracy in Judaism, which was possessed of considerable authority, however difficult it may be to define the limits and extent of that influence. Very naturally the selection of the high priest was made from these families. The numerous references in the Gospels are ordinarily to this high priestly class, and when the Greek is so used it is translated 'chief priests' (see art. CHIEF PRIESTS).

As far as concerns the high priest proper, he occupied the position of chief political authority among the Jews, as head of the Sanhedrin. Josephus declares (Ant. xx. 10) that there were 28 high priests from the time of Herod to the destruction of Jerusalem. Of these, the Gospels mention the tenth, Annas, appointed by Quirinus (A.D. 6), and the fourteenth, Joseph, surnamed Caiaphas, who was in office at the time of the crucifixion of Jesus and presided over the Sanhedrin at His trial. Previous to this trial there was a preliminary trial or hearing, whether with or without legal right, before Annas, father-in-law of Caiaphas. The Gospel narrative of these events, so far from being confused or improbable, is confirmed as entirely consistent and probable by the records of Jewish practice of those days. Annas was a man of long continued influence among his people. No fewer than six of the high priests of the Herodian period are known to have been of his family. Other high priests after the end of their term of service are stated to have held high positions at home and abroad, and it is possible that some of the Gospel references to high or chief priests are to this group of ex-high priests together with the officiating priest.

The high priest was also at the head of the sacerdotal system, as the title, of course, implies. But although historically this was his chief claim to authority, his religious influence in the time of Christ was far less than his political power. The religion of the Jew was a matter quite distinct from the rites and ceremonies of the temple, though he might observe these with care. The very success of the high priests centuries before, in uniting the two offices of religious and secular ruler, had operated to foster the development of a religion of a different sort. It was now a religion of the scribes.

The high priest conducted the sacrifices only on special occasions. He was required to officiate on the yearly Day of Atonement; and on other festival days, such as New Moons and Sabbaths, he officiated at his pleasure. These distinctively priestly duties do not come into consideration in the Gospel narratives. The Epistle to the Hebrews, on the other hand, makes much mention of the office in order by that means to portray more clearly the work of Jesus in behalf of men; but one will be disappointed who goes to this Epistle to discover what were the high priestly functions at the time of Christ, or even to discover the theory of sacrifice and priesthood current in those days. The author does not describe the ceremonial as he and his readers knew it from daily observation or participation. He does not allude to it because it was something vital in the religious experience of the Jew. He describes it as he knew it out of the Jewish Scriptures, and he reflects upon it as dispassionately as a philosopher or a theologian. The OT priesthood and sacrifice did not really make atonement for sin; to the author they typified that atonement. In the real atonement Christ had a part similar to that played by the high priest in the sensuous, temporary, typical atonement of the earlier dispensation. He made reconciliation for the sins of the people (2<sup>o</sup>); He was faithful, the recipient of a greater glory than Moses (3<sup>o</sup>); sought not the office, but was chosen as was Aaron (5<sup>o</sup>); He was of the order of Melchizedek (5<sup>o</sup> 6<sup>o</sup>); was competent to sympathize with men (2<sup>o</sup> 4<sup>o</sup>). He possessed an unchanging priesthood, sacrificing once for all (7), and the sacrifice was Himself. He has passed through the heavens, through the veil (4<sup>o</sup>), and serves in a perfect tabernacle. As the work wrought by Him for men surpassed that of the high priest, so the terminology of the older dispensation is insufficient, and breaks down under the burden of the description. Jesus is not only the Mediator of the new covenant, the High Priest, but He is also the sacrifice itself. The author will not say that the death on the cross fitted into the OT sacrificial system, any more than he brings Jesus into that system as priest. It was in the new order of things, in the spiritual atonement, which was the real one, with spiritual agencies and results, that His perfect humanity, His perfect obedience and sinlessness, found place. The temple is in the heavens whither He has gone to consummate the service of which His earthly career was an incident. See, further, art. PRIEST.

HIGHWAY.—In the parable (Mt 22<sup>o</sup>) where the invited guests all made excuse, the king sent his servants out ἐπὶ τὰς ὁδοὺς τῶν ἄστων, 'into the highways' (AV), to gather as many as they could find, and bid them to the feast. The Gr. phrase means literally 'the partings of the highways' (so RV), convius vicarum (Vulg.). This is the only occurrence of ὁδοὶ in the NT, and it is impossible to determine with certainty what is meant by the expression. It may signify either the roads leading out of the town into the country, or the crossings of such, or the streets leading into the open spaces or square in front of the town. The idea is clear—where men both good and bad, Jew and Gentile, are most likely to be found. God's purpose cannot be frustrated; and if the invited guests neglect the call, then others who have hitherto been looked down upon will take their place. The invitation is to all and sundry, which leads Whedon to say, 'The good are not too good to need the gospel, nor the bad so bad as to have no hope if they will accept it.' It was the poor, the outcast, the hopeless that were to be found on the highways; blind Bartimeus (Mk 10<sup>46</sup>) shouting, 'Have mercy on me,' and such as the lepers who stood afar off (Lk 17<sup>12</sup>) uttering the same miserable cry. See, further, art. ROADS. R. LEGGAT.

HILL.—In Lk 3<sup>5</sup> 23<sup>30</sup> ὄρος is distinguished from βουνός, which in LXX commonly stands for ἵψος, and as representing the lesser eminence, is properly rendered 'hill.' Language like that of 23<sup>30</sup> is used in hyperbole to-day by Easterns, of preparing a highway for royalty through a practically roadless country. In two cases (Mt 5<sup>14</sup>, Lk 4<sup>21</sup>) RV retains AV rendering of ὄρος, 'hill.' In Lk 9<sup>37</sup> RV rightly substitutes 'mountain.' Perhaps we should read 'mountain' also in Mt 5<sup>14</sup>. There is nothing to show that any particular city was referred to, but if the words were spoken on any height west of the Lake, Safed, with white walls gleaming in the sun, must have been a striking feature in the landscape. It stands literally 'on a mountain,' to the north, nearly 3500 ft. above the Sea of Galilee. Ancient Nazareth, however, was built on the slope of a hill to which 'mountain' could hardly apply.

Hill country (ἡ ὄρη), ἡ ὄρη is a frequent LXX equivalent of ἵψος. The use of Heb. ἵψος closely resembles that of Arab. Jebel, which denotes a single height, but also a whole range, as Jebel Libnán; or a definite part of a range, as Jebel Nábús—this indicating that portion of 'the mountain' which is under the government of Nábús. This expression and Jebel el-Kuds the present writer has often heard on Palestinian lips, without any sense of vagueness or confusion. ἵψος was 'the mountain'—the central range as distinguished from the plain and the Shephelah on the west, and the 'Arabah on the east. Jebel el-Kuds, 'mountain of Jerusalem,' is perhaps the nearest modern equivalent of ἡ ὄρη ἡ ἵψος Ἱερουσαλήμ, that part of 'the mountain' associated with the tribe of Judah. See, further, art. MOUNTAIN. W. EWING.

HINDRANCE.—The life of communion with God and of obedience to His revealed will is regarded as the normal state and right relationship of man made in God's image and for His glory. All defect and deflection from this standard are the result of external and internal hindrances. The world is an environment of hindrances and causes of stumbling (Mt 18<sup>7</sup>). Such is the pressure of opposing influences that the entrance into life has to be by a narrow gate (7<sup>13</sup>). Instances of these outward and inward difficulties are given in the parable of the Sower (13<sup>3-23</sup>), and in that of the Tares their final elimination is predicted (v. 4).

1. The following hindrances are specially emphasized: (1) prosperity and power (Mt 4<sup>8</sup> 19<sup>24</sup>, Lk 16<sup>11</sup> 18<sup>21</sup>); (2) self-righteousness and the arresting effect of an inferior standard (Mt 5<sup>20</sup> 6<sup>2-5, 19</sup> 23<sup>27</sup>, Lk 18<sup>9</sup>); (3) family claims and their displacing power (Mt 8<sup>21</sup> 10<sup>41</sup>); (4) want of faith (Mt 14<sup>31</sup> 17<sup>20</sup> 25<sup>25</sup>, Lk 22<sup>32</sup>); (5) blindness of heart in its progressive stages of (a) ignorance (Mt 13<sup>13</sup>, Lk 18<sup>35</sup> 23<sup>34</sup>, Jn 17<sup>9</sup>, repeated in Ac 3<sup>17</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>8</sup>), (b) indifference (Lk 7<sup>22</sup>),—being the interval of apathy and discouragement that succeeds when ideals once regarded as final cease to fill the imagination and satisfy the heart, and institutions once held to be sacred fail to yield the expected results,—(c) inability to discern and feel (Mt 16<sup>8</sup> 23<sup>27</sup>), and lastly (d) conscious malignity towards the King-

2. Comparative moral values are attached to these hindrances (Mt 8<sup>10</sup> 11<sup>21-24</sup> 12<sup>41-42</sup>, Mk 12<sup>41-44</sup>, Lk 7<sup>47</sup> 17<sup>18</sup>). Prayer may be offered for their removal (Mt 26<sup>38</sup>, similarly 2 Co 12<sup>8</sup>).

3. Christ's relationship to the world-spirit is one of complete opposition (Jn 16<sup>33</sup> 18<sup>30</sup>). The victory that can be obtained over all hindrances makes a sanctified cross the emblem of the Christian life (Mt 16<sup>24</sup>, Mk 8<sup>34</sup>, Lk 9<sup>23</sup>). This power to overcome, promised to those who abide in Christ (Jn 15<sup>7</sup>), is referred to in the Epistles as already a verified fact in Christian experience (Ro 8<sup>38-39</sup>, Ph 4<sup>13</sup>).

Stumbling-block, stumbling-stone (προσκολλημα, προσκολλη, also σκάνδαλον, 'trap' or 'snare' (Ro 11<sup>17</sup>) and frequently tr. 'offence,' 'offend' (Mt 18<sup>6</sup> 18<sup>7</sup> 26<sup>31</sup>, Lk 17<sup>1</sup>)). The root-idea is that of encountering an obstacle where such ought not to be, as on a public road. In its fig. sense the offence is most blameworthy where the trust is most implicit and unreserved, as in the confidence of children (Mt 18<sup>6</sup>).

In the East the bridle-path is seldom repaired. Stones may be cast out upon it in clearing the neighbouring fields; squared stones for building, collected at the road-side for transport, are often scattered over the path; if a bed of sand suitable for mixing with lime be found near it, the path may be dug into and the cavity left unfilled. No harm can arise from it, men say, except to those for whom it is decreed. The people of the village soon come to know of it, and they are under no obligation to strangers. The better prepared roads have generally been constructed for Government purposes and by forced labour, so that the people of the locality take little civic interest in their condition and preservation. Hence stumbling-blocks are frequently met with, and cause little surprise or comment.

In modern Palestine criminals and men of depraved life are called mi'athlatrin, 'those who have been made to stumble'; and the same epithet is applied to such as are in trouble through misfortune.

The Cross that made God the sacrificer and suppliant, and called for faith in a Saviour who could not save Himself, was a stumbling-block or offence to the wisdom of the world, and to all its religious traditions (Ro 9<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>23</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>8</sup>).

HIRE.—'Hire' (μισθός) occurs in two passages as the regular payment given for service rendered. In the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard (Mt 20<sup>1</sup>) it is spoken of the day's wage, the denarius, owing by agreement to the workers. The proverbial phrase, 'The labourer is worthy of his hire' (Lk 10<sup>7</sup>), is used by Christ in connexion with the mission of the Seventy. In Mt 10<sup>10</sup> τροφή, 'food,' is substituted for μισθός. The latter Greek word occurs again (Jn 4<sup>32</sup>) as the wages of the reaper. It is used in a good sense as the reward of devotion and service to God (Mt 5<sup>12</sup> 6<sup>10</sup>, Mk 9<sup>4</sup>, Lk 6<sup>23</sup>), as well as to describe the 'empty popularity' attaching to the religious ostentation of the hypocrites (Mt 6<sup>2-5, 16</sup>). It is employed (Rev 22<sup>2</sup>) of Christ's reward to His faithful followers: 'My reward is with me.'

The term 'hired servant' or 'hireling' (μισθωτός) is used in speaking of Zebedee's servants (Mk 1<sup>20</sup>), and of the false shepherd who deserts his flock at the approach of danger (Jn 10<sup>12, 13</sup>). A similar derivative (μισθίος) describes the father's servants in the parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15<sup>19</sup>). The verb 'to hire' (μισθώω) occurs (Mt 20<sup>1</sup>) of the householder who engaged the labourers for his vineyard. See also next article. C. H. PRICHARD.

HIRELING.—A hireling is one who works for wages, an employé. Originally synonymous with 'hired servant,' it did not necessarily imply venal motive. Ben Sira was acquainted with devoted hirelings: 'Entreat not evil thy servant that worketh, nor a hireling that giveth thee his life' (Sir 7<sup>20</sup>). Hireling now denotes a wage-earner who manifests certain baser qualities of human nature. Christ's use of the word in Jn 10<sup>12</sup> is to signify one who, because he cares more for his wages than for his work, proves unfaithful under trial, has determined its evolution into meaning an untrustworthy employé.

Calvin, who defines hirelings as 'those who retain the pure doctrine, and who proclaim the truth, as Paul says, to serve a purpose rather than from pure zeal,' discusses a question wont to be debated in times of persecution, viz.—Has that man to be reckoned a hireling who for any reason shrinks from encountering the wolves? He agrees with Augustine that parties may flee 'if the public advantage of the flock be thereby promoted' (Calvin on John, vol. 1, p. 403 f., Edinburgh, 1847).

D. A. MACKINNON.

HISTORICAL.—1. The word 'history' is ambiguous. It may mean (1) the course of events; or (2) any record of the events—i.e. history; or (3) the science. History, which understands the whole. Scientific history is comparatively a young thing; but already educated mankind are tending to refuse the name of 'a history' to anything under the second head which does not try to fulfil the requirements of science. What fails in that may be a chronicle, or may furnish useful materials to the true historian, but is not really history.

2. The aims of the science of history are twofold. (1) It must get at the facts; and to do that it must secure, as far as possible, first-hand evidence; (2) it must study the facts in their development or causation or connexion upon all sides. (1) In its search for first-hand evidence, the science of history has different kinds of material to work with. (a) The oldest material for history is tradition. All knowledge of past events lived at first in human memory before it assumed any more permanent shape. But tradition, unsupported or unassisted, is a bad witness. And in our own region there is no real historical tradition apart from the Christian records, etc. What is pretended by Catholicism in that sense is a make-believe, to cover over unwarranted innovations. The furthest admission we can make is that scraps of historical recollection, otherwise lost to us, may survive in Church legends, which were reduced pretty early to writing (the Thekla legend?). (b) The best of all witnesses is epigraphy. Biblical learning owes something to this, and may come to owe a good deal more—no one can say. (c) The main source of historical knowledge is literature, —human speech reduced to the ordinary forms of writing. Less durable (as well as less stiff) than inscriptions, books are more numerous—so much more numerous, that they enjoy probably a better chance of survival. In our own field the Bible writings, though not absolutely isolated, stand head and shoulders above all other materials in point of importance. This is true on purely historical principles, theories of inspiration apart. (d) At the risk of making a cross-division, we must mention the importance of foreign testimony. The amount of this is increasing with modern study and research; and the significance generally attached to affinities between primitive Christianity and other civilizations or religions is also on the increase. (2) The most manifest result of study in the field of history is to give a better knowledge of detail. But we must not allow ourselves to suppose that events occur disconnectedly, one by one, and that the mind of the scientific thinker imposes connexions upon them. Science does not create, it elicits the hidden law; and anything that gives us greater knowledge of events increases our knowledge of the relations in which they stand to each other. Facts without theory are 'blind,' if theories without fact are 'empty.' The ideal goal of historical study, never, of course, to be reached, would be a scientific grasp of every past event in its full significance—reality completely reproduced in the historian's intelligence. For the facts with which history deals are intelligent acts and intelligible processes. True, the unconscious tendency of the times may count for more than the conscious, perhaps selfish, effort of the great man. Or what he does unwillingly, as the executive of Providence and the Zeitgeist, may be the most significant and durable of all his acts. Yet history is man's story; surely, then, man can read it!

3. The Christian study of Bible documents moves for great part of its way, though hardly to the very end [see below], upon historical lines. (1) Its admitted hermeneutical principle, since the days of Ernesti (Institutio Interpretis NT, 1761), is the 'grammatico-historical'—i.e. literal and historical—method. Strictly, each sentence has one meaning, and only one—the meaning its human author designed; the meaning its first readers would naturally apprehend. This principle had to be laid down in face of the Church's age-long hankering after 'mystical' interpretation. If the Scriptures may be allegorized, theology and faith itself rest upon a quicksand. (2) Criticism of the text, by all its methods, aims at discovering, with as much probability as can be attained, the original form of words used by the writer in each passage. It has nothing to do—unless with supreme caution, as possible evidence to the fact—with the question, which words appear to the student most seemly or most telling. Nay, there is a recognized principle that 'the harder reading is probable'; though we must be able to discriminate the sort of 'difficult' reading which suggests a powerful while perhaps erratic mind, from that which rather suggests a blundering copyist. (3) Careful study of the text leads to a further set of inferences, chiefly or entirely drawn from internal evidence, regarding probable date and probable authorship. This is the Higher Criticism—'higher' because dealing with larger questions than those of the text. (4) Even in Biblical Theology we are still occupied with the historian's business. Before all things, we are reproducing past facts. Scripture includes great masses of doctrinal teaching; the Biblical Theologian seeks to put these in shape, as they stand—the affirmations of such and such books, or teachers, or ages. The result aimed at is not Divine truth as such, but various Biblical teachings about the truth; not a normative statement regarding realities which are real, but a historical statement regarding what was held or announced to be spiritual reality; historical, not dogmatic.

4. An attempt was made by a great theological leader, Schleiermacher, to bring even dogmatic theology under the same rubric. It was to be a branch of Historical Theology. Ceasing to be (primarily) a statement of truth, it was to be a statement of what a certain Church in a certain age has come to hold for true. The suggestion was ingenious, and avoided certain difficulties; but it led to other and worse difficulties. If Christian theology, in its central department, cannot pretend to set forth truth, it proclaims itself bankrupt. It can live upon nothing less than the truths regarding God and His purposes which He has been pleased to make known to us.

5. What shall we say, then, of the remainder of the Biblical territory? We were dealing, until the last paragraph, with stages in a process of historical study. We found that even doctrine was treated in Biblical Theology as a historical study, although on the systematic or dogmatic side it required us to occupy a different point of view from the historian's. But what are we to say regarding the history of Israel? Or—coming closer to our ground—regarding the life as distinct from the teaching of Jesus? Or, in general, regarding the origins of Christianity? That which was higher than man or than history has appeared once for all upon the plane of human history. The Word became flesh. Unless this be denied, we have come to a point where the contents of our study burst the bonds of ordinary historical investigation. Difficulty arises in two forms. First, there is the minor difficulty connected with physical miracles. Can history adjust itself to them? If so, how? If not, what are we to conclude? But, in the second place, substantially the same question, issuing in substantially the same alternatives, repeats itself as regards the very kernel of the Christian faith. Have we in Christ, and, to a lesser degree, in His antecedents and environment, a unique Divine revelation, a unique Divine redemption? Then how is the historian to deal with Christ?

6. The question is more familiar in its less formidable shape, as regards miracles. (1) It may be held that facts convince us of miracle. History makes its investigation, and bears witness. It cannot demonstrate, but it announces a satisfactory probability. This is the attitude generally taken up by British scholars, e.g. in Dr. Sanday's recent Criticism of the Evidences (though, he has the wider as well as the narrower problem before him). (2) Secondly, there is the claim of dogmatic naturalism—'miracles do not happen'; for history, the miracle narrative is an interesting and instructive problem, the miracle itself a hallucination a priori, be the alleged evidence what it may. This mood of mind is sometimes confessed, but much oftener is silently at work behind a disguise. (3) There is an attempt by Harnack to strike out a tertium quid: 'The historian cannot regard a miracle as a sure given historical event; for in doing so he destroys the mode of consideration on which all historical investigation rests.' Belief in miracle is due to the 'unique impression' of Christ's person, though 'there has seldom been a strong religious faith which would not have drawn the conclusion' that Christ wrought miracles (Hist. of Dogma, vol. i. Eng. tr. p. 65, note). This seems to mean that history is prevented from dealing with miracles by limitations of its own,—limitations which do not necessarily imply the absence of miracle from the world of real events. (4) Against the point of view which excludes miracles a priori, we might set a point of view which welcomes them a priori as congruous to a Divine revelation and Divine redemption. They are only signs—not the Divine content itself; but are they not fit signs?

7. On a first inspection, none of the views named is definitely anti-Christian unless the second. Naturalism, which refuses miracle out and out, is plainly pledged in logic to deny revelation. But, as we have said, the importance of the whole matter lies in its further implications. The same difficult decision is called for—not face to face with miracle, but face to face with the Christ. And the logic of the third position—the logic which leads Harnack, while believing in revelation, to ban miracle as a thing the historian must not touch—will inevitably be applied by others to Jesus Himself. They will repeat or extend the claim to be historians, thorough historians, nothing but historians. They will describe the teacher of Nazareth, the martyr of Calvary; but the Christ of God will be a magnitude as inaccessible to them as physical miracle is to Dr. Harnack (cf. art. 'Jesus' in Encyc. Bibl.). And if he is in the right, who can say that they are wrong? Analysis must go on to the end, and that great stumbling-block, the supernatural, be revealed plain in our path. Even if not formally declared an impossibility, supernatural revelation or redemption will be politely waved aside as irrelevant to the historian.

8. There is no question more important at the present moment than this. What is, e.g., a 'historical' view of the NT? Is it a view of the NT in its historical actuality, looked at round and round? Or is it a view hampered by the limitations of one of the special sciences? Ambiguity is always dangerous. People omit the Divine 'Word' under pretext of the second definition—That lies beyond the historian's province! But presently they are found implying the first definition. History tells us everything! There is no Divine 'Word' at all—no supernatural salvation.

9. If history does not give full truth, what does? We shall probably be told, Metaphysics. The only court of appeal from 'scientific fact' is 'metaphysical reality.' Metaphysics is certainly pledged to many-sidedness, to all-sidedness. But the question remains, How far can metaphysics discharge its task? And, again, Can it do justice to the Christian origins? Idealistic interpreters of Christianity are very willing to undertake the championship of the Christ idea (e.g. Pfleiderer), but their patronage is not extended to the Christ fact. At any rate the majority, and those who know their business best, as found in Jesus of Nazareth to a symbol, very vaguely connected with any abiding spiritual reality. To a philosophical interpreter it remains 'foolishness' that the Divine Word literally and in deed became flesh. If the professional historian verges upon Ebionism, his philosophical colleague rarely escapes Docetism. Neither of these positions amounts to historical Christianity, which, amid increasing uncertainty in detail, may and ought to have increasing certainty in the fundamental outlines.

10. In the present writer's judgment the attempt to make history a special science, too coy or too scientific to deal with a (possibly real) supernatural, is hopelessly artificial. Scientific history must deal with all the demonstrable, nay, with all the probable, events of the real past. This may interfere with the rounded symmetry of the science; small loss, if it gives us wider and truer knowledge! Further, the writer's own belief is that (not a Christian bias, but) a Christian interpretation is indispensable; or, that experience bears its witness (cf. the fourth position, § 6, as against the first; still, he recognizes that many Christians and many useful theological workers will find themselves able to maintain the first position, and will prefer it). It is perfectly true that faith misleads and over-idealizes (Dr. Moffatt); yet that is a half-truth, or rather it is much less than the half. Better a dazzled faith than 'blind unbelief.' Amid superficial errors, Christian faith grasps the essential truth. Amid superficial inaccuracies, non-Christian historians (and non-Christian philosophers no less) throw away the kernel. The vérité vraie—to a Christian—lies neither in metaphysics nor in the abstract findings of historical science, but in the fellowship of Jesus Christ the living Saviour. 'This is the true God and eternal life.'

11. One form of putting this appeal sets the evidence of later Christian history, with its known developments, against the academic modern study of Christian origins. Christ has founded, and must have meant to found, a worshipping Church! The Germans can put this in a phrase—'der geschichtliche Christus' versus 'der sogenannte historische Jesus' (Kähler). There is a measure of truth in this. Indeed, it is bad history to forget, in studying origins, whereunto the origins grew. On the other hand, the appeal, put forward without qualification, helps the High Churchmen, if not the Ultramontanes. The Church of history is sacerdotal! Protestant evangelical Christians are forced by their faith, by their experience, into a fruitful alliance with sober all-round history. Like the Reformers, we must go back to the primary revelation. Christianity, as the world knows it, is not the measure of Christ, nor His worthy interpreter. 'Hear ye Him!' ROBERT MACKINTOSH.

HOLINESS.—The word 'holy' is etymologically connected with 'whole,' 'hale,' 'healthy,' etc. (cf. Ger. heilsam, heilig). Modern lexicographers hesitate to speak with certainty in regard to the primitive meaning of the root whence this group of words is derived. Murray's Eng. Dict. is content to equate 'holy' with the Lat. sanctus, sacer, on the ground that 'we cannot in Old English get behind the Christian sense.' It is probable that the sense-development is either from hallo, i.e. inviolate, inviolable, that which must be preserved whole; or from hal in the sense of health, well-being.

In all the passages to which reference will be made, the Greek word is ἅγιος or one of its derivatives, with the exception of Ac 27<sup>13</sup>, Lk 17<sup>5</sup>, He 7<sup>2</sup>, where ἅγιος or ἁγιος is found. In Acts the words of Ps 16<sup>5</sup> are quoted twice; 'thy Holy One' is a title of the Messiah to whom pre-eminently belongs the OT designation of the theocratic nation,—ἅγιοι τοῦ θεοῦ, God's pious ones. 'The ἅγιος, the German fromm, is one who reverences the everlasting sanctities and owns their obligation' (Trench, Synonyms of the NT, § lxxxviii.). In Lk 17<sup>5</sup> 'holiness' and 'righteousness' are closely associated, as is frequently the case both in classical and biblical usage. The words are complementary, though the sharp distinction drawn by Plato (Republic, 607 B) cannot be maintained; in the NT 'righteousness' cannot be limited to duties toward men, nor can 'holiness' be restricted to duties toward God. Righteousness is the manward, as holiness is the Godward aspect of pious character and conduct. Hence Jesus, our High Priest, is 'holy' (He 7<sup>2</sup>); in His filial reverence and in His devotion to His Father's will there is no flaw; He is, therefore, fitted to appear in the presence of God to do priestly service on our behalf. The LXX usually renders קדוש ('godly' or 'beloved') by ἅγιος (Dt 33<sup>9</sup>, 2 S 22<sup>36</sup>, Ps 4<sup>4</sup> etc.), but קדוש is generally translated ἅγιος (Ex 19<sup>9</sup>, Nu 6<sup>8</sup>, Ps 15<sup>1</sup>, etc.).

Both ἅγιος and קדוש are used when holiness is ascribed to God as well as to persons and things. The question, therefore, arises—What is the primary meaning which underlies and connects these different applications of the word? If the fundamental idea is separation, the progress of thought is from the negative to the positive, from men and things to God, from the cleansing which is an essential qualification for use in the service of God to purity as the central attribute of God Himself. But if the fundamental idea is essential Divinity, separation becomes a derivative conception; the progress of thought is then from the positive to the negative, from God to external things and persons. Every thing devoted to God must be separated from profane or common uses; and every person devoted to God is not only thus set apart, but is also under moral obligation to fit himself for drawing near to God by separating himself from all that is sinful.

Those who regard separation as the radical meaning of ἅγιος make it almost synonymous with ἁγνός, which signifies pure, and sets forth a negative conception of holiness. Stevens (Hastings' DB

ii. 399) follows Trench, and interprets 1 Jn 3<sup>3</sup>—ἐκείνος ἁγνός ἐστιν—of God. But, as Westcott (Com. in loc.) points out, ἐκείνος in this Epistle always refers to Christ; it is in respect of His true humanity that it can be said 'He is pure,' and not only 'He was pure.' In His glorified state 'the result of the perfection of His earthly discipline (He 5<sup>7a</sup>) still abides.' According to St. John, a 'hope set on (1 Jn) Christ is a constant incentive to strive after holiness; and the standard by which the disciple will always measure his attainments is the perfect purity of his Lord. Few will doubt the soundness of the inference which Westcott bases on his exposition of this verse and on his study of the words:

'Both ἁγνός and καθ᾽ ἁγίαν differ from ἅγιος in that they admit the thought or the fact of temptation or pollution; while ἅγιος describes that which is holy absolutely, either in itself or in idea. God can be spoken of as ἅγιος but not as ἁγνός, while Christ can be spoken of as ἁγνός in virtue of the perfection of His humanity. A man is ἅγιος in virtue of his Divine destination (He 10<sup>10</sup>) to which he is gradually conformed (εὐλαβίζεσθαι, He 10<sup>9</sup>); he is ἁγνός in virtue of earthly, human discipline.'

This clear and helpful distinction assumes that the primary meaning of ἅγιος must be sought in the revelation of the essential nature of God; the various meanings of ἅγιος may thus be traced in orderly sense-development from its root ἅγιος, 'religious awe,' 'reverence.' 'Holy is his name (Lk 11<sup>20</sup>) is the starting-point; things and persons are holy by reason of their being destined for Divine uses; the secondary meaning of separation from defilement arises at a later stage, as clearer perception of the nature of God also reveals the need of preparation for His service by cleansing from all impurity.'

This conclusion must be tested by a brief study of the Jewish conception of holiness. The etymology of קדוש (LXX generally ἅγιος, sometimes καθ᾽ ἁγίαν, never ἁγνός) is disputed. Little can be learnt from the use of cognate words by non-Israelitish peoples. The profound and indeed unique meaning of holiness in the religion of revelation can be ascertained only from a careful investigation of the phraseology of the OT writers. An excellent sketch of the probable history of the word, which assumes that its fundamental idea is separation, is given in Sanday-Hesdian's Homans (note on 17); but it is acknowledged that 'there is a certain element of conjecture . . . which is inevitable from the fact that the earlier stages in the history of the word had been already gone through when the Hebrew literature begins.' There is, therefore, scope for further inquiry.

Kittel (PRB 7 vii. 568 ff.) maintains that the root-idea of the word is positive. Things are not holy because they are separated from other things; they are separated from other things because they are holy. When holiness is ascribed to vessels, animals for sacrifice, etc., either order of thought is suitable. But this is not the case when, e.g., the temple, Zion, and heaven are called holy; they are holy because they are the abode of God. If the primary meaning of holy is that which belongs to God and is devoted to His service, persons may be called holy who stand in a close relation to God, inasmuch as they are in a special sense His servants. Very instructive is Nu 16<sup>7</sup> 'In the morning the Lord will show who are his, and who is holy.' As applied to persons and to the nation, holiness acquired a deeper significance. In the Law of Holiness (Lv 17:1) the command, 'Ye shall be holy; for I the Lord your God am holy' (Lv 19<sup>2</sup>), is seen to involve both external requirements referring to ritual, and inward requirements referring to moral character.

The holiness of God means, if the positive idea is primary, His 'essential Divinity.' Kittel's exposition accords with Bengel's saying that God's glory (כבוד) is His disclosed holiness, and His holiness (קדוש) is His inner glory. God's holiness is 'that which proves Him to be God; that which is worthy of God.' Cf. 'The Lord God hath sworn by His holiness' (Am 4<sup>2</sup>), with 'The Lord God hath sworn by Himself' (Am 6<sup>8</sup>). If it be said that this definition is vague, the reply is that 'the Divine essence cannot be expressed in a single formula which is suitable for all stages in the development of the OT idea of God.' It is a manifest advantage of this view that the evolution of the idea of holiness finds its explanation in the historical evolution of the idea of God. An early stage is seen in 1 S 6<sup>10</sup> 'Who is able to stand before the Lord, this holy God?' None may approach Him save those who have complied with the prescribed regulations (cf. 1 S 21<sup>5</sup>). As the moral nature of God was more clearly apprehended, the conception of His holiness was spiritualized; in Hos 11<sup>9</sup> 'I am God, and not man; the Holy One in the midst of thee,' the Divine holiness is the ethical motive of the resolve, 'I will not come in wrath (RVm) into the city.' Kittel rightly distinguishes God's glory from His holiness: 'Glory' is a cosmic predicate of God, and refers to the outshining of His attributes, which may be metaphysical or moral; but 'holiness' has always a tendency to acquire an ethical significance, and becomes at last solely His moral glory. The fact that the conception of holiness varies with the conception of God explains the occasional deterioration of the idea. When stress was laid upon the transcendence of God, stress was also laid upon ritual purity. But, in general, later Jewish teaching has insisted upon moral as well as ceremonial purity as being essential qualifications for the service of the Holy One of Israel. Rightly to understand the meaning of 'holy' as used by our Lord and His contemporaries, it is needful to remember that for rabbinical Judaism holiness became 'synonymous with purity of life, purity of action, and purity of thought' (see Jewish Encyc. vi. 441b). Holiness is 'an ideal state of perfection attained only by God' (Gruen. Zet. ix. 13a); but 'man grows in holiness the more he aspires to the Divine will, rising above the sensual' (Toma. 39a). Dalman says (Words of Jesus, p. 202) that 'the Holiness' (קדוּשָׁה) became a Divine title (Siphre, Num. 112, ed. Friedm. 33a).

The NT passages which fall within the limits of this article may be classified according as (1) holiness is ascribed to things, places, or persons by (a) the Evangelists, (b) our Lord; (2) holiness is ascribed to Christ (a) in the Acts, (b) in the Epistles.

1. Holiness in the Gospels.—(a) The Evangelists speak of 'the holy city' (Mt 4<sup>s</sup> 27<sup>ss</sup>), 'the holy place' (Mt 24<sup>ss</sup>), 'his holy covenant' (Lk 17<sup>s</sup>); Jerusalem and the temple are holy, as being the abode of God; the covenant made with Abraham is holy, as being a revelation of the gracious purpose of God in choosing a people to serve Him in holiness (Lk 17<sup>s</sup>; see above on ἀβραάμ). Persons are described as holy, because they are devoted to God's service: in the Gospels mention is made of 'the holy angels' (Mk 8<sup>ss</sup>, Lk 9<sup>ss</sup>), 'his holy prophets' (Lk 17<sup>s</sup>), and Herod is said to have recognized the holiness of John the Baptist (Mk 6<sup>ss</sup>); in such uses of the word there is included an assertion of the moral purity which is an essential qualification for the service of God. In Lk 22<sup>s</sup> an OT quotation (Ex 13<sup>s</sup>) explains that the offering of the parents of Jesus, when they presented their child to the Lord in the temple, was a recognition of the fact that every firstborn son was holy as belonging to God. The ascription of holiness to the Divine Spirit (Mt 11<sup>s</sup> etc.) will be considered in paragraph (b); but here it may be noted that in the story of the Annunciation (Lk 1<sup>ss</sup>), Mary is told that the Holy Spirit shall come upon her with the result that her child shall be holy (τὸ γεννώμενον ἁγίου); and that once (4<sup>s</sup>) Jesus is described as 'full of the Holy Spirit.' In Mk 12<sup>s</sup> = Lk 4<sup>ss</sup> the man with an unclean spirit calls Christ 'the Holy One of God,' and according to the true text Simon Peter uses the same title (Jn 6<sup>ss</sup>). The phrase is a designation of the Messiah, described by John (10<sup>ss</sup>) as 'him whom the Father consecrated' (ἁγίασε. For this and other uses of ἁγιάζειν see art. CONSECRATION). Finally, holiness is ascribed to God in the Magnificat, and the whole context ('his mercy,' etc.) shows that 'holy is his name' (Lk 1<sup>ss</sup>) is a declaration of the moral glory of God.

(b) Our Lord never speaks of any person, save the Father and the Spirit, as holy; and only once does He describe any thing as holy. His command, 'Give not that which is holy to the dogs' (Mt 7<sup>s</sup>), is a proverbial expression whose origin is probably some Jewish exclamation of horror at the thought of profaning altar-flesh, which had been offered in sacrifice to God (Lv 22<sup>ss</sup> LXX τὰ ἅγια). A similar saying is quoted from Aristotle: 'Do not fling wisdom into the street' (μὴτε βίβλα σοφίαν εἰς τοὺς ῥιθδούς, op. Themist. p. 234).

The application of our Lord's words need not be limited to preachers of the gospel; and it is certain that they do not sanction any doctrine of reserve in the statement of truth; their obvious meaning seems to be that holy themes are not to be exposed to the contempt of the profane. John Wesley's comment (Sermon xxx.) is both pithy and pertinent: 'Beware of thinking that any deserve this appellation till there is full and incontestable proof.' But 'great and glorious truths are not to be forced upon those who 'contradict and blaspheme,' 'Do not begin a discourse with these upon remission of sins and the gift of the Holy Ghost. . . . The most probable way to make Felix tremble is to reason with him of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come.'

In each of the four Gospels there are passages in which our Lord speaks of the Holy Spirit, viz. Mt 12<sup>ss</sup> 22<sup>ss</sup>, Mk 3<sup>ss</sup> 12<sup>ss</sup> 13<sup>s</sup>, Lk 12<sup>ss</sup> 15<sup>s</sup>, Jn 14<sup>ss</sup> 20<sup>ss</sup>. In so speaking He definitely ascribes essential Divinity to the Spirit. Not in this way could He have spoken of 'a created Intelligence above the angels' but inferior to Himself. Moreover, this Divine agent is distinguished both from the Father who sends Him, and from the Son in whose name He is sent; and in the NT the phrase which normally describes Him—the Holy Spirit— ascribes to Him the essential attributes of Deity, the moral glory of God.

In this sense Dalman's words (op. cit. p. 202 f.) must be understood when he says, 'As regards content, there is no difference between "Spirit of God" and "Holy Spirit."' He is careful to point out that, as 'the Holiness' had become a Divine title, 'it might readily be supposed that in the term קדוּשָׁה הוּא "the Holy Spirit," the word קדוּשָׁה became in reality a name for God, so that τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ θεοῦ would represent it more accurately than τὸ ἁγιῶμα τοῦ θεοῦ. But in that case terms like קדוּשָׁה הוּא "thy holy spirit" (Ps 51<sup>s</sup>), קדוּשָׁה קדוּמ "my holy spirit" (Targ. Is 49<sup>s</sup>), would be impossible. And yet it must be maintained that the addition of קדוּשָׁה is expressly meant to specify Divinity as an attribute of the Spirit.' See, further, HOUY SMIR.

The last recorded example of our Lord's use of the word 'holy' is in His intercessory prayer. He who never called any human being 'holy' prays that His disciples may attain unto holiness. His petitions are both negative and positive: from the corruptions of the world He asks that they may be kept in the name (Jn 17<sup>s</sup> 14<sup>v</sup>) which in its fulness it had been His mission to reveal. But it is not enough for them to be kept from entering the domain of the Evil One (Jn 17<sup>ss</sup> ἐκ τοῦ πανθοῦ, cf. 1 Jn 5<sup>ss</sup> 'the whole world lieth in the evil one'). If they are to continue Christ's work, they must be partakers of His holiness, for only in complete devotion of all their powers to the service of God can they share their Master's joy. Hence He also asks, as in absolute self-sacrifice He consecrates Himself, that 'they themselves also may be consecrated in truth' (Jn 17<sup>ss</sup>). In these petitions the love of Christ for His own finds full expression, and they are fitly introduced by the unique phrase 'Holy Father' (cf. 'Father, v.', and 'righteous Father, v. 29'). In this glorious name of God 'all excellences meet'; purity and tenderness unite, majesty and pity combine. Christ regards this all-sufficient knowledge of God as 'an ideal region of security,' in which His disciples will be safe from harm. As long as they are 'in the name,' it will be impossible for thoughts of God's holiness to suggest that it is dangerous to approach the Holy Father (cf. 1 S 6<sup>ss</sup> 21<sup>s</sup>, and see above). Nor can the revelation in Christ of His 'pitiful tenderness Divine' lead to sinful presuming on His grace, and to neglect of moral purity, without which none may hold communion with the Holy Father. Therefore, as in the OT the conception of holiness varies with the conception of God, so in the NT the climax of the revelation of the Father in the Son is reached in the harmonizing of the 'many-hued' manifestations (cf. πολυχίλος, Eph 3<sup>ss</sup>) of His glory in the pure, white light of His holy love. The opening petitions of the Lord's Prayer teach that His Kingdom will come and His will be done 'as in heaven, so on earth,' when in His Church on earth as in heaven the name of the Holy Father is hallowed (Mt 6<sup>ss</sup> ἁγιασθήτω τὸ ὄνομα σου . . . ὡς ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς).

2. The holiness of Christ.—Outside the Gospels holiness is ascribed to Christ in the Acts and the Epistles.—(a) The Acts. St. Peter (2<sup>ss</sup>) and St. Paul (13<sup>ss</sup>) see in the resurrection of Jesus proof that He is God's 'Holy One,' in whom is fulfilled the Messianic promise that He should not see corruption (Ps 16<sup>10</sup>; RvM renders  $\kappa\tau\tau\iota$  'godly or beloved,' see above on  $\delta\sigma\iota\omicron\varsigma$ ). In the prayer of the early Church, Jesus is twice described as Jehovah's 'Holy Servant' (4<sup>25-26</sup>), and it is probable that St. Peter has in mind Is 53 when he speaks of Jesus as 'the Holy and Righteous One' (3<sup>14</sup>, cf. v. 12). In these passages  $\delta\gamma\iota\omicron\varsigma$  is applied to the ideal Servant, in whose consecration, even unto death, God's moral glory was revealed.—(b) The Epistles. Our High Priest, for ever 'separated from sinners,' is 'holy' (He 7<sup>26</sup>). Here  $\delta\sigma\iota\omicron\varsigma$  is a comprehensive summary of those inward qualities which were manifested by our Lord's dutiful submission to His Father's will; pre-eminently He was 'pure in heart,' fitted to exercise, in the presence of God, His ministry of intercession. In Ro 1<sup>4</sup> 'the spirit of holiness' is not a synonym of Holy Spirit; holiness is ascribed to the spirit of the Incarnate Son. The  $\pi\alpha\rho\theta\epsilon\iota\alpha$  of Christ was human; in this respect He was 'made like unto his brethren' (He 2<sup>7</sup>); but His spirit was holy, and in that He was 'without sin' (4<sup>8</sup>). He was unique among men. His 'spirit of holiness' was 'the seat of the Divine nature'; He was filled with the Holy Spirit, and being 'essentially filled with God' was 'full of Divine unpoluted life' (cf. Meyer, Com. in loc.). St. Paul declares that it was in complete accord ( $\kappa\alpha\rho\acute{\alpha}$ ) with the transcendent holiness which was the characterizing quality of the spirit of Christ that His Divine Sonship should be 'visibly manifested in the miracle of His resurrection.' In 1 Jn 2<sup>20</sup> 'Ye have an anointing ( $\chi\rho\iota\sigma\mu\alpha$ ) from the Holy One,' the reference may possibly be to God the Father; but almost certainly the Holy One is Christ (cf. 3<sup>6</sup> 'He is pure,' and see above). The true reading in v. 27 ( $\alpha\epsilon\tau\epsilon\rho\acute{o}\nu$  not  $\tau\acute{o}$   $\alpha\epsilon\tau\epsilon\rho\acute{o}\nu$ ), 'His anointings,' seems to remove all ambiguity. St. John says that Christians have a chrism from the Christ; and there can be little doubt that the predominant reference in chrism is to the Holy Spirit. It is 'a faint prelusive note,' and in 3<sup>24</sup> 'the full distinct mention of the Holy Spirit comes like a burst of the music of the "Veni Creator," carrying on the fainter prelude' (Expos. Bible, p. 170).

The chief contributions to the formal exposition of the NT doctrine of holiness lie beyond the limits of this article. It need occasion no surprise that even to His disciples our Lord should not speak directly concerning holiness until in His farewell prayer He asked that the men called to continue His mission might share His consecration. The reason for His reticence is that 'in Him, and for them, holiness imported something—far more and other than it did in the religion of the day. . . . Only as they saw their Lord devote His person in the consummating sacrifice would they be prepared to realize what their Christian consecration involved' (Findlay, Expositor, VI. [1901] iv. 5). It is also significant that the prayer for His disciples' holiness should immediately follow the discourse in which our Lord expounds in welcome detail what is involved in the promise of the Spirit whose gracious indwelling is the secret of holiness.

The Gospels are, however, the supreme revelation of holiness. The imitation of Christ is the royal road to holiness; His teaching concerning union with Himself and the bestowment of the Holy Spirit reveals the secret of holiness. The writers of the Epistles, under the guidance of the promised Teacher, unfolded the implications of their own experience and the purpose of the Incarnation, the Passion, and the abiding Priesthood of the Son of God.

The stress laid on the positive idea, which is probably the primary conception of holiness, may serve to guard Christians against the error of supposing that holiness may be acquired by withdrawals and negations, or by compliance with external regulations. Holiness means the attainment of the Divine likeness, and this consists in moral qualities which are all comprised in holy love. The motive to holiness increases in strength as God is more perfectly known. In proportion as the Holy Father is known as He is, will be the gladness of our response to His claims, and the ardour of our desire to be like Him in this world. Into the world Christ sent the men for whose consecration He prayed, and His promise, 'Ye shall know that ye are in me' (Jn 14<sup>21</sup>), conveyed to them His assurance that 'in the world' they should attain to holiness. Life in Christ is holiness.

HOLY ONE.—The expression 'the Holy One,' or 'the Holy One of God,' is used several times in the NT to describe our Lord. It is in itself so remarkable, and used in a manner so calculated to arrest attention, that it has been surmised that we have here a characteristic designation of the Messiah (Meyer on Mk 1<sup>24</sup>). While it may be doubted if so positive an assertion can be justified, the expression is sufficiently striking to require a careful examination into its origin and its significance.

A scrutiny of the passages in which the AV has rendered the Greek expression by 'the Holy One,' will show that for the word 'holy' we have two Greek words,  $\delta\sigma\iota\omicron\varsigma$  and  $\delta\gamma\iota\omicron\varsigma$ . Now, since the two passages in which  $\delta\sigma\iota\omicron\varsigma$  occurs are in a quotation from the LXX, and the signification of the term is most likely to be derived from a Hebrew original, it will be necessary to ask if these two words are uniformly used to represent corresponding Hebrew ones, or used indiscriminately to tr. different Heb. words in different places.

In the OT there are two distinct words used for 'holy,'  $\קָדֵשׁ$  and  $\שׁוֹבֵה$ , and it is to be carefully noted that in the LXX, although  $\delta\sigma\iota\omicron\varsigma$  tr.  $\קָדֵשׁ$  about 30 times, and  $\delta\gamma\iota\omicron\varsigma$  tr.  $\שׁוֹבֵה$  100 times, in no single instance is  $\delta\sigma\iota\omicron\varsigma$  used for  $\שׁוֹבֵה$ , or  $\delta\gamma\iota\omicron\varsigma$  for  $\קָדֵשׁ$ . (See French, NT Synonymes.)

It is reasonable, then, to look for the signification of  $\delta\sigma\iota\omicron\varsigma$  in  $\קָדֵשׁ$ , and  $\delta\gamma\iota\omicron\varsigma$  in  $\שׁוֹבֵה$ . See art. HOLINESS.

A. Passages in which our Lord is described as 'Holy One,'  $\delta\sigma\iota\omicron\varsigma$  being used. As a substantive expression it occurs only in Ac 2<sup>27</sup> 13<sup>35</sup>—in both cases a quotation from Ps 16<sup>10</sup>—used first by St. Peter and afterwards by St. Paul,— $\alpha\iota\delta\epsilon\iota\delta\epsilon$   $\delta\delta\omicron\sigma\tau\epsilon\iota\varsigma$   $\tau\omicron\nu\theta$   $\delta\epsilon\lambda\omicron\nu$   $\sigma\omicron\nu$   $\delta\epsilon\theta\epsilon\iota$   $\delta\iota\alpha\phi\theta\omicron\rho\alpha$ . Without a reference to the Hebrew, it might appear that such an expression, taken from the OT and applied by Apostles to Christ, would carry with it peculiar significance; but beyond the fact that the Apostles so used the expression, there is nothing in the words themselves to justify any unique position in which our Lord was described as 'holy.'

B. Passages in which our Lord is described as 'Holy One,'  $\delta\gamma\iota\omicron\varsigma$  being used. If the examination of the foregoing passages prevents us giving to the word  $\delta\sigma\iota\omicron\varsigma$  any peculiar significance which would make it describe our Lord as a being of peculiar holiness, the case is quite otherwise when we come to the expression  $\delta\gamma\iota\omicron\varsigma$ .

1. Use of the title.—We find it first on the lips of the demoniac (Mk 1<sup>24</sup>, Lk 4<sup>24</sup>), who, in declaring his knowledge of Christ, describes Him as 'the Holy One of God' ( $\alpha\gamma\iota\omicron\varsigma$   $\sigma\epsilon$   $\tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$   $\epsilon\theta$ ,  $\delta$   $\delta\epsilon\theta\epsilon\iota\circ\varsigma$   $\tau\omicron\nu\theta$   $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\theta$ ). The words probably made a deep impression on the disciples. We know how vague and uncertain were their views about their Master, and it would seem as if they seized on the demoniac's confession as a revelation of His claims; for, the next time the title is ascribed to Him, it is by St. Peter himself, when striving to find words to answer our Lord's question if they too intended to abandon Him: 'Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we have believed and know that thou art the Holy One of God' (ὅτι αὐτὸς ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ [so correct reading], Jn 6<sup>68</sup>).

St. Peter, in his speech to the people in Solomon's porch (Ac 3<sup>14</sup>), charges them with denying 'the Holy and Righteous One' (τὸν ἅγιον καὶ δίκαιον). St. John (1 Jn 2<sup>20</sup>) tells his readers that they have 'an anointing from the Holy One' (ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου). In Rev 3<sup>7</sup> our Lord so describes Himself in the address to the Church of Philadelphia: 'These things saith he that is holy' (ὁ ἅγιος).

2. Derivation of the title.—We have seen that the significance of ἅγιος is naturally to be looked for in the Heb. qados, which, like qayy, is freely employed of places, things, and persons. Yet, while qayy is used of God only in Jer 3<sup>23</sup> (LXX ἀγιωσαν) and Ps 145<sup>17</sup> (LXX θσιος), where it is joined with a reference to His works ('holy in all thy works'), qayy is used very frequently to describe God Himself. It is so found in the Books of Job, Psalms, Isaiah, Hosea, and Habakkuk; qayy 'the Holy One,' LXX ὁ ἅγιος. Besides the simple title 'the Holy One,' God is 24 times called by Isaiah 'the Holy One of Israel'; elsewhere only in Ps 71<sup>22</sup> 78<sup>24</sup> 80<sup>15</sup>, Jer 50<sup>29</sup> 51<sup>5</sup> [2 K 19<sup>22</sup> = Is 37<sup>22</sup>] qayy.

3. Its significance as applied to our Lord.—To men familiar with the OT expressions 'the Holy One' and 'the Holy One of Israel,' as describing God Himself, it would seem almost impossible that the expression could have been used of Christ without a distinct desire to connect His title with that of Jehovah. Every male firstborn was indeed 'holy to the Lord' (Lk 2<sup>23</sup>). But on the lips of St. Peter and the demoniac it must be felt to have that special and distinct significance such as Jesus Himself implies in Jn 10<sup>36</sup>, when speaking of Himself as one 'whom the Father sanctified (ἁγιασεν) and sent into the world.' Spoken by our Saviour of His Father (Jn 17<sup>14</sup>), it signifies that which He is absolutely; spoken of Christ Himself, it means both this and also His special dedication to the work of man's salvation (e.g. in Ro 12<sup>1</sup> it is used with the force of a sacrificial metaphor, the victim consecrated to God). Christ was indeed the Holy One of God above all others, but that which He was He came in a measure to make His people, so that, in the language of the NT, those who through Him were consecrated and set apart were also ἅγιοι. See, further, art. HOLINESS.

HOLY SPIRIT.—With the exception of the 2nd and 3rd Epistles of John, every book in the NT mentions the Spirit. On a comprehensive view, indeed, it may be said that to understand what is meant by the Spirit is to understand these two things—the NT and the Christian Church. Not that the two can be precisely co-ordinated; yet in them and in their mutual relations we have the only adequate witness to what the Spirit means for Christians. To the men who wrote the NT and to those for whom they wrote, the Spirit was not a doctrine but an experience; they did not speak of believing in the Holy Spirit, but of receiving the Holy Spirit when they believed (Ac 19<sup>2</sup>). In some sense this covered everything that they included in Christianity. The work of the Christ was summed up in the words: 'He shall baptize with holy spirit' (Mk 1<sup>8</sup>). The acceptance of the gospel is the subject of the question: 'Was it by works of law or by the hearing of faith that you received the Spirit?' (Gal 3<sup>2</sup>). The entire equality of Jews and Gentiles in the Christian community is asserted in the words: 'God who knows the heart bore them witness in that he gave the Holy Spirit to them even as he did to us' (Ac 15<sup>8</sup>). After this, there was no more to be said. Yet the very fact that all who speak to us in the NT are familiar with experiences of the Holy Spirit does not always make it easier for us to understand them. It is clear that very various experiences are described in this way, and sometimes we cannot refrain from asking whether experiences which one writer recounts without any reference to the Spirit would not have been explained as 'pneumatic' by another; or vice versa, whether experiences ascribed to the Spirit by one writer would not in another have found a different interpretation. Further, there is the difficulty raised by the fact that while the experiences thus explained are represented, broadly speaking, as the work of the Risen Saviour, and as dependent somehow on His death and resurrection, the Spirit appears also in His life on earth. Was this the same thing? When we read that Jesus was baptized with the Holy Spirit, are we to suppose that He had experiences in consequence of which analogous to those of Christians in the Apostolic age? The purpose of this article is to bring out the facts as they are presented in the oldest Gospel to begin with, and to show from later stages in the history the relation between the Spirit and Jesus the Christ.

1. The earliest reference to the Spirit is in the preaching of the Baptist. To the end John was conscious of the impotence and inadequacy of all his efforts: the true Helper of Israel, whatever else he might be, must be 'One mightier than I.' 'I baptize you with water, he shall baptize you with holy spirit' (Mk 1<sup>8</sup>). A Christian Evangelist, like the author of the Gospel, might interpret such words in the light of his own post-Pentecostal experiences; and when we find the later Evangelists (Mt 3<sup>11</sup>, Lk 3<sup>16</sup>) add to 'holy spirit' the words 'and fire,' it is nearly certain that they have done so.* But it is not clear that for the Baptist the Holy Spirit of which he spoke was so clearly defined. He had not the Christian experience to put meaning into his words, and he can only have intended something which could be understood through its OT antecedents, or through experiences with which he had been in contact at an earlier period. The earliest form of the Gospel says nothing of such experiences, and when we look backward we cannot but be struck by the almost total disappearance of the Spirit from the apocalyptic literature of Judaism. 'First and Second Maccabees and Daniel are each in a different way witnesses for a very profound religious feeling of exactly the sort that in other ages, either earlier or later, would have been ascribed to the Spirit' (Wood, The Spirit of God in Biblical Literature, p. 71; cf. Gunkel, Die Wirkungen des heiligen Geistes, p. 50 f.). Yet the Spirit is not appealed to in explanation. When we come to the Hebrew OT, however, the one idea which is dominant in connexion with the Spirit is the one which is wanted here to explain the prophecy of the Baptist—the idea of power as opposed to impotence. The inability of Egypt to help Israel is expressed by Isaiah in the words: 'The Egyptians are men and not God, and their horses flesh and not spirit' (31<sup>2</sup>).

* The reference of the 'fire' in this connexion to the fire of Gehenna seems to the present writer (in spite of Mt 3<sup>12</sup>, Lk 3<sup>17</sup>) simply incredible. The true key to it is Ac 2<sup>3</sup>, and the many passages in which the same or a similar figure recurs, e.g. 1 Th 5<sup>6</sup>, Ro 12<sup>11</sup>, Ac 15<sup>29</sup>.

Men and flesh are the impotent things, in contrast with the omnipotent, God and spirit. As A. B. Davidson puts it (Theology of the OT, 128), 'the Spirit of God ab intra is God active, showing life and power . . . the Spirit of God ab extra is God in efficient operation, whether in the cosmos or as giving life, reinforcing life, exerting efficiency in any sphere.' John the Baptist was a worker for God, but he never claims for himself either to have the Spirit or to be able to give it; he has the sense, however, that when the 'Mightier than himself comes, He will be distinguished in precisely these ways. He will baptize with 'holy spirit' in virtue of being full of the Spirit himself.

2. When Jesus comes to be baptized in Jordan, the remarkable phenomenon is that what for others is a baptism with water coincides for Him with a baptism in the Holy Spirit. According to Mk 1<sup>9</sup>, as Jesus ascends from the water, He sees the heavens cleaving and the Spirit as a dove descending upon Him. In the earliest Evangelist this is the experience of Jesus only: it is He who sees the Spirit descending, He to whom the heavenly voice is addressed. The later Evangelists may have conceived it otherwise, and extended the vision and the hearing of the voice to John the Baptist or even to the bystanders: it is indifferent here. All agree that on this occasion Jesus received the Holy Spirit, and in it the attestation of His Sonship, the call to His unique task, and the endowments needed to discharge it.

Critics have suggested that the curiously indirect way in which the baptism of Jesus and the descent of the Spirit are mentioned in Lk 3<sup>21</sup> is due to the writer's desire to slur over something which is really inconsistent with his account of Jesus' birth; but even if Luke had difficulty in adjusting these two things, as the Fourth Evangelist may have had difficulty in adjusting the incarnation of the Eternal Logos in Jesus with the descent of the Spirit upon Him in manhood, it is clear that for both the baptism was so securely fixed in the Gospel testimony that they had no alternative but to set it unambiguously down (cf. Jn 1<sup>33-34</sup>).

Have we any means of saying what is meant by such words as the Evangelists employ in this connexion? Can we interpret Jesus' experience by what we read of spiritual gifts or states in the Primitive Church? Is it right to look in His life for such phenomena as we find, e.g., in Acts or in 1 Cor. ascribed to the Spirit? May we look for such sudden accesses of feeling as we connect with scenes like Ac 2<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>31</sup> 13<sup>9</sup>? Can there be such a thing as the rapture or ecstasy which seems to be meant by being 'in the Spirit' in Rev 1<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>2</sup> 17<sup>2</sup> 21<sup>10</sup>? These are not questions to be answered a priori. There must have been something in the life of Jesus as determined by the great experience of His baptism akin to the experiences which Christians subsequently ascribed to the Spirit, or they would hardly have traced both to the same source; and the more closely we look into the Gospels, the less does the emotionally colourless Saviour of popular art seem to correspond to the historical reality. The experiences of Jesus at the Baptism and the Transfiguration were not those of everyday life; they belong to 'pneumatic' as contrasted with normal conditions. So again it might be said that if the cleansing of the temple (Mk 11<sup>15-17</sup>), the cursing of the fig-tree (11<sup>14</sup>), the excitement (apparently) with which, on the way to Jerusalem, Jesus took the lead of His disciples, to their bewilderment and fear (10<sup>39</sup>), had been told of anybody else, that other would have been described, on each occasion, as 'filled with the Holy Spirit.' However this may be (see J. Weiss, Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes, p. 54 n.; O. Holtzmann, Wahrheit Jesu Ekstatiker?), the Evangelist makes no reference to the Spirit in this connexion. He leaves us to infer from the life which Jesus lived in the Spirit what the Spirit itself was. But it may fairly be said that some of the ideas which Christians subsequently connected with their own baptism were not without relation to the baptism of Jesus and to the interpretation which they put upon it. It was the facts of His baptism which led them to believe (a) in a normal coincidence of baptism with the Spirit and water-baptism, instead of in the displacement of the latter by the former; (b) in the Spirit received in baptism as specifically the spirit of sonship; and (c) in that same Spirit as one consecrating them to God and to service in His kingdom.

3. The first light is thrown on the nature of the Spirit as received by Jesus in the narrative of the Temptations. It is the Spirit which sends Him out to the wilderness, there to engage in conflict with the power of evil. The word ἐβάλλει (Mk 1<sup>13</sup>), though it must not be forced, suggests a Divine impulse which could not be resisted. Jesus was Divinely constrained—for the Spirit is always Divine—to face the ultimate issues of His work from the very beginning, to contemplate all the plausible but morally unsound ways of aiming at ascendancy over men for God, and to turn from them; to face the Prince of this world, and to demonstrate that that Prince had nothing in Him. The most elementary notion of the Spirit may be that of Divine power, but where we see it first at work in Jesus it is Divine power which is at the same time holy; it is at war, in principle, with everything which is unworthy of God; the kingdom which the Son of God is to found in the power of the Spirit is one which can make no kind of compromise with evil. It must be spiritual (in the complete Christian sense) in its nature—not based on bread; spiritual in its methods—not appealing to miracles which only dazzle the senses or confound the mind; and spiritual in its resources—not deriving any of its strength from alliance with Satan, from borrowing the help of the evil which wields such vast power among men, or from recognizing that it has a relative or temporary right to exist. The Spirit, as Mk. calls it (1<sup>10-12</sup>), while Mt. has 'God's spirit' (3<sup>16</sup>), and Lk. 'the holy spirit' (3<sup>22</sup>) or 'holy spirit' (4<sup>1</sup>), is the Divine power with which Jesus was endowed at His baptism, and which committed Him to an irreconcilable conflict with evil. It is the conscious and victorious antagonist of another spirit, of which all that need be said is that it is not of God.

4. St. Luke tells us that Jesus returned from the Jordan 'in the power of the Spirit' into Galilee (4<sup>14</sup>), and St. Peter in Ac (10<sup>38</sup>) tells how God anointed Him (in the Baptism) 'with holy spirit and power'; and it is under these conditions that the Evangelists conceive His whole ministry to be fulfilled. If they do not mention the Spirit at every step, it is because they think of Him as in full possession of it continually. It probably agrees, e.g., with the Evangelist's own idea, to say that the passage in Mk. which immediately succeeds the Temptations illustrates first by Jesus' power over men (1<sup>16-20</sup>), next by His power or authority in teaching (1<sup>21</sup>), and, finally, by His power over demons (1<sup>23-27</sup>), what is involved in His possession of the Spirit. A Divine power accompanied all His words and deeds, and made them effective for God and for His kingdom. The allusion in 1<sup>30</sup> to His rising early and going away to a desert place to pray suggests that, Divine as this power was, it wrought in, and in accordance with the laws of, a human nature which was capable of spiritual exhaustion, and had to recruit its strength with God. We do not find till we come to 3<sup>21</sup> ('they said, He is beside himself, ἐξέρρη') any further indication of how His work in the Spirit affected Jesus. It is clear from this impatient word, in which the same charge is brought against the Lord as was afterwards brought against Paul (see

2 Co 5<sup>13</sup>, where ἐξέστημεν is opposed to σωφρονοῦμεν, that the tension of His spirit seemed at times abnormal: He was 'rapt' or 'carried away' by His earnestness, and became for the time unconscious of bodily needs or indifferent to them (cf. the fast in the wilderness, and Jn 4<sup>21c</sup>). Possibly even the charge brought against Him by the scribes, that He cast out devils by Beelzebub, in other words, that He was possessed Himself by a demon,—a charge mentioned in this connexion by Mk.,—appealed for support to this tension or rapture. If the character of Jesus' teaching and healing had been that of emotionless placidity, it would not have been even plausible to say δαίμονιον ἔχει καὶ μαλ' αὐτοῦ (Jn 8<sup>46, 52, 10<sup>30</sup></sup>; these passages from the Fourth Gospel are guaranteed by their agreement with Mk 3<sup>22b</sup>). There is no trace in the Gospel of any want of self-control,—no such frenzy as is ascribed to the Spirit in 1 S 19<sup>24</sup>, or in the description of the glossolalists in 1 Co 14,—but there is a superhuman intensity implied which was felt throughout the life in word and deed.

5. The main interest of the passage Mk 3<sup>20-35</sup> lies in the word of Jesus Himself about the Holy Spirit: 'Verily I say unto you, All things shall be forgiven to the sons of men, the sins and the blasphemies, all that they have blasphemed: but whoso shall have blasphemed the Holy Spirit hath never forgiveness, but is guilty of eternal sin: because they said, He hath an unclean spirit' (v. 28<sup>c</sup>). It is hardly doubtful that this is the true form of this much discussed saying of Jesus. The Holy Spirit is not here set in any contrast with Jesus, as though to indicate that Jesus were a venial fault, but to blaspheme the Spirit an unpardonable one; on the contrary, the Holy Spirit is blasphemed when malignant hearts harden themselves to say of Jesus, 'He has an unclean spirit.' The Divine power which works through Jesus with such intensity, healing all who are under the tyranny of the devil, is in point of fact God's supreme and final appeal to men. It is such an exercise of power as is possible only for one who has already vanquished Satan, and is engaged in liberating his captives (Mk 3<sup>27</sup>). No person with any sense for God in him can help being attracted by it to begin with. But if the other manifestations of this power should happen to provoke resentment,—if its ethical demands (as in the teasing of Jesus) should threaten seriously the reputation or the self-complacency of the insincere,—it is fearfully possible that they may set themselves against it, and so resist the Holy Spirit. Such resistance, once begun, may go to any length, even to the length of defiantly misinterpreting the life of Jesus, and affirming it to be from beneath, not from above. This is the sin against the Holy Spirit. In principle, it is the everyday sin of finding bad motives for good actions; carried to its unpardonable height, it is the sin of confronting the Divine holy power which wrought so irresistibly and so intensely in Jesus, and saying anything—the maddest, most wanton, most malignant thing—rather than acknowledge it for what it is. The people who said, 'He has Beelzebub' (3<sup>22</sup>), 'He has an unclean spirit' (v. 30), were not giving expression to their first, but to their last thoughts of Christ. This was the depth which malignity in them had reached. The Holy Spirit receives here a certain interpretation from being contrasted with an 'unclean' spirit. 'Unclean' is a religious rather than an ethical word; the unclean spirit is one which has not and cannot have relations with God: it can only be excluded from His presence, as it excludes those who are possessed by it. The Holy Spirit is specifically God's; it brings Him in His power to men, it is the very token and reality of His presence with them. But it is interpreted more precisely—and this is the point of Jesus' argument as it is brought out in the parallel passage in Mt. and Lk.—by the works which it does. 'If I in the spirit of God am casting out the demons, then the kingdom of God has come upon you' (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>, cf. Lk 11<sup>20</sup>, where for ἐν πνεύματι θεοῦ we have ἐν δακτύλῳ θεοῦ, the Divine power being the essential idea; cf. Ex 8<sup>10 (25)</sup>). When the superhuman power which displays itself with such intensity is manifested in works of this sort, it is clear that it is not merely superhuman, but specifically Divine. To withstand what is so unambiguously the redeeming power of God, and to do so deliberately and malignantly, in the spirit which will kill Jesus rather than acknowledge Him as what He is, is the unpardonable sin.

The form of this saying which appears in Mt 12<sup>28c</sup> and Lk 12<sup>10</sup> has almost certainly been deflected in tradition. Mt really has it in two forms, v. 28 by itself corresponding to what we have in Mk., and v. 29 to what we have in Luke. But in Mt 12<sup>28c</sup> is a doublet, in which the same saying is found, first as it appeared in the Gospel of Mk., and then as it appeared in the collection of discourses generally allowed to have been used by Mt. and Luke. What is meant in the second form, where a word spoken against the Son of Man is contrasted with blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, is not very clear. Mt., who puts the odious charge, 'He has an unclean spirit,' into connexion with the word of Jesus' friends, 'He is beside himself,' might be regarded as giving a key to the meaning, were it not for the fact that 'the Son of Man' does not occur in his text at all. An impatient, petulant word, like 'He is crazy,' bursting in a moment of anxiety or irritation or misunderstanding from hearts that at bottom loved Him, was no doubt a sin; His friends ought to have been more capable of doing Him justice. But it was not a sin which committed the whole nature blindly and finally against God; it could be repented of, and when it was, then, like other sins, it would be forgiven. This would be the word spoken against the Son of Man. In contrast with such a momentary petulance on the part of His friends stands the hideous expression in which hatred of God's present saving power reveals its utter antagonism: 'He has an unclean spirit.' Here the nature is finally committed against God; such a word blasphemes His Spirit—that is, it blasphemes God as He is actually here, working in Christ for man's salvation; as such it is sin absolutely, ἁμαρτία ἀπαράγραπτος, i.e. sin which has the character of finality, and can never be anything but what it is—sin past which one cannot see so to infer the possibility of forgiveness either in this world or in the next.

6. The expulsion of evil spirits from the possessed is regarded in the Gospel as a chief manifestation of the possession by Jesus of the Holy Spirit. But all His miracles are to be understood in this connexion. Without going so far as to say that in the Temptation narratives He is represented as tempted to put to selfish uses the power just conferred through the Spirit in baptism for the ends of God's kingdom, it is a mark of historicity in the canonical Gospels that until He is baptized with the Spirit, Jesus works no miracle. It is the Spirit in which the power is given for all His mighty works (δυνάμεις). It is not likely, however, that when we read of power as having gone forth from Him (which in Mk 5<sup>13</sup> and Lk 6<sup>19</sup> may be only the Evangelist's reading of the facts, but in Lk 8<sup>46</sup> is distinctly ascribed to Jesus Himself), any reference to the Spirit is intended. The wisdom and the mighty works which astonished the Nazarenes (Mk 6<sup>7</sup>) would no doubt be referred to this source by the Evangelist; and when in 6<sup>7</sup> Jesus sends out the Twelve, giving them authority over the unclean spirits, it can only have been conceived as due to the transference to them of a part in that Divine power which had been so wonderfully operative in Him (cf. Nu 11<sup>27</sup>). The idea, however, that it was the Risen Saviour by whom the Spirit was given to the Apostles so dominated the Evangelists, that none of them refers to the Spirit in connexion with this mission of the Twelve during Jesus' lifetime. The Spirit of Jesus in Mk 8<sup>12</sup> is no doubt, as in 2<sup>8</sup>, His human spirit; but if we admit that it is to this that the Spirit of God is most akin, or most immediately attached, it is perhaps not fanciful to suppose that the sigh (ἀναστενάξας, cf. in a similar situation 7<sup>34</sup>) represents the grieving of the Spirit of God by the unbelief and hard-heartedness of man (cf. Eph 4<sup>30</sup>, Is 63<sup>10</sup>). It is more hazardous to argue that only in 'pneumatic' and abnormal conditions—only in a psychological state extraordinarily and violently elevated above the level of common experience—did Jesus identify Himself with the Son of Man, who after a tragic career on earth was to rise again on the third day, or to come on the clouds of heaven (Mk 8<sup>38</sup>, 9<sup>9</sup>, 10<sup>32</sup>, 14<sup>62</sup>). Abnormal conditions such as are here supposed do not persist in sane minds, and to call Jesus an 'ecstatic' or a 'pneumatic' in this sense is only to avoid calling Him a fanatic by using a natural instead of a moral term to describe Him. Certainly the Gospel suggests in this period of His life accesses of intense emotion (Mk 8<sup>38</sup>) and phenomena both in His aspect (9<sup>30</sup>) and in His conduct (10<sup>39</sup>) which must have struck people as unusual, and due to something overpowering within, which it would have been natural to call the Spirit; but in point of fact there is no reference to the Spirit in this period. Perhaps the nearest approach to it is in Mk 10<sup>38</sup>, where Jesus asks James and John, 'Are ye able to be baptized with the baptism with which I am baptized?' There is no doubt that Jesus speaks throughout this scene with unusual elevation of tone; and the figure of baptism, which He could hardly use without recalling the experience at the Jordan and all that His consecration there involved, lifts us into the region where the thought of the Spirit is near. Still, it is not expressed. The Triumphal Entry, the Cleansing of the Temple, and the Blighting of the Fig-tree are all acts implying intensity and elevation of feeling transcending common human limits: often other persons, visited by such impulses with startling suddenness, are said to be 'filled with holy spirit', but in Jesus they do not seem to have made the same impression on bystanders. They did not apparently stand in relief in His life as they would have done in the life of others; little in it is specifically assigned to the Spirit, because the spiritual baptism at the beginning impelled and controlled it throughout. It does not really cast any light on Jesus' experience of the Spirit, when in Mk 12<sup>30</sup> He quotes Ps 110 by 'David himself said in the Holy Spirit': this merely represents the Jewish belief in the Divine inspiration of Scripture, a belief most distinctly preserved in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where OT quotations are introduced by 'as saith the Holy Spirit,' etc. (3<sup>6</sup>, 9<sup>15</sup>, 10<sup>15</sup>; cf. 2 P 1<sup>21</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>, Ac 1<sup>16</sup>). More important is Mk 13<sup>11</sup>, which contains the only promise of the Holy Spirit in the earliest Evangelist. Referring to the persecutions which will come upon the Apostles after His death, Jesus says: 'When they lead you to judgment and deliver you up, be not anxious beforehand what ye shall speak, but whatever is given to you in that hour, that speak; for it is not you that speak, but the Holy Spirit.' The Spirit is here conceived as a Divine reinforcement in the very crisis of need. If fidelity to the gospel brings men to extremity, they will not be left there, but will have experience of superhuman help. It is important to notice that the precise character in which the Spirit which comes to the help of the disciples is here conceived as acting is that of a παρακλητος or advocatus—an idea of which ample use is made in the Gospel and 1st Epistle of John. The term παρακλητος may be due to the Evangelist, but the conception of the Spirit's function goes back to the Lord. It is not the Holy Spirit which is referred to in Mk 14<sup>38</sup>; and in 16<sup>7-9</sup>, although mention is made, as is natural in a late passage based on other NT writings, of most of what are usually called spiritual gifts, the Spirit itself is not expressly named.

If, then, we try to sum up the oldest Evangelic representation, we can hardly say more than that the Holy Spirit is the Divine power which from His baptism, onward wrought in Jesus, making Him mighty in word and deed—a power the character of which is shown by the teaching and by the saving miracles of Jesus—a power to which the sanctity of God attached, so that it is Divine also in the ethical sense, and to blaspheme it is the last degree of sin—a power in which Jesus enabled His disciples to some extent to share, and which He promised would be with them in the emergencies of their mission—a power, however, which (contrary to what we might have anticipated) the Evangelist does not bring into prominence at any of the crises or intense moments of Jesus' life. It takes nothing less than that life itself, from beginning to end, to show us what the Spirit means. If the last Evangelist tells us that the Spirit interprets Jesus, the inference from the first is that Jesus also interprets the Spirit, and that only through Him can we know what it means.

7. If we turn from Mark to the other Evangelic source common to Mt. and Lk., we find little to add to this. Both our First and our Third Evangelists have everything which Mk. has, and their variations (e.g. Mt 3<sup>11</sup>, Lk 3<sup>16</sup> as opp. Mk 1<sup>8</sup>; Mt 12<sup>31</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup> as opp. Mk 3<sup>31</sup>; Mt 10<sup>20</sup>, Lk 12<sup>23</sup> 21<sup>15</sup> as opp. Mk 13<sup>11</sup>) have been noticed already, or are of no consequence. But when we look at what is peculiar to Mt. and to Lk. respectively, there is more to say. Omitting for the moment the first two chapters in each, we notice these points.

(a) It is a mark of historicity in Mt. that in recording the Sermon on the Mount he nowhere alludes to the distinction of 'letter' and 'spirit' which occurs so spontaneously to the modern interpreter of the words of Jesus. On the other hand, in 7<sup>22</sup> we have an utterance of Jesus reproduced in terms which have almost certainly been influenced by post-Pentecostal experiences of the Spirit. It was only then that men 'prophesied' in the name of Jesus, etc., and till they had done so, such language as this could not have been used. Comparison with 1 Cor 13<sup>26</sup> justifies us in saying that we have here the word rather than the words of the Lord. But in any case, the idea that the most amazing gifts of the Spirit are worthless apart from common morality—the idea expanded in 1 Cor 13—is here traced back to Jesus Himself. It is difficult to understand a Divine power, the action of which, so to speak, elevates and reinforces the nature, without raising the character; yet this is undeniably what is contemplated both by Jesus and by St. Paul. Perhaps the underlying truth is that the moral nature is the deepest and the hardest to penetrate by the Divine power, and may remain unaffected by it when other elements of our being have been subdued to its service. The unnaturalness of such a result is reflected on by Jesus in Mt 11<sup>12</sup>, where woes are pronounced on the cities which had seen so many of His mighty works, yet had not repented. It is implied that these mighty works, the works of the Spirit in Him, were of such a character—that is, so holy and gracious—that they ought to have evoked penitence, and brought a new moral life into being. An interesting light is thrown on the Evangelist's own conception of the Spirit in relation to Jesus, by his application to our Lord of the prophecy in Is 42<sup>1-4</sup> 'I will put my spirit upon him, and he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles,' etc. (Mt 12<sup>18-21</sup>). Here not only the power of Jesus, which gives Him assurance of final victory (Mt 12<sup>20</sup>), but His method and His temper—His meekness, patience, constancy—are ascribed to the Spirit. The presence and power of God are felt in His superhuman renunciation of the ordinary ways and tempers of men as much as in the superhuman resources which He wielded. It is again a mark of historicity in Mt. that we find no mention of the Spirit where in a writer dominated by the consciousness of a later time we should certainly have expected it—that is, in the passages which speak of what are sometimes called ecclesiastical prerogatives or functions (16<sup>28a</sup>, 18<sup>25-26</sup>). Contrast with these Jn 20<sup>22</sup>, Ac 15<sup>28</sup>. The Trinitarian baptismal formula, however it be explained, throws no light on the Spirit as an experience in the life of Jesus (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>).

(b) St. Luke's interest in the Spirit, as the most conspicuous phenomenon in primitive Christianity, is well known, and it is apparent in his Gospel. Thus he describes Jesus, as the result of His baptism, as πλῆρης πνεύματος ἁγίου (4<sup>1</sup>), where the adjective seems intended to describe a permanent condition, as opposed to the verb (used of sudden and transient accessions of the Spirit in 14<sup>41</sup>, 67). Similarly he says that in the wilderness ἤγρευτο ἐν τῷ πνεύματι (41), which seems to signify an intense, rapt, and absorbed state of feeling, in which He was carried up and down the desert. The form of words is used elsewhere to describe either possession by an evil spirit (Mk 1<sup>23</sup> ἀθρόωτος ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτῳ) or ecstasy in the Divine (Rev 1<sup>10</sup> ἐγερθῆναι ἐν πνεύματι). More instructive is the way in which St. Luke puts the whole ministry of Jesus under the heading of the Spirit. He returns from the Jordan to Galilee ἐν τῷ δυνάμει τοῦ πνεύματος, and it is this power which is the key to all the marvellous life which follows (4<sup>1</sup>), of the summary account of Jesus' life by the same writer from the lips of St. Peter in Ac 10<sup>38</sup>). But though power—that is, the presence of God, who can do what men cannot do—is the fundamental note of the Spirit, it is not power undefined. St. Luke has no sooner spoken of Jesus as entering on His work in the power of the Spirit, than he interprets this by the scene at Nazareth where Jesus applies to Himself the prophecy of Is 61<sup>1</sup>. 'The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach glad tidings to the poor,' etc. (Lk 4<sup>18</sup>). 'The words of grace which proceeded out of his mouth' on this occasion (v. 22), and the spiritual healings which He wrought, were as unmistakably tokens of the Spirit as the 'mighty works' which the Nazarenes had heard of as wrought at Capernaum.

If the reading of the TR in 985 (ἐν ᾧ ἦσαν αὐτοὶ πνεύματι ἱεροῦ) has any authority, it is to the same intent: the spirit in which Jesus came, to seek and save the lost, was the very opposite of that which wished to call down fire from heaven on the inhospitable Samaritans. There is an approach here to the sense of 'temper' or 'disposition' for spirit, but it is temper or disposition regarded in relation to the power which produces it; the Divine power which works in Jesus makes Him a Saviour, and it is therefore quite different from that other power, whatever it be, which has found its instruments in James and John.
